- The 2013 Constitution was written by people who seized power, for their own benefit, without asking the Fijian people. That is where the democratic deficit starts.
- Too much power was placed in one person's hands. That power was abused. The structure that enabled the abuse must be changed.
- The immunity clauses protect coup-makers from accountability. They protect the people who silenced me. They must go.
- Four coups in fifty years happened because no constitution ever said clearly that you cannot give legal protection to someone who seized power by force. This is the structural gap. The Anti-Impunity Clause closes it. Fiji's own commitment to the International Criminal Court — made in 1999 — means it is already obligated to uphold this principle.
- The electoral system leaves outer islands and rural communities without a direct local voice. Geographic representation must be restored.
- The Vanua — the land, the chiefly system, the indigenous identity of the iTaukei people — was stripped of its constitutional voice. It must be restored, by and for the people whose Vanua it is.

> My parents left me with a better Fiji than the one I am leaving my grandchildren now. My parents knew and strongly respected their Vanua, their Lotu, and their Matanitu. I want my grandchildren to be able to say the same about me.

The Commission's own guide says something I believe with everything I have: the Constitution belongs to the people of Fiji. I am asking this Commission to mean that. Whatever comes out of this review, put it back to the people. Let them say yes or no. Let them choose it. So that for the first time in my lifetime, Fiji has a supreme law that truly belongs to the people it governs.

That is the Fiji I want my grandchildren to inherit. A Fiji built on the three pillars my elders gave me. A Fiji where nobody — no matter how powerful — is above the law that the rest of us must live by. A Fiji where the Vanua, the Lotu, and the Matanitu each have their proper place.

Vanua. Lotu. Matanitu.

Three pillars. One Fiji. A constitution that belongs to all of us.

Eremasi Tova Matanatabu
15 Thomson Crescent, Simla, Lautoka, Fiji
April 2026
Submitted to the Constitution Review Commission of Fiji

REFERENCES

Sources and References

All sources cited in this submission are publicly available. Where possible, online links are provided.

[1] Yash Ghai Constitution Commission Report, 2012. The Commission consulted over 7,000 Fijians. The report was publicly released before the military government rejected it.

[2] Constitution of the Republic of Fiji, 2013. The document as enacted by the military government. Available at: fiji.gov.fj

[3] Constitution of Fiji, 1970 (Independence Constitution). The Westminster-style constitution negotiated with the British Government at independence.

[4] Constitution of Fiji, 1990. Imposed following the 1987 coups. Included Decree No. 9 granting immunity to coup participants.

[5] Constitution of Fiji, 1997. The broadly praised constitution abrogated by military decree in 2009. Included provisions from the Muanikau Accord.

[6] Amnesty International. Beating Justice: How Fiji's Security Forces Get Away with Torture, Ill-Treatment and Deaths in Custody. 2016. Available at: amnesty.org

[7] Freedom House. Freedom in the World 2024: Fiji. Annual assessment of democratic rights and civil liberties. Available at: freedomhouse.org

[8] United Nations Treaty Collection. Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Treaty No. 38544. Fiji ratification date: 29 November 1999. Available at: treaties.un.org

[9] International Criminal Court. Rome Statute, Articles 1, 17, 27. Article 27 states that official government capacity (including Head of State) does not exempt anyone from ICC jurisdiction. Available at: icc-cpi.int

[10] Constitution of Kenya, 2010. Article 3(2): any attempt to establish a government otherwise than in compliance with the constitution is unlawful. Available at: kenyalaw.org

[11] Constitution of South Africa, 1996. Section 2: supremacy of the constitution. Available at: gov.za

[12] United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, 2007. Fiji is a signatory. Available at: un.org

[13] New Zealand Electoral Commission. History of New Zealand's Electoral System — the 1996 referendum that introduced the Mixed Member Proportional system. Available at: elections.nz

[14] Terms of Reference for the Constitutional Review Commission of Fiji, 2026. The governing mandate for this Commission.

[15] Constitution Review Commission. Our Constitution, Our Voice: A Guide to the Constitutional Review Process, 2026.

[16] Brij V. Lal. Fiji: Coups in Paradise. Zed Books, 2009. A comprehensive academic history of Fiji's coups and constitutional changes.

KENYA 2010	Article 3(2) of Kenya's Constitution states: 'Any attempt to establish a government otherwise than in compliance with this Constitution is unlawful.' This clause is enforceable in Kenya's courts and has been used to challenge acts that seek to bypass constitutional authority. [Source: Constitution of Kenya, 2010]

Together with a companion law — a Rome Statute Crimes Act that incorporates Fiji's international commitments into domestic law — the Anti-Impunity Clause would do five specific things:

- Make any future attempt to write immunity for a coup into the constitution legally void from the moment it is written.
- Give Fiji's own courts the tools to act against such attempts without waiting for the international community to intervene.
- Make clear that Fiji's commitment to the International Criminal Court cannot be removed by any domestic law or constitutional change.
- Allow for a conditional, court-supervised path to limited immunity where appropriate — such as through a Truth and Reconciliation process — but prevent anyone from granting themselves immunity.
- Send a clear signal to Fiji's military, to the region, and to the world that Fiji's constitutional order is founded on the permanent principle that power must answer to law.

SOURCES

[1] Constitution of Kenya 2010, Article 3(2) (kenyalaw.org)
[2] Constitution of South Africa 1996, Section 2 (supremacy of the Constitution) (gov.za)
[3] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Articles 1, 17, 27 (icc-cpi.int)
[4] International Law Commission, Principles of International Law Recognised in the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal, 1950

Recommendation: The new constitution must contain an explicit Anti-Impunity Clause stating that any law or provision granting immunity for an unconstitutional seizure of power is void and unenforceable. Parliament should also pass a Rome Statute Crimes Act bringing Fiji's international legal commitments into domestic law. This would close, for the first time in Fiji's fifty-six-year history, the structural gap that has allowed every coup to repeat itself.

ARGUMENT 5

The Electoral System Must Reflect the Will of the People

Pillars engaged: Vanua • Matanitu

The current voting system — a single national constituency — was designed by the Bainimarama regime. In simple terms, it means that all 50 members of parliament are elected from one single national list, rather than from geographic areas. While the abolition of ethnic-based voting (called communal rolls) was a genuine positive step that should be kept, the single national system created a new problem: it cut the link between voters and their local representatives.

If you live in Kadavu, Rotuma, or the outer islands of Lau, you have no MP who specifically represents your community. Every MP represents the whole country in theory, which means in practice they represent wherever the most votes are — the cities. Rural and outer island communities lose their voice.

For the Vanua, this is a deep problem. The Vanua is about belonging to a specific place — specific land, a specific community, specific people you are accountable to. An electoral system that erases place erases something the Vanua holds sacred.

FIJI 2025

When the Rabuka government attempted to amend the constitution in 2025 with a clear electoral mandate from the people, it fell one vote short of the three-quarters majority required. A democratically elected government could not reform the electoral system the people had voted to change. The constitution had been designed to prevent exactly this kind of democratic reform. [Source: Fiji Parliament records, 2025]

Other Pacific nations show there is a better way. Samoa uses geographic areas alongside proportional representation, so that local communities have a direct representative while national fairness is maintained. New Zealand held a public referendum in 1996 and moved to a system that keeps local seats while adding proportional national seats.

SOURCES

[1] New Zealand Electoral Commission, History of New Zealand's Electoral System, 1996 Referendum (elections.nz)
[2] Electoral Commission of Samoa (electoralcommission.gov.ws)
[3] Freedom House, Freedom in the World 2024: Fiji — Electoral Process section (freedomhouse.org)

Recommendation: The Commission should recommend a voting system that brings back geographic representation — so that every island, province, and community in Fiji has a representative directly answerable to them — while keeping the principle that all citizens vote equally, regardless of ethnicity.

ARGUMENT 6

The Rights and Voice of iTaukei and Rotuman Peoples Must Be Protected

Pillars engaged: Vanua • Lotu • Matanitu

The Commission's Terms of Reference specifically ask it to look at the rights of indigenous Fijian and Rotuman people, the protection of native land and customary fishing rights, and the recognition of the Great Council of Chiefs. As an iTaukei man who grew up learning the three pillars from his elders, I regard this as the area where everything I have described in this submission comes together most directly.

The Great Council of Chiefs

The Great Council of Chiefs (GCC) was the constitutional body that gave the chiefly system of the Vanua a recognised voice in the governance of Fiji. It was not a perfect institution — no institution is. But it represented an important principle: that the iTaukei people's own system of authority deserves a place in the national framework.

The 2013 Constitution abolished it.

This submission calls for a reconstituted body — designed with input from iTaukei communities themselves — to be given constitutional recognition. Its authority should come from the Vanua, not from government appointment.

SOURCES

[1] Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013 (the GCC is absent from the document)
[2] Constitution of Fiji 1990, Chapter 7 — The Great Council of Chiefs
[3] Constitution of Fiji 1997, Chapter 11 — The Great Council of Chiefs

Native Land and Fishing Rights

The Terms of Reference call for protection of native land and customary fishing rights, and for iTaukei landowners to receive a fair share of income from resources on or under their land.

The Consultation Must Reach Everyone

If this review process only hears from people in cities, it will produce a constitution shaped by city voices. The Commission's guide says it will travel across the country and sit with communities. I am asking the Commission to honour that commitment fully — to go to Rotuma, to Lau, to Kadavu, to the villages. The voices that matter most on questions of Vanua are not in boardrooms. They are in the places the Vanua is actually lived.

SOURCES

[1] Terms of Reference for the Constitution Review Commission of Fiji, 2026
[2] United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, 2007 (un.org) — Fiji is a signatory
[3] Constitution Review Commission Guide: Our Constitution, Our Voice, 2026

Recommendation: The Commission should recommend: a constitutionally recognised, independently mandated body for the iTaukei people's voice in national affairs, with authority from the Vanua rather than government appointment; enforceable protections for native land and customary fishing rights; genuine constitutional protection for the independence of faith communities; and a consultation process that reaches the outer islands and rural communities as a primary commitment, not an afterthought.

CLOSING STATEMENT

For the Twelve Faces

I have made six arguments in this submission. Let me say what each one means in plain terms.

- The 2013 Constitution was written by people who seized power, for their own benefit, without asking the Fijian people. That is where the democratic deficit starts.
- Too much power was placed in one person's hands. That power was abused. The structure that enabled the abuse must be changed.
- The immunity clauses protect coup-makers from accountability. They protect the people who silenced me. They must go.
- Four coups in fifty years happened because no constitution ever said clearly that you cannot give legal protection to someone who seized power by force. This is the structural gap. The Anti-Impunity Clause closes it. Fiji's own commitment to the International Criminal Court — made in 1999 — means it is already obligated to uphold this principle.
- The electoral system leaves outer islands and rural communities without a direct local voice. Geographic representation must be restored.
- The Vanua — the land, the chiefly system, the indigenous identity of the iTaukei people — was stripped of its constitutional voice. It must be restored, by and for the people whose Vanua it is.

> My parents left me with a better Fiji than the one I am leaving my grandchildren now. My parents knew and strongly respected their Vanua, their Lotu, and their Matanitu. I want my grandchildren to be able to say the same about me.

The Commission's own guide says something I believe with everything I have: the Constitution belongs to the people of Fiji. I am asking this Commission to mean that. Whatever comes out of this review, put it back to the people. Let them say yes or no. Let them choose it. So that for the first time in my lifetime, Fiji has a supreme law that truly belongs to the people it governs.

That is the Fiji I want my grandchildren to inherit. A Fiji built on the three pillars my elders gave me. A Fiji where nobody — no matter how powerful — is above the law that the rest of us must live by. A Fiji where the Vanua, the Lotu, and the Matanitu each have their proper place.

Vanua. Lotu. Matanitu.

Three pillars. One Fiji. A constitution that belongs to all of us.

Eremasi Tova Matanatabu
15 Thomson Crescent, Simla, Lautoka, Fiji
April 2026
Submitted to the Constitution Review Commission of Fiji

REFERENCES

Sources and References

All sources cited in this submission are publicly available. Where possible, online links are provided.

[1] Yash Ghai Constitution Commission Report, 2012. The Commission consulted over 7,000 Fijians. The report was publicly released before the military government rejected it.

[2] Constitution of the Republic of Fiji, 2013. The document as enacted by the military government. Available at: fiji.gov.fj

[3] Constitution of Fiji, 1970 (Independence Constitution). The Westminster-style constitution negotiated with the British Government at independence.

[4] Constitution of Fiji, 1990. Imposed following the 1987 coups. Included Decree No. 9 granting immunity to coup participants.

[5] Constitution of Fiji, 1997. The broadly praised constitution abrogated by military decree in 2009. Included provisions from the Muanikau Accord.

[6] Amnesty International. Beating Justice: How Fiji's Security Forces Get Away with Torture, Ill-Treatment and Deaths in Custody. 2016. Available at: amnesty.org

[7] Freedom House. Freedom in the World 2024: Fiji. Annual assessment of democratic rights and civil liberties. Available at: freedomhouse.org

[8] United Nations Treaty Collection. Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Treaty No. 38544. Fiji ratification date: 29 November 1999. Available at: treaties.un.org

[9] International Criminal Court. Rome Statute, Articles 1, 17, 27. Article 27 states that official government capacity (including Head of State) does not exempt anyone from ICC jurisdiction. Available at: icc-cpi.int

[10] Constitution of Kenya, 2010. Article 3(2): any attempt to establish a government otherwise than in compliance with the constitution is unlawful. Available at: kenyalaw.org

[11] Constitution of South Africa, 1996. Section 2: supremacy of the constitution. Available at: gov.za

[12] United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, 2007. Fiji is a signatory. Available at: un.org

[13] New Zealand Electoral Commission. History of New Zealand's Electoral System — the 1996 referendum that introduced the Mixed Member Proportional system. Available at: elections.nz

[14] Terms of Reference for the Constitutional Review Commission of Fiji, 2026. The governing mandate for this Commission.

[15] Constitution Review Commission. Our Constitution, Our Voice: A Guide to the Constitutional Review Process, 2026.

[16] Brij V. Lal. Fiji: Coups in Paradise. Zed Books, 2009. A comprehensive academic history of Fiji's coups and constitutional changes.

Ministry of Housing

Ministry of Housing
Date: 1-5-2026

Leighton: Good morning and welcome to the team from the Ministry of Housing, in particular the Permanent Secretary Mr. Manasa Lesuma and the team. On behalf of the Constitutional Review Commission, it's my honor to thank you for accepting our invitation and taking the time out of your busy schedule to come and make a submission before the Commission. My name is Leighton Fatiaki, I'll just be going through a few housekeeping matters.

With regards to the mics, if you wish to speak, you'll have to press on the right panel on the mic in front of you to turn the mic on and once you've made your submission if you can also press the same right panel to turn the mic off. Following this the Chair will introduce the Commission and the work that they'll be undertaking as well as introducing the Commissioners or he will ask the Commissioners to introduce themselves. Following this we request that if you can also introduce yourselves as a team, this is for the transcript and the record.

Mr. Valenitabua: Permanent Secretary, good morning, good morning, ladies, welcome to the Commission and the Consultation this morning. We are glad that you responded to our invitation and have turned up here before the Constitutional Review Committee to submit or make submissions to us in relation to what you think about the provisions in the Constitution. Before I move on, on my right is Mr. Conway Beg, one of the Commissioners, on my right is Mr. Ami Koli, Mr. Beg is an architect as you might know since you deal with housing and on my left is Mr. Koli, a lawyer in Labasa.

There should be seven Commissioners, four of them are not here with us. We are getting ready to go to the islands, to the maritime islands next week on Monday so they have sent their request and apologies that they won't be able to be here this morning. That does not mean that we are not taking you seriously. You've got me as a chairperson, you've got a lawyer here on my left and you've got a architect who is also a thinker, a very deep thinker on my right. So, you should be in good hands. We welcome you again.

By way of introduction, the Constitution Review Committee is now out there at the public knowledge. We were appointed by His Excellency the President, His Excellency the President of the Republic of Fiji and our main task is to review the 2013 Constitution. There is a possibility of an amendment of the 2013 Constitution so that we can have provisions removed or repealed or provisions added or provisions just amended within the sections. That is what we are here for or what our task has been given to us. In our term of reference, we have been told to look into the democratic deficiencies in the preparation of this Constitution. One of the deficiencies is that most of us, the majority of us in Fiji, citizens and population of this country did not know how this came about, how the 2013 Constitution came about. It was the work of a very small group of people. We don't even know who. So that democratic deficiency has to be redeemed, has to be cured so that we say in the preamble to the Constitution, we the people of Fiji, it means us, everybody.

Maybe not everybody but the majority. So, the task before us as commissioners is to take submissions, hear submissions, record submissions from the people of this country, record them, collate them, analyze them and decide which provisions should go into the Constitution, which ones should not. So, we are looking at an amendment to this document here. We've had a number of consultations up until the last report I presented. There were more than 20 consultations. Yours is the second last one to be held here this week and the second last one from all the consultations with which we have put up here.

From Monday we will be traveling to the Maritime Islands. I will be heading a team to go to Lau and Lomaiviti. We start from Onoilau and then we come up north to Vanuabalavu, then to Lomaiviti.

And there's another team which will be going to Beqa from Monday, Vatulele, Ovalau and Kadavu. That would be the leg one of this consultation. And then we'll move on to Vanualevu and then Vitilevu.

Finally, the Maritime was decided to be visited first because of the fuel problem we are dealing with. We thought that we'd take the Maritime Islands first in case we run out of fuel then we'll just be dealing with Vitilevu and Vanualevu. So, thank you very much for appearing before us this morning.

We have just been joined by Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau. She was here this morning but had to run off and get something done. And I will now hand over the mic to you, Permanent Secretary, so that you can make your introductions and the ladies and make your submissions.

Mr. Lesuma: Thank you. Vinaka vakalevu, Chair, and we thank you for the opportunity to come before the Commission this morning to present on behalf of the housing sector. So, very briefly with me this morning, on my right is the Director of Housing, Ms. Teopola Kulavati.

On my left is my Principal Research Policy Officer, Ms. Litiana Mua. And on my far right is also our Senior Policy Officer, Ms. Susana Rounds. The Ministry of Housing is fortunate to have members of the Commission because you will see with me today my executive team is made up of three ladies who play a key role in this ministry. And we all see housing as women in any household is a foundation of any family. So, I feel very fortunate being in a ministry surrounded by the ladies who are able to provide the guidance and advice that helps us to deliver our mandated role under the Ministry of Housing. So, to the Chairperson members of the Commission this morning, firstly, we apologize for having to defer the presentations from the last invite that we had received.

I believe the Secretary would have been aware that whilst we had conveyed our apologies it was rather late. We actually went past the date that we were actually invited to present and unfortunately it was an oversight by my secretary who had sent in an email, an apology for the Ministry's oversight, hence our coming in this morning. To the Commission, again on behalf of the Ministry of Housing, we thank you for the opportunity to present our formal recommendations regarding the review of the 2013 Constitution of the Republic of Fiji.

Our submission today outlines a roadmap to move housing to an enforceable constitutional pillar. Our first concern lies with Clause 35 under the Bill of Rights. Currently the State is only required to take reasonable measures within its available resources.

This language creates a loophole where housing is not a stand-alone enforceable right. This does not reflect international human rights standards and we are therefore recommending a transition to an absolute right. We propose that Clause 35 be strengthened and amended to recognize the right to adequate housing as a stand-alone right that imposes a minimum core obligation on the State.

We must move away from policy discretion and toward a constitutional mandate that requires the State to establish affordable social housing and subsidies for our low-income earners or seniors in our marginalized communities. Secondly, we must address the trauma of displacement. Under the Bill of Rights in Clause 39F, it currently offers a general protection against arbitrary eviction, but we feel it lacks the procedural safeguards to protect the vulnerable.

It fails to mandate alternative shelter or resettlement sites. Leaving informal settlements or settlers, especially those on Itoki land and also those on private land, in a state of constant insecurity. The Ministry therefore proposes an anti-homelessness clause.

We believe the Constitution should explicitly state that no eviction should result in an individual being rendered homeless. The law must mandate meaningful consultations and social impact assessments before any court-ordered eviction. No person should be removed from a home without a clear path to an alternative shelter.

Turning to the land sector, again under our Bill of Rights in Clause 27, we find that the clause is far too narrow. Currently, when the State acquires land, compensation is based only on market value. It completely ignores the loss of family livelihood and the cost of relocation.

Furthermore, the clause fails to distinguish between essential public works, like hospitals and roads, and development-led acquisitions from commercial gain. We therefore propose a public interest test to ensure that the compulsory acquisition is strictly a last resort for public good purposes only. Furthermore, committee members, we also advocate for a holistic compensation that covers relocation and livelihood restoration, ensuring that no citizen is left disadvantaged by the State's need or by the owner's needs for the land.

Finally, on Clause 42, again under the Bill of Rights, while it guarantees equality, it fails to mandate that our housing system be inclusive. Accessibility should not be a luxury, it must be a requirement, and we therefore recommend a constitutional mandate that all State-funded housing and public infrastructure comply with universal design principles. We must ensure that our homes and cities are built to be accessible to every citizen, regardless of their physical ability.

Just to conclude, Chair and Commission members, our houses are a foundation of dignity, health and security. We urge this Commission to please consider and adopt these recommendations and turn reasonable measures into enforceable rights, and to ensure that the 2013

Constitution truly protects the most basic needs of every citizen. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Permanent Secretary, we received these written submissions by email last night, or yesterday afternoon. I read it last night. Was there an earlier email sent to us? Yes? No?

Mr. Lesuma: No.

Mr. Valenitabua: So, it's only this one. Thank you for that clarification. Now, we have heard you. Thank you very much for your submissions and the written form, which we received, and the oral submissions that were made before us this morning. Housing is an important aspect of our lives, and that is why it's in the Bill of Rights, because everyone has a right to housing. We've got these sections which have been highlighted. Section 35, the right to housing. Section 39, the eviction, arbitrary eviction. Section 27, compulsory acquisition of property. And Section 42, the rights of persons with disabilities. Am I correct? Right.

Now, normally we ask questions to submitters, and we ask questions for clarifications. At times, there's just reflections on the submissions that have been made to us. So, I'll just ask my commissioners if they have any questions to ask or any comments to make in relation to your submissions this morning. Commissioners?

Mr. Kohli: Thank you, Chair. Thank you. I think you've raised some very humane points on housing, and there's no doubt about it at the moment. The Constitution provides that the government should provide housing, and adequate housing. And I think what happens is that if they are not able to do so, it's onus upon them to say they don't have resources.

That's how my fight goes. But the implications of people being evicted, moving out of the lease when it expires, etc., it has very serious implications. And I think when you're coming to here and saying, it's one thing to say we're a right to housing, and the other thing to say, you move out now, where do we go? So, I take that into consideration, and we'll address that as well. Thank you.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Chair. Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. I apologize sincerely for my tardiness this morning. Please do not take it as a reflection on your esteemed ministry. I offer my apologies. I thank you for your submission this morning. And I'm curious and encouraged to see the inclusion in your recommendations for perhaps a process that would include a social impact assessment in terms of, as Mr. Kohli was also alluding to, people's housing rights in terms of movement and potential displacement. I would just be curious to hear you expand on what such a process might look like. Perhaps an environmental impact assessment is the most familiar term for many of us. But you've touched on an important dimension in terms of how it impacts us socially. Likewise, market value of land versus the broader impacts of loss of livelihood, et cetera. But yes, just to reframe my question, it would just be very welcoming to hear you expand on what a social impact assessment process might look like in terms of your recommendations. Thank you.

Mr. Lesuma: Thank you, Madam. I will answer your questions and also will ask the ladies to come in if I've actually missed out anything. We have realized that for any government interventions, it's important to know what's on the ground. As we speak, there is about close to 300 informal settlements in Fiji. Now, one of the reasons why we have not even been able to determine the exact number is because such an exercise has never been conducted in the past. As we speak, we are working with the New Zealand MFAT. We have supported us in providing funding to conduct a socioeconomic survey for all informal settlements in Fiji.

That is now a process that we are doing as we speak. We are working closely with Fiji Bureau of Stats and we are actually in the process of engaging 36 enumerators to actually conduct this exercise. Really, the reasons behind this is we would like to know the number of families in any house, the details of the combined annual salary, all the information that any household would have, the type of information that we acquire through these surveys.

Through that, it actually helps my team and the policy team to come up with policies that are more targeted. It actually also determines the type of interventions that governments should take. Particularly, through that, we are also able to understand that there are some of those that are still living in informal settlements who would like to go back to their villages but cannot afford to do so. They do not have the means. While others who stay in informal settlements, though they can afford, they have the means of buying a property. This is just not enough. So, for us, these are the type of information that are very useful to us because it tells us really where the gaps are. Not all those that are residing in informal settlements are the poorest of the poor or the very vulnerable. There are those that can actually afford affordable homes but because there has been a shortage of homes in the last so many years, it hasn't been enough provided through government or through the housing authority to provide housing stock, people have resorted in informal settlements.

According to our national housing policy through the studies that we have made, government has to provide 1,600 homes every year for the next 30 years. But again, going back to your question, the social survey is basically a way for us to be able to obtain the type of information that we require to help us help government make the decision that we need to make. Through that, we are able to capture those that qualify for housing authority.

So, we've actually worked with housing authority in ensuring for any subdivision that they develop, 10% of any subdivisions will be for those that qualify from the informal settlements. And that is only possible because of the surveys that we conduct there. So, I hope I've answered that question. But then if the director has anything further to add that I probably missed, please, director.

Ms. Teopola: Chair and members of the commission. Just to add on to what the permanent secretary had mentioned, this is basically for those that have been displaced due to eviction. So, the social impact assessment is to allow us to understand the affordability that they have for housing or alternative options for housing. So, while we look at the income, most of them are very low-income earners. So, in terms of displacing them, what other options do they have to have shelter? So, we have recommended that social impact assessment just to allow us to frame the kind of assistance that can be rendered to them.

So currently, since we have three informal settlements that have been evicted through court order, we have done the social economic assessments. And we have realized that most of them are very low-income earners earning a household income of $30,000 and below. Some of them are casual workers.

So, these are a population that does not have that access to a loan facility because they do not meet the requirements of the commercial banks. So, we try to provide assistance for them through our government-owned financial entity, which is Housing Authority. So the social impact assessment is just to allow us to understand their background, their terms of affordability to alternative housing or shelter that can accommodate them permanently because of the risk of being displaced through court order. So basically, the social impact assessment is just to provide that baseline for us. Thank you.

Mr. Beg: Thank you, Chair. Thank you, PS and members of your team. I don't know what to say. Maybe I – first of all, I might have to declare my interest here because I work closely with this sector as well. And I don't know how to frame my questions because I have to be careful because I'm listening. But first of all, I have to say thank you very much for your submission. And as my fellow commissioners, we will look at it. They're very poignant and to the heart.

The question I wanted to ask was hearing the changes in the constitution that you're recommending is that it's not enough to be in policy. You want it enshrined in the constitution. And there are models around the world that has that. Like, for example, developing countries. I think South Africa has a very strong model and the other developing countries. But Australia and New Zealand don't have it. It's enshrined in – it's not in their constitution. It's through policy. Yeah. So, I – but Fiji's different. We have to do what we have to do. But I just wanted to ask that question. Can you qualify that for me? Yeah. Well, my question was you prefer it to be enshrined in the constitution.

Not very clear because it's not coming through. Even though we write policies, government says this because I can talk all day on this subject, but I don't want to. My position is different here. So, I'm sorry, Chair. I just need to be very careful what I say. Those are my first points.

Mr. Lesuma: Well, we feel that there has to be – it has to be – the law has to be strengthened. Because we've seen that people have been evicted without any care at all in terms of where they go. Government has to put the responsibility in trying to find means and ways to temporarily put them somewhere. I think, for example, people that have been residing on land for generations, the owner has then decided after so many years to relocate them. Because of the need to probably build something on the land.

There is no sense of responsibility taken by the landowners, even though these people have been residing on land for generations, to at least cover part of – but they've actually left everything entirely to the state. We've realized in the – just after the coalition government has come in, there has been a lot of court evictions that have been issued by the court, or even by the court, by the landowners through the court, to evict settlers on the land. They have come to the ministry, basically, and they've even approached the prime minister's office, and a lot have come to the ministry saying, we've been given a court eviction, there's nowhere to go.

But because they've come into government, government has that responsibility to look for some place to – we continue to discuss with the landowners, but there's very lack of commitment from the end to work with government to provide – to help us provide a place where we could actually displace and move them into – the displaced families into where. So, we feel that whilst the policy is there, it's still not strong enough. It has to become law.

So, there's some sense of responsibility for those – for the landowners, basically, who have accommodated people to resettle on their land for generations. If they plan to relocate, then at least there's some sense of responsibility to work with government, because for government to be solely responsible for that, it would be a costly exercise, I understand. I understand also in the constitution, in the 2013 constitution, it says where the resources, it's actually –

Ms. Nailatikau — Its reasonable measures within available resources, sir?

Mr. Lesuma — Within available resources, yeah. We just felt that that's not strong enough. There has to be a commitment on those parties involved to ensure that whoever is going to be resettled has to have a place where he can actually build a home to resettle in. I mean, those are basically how we look at it, learning from the experiences that we've had.

As we speak, we have been tasked by cabinet because of the – I feel like to share this with us. Because of the recent evictions, cabinet has approved that the ministry comes up with a five-year to ten-year relocation and resettlement policy. Now, we have that policy.

That's – we've drafted the policy. We've circulated it to the key ministries that needs to provide the advice, including the ministry of finance. It's going through the government machinery for approval before we go back to cabinet to endorse the policy.

We can even see the differences in views when circulating the policy. Because it is a big ask for government to be able to take on the full responsibility. So, I feel it needs to be strengthened because whoever is the owner of the land that allows people to stay on the land for generations at least have some sense of responsibility to work with government if they have a need to use the land and there's a need to resettle those that are living on the land. Thank you very much.

Mr. Beg: I think you've answered my question. I will debate this with my fellow commissioners, but I hear you loudly and clearly.

Mr. Kohli: It's a space I work in as well, but thank you, sir. I will discuss this further with your commissioners. I noticed that, you see, there is constitution says clearly that you should have in the Bureau of Rights, the government should provide, and if they can't, they have to do it in the spheres that they can't.

But, you know, I'm surprised that nobody has challenged that. In the sense that nobody has taken a government to court. In New Zealand they have, I know that.

Australia, they have. And I'll just share something that might assist you. You'll be aware that when they're overloading of, you know, overloading of trucks, etc., and ADA is to give you a traffic infringement notice, and then you go and challenge.

Then before you challenge, you go and pay $10,000, $20,000, whatever. You have to pay it first and challenge. And the Supreme Court has just ruled yesterday that that infringes upon Bureau of Rights.

ADA can't do that. That is wrong. And for years, including myself, we are guilty of the fact that we didn't take it up because our clients didn't want to take it that far for fear of ADA.

So, I'm saying there may be people who, because of fear, are not taking it. But I think they should take it. If somebody takes that matter to court and says, well, the onus is upon you to say we don't have rent to give or to resettle.

And I think that will help you, not directly, but indirectly. And if that decision comes down, the government might be forced to recognize that they'll be liable if they don't.

Mr. Valenitabua: Do you have any response to that? To that comment? It's a comment, right? It's a comment, not a question.

Mr. Lesuma: But we share equally the same views. We've always been mindful of the fact that what if anyone had taken that up because of what's in the Constitution? Well, we're quite fortunate that we are sitting on this side of the room. We'll leave it to the commission to decide what.

But that is a real issue. There's a shortage of homes, shortage of land parcels. And one would easily take that up and say you have a right to housing.

And while the government is working hard in providing this through the various – there are different programs that the ministry is involved in. We have formalization of informal settlements where we have tenants that are sitting informally. We develop the land around it.

We acquire the land, acquire a development lease. And we actually develop to civil works to ensure that they have electricity, good roads, meeting FRA standards, having the water and sewerage regulations installed. That is part of the program that we do.

But it is a very costly exercise. So, I feel that government is partially trying to provide as much as they can in terms of providing the lands in various ways through housing authority. You will see that we are aggressively addressing that by providing not only the land parcels but we are also building homes for families.

We've realized particularly a lot of Ito case who have actually acquired land. There's a lot of – it is a challenge to try and run around and get the plans, the various offices that they need to go to be able to eventually build a home. So, we've realized that that is one of the challenges that families face.

So, we are now coming back in and providing land and homes for people just to walk in. But then again, whilst we are also providing through housing authority, we have transitional social housing with public rental bond. And the ministry is working with our informal settlements in formalizing the informal settlements.

And also, we are also in the process of acquiring greenfield to move these families to the greenfield. So eventually, they will be able to get a block on the greenfield that we are now, that government is acquiring. So, it is all part of this resettlement, relocation and resettlement program that we are doing.

So, I feel that government is trying its best to provide that environment in terms of providing opportunities for those to own homes. But again, it's still not enough. And anyone can always come up and say that they have not been – government is not honoring inside of what's in the constitution of a person's right to housing.

And you're right, rightly in terms of highlighting that because that was also a concern that we had. No one has ever taken that up. But that doesn't mean that that will not be taken up at some point because of the very slow work that is happening in the housing sector.

And most of it is because of the slow – I think it's mainly because of the budget. It's very costly. And until – I feel until government realizes that the housing sector is one also – one of the main sectors that needs to be prioritized, then it's only then that we'll be able to achieve.

At the moment, I believe there are other sectors that seems to be a priority at the moment. But we will continue to be the voice until the day they realize that it's also a very important sector in Fiji. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yeah. Permanent Secretary, section 35. Section 35 of the constitution.

You started off your submissions in relation to section 35 of the constitution. And you state in paragraph 1.1.1.1 – is there another constitution there? We're getting another one. Yeah.

Sorry. Do the number of pages for your big copies? Page 24. Section 35, subsection 1. It's headed right to housing and sanitation.

Now, I see that in paragraph 1.1.1.1 of the submission, the Ministry of Housing is stating that the constitution does not clearly state the right to adequate housing. Clause 35.1 or subsection – or section 35, subsection 1 – shows that housing is not recognized as a stand-alone enforcement right. Hence, does not access constitutional entitlement to adequate housing.

And then, in paragraph 1.1.2.1, your ministry says that the constitution does not impose any obligation on the state to develop social or public housing programs and so forth. Now, the right – section 35.1.1 – mentions the right of every person to accessible and adequate housing and sanitation. Are you submitting to us that that needs to be made into one subsection alone, so that it says every person has a right to accessible and adequate housing full stop? Is that what you're saying?

Mr. Lesuma: Yes, sir.

Mr. Valenitabua: That makes it stand-alone? It's stand-alone, yeah. That's what we refer to. I see.

So, when the wording as of now, which says the state must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realization of that right, is only a policy guide to the ministry? Yes. Is that right?

Mr. Lesuma: That's right. Okay.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Let us go to section 39. This is for clarification, Permanent Secretary.

We're not trying to, you know, yeah. Right. This is for clarification, because when we get down to collation of the submissions and analysis, we will have to decide what goes into the constitution and what should not go in there.

Mr. Lesuma: Agreed, sir.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yeah. So, now we have one point there, a right to itself, adequate housing.

You mentioned water in your statement earlier. There's a right to water. Someone has to show the water authority of Fiji in relation to that, because of the water.

I'm not suggesting it, I'm just commenting on it. Section 39. Section 39 states every person has a right to freedom from arbitrary eviction from his or her home or to have his or her home demolished without the order of a court made after considering all the relevant circumstances.

And then, subsection 2, no law may permit arbitrary eviction. Now, that is a direct constitutional provision, subsection 2. There should not be any arbitrary eviction, and subsection 1 gives us the qualifier, which is there should be a court order. Now, that means if we look at your submission on paragraph 2.1, you're saying that it's a general statement on forced eviction, correct? It fails to include requirements for eviction process, obligations in the provision of alternative shelters, or resettlement sites.

Mr. Lesuma: Correct.

Mr. Valenitabua: So, you are suggesting to us, or your recommendation to us, is subsection 1 is okay, there has to be a court order before anyone can be evicted, which is the law, and subsection 2 is all right, because it spells out the right, there is no right. But we have to add, say, a subsection 3, which sets out the factors, which has to, maybe one, processes, two, factors, which have to be taken into consideration.

Mr. Lesuma: Yes, sir. Agreed.

Mr. Valenitabua: So, there'll be additions, or you are suggesting additions, subsection 3, the factors to be taken into consideration, like you cannot evict someone unless you find an alternative place for him or her to go to.
That is your telling government then?

Mr. Lesuma: Correct, sir.

Mr. Valenitabua: And then, the processes. Maybe the processes can come under your regulation? The process can come under your regulation.

Mr. Lesuma: But the main law is to be in the constitution, just making them understand, you know, how it can be put in the constitution. I think, Chair, on clarity, on, in terms of alternative shelter, there has to be a shared responsibility on, it's not entirely on the state, but it should be a, the responsibility should also lie with the owners, of the land, who have accommodated, you know, these squatters for so many years. We just feel that there should be some sense of responsibility taken by those who are evicting the families, and not just evicting them blindly.

They should work with government in trying to, so I don't know how, how that will be captured. But again, that's a process, sir. It's not going to be...

Mr. Valenitabua: Are we looking at, are we looking at tenants who have been sitting on, say, Itaukei lands for so many years? So many years.

This is what you're talking about?

Mr. Lesuma: Yes, Chair. Are you also talking about landlords? Landlords.

Landlords on freehold properties that are sitting, and we have generations that are occupying land for so many years.
Well, generations, sir.

Mr. Valenitabua: As squatters.

Mr. Lesuma: Yes, as squatters.

Mr. Valenitabua: What about the normal tenants? People who walk in and they rent houses and this and that?

Mr. Lesuma: We've had a few, through the survey that we've conducted, we've realized that there are also those who are also renting in the homes. The surveys that we also conduct is not a one-off exercise. We do a few in one settlement to see the consistency in terms of who is actually... We've realized that some have been renting for so long, longer than almost the same as those that are currently staying on the land itself.

But we feel, while at the same time, we are also mindful through the surveys, we are also able to capture those that actually benefit from this kind of setup. There are those also who have homes that have been rented out in these informal settlements and live elsewhere. For these cases, they will not be accommodated.

They will be dismantled and they will not be given an alternative site to... So, the exercise is very thorough because we also do title search to ensure that the person that is assisted is a genuine settler that needs to be assisted. And there are those that actually manipulate the process to have a few homes and we are all also able to capture this. And even those that reside overseas who still have homes in these informal settlements are currently being rented out.

We will assist those that are renting, but not the owners who have actually left the community, but have left a building there for someone to rent. I think you addressed very well that there are powers to evict and also not to arbitrarily evict, meaning that the supervisory role is in the court.

Mr. Kohli: But your question is, what after eviction? So, if you look at clause 39, it says here every person has the right to freedom from arbitrary evictions from his or her home or to have his or her home demolished without an order of a court made after considering all the relevant circumstances.

Maybe under that if you include alternative accommodation, including means to resettle...

Mr. Lesuma: Yes, there was a rule. Maybe if you can outline that a bit, define that a bit further.

Mr. Kohli: Then the court will have to take into consideration liability.

For example, at the moment if somebody owes money, goes to court, you want to enforce it. Court will ask how much can you pay, what is your income, how many children you have, what are your expenses. Then court says, all right, you pay this much.

If you have got $100 left, you pay $10 a week. So you have other money, you know. So something like that can come in here as well, take into consideration all those factors before you make an order.

Mr. Lesuma: Yes.

Mr. Kohli: Is that what you're looking at?

Mr. Lesuma: Yes. Totally then.

Ms. Teapola: Yes. Chair, may I just add on in terms of the process of the court eviction. We were recommending that alternative shelter be provided by the party that's evicting the settlers and that the full responsibility does not fall on government as it is right now.

There are three settlements that have been evicted, but then we are taking on the full responsibility to relocate them. So we wish to recommend that court considers that the party, like for landowners, the owners of the freehold land or whoever is evicting that portion of the community, be responsible to provide the alternative shelter and government can come in to facilitate, to ensure that they follow the proper process of actually relocating the displaced families.

Mr. Kohli: Can I just ask you for clarification? Do you have a problem with freehold land? Because in freehold land, as far as I'm aware, the law is this.

If you allow someone to stay on the land and he incurs expenses in erecting his house and you don't evict that person, let him stay there, then you cannot go and evict that person. Correct me if I'm wrong, but

I've succeeded in a few cases where they have said that much area must be given to the person who has resided there for about six years and built a house to his, and you are now gaining, unjustly getting enriched by that house to his detriment. So, the court has allowed him to stay there.

Mr. Lesuma: I thank you, sir, for raising that. There are a few that has the same. I would say the situation is very much how you've actually highlighted.

But again, because it's the third party, we will just wait and see when they come to us. But that's a very valid point that you've raised, and one that those that are residing can easily take it up, but then that's for the court to decide. But it is in some situations exactly in the nature that you've highlighted, the tenants have, with their lawyers, have come in to see the ministry, and they've actually informed us.

There's a court case that's currently provided us the status of where they are in terms of the decision of the court. It's still an ongoing thing. But according, the lawyer has actually advised us, we are basically here to tell you, if we lose this case, I have 200 families that we'll be looking for a place to move to.

Basically, so they are telling us that. And the question is, what will you be doing to these families if we lose the case, and we have to be evicted from a freehold land? We would like to come and give a heads up that these are the families, there's about 200 families that will be required to be evicted or to be resettled. So, in view of the experience that we've had, and as highlighted by the rector, we feel that there should be a sense of responsibility shared by the owner who's currently, who's evicting.

And maybe the court will also see that, you know, like you've raised, that they need to ensure that any decisions made by the court, they need to be mindful that there is another alternative site for them to move to at. So, we will facilitate, but we feel that it will make work easier for us if that's being addressed by the court at that level, in terms of having alternative sites, some sense of responsibility taken in. It may not be fair on those that are the Itaukei landowners, who have allowed people to reside.

So that is probably another scenario that the commission probably will see. It's probably, it's not a one size fits all situation, where we can actually solve all problems with regards to this nature, because of the difference in ownership there. Thank you for that.

Mr. Fateaki: Just for clarity, the questions I wanted to raise was in these different scenarios, what is the narrative of the agreements? So, you have different cases, like leasehold, ITLTB, and then freehold. What is the narrative, what are you seeing in terms of the agreements, the lease agreements or rental agreements in that framework? Because that can easily be prescribed there. My lawyer friend, if that's very clearly identified, then again that's something to look at.

But I'm only just asking the questions of my area. But the points are, where that has happened, it's basically a loose agreement sometimes. And that can become very, that sets the precedent.

So, in law, that's what happens. Then over time, they have the right under different parts of the constitution, and law takes over. So, it's tricky.

I think we all address those matters. I think you're right. But I have a strong affection for that.

And probably we'll discuss that more with our team. Thank you.

Mr. Kohli: I think, yes, the difference is between those who have been allowed to come and live on the land, and those like squatters have moved in without the knowledge of the landlord.
The latter category are very vulnerable. They have no right.

Mr. Lesuma: Yes, yes.
Whereas the former category has rights. Mary Merritt. Yeah.

Mr. Valenitabua: Paragraph three. On page three of your submissions. I note your limitations identified in paragraph 3.1.1.1. Which states the constitution states, the owner of the acquired property will be compensated based on its market value.

However, it does not include compensation for the loss of livelihood and relocation and resettlement costs. That is for the tenant. That is for the tenant.

Mr. Lesuma: Correct, yeah.

Mr. Valenitabua: And in paragraph 3.2, subparagraph 3.2.1.1, the Ministry of Housing is suggesting an amendment to clause or section 27, subsection 2V, to ensure compensation is fair and equitable, covering the relocation and livelihood restoration costs.

Mr. Lesuma: Correct, yeah.

Mr. Valenitabua: You were suggesting that that be included or similar provisions, provisions to be put in its proper words to be added to the constitution. Now, if we look at section 27, subsection 2B4.

If we take B, who asked that word from the top, subsection 2, a written loan may authorize compulsory acquisitions of property. And then we go on to B. Are we together? Then we go on to B, it says on the basis that the owner will be promptly paid the agreed compensation for the property. You are all right with that.

Yes. Or failing agreement, just an equitable compensation, as determined by a court or tribunal, that is to be argued in court. And after considering all relevant factors, including, go down to subparagraph four, Roman numeral four, the interest of any person affected by the acquisition, to you, does that not cover the tenant, the relocation, the livelihood restoration costs? Should they come under that? Do we have to spell it out?

Mr. Lesuma: I feel we should.

Mr. Valenitabua: So it's in addition to subparagraph 2B4, including, we can just add there, including the interest of any person affected by the acquisition, including, this is, including is the interest, the interest in relation to loss of livelihood and relocation and settlement costs, extra.

Mr. Lesuma: Yes? Sure. Okay.

Mr. Valenitabua Any comments on that?

Mr. Kohli: I think there is a very relevant point here, as you have said. If I just draw an analogy, if, for example, a person loses his boat in a hurricane, they come and say the cost of the boat is 25,000, that's the market value. They don't realize how long it will take him to replace that boat.

It might take him one year to earn that income to be able to replace that boat proficiently. So basically, you have to take into consideration that factor as well, not only $25,000 loss of boat, loss of income for the next, until he's able to replace. So basically, if I hear correctly, you are saying, don't only look at the market value and say I'll pay you 100,000 for this.

You look at him, his cost of acquiring a boat, building costs, replacement costs in building, because he might have built that house a long time ago. And sometimes, market value does not necessarily reflect the cost of replacement. So, you want all that to be taken into consideration.

If I'm correct. I think that can be added on. Yeah.

Mr. Lesuma: Yeah.

Mr. Valenitabua: Well, thank you very much. In relation to the persons of the section, and what is that? Section 42.

Section 42. Subsections 1, 2, and 3. They deal with the right of persons with disabilities. I believe we can have a look at that.

And see how we can improve the constitutional provisions in relation to persons with disabilities. The blind, the lame, and all that. Oh, accessibility.

Accessibility, yeah. The right to accessibility. Yeah.

So, we will have a look at that. Is there any other submission that you would want to add this morning?

Mr Lesuma: No, Chair. We thank you for the opportunity for us to come in this morning.

I believe that's all that we had in mind to present to the commission this morning. And just before I conclude, I would like to wish the commission the best in the work that you are all being tasked to do. I believe it's not an easy task.

And in terms of the travel that you need to do, we hope that you always have a safe journey in visiting our islands. I just have one question, if I may. What is the timeline for?

Mr. Valenitabua: The timeline for this commission's work is six months.

Oh, six months. We started in April, and we are given 31st of August, 2026 as the expiry date. Yeah.

We started in March. Not April, we started in March. And then we have that six month.

What we did was two months for preparation, reading, we've got books, lecture, literature, in relation to constitution making, the Yes Guy report, the Reeves report, and constitution from 1970 onwards. We've been reading through all those. So, two months for preparation.

Within those two months of preparation, we are having this consultation to selected or targeted audiences, including the ministries. We've had individuals, we've got associations, or we had associations and we had ministries when coming. So now at the end of these two months of preparation, secretariat, which is at the back there, they are now ready for our public consultations.

So, I decided that we'd have two teams. Because the six months, if we were to go as a group all around VT Label, we wouldn't have been able to achieve that. So, the two teams have been, two teams have been formed.

One team will start next week from the Lau Group, the Lomaiviti Group, and the other team from Beqa, Kadavu, Vatulele, and Ovalau. Then we'll meet together in Honolulu and separate again there, two teams. One team covers the Cakaudrove and Taveuni, which is my team, and the other team led by Dr. Fateaki, who's not here today, will cover Macuata and Bua.

Once we finish that, then we'll come back here. Now the logic was that we'll go to the outer island first in case we run out of fuel. So, we would have done our job by the time the fuel runs out.

You know, it's just a matter of planning. So that's it. Thank you very much for your submissions today.

We have taken your submissions and the contents thereof into consideration, or we've recorded them. We will be collating this with the other submissions, and then we will be analyzing, and then we will work out how they can be included in the draft, in the draft amended 2013 Constitution. Whether it will be called 2013 Constitution or we call it 2026 Constitution, or 2027, we don't know yet.

Yeah. I will try my best. Just one request.

In case we need more assistance, we'll contact you, sir, to come and gather more information about housing. It's important to our people, so we have to get it right. That's all I have to say.

Thank you. That's all I have. Thank you.

We usually take photos.

----------.End of Session[1-5-2026]----------

MINISTRY OF HOUSING

Korobasaga House, 33 Gorrie Street, Suva.
PO Box 2130, Government Buildings, Suva, Fiji.
Phone: +679 330 9918
email: infohousing@govnet.gov.fj web: www.housing.gov.fj

SUBMISSION TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW COMMISSION

A. OVERVIEW

The Ministry of Housing welcomes the opportunity to submit recommendation for the review of the 2013 Constitution of the Republic of Fiji. While the current Constitution recognizes socio-economic rights, significant gaps remain that hinder the "progressive realization" to adequate housing. This submission outlines the limitations of the current framework and proposes specific amendments to ensure housing is treated as a fundamental, enforceable human right.

B. HOUSING SECTOR

CHAPTER 2 BILL OF RIGHTS CLAUSE 35 RIGHTS TO HOUSING AND SANITATION

1. RIGHT TO ADEQUATE HOUSING (Reference: Clause 35)

Clause 35 (1) states; "The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the right of every person to accessible and adequate housing and sanitation".

1.1. Identified Limitations

1.1.1. Lacks Constitutional rights to Housing

1.1.1.1. The constitution does not clearly state the right to adequate housing. Clause 35(1) shows that Housing is not recognized as a standalone, enforceable right hence citizens does not access constitutional entitlement to adequate housing.

1.1.1.2. The constitution lacks explicit right to adequate housing which does not fully reflect the standard of international human rights laws.

1.1.1.3. As per the current constitutions, the provision of housing remains as a matter of policy discretion instead of a constitutional duty.

1.1.2. Lack State obligation on affordable social or public housing programs

1.1.2.1. The Constitution does not impose any obligation on the State to develop social or public housing programs that can be accessed by low-income households, people with disabilities, marginalized groups and senior citizens.

1.2. Proposed Recommendations

1.2.1. Transition to an Absolute Right

1.2.1.1. Amend Clause 35 to recognize the "Right to Adequate Housing" as a standalone right that imposes a minimum core obligation on the State to the most vulnerable and prevent homelessness

1.2.2. State-led Housing Programs

1.2.2.1. Insert a sub-clause requiring the State to establish and maintain affordable social housing frameworks and subsidies for the most vulnerable population.

CHAPTER 2 BILL OF RIGHTS CLAUSE 39 FREEDOM FROM ARBITRARY EVICTION

2. FREEDOM FROM ARBITRARY EVICTIONS (Reference: Clause 39)

Clause 39 states: (1). Every person has the right to freedom from arbitrary evictions from his or her home or to have his or her home demolished, without an order of a court made after considering all the relevant circumstances

(2). No law may permit arbitrary evictions

2.1. Identified Limitations

2.1.1. Lack Procedural Safeguards

2.1.1.1. Clause 39 (1&2) provides a general statement on forced eviction, it fails to include the requirements for eviction processes, obligations in the provision of alternative shelters or resettlement sites.

2.1.1.2. The Constitution does not explicitly address arbitrary eviction that affects informal settlers and communities under informal arrangements with Itaukei landowners.

2.2. Proposed Recommendations

2.2.1. Anti-Homelessness Clause:

2.2.1.1. Amend Clause 39 to state that no eviction should result in an individual being rendered homeless. The State or the evicting party must be obligated to provide alternatives to basic shelter.

2.2.2. Mandatory Consultation:

2.2.2.1. Require "meaningful consultation" and a "social impact assessment" as a pre-requisite for any court-ordered eviction involving any citizen.

C. LAND SECTOR

CHAPTER 2 BILL OF RIGHTS CLAUSE 27 FREEDOM FROM COMPULSORY OR ARBITRARY ACQUISITION OF PROPERTY

3. LAND ACQUISITION AND TENURE SECURITY (Reference: Clauses 27 & 29)

(Freedom from compulsory or arbitrary acquisition of property)

Clause 27 (1-3) states: 27.— (1) Every person has the right not to be deprived of property by the State other than in accordance with a written law referred to in subsection (2), and no law may permit arbitrary acquisition or expropriation of any interest in any property. (2) A written law may authorise compulsory acquisition of property—...

3.1. Identified Limitations

3.1.1. Limited constitutional guidance on fair and holistic compensation:

3.1.1.1. The constitution stated that the owner of the acquired property will be compensated based on its market value however, it does not include the compensation for the loss of livelihood and relocation and resettlement costs.

3.1.2. Lacks to distinguish between infrastructure-driven and development-led acquisition:

3.1.2.1. The constitution does not differentiate between essential public use acquisition (like, schools, hospitals, pipeline, and roads) and development driven acquisition (e.g. tourism, industrial and commercial). This may expose the process of acquisition to focus solely on private or commercial benefits without assessments for alternatives that can avoid unnecessary acquisition.

3.2. Proposed Recommendations

3.2.1. Holistic Compensation:

3.2.1.1. Amend Clause 27. 2. (v) to ensure compensation is fair and equitable, covering relocation and livelihood restoration costs.

3.2.2. Public Interest Test

3.2.2.1. Introduce a "Public Interest Test" to ensure compulsory acquisition is a last resort and strictly for non-commercial, public-good purposes.

D. PERSON LIVING WITH DISABILITY

CHAPTER 2 BILL OF RIGHTS CLAUSE 42 RIGHTS TO HOUSING AND SANITATION RIGHT OF PERSONS LIVING WITH DISABILITIES

4. RIGHTS OF PERSONS LIVING WITH DISABILITIES

Clause 42(1-3) states:

42.— (1) A person with any disability has the right -.

a. to reasonable access to all places, public transport and information
b. to use sign language, Braille or other appropriate means of communication and
c. to reasonable access to necessary materials, substances and devices relating to the person's disability...

4.1. Identified Limitations

4.1.1. No Disability-specific protection:

4.1.1.1. The constitution guaranteed equality but fails to highlight any constitutional requirements that the systems be inclusive in design and adaptable based on different needs.

4.2. Proposed Recommendations

4.2.1. Universal Design Standards:

4.2.1.1. Mandate that all state-funded housing and public infrastructure must comply with "Universal Design Principles" to ensure accessibility for all citizens.

Professor Wadan Narsey

Ms. Nailatikau: We will ask the IT support team to see if they can zoom in any further, but in the meantime, we will have... We could?

Professor Narsey: Your voice is very muffled; I can't seem to hear you all that clearly. Can you hear me clearly?

Ms. Nailatikau: We can hear you. Does it help if we use our mics? Yes, please, yeah.

Professor Narsey: Okay, will do. So, who are the people sitting in the front row, starting from my left?

Mr. Valenitabua: Yeah, good afternoon, Professor Nassi. Good afternoon.

I am Sevuloni Valenitabua. I'm the chairperson. And next to me is, you know, Merewalesi Nailatikau.

Next to Mere is Dr. Fatiaki. And next to Dr. Fatiaki is Mr. Conway Begg. And last but not least is Dr. Neelesh Gounder

Professor Narsey: I think I know most of you guys. That's good.

Mr. Valenitabua: There's one who is yet to come in here, Mr. Ami Koli, lawyer of Labasa.

Professor Narsey: I know him as well, because I met him when we were touring Vanua Levu for the electoral reform.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yeah, the Tui Labasa. All right, since you have already joined us, I think we will start.

I think we will start. Now, I believe that you know very well what this commission is about. Right, so we are here this afternoon to hear from you.

I have introduced most of us, except for Mr. Koli. And we also have in the room now our legal drafter. She is sitting on the side, and she is sitting in just to listen to the consultations.

Now, we have one hour, so without further ado or further introductions and all that, I think I will now give you the time to address us in relation to what you think we should know about review of the 2013 constitution. And at the end, we might be able to have some discussions. Thank you.

Professor Narsey: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First of all, what I would like to do is to perhaps speak at maximum for half an hour and spend the next half hour if you have any questions. Now, I presume that you all have my written submission?

Ms. Nailatikau: Yes, we do.

Professor Narsey: And what I would like to suggest is that you have the media there as well. This is an open session. I don't think there is anything confidential I want to say today.

So, I'd be grateful if you would also make available the written submission to the media in Fiji.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yes, we will. We will.

We will, Professor Nassi. Yeah, you have asked us about providing your written submissions to the media.

Professor Narsey: Yes, please.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yes, we will. We will do so. Okay.

Professor Narsey: Thank you very much. Now, let me, if I just give an overview of what I am saying in my written submission, you can see on the first page of my written submission, there are six very, very specific recommendations that are there, sets of recommendations that are there. The main one, probably, because my chairman of the Electoral Review Commission asked me to focus on that, you know, particularly, is the electoral system, the new revised electoral system that we thought would be really good for Fiji, right? So, that is me.

But I also address, I start off by addressing the question, what constitution does Fiji have today? And, it is a question which was, of course, answered by the Supreme Court opinion, of all things, in a very, very surprising manner. But I will take the Supreme Court rulings, if you like, as a starting point for the rest. So, essentially, my second set of submissions will be about the electoral system.

The third one will be about an upper house, or senate. The fourth one is the removal of decrees, which are really cancerous decrees, and should never be in any constitution, because they undermine the basic human rights of our people, in particular, the 2012 pensioners, who had their case been heard in court in 2012, and then the military passed a decree to say, no, this case will be thrown out of court. So, they denied these 4,000 people their day in court, which is absolutely abhorrent to any good constitution.

So, the fifth one will be the whole very, very sensitive question of the removal of immunities in the 2013 constitution. And, I emphasize, the immunities which have not been approved by Parliament, right? Because, in the 1997 constitution, immunities were granted to those who were involved in the 1987 coup. And, you know, on both sides as well, I must mention.

And, that was approved by the 1997 constitution by the Parliament then, both upper house and lower house. So, you know, once something gets approved by the Parliament, upper house and lower house, the democratically elected Parliament, you have to consider it to be the law. And, you can't question it.

But, there's a whole range of other immunities in the 2013 constitution, which have never been approved by any Parliament or by any referendum. The sixth one that I would like to comment on briefly is removing the overriding role of the military, as stated in the 2013 constitution, cap 131. Because, I don't believe that the military has got any responsibility in the civil governance of the country.

Now, I'm very, very glad to see in the last few weeks, the last week or so, that the commander of the RFMM has also come out in favor of the removal of immunities. And, I'm very, very happy he's done so. Because, I do know from what was going on after the 22 elections, there was a lot of pressure on him to interfere with the economy and with the elections and so on, from different sides, from both sides of the political divide.

And, I was so glad that the military declined to interfere with the normal political processes. And, I'm glad that his contract has been renewed for another five years. And, because I believe that under him, the military now understands the huge damage that coups have caused Fiji.

And, I have a lot of articles on my writings, trying to document the huge cost to Fiji of the coups. And, put simply, and I don't mind saying it now, because it is something that our people must keep in mind all the time, that if we did not have the coups in 87, 2000, and 2006, everybody's income in Fiji, everybody's income in Fiji would be twice, more than two. And, it would be not what precious, because they're not.

And, I, it's a point which I think you can request Dr. Neelesh Gounder to elaborate on, because he will have seen all the graphs that I have put up before the public, explaining why every coup set us back God knows how many years, until our people were able to claw themselves back to a normal growth path, but never to the old growth path. So, let me first of all start with, I won't spend too much time on it, because to me, the Supreme Court opinion, I find it absolutely objectionable, you know, that they ended up concluding that a constitution which had never been passed by any parliament, never been approved by a referendum. You know, when there were all those opportunities in front of the Bainimarama government, you know, in pre-elections, 2014, 2018, 2022, they could have had a referendum if they wanted to.

They never used that opportunity. They control parliament for a... You can't change a single, you know, line in this, unless you have three quarters of parliament, and, you know, three quarters of registered voters in a referendum, which is an impossibility, because registered voters, well, you never get three quarters of registered voters voting, ever. So, to me, it was a huge joke on the people of Fiji, that you impose a constitution, nobody knows who is the source of this constitution, and you tell the people, hey, you can't change it, unless you have these conditions satisfied.

Well, in fact, those conditions were never used in the first place to bring that constitution into being. Now, look, I agree that having gone through the Supreme Court opinion, right, you can see why they're saying, well, that constitution has been there since 2014, to now, that's, you know, 80 and whatever contracts have been signed under it and all that, and if you now say, this is null and void, and you go back to the 1997 constitution, then people all over Fiji and globally who have done contracts under the 2013 constitution will have to re-look at all those contracts. So, the Supreme Court ruled in their wisdom, you know, it's in place, it's now the law.

So, you know, my submission sets out all the things that have happened, you know, in the last sort of, since 1987, and I don't mind actually repeating them, because, you know, people have got all kinds of ideas, especially in the Truth and Reconciliation Commission has been sitting, they think that the truth has come out, but sadly, the truth has not come out about any of our coups, not a single one. And, you know, nobody really knows who were behind the 87 coup, you know, when the Third in command overthrew the locally elected government of Bavadra and Jai Ram Reddy, the 1990 constitution, you know, there was a coup in 2000, nobody knows who were really behind that coup, because there were people in the highest levels of the RFMF who were in favor of the coup at the beginning and they changed their mind halfway through, which was why the mutiny took place, because soldiers felt betrayed. And, you know, I don't mind saying that, because it's there in the Evans Board of Inquiry Report, and I would plead with the commissioners, go to the trouble of reading that Evans Board of Inquiry Report, because there's a lot of interesting things in there, and of course the commander of the RFMF then refused to appear before the board.

I mean, how atrocious, right? But, you know, it actually shows you that there was one person hired in the military who was in contact with the CRW soldiers on the morning of the coup, and he's been named in that report, and he's now occupied a very high diplomatic position in the coalition government. So, you know, we all know what happened. And then the 2006 coup, well, hold on, you know, nobody disputes that it was a treasonous coup, but, you know, how often have you seen in the public that one of the things that was happening just before the 2006 coup was the prosecution was about to be brought by the Australian Police Commissioner, the late Andrew Hughes, over the deaths of the five soldiers, you know, in 2000, after the 2000 mutiny, and of course for sedition.

And so, the 2006 coup, it was not a coup to make everybody equal in Fiji, you know, despite all the propaganda and everything else. The truth has never been publicly revealed. So, you know, look, I mean, like it or not, there's all these things that have happened in Fiji that the Supreme Court opinion did not investigate.

They did not investigate these things. And so, while they did say, right, that, okay, you know, we can't go back, events have overtaken it. Well, I don't know, Commissioners, you know, how on earth can you have events overtaking a sacred constitution for a country? What events? I mean, I go through all those arguments by the Supreme Court, and about the only set of arguments that I can sort of agree with, you know, is the first set which says that too many things have happened, contracts would have to be rewritten, etc., so we'll have to stick with it.

We'll have to stick with the 2013 constitution, right? Okay, so I can accept that, and basically the rest of my submission starts from that premise that however, you know, whatever grade is the democratic deficit in that 2013 constitution, how do we take the country forward? And that is, of course, the task that also faces you Commissioners. How do you take it forward? So what I am suggesting in my submission to the Commissioners is that if we start that the 2013 constitution is there, right, I agree with the sentiments expressed by Justice Anthony Gates in a 2001 case. He said, you know, it's not possible for any one man to tear up the constitution.

There is no authority to do so. The constitution remains in place until enacted by Parliament, you know, a body of elected members who collectively represent all of the inhabitants of Fiji. You surface their rule for many years, apparently outside or without the constitution.

Eventually the original order has to be revisited, and the constitution resurfaces. Well, I agree with the Supreme Court opinion that reasserting the 1997 constitution is not practical, given so much water has flowed under the bridge. But what I am suggesting in the submission that I have made is just a few areas where the government of the day, through Parliament and a referendum, right, can bring in some critical changes to the 2013 constitution, which effectively presents before the people of Fiji a new constitution, a fundamentally different constitution, which I am just suggesting for the convenience's sake at the moment.

We can call it the 2026 constitution, or if it happens to come in, you know, after the end of the year, call it the 2027 constitution. And what are these changes? Well, the first set of changes, you know, that the government itself commissioned last year, was to bring in an electoral system that the people actually wanted. Now, I don't know how much detail I should go through in explaining the new electoral system and how it differs from the old system, because you in your, you know, consultations around the country will also have, you know, met these same views from people, right? And on our commission, of course, you know, it was chaired by former Chief Justice Daniel Fatiaki, who the people all over Fiji respected.

And so when he used to, you know, tell them, you know, in his big, you know, Chief Justice voice, I'm here to listen to your views. Tell us what you think. You know, I don't want to tell you what to think.

You tell us what you think about the electoral system. Well, you know, such an authority like him, they spoke and they gave their honest views. And everywhere they said the following things, which I'm sure, you know, you yourself will have heard, because I looked at your terms of reference, and your references on the electoral system are pretty much the same as ours, except that our work, of course, I think necessarily was more comprehensive than your work could be, given that you have so much more to cover on the Constitution than just the electoral system.

But, you know, I think that our report makes very, very clear that the complaints that were there and look, those complaints are still there today, you know, and it's not going to go away just because this coalition government adds some photos to the ballot paper, right? You've got 500, 300, 400 numbers there. So, adding 300, 400 photos and party symbols and all that will make that ballot paper a virtual booklet. And voters will have to go through this.

At least it will be better, I think, because now when they circle a number or they tick a number, they will be voting for the person that they really genuinely believe in. But it wasn't, it isn't so there if you leave it as it is. And everywhere people said, well, we don't know whether we even tick the right number or not.

You can tick anything. Is it the right number? You don't know. Well, if you go and look at the 2014 election results, there's one bloke over there, one bloke there, who's a total unknown.

And he got more than 4,000 votes, more than his party leader. And why did he get more than 4,000 votes? Because his number was a transposition of Frank Bainimarama's number. Instead of 279 or 297, it was 279 or 297.

Nobody knew him. And he's disappeared from view now. So, you know, the whole thing about giving ordinary, illiterate people all over the country a massive ballot paper with 300 numbers.

Oh, man. What a joke. What a joke they played on the people of Fiji.

And you all know why they did that. Because all you got to do is look at the results of the 2014, 2018 and 2022 elections. They were all asking the voters, and even candidates were asking the voters, just vote for this number, the number for the leader.

And the leader, you know, well, in 2014, you know, one leader from the Fiji First Party, he got 80% of all the votes. And all the others who came into the party, into the parliament with him, had minimal number of votes. One or two smart ones, I can tell you, there was one very smart person in the Fiji First Party, he's the only one in his party whose votes went up from 2014 to 2018 to 2022.

Only one, and I'm not going to tell you who that smart person was. Because the others, all their votes all went down. And so you look at the results, and what you had was that the leader of the party had huge numbers of votes, and the others had but a role.

Now, the other political parties tried to play the game, but they could not match. They could not match the leader of the Fiji First Party. Although, you know, they made a run for it.

You know, Ro Temumu Kepa got 60,000-70,000 votes. You know, Sitiveni Rabuka got 60,000-70,000 votes. But in the process, what also happened was that ordinary people throughout the country were denied the chance to vote for somebody who they hold accountable in parliament.

People are denied that. And you can look at the results for all the three elections so far. And sadly, I mean, and I'm so disappointed, sadly, what the government has done now is they're going to have the next election under the old system.

We'll still have the same witnesses. Unless, of course, the Constitutional Review Commissioners go around the country telling people and putting it in their report, hey, listen, you might not have constituencies now, as our commission actually recommended, but there's nothing to stop you from all looking for your own local leaders in your area and vote for them. Don't vote for any big leader.

Don't vote for any big leader. Because you need to have somebody in parliament who represents you, who you can go to with your problems. If you don't have it, you're back to square one, expecting Superman to solve all your problems around the country.

And from what I hear, the problems around the country have absolutely multiplied. Absolutely multiplied. And a large part of that also is because in parliament, you've got a whole lot of people who do not represent the local communities.

So, you know, that is a very key feature which is really missing in the current system. So, you've got a system which allows people with very small numbers of votes to get into parliament while other people with large numbers of votes are disqualified. Partly by the threshold rule, 5% threshold rule, which I will also describe.

Plus, there are other things there, you know, in our electoral laws, which we deal with in the details of our report, which has created this climate of fear in Fiji. And all those laws and things have to be got rid of. And our report details those things as well.

Okay. So, what did the public want? Well, you know, primarily they wanted their own local constituencies and MPs who would identifiably be accountable to them. Primary.

That's the primary thing that they wanted. And so, this is what we have tried to accommodate. And not only that, we've also tried to accommodate all the small constituent areas where people say, oh, look, you know, Yasawas, Rotuma, you know, Kadavu, you know, they're lumped in with the mainland electorates, and their voices are drowned out.

And, of course, the maritime provinces have, although they're small in number in terms of numbers of voters, they have their own distinct problems. So, we've tried to give the maritime constituencies their own constituency and five there. So, we ended up with 25 open constituencies, 25 open constituencies.

And the way we did it, we designed it, is that you could use the existing information on the voter ID cards, which is every voter is identified with a polling station. You look at the voter ID card, you'll see there's a polling station there. And we worked together.

Well, in fact, Daniel Fatiaki and Seini Nabou worked together with the official, with the technical people in the elections office, and designed all these constituencies. And we used the boundaries that were given to us by the U.S. Deliberate, and we reconstructed 25 boundaries using the existing voter ID card. Why did we do that? So that the elections office would not have to do a new national re-registration of voters.

And that's very important for you to understand. That is still there. They don't have to re-register all the voters to use the system that we recommended.

Because a national re-registration would be a big exercise involving a lot of money, a lot of work. But they can use the current system, the current boundary maps that we have set out, and have the election within three months, in my opinion, before the end of the year, if they want it, right? And so that was the first thing, constituencies. Secondly, they wanted simple voting, no complicated preferences to count and move this way and that way, which nobody in Fiji could understand.

But this is what, you know, that has been happening, you know, in previous elections, right? So, this was simple voting. If you have constituencies, you probably will have maximum of 10 candidates per constituency. One tick, one tick of the ballot paper, which will have the names, the faces, and the party symbol.

And you count the votes by first-past-the-post method. So, you know, the elections officer in the local constituency can file the votes in different files corresponding to the candidates. The public can see, the candidates can see, the media can see, hey, which is the candidate getting the biggest file? And the person is declared the winner.

No counting of preferences, nothing, right? Okay. So that's the second thing. Now, some people insist, and, you know, I'm one of them, I'm one of them, because in 1996, when the Reeves report came out with the 97 Constitution electoral system, you know, I wrote two articles in the paper then, in 96, that the electoral system they were recommending, you know, was not good because it did not have proportionality.

It did not have proportionality. So, the 2013 Constitution has got proportionality, which I agree with. And so, our recommended system has also got proportionality in it.

And I'll explain how we get the proportionality element in a moment, right? Because first, you know, I want to explain this whole thing about the reserved seats for women. Now, here and there, here and there, we've got some voices, you know, usually from men, I mean, always from men, right, saying, oh, why is it that bloody women get to spare any extra special effort? Let them go and compete, you know, equal on the level playing field with us, you know. If they're any good, you know, there's a certain big lady in Parliament, if they're any good, you know, they can get funding from China and everywhere, and in fact, soon they're in Parliament with large numbers of votes.

Hey, hey, not every woman candidate in Fiji is in that fortunate position. They can't go around campaigning. You look at the violence against women in the country and all that, the safety concerns.

They can't compete on equal level playing field with men. And, you know, there have been calls for women in Parliament for ages. Donkey is here, Fiji Women's Rights Movement, Crisis Centre, you name it.

They've all said, please let's have more women. And so we've decided, okay, let's give them more women, and originally, we were only going to get about 15 or 20, but then we realised, and this is an interesting point to understand, if you have a smaller number of reserved seats for women, their constituencies will have to be larger, which means they will have to campaign further afield to get votes. We don't think that we should force them to go get any further afield.

If we have the same constituency boundaries as the 25 open ones, then women and men candidates from a particular party, they can campaign together with great safety and security. This is a very important principle to understand, and also having different constituency boundaries makes it so much easier for the Fiji elections office. One boundary for one constituency, and both the reserved seat for women and the open, open, open candidate can stand in that constituency.

So, 25 open constituencies, 25 women, that's 50, and how do we get the proportionality? Well, we have a list system, a list system which goes on top of these 50 constituencies. Now, in our proposal there, we've got 21 list seats, right? Where do the list candidates come from? They come from the losers in the open constituencies. So, you've got the 25 open constituencies, the losers, you've got 25 winners coming from there, no doubt, they've got first place, they've won, right? And then the next loser of that constituency then goes on to the list for their party, goes on to the list.

Now, in our report, we had said, hey, hold on, you know, if you're a loser in a small constituency like, you know, yourself, you know, you won't have too many votes. So, you'll be at a disadvantage to a loser in the big constituency somewhere in Vitilevu. Well, that's quite true.

But then, you know, in hindsight, and I thought, well, if it's going to be puzzling for voters, why not just simply use the losers' votes, exactly what they've got, and that way you also have an additional advantage that only losers who've got large numbers of votes will go on to the lists for their parties. Now, think about that. I've emphasized that in my report because what it also means is that not only will you have a winner from a constituency, but you also have a loser, the next loser from that constituency.

You're going to get opposing views in Parliament from each constituency. Or pretty much so. We could be at an advantage because, to me, it is important to strengthen opposition in Parliament.

You know, Parliament can sometimes become a rubber stamp for the party that's controlling Parliament, but that's not everything. You need to have opposition in Parliament. And so, the losers from the constituencies, the 25 open constituencies, not from the Reserve list because already they're at an advantage, right, only from the 25 open constituencies, they'll go on to the lists for their parties.

So, what will happen? At the end of the election and the counting of the votes in the open constituencies, right, once you have the 50 winners in the open constituencies, you will also know, right, how many each party has got. You know, for the first time ever, and I don't mind bringing it in now, if you have a constituency election, you might have for the first time independents coming into Parliament because you don't need a 5% threshold to win in a constituency. You might have small parties like Unity Fiji, Labour Party, coming into Parliament even though they don't have 5%, you know, of the national votes.

So, to me, that's a very, very important benefit that will come through constituencies. So, after the elections office has determined how many independents there are, how many there are from small parties or whatever, it doesn't matter, what can work out is how much votes have the parties got as a percentage of all the votes cast, leaving out those votes for independents. Threshold is 5%.

Well, 5% of the number of votes we usually have amounts to about 25,000 votes. That's too big, bigger threshold. You know, I mean, if you have a 55-seat Parliament, 5% of all the votes cast is only about 1.8% of all the votes.

And if you have a 71-seat Parliament, then, you know, one will only represent 1.4% of the votes. So in my opinion, in my opinion, the threshold can be very, can be reduced from 5% down to 2%. When you have that threshold, you can work out, well, how much will parties, what is the percentage of votes going to each party? That tells you how many seats they are entitled to.

And in my, in my submission there, I've called it, that is T, capital T, the total number of seats they are entitled to in Parliament. Then you look at how many seats they have got, actually, in their constituencies. That's the open seats and the reserved seats for women.

And then that's the constituency seat C. How many are they entitled to? It's T minus C. That's the one number of seats they'll get from the list. Shall I go through that slowly again? Because John Fatiaki, who I once told statistics, some 40 years ago at USP, will understand this very easily. And Neelesh, of course, will also understand it.

Once you've determined the total number of seats entitled to a party, look at how many they've got in their constituency, take it away, and that gives you the number of list seats that they're entitled to in Parliament. So, the list will then come from the party list, which is pretty much the same as what you have at the moment. You just go down highest number of votes to the lowest number of votes to get the number of list seats.

Now, here is a result that follows from this, right? I've seen in the news that there's talk about you'll have to set up a boundaries commission, right? I don't know, but Ami Kohli will remember, in the olden days, the boundaries commission used to be a real source of bickering and fighting as politicians and parties tried to move the boundary this way or that way to make it easier for their candidate to win. But in the system that we are recommending, where the boundary goes will not matter. It will not matter because if you move the boundary to get an extra seat in the constituency, then you'll get one less through the list.

If you get one less in the constituency, you'll get one more from the list. So the boundaries commission then will not be a place for bickering between the parties. The boundaries will be set for the convenience of the voters, the convenience of the candidates, and the convenience of the Fijian election office officials, which is going to be a really great thing because you don't want any more conflict between political parties.

And look, I tell you what, once we reduce the threshold to 2%, once you allow constituencies, the small parties who are currently outside of parliament will be in parliament, without a doubt. And you're not going to have all this bickering. So basically, we've got a system that we've got, and I don't mind emphasizing this once over and over again, right? One of the advantages of this system we're recommending is that it is a proportional system.

A proportional system means that the percentage of seats going to political parties depends on the percentage of voters who are supporting them, and the percentage of voters supporting them in Fiji, if you want to look at it ethnically, you look at it ethnically. Why do I look at it ethnically? Because let's be clear, 87 coups, 2,000 coups, all because politicians were able to run around saying, oh, indigenous Fijians, iTaukei have been marginalized from governments in this country, and other races are taking over. Yeah, that's true.

I mean, you know, it's neither here nor there. But that was the case, right? But today, today in Fiji, and I've got a graph in my submission which shows it so clearly, currently, you know, iTaukei are 67% of the population and of the voters. Indo-Fijians are 26%, and in 10 years' time, iTaukei will be 73% of the voters, and Indo-Fijians will be 19% of the voters.

And if you don't believe me, go and look at the education statistics to see what the ethnic composition of class one is, class one in schools. It is about 15% now, Indo-Fijians. All the schools throughout Fiji, and you iTaukei know it too, it used to be called Indian Secondary School, Indian High School, Indian Middle East, Indian, well, they're all mixed-race schools, and in fact, the majority of students of those schools are Indo-Fijian.

So, in the future, if you've got a proportional electoral system, the Fijian parties, the iTaukei parties, who are supported by iTaukei voters, they will always form the majority in Parliament. You are not going to have the precondition for coups that you had in 87 and 2000. It's end of story to coups, I think, and I'm very, very glad that the commander of the RFMF has come out very, very clearly and said, we're not going to support any more coups anymore.

So, these are all the advantages that I've got in my paper that explains it in detail, right? So, shall I leave it over there? Right? I would just simply, you know, plead with people, right? If anybody says, let's economize on the cost of Parliament, I'll say to them, look, the way to economize on the cost of Parliament, we used to have 71 seats in Parliament before. It never bothered anybody, right? If you want to economize, set up a proper independent salaries commission, right? Not comprising the MPs themselves, right? Who disgracefully increase their own salaries straight after they won the election. I mean, that was utterly disgraceful.

So, one of the recommendations you must make in your final report is that that business of determination of salaries of MPs and ministers, et cetera, and their bids must be taken out of their hands altogether and given to an independent commission. On my website, I have a paper, you know, around about 2023, where a pointer of our salaries in PhD Parliament are totally, totally incompletely out of kilt with what exists in New Zealand and Australia and all that. So, if you have a higher salaries commission which sets the salaries appropriately, you have the right number of ministers and assistant ministers, then you are not going to have these extravagant costs of Parliament.

So, I would suggest, please don't criticize the Parliament, please keep the reserve seats for women, and, you know, you must also think about, well, I'm glad, you know, Mary, you are there, right, on that commission. Just think about this. If our recommendation is accepted for 25 reserve seats for women, then women all over the country, all over the country, they will have a woman representative in Parliament who they can go to with their needs.

Never happened before in the history of Fiji. Never before. And it's not something to be thrown away just because you want to reduce the size of Parliament.

Please resist that urge. And women typically are not forthcoming with what they should have. I suspect that your commission would experiment with having 25 women MPs in Parliament for the first time ever and see down the line does it make a difference or not.

And if after 15 years it doesn't make any difference, okay, put the number if you want to. Reduce it back to zero again and let the women compete on a level playing field if you have got a level playing field back then. So let me then go on now to the second major point that I'm making, right, which is that the commission must reestablish the upper house.

The second. It amazes me because soon after the particular lecture I wrote an article where I said hey, here's all these constitutional issues the new government can deal with. And included in there was hey, let's reestablish the Senate because you need to have a checks and balance mechanism in Fiji.

Without it, a government can just do what they want which is pretty well what they have been doing for the last three and a half years or what they have not been doing for the last three and a half years. To be honest, it is a very beautiful performance and it amazes me why the current government, coalition government has not made it a priority to reestablish the upper house, the Senate which can be a checks and balance mechanism. Now, I have got a table in my report, in my submission which shows you what the representation was in 1970 what it was in 1997 and what I am proposing for the constitution you are going to recommend.

And I have made some changes there. I have got eight nominated by the Prime Minister seven nominated by the Leader of the Opposition and only five nominated by the GCC because to be honest to me the GCC have failed the Fijian people as leaders. They have failed.

You know, when Bainimarama closed them down and told them go and drink homebrew under the mango tree they quietly went away. And not only that the ITaukei people couldn't care less. They didn't rise up in rebellion.

They were quite happy when the lease money was all equalized you know, they were glad that the GCC has been closed down but the important thing is that the GCC did not fight back either. Quietly went away. Whereas in 87, in 2000 they were very active players supporting the coups.

So, to me, they have failed the people. But anyway, it's not for people like me to say you know, whether they should be there or not it's up to the iTaukei people and I have got them in there in the proposed Senate and five representatives you've got the same one, two more one but what I'm adding in there is we can have ten nominated by the religious organizations, ten representatives because I believe that the religious organizations will nominate people of integrity and I've got a table in there which explains how I've derived the ten which is based on the most recent Bureau of Stats survey data for 23-24 essentially, Methodists will nominate three Saddam Haram and Haider Samad will nominate two Catholics and the Assemblies of God and the Muslims will nominate one person and so you will get that number you know, in Senate and I mean,

I suggest that at the end of it in Senate, there will be far more iTaukei representatives than their share of the population and to me, that's fine as well because, you know, one of the things and responsibilities of this Senate in the old constitution was they had a lot of say over indigenous Fijian resources the iTaukei resources and that's right so, you know, please consider that.

My third area of concern is removing all this excess decrees which deny people their basic human right in court and this one in particular of course, which is to do with decrees 51 and 52 you know, which stopped the David Bernas case from being heard in court I claim my interest, I am one of those pensioners who lost out considerably the pensions were reduced and people were forced to take away their sums but, the thing is you should not have anything in the constitution which stops people from enjoying their basic human right to go to court with their perceived grievances how the court rules is their business but, at least they should be able to go to court currently, they can't go to court and those clauses which are there in that past constitution should be just chucked out willy-nilly, there is no room for that.

Now removing the immunities not approved by parliament please make the distinction the immunities that were given for those who were involved in the perpetration of the 87 coup and also some of their opponents right, I keep that in mind they were never approved by the 97 parliament I was there, I was there in that parliament you know, and I put this regret that we approved those immunities because no constitution should have immunities in there, really, the constitution has to apply to everybody, willy-nilly you can't say, ah, this constitution applies to 99% of the population but not to 1% and certainly not say something like, for deeds which they committed in 2000 running up to 2014 hey, what deeds? what deeds are you giving them immunities for? and in my paper,

I actually specifically, you know, referred to two deeds which are absolutely questionable for giving immunities for one of them is the 5 people who were taken by the military from police custody in Nabua police station, the evidence is all there, they were taken and that night their bodies were delivered to the morgue I mean, how?

Absolutely atrocious international law you know, which the supreme court opinion refers to, hey I don't think there's any supreme court, any court anywhere in the world which will justify the killing of 5 soldiers, persons without trial, without judge, without jury and that's what the 2013 constitution, you know, implies, can't be given immunity I suggest no and the other thing is of course the treasonous overthrow of the government of the late Dara Singh which was not just an SDL government I remind, it was a multi-party government of SDL and the Fiji Labour Party that was deposed in 2006 and the prime minister he was sent packing off to his home island, you know, Vanua Balavu or wherever, right how actually disgraceful and you know, look, I tell you what folks people deserve the constitution they gave but something like that happens to your prime minister.

I expected I expected all kinds of people from all over Fiji to come and protest in Suva and when I went to visit the late Qarase, his home, you know in that street there, you know between Rewa Street and Waimanu Road, well about 40-50 people there that's all that poor fellow, the prime minister you know, he absolutely was treated so badly, right and I don't think that you can give immunity for that treasonous act so, I say that please remove the immunities and I'm so glad that the commander Kalouniwai has come out and said please do not have immunities in the constitution because I think I will take you back in 2000 when the coup happened, the civilian leaders right, civilian leaders only military leaders quietly kept out of sight, but they were there always in the background the civilian leaders, George Speight, Jo Nata and Fred you know, my friends, I used to play golf with them at Fiji Golf Club they called for immunity because they had learnt from Rabuka's immunity in the 87th coup if you have immunity provisioned in a constitution you're always giving the message to the people of Fiji hey, do a coup remove the government, hold on to the government for 8 years, 10 years, whatever put your own in place have a rigged election and then give yourself immunity well that cycle is never going to break unless you the 2026 constitution review commission.

If you put a line under that and say no more immunities in constitutions and you have, of course the difference is you can say no immunity which has not been approved by parliament shall be allowed in the constitution you recommend. The line has to be drawn here and now and I'm so glad that that commander Kalouniwai has just come out, saying please get rid of the immunity and I, of course, I've got something in my submission which really really totally actually disagrees with the supreme court opinion and you have got access to lawyers who also can look at the supreme court opinion and to me their section there on why they say the immunities should be left as they are, it's absolutely woolly, woolly reasoning reasoning neither here nor there all kinds of waffle in there .

I believe that you should reject that section completely. Totally reject that section because the way they are arguing there, there is no substance at all to justify the maintenance of immunity provisions in the constitution. Ok, the last point that I put is in that constitution where there is that step 31 2 which says it shall be the overall responsibility of the Fiji military forces to employ all terms of security and defense and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians. Well, please the military should never be given that kind of responsibility in the constitution you will know that there is social influences and I won't name them but during the 22 election counting, vote counting, there were people who felt that their counting was going against them they were appealing to the military commander, please, use this clause in the constitution and stop this nonsense whatever they thought was the nonsense, having a clause like that in your constitution is an opinion, my opinion is an invitation to the military to do a coup when they feel like it because how can it be the responsibility of the RFMF to ensure all the security, defense and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians how can they do that how can you give them that responsibility and for what exactly.

I suggest to the constitution review commission please just check that whole clause out and you will be doing not just the people of Fiji a favor, you will also be doing the military a favor because I suspect that even the commander and his good advisors don't want that responsibility to look after the security of people in Fiji is the responsibility of the police, it's not the responsibility of the military.

Militaries everywhere in the world are created to deal with external threats not so-called perceived internal threats and the reason why we have come to this sorry state of affairs is because since 1987 since 2000 the military have got used to in fact interfering with the economy and let me say this actually let me say this also if you look at them all individually right, they have all got disgustingly rich at the expense of the people of Fiji all these military people who have interfered with the economy, who have done coups, who have got rid of civilian governments and put themselves in these places and in the process they have wrecked the country so please CRC may I suggest that you throw that clause out now may I suggest that what you can do and you've got all your legal drafts.

I'm quite sure you've already been doing this right you also know that in looking at what should go into the constitution you recommend you know you can draw on the 1970 constitution right oh I should have put that in there as well I haven't got that, you should also have the 1970 constitution I'm glad that you announced in the revised version, look at the 1997 constitution, look at the Yash Ghai draft constitution and yes you know I mean may I also suggest you can also look at the 2013 constitution, see what's good in there it's not that there's nothing good in there and see what you can what you can take out of all this constitution and recommend for a new constitution for Fiji so if you implement the kind of thing that I'm suggesting which is you have a new electoral system you remove all those clauses which undermine the human rights of people you get rid of the immunity clauses, you get rid of a clause which gives the military the ultimate authority and the responsibility for safeguarding Fiji, by the time you do that, I believe you'll have a constitution which is genuinely a new constitution. And it just shows you Mr. Chairman don't believe the academics who say I'm going to speak for only half an hour can you at least speak for one whole hour sorry do you have any questions you'd like to ask.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you professor, any questions from Miss Nailatikau, wants to ask you a question.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you professor Narsey, much appreciate your conveyance as well of all the deliberations and consultations that the Fiji electoral law reform commission has put across my question to you relates to the composition of the senate you propose a new composition for the senate, you're also one of a few submittees who has expressed respectful reservations about the level to which we can outsource our indigenous guardianship aspirations to the great council of chiefs as it stands for example. I remember being a cadet reporter in parliament when you were in the senate and I was just interested to hear from you your reflections on the roles of your colleague GCC representatives in senate in terms of their roles in being guardians of indigenous related legislations or any of those matters that would have been discussed in the senate and also thanking you for putting forward a very strong argument for the reserved seats for women. But my question to you relates to the GCC in the senate and your experience as a former senator.

Professor Narsey: Well you know when the GCC was resuscitated, I was thinking why is it being resuscitated because the upper house wasn't even brought back and my feeling is that there are politicians who want to use the GCC for their own purposes as they did in 87 and as they did in 2000 but I was then very relieved I was very relieved when Semi Seruvakula was appointed chairman of the GCC because I have had experience with him and I have had a lot of dialogue with him since the 2000 coup and all that and I absolutely respect he's a person of integrity and the other person who I have met who is also at the GCC is Ratu Naulu Mataitini and he's been writing a lot of very very good things in there, some of which I disagree with and all that but you know there's a little minor things you know but I believe that the GCC is now on a new trajectory. Now in 2015 and 2016 if you look on my blog site and just look through the word GCC, you'll see I wrote a couple of articles assessing the performance of the GCC by 9-10 criteria you know and by those criteria I adjusted each of those criteria by about 10 points, you know points out of 10 and at the end of it all the GCC could only get 27 points out of 100 in terms of their performance as leaders of the Indo- people.

Now I believe I believe that the GCC needs real guidance as to what their role should be in Fiji especially when I look at indigenous Fijians, you know look, up to about 10 years ago, 10 years ago the people who were emigrating from Fiji were the Indo-Fijians, the Kai China the Kai Loma and all that in the last 10 years it's also the iTaukei people and if they get an opportunity to emigrate they emigrate because they can find in Australia, New Zealand Canada, the States, they can find opportunities to improve the welfare of their families, their children in ways that they cannot do in Fiji.

So Fiji has failed the iTaukei people as well now I was looking at some of the statistics from the 23-24 EUS very few people do these kinds of detailed number crunching that I do and I was horrified to find that while the Fiji Bureau of Stats website says the population of Fiji is 900-something thousand right, the EUS data, and Neelesh will confirm that for me if he looks into it shows that the population of Fiji is now about 850,000 it's been dropping for 5 years, declining and huge declines in the iTaukei population which nobody expects of course but it is, so really the iTaukei have to ask themselves how can the GCC serve their interests better, and the GCC has to ask themselves as well not for people like the outsiders to actually say that right so if you look at the 1997 constitution, which is the last lawful constitution we had.

It gave the Senate certain powers certain powers over changes in law brought in by the lower house in particular I think over iTaukei resources so you might want to ask yourself what should be the functions of the GCC in the new order in Fiji, and honestly the GCC need to ask themselves how are they serving the indigenous people in the country using their special position that they have or are they just sitting there at the top collecting all the freebies that they get. Now one of the things that I did write about recently was up till about the Supreme Court opinion I felt that well nobody has the right to say that everybody in Fiji should be called Fijian, I always said let the business Fijian people define that and thankfully there is a lot of people amongst the indigenous Fijians who say no, everybody in Fiji should be called Fijian and iTaukei to be used for indigenous Fijians in matters that concern their resources and all that so that's the Supreme Court opinion as well I'm not comfortable with that but I noticed that the GCC has come out and said we want to go back to not call everybody Fijian which disappoints me and I did not expect that from Ratu Naulu Mataitini but you know these are things that people can discuss and you know if your constitution wants to talk to the indigenous Fijians, talk to the GCC and all that and ask them well are you comfortable with calling everybody Fijian in the interest of national unity you never know, they might agree.

And this issue can be laid to rest forever and a day but there are other things in my article of 2015 or whatever I'll dig up a reference and I'll send it to you people where you can ask yourself how well are the chiefs looking after the iTaukei people by the state criteria and honestly, honestly whatever their good intentions may be, I believe that the iTaukei people who are educated and qualified now for the modern global economy.

I believe they are the people who should lead the iTaukei people and relying on a traditional chiefly system which is mostly brings up men as leaders, there are no very few women as leaders in the GCC apart from people like Ro Teimumu Kepa, but I noticed that the GCC has not made any attempt to bring in good commoners into the GCC leadership position. You know in the British House of Lords they used to be the hereditary lords and all that but they also nominated commoners of ability to go into the House of Lords depending on their contribution to society and even people of their House of Lords. So you know the GCC has done a lot of hard searching to know what its role should be but you know my suggestion is that the GCC.

You know it should not have overriding role in the upper house they can contribute and I've given them five positions there I mean it's entirely up to you, you can reorder the number you want to give to the representatives in the Senate from the Prime Minister, from the Leader of the Opposition who of course can also nominate people of ethnic minorities they can nominate Rotumans they can nominate you know Kai China the Kai Lomas and all that right but I would hope that you keep the element of religious representation because I believe religious organizations have got very good people of integrity and I look at Archbishop Loi Chong you know as an example of somebody who has contributed very seriously in the national politics.

You will notice something commissioners I've said nothing there in my submission about how your constitution can come into being that's your practical process I've said nothing there in my submission because to be honest it is something that is totally unclear to me what this government has planned to bring about your constitution in place because if the Supreme Court has said that you need to have a two thirds majority in Parliament and then a simple majority in a referendum.

Then it seems that your constitution has to wait for the next election to come in and during that election you can have a referendum which can prove your final report so I have said nothing in there about that probably this is a headache that you are going to have to think about because the last thing you want to happen to your report is what happened to our report which is that you used a lot of taxpayers money to go around the country and ask people for their views, you did a lot of work yourself, you did a lot of thinking, the people did a lot of thinking, then you produce a report and then it's embargoed and shelved and not even tabled in Parliament.

So, I will simply hope that you have got a pathway forward not only is your report tabled in Parliament and recommendations are accepted and brought into being but also the 2025 electoral law reform report is also tabled in Parliament, also discussed by the public and all that and eventually given effect to at the moment nothing has been said about all that and I have no great faith because to me to be honest there is a real problem you have in front of you which is also what we had in front of us and we never thought about it at the time we were doing the work is that politicians can sometimes think not sometimes, they always think if the system is working for us, why change it? why change it? if the system is working for us and quite often political leaders can be utterly and totally selfish they want to come back in the next elections regardless of whether the people want them or not and they might say no need to change, so you know you have a real headache in front of you Mr. Chairman and Commissioners, is there a pathway forward for your report to make sure that 1. it gets tabled in Parliament 2. it gets released to the public and discussed and 3. the recommendations that you are going to make are brought into being, after the next election and referendum hopefully.

Mr. Valenitabua: Professor Narsey we have been given until the 31st of August 2026 to complete our work and present the reports, the recommendations and the amended constitution to His Excellency and that is how far we go and that is how far we are looking. What happens after that is beyond us, at this point in time so we'll just head into His Excellency as we were directed under our terms of reference and then we'll leave it to His Excellency and the Government. I hope that answers your question, we have been asked that question but once it gets to Government there is the process of amendment to be followed which is in the constitution and which has been refined by the Supreme Court so the Government has to follow that if it wants to get the bill to Parliament and have it passed by two thirds second reading and then the referendum 50 plus 1 percent so I hope that answers your question.

We are working hard towards the 31st of August 2026.

Professor Narsey: Sir Chairman I think you've clarified your view on what happens as far as your work is concerned. Whereas what happens afterwards is as you rightly say, not your responsibility but that of the Government which commissioned you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yes, the President commissioned us, yes.

Professor Narsey: And I think that one of one of the areas that the Fiji Electoral Law Reform Commission the one chaired by Mr. Fatiaki, I think we failed in one respect which is that we did not demand from the Government a commitment that they would take our report to its logical conclusion and basically they were able to sit on our report not even table it in Parliament and not even reveal it to the public although it was the tax payers who had paid for it all and ultimately the tax payers of Fiji and the voters of Fiji are our ultimate clients and we failed to get that commitment and we are failing even now because our report has still not been tabled in Parliament it has still not been been made public which is to me is absolutely unacceptable and it does not show that this is the Government which is accountable to the people of Fiji and sadly it's also got to do intimately with the kind of electoral system we've got the kind of system we've got for forming Government that in fact the Government is able to just do this without being accountable to the people of Fiji. It's really sad for me yeah.

Me Valenitabua:	We understand the position in relation to your report however we will proceed as we have been mandated under our term of reference.
Professor Narsey:	May I may I make one request now I do not speak for my colleagues but I suspect the Chairman of our Commission would be in agreement with me that in your in your report, it includes a recommendation that our report be tabled in Parliament and made public may I request that.
Mr. Valenitabua:	Right all the Commissioners are listening to you now, we will deliberate on that we will discuss it during our deliberations and the writing of our report.
Professor Narsey:	Thank you very much any questions from anyone Neelesh.
Dr Gounder"	I'll send you an email Prof.
Mr. Valenitabua:	We have been overtaken by time, so unfortunately, we will have to bring this session virtual session to a close Prof Warden Narsey we thank you very much for your submissions and your comments about what I should say this afternoon. We have been listening to your submissions, the written ones are here, so we will be looking at them and in our presence is the legal drafter she is also listening. Vinaka.
Professor Narsey:	Thank you very much, thank you Commissioners thank you.

----------End of Session [6-7-2026] ----------

Submission to 2026 Constitution Review Commission

Professor Wadan Narsey

1. The Terms of Reference for the 2026 CRC as stated in the Government Gazette Vol. 27 No. 21 (Friday 27 March 2026) required the Commissioners to "inquire into and examine the democratic deficit of the 2013 Constitution of Republic of Fiji, as identified by the Supreme Court of the Republic of Fiji".

2. While the above might seem unduly restrictive to the Supreme Court Opinion (of 29 August 2025), the CRC is also required to inquire into and report on the perspectives from Fiji's diverse communities into a wide-ranging set of eight issues some of which are different and broader than what the Supreme Court was tasked with.

3. I wish to make comments and recommendations on six issues:

(A) what constitution does Fiji have today?

(B) An Electoral System for the People From the People.

(C) An Upper House or Senate

(D) Removal of cancerous Decrees denying the 2012 Pensioners their day in court

(E) Removal of immunities in the 2013 Constitutions not approved by Parliament

(F) Removing the over-riding role of the military as stated in the 2013 Constitution Cap 131 (2).

(G) Have the 2026 Constitution approved by Parliament and the people of Fiji.

A What Constitution does Fiji have today?

4. No one disputes that:

a) In 1987 third in command in the RFMF (Sitiveni Rabuka) treasonously over-threw the lawfully elected Government of Bavadra and Jai Ram Reddy;

b) After the imposition of the 1990 Constitution, there was a consensus 1997 Constitution approved by the Fiji Parliament (both Houses) with immunity granted to Rabuka and his associates, as well as others who had opposed the 1987 coup;

c) The 1999 Elections were held under the 1997 Constitution with the political party of Rabuka losing power while the Party of Jai Ram Reddy (including myself) was wiped out totally (despite having significant number of votes);

d) The Fiji Labour Party of Mahendra Chaudhry then formed Government but held office for just one year;

e) A 2000 coup by a unit of CRW soldiers, backed initially at the highest levels of the RFMF but led in Parliament by civilians (prominent being George Speight and Jo Nata), took the Chaudhry Government hostage;

f) Eventually, another election under the same 1997 Constitution brought in the Qarase Government of 2001.

g) The 2006 Elections brought in the multi-party Government of SDL (Qarase) and FLP (with Chaudhry personally staying out).

5. No one disputes that

a) the 2006 treasonous coup by Bainimarama then overthrew the lawfully elected Government of the late Laisenia Qarase in multi-party with the FLP, with Chaudhry joining Bainimarama soon after;

b) the Fiji Court of Appeal ruled in 2009 that the 1997 Constitution had not been abrogated;

c) the Bainimarama Military Government by military might then ruled Fiji for eight years and then imposed the 2013 Constitution on Fiji prior to the 2014 Elections under it;

d) the 2013 Constitution was never ratified by any Parliament (despite the Bainimarama Government being in control from 2014 to 2022);

e) the 2013 Constitution was never ratified by a Referendum despite there being three national elections in 2014, 2018 and 2022 during which Referenda could have been easily held;

f) the 2013 Constitution stipulated, in total contradiction, that to change any element of the 2013 Constitution there needed to be three quarters majority in the Parliament and three quarters majority of registered voters in a Referendum (a virtual impossibility).

6. How utterly ludicrous (and a joke on the people of Fiji) to require conditions for the slightest constitutional change required by the people of Fiji that were never used when the constitution was imposed in the first place on the people of Fiji, by unknown persons.

7. The 2013 Constitution also granted a whole range of immunities for unspecified acts by the Bainimarama Government agents (but not their opponents) from 2000 to 2014.

8. Elections were held in 2014 and 2018 returning Bainimarama's Fiji First Party to Government.

9. The 2022 Elections saw FFP defeated narrowly by a coalition of PAP, NFP and SODELPA.

10. In the March 2025 sitting of Parliament, the Fiji Government tabled the Constitution (Amendment) Bill 2025 (Amendment Bill) which sought to amend the amendment process in section 160 (by deleting "three quarters" and substituting "two thirds" in s 160(2)(b) and deleting subsections (3) to (6) and repeal the amendment prohibition in section 159 (by deleting s 159(2)(c)). The Bill was defeated on its second reading.

Supreme Court Opinion

11. The Coalition Government then through the Office of the Solicitor General (OSG) sought an "Opinion" from the Supreme Court on five issues, the first four being merely conditions for changing the 2013 Constitution and the fifth on the validity of the 1997 Constitution. The Supreme Court went further.

12. The Panel of Supreme Court judges argued that the conditions for change were too onerous making the Constitution unresponsive to people's changing needs. The Opinion ruled that a two thirds majority in Parliament and a simple majority in a Referendum should be enough to keep the constitution "alive" and responsive to changing needs over time, but also not too easy to change.

13. The fifth issue was whether the 1997 Constitution was still valid with the OSG strangely asserting that it was not necessary to answer that question as it had been "overtaken by events".

14. Let me state at the outset that I disagree with the same Supreme Court Opinion that while the 1997 Constitution has not been lawfully abrogated, "events have overtaken the 1997 Constitution". Any rational person must ask: what "events" can "overtake" a constitution?

15. I am in agreement with a previous judgement by Justice Gates who ruled (in a 2001 case Koroi v Commissioner of Inland Revenue) on the attempted abrogation of the 1997 Constitution in 2001 as follows:

> "It is not possible for any man to tear up the Constitution. He has no authority to do so. The Constitution remains in place until amended by Parliament, a body of elected members who collectively represent all of the voters and inhabitants of Fiji. Usurpers may ... rule for many years apparently outside of, or without the Constitution. Eventually the original order has to be revisited, and the Constitution resurfaces".

16. This is however a moot point now with the Supreme Court ruling otherwise. The Supreme Court has argued that by a number of criteria and arguments (which they discuss and which can be regarded as quite plausible), they have determined that the 2013 Constitution must now be regarded as the "common law" of Fiji.

17. The Supreme Court asserted that this was a "determination" and not just an "Opinion".

18. While I personally believe that this is still debatable, I concede that Fiji can still accept the Supreme Court decision that the 2013 Constitution is now "in place" whatever its dubious provenance (the Supreme Court called it "democratic deficit") , but bring in fundamental changes which results effectively in a "new" constitution.

19. This constitution can then obtain social legitimacy if passed by Parliament (with two thirds majority) and a Referendum (simple majority), as determined by the Supreme Court Opinion.

20. I believe that the Fiji Parliament can bring in at least five sets of fundamental changes to the 2013 Constitution that will allow the Fiji Parliament to effectively approve a "new" Constitution (which we can call the 2026 Constitution):

a) A new electoral system (POLCS) with constituencies and proportionality;

b) reintroduce an Upper House similar to what existed in the 1997 Constitution;

c) remove cancerous Decrees denying basic human rights to groups of Fiji people;

d) remove immunity provisions not approved by any Parliament.

e) Remove the over-riding role of the RFMF in national affairs.

B A New Electoral System For the People From the People

21. In early 2025, the Fiji Government appointed the Fiji Electoral Law Reform Commission (FELRC) chaired by former Chief Justice Daniel Fatiaki and comprising Professor Wadan Narsey, Dr Deidre Brookes (a NZ citizen) and Seini Nabou.

22. The 2026 CRC should confirm that in the Terms of Reference, the Fiji Law Reform Commission had asked the 2025 FELRC to ensure that:

(a) the proposed electoral system should uphold the principles of democracy and good governance, equality, inclusion, and fairness;

(b) promote the representation of women by the inclusion of Special Measures; which comply with Fiji's obligations under international law, including CEDAW

(c) strengthen the accountability of elected representatives to voters;

(d) review the restrictions placed on civil society actors

(e) review the powers of the Supervisor of Elections, electoral offences and penalties.

(f) carry out community-wide consultations

23. The 2026 CRC should confirm that its own TORs for electoral reform are consistent with the TORs for 2025 FELRC.

24. The Final Report of the FELRC (An Electoral System for the People from the People) was handed to the Fiji Government in early July 2025. A Validation exercise was conducted at the FEO. A presentation was made by Professor Narsey from Melbourne via Zoom to the Prime Minister.

25. The 2026 CRC should note that the website of the FLRC recorded "The Report [An Electoral System for the People from the People] marks a significant milestone in Fiji's journey toward electoral reform and democratic enhancement.

26. The 2026 CRC has also been given the Final Report (and all its detailed annexes) which was handed to Government in early July 2025 but embargoed and not tabled in Parliament or made public, for reasons unknown.

27. My comments here repeat the main arguments of that Report with a minor modification that I have conceded in hindsight, on the method of ranking of failed candidates on the List which ensures the crucial factor of proportionality.

28. I also suggest a modification that the 2026 CRC could recommend (on the 25 RSW) based on its consultations with the people

The public complaints about the current system

29. The CRC may wish to confirm from their own public consultations that virtually everywhere in Fiji the people/voters/political candidates complained (as outlined in the Report's Annexes)

(a) about the confusing Sudoku style ballot paper with hundreds of random numbers with no candidate name or picture, and no party names or symbols;

(b) the absence of an identifiable local MP who would be accountable to the voters in his/her local community;

(c) the unfairness of a system which allowed candidates with insignificant number of votes to become MPs under the massive votes going to the "Popular Leaders", while others with thousands of votes were excluded;

(d) the unreasonable and onerous requirements for registration of Political Parties;

(e) the increasing criminalization and excessive penalties for minor infractions;

(f) excessive powers of some electoral officials

(g) many other criticisms outlined in the full Report of the FELRC.

What the public wanted

30. The 2026 CRC should confirm through a detailed reading of the Report's Annexes and their own consultations throughout Fiji that:

(a) Voters throughout Fiji wanted their own local constituencies and MPs who would identifiably be accountable to their local constituencies;

(b) Maritime voters wanted their own voices in Parliament and not be submerged in mainland constituencies and MPs.

(c) Voters wanted simple ballot papers with candidate names, party symbols, and photographs of candidates, not just numbers easily jumbled and ticked.

(d) They wanted simple voting with ticks (no complicated counting of preferences)

(e) they wanted transparent counting of ballot papers in front of candidates (and their agents) and the public;

(f) A few knowledgeable witnesses (like Dialogue Fiji) wanted proportionality at the national level, one of the great benefits of the 2013 Constitution.

(g) many witnesses stated that if the 2013 Constitution prevented what the people wanted, then Government should throw out the 2013 Constitution and its electoral system which had never been approved by any parliament or referendum.

The 2025 Proportional Open List Constituency System (POLCS)

31. The Proportional Open List Constituency System (POLCS) recommended by the 2025 FELRC would comprise three essential elements:

(a) 25 Open Constituencies (with 5 Maritime ones), with no ethnic requirement for candidates or voters; (for the first time there will be MPs representing Kadavu, Yasawa/Mamanuca, Rotuma, Lomaiviti/Ovalau and Lau.

(b) 25 Reserved Seats for Women in the same 25 constituencies, all voters voting and only women standing; this can be a temporary measure until women candidates begin to stand and win in the 25 Open constituencies.

(c) 21 List Seats to ensure proportionality.

32. Note that for the first time in Fiji there would be no need for ethnic constituencies and ethnic voting to protect any major ethnic group, as proportionality will do that quite effectively, as it does to a certain extent in the 2013 Constitution.

33. This would result in 71 MPs, the same size as in the 1997 Constitution, which number was generally accepted by the people without any great protest about cost inflation.

34. The current high salaries of Ministers, Assistant Ministers, MPs and their perks must be all independently assessed by a body independent of Parliament.

35. The number of MPs could be less if so desired by reducing the number of Constituencies (e.g. merging some Maritime constituencies and/or reducing the number of List candidates). But I believe that the extra problems associated with larger constituency sizes do not justify this.

36. The constituency boundaries could be easily demarcated by using already existing information on the Voter ID cards, such as polling station the voter was associated with. This exercise has already been conducted by Mr Fatiaki and Ms Nabou with the assistance of technical staff from the FEO and constituency boundaries determined (see the Annexes).

37. The CRC should note that there is no need for a costly and time-consuming national re-registration of all voters.

Simple voting and transparent counting

38. Voters wanted simple voting and simple transparent counting and the 2025 POLCS delivers on this.

39. Each and every voter would get 2 ballot papers, one for the Open Constituency, and one for the RSW.

40. Each ballot paper will have the names, party symbols (including Independents) and photos of all the candidates for that constituency alone. i.e. a relatively small number probably less than 10 or 15.

41. There will therefore be 25 MPs from the 25 Open Constituencies.

42. There will similarly be 25 Women MPs from these same constituencies, so that there is no need for different boundaries for the RSW.

43. The 50 local MPs can be and should be decided by the FEO at the local constituency centers: in front of party agents, media representatives and voters themselves. Simple piles associated with each candidate would be clearly observable and the counting visible and verifiable.

44. There are no preferences to count and recount causing great confusion in the public mind.

45. While the First Past the Post system has its weaknesses, the benefits of simplicity far outweigh the small weakness. In any case, the eventual proportionality of results for every party will compensate for any weakness of representation at the constituency level.

46. What must be appreciated is that with 50 local MPs, voters will know exactly who is their local MP and who they can go to for their needs. This is a fatal weakness in the current 2013 Electoral system.

47. In complete contrast, with the current electoral system allowing Parties to mount their campaign on "votes for the leader" the MPs who enter Parliament under the Party banner often have absolutely minimal votes, and no MP can be identified with the local needs of voters. This will never happen under the 2025 POLCS.

48. The List MPs will then be the only results decided at the FEO HQ after all the Party votes are aggregated. All these MPs will have significant numbers of votes behind them from their local constituencies.

The List to Ensure Proportionality

49. For each qualifying Party having more than the 5% Threshold, "the Proportion of their Total MPs in Parliament" will be the same as the "Proportion of their Total Party Votes in Total Votes cast for Qualifying Parties".

50. While the 5% Threshold currently applies to qualification for the List, note that any small party which has enough local constituency support to win on a First Past the Post mode of counting, could win a seat without getting 5% of the Total Votes cast in Fiji (the current Threshold).

51. Independents could also be elected in local constituencies without having to satisfy the 5% Threshold which requires around 25 thousand votes.

52. In the Final Report we had stated that the losers from the Open Constituencies would then go on to the Open List where they will be ranked according to "Standardized Votes" which take into account that some Open Constituencies will be very large (and losers will tend to have large numbers of votes) and some (e.g. Maritime Constituencies) will be quite small (and "losers" will tend to have smaller numbers of votes). Percentages would equalize the candidates.

53. I have since considered that there is no need for standardization of Losers Votes via percentages, which method voters and parties may have difficulty understanding.

54. The FEO could simply rank Losers by the total votes received. This will also ensure that the MPs selected for Parliament will have significant numbers of votes behind them.

55. We need not worry about Maritime constituencies as they will be well represented in any case, better than ever before especially with the RSW seats in each constituency.

Guarantee of Opposing Views in Parliament

56. With there being 21 List MPs (of Losers in Constituencies) as opposed to 25 Local Open Constituency MPs (of Winners), there is a virtual guarantee that there will be opposing views conveyed to Parliament, and not just of the Winners. This will surely strengthen democracy.

Why Reserved Seats for Women?

57. A few witnesses did state to the FELRC that there should not be any reserved seats for women and that women should compete with men equally as candidates.

58. The FELRC however felt that given the extent of violence against women in Fiji, women were not on the same "level playing field" when it came to taking full part in politics as candidates, even if they in aggregate had roughly the same number of votes nationally as men.

59. The Full Report of the FELRC explains why there are urgent economic reasons to strengthen women politically in Parliament, because historically, women have never been more than 15% of Parliament despite all the encouragement by women's organizations, local and international.

(a) Women have extremely small shares of total wealth, total income, paid formal employment, and even leisure, while doing more than 54% of all work in Fiji (paid and unpaid).

(b) With the 25 Open and 25 RSW boundaries being the same, then male and female candidates for any party should be able to campaign together, giving greater security to campaigning women candidates. There will be no shortage of women candidates as currently.

(c) Note an additional advantage not mentioned in the full Report that giving women their own reserved seats will also ensure that good male candidates are not pushed out of the 25 Open Constituencies.

(d) Note also that the losers from the RSW seats do not go on to the Party Lists, only the losers from the 25 Open Constituencies.

(e) Of course both the winner and the loser from the Open Constituency could also be women who would add to the 25 RSW. This is however extremely unlikely as good women candidates would probably all stand in the RSW constituencies.

(f) If the RSW recommendation is accepted, the PM will have far more women to choose from as his Ministers and Assistant Ministers than currently.

(g) Women all over the country will without fail have a woman MP from their local constituency to go to for their interests. This has never happened previously in the history of Fiji.

(h) For the first time ever in the history of Fiji, the Fiji Government will be able to tell the world that Fiji satisfies the CEDAW target of at least 30% of Parliament being women- at least 25. Currently there are only 5.

(i) Fiji would surely be able to understand whether having at least 25 qualified women in Parliament is an improvement on past parliaments: not just on matters concerning women but national policies as a whole.

(j) In the unlikely event that the 2026 CRC finds from their conclusions that there is no great public pressure for Reserved Seats for Women, I reluctantly suggest below that (despite its great value):

- the recommendation for 25 RSW can be ignored,
- the number of List Seats can then be increased to 30,
- while keeping the size of Parliament to 55, the current size.

Protecting major ethnic groups

60. Fiji has suffered coups in 1987 and 2000 because, in my opinion, indigenous Fijian Parties did not control government after elections and they were able to influence the RFMF to conduct coups.

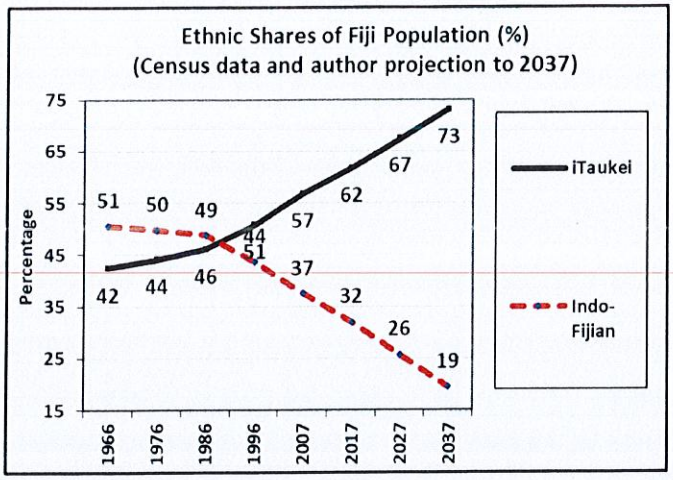
61. It is a continuing tragedy that the full truth behind the real ringleaders of the 1987 and 2000 coup have never been established, even to date with the sitting of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.

62. The origins of the 2006 coup are quite different and have also never been publicly established although many had hoped for more light to be shed by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.

63. With indigenous Fijians now comprising 65% of the voters and Indo-Fijians comprising around 30%, the element of proportionality through the Open List system will ensure, without fail, if the two major ethnic groups vote as groups, then whoever they vote for

* iTaukei/Indigenous Fijians will elect 63% of the MPs (even more in the future)

* Indo-Fijians will elect 31% of the MPs (decreasing slowly into the future)



64. The future for ethnic proportions of the population may be seen in the accompanying Graph. By 2037 Indo-Fijians will be a mere 19% of total population and slightly higher proportion of voters. A mere 12% of Class 1 primary school children will be Indo-Fijian.

65. The political parties representing iTaukei voters will almost certainly form Government either on their own or in partnership with other parties which will include those voted for by Indo-Fijians as currently.

66. The skewed electoral results and marginalization of iTaukei parties that encouraged coups in 1970 and 2000 will not occur again. Coups arising from ethnic iTaukei unhappiness will be a "thing of the past".

67. This positive proportional result has happened in some fashion under the 2013 Constitution and its Electoral System in the elections of 2014, 2018 and 2022.

68. That proportionality element is preserved through the 2025 POLCS outlined in the Final Report of the FELRC.

69. It is also important to note that in the constituency system Political Parties can choose to stand candidates of other ethnic minorities.

70. It should also be noted that Prime Ministers and Leaders of Opposition can also nominate persons from ethnic minorities to Senate.

71. One un-noticed feature of Fiji's ethnic politics since 1970 is that virtually all Indo-Fijian political leaders (e.g. Jai Ram Reddy, Mahendra Chaudhry, Professor Biman Prasad, and others) who suffered from military coups have co-operated with the RFMF coup leaders thereafter in the national interest.

There will be no need for gerrymandering through the Boundaries Commission

72. I remind that in ALL the electoral systems before the 2013 Constitution when there was no national proportionality, the Boundaries Commission was a source of much political bickering and tension as political parties tried to move boundaries this way and that to suit their perceived interests.

73. With total proportionality ensured between political parties by the 2025 POLCS, there will be absolutely no advantage to be gained by any political party trying to change boundaries here and there (called "gerrymandering" in political theory).

74. The 2026 CRC should make an extra effort to understand why this will be so arithmetically as I explain below.

75. At the FEO HQ after allowance is made for the Independents who win in Local Constituencies, then each Party who gets past the Threshold (existing 5% or the recommended lower 2%) will then be allocated the same proportion of seats in Parliament, and corresponding seats (say T).

76. If C is then the number of constituency seats it has won, then the number of List seats it is entitled to will be

$$L = (T-C).$$

77. Once T is fixed, then C going up by 1 MP (through gerrymandering of boundary change) will mean that L must go down by 1 MP, since T is fixed. A Constituency seat artificially gained by a Party by shifting boundaries, will automatically mean a seat less in the List allocation, so to keep the national number of MPs owed to each party the determined by their share of total votes.

78. A Boundaries Commission, if set up under the POLCS, will not face political bickering among parties.

79. Constituency boundaries can be set purely according to the logistical needs of the candidates, voters and FEO officials in implementing the elections.

Other advantages of the recommended POLCS

80. For the first time since 2006 there may be Independents winning. Since 2006 there have been no Independents in Parliament.

81. For the first time since 2014, there may be small parties winning in local constituencies even if they do not get the Threshold nationally. Currently at least two small parties are unfairly excluded by the 5% Threshold.

82. If the next election is held under the same 2013 system, then it is possible that even the current two small parties in Parliament may not make the 5% threshold. Even the current newly created parties who were elected under the Fiji First Party banner may fail to get the 5% threshold for obvious reasons. I suggest that the Threshold be reduced.

The 5% Threshold Black Hole: reduce to 2%?

83. It would be considered utterly scandalous if it was discovered that the Fiji Elections Office had quietly thrown away thousands of votes into a dustbin (Black Hole) at the back of their Headquarters in Toorak.

84. Yet this is precisely what the current Fiji Electoral System in the 2013 Constitution does in every election and probably will again, in the next election.

85. The current 5% Threshold has meant that more than 30 thousand voters have been effectively disenfranchised at each of the elections of 2014, 2018, 2022. Their votes have been totally nullified because they were for small parties or Independents not reaching the 5% Threshold and therefore simply did not count towards electing any MP.

86. With 1 MP in a 71 seat Parliament representing just 1.4% of voters (and 1 MP in a 55 seat Parliament representing just 1.8% of total votes), I suggest that the Threshold for Parties to qualify for the List could be reduced to 2%.

87. In any case, remember that the winners in the local constituencies will not require any Threshold to be exceeded- they just need to be First Past the Post relative to the other candidates.

If the Public insist on Economizing on the size of Parliament

88. If the 2026 CRC finds from its public consultations that the people are generally in favour of keeping the size of House of Representatives at 55 (the current one), AND if there is no great pubic desire for the 25 Reserved Seats for Women, then the 25 RSW can be omitted altogether and the List Component be increased to 30 to ensure proportionality.

89. I would strongly advise against merely reducing the number of the RSW seats as that would require laborious different boundaries for the Open Constituencies and the RSW.

90. This would then result in (25 + 30) or 55 MPs altogether in Parliament, as currently.

91. But then, Fiji would also miss a glorious opportunity to take a radical step forward towards gender equality in politics on the global stage. It should also be remembered that another Review of the Electoral system may be a long time coming. Fiji has surely had enough of electoral changes.

92. I would strongly recommend keeping the 25 RSWs and the 71 Seat Parliament, especially as each MP will have a direct connection and accountability to the voters of one of the 25 constituencies.

93. Those concerned about the excessive cost of Parliament might wish to recommend to the 2026 CRC to re-establish the Higher Salaries Commission and prevent the debacle that took place after the 2022 Elections when a Committee comprising MPs themselves massively and unprofessionally increased their own salaries and perks.

Other Changes to the Electoral Laws

94. The 2025 FELRC Report and its Annexes have detailed recommendations for fundamental changes to the electoral laws to remove the climate of fear etc.

C Re-establish Upper House

95. One of the undoubted benefits of the 1997 Constitution was that it had an Upper House (Senate) which was an excellent "checks and balance" mechanism for the Lower House of elected MPs.

96. The authoritarian Bainimarama Government saw no need for an oversight body.

97. It is puzzling that the current Parliament (neither the Government nor the "Opposition") have shown any urgency for the restoration of the Upper House.

98. I suggest that while not being accountable to an Upper House may have benefits for those in power, it reduces the Government's accountability to the public.

99. I would strongly recommend that the 2026 CRC explore with the public the full restoration of an Upper House in the new 2026 Constitution, discuss what could be the components and what would be its key functions.

100. They can take guidance from the 1970 and the 1997 Constitutions which both had parliamentary legitimacy with nominations from the Prime Minister, Leader of the Opposition, the GCC and Council of Rotuma.

101. The Senate in the 1970 and 1997 Constitutions had the following numbers:

Table 1 Composition of Senate in Constitutions of 1970, 1997 and Proposed 2026

	1970 Constitution	1997 Constitution	Proposed 2026 Constitution
Prime Minister	7	9	8
Leader of Opp.	9	9	7
GCC	8	14	5
Rotuma	1	1	1
Religious Org.			10
Total	25	33	31

102. My suggestions for the Senate in the new Constitution are given in the last column.

103. I note that one of its components, the Great Council of Chiefs has been restored by the Coalition Government but without any specified role in Parliament.

104. Given that the GCC had dubious roles in supporting the coups of 1987 and 2000 and given that the iTaukei representation in Senate will be further strengthened by the religious organization nominees I suggest below, I believe that the GCC representation can be reduced to 5.

105. I would suggest that in addition to those nominated by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the GCC, there could also be around 10 persons nominated by the main religious bodies in Fiji, roughly 7 of whom would represent iTaukei religions and 3 represent Indo-Fijian religions. Of course, these representatives could be from ethnic minorities as well.

106. The latest FBS data from the 2023-24 EUS, suggest that the most supported religions in Fiji are currently, with their approximate national support and my suggested number in Senate:

Table 2 Religious affiliations of Fiji population in 2023-24 and Suggested numbers in Senate
Religion	Perc. Of Population	Suggested No. in Senate
Methodist	35.4	3
Sanatan Dharm and Arya Samaj	21.8	2
Catholic	9.2	1
Seventh Day Adventist	6.0	1
Assemblies of God	5.8	1
Other Christian	6.6	1
Muslim Sunni and Ahmadiyya	4.0	1
Total		10
Source: estimated by Narsey from 2023-24 EUS

107. I suggest that the representatives of religious groups in Fiji may be expected to provide far more moral and ethical guidance to Parliament than political parties or even the GCC which has had a chequered past in previous coups (such as in 1987 and 2000).

108. With the Senate numbers suggested in the Table, political party representatives nominated by the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition will comprise 15 out of 31 and cannot thereby determine Senate decisions without other support.

109. I remind that the MPs in Parliament will be roughly representing these same ratios of ethnic populations in the population.

110. Overall there will be a significant majority of iTaukei representatives in Senate, even higher than their share of population. This is appropriate given Senate's over-riding responsibility for iTaukei natural resources.

(D) Removing Cancerous Decrees

111. The Coalition Government has already removed some undesirable Decrees imposed by the Bainimarama Government, such as the Media Decree.

112. It is just as important to remove Decrees 51 and 52 which the Bainimarama Government imposed so as to break the lawful contracts that the FNPF had with the 2012 Pensioners AND to throw out the David Burness case which was already being heard by the High Court. This has never been done before in the judicial history of Fiji

113. It is absolutely critical for the Coalition Government or any Fiji Government to remove from the Constitution any cancers that deny Fiji citizens their right to take their perceived grievance to court- to be at least heard, whatever the court may subsequently decide on their case. The reputation of Fiji's judiciary deserves nothing less and I would expect the Fiji Law Society to take the lead in calling for these cancers to be removed from the Fiji Constitution.

E Removing the Immunities Not Approved by Parliament?

114. It cannot be disputed that "punishment" for those who break the rule of law, is crucial to the existence of the rule of law: as a deterrence of the offender and others, for retribution and reform of the criminal, all ultimately with the objective of protecting society.

115. I call on the CRC to ask why there has there been no "punishment" for

(a) those who clearly committed treason in 2006?

(b) The 5 deaths of CRW soldiers in military custody after the 2000 mutiny without trial, judge or jury?

116. On the contrary how can the 2013 Constitution give wide-ranging immunity to Bainimarama and all coup collaborators stretching back not just to the 2006 coup but also to the 2000 coup and mutiny.

117. It is extremely unfortunate that the Panel of Supreme Court judges did not inquire into the possible fundamental causes of either the 2000 coup or the 2006 coup.

118. While some prominent front men (such as George Speight and Jo Nata) have been prosecuted, found guilty and paid their dues, there is clear evidence in the 2000 Evans Board of Inquiry Report that there were leaders of the 2000 coup at the highest levels of the RFMF with the Commander even refusing to appear before the Evans Board or Inquiry.

119. I remind also that the Panel of Supreme Court judges did not inquire into the identities of the real supporters of the 2000 coup at the highest levels of the RFMF, including one senior officer identified by the Evans Board of Inquiry Report as being in contact with the CRW soldiers on the morning of the coup. He is currently occupying a high diplomatic position in the Coalition Government.

120. The facts are abundantly clear that the 2006 coup had nothing to do with ethnic tensions but possibly tragic events, such as the killing of 5 CRW soldiers after the putting down of the 2000 mutiny. It has been forgotten that the Commissioner of Police at the time (the Australian late Andrew Hughes) was investigating this event and about to charges also for sedition, but had to with his family to Australia, following threats made on their safety.

121. Should the Supreme Court not have inquired whether the immunity offered in the 2013 Constitution could be legitimately applied in international law for the killing of the 5 CRW soldiers in 2000 or the treasonous 2006 overthrow of the Qarase Government?

122. Of course, there was no punishment meted out for treason committed by Rabuka in 1987. But the fundamental difference in law is that Rabuka was guaranteed immunity in the 1997 Constitution which was approved by both Houses of a legitimately elected parliament in 1997.

123. In contrast, the 2013 Constitution was unilaterally imposed on Fiji by the unelected military Bainimarama Government, without any parliamentary approval or Referendum, and "signed into law" by one individual, arguably also an illegally appointed President.

124. The fundamental legal flaw in this 2013 Constitution is that it brazenly stipulates that any changes whatsoever, however small, must require three quarters of an elected parliament and three quarters of a Referendum, when neither condition was required for its imposition in the first place.

125. This has been correctly modified by the Supreme Court Opinion to only require two thirds of Parliament and a simple majority in a Referendum.

126. The Supreme Court Opinion however strangely ruled that no changes may be made to the provisions for immunity. This is surely challengeable.

127. The Supreme Court Opinion acknowledged that "Immunity provisions can be seen to detract from the rule of law, they insulate from what would otherwise be the legal consequences of their actions. They also sit uneasily with the concept of equality before the law. As well, such provisions may create, in the minds of those contemplating a coup, expectations of future immunities and, in this way, might increase the risks of extra-constitutional action. These issues are compounded when immunities are not able to be amended."

128. But then it argued: On the other hand, unamendable immunities may be— as they probably were in 2012 and 2013 —preconditions to a peaceful transition from military government to democracy. In this way they can be seen to promote democratic values."

129. Whether they were "preconditions" to a peaceful transition to democracy is quite debatable. Preconditions set by whom for whom to follow? The idea that immunities for some for unknown crimes committed can be seen to "promote democratic values" is surely stretching logic beyond common sense.

130. The Supreme Court Opinion argued "As well, nonrecognition of the unamendable immunities would understandably be regarded by those affected as a departure from understandings that have formed the basis of the way Fiji has been run over the last 35 years (that is, since the 1990 Constitution came into effect).

131. "A departure from understandings"? Understandings by whom?

132. The Supreme Court Opinion argued that "The 1997 Constitution shows that unamendable immunities can result from a democratic process and for this reason are not necessarily a breach of the right of self-determination".

133. While the first part of the above statement is correct, the second part (underlined here) is a "red herring" or non-sequitur.

134. The Supreme Court Opinion went on to assert (Clause 229) "Given that unamendable immunities have now been a feature of Fiji's constitutional history for the 35 last years and are not inconsistent with international practice".

135. This above statement ignores the central point that unamendable immunities have been a feature only since the 2013 Constitution was imposed by the Bainimarama Government.

136. The idea that there have been international cases of immunity granted in constitutions do not make them in any way desirable, especially given that the "rule of law" must apply to all, without exception. Certainly the rule of law must apply for horrendous crimes such as the extra-judicial killing of 5 possibly innocent persons in 2000 and the treasonous 2006 overthrow of the lawfully elected Government of the late Laisenia Qarase.

137. The Supreme Court Opinion goes on stating "and, very importantly, in the particular Fijian context, it would not be right to withhold recognition of them [immunities] in this case".

138. "It would not be right"? This is extremely shallow logic to say the least: it has happened in the past, so let us continue the practice, however fundamentally bad it is?

139. I remind that when the 2000 coup occurred front man George Speight and his co-conspirators expected and demanded immunity for their treason against the democratically elected Chaudhry Government: they had learnt from the immunity granted to Rabuka by the 1997 Constitution and verified by the 1007 Parliament.

140. I suggest that should the 2026 CRC continue the immunities granted in the 2013 Constitution not approved by any Parliament (i.e. excluding those implicated in the 1987 coup) this would permanently reinforce and strengthen the perverse historical logic that anyone can commit any crime in Fiji, overthrow the government, hold power long enough, even hold elections under distorted electoral laws. and rewrite the constitution to include immunity for themselves.

141. There can be no end to this cycle. It is surely time to draw a line under that cycle.

142. The 2026 CRC may wish to consult the highest levels of the RFMF who I believe have declared that they will never again support a coup against a lawfully elected government.

143. The current RFMF Commander has withstood many public calls (and private pressure) for him to remove an elected government following the 2022 Elections.

144. He has publicly acknowledged responsibility for RFMF involvement in all the past coups, and has opposed the immunity clauses in the constitution.

145. His contract has been renewed for another five years.

146. I believe that the 2026 CRC is at a historic crossroad: this is now the time to say that immunities for crimes committed must never again be granted through any constitution approved by a Fiji Parliament. Any such clauses must be removed.

F Removing the role of the military

147. In the 2013 Constitution, Cap. 131 (2) states "It shall be the overall responsibility of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces to ensure at all times the security, defence and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians"

148. During the counting of votes after the 2022 Elections and several times thereafter there have been calls in the social media, from all sides of the political divide, for the RFMF to use this specific clause and interfere with the vote counting and government formation process.

149. It is absolutely unacceptable for the RFMF to be used in this fashion in domestic politics, a recipe for the encouragement and continuation of coups and the coup culture.

150. The 2026 CRC should throw this clause out from the Constitution they recommend.

G New Fiji Constitution?

151. The 2026 CRC might want to re-examine all the constitutions that have been placed before the public and see what can be retained and what eliminated:

- the 1997 Constitution

- the Yash Ghau Draft Constitution

- the 2013 Constitution

152. Should the changes recommended above be approved by two thirds of Parliament and a simple majority in a Referendum, then the public can legitimately see the 2026 Constitutions as a genuine "new" constitution, approved by a Fiji Parliament, supplanting the imposed 2013 Constitution with all its "democratic deficits".

Can the 2026 CRC save Taxpayers' Funds: What Electoral System for Fiji? Professor Wadan Narsey

This last week has seen a very positive development with Prime Minister Rabuka proposing that all Ministers take a 20% pay cut and reduce all their frequent overseas trips.

While some cynics have publicly labelled this as a superficial gimmick before the next election, nevertheless the measures proposed will save some taxpayers' money.

May I suggest to the Prime Minister that he could save some more of taxpayers' funds by advising his 2026 Constitution Review Committee that they do not waste tax-payers' money on community wide consultations for the public's views on desirable electoral reform.

This would merely cover the same grounds that the 2025 Fiji Electoral Law Reform Commission (FELRC) chaired by Danial Fatiaki (former Chief Justice), and comprising Professor Wadan Narsey, Seini Nabou and Dr Deidre Brookes, covered quite comprehensively (in the words of the Fiji Law Reform Commission - demonstrating Fiji's commitment to inclusive and participatory policymaking. The Final Report will be made publicly available in due course.").

Nine months on, while that Report has not been made publicly available or even tabled in Parliament, PM Rabuka can remind the 2026 CRC that the 2025 FELRC had focused on electoral law reform in their Terms of Reference (TORs), far more comprehensively than required of the 2026 CRC.

The TORs given to the 2025 FELRC

The 2026 CRC should confirm that the FLRC had asked the 2025 FELRC to ensure that:

(a) the proposed electoral system should uphold the principles of democracy and good governance, equality, inclusion, and fairness;

(b) promote the representation of women by the inclusion of Special Measures; which comply with Fiji's obligations under international law, including CEDAW

(c) strengthen the accountability of elected representatives to voters;

(d) review the restrictions placed on civil society actors

(e) review the powers of the Supervisor of Elections, electoral offences and penalties.

(f) carry out community-wide consultations.

With the excellent assistance of FLRC staff (Leighton Fatiaki and Leah Duru) and two staff from the Fiji Elections Office (Anaseini Senimoli and Mesake Dawai), the FELRC Team went all over Fiji, twice, seeking the views of the people.

The website of the FLRC accurately noted:

"The Report marks a significant milestone in Fiji's journey toward electoral reform and democratic enhancement. The review was conducted with support from the Ministry of Justice, Electoral Commission, Ministry of Women, Ministry of Rural and Maritime Development, Ministry of iTaukei Affairs, Ministry of Information, and the Fijian Elections Office. It included a four-month nationwide consultation across all four divisions and Rotuma. The process featured simulations with political parties, outreach in places of worship, villages, and universities, and materials translated into Vosa Vakaviti, Hindi, and Rotuman—demonstrating Fiji's commitment to inclusive and participatory policymaking. The Final Report will be made publicly available in due course."

While the Final Report of the FELRC (An Electoral System for the People from the People) has been inexplicably "embargoed", I had already conducted a full Simulation/Validation exercise at the Fijian Elections Office (20 June 2025) to which ALL the political parties were invited and were present. So they all know what we were recommending.

Secondly, I can refer to the contents of my Narsey Power-point presentation I personally made on the 30 June 2025 by Zoom to Prime Minister Rabuka from Melbourne.

The views here are therefore my own, and not necessarily of my colleagues on the FELRC whose Final Report was handed to the FLRC on 7 July 2025.

What the people complained about.

If the 2025 CRC is given full access to the Report of the 2025 FELRC including all the detailed Annexes, they can confirm that virtually everywhere in Fiji the people/voters complained

(a) about the confusing Sudoku style ballot paper with hundreds of random numbers with no candidate name or picture, and no party names or symbols;

(b) the absence of an identifiable local MP who would be accountable to the voters in his/her local community;

(c) the unfairness of a system which allowed candidates with insignificant number of votes to become MPs while others with thousands of votes were excluded;

(d) the unreasonable and onerous requirements for registration of Political Parties;

(e) the increasing criminalization and excessive penalties for minor infractions;

(f) Excessive powers of some electoral officials

(g) many other criticisms outlined in the full Report of the ELRC.

What did the people want in their electoral system?

The 2026 CRC can also confirm through a detailed reading of the Annexes that:

(a) Voters throughout Fiji wanted their own local constituencies and MPs who would identifiably be accountable to them;

(b) Maritime voters wanted their own voices in Parliament and not be submerged in mainland constituencies and MPs.

(c) Voters wanted simple ballot papers with candidate names, party symbols, and photographs of candidates, not just numbers easily jumbled and ticked.

(c) They wanted simple voting with ticks (no complicated counting of preferences)

(d) they wanted transparent counting of ballot papers in front of candidates (and their agents) and the public;

(e) A few knowledgeable witnesses (like Dialogue Fiji) wanted proportionality at the national level, one of the great benefits of the 2013 Constitution (which I totally agreed with and went beyond the 2013 Constitution).

(f) many witnesses stated that if the 2013 Constitution prevented what they wanted, then Government should throw out the 2013 Constitution and its electoral system which had never been approved by any parliament or referendum.

The 2025 FELRC therefore attempted to ensure that the electoral system being recommended would be consistent with the 2013 Constitution which was the Supreme Law of Fiji, until such time that it could be lawfully changed, as Prime Minister Rabuka stated publicly (FT 29 June 2025).

The Electoral System recommended by the 2025 FELRC: the POLCS

It has been previously revealed (FT 16 Nov 2025) that while the eventual total numbers in parliament could be reduced by Parliament, the Proportional Open List Constituency System (POLCS) recommended by the FELRC would comprise three essential elements:

(a) 25 Open Constituencies (with 5 Maritime ones), with no ethnic requirement for candidates or voters; (for the first time there will be MPs representing Kadavu, Yasawa/Mamanuca, Rotuma, Lomaiviti/Ovalau and Lau.

(b) 25 Reserved Seats for Women in the same 25 constituencies, all voters voting and only women standing;

(c) 21 List Seats to ensure proportionality.

This would result in 71 MPs, the same size as in the 1997 Constitution. The numbers could be less.

Keeping Parliament at 55 MPs?

If Parliament decides to have the same 55 MPs in Parliament (to keep costs down) then the system could comprise

22 Open seats
22 Reserved Seats for Women
11 List Seats.

The Maritime communities would probably be merged with mainland constituencies as in the 1997 Constitution, surely undesirable.

Voters wanted simple voting and simple counting

Each voter would get 2 ballot papers, one for the Open Constituency, and one for the RSW.

Each ballot paper will have the names, party symbols (including Independents) and photos of all the candidates for that constituency alone.

There will therefore be 25 MPs from the 25 Open Constituencies.

There will similarly be 25 Women MPs from these same constituencies.

The losers from the Open Constituencies would then go on to the Open List where they will be ranked according to "Standardized Votes" which take into account that some Open Constituencies will be very large (and losers will tend to have large numbers of votes) and some (eg. Maritime Constituencies) will be quite small (and lowers will tend to have smaller numbers of votes).

Only Political Parties who have a minimum of 5% of the Total Votes Cast will qualify to draw the required number of MPs from their ranked Open List, to ensure that, without fail, the "Proportion of their Total MPs in Parliament" is the same as the "Proportion of their Total Party Votes in Total Votes cast for Qualifying Parties".

But note that any small party which has great support could win a seat without getting 5% of the Total Votes cast in Fiji.

Advantages of Reserved Seats for Women

The Full Report of the FELRC explains why there are urgent economic reasons to strengthen women politically in Parliament, because historically, women have never been more than 15% of Parliament despite all the encouragement by women's organizations.

Women have extremely small shares of total wealth, total income, paid formal employment, and even leisure, while doing more than 54% of all work in Fiji (paid and unpaid).

For the first time ever in the history of Fiji, the Fiji Government will be able to tell the world that Fiji satisfies the CEDAW target of at least 30% of Parliament being women- at least 25. Currently there are only 5.

The PM will have far more women to choose from as his Ministers and Assistant Ministers than currently.

With the 25 Open and 25 RSW boundaries being the same, then male and female candidates for any party can campaign together, giving greater security to campaigning women candidates. There will be no shortage of women candidates as currently.

Note also that giving women their own reserved seats will also ensure that good male candidates are not pushed out of the 25 Open Constituencies.

Other Valuable National Guarantees

The people of Fiji should note that at least in 1987 and 2000 there have been coups because indigenous Fijian Parties did not control government after elections.

There are therefore many benefits that the element of proportionality through the Open List system will ensure, without fail, given the current demographic reality and trends of the numbers of ethnic voters (and even more extremely in the future).

If the two major ethnic groups vote as groups, then whoever they vote for

* iTaukei/Indigenous Fijians will elect 63% of the MPs (even more in the future)

* Indo-Fijians will elect 31% of the MPs (decreasing into the future as Indo-Fijians keep emigrating)

This never happened in any election from 1970 to 2006.

This may have happened in some fashion under the 2013 Constitution and Electoral System and that element needs to be preserved for the future.

It is also important to note the importance of regional balance of MPs under the POLCS. If all the voters in each Division vote only for candidates from their division, then the distribution in parliament will be

Central	43 MPs
Western	28 MPs
Northern	14 MPs and
Eastern	3 MPs.

No division will be unfairly marginalized.

There will therefore also be absolutely no advantage to be gained by any political party trying to change boundaries here and there (called "gerrymandering" in political theory): a seat artifically gained in a constituency by shifting boundaries, will mean a seat lost in in the List allocation, to keep the national proportions of Ms owed to each party the same.

Other advantages

* For the first time since 2014, there may be Independents winning. Since 2014 there have been no Independents in Parliament,

* For the first time since 2014, there may be small parties winning in local constituencies even if they do not get 5% nationally.

Currently at least two small parties are unfairly excluded. If the next election is held under the same 2013 system, then it is possible that the current two small parties in Parliament may not make the 5% threshold.

Even current newly created parties who were elected under the Fiji First Party banner may fail to get the 5% threshold given that the two FFP Supermen may not be allowed to stand for elections.

The 2026 CRC can save taxpayers' money

I would like to suggest that the current 2026 Constitution Review Commission could first request their authorities to make available to them the Full Final Report of the Fiji Electoral Law Reform Commission (An Electoral System for the People from the People), including the Annexes.

That Report also has detailed annexes listing all the communities consulted throughout Fiji, as well as detailed verbatim records of the witnesses, also in the vernacular.

The 2026 CRC can then decide whether they need to consult further on these terms of reference or new areas not covered by the 2025 FELRC.

The 2026 CRC could also make their own recommendations on what kind of electoral system they think more appropriate, consistent with their overall Terms of Reference, of which the electoral system is only a part.

But without doubt, a significant amount of taxpayers' funds may be saved if the 2026 CRC do not attempt to duplicate the in-depth work of the 2025 FELRC.

Fiji Nursing Association (FNA)

Fiji Nursing Association
Date: 17-04-2026
Time:10.00am-12.00pm

Mr. Valenitabua: Lady and gentlemen. I know that there's a lot going on outside of this building right now. And there's a hold-up in traffic. We haven't got our full staff in place. Staff members. But we will proceed. Since you are here, and the three of us, we can listen to you this morning. I welcome you to this consultation session with the Constitution Review Committee. Present, the commissioners present are, as we have introduced ourselves, Dr. Fatiaki, Conway, and me.

The CRC is a review commission. We are reviewing the 2013 Constitution as an obligation or task that has been given to us by His Excellency, the President of Fiji. We'll be doing the job for the country, for the government, for everybody else.

And that is why we have been sending out invitations to various institutions and various individuals, inviting them to come and make submissions before us. We'll be going out to the public, to the islands, but we are dealing with the submissions here at Level 9 until the day we leave. So, we welcome you to this session.

We are here to listen to you. Remember, we want to review, we are reviewing the Constitution. We will take submissions on what should be removed, what the people think should be removed, what the people think should be included, and what the people think should remain the same in the 2013 Constitution.

And eventually, we might have an amended Constitution. Now, there is a purpose for these consultations. We welcome you, and we will now pass you the mic so that you can proceed with your submissions this morning.

Ms. Miliakere: Good morning. Good morning. Good morning, Mr. Beg. Good morning, Dr. Fatiaki. My name is Miliakere Naisorovakawalu, the current President of the Fijian Nursing Association. And on my left, Mr. Taniela Ravuka is the General Treasurer for the Fijian Nursing Association.

I would like to take this time to thank the Constitutional Review Committee in thinking of the Association. We were so proud, because it came in the last two days when the invitation came to our former President. But when we saw that invitation that came in from the CRC, we were so proud.

And we would like to thank the Committee's Mr. Ratumaiyale for thinking of the Association. The Fijian Nursing Association, I know Dr. Fatiaki, we have heard Dr. Fatiaki has been long in the service in the medical private. It's the only national professional association for nursing in this country.

Currently, we've got about 1,600 members, and it's been there, existed for more than 60 years. We are the only voices for our members, but we are voices for the nurses here in Fiji. We were grateful because tomorrow is our 67th AGM.

And this is one of the achievements that we're going to share with our members, that we were part of the CRC. Even though we did not be meeting with the National Council, sir, we discussed last night because of the Constitution. The Constitution came in from our inside.

We were both nurses. I'm the Director of Nursing at the St. Giles Hospital. So, when we talked about recruitment, we talked about legislation, we always linked to the Constitution.

And Mr. Ravuka is also a former staff of St. Giles, but Director of Nursing at the military, Fijian military hospital. So, I'll start with the Constitution. It was shared with the Fijian Nursing Council members in St. Giles, because we deal with our Act.

When we talked about legal things, we always talked about the Act. That is the Mental Health Act and the Nursing Act. So, when we shared with our Council members yesterday, these are only two group books when we talked about in the hospital.

And I was sharing with my Council members of Fijian Nursing. One is our Bible, the country that is the Constitution. And the second one is the Holy Bible.

So, with the Constitution, sir, from my understanding when we look at it, I was sharing with my Council members, we've got about 170 plus, if I'm correct, sections. But we were trying, we were sharing, what is the reality. Because we were so, you know, like what I mentioned, we were proud because the CRC think of this association.

This is a very important association, the only national voices for nurses. And we tried to link, okay, when we are going there, what are we going to share? Whether it is the relevance of the section to nursing as a trade union, or we are going to share our story and the CRC is going to fit into the section. Because currently we've got issues from the association and the members.

Number one, we read the, we knew that there are sections that talks about the freedom. When we try to relate into Fijian Nursing as a trade union, we look at, we were reading about section 17 right up to section 20. The freedom of speech, the freedom of expression. With, we, when we tried to compare with the previous constitution, with the previous act, then we came up with industrial action. Before, it took us like, correct me, sir, it was only two, it was two weeks. We do our negotiation and bargaining when it goes down to the ERA.

But right now, it's about six months, that is some of the process that have been changed, that is reflected in the ERA 2004. So, I knew that the constitution, from the constitution, the government aligned the development of the act, the regulation and other policy. And from us, when we look at 17 to 20, it was good, the freedom is there. But then we tried to look at 20. There was some narrative, because maybe it was a constitution, it was general. When it goes down to the act, it's more explained. Then we have the regulation and the policy, it's going to be very clear. And we were coming up with, right now, the Fijian Nursing Association. We'll share the stories, like what I mentioned.

And then we'll try to share with the CRC and see where do we fit into the section that 174, from the 17 to the 20. We've been having, like, the freedom of, we talked about the housing quarters. Right now, nurses are finding difficulties, our members, to go to the islands. Before, when we posted nurses, they've got nurses home. Right now, it's more general. Not anybody can come see.

So, when they posted to Vanua Levu or even Lomaloma, right? Loma loma, the divisional medical officer approached me last three weeks, Madam, can the FNA bring it up for nurses to have allocation allowance for accommodation? Because there is no quarters for nurses in Loma loma. We want to send the nurses down, but there is no quarters. Just for an example, when we have climate change in Nadi, nurses working in Lautoka stay right in Sabeto. And the quarters have been given to the other non-essential workers. And then when we look at the constitution, essential is mentioned in there. This is in relation to quarters.

We were asking the Minister of Health Management, and this is going to be part of our, this afternoon we are going to meet with our acting PS and the senior executive. Part of our log of claims is the right to have housing. And I knew that it's been reflected in here.

If something can be done, like what we used to do before, I knew that we've been in the government for more than three decades now, and some of you in the fourth decade. When it comes to climate change now, when we want to provide essential services, the services is not available to the community, because why? The nurses are not being accommodated. There is no quarters there.

If we have quarters, we can ablate the nurses there for emergency. And it's only the non-essential workers out there we do respect. Because what happens when the services of the community are not accessed to the service during disaster because of nurses have been staying far away. Working in a lot of the staying in Sabeto. Flooding comes, they are stuck, even in Nadi. And not only in the western side, in Lomaloma, in Bua. So, they have to be accommodated outside. They have to seek accommodation from the village. This was not like before.

So, from the association, we're negotiating to the ministry, please, can you provide quarters? Because this is going to help the ministry in regards to the services and to the government. So that is regards to... The other one is, we are facing with the challenges, is still with the section 17 from the 20. The remuneration.

I knew that right now, from the 8, there is a circular being circulated to us for all civil servants. But before that circular, that was being circulated a few days ago, the nurses working in the public health sector, they were not being remunerated with the overtime. They are breaching.

The FNA is trying their best to work together with the Ministry of Health, so that the nurses will not go out because of the issue of the lack of claims. When we read into the section 20, it talks about the negotiation and all those about trade union. And then I knew, from my understanding, I knew that Mr. Valenitabua, with your specialist in law, that the ERA Act, we always argue that the ERA Act has been breached by the, maybe with the ministry.

We understand the Ministry of Health has got a limitation in regards to budget because it's with the Ministry of Finance. Right now, last year, without the pushing of the Fiji Nursing Association, our nurses were not paid with overtime from last financial year, July to December. Because we signed the mediation agreement in 2023 and collective agreement supposed to be in 2024.

We negotiate with the ministry. We do not want our members to go for industrial action. It's already been approved. We don't want to. The only thing is to find ways to remunerate because you are breaching. We don't want to take it to the court of law.

And these are some of the things we would like to share, that is to be part of this one. Maybe we can filter down to the ERA or whatever. So last night and this morning, even this morning before we came, we are going to tell our story.

Our story is linked with the relevant section. We've got specialists that have been chosen by the government to listen to our voices. And this is where we think that you, the specialist, we share whether this is the right forum from understanding the link of the Constitution right to the relevant Act.

And we're coming up with the ERA Act. And we've got our other Act like the mental health, like for example, the right to be protected and for St. Giles Hospital, we've got a mental health Act that has been there for 2010. Our nurses from 2011, during our AGM, they've been raising that our nurses or health care workers in St. Giles, they have been robbed.

We fear because of being the violence. Ended up, nurses being burned. Even though ACCF has been given, but the stress of PTSD has been there. But we are not remunerated. It has been acted in ours. So, we try to negotiate.

We submit. We told the minister, you know, we would like to help. We would like to work together. We don't want to be seen as enemies. If you're going to hire a lawyer, we've got a lot, but we don't want that you are going to be taken to task because you failed to do that. And we also negotiate with them, with A/PS.

Please, can you speak to your head of executive support unit to new the implementation of the Act. That is very important in regards to the right for safety. So maybe, sir, this is some of the things that we would like to see. That maybe when we review the Constitution, all the other relevant Act that is, it needs to work well with.

The other issue that is currently we'll see that it's been in the paper. The recruitment process. We always discuss, and I'm also a member of the Fijian Nursing Council, and the permanent secretary is out here, and our chief nurse is our registrar. We've got nurses, not like before. Dr. Fatiaki will know.

When we receive our letter to be transferred, so you'll go. It's no other preferences. This is what we have noted for the past 16 years. Maybe we've aligned with the Constitution. The preferences of choosing where you need to go, and the appeal. And it's affecting the services.

Our services have not been accessed to the outer islands, in the maritime, and also with the rural. We are sending people right to Ono- i-Lau. Sometimes they refuse, because they prefer, and we put them to the other areas against which they appeal.

And that is the power within the Constitution reflected for PS in here. You know, it was, but compared for us, when you're given your letter for transfer, you go to Levuka, you go to Ono-i-Lau, Naitasiri up there, you go, you serve for three years. No more now.

When we give them, and it is very challenging for the nursing division in the ministry, but it's not finished if we can also be part of the lobby with the ministry. This is some of the issues. Maybe I need to stop if you would like to question us. My colleagues have got other sections that you would like to share too.

Mr. Rasavuka: Vinaka Sir, Taniela Rasavuka I would like to highlight more on what Madam have mentioned around section 33, 34 and 35. She was talking more about the rights to work firstly on the degree to work and adjust minimum wage. We are, from the Nursing Association, we are happy that this is highlighted and like Madam has said with the stories that we will come up with, we have been remunerated in 2023 to the right salary that most of the nurses are supposed to be sitting on according to their years of experiences. But it is still sad even though that it is mentioned in the Constitution that all workers are supposed to have this right, we can still see that section 26, maybe I'll say it applies there, discrimination maybe of sex because we are mostly majority female and comparing it to the doctors, more are male.

We came up with a submission and they went ahead with their work and they are paid with all the allowances you can name, from environmental allowance, from risk, we are working in the same environment in the hospital. But the question is why this is stated there but maybe 26 applied onto that area that we are mentioning. And also, before like Madam has said, access to transportation I hope, we hope that this section will be more loud and more visible because of what we are going through now.

We have been receiving circulars the cost cutting in transportation but we are essential services that we need nurses to be transported in and out during their shift and this is something that the Pugin Nursing Association have fought as an association for us to be provided with transportation. In light with the crisis that we are going through from FNA we hope that this is more visible for us essential services like nurses that this is continued to be done with whatever the state or the resources that the state has for them to provide that the nurses are provided with this right for them to access transportation for them to deliver the services because of our communities and our society to receive the care that they need to receive. And like Madam has mentioned as well with the housing she has enlightened the housing in Bua.

We went around to collect information before our AGM tomorrow to gather data from our members especially in the peripheries. In Nabouwalu none of the nurses in Nabouwalu are from Bua or from Labasa or from Vanualevu. They are all from Viti Levu.

They are deprived from this right for them to provide the care that the people of Bua need just because of housing. They have to go to Nabouwalu village a nearby village they have to go and ask the Turaga ni Koro if they can rent in some of the houses there. If there is any emergency there is no nurse in the compounds to be housed in the compound or for the vicinity of the hospital for them to provide the care that is needed.

I hope and we plead this morning this can be section 35 can be more visible in what we are saying for our members for them to be provided or accessed to this right. And also going back to the T3 with minimum wage as you know we have been having a meeting in our office in FNA and we have been getting calls from the police departments and the CID's asking us what our next plan what are we going to take. We have identified that the shortage of nurses is a crisis and it says in the section 33.1 the state must take reasonable measures within what is available.

We would like to put it on the floor what can the states do what resources do you have available with the crisis that we are having and the main reason that they are going to expel they are going to Oceania they are going to Pacific Health in Walu Bay or migrating to the nearby Pacific Islands now Cook Islands just because of these wages. So, we are leaving that on the floor for today for us coming this morning that if these three areas can be addressed as well. But we are so happy that this is reflected in the constitution but we are just requesting if it can be more visible in other policies or acts that is aligned to this constitution that it is documented there and noted and we are provided with these rights.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Thank you Mili. Thank you, Taniela. I will ask my fellow commissioners if there are any comments or any questions which they would like to ask.

Dr. Fatiaki: Through you, chair, Mili, Taniela, thank you very much for the presentation. I'd like to just allude to the aspect of the what you are referring to comes under our chapter 2 which is the Bill of Rights and obviously under that various aspects of it, I think we started off at about 17 to 20 in respect and I think particularly for your association and the nurses in general, the area of employment relations is the area that I guess has a lot of impact upon the profession and particularly in the context of the type of work that the nurses do.

So, I refer to section 20 which is the one to do with employment relations. Just glancing at it, we allocated each of the commissioners a separate area and we gave one of the lawyers the Bill of Rights to look at. But now that I have a look at it, and just historically, the initial employment relations Bill was actually handled by a committee of which I was a member of in 2006 in Parliament.

And so, I have a particular interest in this particular area because in that committee, obviously, most of the people who came to were employers and representatives. And the employment relations Bill was specifically tabulated in Parliament to address some of these issues. I notice that now we've incorporated it into the Constitution as a right.

My concern is, immediately after saying every person has the right to fair employment practices, including humane treatment and proper working conditions, every worker has the right to form a trade union and every employer, etc. After that they make subsection 5. They put all the exceptions to your right. I point this out because obviously in this particular instance where you got notification of this at the last minute, I think it would be a good time because we will accept submissions until probably the end of June to have a written submission. And I remember when we were discussing this area in the employment relations Bill, the initial one, I know they put another one out since.

But one of the areas that I had issues with is that they had more exceptions than they had rights. So, if I look at the constitution right now, you've got one, two, three, four rights under employment relations and about seven exceptions to those rights. I see that as almost counterproductive in the sense that if you give a person a right to bargain, then you should leave it at that.

Now, if there's a dispute about the applicability of that particular right to a particular situation, that's what the courts do. That's the job of the employment relations tribunal or the courts, the higher courts. So, what I would like from the FN Fiji Nurses Association is have a look at all the exceptions that they've put there.

And maybe, I'm not going to quote you because I'm a medical professional myself, but if I were in a position where I had four rights according to me in terms of how to bargain and all that, and then I had seven exceptions to my ability to do these things, I would have an issue with that. Because the exceptions, after a while, they keep putting you into, they say, well, it doesn't apply now because we've got national security, public safety issue, public order issue, public morality issue, public health, orderly conduct of elections, all of these things makes your right under employment relations null and void. They can make a law to exclude you from bargaining, having this right under the supreme law, which is the constitution, by virtue of these exceptions.

And we talked about this amongst the lawyers, and the question is, why don't we just give the people the right to bargain collectively and then leave it at that? I noticed that whoever wrote this constitution, wrote it, it sounds good when they say you have the right of free assembly, however, a law can be made to restrict you in these 15 situations. And I, what I'd like the Fiji Nurses Association to look at is as an association, looking after the welfare of yours. Ask yourself whether, how much of that part of the section 20 under employment relations, you might want to modify.

You might like to say, well, you should remove all of subsection 5, so there's no restrictions. And if there are disputes about the applicability of your right, then take it to court. And the courts will then decide.

The way it's written here, you might end up with no rights for employment relations. If I can fit you into one for the purposes of regulating collective bargaining processes, which means that they can tell you how to bargain. And if you don't agree to them, well, sorry, your right to bargain no longer applies.

They could regulate essential services. See, they always put medical and nursing under essential services. As soon as they put it under essential services, half, three quarters of your rights disappear, because they say it's essential.

Even if the particular instance in which they're applying this is not an emergency. You understand? I mean, there's a difference when you have an emergency and an essential service is necessary. Then, obviously, that is an appropriate one.

But if they just say essential services, they mean anything to do with nursing is considered an essential service, and if they consider a particular situation to be a national emergency, then your rights no longer apply if you're a doctor or a nurse. I'd like you to just look at those exceptions, please, and then maybe in the way of a formal submission, you might want to address those. As a medical professional, I'm looking at those.

I have serious concerns about rights that are given to people if the number of exceptions to the rights are more than the actual rights. That's one. And I guess under that, obviously, some of the issues with respect to the right to appropriate housing and that.

In a collective sense, I think we could apply it here, although I understand where you're coming from in terms of the rural postings, and I think that is more an issue that has to be addressed at the, what do you call it, at the nursing regulations and the nursing acts that the Ministry of Health will, you know, be able to address and input the necessary recommendations, but not in a, not in the context of a supreme law document that applies to all of Fiji. I think the nursing part of it in terms of housing at the rural and remote substations probably would not be appropriate to consider in the setting where we're basically asking for basic human right to a house or to a shelter. I think the supreme law, when it says it in that context, that's how it's looking at it, rather than staff housing for teachers or nurses that get posted.

So, that may not be an appropriate area for us to address it, but it can definitely be addressed under the medical regulations and the medical respective nursing acts in respect of the, and again, under your employment conditions, those things should be addressed there. Those are some initial comments I leave to my colleagues.

Mr. Beg: Thank you, Dr. John. Subject matter experts here. President and Treasurer, sorry. Thank you very much. Very enlightening presentation this morning. I have a different view. I mean, I understand I've been taking notes here.

The housing thing is a real concern, having been in this space. And I've worked on a couple of your housing projects out in the maritime areas. Yeah, I'm very speechless that it has now, where those services are not being provided, I am really a bit gob smacked and thank you for addressing that.

But I guess our job is, as what Dr. John said, is to receive comments and listen. But what's resonating really is the lack of clarity from the Constitution into the various acts that exist. So, it's sort of like we have this Constitution that's saying these are all your, what you can do and how your, you know, your basic way to operate.

But then the acts is defining a different mechanism below. And I think it's contributing the process, in my opinion, having looked at the acts very quickly on this. And, you know, the amendment to the Bill of Rights would like support for essential services, delivery in remote and maritime areas.

I'm just preempting some of the thoughts that are coming out here because these are, again, our Constitution must lay down a strong bridge to our health. And the people who work in healthcare. So, the Constitution has been all about that.

The underlying principles. So, I think we would probably like to address those issues I would have thought. I think when we go away, I've already started to draft something quite quickly because this subject has been with me for some time as well.

I've been listening to you. I understand also the point that you made about demographic location of nurses that, again, are not posted to the areas of their, can you just explain a little bit more about that? I may have lost; you're talking about nurses that are qualified but are not located to the regions that they are from. Is that what you're trying to say? So that might help alleviate some of the housing problems? Can you just sort of elaborate a little more? Thank you, sir.

Ms. Miliakere: This is in regards to the posting and transfer of our nurses, especially for the interns who just completed the internship for 18 months as registered nurses. So, when we try to post them to the new areas like before, for us, when we receive, you just receive your posting, you're going to serve in the community for three years, complete your job so that you can move to the new. Right now, no.

Before they have to be posted, they have to fill the preferences. There are three preferences. They have to choose. And majority from right now, we've got three nursing schools, and majority from Vanualevu with due respect here. And they want to go to Vanualevu. So, for us, as a nursing, we've got a national posting committee.

So, we just have to only the married one, we look into case by case, the one that they prefer. If they're married with children or if they're married with parents, but we always, with the preferences, they choose down.

So, when we did not give their preferences, they appeal that process to PS, because it's part of the Ministry of Civil Service policy.

That's where I tried to share with the location. They prefer their location. And even while we were discussing with the Honorable Minister, during that time, this is what happened.

When this new constitution came in, there is a different thing. So that's where the constitution changed the policy, recruitment guidelines and everything. And we've been challenging because when new government comes in, the constitution passed the policy because we've been in the government, I mean, I've been for 34 years.

And we've seen different government, different, the policy remains the same. So, it does not go well when we come in with the new government, come in with the changes, and this is some of the limitations. So, when we want to make them move, to go, because this is the best situation, and there is a process that allow them, this is your right, you can appeal, go up to PS, because PS is reflected in the constitution, this is, the right is there.

I mean, the authority is here.

Mr. Beg: Meanwhile, while that's going on, Madam President, the services are, either work is being delayed, and the filling out that position can linger on for a while, is that correct?

Ms. Miliakere: Yes, and the community have been deprived of the services.

Mr. Beg: So then, you know, I just looked at your stats quite quickly, in 2022 you had, what, 500 to 600 nurses leave Fiji, 2023 you had about 1,000 nurses that migrated. Wow, that's a big number. 2024, approximately 1,500 nurses, but a lot of it's in process through recruitment agencies from Australia and New Zealand. These are astonishing numbers. I'm sorry, is this, and is this because of the concerns you're raising?

Ms. Miliakere: Yes, Mr. Beg, these are the pushing factors. We're just pushing our marketing within locally. So, from 2015 to 2024, in January, it's more than 1,000. With the COVID that came up, with the triple P that came up. Even we came up with the triple P. On the other side, it was a bit disadvantaged from the Fiji Nursing Association. When the triple P came up, we were against it.

Even though it was good, there is a good and bad. But otherwise, that's where coming in. Majority of our nurses went to the Aspen.

So, when they go to the Aspen, there is another new management and there is another new recruitment strategies. They've got very good retention strategies. Like for example, when you resign, or even you went to Australia, you worked there for 20 years, you come back with a salary scale of 20 years, they're fitting in there.

When you come into the government with that experience, you start from step one again. So, when you recruit, I recruit Mr. Rasavuka to work in Aspen, I'm going to be awarded with 1,000 because I'm recruiting them. And we're going to pay 5,000, 2,500 first payment, it's called the adaptation relocation allowance.

And that is their strategies. Their retention strategies. And we always say, you know, in a joking way to the management, you are bribing. We've got the government money. So, when we have meetings, but otherwise that's the retention strategies. There is a MOU between the government, what I've been informed, 23 years we can always say, reduce their budget. But it's already been an MOU, a legal something. Those are some of the things that is pushing. Right now, it's going down, but it's still going.

Mr. Beg: So, I hear you, Madam President. So, I'm trying to, with my colleagues, I'm trying to work out, because we're addressing the Constitution, how this could better improve that. I think, I also hear there's a lot of operational matters that you raise, but because it's all somehow comes back to the acts, and, you know, for instance, the nurses are raising concern about transportation, they can say, well, as you quite rightly said, Dr. John, well, that's fine.

It's an essential service so that your waiver, your rights are gone, you have to do that. So, I understand it. I would like to hear more from the rest of the panel.

I'm not a subject matter expert here, but I work in the field of architecture, and we've worked in medical facilities. We did the Taveuni community project that was kind of successful many years ago, but I don't know what's happening now, but I hear you rather clearly that our medical team nurses that work in the field, especially to remote areas, are concerned, but thank you very much. Sorry, I yield back to the chair.

Mr. Valenitabua: Madam President and gentlemen, the rights, you have mentioned sections 17 to 20 of the constitution, and sections 33 to 35, including section 26. Now, Dr. Fatiaki has commented on the fact that you have section 20, for example, your rights, and then limitations. The government can just enact legislation to limit whatever is there, or they may have powers already, the police powers, the military powers, and whatever powers there are.

Are you public officers? No? Are you public servants?

Ms. Miliakere: Yes.

Mr. Valenitabua: All right, the public service is there. They might have their own regulations, and so on. These are the limiting aspects.

Mr. Beg has said that we are looking at the constitution here. Is there anything you have found which might cover the nursing association in this situation where it says employment relations, section 20, you have these rights in sub sections 1, 2, 3, and 4, and you have a limitation, or you have limitations in sub section 5, A to J, or A to F. Look at F. A law may be passed for the purpose of regulating essential services and industries.

Mr. Beg: Chair, can I reference 38 to that section as well?

Mr. Valenitabua: Section 38, also section 38. This is where the limitations are. They are limiting your rights so that they can have essential services and industries done, and to continue. Do you have or have you thought of a provision or do you want a provision which would say, okay, we've got this right, you want to limit our essential services or limit our industrial action for essential services and industries? What about us? Can we have a right which also considers that our essential services are under threat? The case in Ono-I-lau, was it? The nurses were attacked.

In that situation, how are you covered? Have you thought about that? You're coming to us in relation to the constitutional provisions. The government is protecting itself. We have our rights.

We limit your rights. What about you? How are you protected by the government when you are performing essential services? Do you see the reverse of that? Has there been any discussion within your association?

Ms. Miliakere: Yes, sir. Currently, now, we have prepared a collective agreement. And this afternoon at 2.30, we're going to confirm when we're going to sign with the minister of health. And part of the collective agreement is the environmental allowance. So that it's to cover all the risk for nurses working either in maritime, in the hospital, or even in the... That is one of the strategies that we came up with.

Because it's... We are not covered with any risk. The only risk that has been enacted is the mental health risk. And it's only when you have injury, when it's been assessed with a report from... As part of the ACCF, that's where you can... Otherwise, what is happening like what you have mentioned, even in coral, it's happening every year.

Even right now in Koro, one in maybe QVS, they've been threatened to the nurses. They're not... So, it's part of our strategic priorities is to look at that they need to be covered with the risk. And that's where the environmental allowance has to come in.

Maybe, sir, that's where we are coming in right now. I agree with you, sir, that's where I mentioned in the previous constitution, in our previous ERA, I mean, in the Act, when we... There was changes like what I mentioned. It's two weeks.

There was more with the limitation. It was less for our trade union. So, when we look at the from A to F subsection 5, they provided this one, they give you the freedom, and they limit you again.

So, we are being threatened. And that's where you'll see that members are saying, never mind about the limitation. We are exposing our threat because it's not been happening government, that's what I for how many weeks.

And even right now, the nurses, I said, we don't care whether we go to prison or whether we go to be locked up somewhere because we are threatened. And that's where we'll see because it's been happening during that time. And now we're coming up with the changes.

Different government, that's what I mean, because we've been in the, I mean, 34 years, we knew what is happening, and this is happening. So our members right now, tomorrow is our AGM. And it's from 2023. So, for me, because I try my best to see, okay, we look at it in the big picture, we continue to negotiate. There is a limitation there. We have to follow the law.

So, when members are saying tomorrow, we had enough is enough, we go out, we will be taken myself, this one, the council, we will be locked, we are willing. Whether we go to prison, we go there. So, we are prepared.

We told our family, you prepare. If you want to walk out, if our members, 1,600 or 2,000, say we want to go out, because the restriction is here, we'll go out. So, we told our family members, prepare yourself, we are going to be locked. That's our because of the limitation. We are willing because we've been suffering, sir. Please.

Mr. Rasavuka: May I speak on section 38, sir? On section 38, right throughout and then in subsection, number two, it says a person must not deny the emergency medical treatment. In this section, we sometimes input nurses at the crossroad where religion come in. It says here that, you we need to deliver the service and it does not say somewhere here where do we stand when religion come in when we are limited with our care but we have our oath we have to provide the care and so a question where in here where it can highlight that area that I'm mentioning that at times we can be we can face disciplinary and we can go to court of law and we are breaching our code of conduct which nursing council can take out or deregister on us for not providing the care because religion come in and we don't achieve number two in and we are limited limitation for providing back here in that area.

Dr. Fatiaki: Thank you Taniela again I reiterate what I've just said because now that I've had the chance to keep looking at a few more provisions of the rights. Your ability is to make a submission to tell us for instance that all the exceptions to your rights can be removed you should you know what I'm saying you see. I'll give an example and a lot of this boils down to good faith unfortunately if there's not good faith in the person who's drafting this Constitution, he will say you have the right to like collective bargaining or reasonable accommodation and then he says however, law can be made enacted to restrict your right in the interest of and then he goes national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health.

Once he says public health what he's saying is he doesn't need to observe the right for instance of giving you choices. He doesn't need to do that anymore you know like collective bargaining he can just say this is it three years go to Ono I Lau and he doesn't need to because he's made he said this is for public health.

The point I'm making is what you need to do in a bit more detail is to go through these rights ask yourself how does this apply particularly in respect of employment relation freedom for sanitation and the Bill of Rights to Health and ask yourself that look at that aspect about denied emergency medical treatment .There's another one to right to your choice of religion and ask yourself how in a nursing context that a nurse's right to her religious beliefs may impact upon her ability to do this and if that is not a good idea then you will ask us to remove that to delete that as an example. Remove a person must not be denied emergency medical treatment take it out so that you're not put into a position where that is used against you even though your religious belief may conflict with it. You understand.

So, I the thing that worries me in reading this as a doctor for instance who worked in the hospital is if I give you the right to collective bargaining you know and collective bargains the kind of thing you say well look when you post us we want give us three options that's your bargaining and that should be observed as a right but, as soon as you have the exceptions then then then you're right under the Constitution gets taken away.

My concern is I mean obviously there are some instances of exceptions every time I've looked over here freedom of association every person has the right to freedom of association that's it that's the right. We should say nothing else go to the next right no after that this is not good faith after that I've got number one two three four five six seven cases where now after I said to you have the right to freedom of association except in these instances. Once I take the first one in the interest of national security public safety public order public morality public health that's everything in the in Fiji can take away your freedom of association under this section.

So, if I were helping as a lawyer giving you advice, I would say oh can you remove this entire part here so every person has the right to freedom of association that's it go to the next one every person has the right to fair employment practices including humane treatment and proper working conditions. This is like you know housing and things like that every worker has the right to form or join the trade union okay that's fine every employer has the right to form an employer's association and to participate in that's fine trade unions and employers have the right to bargain collectively where you're bargaining on their behalf that's your right.

Those are the rights that should be there under employment relations you have four after that then they make this exception now a law may limit or authorize the limitation of all those rights just mentioned which are the things that allow you to bargain and then they less these seven things. If your recommendation was to us to remove section part five subsection five so there is not a restriction then they will have to then keep working by the law meaning the Constitution.

If they decided to do something that was outside that if they were to just give you a letter that says you and you say well you're not observing our collective bargaining you're not observing our right under this section if you dispute it go to court and most likely the court will find in your favor.

It's this to me this is bad faith you know by putting all these restrictions so I ask you to look at the relevant chapters yeah Taniela brought up an interesting issue with real sorry it's Taniela yeah brought up an interesting issue about okay we like the idea that everybody has the right to emergency care but if emergency care conflicts with your right to your religion or your you know your belief then, then then maybe we should remove that right away and that may be something that your membership you know talk about and look at the areas in respect .

I mean I know that they're going to be right for instance the freedom of religion they've had arguments you know Jehovah's Witness don't allow someone to get transfusion. The danger with these rights is they can remove your ability to decide whether your child gets a transfusion under the rights of the child or the rights to access of medical treatment. Then the doctors the boss not the person and if the person has a religious belief that they do not want to get a transfusion, then then you know this is the kind of situation that may arise when you brought up.

Taniela the issue of having to provide emergency treatment but that may conflict with a person's religious beliefs. I would like you like I said go there my words of guidance would be along the lines of when someone gives you a right and then they say but you say everything after but can you erase just give me the right, and then I'll take that and I will use it responsibly. If I don't use it responsibly then the employer can take us to court and the court will arbitrate but if they write it in here every time you try and do the same they say the Constitution says we can do this the Constitution says we can do that we can tell you go there because it's in public health and that's it.

Therefore, they've taken away your right under employment relations employment relations should be a two-way thing the figures that my colleague Conway has pointed out any person in their right mind I'm not going to talk about the Minister of the Ministry should be banging their head against the concrete because, if you can't understand why people are leaving in those kind of numbers then you have no appreciation for what these people are doing. I can tell you the same poor factors are there from 20, 30, 40 years ago the same poor factors New Zealand pays better Australia pays better but, we never lost that amount it's now looks like the push factors are the major reason that when nurses are not valued.

They don't feel that people appreciate the work that they do then it's the push away that should concern me and those figures are very concerning. I mean that to me that's a national emergency and that's a national crisis but they will have another workshop to discuss it and another parliamentary committee to look at it and unfortunately, they end up not addressing the fundamental issues but thank you very much. It's heartening to see you guys here and representing the nurses and I really appreciate it.

Mr. Valenitabua: Madam President, and the gentleman treasurer my question to you was you've got these essential services which can limit your right and that is in protection of the government and its people it does not consider you as nurses now if do you have copies of the Constitution all right just have a look at it have a look at section 38. Have a look at section 38, when I asked that question, I was putting it to you to go and think about it now little did I know that Mr. Beg had done something which I will I will show you now.

Section 38 deals with the right to health so the state must take reasonable measures within its resources to achieve progressive realization of every person's right to health. And then subsection 2 a person must not be denied emergency medical that is understood in applying in section 3 any right in applying any right under this section if the state claims that it does not have the resources to implement it is the responsibility of the state. To show that the resources are not available giving excuses excuses; excuses. We can't have ex-ray in ono-i- Lau because there's no x-ray machine there there's a breakdown in the extreme machine in Lakeba there's we can't deal with it now.

In relation to you in addition to section 38 there's a suggestion here you have your meeting tomorrow you have your meeting tomorrow we're going to give you a copy of these so that you can discuss section 38.

Include a section 38 [a] it's not there it's here in my screen. I'm just going to read out and we'll give you a copy section 38 support for essential service delivery in remote and maritime areas this is to be a new section. right, this is a suggestion under section 38 and 1 section 38 a is done in various constitutions. This can be done in the year to support for essential service delivery in remote and maritime areas subsection 1 would say the state shall take reasonable legislative and administrative measures to ensure that public officers which includes nurses providing essential services in remote rural and maritime areas are supported by adequate housing sanitation and living conditions necessary for the effective delivery of those services. So, it's precise to the essential services they give you the right they limit it and we add this and maybe do away with the limitation.

I'm not saying that we were not that we are going to do it but we'll discuss it so, we add that one. And then subsection 2 says in fulfilling this obligation the state shall have regard to geographical isolation and logistical constraints continuity and quality of essential services and equitable access of all communities and maybe security of this we can add that. If you want that included in the Constitution so like Dr. Fatiaki just said you can go back have a written submission include this. Mr. Beg is going to give you a copy so that you can discuss with your members tomorrow.

I can assure you that most of the panelists will look very favorably on any requests that come from the medical profession. The nursing profession thank you.

Ms. Miliakere: Sir, because what happened when we look at the other healthcare workers the allied and this seems to be relying on us to be there even the last three weeks even, we've got managers they're just asking me what is happening with our overtime I said to you.

Do I look like a money lady or the finance people because they see that we seem to be very vocal in regards to the right so like what is in the Constitution what is in the ERA so, with our presentation today we sharing and from the response we were very happy. Thank you Dr. Fatiaki ,you know we were proud because there is a medical person that is here even myself when I look into the committee the first time with the because, I always the Constitution and the act so when we work in our mental health we always this is a always share with them this is the Bible but what happened compared with the previous one this is some limitation a lot of it's even with association because, when I start from stillness as I was the strong member of the FNA so I'm 37 years with the FNA.

So, when we try to look into this one and I said it's for me as a public it's a direct of nursing also at the same time with with I try to you know have that complimenting each other looking at because of the limitation in here. And what happened like what you mentioned because it's been given taken away again that's were coming up we said it's okay the limitation is there it's against the national security we are willing to go because who's going to be suffer it's the the nurses plus the public is going to suffer because of this limitation.

That is so thank you so for maybe it's a it's God time we always you know we believe in God's time we said we shared with him the eve of the the eve of the AGM surprise will be coming I was the last two days when the office secretary sent me the invitation I said, we don't have to miss this one and today what so what it's supposed to I said it's 12, they said no 10 we supposed to have another one but he was not coming because the 12 o'clock so, he was there I said we were sharing we went to run about after 1 no 4 o'clock 4 o'clock this morning.

We were discussing the Constitution from 1 o'clock until 4 and then we were arguing with this one so thank you we are going to go back we're going to sit, and even this afternoon, for the submission on the relevant section. We're requesting sir for that what additional in 38 a maybe from Mr. Beg to give us a limitation. So, we're going to be part of our other matters in our agenda in our AGM.

Dr. Fatiaki: Just a final comment and this really doesn't really specifically to your submission but I heard you mention that amongst the nursing association you had a very much a sense of God time and God let me assure you as the person who reviewed the first three chapters of this Constitution this new Constitution has no comment about God in the preamble in everything compared to the other three constitutions every other Constitution acknowledged God in it except for this one.

It's removed God completely from it supposedly in the interests of the so-called secular state I mentioned this only because other submittees as recent as yesterday have brought this to our attention. Now I know you didn't bring that as a amendment to the Constitution but I noticed that you started your conversation by alluding to a God moment and, I appreciate that very much because the nature of our profession is if you're not walking with the guidance of God then you aren't practicing the profession properly.

I thank you for that I want to assure you that other people have brought up to us the fact that this Constitution need to be couched or to be directed or to be guided by a God or a belief in God and I think, you alluded that to that you talked about a God moment and I think I can assure you that other people have brought it and it will be under consideration in our review. Thank you.

Ms. Miliakere: Just so can I respond to that one, it's been coming but the secular state I want to share with the secular state I'm not a very religious person but they all my nurses' members majority they knew I don't go to church but I will be a virtual from centenary my husband is a strong church somewhere like a pastor but I always believe that there is a living God.

What is so one of the things that it's really because of we are diverse circular state is one of the thing that I did not want to bring it up in the association so that because of maybe I say that I'm more racist or more Christian, but I'm not a church goer but I believe. The secular state, I'm always coming up if we cannot really look at the secular state this is my individual ascent but I don't want to push if we can something be reflected in there something in the Constitution at least one day maybe what you call is Easter. We can recognize as business to be stopped so that we acknowledge it this is a Fiji and it's been see that we believe in in God in here. We respect diversity but we need to show out that we were a lot of social issues we both from the mental health.

The national crisis right now is mental health and runs with HIV and it has to come back into the community come back to the family to the individual when you have one God, you believe you don't go to church every day or every Sunday but you believe, and then you share that this is the living this is going to work together with a medication with whatever changes that comes in but it has something has to be changed in the secular state. If so that to show the solution for the social determinants of health right now is a national crisis it has to come back with where God.

This is this is a not to say that the Christian countries but at least respects on Easter, just for one day not to say that all business to stop on Sunday but at least respect one Easter. When you look at I always in Easter at the Rup's I don't know whether Rup's are Christian or what this is one of the things that I've noted that every holiday Rup's will close during Easter. That's in Nakasi and I said that they are Christian or what is who's the owner of this company.

I went to Tonga last year in Tonga that's why I always said my Tonga the royal here they are here my distress when I when I'm stressed out I go to the royal family see the way that they dress you look at the thing and the way. In Tonga on Sunday there is no business everything closed it's only going to church and the taxi if you want to run on Sunday you have to remove the taxi sign, and Sunday is a day for church. That's all that's where coming that's from me.

I know, I always share with them they knew that I'm not a 'Tabutabulotu' and anything. Sir, just for information we invited, every AGM we've got a 'talatala ' to come and do the blessing so, tomorrow it's going to be the Qaselevu ni Lotu Wesele' start with the blessing and our Honorable Assistant Minister is going to be our chief guest. And he's not aware that we are going to do the Fijian protocol the; Matanigasau'. Matanigasau because coming back the respect.

You as an iTaukei leading an association is a iTaukei led by a iTaukei and majority a iTaukei and we are Christian. I said our theme is our nurses our futures empower nurses save lives; how can we save lives of other people when we are not having a forgive ourself because we've been hurting our Assistant Honorable Minister with words. That's we're coming back and I try to relate where God comes in is very important with the social issues that is coming up now majority, we iTaukei. We always have that sympathy in St. Giles we iTaukei where can we fit in God where maybe in the circular state at least respect one day in a year maybe for Easter all shops business to be close and to indicate. Yes, we believe in one God, that is me thank you Dr. Fatiaki again I think you sir.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. The suggestion from us through Mr. Beg has been sent to Mr. Fatiaki to print out. We'll release it to you it's a way of resolving the issue which I raised and for essential services nurses in particular there are too many attacks on nurses, how will you be covered so this is one area which you can talk about. Do you have a lawyer?

Ms. Miliakere: Yes, sir we don't have any MOU but we seem to be like it's just a situational it's a lawyer a lawyer on the SPA the special sales purchase agreement but we're trying to assess yeah that is our legal.

Mr. Valenitabua: That's fine. Take this discuss it with the between your executives and maybe you can add it into the submission that you will send us later. Thank you very much. Do we have something else?

Ms. Miliakere. No. Thank you. Can we get a copy of the submission from Mr. Beg.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yes, after this we can wait for Mr. Fatiaki to give you a copy there are two sections section 38 at the section 38A and 131 section 131A for public service. It's not going to be good for you for all essential service so the nurses are going to be the nurses are going to be taking the lead. We will discuss it later it might come up in the Constitution someone might have a different idea but at least you bring it up in your submission. Go and read what's been said to you okay. Thank you.

----------End of Session [17-04-2026] ----------

FIJI NURSING ASSOCIATION

"Caring is our Concern"

PRESIDENT: Miliakere Nasorovakawalu (Mrs)
GENERAL SECRETARY: Filomena Talawadua (Mrs)
REF: GN100

FROM : FIJI NURSING ASSOCIATION

TO : CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW COMMISSION

DATE : 28.04.2026

SUBJECT : SUBMISSONS ON PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF FIJI

The Fiji Nursing Association ("Association") has identified some clauses from the 2013 Fiji Constitution, which we believe as an Association needs to be reviewed and appropriately addressed through this esteemed Commission. The following are the collective submissions of the Association.

A. EMPLOYMENT RELATIONS

1. Firstly, in terms of employment relations, we believe that the current wordings of Section 20 have gaps that leave employees (especially Essential Service providers) vulnerable to having their rights being stifled or even unnecessarily limited. Section 20 subsection (5) enables the limitation of employment relation rights, which we believe has been used to stifle past attempts of our Association in negotiations for our members.

2. We recommend that Section 20 (5) of the Constitution be reviewed and amended to either remove the limitations enabling words/provisions or include a provision that limits the limitations that may be prescribed under Section 20. Our specific focus for the amendments is on paragraphs (a), (c) and (e) to enable individuals such as an essential worker or a public officer to freely be part of a Trade Union and participate in bargaining processes. The amendment should also enable bargaining and negotiation processes to follow an expedited or reasonable timeline.

B. BILL OF RIGHTS (RIGHT TO HEALTH) AMENDMENTS (REVISED)

2. Secondly, we also note that Section 38 of the Constitution is not equally applied to Essential Service providers especially members of our Association or persons working in our profession. We have experienced so many hurdles with trying to get support and protection for members of our Association that are providing essential services in rural, remote and maritime areas.

3. We recommend that Section 38 (the provision for right to health) be reviewed and amended to provide much needed support and protection for Essential Service providers in Remote and Maritime Areas. We request the Commission to consider our recommendations, and we put forward a few suggestions for its consideration:

(a). That amendments to Section 38 include a provision that ensures the State/Government shall provide reasonable legislative and administrative measures to ensure that public officers providing essential services in remote, rural and maritime areas are supported with adequate safe, and secure housing, sanitation, and living conditions, necessary for the effective delivery of those services.

(b). That the amendments incorporate provisions that the measures referred to in (a) above shall ensure that such officers are not placed at a systemic disadvantage by reason of their deployment, and are afforded conditions that uphold their dignity, safety, and personal security.

(c) . That the amendments provide provisions which ensures that the State In fulfills its obligation, and shall have regard to -:

a). geographical isolation and logistical constraints;

b). risks to personal safety and wellbeing associated with postings to rural, remote and maritime areas;

c). the need to ensure service continuity and quality of essential services; and d). equitable access to services for all communities.

C. CHAPTER 6 – STATE SERVICES (REVISED)

4. The Association believes that it would be proper to also include an additional provision in Chapter 6 of the Constitution which provides specific requirements for the Conditions, Safety and Security of Public Officers in Rural, Remote and Maritime Deployment. This provision would be in addition to the Rights prescribed in Section 38.

5. This additional provision will provide that the State shall ensure that members of the Public service and essential service providers deployed to remote, rural, and maritime areas are provided with adequate, safe, and secure housing, infrastructure, and living conditions, necessary for the proper performance of their functions.

7. The conditions referred to in paragraph 6 above shall-:

a). meet minimum standards to be prescribed by written law;

b). reflect the operational demands and environmental conditions of such postings;

c). address risks to personal safety, security, and well-being, and d). not be reduced below a level that would materially impair service delivery or place officers at undue hardship or disadvantage.

8. We recommend that a provision be included that ensures Parliament shall provide for a budget that caters for such deployed public officers and provide for the following:

a). Minimum accommodation and facility standards

b). hardship, isolation, and security–related allowance;

c). systems for maintenance, safety compliance, and rapid response to risk;

d). transparent and equitable allocation of housing and support services.

9. We also recommend that the amendment provisions include that the State shall take reasonable steps to ensure that no public officer deployed under this section is exposed unsafe or insecure living conditions arising from neglect, under–resourcing, or administrative failure.

10. We further recommend that compliance with this section shall be subject to independent oversight as prescribed by law.

11. We request these esteemed Commission to hear our plea for improved support for essential service providers such as nurses and pray that our recommendations are also given due consideration.

Miliakere Nasaorovakawalu (Mrs.)
President
Fiji Nursing Association

Jon Apted

Mr. Jon Apted

Date: 29-6-2026

Leighton: Thank you, Commission. It is my great pleasure to welcome you this afternoon. Thank you very much for accepting the invitation of the Commission to make submissions. Just before we start, I just have a few housekeeping matters. With regards to the mic in front of you, just on the right panel, if you press it, it will come on, and then you can speak, and then press the same panel to turn it off. I will briefly introduce the members of the Commission, before handing over to the Chair to speak to the work that the Commission will be undertaking.

To the far right, we have Mr. Conway Beg, a well-known architect, and also a rugby player and administrator with FRU. Seated next to him is Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau, a development and communication specialist, as well as a former Miss Hibiscus and Miss South Pacific. Seated next to her is Dr. John Charles Fatiaki, a former Senator, current Special Administrator in Suva, and has his own medical practice. Seated next to him is the Chair of the Commission, Mr. Sevuloni Valenitabua. He is a prominent defense lawyer, as well as a future Human Rights Commission member previously, and is well known in Fiji and throughout the region. I think Mr. Kohli will be joining us momentarily. He is also part of the Commission. I know you will be familiar with Mr. Kohli from Labasa Kohli N. Singh. Seated to the far end is Dr. Neelesh Gounder, a well-known economist in Fiji and a University Lecturer with the University of the South Pacific. With that, I will now hand over to the Chair.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr Apted Good afternoon, and welcome to the Constitution Review Commission. We thank you very much for accepting the invitation to come before us this afternoon. We were blessed today. In the morning, we had Mr. Wiley Clark from the Fiji Law Society. Then after that we had Mr. Graham Leung. And then this afternoon we have you. And we have such an honors task. And to be getting submissions from you and the two other lawyers which we had listened to this morning is really appreciated, particularly when you use your time, which you could have been using in your office doing other matters, to appear before us. The Constitution is as you see it now, except for Mr. Kohli. There were six of us initially, seven of us initially. One later resigned due to work commitments with FNU, so the six of us were left.

The six had been around Fiji. Lau Group, Lomaiviti Group, Yasawa, Kadavu, Beqa, you name it, even in Vanualevu and around Viti levu. And what we had been doing was that we were gathering submissions from the people of our country on what their views are, what their recommendations are, on matters or laws, matters which could be included as laws in the amended Constitution for Fiji.

Our task is to review the 2013 Constitution. The review means that we can amend it. So, we had been given this task to remove laws if they need removing, add additional laws if they need additions to be added, and also amend the provisions inside the Constitution itself to just change the meaning.

Those are the tasks that we have been given by His Excellency. So as a follow-on from our trips around Viti Levu, we have now started here today at Level 9 Suvavou House to receive submissions from associations, ministries, and individuals like yourself in relation to what your thoughts are in your submissions in relation to the 2013 Constitution amendment. We have been asked to throw the Constitution away completely. However, that is not our purpose. We do not have the authority or the power to do that. We only review and amend.

So with you present this afternoon, we are looking forward to submissions from you which will assist us in our deliberations when we come to deliberate on the suggestions that we have received regarding the 2013 Constitution. With those few words, I again welcome you and now open the floor and give us your submissions this afternoon.

Jon Apted: Thank you, Mr. Chair for that welcome. First, if I could just say that I've been brought here under false pretenses. I was accosted in the supermarket by Leighton in April, and I was asked if I was intending to give a submission. I sort of indicated I wasn't, and he told me that the Commission was interested in talking to me. So, I've come here to talk. I have not come here to make a submission proper. And as I explained to you before the session began, I had asked a team member in my office to cancel my appointment today and defer it to another time this week, and it wasn't until this morning when I checked on the alternative time that I was told that they had overlooked to seek an alternative time.

So, I come to you, as I do normally, with absolutely nothing prepared. So I will speak from the heart, and I'm quite happy to answer any questions that you have or to have a conversation. And what I am offering today is, and this is part of the reason that I ask for no press, it's because I'm not prepared and because I want to come to you from a personal space.

I think that I'm different from many other people who have appeared before you because of my experience in the area in which you are working. I'm not sure whether you are all aware of how much background I have in this area, but I was a legal officer in the AG's chambers in 1987 when Sitiveni Rabuka took over. I was the one from the AG's office who was sent to do that kind of work with the Falvey Commission, Falvey Report, and I traveled with them.

I was also, because at the time of the coup, all drafting work was done by expatriates under British supplementation and Australian supplementation, and they were pulled after the coup, so I had to, as a junior officer who was the only one in the office who left, who was not a court lawyer and whose first language was English, to do drafting. So, I drafted alone for two years. As a result of that, I also did the work with Cabinet on Constitutional Review and that kind of thing, so I was with the Falvey Commission, I was with Saturn Cabinet when they did the draft 1990, I was initially with the Manueli Commission before I went to the US and then Pate took over and finished the Constitution, and then I came back and was supervisor of elections, so I was directly involved in the implementation of the 1990, and I have experience in electoral administration.

I did the two elections, 1992 and 1994, and then I went back, and then I was called back to be Constitutional Review with Sir Paul Reeves and Company. So, I've been involved in these exercises three times. So, the point of that all is that I always think of myself as still a teenager, but obviously I'm not, and I have a personal experience and perspective on what has happened from 1986 until today, because I worked in the AG's office under the 70 Constitution, I was there for the 87 events, I was there for 1990, on and on and on.

So that's what I want to draw on as I talk to you today. The first thing that I would share is that, and this comes from both my experience with review bodies and my personal experience in last year with the Supreme Court reference that led to your appointment. I caution you about how you understand and deal with submissions from the public. There is a tendency, not just in the constitutional area, but in any law reform area, for people to come to the review body with their idea of change. They very rarely articulate the problem that they perceive. And with all due respect to them, often their solution is not the solution to the problem.

Because they know from their experience what feels bad. But they don't know necessarily how the system works and how the rules interact and what else is at stake. So, they will come to you with the demanding solutions, but the difficult job that you have to do is to work out what they're really complaining about and what really makes them unhappy and whether their proposal actually will achieve that outcome or won't.

And oftentimes if you stand back and look at it that way, what they suggest won't work. Because they don't actually understand what the problem is. And it's just like how people in Fiji deal with medical problems. They have a symptom, there's a knee-jerk reaction to it, like have a massage or whatever, but they don't know what the underlying cause of their problem is. And sometimes their solutions tend to be fatal. And I'll give you an example from last year.

In the Supreme Court reference, a number of indigenous-based political parties were advocating for the return and the restoration of the 1997 Constitution. And I do not doubt that they genuinely believe that. But none of the people, and I put it to them in the court, I put it to their counsel in the court, none of the people who were representing them in court actually had thought about what was in the 1997 Constitution.

Or even knew about what the experience of the country was under the 1997 Constitution. I could be completely wrong, but my perspective was that this golden view of 1997 was driven by anger and hurt at the way it was taken away. And then how the 16 years after that, you know, they'd been marginalized.

And a lot of the anger, which was, you know, only became articulated in the last couple of years, was centered around Boselevu Vakaturaga. So, there was this anger that the Great Council of Chiefs had been removed. So therefore, the old one that recognized it was all good.

When I pointed out to counsel for the other indigenous Fijian parties, not on the record, but in conversation in court, I said, do you know what the 2000 coup was about? Do you know why George Speight took over? Do you know why all of those people congregated in Parliament for three months or whatever they were doing and were so crazy? Do you understand why there was so much looting and burning and stealing? It was because of the 1997 Constitution. The indigenous people didn't like the result that the 1997 Constitution had resulted in, the political outcome because of the numbers. That was the reason the AG's office itself took action to try after the coup to, you know, when the question was about whether the Constitution had been abrogated or whatever, the position taken by AG's office was it had to go because the indigenous people didn't like it.

So be very careful about what you hear now, because a lot of the people who are advocating for its restoration have no sense of history and no experience. They're young. They have no experience of what went on. And I was, how do I put it? I was very, very close to the recommendations that led to that voting system. Right. We went around the world. We spoke to experts. The commissioners were convinced that it was going to work. I was not. But that's fine. I'm not the commissioner. But their belief and their experiment didn't pan out.

Okay, and it didn't do what the players and that's the other lesson when you're idealistic about how a system is going to work. You can't rely on the players. The political parties, the politicians to behave as you expect them to be, because life is unpredictable. What I also pointed out to counsel privately at court was that I asked them if they realized that the underlying. I asked them if they knew what the seat makeup was under the 1997 constitution. None of them knew it, but they were advocating for its return.

I asked them if they knew what the allocation was based on and how true or how current those assumptions were today, because the seat allocation between the ethnic communities in the 1997 constitution was based on the population in 1995 or 1996. And the expectations and the assumptions about population have not been realized. They've been contradicted because our population now is completely the proportions are different to what the allocation was then.

And the assumptions that underlay that, which also have not continued to be true, is the assumptions was also that Indo-Fijians or Indians, whatever you want to call the group, would be the only ones to be immigrating. And Indigenous Fijians would eventually become the majority through the external immigration of non-Indigenous. But if you actually look at the numbers since COVID, this seems to be as many Indigenous Fijians immigrating as non-Indigenous.

So, the point I'm trying to make there is be very careful about the assumptions that you make about not just what the people's submissions mean, but also about the underlying assumptions as to the state of affairs, because life is really unpredictable. In 1994-95, nobody would have dreamed that Indigenous Fijians would be fleeing to Australia and New Zealand in great numbers. Everybody assumed that they would be the ones here and all the rest of us would be going. But that's not true. I mean, the rest of us are going, but so are Indigenous Fijians. The other thing is to look at the assumptions about the aging of the population.

We don't know, with the external migration and with HIV, what the shape of the population will be in five years, in terms of the age breakdown, the ethnic breakdown and all of that. So, one needs to be very, very careful about that. What else can I say? You also mean, I don't know whether this is a practical point, but if you have your, there's two sides to it.

There is what you in your hearts, having heard the people and bringing your own life experience, think the ideal is going to be. But there is also the practical question of, given the majorities that are needed to bring about change, what can you recommend that is likely to get the two-thirds majority in the House and the 50% at a referendum? Because otherwise, your work is not going to go anywhere. As a practical matter.

I don't know what the mechanism is going to be for the referendum, and I'm not an expert at referendums, but I would expect that it's far easier to get a yes vote in a referendum on an issue than it is on a package. So, if you are confronted in a referendum of yes or no to X, you can easily say yes or no. But if you are confronted with a package of 20, 30, 40 proposals to which you must give one yes or no, it's always easier to say no.

Because uncertainty will cause you to be conservative. And if, of the bundle of 20, 30, or 40, you don't like one, you're more likely to say no because of that one, even if you are okay with the other 19. I mean, that's my perspective, which I just suggest to you, just for your consideration.

So that's some general issues. If I can go to the Constitution itself, just very quickly, and I will do what I said you shouldn't listen to. I think it's important that the preamble and the opening, the fluffy stuff, focus on nation building.

As it does now, but some fine-tuning of the words because there's all of that, and it should recognize the special place of the indigenous people, and those kinds of things. Citizenship, the Constitution, at the moment, historically, the 1970 Constitution and the 1990 Constitution, I can't remember about the 1997, was a bit more prescriptive about citizenship. It said who was entitled to citizenship in the Constitution itself.

The 2013 Constitution doesn't. It leaves it to law. It gives you the three categories, but how people qualify for those categories, whether it's registration, birth, naturalization, is left entirely to legislation.

So, at the moment, there are no guarantees in the Constitution about who has a right to be part of this state. So that's one thing I recommend you look at, whether you need to have some assurance of some category of people. The Constitution in terms of citizenship now, and related to this is the question of the rights of former Fijians to resume citizenship, whether that should be a constitutional issue or a statutory issue.

There is a very vexed question of whether iTaukei people, indigenous people, have a special right to citizenship, even if they've adopted foreign citizenship, and if you're going to embrace that idea. There's all the difficult questions about equality and all of that. The next question is, how many generations should this right exist? Because there's this idea that if you're in the volanikawabula, you should automatically have a right to be a citizen of the nation state of Fiji.

It doesn't quite equate, because we've got second generation now, third generation. Soon we'll have fourth generation indigenous people living in Australia or Canada or the UK, who are maybe even pure indigenous or half indigenous or quarter indigenous. Should they have a constitutional right to citizenship? These are questions that have been raised.

I'm not raising them myself. I'm aware that these are difficult national questions, so there's that. The other thing I'll go to is... Sorry, how much time have I got, by the way? Until what time? So I'll have to cut my coat according to my... Oh, I've got only half an hour left. Let me just go through very quickly. Secular state, that's a very, very strong provision of the 2013 constitution and very controversial. I personally am in favor of a constitutional guarantee of a secular state.

I am a Christian myself, but I'm aware from history that the most bitter wars in European history, even in Rotuman history, have been fought over which is the correct Christian religion. And I'm old enough to remember how Methodism took over the state in 1987, and we had the Sunday observance decree as a result, and how oppressive that was for other communities, including Catholics like myself, because in our denomination, you're free to do anything on a Sunday. You just go to church, and then you're free to do whatever, and then suddenly we were all required to live like Methodists, and it was not very nice.

But anyway, that's my experience. I think that secularism is important because life changes, and there's more than one truth even within the Christian faith. I don't have a problem with the preamble or earlier declaratory provisions of the constitution recognizing the special role of Christianity in bringing order to the country.

I won't say civilization, that's kind of patronizing, but that kind of idea. The constitution, another provision that is about which language it should be in, at the moment English is predominant. I think it has to stay that way, because we can't have competing texts, and when you deal with language, when things are translated, the translations are never the same.

Currently the interpretation provision provides that interpretation and application of the Human Rights Commission. The court can take into account international law on the right. I think that's important that that stays, because we need to be consistent with other countries in terms of international law, especially in new areas.

A particularly good example is how one deals with COVID, how one dealt with COVID, because we had no precedence for that kind of situation, and that was a situation in which everywhere in the world was confronted by the same thing. The human rights provisions, I think that they are important and need to remain, but there are big flaws within the current one. If I can be frank, because the traditional civil and political rights, which are the things like freedom of speech, assembly, voting and all of that, were being restricted, the architects of the 2013 constitution, in order to do the sell about what a great human rights constitution it was, bumped up the economic and social rights.

So, we have all of these almost meaningless economic and social rights in the constitution, which are not really enforceable, they're just sort of declaratory. So, a lot of it is fluff. You go back to the important civil and political rights, the limitation provision is defective.

There are two models of how constitutions provide for human rights. Our 1966 constitution, our 1970 constitution, 1990 constitution and 1997 constitution followed the British post-independence model, where there was a statement of the right, limitations were permitted for specific purposes, with an overriding rider that the limitation had to be reasonable and justifiable in a democratic society. So, for example, any particular right, you could only limit it by a law, if it was, depending on what it was, for public health, for public order, for the rights and freedoms of others.

And this list differed depending on the rights. So, there was always this question of whether you could pass a law infringing that right, which also infringed that right, when this one has public health and that one doesn't have public health. That was a little bit difficult from a drafting point of view to do something, because laws impact more than one right.

So, I know that in the Ghai report, he recommended doing away with the list and to just have a general formula about limitations, and that's fine. But you've got to get the formula correct. What is deficient in the current constitution is that it authorizes limitations broadly. You can limit the rights so long as there's a law, or even if there's not a law, it's necessary. This is like having an illusory right. The Supreme Court has placed a gloss on it.

They've read into the constitution a right that the limitation has got to be proportionate, and it's got to be rational, it's got to be for a necessary purpose, and it's got to be no more than is necessary in the circumstances. So, the limitation provision needs to be tightened, and I recommend that you use whatever is the current trend internationally in constitutions so that limitations are not completely open-ended. I also invite you to look at the list and decide whether they all need to stay, especially the ones towards the end.

There's the question related to this and to citizenship, of whether the right to stand as a candidate, which is both in the human rights provisions and elsewhere, should be limited to single citizens, people who are exclusively Fiji citizens, because presently those with dual cannot stand or contest. A big problem, a big practical problem for many of our colleagues who went overseas for greener pastures, is the two-year residency rule. And that is really important that you look at whether that is necessary, because at the moment you can vote if you live overseas, but you can't stand as a candidate unless you normally reside in Fiji, and there's a constitutional test, which is not very well written, that you have to have been here for two years before nomination.

And a lot of people who are living overseas and who intended to contest have come back only to find that they miss out. And you've got to ask yourself, is that necessary or is it fair in this particular day and age where people are mobile? I mean, I know Mr. Kohli himself. Like me, I see him often at the airport. We don't know. I don't have any residency overseas, but I travel a lot. So, if I counted up how many days I've been here over the previous two years, I don't know, or three years, I don't know whether I would qualify, even though I have no other home other than here.

I don't have family, a wife and kids overseas or whatever, but that is a real practical issue. And there are many ordinary people who work on boats, who go overseas to work for, you know, like to make money and come back there. They haven't shifted their center of gravity, but they are out of the country.

You know, there's lawyers who've gone to work like yourself for personal reasons in the Solomons or Nauru or whatever, and you, as a result of looking for work because you're being discriminated against or you're not able to find, you're not comfortable here temporarily, therefore become disentitled to contest an election. You know, so that's a very, very strict rule, which I think should not be in the Constitution. The other question around voting, which is in the Constitution strangely, well, not strangely, is there, but was not there before, is that Fiji citizens overseas have a constitutional right to vote.

In the past, Fiji citizens overseas were eligible to vote, but they didn't have a constitutional right to vote. The presence of the constitutional right means that the elections office and the state machinery must go out of their way to facilitate polling for these people. And sometimes it's impossible, you know, like it's really impossible to get ballot papers out given the time frame here to meet the other constitutional, the seven days and the 14 days and then you've got these ballot papers.

And how do you get them across to them? How do you get them returned? In my day, we sent them by, you registered, we sent them by courier. You got them, you didn't get them. That's your problem, baby.

You know, like, but now that's why the machinery's got to go here, there, everywhere. And they're spending so much money going around doing polling in these overseas places. I don't know of any other country that has as little resources as we do that spend that much money trying to get votes from people who are not here. So, I urge you to look at that because it's in the Constitution, this right that they have to vote. And we know why that was put in because the support for the architects was large. A lot of it was overseas, so there was that reason.

There is, wait, limitations I've dealt with. The voting system, well, there is the question of how many houses you should have. We used to have two with the Senate, and the whole purpose of the Senate was essentially to protect indigenous Fijian interests. Because that was where the great Council of Chiefs nominees sat with their veto power over specific legislation. This Constitution has just one chamber. When you have one chamber, it's cheaper.

But it's harder to give a place to indigenous interests that is real without being unfair to everybody else. Without making the voting system discriminatory and that kind of thing. So that's the advantage of having a second chamber. You can recognize special interests, including women, including youth, in an upper house, without undermining the purity of the elected system. I mean, I'm not saying that you should, I'm just saying that it's something that you can think about. That's the value of a thing.

I'm going to say something very controversial here. And I ask forgiveness if it offends indigenous people sitting here. But I speak as somebody who is also of indigenous ancestry. There is a tendency, because of the importance of chiefs to our identity, to overestimate the wisdom of chiefs. Especially in the modern setting. We were lucky in the colonial era and the immediate post-colonial era to have chiefs who were trained specifically to succeed to government.

The likes of Ratu Mara, Ratu Penaia, Ratu George Cakobau, they were all trained by the British and by Ratu Sukuna to be ready for that role. We don't have those kinds of people anymore. And if you stand back and you look honestly at how chiefs behave, and I'm not saying all chiefs, because it's the opposite, the assumption is all chiefs will make the right decision. That's the assumption of elevating chiefs. But if you look at the experience of the last 20, 30 years, that's not true. There has not been unity.

There's not been necessarily wise decision making. We have a situation at the moment. We have a constitutional crisis over FICAC because people are frightened to advise the president what he's allowed and not allowed to do because of his status. So, think very carefully about that. The fact that people are chiefs does not make them wise. Yes, the Great Council of Chiefs, the Boselevu Vakaturaga, had a stabilizing influence after 1987.

But again, if you were there on the scenes, it was like this far. There was a tussle in there. And then there is the question of what is the Great Council of Chiefs, which opens up, I mean, who is entitled to sit there, which opens up another big issue. So, all I'm saying is that that is a huge issue that you've got to think about without any rose-colored glasses because the Constitution is forever. So just because there is anger and nostalgia for what was taken away doesn't make that suitable for today. If I can use an example, an analogy, it's like somebody taking your house, right? That was the house you used to live in that was okay for your family 16 years ago. But your family's changed. You're richer. You've been living in that house has one bathroom and toilet.

In the last 16 years, you've been living in a different house with four bathrooms and toilets. And you're fighting to go back to that, even though it doesn't suit you anymore, because it was taken away. And that's the same situation with the 1997 Constitution. There's this nostalgia about it that's completely undeserved and completely uninformed. And it's built around this anger that something was taken. And they're perfectly entitled to be angry about it.

That I can understand. But the assumption that therefore what was taken is good and should be given back is that you need to look at carefully. You've got to assess whether it's still right. So, there's that. The voting system, the present voting system, is a mess. It cannot continue in the present form. It denies ordinary people effective representation. And I'm sorry if I'm lecturing you, but that's just my tone. It also favors the superstar parties.

So now, it was built around Fiji first. PAP was able to challenge it and win at the last election because it had a superstar. I mean, a charismatic leader who could be the focus. I mean, that's the reality, who could be a focus of votes, because that's what the voting system favors. I mean, it means that even though there is currently, and I'm not favoring or saying what, we all know that there's dissatisfaction. We know that there are parties seeking to challenge, but the system doesn't allow any alternative parties to come forward.

And it actually makes what's going to happen at the next election so unpredictable. Because we can't work out in the absence of polls whether the leader of PAP still has enough charisma to get enough votes over. So, it's quite an unstable system because it depends on parties maintaining leaders who have strong appeal.

And if he should decide to resign, who in that party has the charisma to pull votes? Or in any other party? So, it's not a very stable model. The alternatives are to go back to first past the post, which is simple. I'm sure you've heard submissions going for that.

The problem with first past the post is that it's kind of outdated internationally. Everybody's into proportional. But at the same time, be careful about proportional because you've got to look at what's happening globally with all of the unstable governments because of proportional.

The assumptions that I grew up on of two parties with one little splinter party in all the big countries no longer hold. So, you have to think very carefully about a voting system that accommodates what exists now and what could happen in the future. And remember also the thing about voting systems is voting systems themselves change behavior.

The voting system will affect how parties operate. Because the game changes so your team will change and your tactic or strategy will change. So, be careful about don't assume that parties will behave how you think they've behaved for the past five years or 10 years, you've got to be very careful and you've got to work out how they behave now and if we do this.

What's the likely pattern that will happen. A big problem in the current arrangement which you will need to look at is the discrimination or the, what's the word. Yes, discrimination or the impediment to independent candidates, the independence has a role.

The current threshold is, I think, three times almost the amount that a party candidate needs to get, even via the leader. So, for example, they just rounding it off right. If, if you had originally there were 50 seats in Parliament. Right. So, if you were at 50 seats in Parliament, out of 100% of the vote, you would need each party rep rounded off would need 2% of the vote to get in. Not necessarily 2% that they got but 2% that their party got a independent candidate at the moment requires 5% to get in.

And it's hard enough for an independent to get 5% of the vote nationally because that's a huge area to project to, but, or even 2% of the vote nationally, but it's still way higher than to the five is just completely, you know, like a disincentive to independence to, to come forward. And the need for independence is particularly for small interest groups, you know, who might not be represented or taken care of in the big parties. I mean, the Rotuman community.

There's an assumption that the indigenous EGM parties will include somebody from them but you don't know if the indigenous EGM parties with their own dynamics and their own relationships will pick somebody who truly represents you, you know, and in that situation it's important that there be an alternative. Who's able to offer themselves, same for the even more so for people like Mr big, and me. You know, our community, who used to be so powerful. And now forgotten.

We don't have anybody who represents us in Parliament. And the political parties have no incentive to include us, because that's the game, you know, they go for the majority. But if being an independent was easier. You might have a shot, I'm not saying you would, but you'd have a shot. You know, so it's important for those kinds of groups the same for women.

The parties might not put for their, you know, they might not put good women forward for their own internal alliance reasons. Right, and then at least the ability to stand as an independent would allow a strong, popular, effective woman who's not aligned with the party to be elected to represent women in Parliament so I commend that idea to you for your consideration. We're running out of time, only 15 minutes, I've got so many things to say. OH, very, very important one, from my experience. First vacation of seat of member. This looks innocuous, but it was the mechanism that they got Niko out under and you will remember we had to fight bitterly jointly to get him back in.

And that was because the Constitution allowed elections office to make a wrong call, which resulted in him losing his seat until we managed to convince the court otherwise. But the reality of winning that case, and I don't know whether you remember it or not, was because we had to use the analogy of married women to get over the line if we didn't have that analogy, we might not have got over the line. All I'm saying is that this provision which looks innocuous. If you have an electoral administration that, you know, making the wrong decision, or whatever. It leaves the security of the member at the whim of the administration. There is a huge problem with the short period given to the Court of Disputed Returns.

They are only, you only have 21 days to file an election petition. And it's got to be decided within, I don't know, so many days of the filing. It's ridiculous. It is really, really ridiculous. And what it does is it favors the winner. Yes, there is a principle that challenges to elections need to be determined quickly because you need to know who your MPs are because of the executive government and all of that.

But the numbers and the time periods that they've come up with are really ridiculous. Because what has happened in my experience is that after an election, there are stories about what went wrong or right. Right? It takes you, people are exhausted. After the count and all of that, the mamarau is over, they kind of like disappear. They all come together. They're all there.

You've got the reports. But Fijian people are not good at recording things and taking things down. So you hear stories of what happened. Then you want to bring a petition. But you've got to go and find these people. And even when you find, you know, you get the thing verified, you've got only so many days to get them, get their affidavit done and all of this.

And you just can't. It's just impossible because the time frames are so short. So, what these time frames in the Constitution do is make the whole system impossible to review. It's impossible to bring an election petition because you just can't meet the deadlines in terms of getting your allegations together, getting your evidence together, getting your arguments together. It's just impossible. So, I recommend we look or you look at what is the standard rule in Australia, New Zealand, the UK.

And we follow that because what makes us different? Or Canada or even Samoa, Tonga or wherever. But ours is unduly and unrealistically restrictive. And that's not good for democracy. It means that when people cheat, which will usually be the party in power because they have the resources, it's not possible to review them. There is a problem, and I hope you realize that the provision about the president acting and who the president whose advice the president acts upon is the reason that we have this impasse over the acting director of FICAC. Because the current provision says the president acts only on the advice of a minister or the cabinet, doesn't say which one of those two, which is a problem in itself, or another authority if the Constitution provides for that.

So, the problem with the impasse over FICAC is the FICAC Act says the JSC advises, but the Constitution says that the president acts on the advice of a minister, the cabinet, or an authority specified by the Constitution. So, the Constitution itself doesn't say JSC advises about FICAC, it's outside the Constitution. And that's why the advises to the president and to the prime minister have said the provision in the FICAC Act is unconstitutional, because you only are to act on the advice of a minister, a cabinet, or an authority designated by the Constitution.

And JSC is not designated by the Constitution for that advice. So that is the reason that we are in this no man's land or no person's land over Fisher's appointment. And we have this, what is actually a constitutional crisis, where the JSC, the president and the prime minister are in a public spat about it. Like they're polite about it, but it is a crisis. And nobody knows whether the acting director is there legally or illegally or what, and then you've got Barbara Malimali on the other side and you know it's a mess. But that's the provision that is part of the problem. No problem with appointment. Sorry, sorry, sorry. Prime Minister.

There's all these prescriptive provisions about how you appoint the prime minister, I'm not fussed about it. But what it says is that if you're the leader of the party, and your party gets the majority you're automatically PM. If your party. If no party gets an absolute majority, then it's voted for on the floor. That's what happened that that gripping day on 24th of December, three years ago because no party had won the majority so that's why it had to go on the floor. But there's that I don't know whether you want to keep that.

They are going back to the vacation of seats and members. They are the question. The fundamental question that underlies a vacation of seats provision is how much power should be given to a political party to expel and, and cause the removal of a member. Traditionally, before 1990. Under the 1970 Constitution, we had the standard Commonwealth situation where if you got elected on a party ticket into Parliament. You still were entitled to vote in your own conscience. And if you cross the floor. There were no consequences. You know you got to deal with it with your body.

Right, but you didn't lose your seat. I was the one who wrote in the crossing the floor provision into the 1990 on the instructions of the then cabinet, because the 1987 coup happened, because Leonie Gila. Mr. Accepted the Senate other speaker. You see, after the election there was a majority, I think of only one between one or two between labor. NFP coalition, and the Alliance, right. So, the Alliance were busy plotting to bring somebody from that side over to this, get a shock, they got a shock.

On the day, the first order of business was to vote for the speaker. On the day that they went, when they went to vote for the speaker. NFP stood up and went and brought Leonie Gila and nominated him, and he stood and was dragged to the chair. And there's a famous picture on the front page of the Fiji Times where Leonie Gila is walking, and the government bench is like, you know, because nobody expected somebody from the Alliance side to our neck and go the other side so it was a result of that that this rule was written that if you cross. You lose your seat. But that's a philosophical question for you guys.

There's two provisions. One is that if you cross you lose your seat, and the second is if you are expelled you lose your seat. But that gives primacy to the party, and its executive over the voters.

Because it's in this system, it might be okay where you've got the seat through the party. But if you're going to another voting system where the party is less important to the selection of the member. The question is, should the member elected by the voters be subject to the whims of the party executive.

Attorney General, lawyer 15 years practice disciplinary offense, whatever that I don't have a problem with that. The judiciary provisions need some tidying up but I'm not particularly fussed about that. The. Okay, big problem. A big big big problem is this. Traditionally in the Westminster system.

The civil service was independent. And civil servants were permanent and independent, and were assumed to last more than the ministry ministers come and go. The civil servants are forever. And in order to immunize the civil servants from the political pressure independent service commissions were invented. And that was why the PSC appointed and dismissed civil servants, and the JSC back in the Judicial and Legal Services Commission it was originally called appointed and dismissed judges and government legal officers. And there was a police service commission that appointed the police.

But the membership of those commissions was independent, because they were independent service commissions. The independence of the civil service has been greatly compromised in this constitution. Prior to this, the Public Service Commission constitutional role was to appoint and dismiss and discipline civil servants.

Right so from PSS, all the way down to admin officer or driver or whatever. The. What changed there was that in this particular constitution, what they are also sorry.

Then in 1974, government passed the PSC Act, the Public Service Act, which gave the PSC, the personnel functions of government. So on top of the pure appointing and disciplining PSC became the personnel authority of the government to do the training, and the, you know, like all of that kind of HR. It was the HR arm of government.

In this constitution, the HR arm is gone. The appointing and dismissing of civil servants is gone. All that the Human Rights Commission, I mean the PSC does under this constitution is appoint the permanent secretaries.

And remember, the PSC is appointed by the COC, the COC. And the problem with the COC is that it's political. It's supposedly independent, and supposedly to bring independence to the public service, but the members of the CRC are the Prime Minister, the Attorney General, leader of the opposition, one member nominated by the leader of the opposition, and two members appointed nominated by the PM.

So, the body, which is appointing the PSC, supposedly independent, is political. I sit on the COC, and I, because I come from the olden days, I exercise my vote independently of the person who nominated me. And to be fair to Mr. Rabuka, he also comes from those days, so he tries to, you know, like, make genuine decisions.

But I know that under the previous government, the nominees of the leader of the opposition, the leader of the opposition and the nominees left, they boycotted. Because when the COC would sit, they were not even listened to. You know, there was no discussion, because the government people just made the decision, and that's how the setup is.

It encourages that kind of behavior. So, the COC, you know, like, the idea of the COC needs to be relooked at. The other problem with the COC in practice, and I'm coming away from the PSC, but I could go back to the PSC.

The other problem with the COC in practice, judging by my own experience, is that because we are not, we don't have the PSC there, we don't have any personnel records, when we are called upon to appoint somebody, like to be the commissioner of police or to be the commander of the RFMF or the commissioner of corrections, we have no idea of their personnel history, if we're looking at somebody from within. We have no access to any records. You know, so we're just saying, oh, yeah, what do you know about XY, he's a good guy.

I remember when I was the minister, I don't know, because the records are not there because we are not the personnel authority. And so when you're doing acting appointments, we're kind of like just guessing based on the members' recollections of the personality of people. And that's been a big problem with prisons.

When we suspended the prisons commissioner, we've had a series of acting ones because we don't know who's good. You know, so systemically it doesn't work. So I'll go back to the PSC, which is the bigger problem. The PSC at the moment only appoints the PSs. The Constitution says that the PSs appoint people in their ministry. And that is because the PSs are beholden to the minister.

That invites the PSs to keep the minister happy. And the situation, part of the problem of this country, to be honest, and I mean no insult, but part of the problem with this country is that civil servants are paralyzed. Civil servants are paralyzed for two reasons, three reasons.

First, they fear losing their job. So, it's easier not to make a decision than to make a decision because you might be exited immediately. Second, you might be FICA-ed because decisions that you make will usually have some disgruntled party or you've got somebody in your office who doesn't like you and all they've got to do is write a complaint to FICA-ed and you're down the vortex. You've got to have money to defend yourself. You go through all of that stress. It's stressful.

And so what does that encourage? It encourages behavior where you don't move. You come to work, you take your pay, any hard decision comes, you move the file there because if you make a decision, your neck is on the line. So, there's two constitutional provisions that lead to this. The first is the FICA-ed provision and the second is the PSE provision. So that is my analysis of why we have a paralyzed civil service. I'll be frank.

The civil service has always been slow, but at least in the old days they made decisions. Now they don't at all because it's out of fear of consequences that this constitution promotes, that kind of paranoia by the rules. The JSC needs to be, the membership, the concept is fine, but the membership needs to be, and the appointment procedures need to be made less political.

In the 1997 constitution, judicial appointments were required to have the consent of the select committee, although that was a little bit problematic because some of the lawyer members in parliament, at least one in particular, made it difficult for somebody. So you need to really look at that. Independent Legal Services Commission.

This is banged into the constitution with the other independent commissions, but it's a different kind of beast. Independent Legal Services Commission doesn't appoint anybody. It's the FICAC of lawyers, and it was put in there to scare the living daylights out of the chair and Mr. Kohli and people like them and me.

You know, like to make this policeman, this important body, and it's banged in amongst the independent appointing authorities that are important to the state. The Independent Legal Services Commission is not to do with government. It shouldn't be in the constitution.

I don't think it exists in any, it's recognized in any other constitution. Whether we have an Independent Legal Services Commission or the Fiji Law Society does it, I really don't care. But I don't think that the Independent Legal Services Commission should be a constitutional body. It's just not that important. FICAC, very controversial topic. Yes, FICAC, well, bodies like FICAC have an important government role to play to keep people accountable, just like the DPP or the, I don't know, Human Rights Commission or Ombudsman or whatever.

The problem with FICAC, though, is the constitution says that it investigates and prosecutes. In other jurisdictions, the FICAC only investigate, like the police. And whatever they find gets submitted to another decision maker, like the DPP, who then reviews and decides whether they're sufficient.

And that is the problem with FICAC. Because it both investigates and prosecutes, there's absolutely no accountability, except in court when they lose and then they quickly forget about it because they've got another prosecution coming up. But somebody's life has been ruined by five years of stress, five years of very, very high legal fees.

And the effect, the chilling effect that FICAC has on the civil service cannot be overestimated. So, two things, if you're going to keep FICAC in the constitution, you have to say that it investigates only. It can't do both.

And it's because they put them together that FICAC became the lapdog for government. There's strange, in the qualifications for the various offices, the legal offices, there's a variation in how many years' experiences you need. And there's no rhyme or reason to it. Like the DPP is seven years and the SG is like none at all. And then it's because at the time they were drafting, they were tailoring to whoever was the incumbent. So, these sorts of things have to be rationalized.

The supervisor of elections used to be constitutionally required to be a lawyer. And it should be a lawyer because you're making legal calls. But the constitution doesn't require it to be a lawyer at the moment. It should be, there should be a requirement to be a lawyer. Legal aid commission. Again, I don't know why the legal aid commission is in the constitution.

You know, it's nice to have, but it's not really an important part of the state. It's got the word commission there, but that's about it. And then of course it was part of the last government's platform. You know, this whole kind of populist idea that we serve the people and we bring justice to you and all of that kind of thing. So, I'm not sure why the legal aid commission should be in the constitution. The mercy commission, yes, that should be in the constitution.

It used to be the prerogative of the mercy commission because the power of pardon is an important state power and traditionally it was exercised by the Queen. Public service disciplinary tribunal. I'm not sure why it's there, but whatever. Accountability and transparency commission, important, but illusory. I mean, we've had, how long has it been now? 12 years? 12 years there's been provision for it and for a code of conduct and for whatever and nothing has happened and freedom of information. What that shows is that you can put whatever you like in the constitution.

Doesn't mean that it's going to happen. So, the question for you guys is how do you make sure that what you recommend, if it's implemented, there's pressure for the people in power to actually do something. I don't know the answer to that, but okay.

Discipline services. The commissioner of police and the army are supposed to be independent and to a lesser degree corrections, but like I say, they're appointed by a political body being the COC. So, you have to recommend another appointment mechanism that is not politicized. Republic of Fiji military forces. I think that that provision has got to go.

The responsibility for the well-being of Fiji, that's just an invitation, a permanent invitation to coup d'etat.

We are very fortunate that the commander, the current commander and the younger officers were sick of what was happening for 16 years. They come from a different culture, but things swing. And a provision like that is an invitation to somebody else within the camp to say it's our job to intervene and regularize what's going on. Okay, that's enough lecture. That's about all I have to say. I think the equality provisions and the human rights provisions are really important.

Apart from the wish list towards the end, none of them should be whittled down. The big question is amendment. The last question is, no, there's two. One is immunity and one is amendment towards the end. Personally, I have many friends who I have fought, argued bitterly with for many years about immunity provisions. My good friends like Ratu Joni Madraiwiwi, Imrana, and other people who are very active in that kind of civil society politics space, always argued against immunity provisions because they say that it encourages coups because there's no accountability for your actions.

As somebody who's worked in the transition side after a coup, immunity is the only thing that allows people to surrender power. So, without an ability to give immunity, why would you give it up and expose yourself to hanging? People don't commit the coups in the expectation of immunity. They do it for other reasons.

And immunity is granted only when they've been convinced down the line to give up power. So, without immunity, and if we do away with immunity, people will have too much at stake, their freedom, their life, to actually surrender power. That's my view.

I mean, I'm not saying I'm right. There's many views about it, but be careful about immunity. And that was why in the Supreme Court reference last year, the court decided not to go to immunity because immunity was on the table. The court recognized that it's far too complicated, and that's not the role. They use the usual excuse, that's not the role of a court, that's a political issue. But what they really recognize is that the very real practical consideration that if you remove it, you give those whose immunity has been lost a stake in taking over to protect themselves. So be careful. I don't know the answer. I'm just saying be careful.

The last thing is amendment. In the original 1970 Constitution, there were two different thresholds. One for the workaday provisions of the Constitution, and then a higher threshold for the important one. And I think that's important to have that kind of decision because the Constitution is full of things that are more important than others. So, you don't want impossible things for housekeeping measures, you know, because time changes. So there should be two thresholds.

I think that a two-thirds majority for normal things and a three-quarters or 70% for fundamental things like the human rights provisions and that kind of thing is important. The referendum, I'm not a great fan of referendum, but I get it. Yes, it's a modern thing to have a referendum. I think it should be 50% of those present and voting. I don't think we should seek a two-thirds majority in a referendum because it's very difficult to get people to agree to something. Even to get 50% is a big ask.

If you look at the history of referenda in other countries, referenda rarely pass. They rarely pass, and that's at a 50% level. I don't know, maybe your research team can look at what the pattern is for constitutional amendments across the world. I would be surprised if many required a special majority in a referendum because generally it's just very difficult to get something passed in a referendum. Look at Australia. The last referendum on the Aboriginal or the First Nations didn't get through because all it takes is a little bit of agitation and people say no.

So, with those, as they say, key words. Thank you very much for the discussion this afternoon. We have been listening and you have given us some ideas which we will be able to use or consider during our deliberations. You have been of much assistance this afternoon. Please pardon us, we have to bring this to an end. We have a team going to Rotuma tomorrow.

Jon Apted: Oh, lucky them.

Mr. Valenitabua: So, they need to go and get ready. And also, we have a virtual meeting with the legal drafter at 5pm.

Jon Apted: Sorry to have taken your time.

Mr. Valenitabua: That's fine, you're welcome. So, we have to call this to an end.

Jon Apted: Thank you for your time and the invitation.

Mr. Valenitabua: John, thank you. And I apologize for using your first name. I think we know each other that way. I had hoped when you started this conversation that this would be in the form of a to and fro and that we would be open to have some discussion. Unfortunately, time doesn't permit that and we have listened to you for the last hour and a half or so.

I'm just interested, given your experience with the genesis of the last four constitutions, which of them do you personally think did the best for Fiji? 1970, 1990, 1997, 2013? Your preference, just rate them 1 to 4? No, I can't. Because a constitution is only as good as how it works in a context. And the 1970 constitution was a compromise that was chosen for that context, but the underlying assumption didn't pan out. The underlying assumption, and don't forget this because you've got to understand this as well. The underlying assumption of 1970 was that indigenous Fijians would stick together. And they never do.

John, I don't want to drag this on. That wasn't a right or wrong question, answer. It was really just a reflection in terms of your experience with all of them, whether you had a preference for any. There's no, I mean I don't have a swarming. I just say there were aspects of each that were good, but none of them worked in terms of the political compromises that they... And I'm interested because you did state quite categorically that a constitution is forever. I think our experience is we've had four constitutions and obviously they're not forever.

I guess from a commissioner's point of view, what I would be interested in is what are the circumstances that led to the constitutions being written. And my understanding is each one was written in response to a crisis or a coup. Which begs the question, the corollary of that would be as a commissioner, I'd be interested in identifying what is causing these coups and maybe looking at that closely in terms of designing a constitution that's suitable for Fiji. So it's just the to and fro that I hope that we'd have, which we unfortunately don't have the time to have. We've listened for one and a half hours, but that's part of this conversation. If I could just answer that.

Jon Apted: My answer to your question, your rephrased question, which is why didn't they work. Two didn't, well, three didn't work, but it's because the assumptions about the power sharing arrangements and the mechanisms just didn't work as they were expected to. The assumptions about people's behavior was wrong. I think we can surmise a lot about the reasons that these things didn't work. The reality is none of us know, other than him. And I guess from a pragmatic point of view, I'm trying to look at this in the context of how we get each constitution, given that they're not lasting forever, and hoping that this time around we get something that lasts a little longer. We do know, with due respect, we do know how people have behaved. We can't predict how they will necessarily behave, but you have to remember history and how they have behaved. So, it's not completely out there. We do have a history to draw on. We know what doesn't work. So, when you move forward, you've got to work out what might work.

And yes, you could get that wrong, but don't forget what hasn't worked. And I guess if I was to use that criteria, the 1970 was the best because it went for 17 years. Yeah. Well, no. No, no, no. Remember, it didn't. It didn't. There was a palace coup in April 1977. When the governor general dissolved. But that was, if he didn't do that, if the NFP didn't get such a shock that they'd won, they were not expecting to win. They were expecting to be the opposition forever. So when they won, they competed to win, and when they won, they were not ready with their leader. And nobody, half the party, didn't want Sadiq Koya to be the PM. They were happy for him to be the leader of the opposition. So that's what happened. But if that hadn't happened, there would have been a coup in 1977 as well. Sorry, I'm just saying. Ah.

Mr. Valenitabua: All right, I think that brings us to the end of our... Mr. Apted, on behalf of the chair and the commissioners, I'd like to thank you again for your robust lecture and discussion. Before you leave, we'd just like to take a picture with you and the commissioners.

----------End of Session [29-6-2026] ----------

Graham Leung

Mr. Graham Leung
Date: 29-6-2026

Leighton: It is my great pleasure to welcome you. Thank you very much for taking up the invitation from the Commission to present a submission. On behalf of the Chair and the Commissioners, I would like to thank you, especially for being very early this morning and prompt.

I will introduce the Commissioners very briefly, and then I will hand over to the Chair, who will then lay out the work that the Constitutional Commission will be undertaking. Just with regards to making your submission, the speaker in front of you, if you just tap on the right panel, the mic will come on, and after you have made your submission, you can press the same panel to turn it off. Introducing the Commissioners, to the far right is Mr Conway Beg, a well-known architect, also a Fiji rugby player and administrator within the Fiji Rugby Union. Seated next to him is Merewalesi Nailatikau. She is a Development and Communication Specialist. Next to her is seated the Chair of the Commission, Mr. Sevuloni Valenitabua. He is a well-known lawyer in Fiji, as well as the Pacific. And seated right next to him is Mr. Ami Kohli, a well-known lawyer as well, who I know you are familiar with from Labasa, with the firm Kohli & Singh. And seated next to him is Dr. Neelesh Gounder, a well-known economist and a lecturer at the University of the South Pacific. I will now hand over to the Chair of the Commission.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr Leung, welcome. We are very pleased to have you here this morning. We have just had the Law Society complete their submission and we were really looking forward to today's consultations because we'll be having lawyers appear before us. You are the second this morning and then we will have Mr Hector in the afternoon, late in the afternoon. Now we welcome you and we thank you for your attendance before us, your experience, your knowledge, the Electoral Commission and work with the SG's office and the Attorney General's office is important and we will be guided by a lot of things that you will be telling us.

The work of the Commission is well known to you. It's a national task that has been given to us by His Excellency, the President of the country, and we are to amend or review the 2013 Constitution and that review can mean amendment and we are looking at an amended 2013 Constitution. So we've been going around the country, as you know, collecting submissions and recommendations from the people of the country.

And this week we have arrived back from our journey around the country and we are back at Level 9 receiving submissions from associations, ministries and individuals like yourself. We will now give you the floor without further ado and we'll listen to your submissions and then we might have some discussion later on with comments from us or questions. Thank you.

Mr. Graham Leung: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, fellow commissioners. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the kind and generous introduction. I hope I don't disappoint you in terms of the expectations and the bar that you've raised. Just as a matter of clarification, how much time do I have? I know I'm early but I don't want to overstay my welcome because you've got other people throughout the day as well.

Mr Valenitabua: We can listen to you until 1 o'clock.

Mr Graham Leung: Thank you. So, Mr. Chairman, first of all, thank you and thank your fellow commissioners.

I've followed your journey, if I can put it that way, in the newspapers the last several weeks and I've kind of loosely also followed a lot of the submissions that were reported in the newspapers. Most of the submitters have cherry-picked and referred to different sections or different topics or themes that are important to them. But unless my memory fails me, very few submitters spoke to their broad vision of what the Constitution represents and how it should be a forward-looking document.

So, I want to start this morning by sharing my vision of what this Constitution, as amended, should look like and commence with maybe some historical background, briefly, to where we are today. Throughout my submissions, I refer to specific sections that are of interest to me and at the end, I'm happy to share with you a soft copy of a table of recommendations that I feel could be useful for you as you ruminate and reflect on the kind of changes that will improve the Constitution as we know it. So I welcome this opportunity today to share with you my views on constitutional reform and to some extent, the future of our country.

Mr. Chairman and Commissioners, I don't think you need reminding that the task that you have been saddled with has come at a critical juncture in our country's troubled and sometimes fractured history. Most of the observers here, including the journalists that are present and observing the proceedings, a lot of them probably weren't born in 1987, but for those of us that are older and longer in the tooth, I think 1987 was a watershed event and the effects of 1987 still reverberate today and still informs and influences present-day constitutional and governance issues and is likely until a generation of people who participated in successive illegal displacements of constitutional government are called by the Almighty to another place. So it goes without saying that your responsibilities are enormous, but even more challenging I suspect for you is the rather truncated and urgent deadlines that you're being asked to carry out this review.

You will know from our history that Sir Paul Reeves, former Governor General of New Zealand, whose report led to the 1997 Constitution, his review took about 18 months, give or take, and Professor Yash Ghai's report took less, but a lot longer than the three or four months that you've been given the task. So, as I said, your outreach throughout our 300 islands has received extensive press coverage. You've gone from Rukua to Rakiraki, from Nabukaluka to Nabouwalu, and everywhere and everything in between, and I'm happy to say that the Chairman and others that followed you to the Lau Group didn't capsize in one of those puns.

I'm glad I wasn't in the fiber, but by the grace of God, here you are at this level nine, which this level nine has an auspicious or inauspicious history going back a few years. Those of us that follow these events loosely, we saw blankets and pillowcases and food being carted in and out, but that's a story for another day. So, I recognize that your job is, if you want it to be pedantic, you're not here to draft a new constitution, but if you suggest amendments to the constitution, and you have an amendment bill to amend the 2013 constitution, in effect, you're actually producing a new constitution. So, in many respects, because this constitution for now is the supreme law, you're not starting with a blank canvas. You're not starting from scratch. So, this is the foundational document, warts and all. Now, the temptation is to throw the baby out with the bathwater, but I think that's quite an ambitious task. I think this constitution, like the curate's egg, is good in parts and bad in others. We recognize that.

And you've heard many submissions over the last couple of months with people expressing reservations about certain parts or endorsing and affirming other parts. Now, I want to say that the changes that will become part of your recommendations to His Excellency the President, they won't be an abstraction. In my view, it will be a set of guidelines that have been drawn out of your experience and the experience of all our people, the experience and aspirations, trauma of our people stemming from those watershed events of 1987.

My sense of what Fiji's future might look like, that's my personal sense, is conditioned by my own personal understanding of past constitutional and legal events as well as the current events that we face. Mr. Chairman, members of the Commission, I believe that our collective history, trauma, and experience impose on us as citizens of this wonderful and sometimes troubled country impose on us duties that are impossible to avoid. Much of what has happened over the last 30 or 40 years in this country compel us to respond to some unpleasant and inconvenient truths.

And it's not easy to be telling truths in a country because quite often the messenger is shot and people fail to listen to the message. But I believe that it is time that we address some of these past events and inconvenient truths that continue to saddle us as a country and to weigh us down. I don't think that we can any longer sweep some of these unpleasant aspects of our past under the proverbial mat.

We keep ignoring that, hoping that it'll just go away. So, as you near the finish line, I believe this is more or less the second last week of receiving submissions. In carrying out your collective solemn duty as commissioners that have been tasked to review the Constitution and to solicit the views of our people, you must ask yourself, first of all, what kind of vision do you imagine for our country? What should the future look like? How do we not repeat mistakes of the past? How do we co-proof our Constitution? Can we co-proof our Constitution? What kind of legacy will you as commissioners bequeath to your children and their children in this Constitution-making process which you are a part of? So I'm not going to give you a lecture on our history because it would be inappropriate to do so. I certainly have no intention of patronizing. I see a couple of PhDs on the commission. But I think the starting point which has made us as a country has to be 1879.

Of course, there was 1874 was when Fiji and Ratu Cakobau and the other chiefs ceded Fiji to the British Crown. Queen Victoria was on the throne and I think the Prime Minister of Britain at the time was Gladstone. But in any event, fast forward to 1879, the first wave of inter-Fijians arrived in this country.

And a large number, despite the rigors of indenture, remained and chose to live in this country following the abolition of indenture. Of course, you know from history that following that, indenture was abolished and then we had various waves of migrants. We had from the state of Gujarat, we had Gujaratis coming in, the Patels and so on.

The Sikhs, we had waves of migrants from forced migration. I think in today's terminology we would call it human trafficking. Where the Solomon Islanders and Kanakis were brought to open up the roads and clear the forests, the Gilbertese and followed Chinese merchants and fanned their way to places like Naitasiri, Kadavu and so on.

And colonial policy dictated and influenced many of these events. So, by the early 60s, Fiji, as you well know, had become a rich tapestry of different races. But many of those races were largely subsisting in their own racial enclaves and silos, living separate and compartmentalized lives. Independence came, of course, in 1970 and it forced us as a country to deal with the realities of different ethnic groups which for a rather prolonged period were living side by side but not having much to do with one another. Now, many of the world events around us as we speak might give us pause and room for pessimism. The war in Ukraine continues unabated. The problems in the Gaza. This week the Strait of Hormuz opened and then it closed again and then it opened. And we have a man with orange hair on Pennsylvania Avenue dictating things.

So, the world is really upended. Here at home in this country we've just had a budget passed. Cost of living, difficulties abound. Very painful fiscal space and then we have a record, I think, at this juncture which we can't be too proud of. Growing incidence of HIV, non-communicable diseases, five amputations a day in hospital, the drug scourge continues and so on. So, these are not mere statistics. This is the backdrop against which your commission is taking place. So, we are talking about the lives of our fellow citizens, many of whom for whatever reason have been unable to realize their full potential and being robbed of a life of dignity and happiness. And certainly, the poverty levels are depressing.

But as a country, I believe we have shown in the past, despite these troubling circumstances, that our people have always had the resilience and the strength to pick up the pieces and soldier on despite the difficulties. So, our people have shown the enormous capacity for adaptation, for survival and being good human through a whole repeated cycle of coups. Now some of our finest minds have left Fiji since 1987 and you know this of course.

We have lost both brains and treasure, brains and capital, and growing numbers continue to do so. So, the figures are depressing because we have lost some of our best people and figures will differ, but it's clearly in excess of 100,000. Now I want to say again something which is self-evident. All the ethnic groups that make up this country today have strengthened and enriched Fiji. Their energies, their food, their commitment, their culture. This matrix of different cultures has made our country far more interesting, vibrant and treasured.

Our progress at times of course has been disrupted by unconstitutional events. Our progress reflects the social and political challenges that have accompanied each of the coups. We cannot turn the clock back to 1987, but at the same time we cannot ignore the reality of those events.

I believe Mr. Chairman and fellow commissioners what we can do perhaps through your report is to learn the error of our ways and not repeat some of the grievous mistakes of the past that continue to haunt us. This review process of which you are an integral part, which you are leading, presents a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to get things right. To rise above parties and politics, political point scoring and boldly reset our constitutional foundations.

As a forward-looking country which embraces the rule of law and promotes the values of equity, fairness and justice for all. I believe your review must consider and involve strengthening our democratic institutions and processes, insisting on building a nation of shared values and a shared identity on which the well-being of everyone is secured. I want to digress for a minute and speak to the issue of indigenous rights.

Quite often if you speak about indigenous rights in this country, immediately the intellectually lazy way of dealing with this issue is to scream racism. But I think a more careful and more nuanced approach at looking at indigenous rights, putting things in perspective, is helpful. We cannot, I believe, move forward unless there is a collective understanding and acceptance of the fact that the indigenous people of this country, by virtue of their indigeneity, have a special place deserving of recognition.

Special does not mean superior. For too long, attempts at addressing by way of affirmative action the situation of our indigenous brothers and sisters has been dismissed and even derided. Mr. Chairman and Commissioners, it is possible to bring about greater economic empowerment of Fiji's indigenous people in a way that does not discriminate against the other races. The mistake is to conceive of these concepts in a way that is binary. I believe that the wealth deficit between the different races will be the key to Fiji's long-term peace and security. If the indigenous people feel secure, then the rest of us feel secure.

If they feel marginalized, then that is not good for our long-term peace and security. I want to talk now about some specific topics within the Constitution. The first point I wish to make is on languages. English, of course, is the language of government, the language of the courts, the language of parliament. Pretty much, more or less, the language of commerce, although, of course, different people speak Hindi and Fijian and other minority languages. But recognizing the historically diminished use and status of the indigenous language of Fiji, I believe that the state must take practical and positive measures to elevate the status and advance the use of the Taukei language.

Again, I qualify that by saying it is not to be the official language of Fiji. It's one of the official languages. In a speech made in 2001, the late Ratu Joni Madraiwiwi a former vice president of Fiji, who you would never accuse of being racist, said, and I quote, already the character of this country has become more appreciably Fijian. That is neither good nor bad in itself. It is merely a fact. So I think on the last statistic that I saw, the Taukei comprise about 63-65% of the population.

And Ratu Joni continues. For that reason, now is perhaps the time to begin considering the adoption of Fijian as the national language. So, national, not official. I say that without prejudice to other languages, particularly Hindi. But if we are to build a national identity, let it begin with the language of the first indigenous inhabitants of these islands. It would have the advantage of giving a protected status.

Language is the core of one's identity. For it allows us to express our feelings and outlook in our own terms. In this era of globalization, Fijians will not long survive if sustained efforts are not made to protect it. And he then ends by asking a question. Without it, where will the Fijian people be? End of quote. I now turn to a different topic, which is one that has excited a great deal of interest in your nationwide travails. And that's section four of the Constitution, which says in the short title, secular state. And I've been listening and reading with great interest calls for Fiji to be a Christian state. For the record, let me state that I'm a Christian.

I'm a Roman Catholic. So I set out in my written submissions the whole of section four. Now, there have been a number of calls in your journey around Fiji that calls for references to secular state be removed. And a number of submittees have asked or submitted that Fiji should be declared in the body of the Constitution to be a Christian state. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a misunderstanding of what exactly is a secular state. From my understanding of the Constitution, the purpose of a secular state is to prohibit politics and religion mixing to the extent that it may be humanly possible.

Now, secularization is not a rejection or absence of religion. It is certainly, in my view, not a rejection of Christianity or any other religion for that matter. Those that conceive of Fiji as a Christian state might not recognize the danger that a fundamentalist government at some future time might seek to force Christianity of all of the people of this country.

You can do it in the kingdom of Tonga, which is culturally and religiously homogeneous. But I think that kind of religious chauvinism is unlikely to work in a country such as Fiji. It's likely to be a point of division and not a point of unity. The last thing we want is to end up being a theocratic state, like a country such as Iran, where the machinery of the state and the machinery of religion are inextricably linked and one and the same. A secular state is neutral as far as religion is concerned. It does not favor one religion over another.

It may allow voluntary religious observance within state institutions, such as prayer in state schools. Mr. Chairman, in my view, secularism is not an argument against Christianity. It does not question Christian principles or indeed the beliefs of any religion. It is essentially a political and legal doctrine that government and religious institutions must be independent of each other and kept separate. So when I've been reading the newspapers and listening to calls for Fiji to be declared a Christian state, I've asked myself, what exactly do they mean? How does a state become Christ-like? How does a state, how does a country become Christ-like? Do they mean that the official religion of Fiji should be Christian? Can a country become like Christ? How does elevating Christianity as the state religion sit in a country where we have significant minorities that practice other religions? In my view, the best way the country can become a Christian state is for those who profess to be Christians to be more Christ-like in their daily lives and the way they treat their neighbor. I don't know my Bible very well, most Catholics don't, but I think the Methodists here in this room will understand the Bible, the St. James Version.

I think the greatest commandment is love. If you love your neighbor, the Bible doesn't say your neighbor has the same skin color as you or the same hair or type or eat the same food. Your neighbor in the Bible is such a large expression. Your neighbor is anybody really. So, the best way we can practice Christianity is to love our neighbor. So, I do not support calls for Fiji to be made a Christian state.

I'm content for Section 4 to remain, that we should remain a secular state. You'll be opening a Pandora's box if you decide to tweak Section 4. Now I want to turn to Section 5. This is controversial where there's a big pronouncement, all citizens of Fiji shall be known as Fijians. And that has really irked a lot of people and I think I can understand why.

We've passed the stage now of everybody knowing that this was an imposed constitution. Nobody was consulted on this. I think two people somewhere did a hatchet job and came up with this. They thought that if we legislate us all being called Fijians, we'll suddenly wake up one morning loving each other because this is a unifying characteristic. Nobody in this country is a non-Fijian, we're all Fijians. Well, that's all well and good if it's come through a democratic process.

But if somebody on the Mount of Olives decrees this without consulting the original group of persons who were described by the British since 1874 in the Fijian Affairs Act, they're Fijians and Indians and they're general electors. I believe sincerely that all of us accept the wisdom of having a common name. A common name. But the common name that we choose should reflect a broad consensus of what we should call ourselves. If the indigenous people of this country for 100 plus years have self-identified themselves as Fijian and then they wake up one morning and then the constitution says everybody is Fijian and they haven't been consulted. For those people, not for me, for those people there's a sense of they've taken a part of who we are without asking us.

I think that's the point of grievance that we should recognize. So, in 1944 the Fijian Affairs Board, Fijian Affairs Ordinance was established or re-established to regulate indigenous affairs. And the legal expression Fijian to refer to the indigenous people of this country was replicated in the 1970s, the 1990s, and the 1997 constitutions. And the word Fijian was explicitly used to refer to the indigenous people of this country in contradistinction to the other races. But as a result of the Fijian Affairs Amendment Decree 2010, it decreed that wherever the word Fijian is any law of Fiji, it should be replaced with the word Taukei. So, I think that's a sore point for a lot of people.

So, the incentive to call everyone in this country Fijian has its origins in efforts to find a common name for all who call this country home. If the truth be told, Mr. Chairman, we remain still a nation of ethnically separate communities with a nascent national identity that is still being developed. But we're making progress.

And the late Ratu Joni Madraiwiwi said, and I quote, our collective sense of nationhood of being Fiji citizens only manifests itself on the occasion of great sporting victories or national tragedies. You know, when Serevi comes back from the World Cup and brings the gold medal from Rio, people come out in their hundreds. When we see our team play sevens in Vancouver, the majority of the people there are Indo-Fijian brothers and sisters.

So sports has a great way of unifying our people. So as I mentioned, the description Fijian to describe all citizens of this country, regrettably, is controversial and has had a polarizing influence. So I'd say a bit more in my written submissions on this. In the Reeves Commission, which I had referred to earlier, which led to the 1997 Constitution, Sir Paul Reeves, Tom Forthora, and Brij Lal, they thought that the common name for people living in this country should be Fiji Islander was appropriate for all who live in this country. You know, we have Cook Islanders, we have the Cocoa Islands. So, I mean, something for you to think about when we get to this stage.

The SDL party's submissions to the Yashgai Commission was not against a common name. Its view was that if all citizens were to be called Fijian, this must be done following consultations and with the agreement of the native Fijians and all the other races in Fiji. I will end this part on a common name, just by referring, some of my Rotuman friends are totally up in arms when I refer to them as Fijian, and they remonstrate, I'm not a Fijian, I'm a Rotuman.

So, nobody consulted me. So, the Rotuman on your commission is not here, but anyway. So, this person said to me, I don't want to be called Fijian, I'm a proud Rotuman. I said, well, good for you. So, that's the problem with imposing a common name when the issue is a little more intricate, more complex than that. And a significant number of people in this country do not speak the Fijian language or live the Fijian way of life or practice Fijian customs or traditions.

In a speech delivered in June 2018, Biman Prasad, the current leader of the NFP, said, and I quote, In position of a common name does not promote common and equal citizenry. In position of a common name does not promote or achieve equality, dignity and justice for our ordinary people. In position of a common name does not promote meritocracy in recruitment and appointment to positions, particularly in the civil service and our security forces, equal opportunities and a sense of pride and patriotism.

End of quote. In my research preparing these submissions for your commission, Mr. Chairman, I came across an editorial comment in the Fiji Times on the 9th of March 1970, just before independence, on a debate on a common name on the eve of independence. And the editorial said, and I quote, "No hasty decisions can be taken on a matter of such importance as a common name in any multi racial society" but it is obvious that the Fijian people themselves and their leaders feel that with the approach of dominion status for Fiji a common national name is necessary. What it should be will need a lot of thought by people of all races and at all levels of community life.

So this debate has been going on for more than 30 years. I think it's time to come to closure, but in a consultative democratic way that meets the broad acceptance of all the people of this country. So I'm going to fast track here and talk about the Bill of Rights, which is Chapter 2. The Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy. It enshrines the rights of all our people and affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom. Mr. Chairman and fellow commissioners, the Bill of Rights, when you look at it in Chapter 2, looks impressive at first glance. You had all these wonderful rights, freedom of assembly, information, privacy, education, environmental rights, rights of children, rights to health.

But if you look at it more carefully, many of the rights have been limited. The state does not have to justify laws limiting rights before an independent court on the grounds that they are necessary in a free and democratic society, unlike the 1997 Constitution. Instead, the government will usually only have to show that the limitation is reasonable. So the expression reasonable is very subjective. So I would respectfully draw your attention to the Bill of Rights and to look closely at the claw back provisions which limit the rights which, on the one hand, are purported to be granted to citizens. Although the rights provided for in the 2013 Constitution are generally consistent with the main human rights covenants and treaties, the extent of the guarantee of true protection for the exercise of those rights, in my view, is severely limited in a number of ways.

If you turn to Section 6 of Section 5, it permits restrictions which are potentially unlimited on the rights by ordinary statutes, whereas it is normal for possible limitations or regulation of rights to be defined by constitutional provisions. And as I've mentioned earlier, the Constitution itself permits very broad restrictions on particular rights. Mr. Chairman and fellow commissioners, in my view, any limitations on any rights must be reasonable and justifiable, as would be the case in a free and democratic society. I now wish to turn to Section 26, subsection 3A, on non-discrimination. It is noted that there has been a suggestion to delete the words sexual orientation, gender identity, and expression from Section 26, 3A. International precedents and jurisprudence indicate that discrimination on the grounds of sex covers discrimination on the basis of sexuality.

And in my written submissions, which I'm happy to share with the Secretariat later, I refer to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States going back to 2020. I quote three decisions there. And in one of those cases, the court held that direct discrimination because of sexual orientation or gender presentation was a form of direct discrimination because of sex.

And Justice Gorsuch, writing for the majority in the Supreme Court of the United States, said, and I quote, It is impossible to discriminate against a person for being homosexual or transgender without discriminating against that individual based on sex. So I'm sure in your available time you'll be able to look at those cases and unpack the reasoning. So if you discriminate against people on the basis of sexual orientation, it's a form of prohibited discrimination on the ground of sex.

The word sex in international legal precedents and cases extends to sexuality. And in the European Court of Human Rights, gender identity has been recognized as a separate and prohibited ground of discrimination. My hope, Mr. Chairman, is that we can live in a nation where tolerance is exalted and that people will not be judged by who they love, but by the content of their character. Now this is a new submission. I want to suggest for the Commission's consideration. We've got some unfinished business here in the Constitution.

And we can see that some of the Constitution of 2013 has not been operationalized. But from memory, there was an accountability commission. And we've never had it established. So I would like to suggest for your consideration that the Constitution be amended to establish a commission for racial harmony and national unity. You know, on Ratu Sukuna Day, and Human Rights Day, and Girmits Day, and all national holidays, people make these great speeches and prescriptions about national unity. And then it just fades away.

But if you look at social media, there's still a rather robust and loud minority that is continuing to make deeply offensive remarks about sending Indians back to India. I mean, like, in this day and age? Give me a break. So what I'm trying to say, Mr. Chairman, is we can't build national unity just by making speeches.

There have to be policies and institutions strengthened to work systematically to building national unity and eliminating racial prejudice, whether you're strengthening the Public Order Act or you're strengthening hate speech based on the ground of race, but having a national unity commission. It is evident, in my view, that race relations in Fiji and national unity need to be strengthened and improved, and that state intervention is needed. We can't just live together without state intervention.

National unity is vital to the long-term success of this nation. It is the foundation of our country's prosperity and success by providing the stability for investment, reducing conflict-related risks, and encouraging collaboration, collaborative effort across the racial divide. Harmonious race relations will promote social cohesion and trust, boosting consumer confidence, attracting investment, and align diverse interests towards shared national goals, increasing productivity and prosperity for all our country.

So what I'm trying to say in simple terms is national unity should be a key goal, but it shouldn't just be left to chance and to individuals. State intervention through a commission for racial harmony and national unity. For too long, it has been assumed that the different races that now call Fiji home will coexist.

But there has never been, in my view, any systematic and state-sponsored plan or action to improve race relations and to promote national unity in a positive and affirmative way through state policy and institutions. So, I recommend that the constitution should establish a commission for racial harmony and national unity to comprise three commissioners, and the granular details can be left to legislation to be passed by parliament, enabling legislation. The commission for racial harmony and national unity must promote respect for racial harmony, tolerance, and reconciliation, and the protection, development, and attainment of racial harmony, tolerance, reconciliation, and national unity.

My paper then goes on to say it will have the power, as regulated by national legislation, necessary to perform its functions, including the power to monitor, promote, investigate, research, educate, lobby, and advise the government on issues concerning racial harmony, tolerance, reconciliation, and national unity. I see the clock is moving very quickly. Section 40.

I'll have to skip over this very quickly. I've recommended that the environmental rights provisions in the constitution be strengthened. On qualification of voters, which is section 55, obviously the right to vote of all citizens is fundamental in a democracy, and one of the most powerful aspects of voting is its ability to ensure that the voices of all our citizens are heard, especially those from marginalized communities who are often forgotten.

In a democracy, every eligible person, regardless of race, gender, income, or background, should have an equal right to participate in the electoral process. It goes without saying that this is essential to promote equity and fairness, and ensuring that diverse perspectives are represented in government decision-making. If you look, if you open your constitutions, which you probably know by heart by now, after several months, section 55.2, and it says section 55 deals with voter qualification and registration.

Look at, if you may, with respect, it says a person who is serving a sentence of imprisonment for 12 months or longer does not have the right to be registered as a voter. I have a view of that. The person is already serving a jail term, which is their punishment. It could be robbery of violence, lastly from the person, act with intent or whatever, gone in for 12 months or longer. Why should they be deprived of their right to vote? To me that's double punishment. They're still a citizen of the country.

They're not an adjudicated bankrupt. They're serving time under a penalty of law, criminal conviction. I believe that that provision is unfair, and I would urge you to look at it so that prisoners that are serving 12 months or longer are able to exercise their democratic right to vote for a person or a candidate of their choice in the general elections. I think that measure is double punishment. Then, just on to another topic, I turn to section 82 of the constitution, which deals with the powers of the president. The president acts on advice.

The president of Fiji is not an executive president like the president of the United States. It's the prime minister who's the chief executive of this country, not the president. You know and I know that the president is titular in the sense that he or she has ceremonial duties and functions, cutting ribbons and cutting cakes and opening bazaars and that sort of stuff, and consulted on other matters.

But there's a real danger of overreach if the president starts second-guessing the prime minister because it's the prime minister in whom the powers of leading or governing this country. So just on section 82, I would urge you to look at that, and if it needs strengthening, from time to time we hear suggestions that the president of this country has prerogative powers. Well, the crown went and was removed in September 1987, and the British crown, through the ages, the crown had prerogative powers.

Those prerogative powers are no longer, and sometimes we hear even lawyers talking now with this constitution, Oh, where did the president get the powers to do this? Oh, he's got prerogative powers. It should be made clear in section 82 that there are no longer any prerogative powers in the president. So the appointment of the president in section 84, in the 1997 constitution, I think the president came to the GCC, and I know even some of my Fijian and Turkey friends want that back.

The president is not president of one race or one political party or one segment of the population. The president is the head of state of all of us. So I would ask that you consider a method of appointing the president that is democratic and reflects a broad consensus of the people.

Because under the 2013 constitution, we know that the political parties nominate a candidate for president and he or she is elected on the floor of parliament. So obviously the majority party that's in government will have the numbers. And so in a sense, the president comes through a politically partisan process.

I'm not talking now specifically about this president or this electoral process that led to the appointment of his excellency. I'm just talking more generally that I believe that section 84 in the appointment of the president, I would encourage you to look at a broad process rather than a narrow one. On the appointment of the chief justice in section 88, section 88 of the constitution deals with the acting chief justice, acting president.

Section 88 says when the president is away from Fiji or for any reason unable to perform his or her duties, it's the chief justice that acts as president. I think that provision is fraught with difficulty. You know, the chief justice is chairman of the Judicial Services Commission.

And then when you've got the JSC suing the president, there's a conflict of interest. And also it fudges the lines between the three branches of government. You've got the executive, you've got the judiciary, and you've got the three branches, the executive, the legislature.

So again, I would encourage you to look at the appointment of the acting president. Why not make the speaker, as is the case in many other countries, if the president is indisposed or unavailable, then that's a safer option. But to bring the judiciary in, and if there's a case against the president for misconduct, I think it's the chief justice that sets up the tribunal.

So we're kind of tying ourself up there in knots. I'm in support, Mr. Chairman and fellow commissioners, of the Bose Levu Vakaturaga being restored to its constitutional status as it was in the 1907 constitution. On the electoral system, which is chapter three, I'm sure if you ask the prime minister's office, you'll be able to see a copy of the Fatiaki committee report, which was delivered in July last year, but it hasn't seen the light of day.

So a lot of the thinking on the electoral system has already been done. And that's really the opening up a can of worms there because we're very late into the election season now. So rather than reinvent the wheel, you might wish to give some consideration to some of the main features of that Fatiaki report.

Now, I think there are serious deficiencies in the electoral system contained in the constitution. And a number of submittees around the country have already expressed their concern that there is no link of the members of parliament to any particular constituency. Now, if you look at the constitution, it talks about a single national role.

It doesn't talk about a single national constituency. So I think that provision in the constitution has been misinterpreted. So in my humble submission, we should go back to multiple constituencies.

So you look at the 55 current MPs, they serve the whole of Fiji. So if you're a cane farmer in the middle of Seaqaqa which of those 55 members is your local MP? Or if you're a villager at the bottom of Vatoa in the Lau group and you have a problem with island shipping or the cost of groceries coming in by transport, whatever, which of those 55 MPs do you go to? So we need a restoration of multiple constituencies serving discrete demographics within certain areas. Because I can tell you now, again, something you already know, the constituency needs of somebody at Udu Point will be very different from somebody who lives in Nabulalevu.

Or somebody who lives in Nabukaluka in the middle of Naitasiri. Or somebody who lives in Makoi or Caubati in Suva. We have urban needs and dwellers.

We have rural needs and dwellers. And their needs and aspirations and interests vary widely across the country. When you don't have local MPs, the MPs are at wild, so to speak.

They're carte blanche. They are not held accountable by anybody. Whereas in the old days, when you had communal seats, Nandi communal or Nandi open, there's a geographic confine that their local MP, they could go to if there was a drainage problem in Yako, outside Nadi or Sabeto, in the cane districts.

Now it's just like free for all. And it's not working. And people don't like it.

So I would again respectfully draw that to your attention and suggest that something be done about that. The other issue that I had for your consideration is section 50, subsection 2C. Just bear with me for a second.

Yeah, there is this provision. I can't seem to get my hand on it at the moment. But if you want to stand for Parliament and you're part of the Fiji diaspora living in Vancouver or Wellington or Sydney, you have to be a resident in Fiji two years before the election.

That's the electoral act. It's an electoral act, is it? But I think it's also in the constitution.

Ms Nailatikau: I believe, Mr. Leung, that might be section 56.

Mr Graham Leung: Just bear with me for a second. Yes, sorry, 56, 56, 2C. Thank you, Ms. Nailatikau, 56, 2C.

So this lady keeps reminding me. Maybe I shouldn't say her name, but Ellen Whippy. She keeps calling me and saying, you know, can this, she lives in Sydney.

Anybody knows Ellen knows that she's not shy with her views on anything. And she wants to stand for Parliament. I said, you can't.

She said, I can't leave my family for two years and come in and satisfy this two-year requirement. All I'm trying to say, Mr. Chairman, is that we have a lot of good people that have Fiji at heart. And they may have migrated 10 years ago, 5 years ago, 15 years ago.

They still hold Fiji passports. And they want to come and serve this country, bringing their wealth and expertise. But this two-year rule is onerous.

Can you give some consideration to looking at that and maybe making the residential requirement more reasonable? Say three months or six months. Nobody's going to leave their family for two years just to satisfy the residential requirements to be a candidate. I think when you do that, you are excluding people that have the potential to serve our Parliament and serve our people through the Parliament.

So two years, I think I know why it was there. But, you know, it's a chance for you as commissioners to make a recommendation to make the residential requirements a little more flexible. Oh, yes, my favorite is Section 53.3. That's the 5% rule, which you would have heard all about.

It's, people have commented on this Dehont system. And the 5% rule means that unless you receive 5% of the votes cast, that's 53.3. A political party or an independent candidate shall not qualify for any seat in Parliament unless the particular party or independent candidate receives at least 5% of the total votes cast. I would urge you to look at that and see whether it should be changed and why, because it's quite a high threshold.

So you can be a candidate from the Unity Party like Save Narube and receive 6,000 votes. And not meet the 5% rule, which is on the last elections around 32,000. And yet you could be Candidate X for Party Y and receive 500 votes.

And because your number is small and you piggyback onto the leader's number, I think you people went somewhere in Lau and then one man there said, he used the Fijian expression, Kanaloto, you got a free ride.

So somebody got 500 votes, jumped on the bandwagon of somebody who got 120,000 votes, and that was their vehicle to get into Parliament. So when there's cynicism about an electoral system, it erodes trust in that system.

The system has to be credible so people can relate to it. They can't understand, and I can understand why. How come so-and-so got 5,000 votes, didn't get in? I mean that's some people's version of democracy, but I don't accept that.

So I would urge you to look at that. Then moving on, Section 64. Presently no elections take place in the event of a death or resignation.

In many countries where they have elected Parliaments, a by-election is a useful barometer to test the popularity and value of a government mid-term. So if you've got a government of four years or five years even, or even three years, the Australian Parliament's federal election has three-year terms. If there's a by-election in 18 months because a member for Wentworth has resigned, then everybody goes to the polls and you can question the government and say, OK, we want a new person to replace us.

With this system, in this constitution, the person next on the list with the next highest number comes in automatically. And in one way you save money not having to run a by-election, but in another way you deprive people of going to the polls for the government to refresh its mandate or to elect a new candidate to reflect people's disgust or disappointment with the performance of the government. No such flexibility exists with Section 64.

I have a lot to say on Chapter 5, which is the judiciary. I think it's important for the judges to have tenure. In the last 16 years, we had Sri Lankans coming here left, right and centre, and most of them were on three-year short-term contracts.

And they kind of knew because Fiji's a small place. If you made a decision that was perceived to be anti-government and offended one or two people, you knew you were on the next plane out. So, if you have tenure to strengthen judicial independence, then you shouldn't be afraid as a judge of making decisions that would displease the politicians.

So, I say a lot more in my written submissions. Just on the retiring age of judges, Section 110, you've got different retiring ages. For the Chief Justice, the President of the Court of Appeal, Supreme Court judges and judges of appeal, the retiring age is 75.

But for High Court judges, the retiring age is 70. And I would urge you to look at that and see whether there's a need for rationalizing and making more consistent the retiring age of the judges. People are living longer.

Remember, of course, that's one extremity. In the United States, the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court are elected for life. And in President Obama's time, he was hoping that Justice Ginsburg would resign so he could have a democratic candidate.

But she died at the age of 90 or something, 92. And she sat on the Supreme Court until the very end. So, obviously, we don't want people that have Alzheimer's sitting on the court.

But in relation to Section 110, please look at the retiring age of judges and see if you can rationalize that to make it consistent across the whole pyramid or spectrum of judges. On the appointment of the judges, removal of the judges, the removal provisions in Section 111, Subsection 1, I would submit should be widened to include removal of the judges for gross misconduct. On FICAC, Section 115, everybody's favorite whipping boy, girl, let me be clear for the record.

I am not against anti-corruption efforts. I think we all understand that corruption bleeds the poor and costs the country in terms of development. I don't believe that FICAC should be a constitutional body.

It was birthed by decree in 2009 and it should remain in a decree. FICAC, in my view, needs a major reset. It can continue, in my view, as a normal Act of Parliament and there are similar bodies in places like Namibia, Singapore, Hong Kong and New South Wales.

If you look at the legislation, FICAC is even permitted to deal with sexual offences, prostitution offences and abortion offences that don't fall within its core purpose of being an anti-corruption body. And FICAC should, in my view, be confined to being an investigative body. At the moment, it's an investigative and a prosecution body.

When I started working in the DPP's office around 1984, the DPP's office was the only prosecution authority and I worked under Sailosi Kepa in those days. But now, we've got different prosecution agencies and there's been a blurring of functions and responsibilities which I think is confusing. So, this may be an opportunity for the Commission to reset that.

Has FICAC delivered? Well, I think you know the answer to that as well as I do. I'm not going to say more than that. Section 117, subsection 5. Yes, it's interesting.

In Section 117, subsection 5, this Supra person in the DPP, he's appointed or she's appointed for seven years. That's quite a long period and I would urge the Commission to consider a reduction of the term of appointment of the DPP and to reduce it. We want a DPP that is not beholden to the executive and independent but to give the DPP a fixed term of seven years, I think is a bit long.

On the role of the military in Section 131, it goes without saying that it's universal practice that the military has no place in governance and politics. It's answerable to the elected government of the day. It's subordinate to civic governance.

And the principle of political control of the military is rooted in the concept of representative democracy. It refers to the supremacy of civilian institutions based on popular sovereignty over the army and security policy-making apparatus. In my view, the Constitution should embed clear constitutional guarantees to protect the state, including the armed forces, from two types of potential dangers, from politicians who have clear military ambitions and from military with political ambitions.

It must establish a clear legal and constitutional framework defining the basic relationship between the state and the military. In a democracy, the military is meant to be politically neutral to prevent any possibility of military intervention in civic and political affairs. When you look at Section 131, subsection 2, the language that the RFMF has overall responsibility to ensure at all times the security, defense and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians, that expression is pregnant with ambiguity and has given an appetite in some quarters for the military to second-guess what the elected government of the day is doing or not doing.

I think that needs to be remedied. In my view, on the face of it, those words do not provide a constitutional basis for military intervention in domestic politics or matters. Yet, when read in the light of the Constitution's enactment and justification, it appears that there is a segment of opinion that has regarded Section 131, subsection 2 as intended to affirm the assumption of the military as the extra-constitutional guardian of not only the entire citizenry, but also the 2013 Constitution.

So, I would urge you to look at that very closely. In its submission to the Guy Commission, the RFMF stated that its primary mission is to be the guidance of the governance of this country. It was based on thinking that the army was to be the last bastion of law and order to deal with both internal and external threats.

In my view, that's a bit of a stretch. In a democracy, the role of protecting the Constitution is the responsibility of the courts, the judiciary, and parliament. The military is only called out at the direction and request of government.

It is not the responsibility of the army to interpret or preempt the will of the people. And there's nothing extraordinary about that. It just reflects universal practice and principles, what I'm saying about the military being subservient to the elected government of the day.

You can't have two centers or two repositories of power. Okay, Section... If you look at the Constitution, there's an extraordinary concentration of power in this duet, the Prime Minister and the Attorney General. The Constitution refers to the Prime Minister 111 times and to the Attorney General 66 times.

So these were virtually persons who had accumulated through the Constitution vast amounts of power in their constitutional offices. In my view, this is something that needs serious reflection because when you vest so much power in individuals, it undermines democracy and it is dangerous putting so much power in the hands of two people. Together, the Attorney General and the Prime Minister control nearly all the appointments to the judiciary and the independent constitutional commissions as well as other senior state service appointments.

So the concentration of powers means that the positions is largely held unaccountable. And I expand that in some detail in my written submissions. I turn to Section 173, the constitutional protection of promulgations and decrees.

I would urge you to consider possibly removing or diluting those protections. The military regime after the 2006 coup enacted 103 promulgations after the coup between April 2009 and the abrogation of the Constitution of 1997 and 328 decrees between the abrogation and the 2014 election. So a total of 431 laws were either promulgated or decreed.

Many of those laws contained ouster clauses denying judicial challenge to them. For example, Decree 51, which completely changed the pension formula for pensioners, that was by decree. And because of the ouster clauses in Section 173, they can't be challenged.

So it is something that you might wish to look at. I see a lot of people have called for removal of immunity in Chapter 11. I will say this, when you grant immunity, it sends a dangerous signal that the violent or unlawful seizure of power is ultimately tolerable, provided it succeeds.

This undermines democratic stability in institutions and it lowers the deterrent threshold against future unconstitutional interventions. Historical experience, Mr. Chairman, Commissioners, strongly supports the conclusion that failure to hold military actors accountable encourages further defiance of civilian authority. Legal impunity for military actors undermines the rule of law by creating a category of persons effectively shielded from accountability.

The rule of law demands that all persons, regardless of influence, rank or office, are subject to the rule of law. Immunity provisions for coup perpetrators fundamentally contradicts this principle. And the dangers of impunity and immunity are not theoretical.

They simply are borne out by real world experience and demonstrated in many countries. So they offer a stark and cautionary example that we in Fiji can learn from. It is imperative that Fiji moves away from the practice of granting immunity to coup perpetrators.

If Fiji is to strengthen the integrity of its rule of law and secure long-term democratic stability, in my view it is essential that immunity for future coup perpetrators cease. I think it's a lot more challenging for past events, but moving into the future, it's something that needs to be discouraged. So in light of my submissions, I would urge that the CRC consider protections that ensure no future legislative or constitutional enactments can grant immunity from prosecution to any coup perpetrator.

Protections that ensure no future laws or constitutional amendments to grant immunity. The explicit recognition of coups as criminal acts constituting treason, and the complete exclusion of provisions granting immunity to individuals involved in any future unconstitutional seizures of power. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that Fiji must act decisively to break the cycle of coups and immunity that has left a mark in our constitutional history.

Anyone found guilty of treason should be banned for life from standing for any political office government board, committee, or instrumentality, and this should be written into the Constitution. I turn to Chapter 11 on constitutional amendment. The opinion of the Supreme Court in August 2025 reducing the threshold for changing the Constitution.

This is your chance now to rewrite that and give effect to whatever the Supreme Court decided, but instead of three quarters, two thirds. I suggest respectfully to the Commission that the Commission should make it mandatory to have a periodic review of the Constitution every ten years. It is a living, dynamic document, and the opportunity to revisit its workings will ensure that it is responsive to changing circumstances and fit for purpose.

There's nothing sinister about this. The Constitution is an evolving, dynamic document. Where it is rigid and unamenable, it becomes brittle and unworkable.

Of course, the demographics will change as the outward immigration continues, and we start having other people here. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman and fellow Commissioners, I trust that when you implement your instructions and finalize your work, you will bear in mind the words of Fiji's national anthem, Land of Freedom, Hope and Glory, and that your report reflects the high aspirations of our national anthem, which resonate more strongly today. In conclusion, may I commend to you the words of the Honorable Prime Minister when he told Parliament on the 30th of April this year, and I quote, the Constitution is not just a legal document, it affects how we live, how we are represented, and how decisions are made about our future.

This is a process of profound national importance. It must reflect the real aspirations and diversity of our people. Let us work together to bring about constructive changes to our Constitution, a Constitution which embodies the values of equity, justice and freedom, and delivers the promise of a multicultural society to fruition.

It promises a unified nation that draws strength from our unique character and from our diversity. Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, in conclusion, it is my fervent hope and prayer that you will have the courage and the vision to reset our supreme law, and that you will future-proof our Constitution to withstand the pressures of partisanship and vested interests bent on putting self before the national good, that you will not succumb to expedient, but do what is right for Fiji. And I have full confidence, when I look across the table, that you have the ability and the conviction and the wisdom to rise to the occasion.

I thank you. Happy to take any questions.

Mr Valenitabua: Thank you very much, Mr. Leung, for a lifetime comprehensive submission.

I must say we have been directed to various provisions in the Constitution, which we need to look at and we will look at during our deliberations after submissions have been finalized or collected and finalized. Now I inquire of the Commissioners if they have any comments or questions which they would like to make or ask Mr. Leung. Mr. Kohli.

Mr Kohli: Thank you, Mr. Leung, very interesting hearing you, very comprehensive, and thank you for enlightening us about various sections of the Constitution. My only one query from you is how do you reconcile the fact that on one breath you are saying that we should have a constituency where people are represented, people should be able to see their MP, identify who they are and raise issues, and with the other breath you are saying that to reduce the residency period of people staying overseas to three months, so they come here in three months, they win the election, and they disappear. How do you address that issue?

Mr Graham Leung: Thank you, Mr. Kohli, for that question I don't see those issues as sitting in tension with one another.

Obviously, if a person comes from, say, Sydney and decides to live in, say, Tamavua, Ragg Avenue, for three months before the election, and Ragg Avenue comprises a constituency covering part of Greater Suva, then if they are elected the people that live in that constituency have that person to relate to, so to speak, because he or she will be living there. So, I don't see that as a big difficulty, but obviously if the person loses, which is probably likely because if you have come from overseas and you have been living there for ten years, a lot of people have forgotten probably who you are. That difficulty would only arise if the person is elected, but they would be living in a physical locality and the people that live in that constituency would, in principle, hold that person to be accountable as being their local MP.

They kind of won't disappear. So, if Parliament, if they're elected to Parliament, Parliament's a four-year term. That Parliament would sit every month.

So, I don't see that as an immense practical difficulty. In any event, the chances of somebody from overseas who's disappeared or left Fiji for many years coming back and being elected, I think the chances would be quite slim.

Ms Nailatikau: Thank you, Mr. Leung.

It caught my attention, your submission relating to the possibility of by-elections, for example, when a representative either passes away or resigns and drawing examples from the United States, for example, where by-elections happen for either senators or representatives who represent a state or a district, would you be suggesting this as by-elections for Fiji with multiple constituencies as opposed to the current model that takes place or would that also be a nationwide election, for example?

Mr Graham Leung: If we had constituencies and only the people in that constituency would vote, it wouldn't be nationwide. It wouldn't involve other people.

Ms Nailatikau: Thank you.

I just wanted to check if that assumption was correct. And finally, forgive me if this takes things beyond what you might be willing to share, but particularly relating to the matter of a common national identity, it comes to be quite apparent that national unity or cohesion can't be something that is imposed. It's something that has to be reached by everyday common people in terms of being able to see themselves as common citizens and equal citizens.

Relating to arriving at a national identity, might this be something that you see your proposed Commission for National Unity and Racial Harmony play a role in, for instance?

Mr Graham Leung: Absolutely, yes. I see this proposed commission as playing a very important role in building coherence, building national unity, and seeking to promote the virtues of tolerance, coexistence, and racial harmony, not leaving it to chance in terms of broad speeches which politicians tend to make from time to time, and bringing along a population with them so that we work actively to promote racial harmony rather than just hoping that it will happen by chance. Mr. Begg has a question, I think, Mr. Chairman.

Mr Beg: Yes, Mr. Begg, please carry on. Thank you, Chair, through you. Thank you, Mr. Leung.

Very compelling submission. You know, I think it's very learned and fares well for me. There are a couple of things that excite me a bit in your submission.

There's the section on immunity, and your threat, if I can use the words, and the way it's framed is that, you know, the immunity hasn't come about from the 2013 Constitution. It's been with us since 1987, so that framework of immunity has promulgated itself through the various years and constitutions, and I'm not an expert in this, I must say, but it baffles me as well that through that historical foundation of this, how the immunity has come about has been born, to take some of your words, through that term, and I welcome your thoughts about it not being threats moving forward, but I was wanting to seek, because we have a Supreme Court ruling as well around this sensitive matter, and to add further to this is the question of settlement in the historical events. I just wanted to ask your views on that.

Mr Graham Leung: I think, well, I thought, Mr. Beg, that you mentioned the word threat. I'm not a person by disposition or personality that is inclined to make threats, so I just wanted to make that clear, but look, I think we recognize that immunity is a complex issue and that it needs careful reflection. If you go back to 1987, that was, as I mentioned, that was the defining event which, 14th of May, 1987, I remember very vividly that day because I was a legal advisor to the Fiji Police Force based at Ratu Sukuna House, so I remember that fateful day.

So what happened was the 1990 Constitution, which was an imposed one, then the 1997 Constitution, which had bipartisan support in both Houses of Parliament and the GCC, and then the 2013 Constitution. All of those constitutions have provided for and perpetuated this immunity. So it's been with us for, what, 30 years or so.

Now, if you take 1987 as a starting point, not just the perpetrators of the coup, but those that took part in various ways, at various levels, whether it be policemen or soldiers or navy or civil servants, judges, lawyers, I'm not suggesting that all of those, that it is humanly possible to prosecute all those people going back if you lift the cover of immunity from prosecution because it would be an administrative and legal and constitutional nightmare going back that long, covering hundreds of people. And we need to be careful we don't go down a rabbit warren, which we can't get out of because it's sensitive and difficult and complex. What I had in mind was moving forward, I think the Constitution should work, maybe say a couple of paragraphs on that, but perhaps leave the immunity as it is for now because it's embedded, but recognizing that it's a poison chalice that we need to do something about, make provision in the amendment bill in the Constitution and say explicitly that if you're going to do a coup in the future, this is the result and you won't get immunity from prosecution in the future and to send a warning to anybody out there who feels that they can use the precedent of the past as a get out of jail card in the future.

I think that's what I had in mind. And as I told the Truth and Reconciliation Commission a few months ago in an oral submission, I was reading somewhere that somebody stole a loaf of bread or something from the top shop and they went to jail for six months. I said in a different context, well, you can stage a coup and end up being prime minister and so there's a moral contradiction there.

It's very difficult for people trying to understand what's happening, how you can have two sets of rules when we talk about the rule of law. So I don't know what the answer is exactly. I'm not a constitutional law expert Mr Beg.

But that's my rather long-winded answer to your curly question.

Mr Beg: Thank you. I apologize if I came across as being threatening.

I was trying to primarily establish the foundations of your submission around this chapter, which is very exciting. Thank you.

Mr Valenitabua: Mr. Leung, relying on your experience, we had an interesting submission at the FNU last week.

The submission was presented by someone knowledgeable and educated The that all public servants and members of the disciplinary forces are to take an oath similar to the oath of affirmation and allegiance which are in the Constitution. I say similar because there was a slight difference submitted to us and the submission was that the oath was to be taken to the Constitution. That's it, to defend the Constitution of Fiji.

Now, the oath of allegiance, for example, states that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the Republic of Fiji, to the country according to law, and I will obey, observe, uphold, and maintain the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji. Now, that is, according to the submission which we received, it was to be changed to say that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji. Full stop.

It was interesting to us as we were sitting there. Dr. Gounder was there and Mr. Beg was there. With your experience and expertise, could you give us a comment in relation to that submission? Is the affirmation of allegiance and is the oath of allegiance? A slight difference.

Oath of allegiance to the Constitution and oath of allegiance to the Republic of Fiji. We were asked to differentiate and distinguish those two. It's a question.

If you are minded to answer, you can answer. Otherwise, we'll just keep it.

Mr Graham Leung: I mean, if you make an oath of allegiance to the country, it's the country.

Generically, it's Fiji or the State of Fiji. I think the oath of allegiance to the country is wider than the oath of allegiance to the Constitution. The Constitution is the supreme law of the country and it governs every other law in the country, subordinate to and bends to the will of the Constitution.

I can't see why you can't have both. I mean, given the upheavals we've had with extra constitutional usurpations of authority, I think it's important to commit to and promise to obey the Constitution. Because when we disobey the Constitution, that's when we have people thinking it's okay to go outside the Constitution to change the government.

Because the Constitution provides the machinery for a peaceful transition of power, the holding of elections to elect new governments or dismiss governments. So, I think we shouldn't go outside that. I'm in favor of both.

If you're a citizen of this country, you promise an oath of allegiance to this country, to Fiji, the country. But equally important, you promise with this oath or affirmation, you promise obedience to the Constitution. Provided it's the Constitution of the people that has been enacted through a democratic process.

Some people would have an objection to committing or making an oath to a Constitution which is imposed. But for now, it's the Supreme Law. I hope that answers the question.

It's a question that deserves closer reflection and consideration.

Mr Valenitabua: Thank you. And one more, please.

During our consultations throughout Fiji, there have been calls for the return of the Senate. Do you have a comment in relation to that?

Mr Graham Leung: I thought about that. You know, in 1917 and in the 1970 Constitution, we had a bicameral legislature.

And you must remember the 1970 Constitution which gave birth to the Senate and the bicameral legislature as part of the lawmaking machinery. We inherited from the British after constitutional discussions in 68,69 at Marlborough House in London. And the Senate had representatives of the Great Council of Chiefs as it was then known, or the BLV.

I believe the Senate was a British construct to protect the rights of the Indigenous people, especially with regard to amending legislation affecting Fijian land and Fijian interests. Now I think in this day and age, I wonder whether a Senate is relevant, not just in terms of the cost to government, but in terms of the lawmaking process. It is obvious that after a bill is passed by the House of Representatives as it was then known, it went to the Senate for the Senate's assent.

But to answer your question in a nutshell, I don't think a Senate is essential to good governance and to a democracy. New Zealand has a unicameral legislature. Australia at the federal level has the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Penny Wong is a Senator. I think the concept of the Senate is a colonial vestige. It harkens back to post-independence when the Constitution took a very paternalistic view that the indigenous Fijians needed that extra layer of constitutional protection.

Today, when I open Facebook, I see so many taukei graduates in PhDs in various fields. A lawyer friend of mine Romulo Nayacalevu recently got a PhD from the Australian National University. A lot of water has passed under the bridge since 1970.

I think we need to be designing a Constitution that is forward-looking and progressive and not overly nostalgic about a past that's been overtaken by events. It may have worked in 1970, it may have worked in 1997, but do we need it in 2026 moving forward? I don't know. That's my rhetorical answer to your question.

You always ask me the difficult questions.

Mr Valenitabua: Thank you very much. Thank you very much for those comments and answers.

We have been overtaken by time. We have two other sessions this afternoon. We thank you again for appearing before us.

You have taken us through the Constitution section by section, which we really appreciate. We will consider what has been submitted to us this morning from yourself. Thank you very much again.

We would like to take a photo session with you, please.

----------End of Session [29-6-2026]----------

SUBMISSIONS TO CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMISSION

By Graham Leung

Mr. Chairman, Members of the CRC

I welcome the opportunity to make a submission to the CRC because it gives me the chance to share with you my views on constitutional reform, and to some extent, the future of our country.

You have been appointed to perform a critical task at an important juncture in our nation's troubled and sometimes fractured history.

Heavy responsibilities have been placed on your shoulders.

You have travelled the length and breadth of our islands. – from Rukua to Rakiraki; from Nabukaluka to Nabouwalu.

The journey has been long and tiring, and I congratulate you for staying the course.

I recognise that your job is not to draft a new Constitution but to solicit the views of the people of Fiji as to what they think might need changing, and what if any parts should be retained in the present Constitution.

In some respects, you do not have a blank canvass and are not starting from scratch.

Essentially, you have been saddled with the responsibility of advising Government on how the 2013 Constitution can be improved upon.

The changes you recommend to the Constitution will not be an abstraction, but a set of guidelines for action which have grown out of our nation's aspirations and experiences.

My sense of what the nation's future might look like is conditioned by my understanding of Fiji's past history and current events.

I believe that our collective history, trauma and experience impose upon us all as citizens of this wonderful and sometimes troubled country, duties that we cannot avoid.

So much of what has happened in the past compel us to respond to some unpleasant and inconvenient truths. It is time to address them. We can no longer afford to sweep them under the mat.

So, as you near the finish line, in carrying out your solemn mandate, you must ask yourself: what kind of vision do you imagine for our country? What kind of legacy do you wish to bequeath to your children?

The original inhabitants of Fiji could not have imagined the profound changes that accompanied the colony following cession.

With indenture in 1879 came the first wave of Indians. Many remained and chose to remain in the country after the abolition of indenture. Subsequent waves of voluntary immigration followed with an influx of Indians from the state of Gujerat, Sikhs, labourers from the Solomons, Gilbertese, Chinese merchants and so on. Colonial policy dictated and influenced many of these events.

By the early 1960s, Fiji had become a rich tapestry of different races, largely subsisting in silos and essentially living separate and compartmentalised lives.

Independence in 1970 forced the country to deal with the realities of different ethnic groups which for a prolonged period had little to do with one another,

Many of the world events which are happening as we speak or which have taken place in our lifetime rightly give us just cause for pessimism.

A war rages in Ukraine; the Gaza strip has been pummelled with untold death. The status of the Strait of Hormuz remains uncertain.

At home one only has to pick up the newspapers to be reminded of a drug problem of near epidemic proportions, the world's highest HIV infections and depressing levels of poverty the likes of which we have not seen before.

These are not mere statistics.

We are talking about the lives of our fellow citizens many of whom for whatever reason, have been unable to realise their full potential, robbing them of a life of dignity and happiness.

But we have shown in the past, despite these troubling circumstances, that we have the resilience and strength to pick up the pieces and to soldier on. In spite of all the terrible things that have happened, our country has exhibited an enormous capacity for adaptation and survival.

However, it is not enough. Some of our finest minds have left our shores since that watershed event in 1987. We have lost both brains and capital as a result. And growing numbers continue to do so. The figures are depressing; some say in excess of 100,000 have left for greener pastures.

All the ethnic groups that make up our country today have strengthened and enriched Fiji with their cultures, their energies, their food and commitment. They have made our nation what it is today.

Our progress, at times disrupted and halting, reflects social and political challenges as well as economic ones.

We cannot turn the clock back even if we wished. Our past cannot be ignored or readily extinguished. What we can do is to learn the error of our ways and not repeat our past mistakes.

It is against this backdrop of both global and domestic events that the current constitutional review is taking place.

This review process which you are leading, presents a once in a lifetime chance to get things right, to rise above partisan political point scoring and to reset our constitutional foundations as a forward-looking country, embracing the rule of law and the values of equity, fairness and justice for all.

It must involve strengthening our democratic institutions and processes, insisting on building a nation of shared values and a shared destiny, on which the well-being of all is secured.

At the same time, we cannot move forward unless there is a collective understanding and acceptance of the fact that the indigenous people of this country, by virtue of their indigeneity have a special place deserving of recognition. For too long, attempts at addressing by way of affirmative action the situation of our indigenous brothers and sisters has been dismissed, even derided. It is possible to bring about greater economic empowerment of Fiji's indigenous people in a way that does not discriminate against the other races. The mistake is to conceive of these concepts in a way that is binary.

I believe that reducing the "wealth deficit" between the different races will be the key to Fiji's long-term peace and security.

1. HISTORICAL CONTEXT 2013

   Like the 1990 Constitution (and in contrast to the 1997 Constitution), the 2013 Constitution was not endorsed by the parliament. It was an imposed Constitution that received neither Parliamentary approval or endorsement by the people of Fiji.

2. PREAMBLE

2.1 Core Values

Section 3(1) should be strengthened

Add the words "rule of law after the word "equality".

3. LANGUAGES

Recognising the historically diminished use and status of the indigenous language of Fiji, the state must take practical and positive measures to elevate the status and advance the use of their languages.

In a speech he made in 2001, the late Ratu Joni Madraiwiwi said:

> "Already the character of this country has become more appreciably Fijian. That is neither good nor bad in itself, it is merely a fact. For that reason, now is perhaps the time to begin considering the adoption of Fijian as the national language. I say that without prejudice to other languages, particularly Hindi. But if we are to build a national identity, let it begin with the language of the first indigenous inhabitants of these islands. It would have the advantage of giving it protected status. Language is the core of one's identity for it allows us to express our feelings and outlook in our own terms. In this era of globalisation, Fijians will not long survive if sustained efforts are not made to protect it. Without it where will the Fijian people be?"[1]

Secular State – Section 4

Section 4 of the Constitution states:

Secular State

4. - (1) Religious liberty, as recognised in the Bill of Rights, is a founding principle of the State.

(2) Religious belief is personal.

(3) Religion and the State are separate, which means -

(a) the State and all persons holding public office must treat all religions equally;

(b) the State and all persons holding public office must not dictate any religious belief;

(c) the State and all persons holding public office must not prefer or advance, by any means, any particular religion, religious denomination, religious belief, or religious practice over another, or over any non-religious belief; and

(d) no person shall assert any religious belief as a legal reason to disregard this Constitution or any other law.

[1] Speech by Ratu Joni Madraiwiwi at the 29th Annual Congress of the Fiji Institute of Accountants, 23 June 2001.

There have been objections to the references to secular state in section 4. Some observers have called for the removal of the provision designating Fiji as a secular state. However, the Constitution does not actually explicitly state that Fiji is a secular state.

In any event, I think there is a misunderstanding of what exactly is a secular state. The purpose of a secular state is to prohibit politics and religion mixing, to the extent that may be humanly possible. Secularism is not a rejection or absence of religion. It is not a rejection of Christianity or any other religion for that matter.

Those that conceive of Fiji as a Christian state might not recognise the danger that a fundamentalist government at some future time might seek to force Christianity on all the people of this country.

A secular state is neutral as far as religion is concerned. It does not favour one religion over another. It may allow voluntary religious observance within state institutions, such as prayer in state schools (Ulrich).

President Macron has stated:

> "As I've said on many occasions, laicite in the French Republic means the freedom to belove or not believe, the possibility of practising one's own religion as long as law and order is ensured. Laicite means the neutrality of the State; in no way does it mean the removal pf religion from society and the public arena...." (Elysee 2020)

Secularism is not an argument against Christianity. It does not question Christian principles or indeed the beliefs of any religion. It is essentially a political and legal doctrine that government and religious institutions must be independent of each other and kept separate.

Some have called for Fiji is to be declared a Christian state. What exactly do they mean? How exactly does a state become Christ like? Do they mean that the official religion of Fiji should be Christian? Can a country become Christ like? How does elevating Christianity as the state religion sit in a country where significant minorities practice other religions? Could it lead to Fiji going down the path of theocratic government?

In my view, the best way the country to become a Christian state is for those who profess to being Christian, to be more Christ like in their daily lives and the way they treat their neigbour.

Common Name – Section 5

We know from history that the contemporary word "Fiji" originated from the Tongan word for Viti now spelled Fisi, By the time of Cession in 1874 (Deed of Cession) the expression was in use to identify the country's indigenous people. There are several references to the word "Fijian" in the Deed.[2]

Since 1874 and for more than a century, the word Fijian has become synonymous with the indigenous of this country. From the earliest colonial days, the Legislative Council the precursor of today's Parliament, and laws passed in that period consistently used that descriptor and reserved it for the indigenous or "native people" of Fiji.

Thus for example, in 1944 via the Fijian Affairs Ordinance, the Fijian Affairs Board was reestablished to regulate indigenous affairs, firmly embedding the term in legal, native regulations. In the 1970/1990/1997 Constitutions, the expression "Fijian" was explicitly used to refer to indigenous Fijians, distinguishing them from "Indians" or "Fiji Islanders". In 2010, the Fijian Affairs Amendment Decree officially replaced the word "Fijian" or "indigenous" in all written laws with the word "iTaukei" when referring to Fiji's native people.

Section 5 of the 2013 Constitution established that all citizens of Fiji are to be known as "Fijians". Views on the term Fijian are widely divergent and unfortunately, rather than being a vehicle for national unity, has become a source of contention and division. This has occurred for a number of reasons. First in as much as the indigenous have identified themselves and by successive colonial administrators and laws for a prolonged period as Fijians, they have assumed proprietorial rights as it were over the word.
More importantly however, there is deep seated resentment, given the latter, that they were never consulted over the decision to broaden the scope of the category of persons to be included in the description.

The incentive to call everyone in this country Fijian has its origins in efforts to find a common name for all who call Fiji their home. If the truth be told, we remain a nation of ethnically separate communities with a nascent national identity that is still finding its way. The late Rt J Madraiwiwi said "Our collective sense of nationhood of being Fiji citizens only manifests itself on the occasion of great sporting victories or national tragedies." The description "Fijian" to describe all citizens is controversial and polarising, and views are mixed.

[2] See Preambular paragraphs 1 ff in the Deed of Cession" "Fijian group of islands"; "Fijian chief Thakombau"; "Fijian language".

The 2013 Constitution declares in the Preamble "that we are all Fijians united by common and equal citizenry".

Section 5 then states "All citizens of Fiji shall be known as Fijians". The word "Fijian" has been in use since the 1800s (possibly even earlier) to identify and describe the first settlers of this country, who according to some anthropologists, arrived in these islands more than 3000 years ago.

Since cession, Fiji's British colonizers have referred to the indigenous people of Fiji as "Fijians". Screeds of laws since 1874 have reaffirmed that description. The 1970, 1990 and 1997 constitutions all drew distinctions on the basis of race.

On 1 July 2010, Ratu Epeli Nailatikau, then President of Fiji, made a new law (Fijian Affairs (Amendment Decree No 31 of 2010), with far reaching consequences.

The word "Fijian" was to be removed in any law wherever it appeared, and replaced with the word "i Taukei". The present Constitution of Fiji which was signed by President Nailatikau, came into effect on 7 September 2013.

It was imposed on the people of Fiji by a presidential decree – it is not the result of any approval or consensus by the people of this country, but the brainchild of two men.

Fiji did not have a Parliament at the time because the government had been unlawfully removed in a coup d'état seven years earlier.

An interim administration backed by the army governed Fiji.

The BLV has been resolute that the common name for the people of Fiji should not be "Fijian".

The Reeves Commission which drafted the 1997 Constitution felt that "Fiji Islander" was an appropriate name for all citizens of Fiji.

The SDL party's (which later morphed into the present day SODELPA) submission to Professor Yash Ghai (who was drafting a new constitution before it was trashed), was not against a common name.

Its view was that if all citizens were to be called "Fijian", this must be done following consultations, and with the agreement of the native Fijians and all other races in Fiji.

Many Indians, Chinese and other races who live in Fiji are "uncomfortable" being called "Fijian" and are proud being referred to by their ethnicity.

When this matter came up in a recent discussion, a colleague said to me: "I don't want to be called 'Fijian'. I'm proud to be a Rotuman."

A significant number of people in this country do not speak the "Fijian" language, live the "Fijian" way of life, or practice "Fijian" customs or traditions (e.g. "curu i bure", "matanigasau" etc.)

In a speech delivered in June 2018, Mr Biman Prasad, current NFP leader and one of Fiji's three Deputy Prime Ministers, said "Imposition of a common name does not promote common and equal citizenry. Imposition of a common name does not promote or achieve equality, dignity and justice for our ordinary people. Imposition of a common name does not promote meritocracy in recruitment and appointment to positions, particularly in the civil service and our security forces, equal opportunities and a sense of pride and patriotism."

The editorial comment in The Fiji Times of 9 March 1970, on a debate on a common name on the eve of Fiji's independence, said:

"No hasty decisions can be taken on a matter of such importance as a common name in any multi-racial society. But it is obvious that the Fijian people themselves and their leaders feel that with the approach of dominion status for Fiji, a common national name is necessary. What it should be will need a lot of thought by people of all races and at all levels of community life."

Many would argue that the word "Taukei" is not a substitute for the word "Fijian". Nor are the words synonymous.

It is evident that many indigenous people of Fiji feel a deep sense of grievance (even loss) in the "application" of the classification "Fijian" to persons of all ethnicities who have made this country their home.

The sense that this is akin to a form of cultural appropriation stems from the way the name Fijian was forced on people. This was regarded by some as arrogant and culturally disrespectful.

They would argue that the word of and by itself is not intended to convey a sense of superiority or supremacy over other races.

The description "Fijian" has been subsumed into the identity and psyche of indigenous Fijians. The very word connotes an entire culture with its rich traditions, protocols, values and beliefs.

The 2013 Constitution boldly stated that "WE, THE PEOPLE OF FIJI.... DECLARE that we are all Fijians..."

The problem with this lofty statement is that the people of Fiji made no such declaration. It was intellectually dishonest.

In 2008, the National Council for Building a Better Fiji (NCBBF) had recommended "Fijian" as the common name.

Reacting to the suggestion, former Parliamentarian Mr Mick Beddoes said the NCBBF had totally ignored the views of the Fijian people.

He said "I would have thought that if this is what we want, then we should first discuss this with our indigenous people first and obtain their views and preferences."

Just as the Maori are the tangata whenua of Aotearoa, in the same vein it could be argued that the indigenous people of Fiji have over time, acquired a proprietary right to use of the word "Fijian" to describe themselves.

The issue is clearly divisive and makes some people nervous. One can even argue that the word "i Taukei" is unsuitable to describe "native" Fijians because it can be confused with the radical indigenous nationalist movement of the same name.

But sweeping the issue under the carpet is unhelpful. Pretending that the mere description of all citizens of this country as "Fijians", somehow makes us all "equal" is a little simplistic.

It ignores the protracted debate about what is the most appropriate and common name for all people who now call Fiji home.

Dialogue on the question should take place in a calm and respectful way.

Cross cultural misunderstandings are more likely to occur when there is a failure or refusal to listen.

We should not confuse the idea of ethnicity and nationality. I believe that we can celebrate our common destiny as one people, while being proud of our different ethnic backgrounds.

As someone with three grandparents who were ethnic Chinese, and a mother who was registered in the Vola ni Kawa Bula, I do not feel diminished or excluded by not being referred to as a "Fijian".

I am proud of my Chinese heritage. Equally, I have been enriched by my "Fijian" ancestry. But I am not defined by a piece of paper.

The strong sense of belonging and affection I have for this country does not depend on what others choose to call me.

If by majority or consensus the indigenous agree to "sharing" the description for all citizens, that would be ideal. In the absence of any such agreement, I am in favour of Fiji Islanders.

The present debate about a common name for Fiji citizens is healthy. We should not feel threatened by it, but welcome the opportunity to have an honest dialogue on the issue.

But it is time once and for all, to secure agreement and consensus on this issue. It is an issue which has festered for more than half a century. We need to come to closure so the country can deal with more pressing national problems that confront us all.

Bill of Rights – Chapter 2

The Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy. It enshrines the rights of all people in our country and affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom.

The Bill of Rights looks impressive at first glance, but it has serious limitations on many rights.

The State does not have to justify laws limiting rights before an independent court on the grounds that they are necessary in a free and democratic society [as in 1997] Instead, the government will usually only have to show that the limitation is 'reasonable'.

Although the rights provided for in the 2013 Constitution are generally consistent with the main international human rights covenants, the extent of the guarantee of true protection for the exercise of those rights is severely limited, in two main ways.

First, section 6(5) permits restriction (potentially unlimited) of rights by ordinary statutes, whereas it is normal for possible limitations on or regulation of rights to be defined by constitutional provisions. Second, the Constitution itself permits very broad restrictions on particular rights.

Any limitation on any rights must be reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society.[i]

Non-Discrimination - Section 26(3)(a)

It is noted that there has been a suggestion to delete the words "sexual orientation, gender identity and expression" from section 26(3)(a). International precedents and jurisprudence indicate that discrimination on the grounds of sex, covers discrimination on the basis of sexuality.

For example, on 15 June 2020 the Supreme Court of the United States handed down judgment in three combined cases, Bostock v Clayton County (2020), Altitude Express v Zarda (2020), and Harris Funeral Homes v Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (2020). In this judgment the court held that direct discrimination because of sexual orientation or gender presentation was a form of direct discrimination because of sex. Gorsuch J, writing for the majority, stated:

"It is impossible to discriminate against a person for being homosexual or transgender without discriminating against that individual based on sex." (Bostock v Clayton County (2020)).

'Gender identity' has been recognised by the European Court of Human Rights as a separate ground under the prohibition of discrimination included in the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

My hope is that we can one day live in a nation where tolerance is exalted and that people will not be judged by who they love but by the content of their character.

4. COMMISSION FOR RACIAL HARMONY & NATIONAL UNITY

It is evident that race relations in Fiji and national unity need to be strengthened and improved and that State intervention is needed.

National unity is vital to the long-term success of the nation. It is the foundation of our country's prosperity and success by providing the stability required for investment, reducing conflict-related risks, and encouraging collaborative efforts.

Harmonious race relations will promote social cohesion and trust, boosting consumer confidence, attracting investment, and align diverse interests toward shared national goals like increased productivity and prosperity.

For too long it has been assumed that the different races that now call Fiji home will and must co-exist. But there has never been any systematic and State sponsored plan or action to improve race relations and to promote national unity.

5. RECOMMENDATION

It is therefore recommended that the Constitution should establish a Commission for Racial Harmony and National Unity to comprise three Commissioners. The granular details can be left to legislation to be passed by Parliament.

The Commission for Racial Harmony and National Unity must promote respect for racial harmony, tolerance and reconciliation and the protection, development and attainment of racial harmony, tolerance, reconciliation and national unity.

It will have the power, as regulated by national legislation, necessary to perform its functions, including the power to monitor, promote, investigate, research, educate, lobby, advise and report on issues concerning racial harmony, tolerance, reconciliation and national unity.

The Commission will have the additional powers and functions prescribed by national legislation.

Environmental Rights – Section 40

This will benefit from being strengthened in a number of ways.

First, second 40(1) should be amended with the addition of the following words:

"The State has a positive duty to preserve and defend the environment."

Second, section 40(2) should be deleted as it constitutes a serious "claw back" and qualification on the rights conferred in section 40(1) of the Constitution.

Qualification of Voters – Section 55

The right to vote of all citizens is fundamental in a democracy. One of the most powerful aspects of voting is its ability to ensure that the voices of all citizens are heard, especially those from marginalized communities. In a democracy, every eligible person, regardless of race, gender, income, or background, should have an equal right to participate in the electoral process. This is essential in promoting equity and fairness, ensuring that diverse perspectives are represented in government decisions.

Section 55(2) unfairly discriminates against persons serving a term of 12 months imprisonment or more. They are already serving time and being punished for having committed a crime. Removal of their right to vote is an additional punishment, which has little justification.

6. INDIGENOUS RIGHTS

There is something odd about proprietary rights in relation to land in this country.

It is well known that the majority of land in Fiji is owned by the original inhabitants. Most land is "native".

Before and after cession until the sale of land was stopped by Sir Arthur Gordon, all land was owned by the Taukei. A small proportion was alienated and sold to white settlers and the balance was vested in the Crown (today's successor being "the State").

Preambular paragraph 2 of the Deed of Cession states:

> That the possession of and full sovereignty and dominion over the whole of the group of islands in the South Pacific Ocean known as the Fijis.....and over the inhabitants thereof, together with the possession of and sovereignty over the waters adjacent thereto and of and over all ports harbours havens roadsteads rivers estuaries and other waters and all reefs and foreshores within or adjacent thereto, are hereby ceded to and accepted on behalf of Her said Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland her heirs and successors, to the intent that from this time forth the said islands and the waters reefs and other places as aforesaid lying within or adjacent thereto may be annexed to and be a possession and dependency of the British Crown."

In the Fijian political consciousness, it is a matter of confusion and puzzlement that they can own the surface of the land and waters for that matter, but not what is below it.

There remains a sense of grievance by many indigenous that the State has arrogated to itself a proprietary interest in minerals below the land. That this codified in section 30 of the Constitution offers little relief.

There are compelling arguments based not only on the Deed of Cession, but more generally on pre-colonial history, that minerals in the ground are the property of the traditional landowners who have recognised title to such land. Restoration of mineral rights to Fijians will right an historical anomaly.

To paraphrase scripture, it is timely that the Commission consider rendering unto Caesar what is Caesar's.

Powers of President – Section 82

Section 82 of the Constitution should be strengthened to ensure that the President has only ceremonial duties and functions.

It should be made clear that he/she does not possess prerogative powers such as were vested in the British sovereign and extended to her representatives in the person of colonial Governors or Governors General in Dominions.

Appointment of President – Section 84

The President is the symbol off national unity. He/ she is meant to be politically neutral. He is the embodiment of the State and representatives the entire country with its different constituents and races including people of different political persuasions.

The head of state typically reflects the virtues of inclusivity and consensus-building. He/ she builds bridges and unites the nation. This inclusive approach fosters solidarity and national unity. He/ she is a symbol of national unity and above party politics.
While I recognise that the 1997 Constitution the BLV was the appointing authority for the President, I would respectfully suggest that a more progressive approach now commends itself.

The role of the chiefs in Fiji's history is indisputable. At times they have vacillated between great acts of statesmanship and generosity[3] and served an accommodative function.

[3] Eg After several attempts, Ratu Sir Lala Sukuna was able to convince the Council of Chiefs to agree to a statutory trustee that would manage their lands, leading to the creation of the NLTB in 1940. The availability of land has been critical to the development of Fiji.

In moments of exigency, they have also succumbed to the pressures of the masses and surrendered their neutrality and independence for political ends.[4] The BLV endorsed the formation of the Soqosoqo ni Vakavulewa ni Taukei (SVT) party.

The party was founded in 1990 as the political vehicle of the BLV with the aim of uniting all indigenous Fijians.

While the current BLV professes to be independent, there is no guarantee that its future membership will necessarily adopt a similar stance.

Opening up the appointment of the country's President to all citizens irrespective of race or social standing will enable all the people of this nation to more closely identify with the President, thus cementing his role as the symbol of national unity.

Afterall, the President when appointed, is President of the entire country, not any segment or section thereof.

Appointment of Acting Chief Justice – Section 88

Section 88 of the Constitution puts the Chief Justice in an awkward predicament. It should be repealed. When the President is unable to perform of his responsibilities they should be carried out by the Speaker of Parliament.

The Chief Justice should not act when the President is unable to. The current provision undermines the separation of powers doctrine and potentially places the Chief Justice in a situation of conflict of interest.

Appointment of Prime Minister - Section 93

A strong case can be argued for term limits under section 93 of the Constitution. This would bring it into line with section 85. The nation's leadership will benefit by changes and refreshment from time to time of the position of head of government.

7. RECOMMENDATION

That the Prime Minister, like the President, be limited to a maximum of two terms in office.

---

[4] It is widely understood that the GCC supported the 1987 coup – see Norton file:///C:/Users/OVALA/Downloads/The_changing_role_of_the_Great_Council_o%20(1).pdf

Appointment of Attorney General - Section 96(2)(b)

The current language and scope of section 96(2)(b) is unduly wide and restrictive and should be amended.

A lawyer cannot be appointed as Attorney General if he/ she "has been found guilty of ANY (sic) disciplinary proceeding".

Thus, for example, if a lawyer is found guilty of professional misconduct (for e.g. failure to answer a client's phone calls), that is enough for disqualify him/ her from being appointed Attorney General – notwithstanding that he/ she may otherwise have an unblemished record.

Section 96 also has an inherent anomaly. A lawyer might have been convicted of a criminal offence such as common assault, but as the law stands, that would not be a constitutional bar to his/ her being made the chief law officer of the land.

8. UNICAMERAL LEGISLATURE

In my view, the Senate has served its time and should not be restored. It was first established under the 1970 Constitution and retained in all subsequent Constitution with the exception of the 2013 Constitution. Laws affecting Taukei land, customs or customary rights could not be passed in the Senate unless it received the approval of at least ¾ of the BLV appointees to the Senate which comprised 22 members.

The Senate basically was a house of review to oversee Fijian or Taukei interests to ensure supervision and protection of indigenous rights and aspirations. This was primarily through the BLV appointees to the Senate.

It was a product of its time and reflected the paternalism of Fiji's colonial masters who felt that the Fijians needed to be protected least their interests be undermined or subjugated. Given the country's demographic trends and trajectory, the Taukei will continue to be the majority race (62%?).

The level of "educated" Fijians today is a lot higher than it was in 1970 or 1997 for that matter. The composition of Parliament is predominantly Taukei. That being so, they are in a good position to protect and safeguard the interests of the Taukei without the necessity of a second chamber.

The current arrangement of having a unicameral legislature should be maintained.

Judicial Services Commission – Section 104

As in the previous Constitutions, the President of the Fiji Law Society should be a member of the JSC: see section 104.

9. ROLE OF THE BOSE LEVU VAKATURAGA (BLV)

The constitutional status of the BLV should be revived. But it should remain as an advisory and not a legislative body.

If the BLV is to be refashioned as a second Chamber or Upper House, this will inevitably make it an integral part of the law-making or legislative process, this is likely to weaken its role as the "guardian" of the interests of the Fijian people. By preserving its independence, it will be more effective in safeguarding and holding the government of the day accountable for addressing the concerns and interests of the iTaukei.

In other words, the BLV can be more effective if it is independent of government rather than being a part of the machinery of government.

A BLV which is not constitutionally tied to the apparatus of government has the potential to play a much bigger role as a force for social and political cohesion and guardian of Taukei interests.

The Electoral System – Chapter 3

In July 2025, the Fatiaki Committee which undertook a full review of Fiji's current electoral system and laws reported back to government on its recommendations.

I would strongly urge the CRC that rather than re-invent the wheel, you consider its report which could form the basis of your own recommendations, especially with regard to any changes to the Constitution and the electoral system.

It has been widely recognised that there are serious deficiencies in the provisions for Fiji's electoral system.

Of particular concern has been the fact that there is no link of members of parliament to representation of a particular constituency. This is because the entire country is a single constituency. I believe this stems from an incorrect interpretation of section 53 of the Constitution which speaks of "a single national electoral roll".

There is nothing in the Constitution which prescribes or states that Fiji must have no more than one constituency.

I would recommend that for future elections, Fiji should be divided into multiple constituencies, carving up the entire country into smaller divisions or entities.

In this way, constituents can identify with and have links to a "local MP".

Multiple constituencies would be fairer, more democratic and strengthen the accountability of MPs to their constituents.

Section 56(2)(c) of the Constitution fails to recognise that with globalization and labour mobility, many Fiji citizens who live and work overseas but who have a lot to contribute to the development of the nation, cannot stand for Parliament.

The 2-year residential requirement to qualify as a candidate to stand in general elections is unduly restrictive and long. Fiji too small a country – we need the best brains to run the country & stand for Parliament – Fiji is part of a globalised world. There is no need to limit ourselves in this way. It's actually hurting us.

It should be reduced to a much shorter period to allow for a greater pool of talent and ability for voters to choose from to represent them in Parliament.

Fiji is too small – we need the best brains to run the country and stand for Parliament. We are part of a globalised world. There is no need to limit ourselves in this way.

Section 53(3)

The 5% rule contained in section 53(3) of the Constitution has seriously disadvantaged independent candidates and those from smaller political parties. It sets an impossibly high threshold which produces results which are unfair and undemocratic.

By Elections - Section 64

This should be amended.

By virtue of section 64, presently no by elections take place under the Constitution in the event of a vacancy caused by the death, resignation of an MP.

The next highest ranked candidate in the general elections of the same party gets "promoted" when a vacancy occurs.

The better practice is to permit by elections to take place giving the voters an opportunity to hold either the government or opposition parties accountable to the people and or to refresh its mandate.

Judiciary – Chapter 5

An independent, impartial, honest and competent judiciary is integral to upholding the rule of law, engendering public confidence and dispensing justice.

Over the last 2 decades, there has been a significant number of judicial appointments drawn from Sri Lanka. In certain respects, this has been a concern.

The majority have been on short term contracts and lacked tenure. In that regard there were perceptions that judicial independence may have been compromised because some may have been "beholden" to the executive branch of government and in particular the Prime Minister and Attorney General.

Over the last 2 decades, there has been an influx of judicial officers from Sri Lanka into Fiji. Opinions are divided as to the value added and contribution of judges and magistrates from that country, the majority of whom were on short term contracts.

The real issue however is not the origin-country of foreign judges but their contractual precarity: in cases alleging government abuses, judicial officers may have had to choose between upholding – albeit to the limited extent the constitution envisages – constitutional rights and renewal of their contract controlled by the appointing authority.

There was a sense that judges on short term contracts appeared hesitant to use the expansive bill of rights in the 2013 Constitution to resist oppressive laws and acts by government instrumentalities.

It is important therefore, particularly for High Court and senior judges to have "tenure". [5]

The United Nations Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary (1985) state: 'The term of office of judges, their independence, security, adequate remuneration, conditions of service, pensions and the age of retirement shall be adequately secured by law. Judges . . . shall have guaranteed tenure until a mandatory retirement age or the expiry of their term of office, where such exists. Judges shall be subject to suspension or removal only for reasons of incapacity or behaviour that renders them unfit to discharge their duties'.

Across the Commonwealth and beyond, practices vary:

- United States: Federal judges and Supreme Court justices hold office for life ("during good behaviour").
- Canada: Supreme Court justices have tenure until the mandatory retirement age of 75.
- United Kingdom: Supreme Court justices have tenure until the mandatory retirement age of 75.
- Australia: High Court judges have tenure, typically with age-based limits.
- Malta: Constitutional Court judges are appointed permanently until retirement age.
- India: Supreme Court judges have tenure until the age of 65.
- South Africa: Constitutional Court judges are appointed for long, non-renewable terms (12 to 15 years), rather than lifetime.

To assist with judicial administration, there should be a new post of Deputy Chief Justice.[6] This is important in the context of succession planning and to reduce the administrative burdens on the Chief Justice.

---

[5] https://www.ohchr.org/en/instruments-mechanisms/instruments/basic-principles-independence-judiciary
[6] South Africa, Kenya, Indonesia are examples of countries which have the position of Deputy Chief Justice.

Appointment of Chief Justice & President of the Court of Appeal: Section 106(1), (3)

This should be amended to remove references to the Attorney General. Both judicial officers should be appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister following consultation with the Leader of the Opposition.

Retiring Age of Judges – Section 110

This ought to be standardized and made consistent. For the Chief Justice, President Court of Appeal, Supreme Court Judges, and Judge of Appeal the retiring age is 75. By contrast the retiring age for Judges of the High Court is 70. There is no rational basis for the divergence.

An independent, impartial, honest and competent judiciary is integral to upholding the rule of law, engendering public confidence and dispensing justice. Successive coups have served to weaken the administration of justice and undermined judicial independence. Some Judges and magistrates have been summarily dismissed. Others have had their contracts prematurely terminated. The strains and pressures on the judiciary have been well documented. Restoring the judicial system to its pre 1987 status is work in progress.

(2) Judges may only be removed from office on the ground of mental incapacity or for gross misconduct.

Appointment JSC consult PM & Leader Opposition

Section 110 appointment of non-citizen judges – for a period not exceeding 3 years.

The retiring age of all judges should be consistent and standardized to be at the age of 75.

Presently for Chief Justice, President CA, SC Judges and Judges of Appeal is 75; High Court judges 70. There is no rational basis for the different standards and treatment of the judges: section 110(2)(a)

Removal of Judges – Section 111

While there is provision for removal of the Chief Justice and the President of the Court of Appeal, there is no corresponding provision for the removal of other Judges including those on the High Court. This should be considered.

The removal provision in section 111(1) should be widened to include "gross misconduct", in addition to misbehaviour.

Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption (FICAC) – Section 115

Does Fiji need an anti-corruption body? The answer is a definite yes.

There is little doubt that Fiji requires a dedicated body to address corruption. anticorruption body on its own, or even the government on its own, cannot succeed in defeating corruption. A widespread problem that affects the entire country requires public support if it is to be mitigated and overcome.

Corruption is basically stealing from the public purse. It undermines trust in government, leaving behind crumbling infrastructure, failing health care and social services.

Should it be in the present form as contained in the Constitution and the FICAC Act of 2007? My view is No.

FICAC needs a reset. There is no reason why it should be retained in its current form as a constitutional body. It can continue to exist under an Act of Parliament, like similar bodies in places like Namibia, Singapore, Hong Kong and NSW.

The FICAC Act lacks clarity and coherence as a scheme. The Act as in force permits FICAC to deal with sexual offences, prostitution offences and abortion offences that do not fall within its core purpose of dealing with corrupt conduct.

FICAC should be confined to being an investigative body only, leaving the prosecutorial function to the ODPP. Until the time of FICAC establishment, Fiji has effectively had only one overarching prosecution authority.

The vesting of prosecution powers in FICAC has blurred the lines and created two centres of gravity as it were. This is confusing and wasteful.

There are real concerns that the body that investigates also has the power to lay charges. The potential for conflict of interest in this arrangement is real, with an absence of checks and balances within FICAC. In Namibia, the country's Anti-Corruption Commission simply investigates and hands over the evidence and files to the national prosecution agency.

In Singapore, the Corrupt Practices Investigation Bureau CPIB carries out the investigations, but prosecutions can only be instituted with the consent of the Public Prosecutor. [7]

Under the Independent Commission Against Corruption Act 1988 (NSW) (ICAC Act), the Independent Commission Against Corruption (ICAC) does not have the power to charge or prosecute individuals for criminal offences. Instead, its primary role is investigative, focusing on uncovering and addressing corrupt conduct involving public officials and public authorities.

ICAC is empowered to investigate allegations of corruption, gather evidence, and make recommendations, but it is not authorised to conduct prosecutions for criminal offences or disciplinary actions Gamage v Riashi [2024] NSWSC 975.

The 2006 coup which caused the removal of the Qarase government had initially been depicted as a 'clean-up' campaign against corruption. As it turned out, little evidence was found against the government that was forcibly removed. Allegations of corruption were the ostensible reason for staging the coup, and led to the promulgation of the FICAC Decree 2007.

FICAC's history and deliverables have been underwhelming. A year after the 2006 coup, there was scant evidence of corruption, despite strenuous efforts (Frankel). Those targeted were usually officials identified with the Qarase government or known opponents of the new regime, but dismissals were invariably accompanied by allegations of corruption, mismanagement and abuse of office.

10. Has FICAC delivered?

I don't believe so.

FICAC's budget has seen a substantial increase since its inception. In 2007, the agency operated with a budget of $1.5 million. By the 2024–2025 fiscal year, this figure had risen to just under $10.5 million, marking an exponential growth in funding over 17 years. The total budget allocation from [7] Section 33 Prevention of Corruption Act.

2007 to 2025 amounted to $139,175,583.

Despite this massive spending, concerns persist regarding FICAC's effectiveness and independence. As of the latest available data, FICAC employs 144 staff members, including 14 lawyers. The increase in budget and staffing has not necessarily translated into a higher rate of complaint resolution, more convictions or enhanced public trust in the agency's operations.

Since its establishment in 2007, Government has provided a cumulative total of around $139.2 million in annual grants to FICAC to support its operations. On any measure, this is a colossal amount of money.

Taxpayers of this country are entitled to ask: how has this money been spent? What results have been produced? How many people have been sent to jail for abuse of office, corruption or related offences?

More than $40 million was spent on the incomplete FNU Labasa campus. The project was at 47% completion when work stopped. The cost of the yet-to-be-finished Lautoka Swimming Pool has escalated from the initial budgeted amount of $2 million to $12.6 million. The anecdotal evidence suggests that the big corruption cases have either not been investigated, or not led to the laying of charges against those implicated.

11. Allegations of Political "Weaponization

FICAC has been accused of being used as a political tool, particularly during the last administration. Critics argue that instead of serving as an impartial anti-corruption body, FICAC was employed to target political opponents and dissenters. A senior academic has stated that FICACs primary purpose was to harass, threaten and arrest the opponents of the previous regime.

In December 2022, the leader of the Unity Party said that FICAC had been politicised and was being used as a weapon. He said that the cases that are reported to FICAC are politically motivated. "I believe it is just that it was established as a political weapon and is used as a political weapon."

In March 2024, the former acting head of FICAC maintained that in the past, there had been a lot of interference in the work of the organization.

Despite this significant financial investment, concerns persist regarding FICAC's effectiveness and independence. As of the latest available data, FICAC employs 144 staff members, including 14 lawyers. The increase in budget and staffing has not necessarily translated into a higher rate of complaint resolution or enhanced public trust in the agency's operations.

In its 2014 annual report, the Fiji Independent Commission against Corruption (FICAC) recorded 79 convictions since its inception in 2007; 26 cases acquitted, withdrawn, or declared nolle prosequi (charges discontinued); and 121 cases pending.

FICAC is an institution that "sends shivers down some people's spines," boasted the Attorney General as FICAC's employees assembled for their annual awards night (Fiji Sun, 17 Jan 2016).

Public confidence in the Commission has been eroded by perceptions of its low levels of efficiency. During a Parliamentary debate on the Commission's 2016-2017 Annual Report, the former National Federation Party President Mr. Pio Tikoduadua questioned the performance of the Commission that as of 2021 only had a 0.2% success rate in convictions against the total number of complaints, despite the Commission website stating 67,417 complaints had been received, 1,570 cases investigated, 366 individuals charged and 115 individuals being convicted[8].

12. RECOMMENDATION

FICAC needs a major re-set. It should be confined to investigations only, and not lay charges or conduct prosecutions. The ODPP should be the only and principal prosecution agency in Fiji.

FICAC will have to demonstrate its neutrality, independence and effectiveness, in other words, ffulfil its mandate, if it is to regain public confidence in its operations.

Office of Director of Public Prosecutions (ODPP) – Section 117

The DPP should continue to be appointed by the JSC.

This was the position under the 1970 Constitution until the establishment of FICAC in 2007. There is no need for the Attorney General to be consulted in the appointment of the DPP. This has the potential to draw political considerations into the appointment.

The resources spent on FICAC should be redeployed in strengthening the ODPP to undertake corruption related prosecutions.

[8] The 'FICAC' Factor

Section 117(5) of the Constitution – this should be reduced to a term of 5 years.

13. Limiting the Potential Control of the Executive over the Proceedings of Parliament:

As already suggested, a key principle of a parliamentary government involves accountability of the executive to the elected legislature. However, from 2014 to 2022, the executive government almost completely dominated the proceedings of Parliament. In the process, legislation was enacted with little or no scrutiny (very little different, in practice, to the enactment of promulgations and decrees by the military regime, 2006-2014), and pursuit of the goal of accountability of the executive through question time in Parliament was almost non-existent.

The Commission should consider recommending provisions that guarantee separation of roles and powers of the executive and the legislature, and empower the legislature to play its proper roles in terms of ensuring accountability of the executive.

Role of Military - Section 131

Universal practice is that the military has no place in governance and politics. It is answerable to the executive branch and subordinate to civic governance.

The principle of political control of the military is rooted in the concept of a representative democracy. It refers to the supremacy of civilian institutions, based on popular sovereignty, over the army and security policy-making apparatus, including the military leadership.

The Constitution should embed clear constitutional guarantees to protect the state - including the armed forces - from two types of potential dangers: from politicians, who have military ambitions, and from military with political ambitions. It must establish a clear legal and constitutional framework, defining the basic relationship between the state and the military.

In a democracy it is vital that the military is politically neutral, to prevent any possibility of military intervention in civic and political affairs. Control of the military by the elected representatives of the people—is fundamental. This enables a nation to base its values, institutions, and practices on the popular will of the people as espoused by their parliamentary representatives, rather than on the choices of military leaders, whose outlook by definition focuses on the need for external security and threats.

For peace and democracy to prevail, the military must remain committed to the rule of law. Democracy is maintained by ensuring that military actions and decisions are subject to control and oversight by civilian authority.

Under s.131(2) the RFMF has 'the overall responsibility...to ensure at all times the security, defence and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians' (section. 131(2)).

On the face of it, those words do not provide a constitutional basis for military intervention in domestic politics or other matters. Yet when read in light of the Constitution's enactment and justification, it appears that there is a segment of opinion that has regarded section 131(2) as intended to affirm the assumption of the military as the extra-constitutional guardian of not only the entire citizentry, but also the 2013 Constitution and the post-2006 'gains' it embodies.

The RFMF has 'the overall responsibility ... to ensure at all times the security, defence and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians' (s. 131(2)). These words do not provide a constitutional basis for RFMF intervention in domestic politics or other matters.

In its submission to the Ghai Commission, the RFMF stated its primary mission to 'be the guidance of the governance of this country'. It was based on thinking that the army was to 'be the last bastion of law and order', 'to deal with both Internal Security and external threats.

In a democracy the role of protecting the Constitution is the responsibility of the courts/ judiciary & Parliament. The military is only called out at the direction and request of government. It is not the responsibility of army to interpret or pre-empt the will of the people.

This reflects universal practice and principles. The RFMF still insists on its extra-constitutional guardian role. That self-appointed mandate persists as a shadow over the country and its constitutional order – an ever-present threat of military intervention against any deviation from the RFMF's perceived vision for Fiji.

Civilian authorities define national security goals and policies, while the military possesses expertise to execute those goals.

The military must be a professional, neutral, non-partisan force focused on national security rather than domestic politics. The purpose of the military is to defend society, not to define it.

14. CONCENTRATION OF POWER IN THE PRIME MINISTER & ATTORNEY GENERAL

There is a huge concentration of powers and executive authority in the PM and AG. The 2013 Constitution mentions them 111 and 66 times respectively. unconstrained. This lends the Constitution and governance of Fiji towards authoritarian rule without checks and balances. It undermines democracy and is dangerous putting so much power in the hands of 2 people only.

Together they control nearly all appointments to the judiciary and independent commissions and offices as well as senior state service and other appointments.

The Prime Minister also controls the remuneration and removal of members of constitutional commissions and 'independent' constitutional office holders.

The Commission should consider recommending significant changes that reduce the constitutional provision for these offices, and ensures their accountability.

In most modern democratic constitutions providing for parliamentary executive bodies, the prime minister is selected by the majority group in the legislature, and governs through a cabinet on the basis of collective responsibility. The attorney-general, if mentioned at all, is usually a relatively minor office serving as the senior legal adviser to the executive government.

Normally any detailed provision on the roles and functions of both offices is contained in ordinary statutes, which is one way in which the executive government is made accountable to the legislature, on behalf of the voters. In contrast, the 2013 Constitution creates the offices of prime minister with 'enormous powers', and an Attorney-General with remarkably broad powers.

This concentration of powers means that the positions are largely unaccountable.

The Commission should consider recommending significant changes that reduce the constitutional provision for these offices, and ensures their accountability.

Together, these two offices control most appointments to the formally 'independent' offices and commissions through their joint control of the Constitutional Offices Commission (COC). It is the COC that appoints the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission; the Electoral Commission and Supervisor of Elections; the secretary-general to parliament; the Public Service Commission; the commissioner of police; the commissioner of the Fiji Corrections Service; the RFMF commander; the auditor-general; and the governor of the Reserve Bank of Fiji (s. 133).

This situation arises because the six members of the COC are the prime minister, as chairperson, who also appoints two members; the leader of the opposition who appoints one member; and the Attorney-General (s. 132(2)). Hence, the Prime Minister and Attorney-General together control four of the six members.

Further, the Prime Minister has other significant roles, of appointing and setting remuneration for the Chief Justice, the President of the Court of Appeal, and other 'independent' offices and indirect powers to initiate removal processes. The Attorney-General chairs the Mercy Commission and vets its members.

In order to protect the independence of constitutional office-holders from influence – even domination – by the executive government, thereby undermining their central purposes as accountability bodies, the executive should have just one representative of the COC (or any equivalent body).

Further, consideration should be given to including provision limiting the number of portfolios that may be vested in a single minister.

Preservation of Laws - Section 173

The constitutional 'protection' of Promulgations and Decrees should be removed:

The military regime, enacted 103 'promulgations' in the immediate post-coup period before the April 2009 abrogation of the 1997 Constitution, and 328 'decrees' between the abrogation and the 2014 election, a total of 431 'laws.

Many contained 'ouster' clauses denying judicial challenge to them. It would be normal for a new constitution to make any pre-existing law (of any kind) that is inconsistent with it invalid to the extent of the inconsistency involved.

The 2013 Constitution further provides that, even if they violate rights or other constitutional provisions, these laws 'shall continue to be in force in their entirety' until Parliament amends or repeals them (s. 173(2)).

This protection of the promulgations and decrees should be removed, so that they are open to challenge for breach of the Constitution.

Immunity – Chapter 11

A coup d'état, by its nature constitutes a fundamental breach of constitutional order. It involves the unlawful overthrow of a democratically established government and the substitution of authority through coercion or force. While "treason" is a legally defined offence, coups amount to a grave betrayal of the State and its constitutional framework. To grant such immunity for such acts is, in effect, to legitimize unconstitutional seizures of power.

Immunity sends a dangerous signal, that the violent or unlawful seizure of power is ultimately tolerable, provided it succeeds. In turn, this undermines the democratic stability of our nation and lowers the deterrent threshold against future unconstitutional interventions. No functioning democracy can endure where those who dismantle it are shielded from accountability.

Historical experience strongly supports the conclusion that failure to hold military actors accountable encourages further defiance of civilian authority.

A key finding from the comparative experience is that granting immunity does not neutralize military power, it entrenches it.

Legal impunity for military actors undermines the rule of law by creating a category of persons effectively shielded from accountability. This weakens the principle of equality before the law and erodes civilian supremacy over the military, both of which are essential to the consolidation of stable democratic governance.[9] Further, unconstitutional conduct, including the seizure of power through force, is implicitly normalized and communicates that successful coups may ultimately be met with legal forgiveness rather than consequence, therefore lowering the deterrent threshold for future unconstitutional interventions.

The retention of immunity provisions for coup perpetrators (and aiders and abettors) risks

- Entrenching the continued political influence and autonomy of coercive state actors – by insulating them from consequence and legal scrutiny

[9] McSherry (n 1) 6.

- Weakening the deterrent effect against future unconstitutional takeovers of government – signalling that unconstitutional seizures of power may be excused
- Undermining public confidence in the consistent and equal application of the law – by creating exceptions to the principle that all persons are equal before the law

Furthermore, the democratic consolidation is structurally constrained where those responsible for subverting constitutional order remain beyond the reach of legal accountability. Rather than bringing closure to periods of instability, institutionalized impunity preserves the underlying power asymmetries that enable recurrence.

The continued inclusion of immunity provisions for coup perpetrators in Fiji's constitutional framework is difficult to reconcile with the principles of constitutional supremacy, civilian control of the military and equality before the law. A durable democratic order requires that no individual or institution is placed above accountability for the unlawful acquisition or exercise of state power.

15. IMMUNITY & THE RULE OF LAW

The rule of law demands that all persons regardless of influence, rank or office are subject to the law. However, immunity provisions for coup perpetrators fundamentally contradicts this principle. Instead, it creates a class of individuals who are above the law, shielded from accountability for actions that would otherwise constitute the gravest criminal offences.

The Constitution is the 'supreme law of the land' and it cannot condemn unlawful seizure of power while protecting those who commit it. Such contradictions hollow out constitutional supremacy and replace it with political expediency. When the law is selectively applied, it ceases to function as law and instead becomes an instrument of convenience.

16. IMPLICATIONS OF IMPUNITY

The dangers of impunity and immunity are not theoretical; they are simply borne out in real-world experience and demonstrated in countries like Myanmar. This case offers a stark and cautionary example for Fiji to learn from.

When perpetrators of humans' rights and serious constitutional violations are not held accountable for their actions, they are emboldened. Immunity does not bring closure, instead it perpetuates cycles of abuse.

Ultimately, what this proves is that impunity did not facilitate genuine democratic consolidation but instead, it entrenched structural inequalities of power and preserved the political autonomy of military institutions.

Where impunity does not resolve instability, it institutionalizes it. Where accountability is denied, the underlying conditions that enabled unconstitutional conduct, very much remain intact.

Therefore, it is imperative that Fiji shifts away from the practice of granting immunity to coup perpetrators. A stable democratic order cannot be built on foundations that excuse the unlawful seizure of power.

The removal of immunity provisions is a necessary step toward securing the integrity of the rule of law and protecting our nation's constitutional future.

These dangers of impunity extend far beyond the absence of punishment. In many states that transition from military rule, impunity has been embedded not only through legal mechanisms such as pardons and amnesties but also through the continued dominance of military institutions within civilian governance structures. In turn, this results in a constrained system in which elected leaders formally govern while key areas of power remain under military influence.

Our continued inclusion of immunity provisions for coup perpetrators risks entrenching a similar pattern in which military actors retain influence beyond constitutional limits.

Even where formal democratic institutions are restored, immunity creates a structural imbalance by placing certain actors beyond the reach of the law further undermining civilian supremacy and compromising the independence of the judiciary.

Essentially, stability or closure is not brought about by impunity. Rather, it lowers the threshold for future coups by affirming that unconstitutional conduct can be negotiated and left unpunished. The idea that the military retains a residual authority to intervene in political life is simply normalized.

If Fiji is to strengthen the integrity of its rule of law and secure long-term democratic stability, it is essential that immunity for coup perpetrators ceases. A robust constitutional order requires the full subordination of all state actors to the law, especially ensuring that those responsible for unconstitutional seizures of power are subject to accountability without any exception.

Impunity cannot be seen as a tool of reconciliation but a mechanism of recurrence and entrenchment.

17. RECOMMENDATION

In light of the foregoing, it is submitted that CRC should consider:

- Protections that ensure no future legislative or constitutional enactments can grant immunity from prosecution to any coup perpetrator.
- The explicit recognition of coups as criminal acts constituting treason.
- The complete exclusion of provisions granting immunity to individuals involved in any future unconstitutional seizures of power.

Fiji must act decisively to break the cycle of coups and immunity that has left a mark in our constitutional history. Immunity for coup perpetrators is only a catalyst for future instability. It is a time to affirm, unequivocally that no individual is above the Constitution. Coups are treason. Treason must therefore be prosecuted to the highest power. Immunity must cease once and for all. Until then, Fiji cannot move forward as a stable, democratic nation grounded in the rule of law.

In future, there should be no immunity from prosecution for any person who is responsible for extra constitutional usurpation of government or government authority, or for anyone aiding or abetting a coup maker.

Anyone found guilty of treason should be banned for life from standing for any political office, government board, committee or instrumentality. This should be written into the Constitution.

There has been a tendency in this country to sugar coat our past, the coups and their aftermath and carry on looking to the future.

But our collective amnesia comes with a price tag. If we do not address our past failures and learn lessons from them, there is the danger that we could repeat them.

While there have been expressions of regret, good intentions do not make a morally wrongful act right.

The overall effect of immunity is that it feeds a culture of impunity, allowing perpetrators to not be held accountable for wrongdoing.

This has weakened confidence in the rule of law, government institutions, the police, and the justice system. Impunity has served to reinforce power imbalances, allowing certain classes to break the law without consequences.

18. Limiting the Potential Control of the Executive over the Proceedings of Parliament:

A key principle of a parliamentary government involves accountability of the executive to the elected legislature. However, from 2014 to 2022, the executive government almost completely dominated the proceedings of Parliament. In the process, legislation was enacted with little or no scrutiny (very little different, in practice, to the enactment of promulgations and decrees by the military regime, 2006-2014), and pursuit of the goal of accountability of the executive through question time in Parliament was almost non-existent.

The Commission should consider recommending provisions that guarantee separation of roles and powers of the executive and the legislature, and empower the legislature to play its proper roles in terms of ensuring accountability of the executive.

Constitutional Amendment – Chapter 11

The Opinion of the Supreme Court (August 2025) and the amendment changes opined by the Court should be written into the amended 2013 Constitution – 2/3 of MPs plus simple majority of voters in a referendum. [10]

The Supreme Court has already observed that the current requirements for change are onerous and make it difficult to change the Constitution.

[10] Since it was enacted in 1950, the Indian Constitution has been amended 106 times.

19. CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW

The Constitution should make it mandatory to have a periodic review say after every 10 years or so. It is a living, dynamic document and the opportunity to revisit its workings will ensure it is responsive to changing circumstances, and fit for purpose.

The Constitution is an evolving, dynamic document – rigidity & unnameability make it brittle & unworkable. While the sanctity of the Constitution is understood, it must be recognised at the same time that amendments may be needed in the future. [11]

20. CONCLUSION

The Prime Minister has said that the CRC will prepare and present a Bill to amend the Constitution, for government's consideration. [12]

I trust that when you implement your instructions and finalise your work, you will bear in mind the words of Fiji's national anthem – "land of freedom, hope and glory..."

The lyrics of our national anthem were relevant in 1970. Today, they resonate more strongly.

In conclusion, may I commend to you of the words of the Prime Minister when he told Parliament on 30 April this year:

> "The Constitution is not just a legal document. It affects how we live, how we are represented, and how decisions are made about our future.....This is a process of profound national importance. It must reflect the will, aspirations, and diversity of our people,"
>
> Let is work together to bring about constructive changes to our Constitution, a Constitution which embodies the values of.....and delivers the promise of a multicultural society to fruition, that promises a unified nation that draws strength and unique character from our diversity.

It is my fervent hope and prayer that you will have the courage and the vision to reset our supreme law; that you will "future proof" our Constitution to withstand the pressures of partisanship and

---

[11] The Constitutions of Japan, Kenya & Philippines have periodic review provisions.
[12] https://www.facebook.com/FijiGovernment/posts/prime-minister-rabuka-updates-parliament-on-the-constitution-review-commission-a/1412749190889274/vested interests bent on putting self before the national good; and that you not succumb to what is politically expedient, but do what is right for Fiji.

I have every confidence that you have the ability and the wisdom to rise to the occasion.

GRAHAM LEUNG
SUVA
MONDAY 29 JUNE 2026

---

[1] Eg see section 32, 1997 Constitution.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Section of Constitution	Subject Matter	Recommendation
Section 26	Non-Discrimination	Retain the non-discrimination provisions without alteration.
Section 30	Mineral Rights	Amend
Section 40(1)	Environmental Protection	State obligation to preserve
Section 40(2)	Qualification of Rights
Section 45	Human Rights Commission	The Human Rights Commission should report to Parliament
Section 55	Qualification of Voters	All prisoners should have the right to vote

Section 56	Candidate Eligibility	Reduce the residential requirement for election candidates from 3 years to 3 months.
Section 84	President	Provide for the President to be elected by the people of Fiji.
Section 88	Office of the President	Delete the provision allowing the Chief Justice to act as President.
Section 93	Prime Minister	Limit the Prime Minister to a maximum of two terms.
Section 104	Judicial Services Commission	Include the President of the Law Society as a member of the JSC.
Section 110	Judiciary	Set the requirement age of ALL judges at 75.
Section 115	FICAC	Remove the constitutional status of FICAC. Retain it as a statutory body with investigative powers only. The power to prosecute should be returned to the ODPP.
Section 117	Director of Public Prosecutions	The DPP should conduct all prosecutions, including for corruption and electoral offences.
Section 131	Role of Military	Remove the responsibility of the military for the "well-being of Fiji and all Fijians."
Section 159-161	Constitutional Amendment	Amend provisions to reflect the decision of the Supreme Court of Fiji.
Whole Constitution	Executive Powers	Limit & reduce the powers of the Prime Minister and Attorney General.
New Section	Judicial Leadership	Appointment of a Deputy Chief Justice
New Section	Language	Consider designating Fijian as the national language (as opposed to an official language).
Part B	Electoral System	Return to a multi-constituency electoral system.

New Section	Bose Levu Vakaturaga (BLV)	Restore the BLV as a constitutional body.
New Section	Immunity & Treason	Ensure future coup perpetrators are not granted immunity. Disqualify anyone convicted of treason from holding public office or standing for election.
New Section	Constitutional Review	Provide for a mandatory review of the Constitution every 10 years.

Fiji Law Society (FLS)

Fiji Law Society
Date-29-6-2026

Leighton: On behalf of the Fiji Constitutional Review Commission, it is my great pleasure to welcome you both this morning and thank you as well for taking up the invitation that was put up by the Commission to come and make submissions. Thank you very much on behalf of the Chair and the Commissioners. I will just be going through a few housekeeping matters. Just with regards to when you make submissions, you will just have to press the right panel of the mic in front of you to turn it on and once you have made your submission, you can press the same panel to turn it off. I will just introduce briefly the Commissioners and the Chair and then I will hand over to the Chair to introduce the work that the Review Commission will be undertaking.

So seated to the far right is Mr. Conway Beck, a well-known architect within Fiji, also a well-known rugby player and administrator in FRU. Seated next to him is Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau. She is a development and communications specialist. Today, Dr. John Charles Fatiaki has excused himself from these proceedings this morning and seated next to Ms. Nailatikau is the Chair of the Commission, Mr. Sevuloni. He is a well-known lawyer with immense experience with the Pacific and the region as well as in Fiji. And seated next to him is Mr. Ami Kohli, who I know you are aware of as well. Mr. Koli has his own practice in Mombasa as well as a lawyer in Fiji. Seated next to Mr. Koli is Dr. Neelesh Gounder, a well-known economist and lecturer with the University of the South Pacific. With that, I'll hand over to Chair now.

Mr. Valenitabua: Good morning, Mr. Clarke. Good morning, Ms. Prasad Welcome. Welcome to Level 9, Suvavou House, before the Constitutional Review Commission this morning.

It is indeed a privilege to be facing you this morning and we are eager to listen to the submissions that you will be presenting to us. Today, we have three lawyers. First, the Fijian Law Society will appear before us and at 12 noon, we'll have Mr. Graham Leong and then at 4 pm, we will have Mr. John Apted. So, we will be inundated with a lot of legal submissions today and we are looking forward to it. The Commissioners are sitting before you. They have been introduced by Mr. Leighton Fatiaki, also a lawyer, as you do know. And the Commission has been travelling around the country. From the 2nd of May 2006, we travelled around the country through the Maritime Islands and around Vanualevu and Vitilevu.

Now, we have come to the end of the public consultations travelling around and we are here at Level 9, Suvavou House, for two weeks so that we can hear submissions from other associations and government ministries who have indicated that they wanted to appear before us and make submissions.

You are the first during these two weeks, so we'll take it from there. The purpose or the term of reference for us is to gather as many or as much information and suggestions as possible and then write recommendations in relation to what should be included in our amended constitution. The term of reference is that we are to make recommendations and we will be looking at a draft amended constitution too.

So, the amendment is on the 2013 constitution. There have been a lot of submissions made to us that we remove the 2013 constitution completely and have a new one done, but unfortunately, we do not have that power. We have not been allocated or conferred that power by His Excellency, the President of the country, Ratul Naiqama.

I will not take further time in the introduction. All I can say is that we are pleased that you are appearing before us this morning and we look forward to your submissions. We will have discussions later on.

We have a lot of questions to ask. Since you are representing the lawyers of this country, there will be a number of legal matters which might be raised and we will welcome any comments from you. With those few words, I now open the consultation session this morning and I leave you with the floor and you can proceed as you wish.

Mr. Clarke: Thank you very much Chair and Commissioners. It is very pleasing for us to be here to make our submissions to this Commission and even more so that I have had the good fortune of knowing many of you over many years. It is nice to feel among friends.

First of all, the Law Society would like to thank you for this opportunity to make these submissions on behalf of the Fiji Law Society. Earlier this morning, we sent Leighton our full written submissions. There are about 26 pages of it. You will be pleased to know that I am not going to read it. It will be here all day. Instead, what I think we will do is just take you through the main points that we would like to make.

I think it will take about 20 to 25 minutes. I am happy to engage in a conversation with you over some of the matters we have raised on, obviously, and other matters that the Commission may wish to seek our views on. Society's written submission is made in a statutory capacity and in the public interest.

The Legal Practitioners Act 2009 recognizes the Society as a continuing statutory body and gives it objects that include assisting government in matters affecting legislation and law reform, the maintenance of professional standards, representing the views of the legal profession, and protecting the public in matters connected with the practice of law. We therefore appear before you today, not to advance a sectional interest of lawyers, but to assist the Commission on matters central to constitutionalism, the rule of law, equal rights, access to courts, judicial independence, professional legal independence, institutional accountability, and democratic legitimacy. The organizing principle of our submission is the rule of law.

We acknowledge at the outset that the 2013 Constitution already recognizes the rule of law, constitutionalism, supremacy, rights protection, equality, fair administrative action, separation of powers, transparency, accountability, and judicial independence. Our submission is that those ideas, it's not that those ideas are absent, but rather it's that they must be preserved, clarified, and strengthened so that they are in fact practically effective. So, the first sort of theme, if I can call it that, that we would like to address you on are equal rights, the Bill of Rights supremacy, and access to courts.

The society's first substantive point is that the Constitution must protect common and equal citizenship. Equal citizenship is essential to national unity, public confidence, and social cohesion. Recognition of the special position of the ITaukei is not inconsistent with equal citizenship.

In fact, we say it should be preserved and strengthened, but framed as part of Fiji's national identity and unity, not as a basis for division or unequal constitutional status. The Constitution should also recognize substantive equality. It should permit carefully designed affirmative measures for disadvantaged groups, include ITaukei communities, women, persons with disabilities, rural and maritime communities, young people, and economically disadvantaged citizens, provided those measures are reasonable, proportionate, and consistent with the rights of others.

The Bill of Rights should be supreme over ordinary legislation. Parliament should be able to enact laws that give greater effect to rights, but not ordinary laws that reduce, suspend, or hollow out the essential content of those rights. We recommend a single general limitation clause.

A right should be limited only where the limitation is prescribed by clear law, pursues a legitimate public purpose, is necessary, is rationally connected to that purpose, is proportionate, and is subject to independent judicial review. The Bill of Rights should also be protected against constitutional erosion. It should not be amendable by a bare parliamentary majority.

Rights-reducing amendments should require special safeguards, special parliamentary approval, public consultation, and referendum approval, where the amendment affects the essential content of rights, equality, access to courts, judicial review, or democratic safeguards. Access to courts is the mechanism by which constitutional supremacy becomes real. The Constitution should prohibit ouster clauses that prevent courts from reviewing constitutional questions, jurisdictional error, natural justice, bad faith, improper purpose, irrationality, disproportionality, or infringement of those rights.

Specialist tribunals and regulators have a role, but they should not be made the final judge of the limits of their own powers. Court supervision must remain available at all times. The next matter that I wish to address the Commission on is about constitutional amendment and referendum.

The recent Supreme Court opinion of sections 159 and 160 of the Constitution is central to this Commission's work. The Society welcomes the Court's confirmation that constitutional amendments should not be affected by Parliament alone, and that approval by the people in a referendum remains necessary. We respectfully disagree, however, with the Court's formula insofar as it allows constitutional amendment by a simple majority of those voting in a referendum.

For foundational constitutional change, that threshold, we say, is too low. The Society recommends a workable but robust amendment formula. First, approval at the relevant parliamentary readings by at least two-thirds of members of Parliament voting. (B,) adequate public consultation. (C), committee scrutiny.(D), approval in a referendum by at least two-thirds of voters voting. (And E), continuing court jurisdiction to determine whether the amendment procedure has been complied with. This approach avoids two extremes. It avoids an amendment process so rigid that reform becomes impossible.

But it also avoids a process that allows fundamental constitutional change by a narrow or temporary majority. Finally, for amendments affecting the Bill of Rights, access to courts, judicial independence, electoral democracy, land protections, independent constitutional offices, or the amendment procedure itself, the referendum safeguard that we recommend should apply as a minimum. The fourth matter that we would like to raise with you is in respect of independent institutions and critical state offices.

The rule of law depends not only on rights in text, but on institutions capable of enforcing them. A democracy requires independent offices and institutions that can administer elections, prosecute crime, audit public money, investigate corruption, protect human rights, regulate the public service, supervise public administration, and preserve the independence of the courts and the legal profession.

The society recommends that appointment bodies for critical state offices be independent, plural, transparent, and merit-based. These offices include judges, members of the Judicial Services Commission, electoral officers, the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Auditor General, anti-corruption officers, human rights commissioners, public service commissioners, the ombudsman, and legal service regulators. We'll come back to the matter of the ombudsman later in my submission.

The composition of any constitutional offices commission, judicial services commission, or equivalent appointment body should exclude the Prime Minister, the Attorney General, ministers, members of parliaments, political party officers, and persons that are subject to executive direction.

The Attorney General may be consulted as the government's principal legal advisor where appropriate, but should not sit as a voting member, control the process, exercise a veto, or act as the recurring gatekeeper for appointments to offices that may have to scrutinize, prosecute, audit, regulate, advise upon, or adjudicate the legality of executive action. Critical state offices should also have secure tenure, protected remuneration, adequate funding, independent staffing, and removal only for constitutionally specified cause after independent inquiry and procedural fairness.

We recommend the creation of an independent constitutional ombudsman. The current constitution does not appear to establish such an office. The ombudsman should investigate maladministration, unreasonable delay, abuse of discretion, unfair administrative action, failure to give reasons, and systemic failures in public administration. This would complement, not replace judicial review and other accountability institutions.

On anti-corruption enforcement, and I must disclose to the Commission now, I have a professional interest, of course, in matters pertaining to FICAC that I must disclose for the record. The Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption has exercised significant coercive powers in an area closely connected with public confidence, political accountability, and rule of law. Anti-corruption enforcement is important, but it must be institutionally independent, procedurally fair, and protected from actual or perceived political use.

The Society recommends that the Commission consider whether FICAC should be abolished altogether and its functions reallocated to constitutionally appropriate institutions. If the Commission decides otherwise, however, and to retain FICAC, its role should be limited to investigation only. Prosecution decisions should rest with the Director of Public Prosecutions independently and in accordance with law and published prosecution guidelines, none of which exist at this moment in respect of FICAC.

There are no public prosecution guidelines that we are aware of in respect of FICAC, and that is another reason we say why. If the Commission decides that FICAC is important enough that it ought to be continued, and we do not agree with that view, it should be for a very limited scope only and just for investigation. The next item that we wish to address you on is legal profession independence and practicing certificates.

The independence of the legal profession is not a privilege for lawyers. It is a protection for the public. Lawyers must be able to advise clients, challenge government action, appear against the state, defend unpopular persons, and bring constitutional claims without fear of improper regulatory pressure.

We as a society are well aware of the abuses of that regulatory power in the past in respect of lawyers who took on unpopular causes for the government then in power and for representing unpopular people in matters against that previous government, where the consequences to their professional reputation and their ability to practice were severely diminished, and that was because of the architecture by which the legal profession is regulated at the moment. Now, of course, the Legal Practitioners Act is in the process of being reviewed and probably amended, but our submission is that it needs more than that. Some of these fundamental protections ought to be built into the Constitution so that it avoids executive and parliamentary interference.

The Legal Practitioners Act 2009 contains important public protection mechanisms, but it also gives the Attorney General, for example, and Minister significant structural roles in legal education, legal services regulation, staffing and policy, or financial guidelines. It is also through the Office of the Chief Registrar and Officer of the Executive that practicing certificates are currently issued, so it is in fact that power is vested in a public official. That creates a risk, or at least a perception of risk, of executive influence over institutions that regulate the profession.

The society recommends that regulation of the profession should be independent, transparent, procedurally fair, and subject to court supervision. In particular, the Fiji Law Society should have authority to issue, renew, maintain, suspend, and impose conditions on practicing certificates for legal practitioners, subject to clear legal criteria, procedural fairness, and of course always court review. Practicing certificate powers are central to regulation.

They allow enforcement of professional standards, continuing professional development, trust account compliance, client protection, ethical obligations, professional indemnity, or risk management requirements where applicable, and conditions such as supervision, training, or practice restrictions where necessary. Because practicing certificates determine who may practice law, appear in court, advise clients, and challenge unlawful public power, that power should not be controlled by the executive. It should be exercised by the profession's independent statutory body, which is the Fiji Law Society, subject to law and judicial supervision.

Electoral reform. The society recommends and strongly supports reform of the current electoral system because the single national constituency weakens accountability between voters and identifiable members of parliament. We understand that the commission has received many submissions along similar lines, and we certainly are in agreement with that.

The society supports equal constituencies and universal voting, where every citizen participates on the same basis, and each vote carries equal weight, grounded in the principle of common and equal citizenry. The objective is equal representation and accountability. Voters should be able to identify a member of parliament, or a small group of members, answerable to their territorial constituency.

The electoral system should remain a form of proportional representation. The overall allocation of seats should reflect, as fairly as practicable, the number and proportion of votes received by political parties. The reform we propose is to combine proportionality with constituency accountability.

This may be achieved through a mixed system or regional multi-member constituencies. The commission should consider whether each constituency should return at least two members of parliament. That may give voters identifiable representatives, while avoiding an overly narrow single-member model.

Constituency boundaries should be drawn by an independent boundaries process, based on population equality, geography, community of interest, transport links, provincial and municipal considerations, and the special circumstances of maritime and remote communities. Boundaries should not be drawn on ethnic, communal, or religious lines. National unity, iTaukei recognition, property, and resources.

The society supports constitutional recognition of the special position of the iTaukei. That recognition should include land, culture, customs, language, traditional institutions, customary knowledge, and development aspirations. But that recognition should be framed consistently with common and equal citizenship, national unity, and the rights of all Fijians.

Recognition should also be practical. It should promote active participation by iTaukei communities in education, finance, professional services, procurement, joint ventures, management capacity, enterprise development, and resource governance. Property rights and land protections should be preserved.

Laws affecting property, leases, licenses, customary rights, land use, resource rights, or compensation should be clear, prospective, non-arbitrary, and subject to court review. In relation to marine and natural resources, customary interest should be recognized through consultation, benefit sharing, co-management, environmental stewardship, and access to commercial opportunities, while preserving state regulatory responsibility, public rights, national unity, and legal certainty. Immunity.

Transitional review. The Society recommends that immunity provisions be reviewed. A future constitutional settlement should not entrench permanent legal impunity or prevent courts from determining the legality, scope, or application of immunity provisions.

No future immunity should be available for unconstitutional overthrow, serious human rights violations, torture, unlawful killing, enforced disappearance, sexual violence, corruption, abuse of office, or other serious criminal conduct. We also recommend a systematic review of existing laws for consistency with the new constitutional framework. Priority should be given to laws affecting rights, elections, public order, media, courts, tribunals, professional regulation, public finance, and institutional independence. The Legal Practitioners Act should be included in that review.

In closing, the Society's central submission is this. Fiji should preserve the best commitments already found in the 2013 Constitution.

Rule of law, rights, equality, constitutional supremacy, independent courts, and accountability. But strengthen them so that they are institutionally real, not just words on paper. The Constitution should be stable but amendable, rights protecting but practical, culturally grounded but inclusive, and strong enough to uphold the rule of law for all Fijians.

Chair and Commissioners, those are the Society's oral submissions. We are grateful for the opportunity to assist the community, the Commission, and are happy to answer any questions and discuss some of the matters that we've raised and of course other matters that the Commission may wish to raise with us. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much Mr. Clarke. Thank you very much for that oral submission. We also thank you for the written submission that was presented to us even before you arrived this morning. We really appreciate it. Now we have heard your oral submissions. You have addressed a number of themes or issues which we have heard from the consultations that we've done around the country.

I will just ask you a question in relation to one. In your paper, or the Fiji Law Society's paper, you have mentioned electoral reform. Yes, there have been a lot of submissions coming from our grassroots people that the single national constituency must go. It is not fair. It is not fair. That is what they've been saying even from the grassroots level.

So that means that multiple constituencies have to be considered. Now we thank you for your comments in relation to how the multiple constituencies could be established and how membership or let's say candidates could be appointed. Now still on electoral reform, there we have submissions for the multiple constituency electoral system.

What would be the view of the Fiji Law Society, and I know that you represent all lawyers who are members of the society, what would be your view on the bicameral? Because there is another submission that has been forthcoming from the grassroots level. Instead of having these House of Reps making laws alone and then assented to by His Excellency, why don't we bring back the Senate? Just a question. If you wish to comment, you may comment.

Mr. Clarke: If not... Well, I don't think the society is opposed to the idea of a bicameral parliament. But I think we would ask that a number of matters be clarified before it would go any further. First of all would be the composition of that upper house and what its properly defined role and responsibility will be in law making.

I mean we agree that simple majority legislation in the House of Reps is a very low threshold in the past to create laws that are binding on everyone and that there ought to be protections in place, which is exactly why we make our suggestion with respect to the Bill of Rights and independence and those matters, because it should be more than a bare majority. But I think that would be our qualification, I think, is how would it be composed and what would its roles and responsibilities actually be within the sort of law-making sphere. The other thing that isn't so clear in our submissions is that obviously we strongly support a proportional representation.

So, one of the things that we say it should not absolutely must not be is a first past the post system, because we should avoid situations where the elected member of parliament only got the support of say 30% of the constituency just because of the sheer number of people running in the election for that constituency. That we say is a highly undesirable outcome. The member of parliament or members of parliament ought to have the support of at least 51% of people within those constituencies.

I hope that answers your question. I mean it's a difficult one because I mean that goes to the question of having a bicameral system is quiet, of course we've always had it until the 2013 constitution. But I think if there's an opportunity to revisit how it would be made up and what it would do, I think that would be a very good discussion to have.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you Mr Clarke. Thank you for your comments on that. We understand that it has to be considered carefully in relation to the return of the senate. Now fellow commissioners, does anyone have any questions for Mr Clarke? Mr Kohli.

Mr. Clarke: Good morning Mr Kohli.

Mr. Kohli: Good morning Mr Clarke. Thank you very much indeed to the law society for having a very balanced submission made to us and thank you for putting it in writing as you have said. I have two questions and first I noticed that you have asked the threshold of the referendum to be increased from simple majority to two thirds. No doubt you are aware that change in constitution is something very, very important. Before there was very high threshold of three quarters and 75% referendum. Do you still feel that two thirds of simple people who are just enough to vote is sufficient or should it be of those who are registered voters or should there be compulsory voting? This is something I just want to ask.

Mr. Clarke: Well, I think I'll take your last point first. This is not an official law society position because we haven't sort of discussed it but I strongly support the idea of compulsory voting because it should be every citizens duty to participate in elections. On the question of the 75% versus two thirds of the simple majority, I was fortunate, the law society was fortunate to be present throughout the submissions and the hearing before the Supreme Court on this very question and we heard all of the submissions from the various political parties and of course from the Fiji Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission and as you can imagine the views were quite diverse but there was consensus

I think that 75% of all members registered to vote would be too high and how the Supreme with the utmost respect to the Supreme Court for its opinion but it was difficult for us to sort of understand the rationale for going from a 75% very high some would say impossible to meet threshold to one that we consider too low which is the bare minimum and so two thirds for lack of any better reason seemed like to us a more reasonable compromise so that at least it commands more than 65% of people voting in a referendum because it's not 51 it's 50% plus one so it's a very we think that it's far too low a threshold to make such important changes to a foundational document like the constitution.

Mr. Kohli: My second question to you Mr. Clarke is again to do with the entrenchment in the constitution about changes. My question is that society is always evolving. Yes. Some people may ask who are you and I to decide what's going to happen in 20 years' time before coming in the new one . Do you think there should be a provision in the constitution for amendment for review every 10 years or should it be left open?

Mr. Clarke: In our submission we recommend that there be a provision to review it say every 10 years.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Dr. Gounder?

Dr. Gounder: Thank you Chair. Thank you, Mr. Clark and colleague, from Fiji Law Society. Thank you very much for your submission this morning. My question is related to the Bill of Rights. You talked about the qualification for limitation on the Bill of Rights and you mentioned legality, legitimate purpose, necessity, proportionality as well as an independent judicial review. You know when we look at the Bill of Rights we see a lot of limitations holding the Bill of Rights. So we have been talking about what would be the benchmark criteria to talk about the limitations and you have provided some of this. There is also mention of historical factors or cultural factors. What do you think of those as other mechanisms to justify any form of reduction or suspension of some of the Bill of Rights? Does it make sense in a legal perspective?

Mr. Clarke: Sorry, could you rephrase the question?

Dr. Gounder: Yes, so the suspension or reduction of Bill of Rights. You talked about it must have a very single clear limitation such as legality, legitimate purpose, necessity, proportionality. Now many others have argued that some of the limitations on Bill of Rights can also come from history as well. For example, countries have different histories and that countries may limit some aspect of Bill of Rights based on history or some cultural perspectives.

Mr. Clarke: Well, I will start with the sort of, I suppose the fundamental proposition that we think underpins this Bill of Rights. It is a Bill of Rights that is to be protected and enjoyed by every citizen and every person that is in Fiji. The 2013 constitution, like you have alluded to, provides far too simple a carve out for the government or the parliament by ordinary legislation to carve out those rights, undermine those rights. Those sorts of criteria that we outlined and that you have just read out, we strongly said that those words or words to similar effect ought to be provided and said expressly in the constitution so that courts have clear objective standards and criteria by which to review these attempts at purported sort of interference or the sort of watering down of these rights.

The problem I think with introducing matters such as history, culture, tradition, is that those are very difficult concepts to distill into sort of a clear guide and criteria for a court or for parliament to consider when looking at whether to actually start interfering with these rights. Because of course, history, tradition, everybody has got a different view on what it means and what that tradition is or what history says. I think that would be our concern with introducing concepts like that because they are very difficult, I think, to measure as a criteria for this.

Particularly when we are having to deal with whose history, whose tradition, when we are trying and what the Bill of Rights is trying to do is protect everyone, including some who may not share that history, who may not share that tradition. It becomes very difficult to introduce concepts like that to sort of what is supposed to be an all-encompassing framework that protects equality and respect by law. I hope that answers you.

Dr. Gounder: Yeah, you definitely answered that. I was also coming from perspective, personal perspective as well, for example. You have the right to academic freedom, but it's limited in the interest of orderly conduct of elections. So, while you have the academic freedom, in the interest of orderly conduct of elections, you may not have the academic freedom. And the argument sometimes is that we have heard academics talk a lot about the elections. So therefore, while you have the academic freedom, it's not necessarily every aspect of the orderly conduct of elections. For example, I'm reading from the Constitution itself.

Mr. Clarke: Well, I mean, unfortunately, those are exactly the sort of limitations that we do not agree with. Because what you've just read, of course, some of that you will already find in the election laws, which we believe are sort of contrary to what ought to be free and fair elections and the participatory democracy where views ought to be freely expressed without fear of sanction. Because the very first question, obviously, that one asks when words like that are sort of bandied about is, well, says who? Who says that is not conducive to conduct of elections? Because generally, that's the executive that would be.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Mr. Clark. I think you've answered my question very well.

Mr. Clarke: Thank you. Thanks, Dr.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Clark, still on the Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights in Fiji are based on declarations of human rights and covenants and treaties and all those.

Mr. Clarke: It's a universal principle.

Mr. Valenitabua: Universal principle. And Fiji has ratified most of these covenants and treaties. How binding, in your view, and we'd just like to have a comment from you, how binding, in your view, are these covenants and treaties and declarations to the sovereign state of Fiji? Is it possible to water down and tone down these rights so that they are applicable and relevant to Fiji as a sovereign state? What would be your view in relation to that? We have watered down cases in relation to the Bill of Rights. And even some Bill of Rights, some rights or some covenants have not been domesticated into law in our country. And so, we still, according to the judges, we still can use them because they have been ratified by Fiji.

So, how binding could they be or could they be watered down to be appropriate and relevant and usable to our country as a sovereign state? The reason why we are asking this is that there have been suggestions that the Bill of Rights be toned down, be watered down. That has been coming from corporal punishment, for example. There have been suggestions that we have to bring back copper punishment. And secondly, there was a suggestion from somewhere where they said that keep Bill of Rights in towns and cities, in villages, no. Those kinds of things. So, we would just be interested to know. You are a lawyer. You are a senior lawyer. What would be your view?

Mr. Clarke: Well, I think there is an overarching point to this, I think, that needs to be dealt with first, which is that whether Fiji adopts and domesticates international covenants and various conventions and the like, that is the power of Parliament and courts cannot usurp that role and start reading into the conventions and Bill of Rights that Fiji has got, other matters that Parliament may have expressly decided not to adopt for whatever reason or just not got around to it.

But like in the 1997 Constitution, it would be helpful, I think, for the courts to be able to have regard to other international conventions that perhaps Fiji has not signed up for, to assist it in the interpretation and enforcement of those rights here. You mentioned we have all done these cases. And often there are gaps.

Often there are issues that cannot be dealt with just if we restricted ourselves to the narrow body of law and provisions here as a regard ought to be taken of that. But we would say only as a tool to help in the interpretation and application and enforcement of those rights. To go any further, I think, would be overstepping the courts and interfering in parliamentary sovereignty.

On that other point you make, which of course we hear it too, even not just professionally but in our own private lives out there. It would be understandable for sure that some may have these concerns about whether these rights things should apply in rural areas. But we would say that we can't go down that path. I think we must, Fiji as a whole, must aspire to something greater. And the unifying principles of the Bill of Rights and Shrines ought to be the values that we aspire to and that we live by. Because we don't get it right all the time, as everybody knows.

We don't get it right all the time. And our history is replete with cases where this sort of stuff comes up. But it would be damaging, I think, to the overall fabric, not just of our legal system but also our social compact as a nation, to start watering down these rights to sort of suit what are, I think in many ways, different concerns, personal concerns. The Bill of Rights has to try and protect everyone. And of course, the Bill of Rights protects that person who has that view. So, it's a difficult one to speak with any kind of real certainty on that one. But I think we must maintain that universality of equality that I think this Bill of Rights symbolizes and represents. And it's got to be real. That's what we say. It has to be real. And should it bind the state? Absolutely. It wouldn't work if it didn't, sir. We strongly support that principle. Because without that, it becomes really nothing other than just words on paper.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you for that, Mr. Clark.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Mr. Clarke and colleague, for your time here today. I have a question about your recommendation for the establishment of an office of the Ombudsman. It certainly drew my interest. And I suspect as our experience has drawn and many other similar bodies' experiences have drawn, much of our submissions are drawn from similar concerns that would be addressed by an Ombudsman's office, for instance, if it did exist. I would be interested to hear how you mentioned that such an office would complement existing institutions, particularly in regard to Fiji at this stage in what is often perceived as an overcrowded or convoluted institutional space. I would just be interested to hear you expand on that thought and how the Law Society sees that the Ombudsman's office would add value. Thank you.

Mr. Clarke: Yeah, I mean, I agree with the sort of perception that it's an overcrowded space. But in this space, particularly with accountability for executive action, there really isn't a body dedicated to that. The closest we've got is the Fiji Human Rights Anti-Discrimination Commission. But that doesn't have – I mean, that is actually – its mandate is actually also quite narrow.

And it deals with those two basic areas, anti-discrimination and human rights. But the only mechanism really available to anybody to express concern or challenge executive action is the courts. And the courts are overburdened, under-resourced and simply unable, because of those issues, to be able to deal with those sorts of concerns or challenges quickly.

The Office of Ombudsman, as other jurisdictions have demonstrated, is exactly the sort of check that, with the correct and adequate safeguards, would be able to deal with not just ministerial decisions, not just other public official decisions, but also the work of other agencies, state agencies, that currently have no real sort of supervising body to actually deal with their decisions. I mean, FICAC, for example, the DPP's office, for example. I mean, the DPP, their independence is important, obviously. But there is no way, for example, of just sort of – borrow a euphemism – mark their work. It doesn't exist. Yes, the perception is overcrowded, but in this space there's really not much there. And that's why we strongly support the creation of that office.

Sorry, just a final point. I mean, there was an ombudsman before. I mean, we've heard it suggested before, and we do not disagree. I think the removal of that office under the current framework may have been deliberate, but it certainly created a big gap that we say ought to be filled. Does that answer you all?

Ms. Nailatikau: Yes, it does.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Beg?

Mr. Beg: Thank you, Chair. Sorry, I'll make it quick. Thank you, Mr. Clark and Mrs. Maraj, for your submission this morning. I just have one. As the immunity clause is a very sensitive topic in Fiji, you know, we've heard far and wide, long and narrow, whichever way you put it.

I mean, there's the instrument sitting there before us, the Supreme Court ruling, and your recommendation is quite intriguing. I make reference to 113 and 114 in your submission, allowing courts to adjudicate over common law in these cases. So, it's quite interesting, and we also recommend that the commission consider whether we remove or narrow entrenched immunity and allow court decisions on common law. Thank you for that. I appreciate the – because this is a very difficult topic to deal with. It obviously has to be well thought out and discussed, so hopefully we can have further discussions along the lines, unless there's something else you'd like to add to that. Particularly, you know, the Supreme Court had rule about the –

Mr. Clarke: Why they did it.

Mr. Beg: Yes. I'm interested in that direction.

Mr. Clarke: Well, just my perception of it, because I don't really say much about it in the opinion, is that they just thought that – and you've said it – that the perception might be that it's too destabilizing, potentially creates some issues. But I think that was a perception on their part as well. We strongly believe that this ought to be discussed, this ought to be looked at, because in this whole sort of framework, this constitutional framework, you know, we're talking about rule of law, we're talking about democracy, we're talking about human rights.

These immunity provisions stand out like a sore thumb, you know, because they are complete antithesis of these other values and principles that the rule of law, democracy, those other matters that I raised, represent. So, we should have the discussion. I mean, the Commission may opt to completely just not do anything about them and move on, and that would be obviously open to the Commission and its recommendations.

But we strongly believe that because they do represent such a sort of antithesis of those values that we outlined earlier, we ought to have the discussion about whether these sorts of provisions or protections should continue and reward wrongdoing.

Mr. Beg: Thank you for your comments. I appreciate that. I'm sure the Commission and through the Chair, we will take this on quite loudly.

Mr. Kohli: Yes, just following up from where you left. The immunity clause, as it states in the Constitution, only applies to a certain period of time. It does not cover coups in the future. So, even if it stands, it will not be applicable to people who are minded to commit coups. So, there is some solace to your heart, but even if it is retained, it does not mean to say it will pardon those people who in the future apply this. Am I correct?

Mr. Clarke: Yes. That is the point we make in our submission. If that is the path you want to take, the Constitution ought to provide that no such immunity or protection shall ever be afforded any person or group that do this. Yes, we would strongly recommend that because you have to draw a line under this. This continues to be an issue that when lawyers look at this framework, it stands out as an exception to the values and principles that this document says it upholds.

Mr. Kohli: My final question to you, Chair, Mr. Clark, is this. If I hear you correctly, you are saying that in the Bill of Rights, there are so many rights written in the Constitution, but if we scrutinize carefully, on the one hand, they are giving you the right. On the other hand, they are throwing it away. Almost applies to every legislation in the Bill of Rights.

Just to give you one example, where the Bill of Rights says that the accused person must be produced in court within 48 hours, and then it says, well, if that is not reasonably possible, as soon as possible thereafter, leaves it wide. It leaves it open, doesn't it? So my question to you is, should we remove those provisos where they are saying any other enactment and just leave the rights there? Or how would you suggest that?

Mr. Clarke: Well, those last few words, as we well know, have been used on many occasions to prolong detention. And we think it would be quite a good outcome if those little sort of wiggle words were taken out, so that there was a clear and absolute no later than 48 hours.

Because, I mean, you know, courts sit on weekends all the time, if need be. But if the constitutional safeguard is there, then there is a clear requirement that they must be produced within 48 hours and amenable to judicial oversight. Because that's, you know, it's precisely those words that have resulted in people detained for four, five days in some cases.

:

But just on that carve-out provision again, because I think we keep, we think it's a really important point, is that any carve-outs of these Bill of Rights, we say ought to be almost, you know, it can't be carved out by ordinary legislation. It ought to be, there ought to be a special protection for that built into the constitution, so that it's not dissimilar to the way in which the constitution ought to, you know, can be amended, two-thirds, two-thirds, or whatever the formulation is the commission recommends. But the one thing that has to be absolutely made clear is that it can't just be done by laws that require, you know, those carve-outs can't just be by laws that require a 50 plus 1% majority in Parliament.

Mr. Valenitabua: Commissioners, is there any other comment or any other question for Mr. Clark and Ms. Prasad? Well, Mr. Clark and Mr. Prasad. Ms. Maraj. I beg your pardon, Ms. Maraj. I would have called you by your first name. And Ms. Maraj, thank you very much for the submissions this morning. We have received your submissions, just a browse through shows that we have a lot of methods in there, which we will have to consider.

This is coming from the Fiji Law Society, and it gets into the heart of the laws in relation to the constitution. We've heard submissions from around the country, but not to the depth which we have heard this morning, and we are expecting more today from Mr. Leong and Mr. I'm sure you will. I'm sure we will. So, thank you very much indeed for your submissions this morning. We will take them into account. For your information, we've got two weeks of public consultations starting today.

We will end on the 10th of July, and then after that it's down to report writing, recommendations. We have to make recommendations to His Excellency, the President of the country, and we are looking at writing up a draft amended constitution. We will be getting a legal drafter who might be arriving in Fiji on the 15th of July to come and assist us with the legal drafting.

So, we will then hand in the report, the recommendations, and the amended constitution to His Excellency, the President. From there, the politicians will take over, because His Excellency will then hand over the draft amended constitution to be put to Parliament through our government, or through the government. As you know, the Cabinet and Government will have to prepare parliamentary papers, and they present it to Parliament for the second and third readings, and as you know, Mr.

Clerk, the two-thirds majority is to be obtained in Parliament before the bill can proceed from the second to the third reading, and even to the referendum. So two-thirds majority in relation to that, and we have been guided by the opinion of the Supreme Court in relation to what we are doing. We are trying to comply with that opinion, so what happens after we hand in our documents to His Excellency will be up to the politicians. We will try.

Our timeline ends on the 31st of August, 2026, and we are working towards completing our task on the 31st of August. It's a big job that's in front of us, but it has to be done for the sake of the nation. Thank you very much for your attendance this morning, and we will come back to you if we need assistance, and I'm sure you will be a member.

Mr. Clarke: We will be happy to help.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much.

Mr. Clarke: Thank you, Chair and Commissioners, for the opportunity to make these submissions today. It's been an honor, and we thank you for the time given to us. Good luck.

Leighton: Before you leave, Mr Clarke, if we can take a picture with the Commissioners.

----------End of Session [29-6-2026] ----------

LEX EST TUTISSIIMA CASSIS

FIJI LAW SOCIETY

PRIVATE MAILBAG, GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS, SUVA
PHONE NUMBER: (679) 3319390 / (679) 7736146 Email: secretariat@fijilawsociety.com

Submission to the Constitutional Review Commission of Fiji

Submission on Constitutional Reform, the Rule of Law, Judicial Independence, Legal-Profession Independence, Rights Protection, Electoral Reform, and National Unity

To: The Constitutional Review Commission

From: The Fiji Law Society

Date: 29 June 2026

Subject: Submission on priority constitutional reforms for Fiji

Introduction

1. This submission is respectfully made by the Fiji Law Society to assist the Constitutional Review Commission in its review of Fiji's constitutional arrangements.
2. The Society makes this submission in accordance with its statutory role and public responsibilities. The Legal Practitioners Act 2009 continues the Society as a body corporate under the name of the Fiji Law Society, with perpetual succession, a common seal, capacity to hold property, and capacity to sue and be sued in connection with its statutory functions.
3. The Society's statutory objects include maintaining and improving standards of conduct within the profession; preserving the integrity and status of its members; assisting Government in matters affecting legislation and law reform; representing the views, interests and wishes of its members; and protecting and assisting the public in matters connected with the practice of law.(LPA 2009.pdf, p. 9)(LPA 2009.pdf, p. 10)
4. The Society therefore approaches constitutional reform not as a sectional or private interest, but as a professional body with statutory responsibilities to the legal system, the administration of justice, the public interest, law reform, and the rule of law.
5. Fiji's Constitution should be a durable national compact. It should protect the rights of all citizens, recognise the special position of the iTaukei, maintain national unity, promote equality and social cohesion, and create an enabling environment for participation, investment, enterprise, and opportunity.

6. The 2013 Constitution contains important commitments, including constitutional supremacy, the rule of law, equality, human dignity, a substantial Bill of Rights, judicial independence, public accountability, and democratic elections. Those commitments should be preserved and strengthened. They should also be made practical by institutional design that prevents ordinary legislation, executive discretion, or emergency power from weakening the rule of law.

7. The 2013 Constitution already recognises the rule of law as a founding value of the State and gives it important legal force through constitutional supremacy, court enforcement, equality, rights protection, fair administrative action, separation of powers, transparency, accountability and judicial independence. The Society submits that constitutional reform should preserve those commitments and strengthen them by making the rule of law more fully effective in institutional design — particularly through stronger protection of equal rights, Bill of Rights supremacy, access to courts, independent appointment processes for critical state officers, and independent institutions capable of checking abuse of public power.

8. Accordingly, the organising principle of this submission is the rule of law. The rule of law requires more than formal legality. It requires that public power be limited by law; that laws be clear, prospective, general and publicly accessible; that rights be enforceable by independent courts; that public institutions act lawfully, rationally, fairly and for proper purposes; that no person or office be above the law; and that institutions responsible for appointing, supervising or removing critical state officers be independent of improper political influence..

9. A democracy cannot function properly if the officers who administer elections, prosecute crime, audit public money, appoint judges, investigate corruption, protect human rights, regulate the public service, supervise the legal profession, or advise on constitutional legality are dependent on the executive for appointment, tenure, funding or continuation in office. Constitutional reform should therefore treat independent appointments architecture as a central rule-of-law safeguard, not as a technical administrative matter.

Executive Summary of Recommendations

Preserve and strengthen the rule of law

10. The 2013 Constitution already recognises the rule of law as a founding value of the State, together with common and equal citizenry, human rights, an independent and accessible justice system, equality, separation of powers, transparency and accountability. Constitutional reform should preserve those commitments and strengthen their practical effect.

11. The rule of law should be expressed not merely as an aspiration, but as an enforceable constitutional principle requiring legality, equality before the law, separation of powers, independent courts, effective remedies, fair administrative action, transparent public power, accountable government, and independent institutions capable of checking abuse of power.

Equal rights, equal citizenship and substantive equality

12. The Constitution should protect equal citizenship and equal protection, treatment and benefit of the law for all Fijians. Recognition of the special position of the iTaukei should be preserved and strengthened, but framed consistently with equal citizenship, national unity, substantive equality and the rights of all communities.

13. The Constitution should also permit carefully designed affirmative measures to advance persons or groups disadvantaged by history, geography, disability, poverty, discrimination or structural barriers, provided such measures are reasonable, proportionate and consistent with the rights of others.

Bill of Rights supremacy and special-majority protection

14. The Bill of Rights should be protected from reduction, suspension or displacement by ordinary legislation. Rights should be limited only under a single clear limitation clause requiring legality, legitimate purpose, necessity, proportionality and independent judicial review.

15. No ordinary law should extinguish the essential content of a constitutional right. Parliament should remain able to legislate to give greater effect to rights, but not to diminish their constitutional core.

16. The Bill of Rights should not be amendable by a bare parliamentary majority. Any amendment that reduces the scope, enforceability or essential content of a protected right should require a special parliamentary majority, prior public consultation, and judicial review of compliance with amendment procedures. More serious rights-reducing amendments should also require referendum approval.

Access to courts and effective remedies

17. The Constitution should prohibit ordinary legislation from excluding judicial review of constitutional questions, jurisdictional error, natural justice breaches, bad faith, improper purpose, irrationality, disproportionality, or infringements of rights.

18. Specialist tribunals, including professional disciplinary bodies, may perform important functions. However, their decisions should remain subject to review by independent courts at least on constitutional, jurisdictional and procedural grounds.

Constitutional amendment and referendum safeguards

19. The Society welcomes the Supreme Court's confirmation that constitutional amendment requires approval by the people in a referendum. The referendum requirement should be retained and entrenched.

20. The Society respectfully disagrees, however, with the Court's formula requiring only a majority of voters voting in the referendum. The better safeguard is a workable but robust amendment process requiring approval by at least two-thirds of Members of Parliament voting and at least two-thirds of voters voting in a referendum, together with public consultation, committee scrutiny and court supervision of compliance with the amendment procedure.

Independence of appointment institutions for critical state officers

21. The Constitution should establish independent, plural and transparent appointment institutions for critical state officers whose independence is essential to democracy and the rule of law. These include, at minimum, judges and judicial officers; members of the Judicial Services Commission; the Electoral Commission and Supervisor of Elections; the Director of Public Prosecutions; the Auditor-General; anti-corruption commissioners; the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission; the Public Service Commission; a new Ombudsman office to oversee executive and administrative action; the Solicitor-General where that office has constitutional functions; and legal-services regulatory officers.

22. The appointment, reappointment, suspension, removal, remuneration and acting appointment of such officers should not be controlled by the Prime Minister, Attorney-General, Cabinet or any single political office holder. Appointment bodies should be constitutionally independent, balanced in composition, protected from executive direction, required to apply published merit criteria, and accountable through transparent reasons, public reporting and judicial review.

Rule of law and legal-profession independence

23. The Constitution should recognise that an independent legal profession is an essential component of the rule of law and access to justice. The legal profession should be regulated in a manner that protects the public, maintains professional standards, and preserves independence from improper political or executive influence.

24. The Fiji Law Society should have constitutional or statutory authority to issue, renew, maintain, suspend and set conditions for practising certificates for legal practitioners, subject to clear legal criteria and procedural fairness. Practising-certificate control is central to professional regulation. It enables standards to be enforced, continuing professional development to be required, trust-account and ethical obligations to be monitored, and conditions to be imposed where necessary to protect clients and the public. Because practising certificates determine who may practise law, that power should be exercised by an independent professional body such as the Fiji Law Society rather than by the executive.

25. The Legal Practitioners Act 2009 demonstrates why this is necessary. It contains important public-protection mechanisms, but it also gives the Attorney-General and Minister a recurring structural role in areas such as legal education, professional regulation, policy and financial guidelines for the Independent Legal Services Commission, staffing approval, and institutional reporting.

Electoral reform

26. The current single national constituency open-list proportional representation system should be replaced or substantially reformed. Electoral reform should be founded on equal representation, equal voting rights and common citizenship. The preferred model is a mixed electoral system that improves accountability of Members of Parliament to identifiable territorial constituencies while preserving equal suffrage and overall proportional fairness. The system should remain a form of proportional representation, so that the overall allocation of seats in Parliament continues to reflect, as fairly as practicable, the number and proportion of votes received by each political party. Electoral reform should therefore improve constituency accountability without abandoning proportionality.

27. Constituencies should be civic, territorial and based on equal representation and voting, rather than on separate electoral categories. The Commission should consider whether each constituency should elect at least two Members of Parliament, so that electors have identifiable representatives while reducing the risk that a single-member constituency becomes too narrow, localised or exclusionary. If a full mixed system is not adopted, the Constitution should at least require multi-member regional constituencies based on equal voting rights, an independent boundaries process, and rules that strengthen accountability between Members of Parliament and identifiable territorial constituencies.

Immunity and accountability

28. The Commission should also consider removing or narrowing provisions that permanently entrench immunity and exclude courts from considering the legality, scope or effect of immunity provisions. At minimum, no future immunity should be available for unconstitutional conduct, serious human-rights violations, corruption, abuse of office, or attempts to establish government outside the Constitution.

Transitional review of existing laws

29. The Constitution should require a systematic review of existing laws for consistency with constitutional supremacy, the Bill of Rights, judicial independence, institutional independence, access to courts, and the rule of law. Priority should be given to laws regulating the legal profession, courts, tribunals, elections, public order, media, land and resources, public finance, professional licensing, and accountability institutions.

Equal Rights, Bill of Rights Supremacy and Access to Courts

30. The 2013 Constitution already contains important rule-of-law commitments, including common and equal citizenry, respect for human rights, equality, constitutional supremacy, court enforcement of the Constitution, access to courts, fair administrative action, separation of powers, transparency, accountability and judicial independence. Those commitments should be preserved. The purpose of reform is to strengthen their practical operation and ensure that they cannot be weakened by ordinary legislation, executive discretion, ouster clauses, institutional dependence or inadequate remedies.

31. The first practical expression of the rule of law is equality before the law. The Constitution should protect common and equal citizenship, equal protection of the law, equal treatment by public authorities, and equal access to justice for all Fijians.

32. Equal rights are compatible with recognition of the special position of the iTaukei. Constitutional recognition of the iTaukei, including land, culture, customs, language, traditional institutions and development aspirations, should be framed as part of Fiji's national identity and unity. It should not be framed in a way that diminishes the equal citizenship or fundamental rights of any community.

33. Equality should be substantive as well as formal. The Constitution should permit reasonable and proportionate measures designed to advance persons or groups disadvantaged by historical exclusion, geography, disability, poverty, discrimination or structural barriers. Such measures should be treated as consistent with equality where they promote genuine participation and do not unfairly extinguish the rights of others.

34. The Bill of Rights should be constitutionally supreme over ordinary legislation. Parliament should be able to enact laws that give greater effect to rights, but ordinary legislation should not be able to reduce, suspend, displace or hollow out the essential content of constitutional rights.

35. Any limitation of a right should be valid only where the State can show that the limitation is prescribed by clear law, serves a legitimate public purpose, is rationally connected to that purpose, is necessary because less restrictive means are not reasonably available, and is proportionate in a free and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.

36. The Bill of Rights should also be protected against constitutional amendment by a bare parliamentary majority. Any amendment that reduces, qualifies or weakens a protected right should require a special parliamentary majority. Where an amendment would substantially diminish the content of a right, affect equality, restrict access to courts, weaken judicial review, or alter the core safeguards of democratic government, additional safeguards should apply, including prior public consultation and referendum approval.

37. A special majority is an important safeguard because it requires broader political consensus before rights are reduced. However, it should not be treated as sufficient on its own. The Constitution should also provide that courts retain jurisdiction to determine whether the amendment procedure has been followed and whether the amendment preserves the essential content of rights, constitutional supremacy, access to courts, judicial independence and the rule of law.

38. Access to courts is the mechanism by which constitutional supremacy becomes real. The Constitution should prohibit ordinary legislation from excluding court review of constitutional questions, jurisdictional error, breach of natural justice, bad faith, improper purpose, irrationality, disproportionality or infringement of rights.

39. Every person should have access to an effective remedy for breach of the Constitution, including declarations, injunctions, compensation, orders of invalidity, structural relief, exclusion of unlawfully obtained evidence and any other just and equitable relief.

40. Specialist tribunals and regulators may perform important functions, including in professional regulation. However, their decisions should remain subject to court supervision on constitutional, jurisdictional and procedural grounds. No statute should make a tribunal or regulator the final judge of the limits of its own power.

Constitutional Amendment, Referendum and Popular Legitimacy

41. The recent opinion of the Supreme Court on sections 159 and 160 of the 2013 Constitution is directly relevant to the Commission's work. The Court recognised the 2013 Constitution as legally effective, but limited recognition of Chapter 11 by reading down section 160. In particular, the Court read the parliamentary threshold from three-quarters to two-thirds, and read the referendum threshold from three-quarters of all registered voters to a majority of voters voting in the referendum.

42. The Society respectfully welcomes the Court's confirmation that constitutional amendment should not be effected by Parliament alone. A referendum requirement is an important democratic safeguard. It recognises that the Constitution belongs to the people and that changes to the constitutional compact should command direct public approval, not merely parliamentary support.

43. At the same time, the Society respectfully disagrees with the Court's referendum formula. A bare majority of those voting in a referendum may be too low a threshold for constitutional change, particularly where amendments affect the Bill of Rights, the courts, electoral rules, constitutional offices, land protections, amendment procedures or other foundational features of the State. Such matters should require a broader national consensus.

44. The Society therefore recommends that the Constitution entrench a workable but robust amendment procedure. Constitutional amendments should require:

    (a) approval at the relevant parliamentary readings by at least two-thirds of Members of Parliament voting;

    (b) adequate public consultation before final parliamentary approval;

    (c) review by an appropriate parliamentary committee;

    (d) approval in a referendum by at least two-thirds of voters voting; and

    (e) continuing jurisdiction of the courts to determine whether the amendment procedure has been complied with.

45. This formula avoids two extremes. It avoids an unworkable amendment process that makes constitutional reform practically impossible. It also avoids a process that permits foundational constitutional change by a narrow or temporary majority. It preserves constitutional stability while allowing democratic correction where there is broad parliamentary and popular support.

46. For amendments affecting the Bill of Rights, access to courts, judicial independence, electoral democracy, independent constitutional offices, land protections or the amendment procedure itself, the same referendum requirement should apply at minimum. The Constitution should also provide that no amendment may abolish constitutional supremacy, equal citizenship, the essential content of rights, access to courts, judicial review, judicial independence or the rule of law.

The Fiji Law Society's Statutory Role and the Legal Profession

47. The Society's submission is grounded in its statutory functions. Under the Legal Practitioners Act 2009, the Society is not merely an association of practitioners. It is a continuing statutory body with law-reform, public-protection and professional-integrity objects.

48. The Society's role in law reform is expressly recognised. Its statutory objects include assisting the Government in matters affecting legislation and law reform, aiding law reform, representing the views and interests of its members, and protecting and assisting the public in matters connected with the practice of law.

49. Constitutional reform should therefore recognise that the Society has a legitimate public voice in matters concerning the courts, the administration of justice, professional regulation, access to justice, rights protection, legislative quality and the rule of law.

50. The Society does not submit that the legal profession should regulate itself without accountability. Public protection, consumer protection, client complaints, trust-account supervision, discipline, and ethical standards are essential. However, professional regulation must be designed so that it is independent, fair, transparent and not susceptible to political or executive direction.

51. The rule of law depends on lawyers being able to advise clients, challenge government action, appear against the State, defend unpopular persons, and bring constitutional claims without fear that their practising status, discipline, professional institutions or regulatory environment may be influenced by political considerations.

Lessons from the Legal Practitioners Act 2009

52. The Legal Practitioners Act 2009 provides important context for constitutional reform. It contains a comprehensive framework for legal education, admission, practising certificates, trust accounts, costs, complaints, discipline, professional standards and professional conduct. It also preserves the Society as a statutory body.

Legal education and admission pathways

53. The Board of Legal Education is given responsibility for ensuring that the academic and practical qualifications of persons wishing to be admitted to practice are of high quality and sufficient to meet the needs of consumers of legal services.(LPA 2009.pdf, p. 6)

54. That is an important public function. However, the Board's composition includes members appointed by the Attorney-General, including the Chairperson. Constitutional design should ensure that legal education and admission standards are set through independent, expert, transparent and profession-inclusive processes.

The Society's internal autonomy

55. The Act recognises the Society's legal personality, Council, general meetings, voting, accounts and regulation-making powers. However, the Society's regulations require approval by special resolution and by the Attorney-General.

56. Constitutional reform should protect the institutional autonomy of professional bodies while ensuring accountability to members, the public and the law. The Society should be empowered to regulate and enforce standards on lawyers by having its power to issue and regulate the maintenance of practicing certificates returned to it, free to govern its internal affairs, speak on law reform, represent the profession, and contribute to public debate without executive approval or direction.

Practising certificates and professional independence

57. Practising certificates are a central mechanism by which the legal profession is regulated. The power to issue, renew, maintain, suspend and impose conditions on practising certificates determines who may practise law and on what terms. It therefore has direct implications for access to justice, client protection, professional independence and the rule of law.

58. The Society recommends that the Fiji Law Society should have constitutional or statutory authority to issue, renew, maintain and set conditions for practising certificates for legal practitioners, subject to clear criteria, procedural fairness, publication of rules, protection against arbitrary decision-making, and review by an independent court.

59. This reform would serve several rule-of-law objectives. It would allow the profession's independent body to enforce professional standards, require continuing professional development, ensure compliance with trust-account and client-protection obligations, monitor professional indemnity or other risk-management requirements where applicable, and impose proportionate conditions where a practitioner requires supervision, training or practice restrictions.

60. The power should not be used to protect lawyers from accountability. On the contrary, it should strengthen accountability by placing regulatory responsibility in an independent professional body that is subject to law, transparent rules, public-interest duties and court supervision.

61. Because practising certificates determine whether lawyers may appear in court, advise clients, challenge government action, defend accused persons and bring constitutional claims, the power should not be controlled by the executive. Executive control or influence over practising certificates may create a real or perceived risk that lawyers who act against the State, represent unpopular clients, or challenge unlawful public power could be exposed to regulatory pressure. That risk is inconsistent with legal-profession independence and the rule of law.

62. The Society therefore submits that practising-certificate powers should be vested in the Fiji Law Society, with appropriate safeguards: transparent eligibility criteria, published conditions, reasons for adverse decisions, internal review where appropriate, appeal or judicial review, protection of client interests, and public reporting.

Independent Legal Services Commission

63. The Act establishes the Independent Legal Services Commission and vests its powers, functions and duties in a Commissioner.

64. The Commission's independence is recognised in one respect: in performing functions or exercising powers, it is not subject to direction or control of any person or authority, except a court of law or as otherwise provided by the Act.

65. However, that independence is qualified by several provisions. The Commissioner is appointed by the President on the advice of the Attorney-General. The Minister may give general policy, administrative and financial guidelines to the Commission, and the Commission must act in accordance with those guidelines. Key staffing and employment matters also require Attorney-General approval.

66. These provisions create a structural risk. A body responsible for disciplining lawyers must protect clients and the public, but it must also be institutionally independent from the executive. If lawyers may be disciplined, suspended, investigated or publicly accused through institutions whose appointment, funding, staffing or removal arrangements are executive-sensitive, public confidence in the profession and in the administration of justice may be weakened.

67. The Society recommends that the Constitution require legal-services disciplinary institutions to have appointment by an independent, plural and transparent process; fixed terms subject to removal only for proved inability or misbehaviour after independent inquiry; remuneration and funding protected against arbitrary adverse variation; staff appointed independently on merit; transparent rules; procedural fairness; protection of privilege and confidentiality; reasoned decisions; public reporting; and review by independent courts.

Judicial Independence and the Administration of Justice

68. Judicial independence is essential to constitutional government. Courts must be able to decide disputes involving the State, Parliament, Ministers, public bodies, private parties and individuals without fear, favour or prejudice.

69. The existing constitutional framework gives the Attorney-General a recurring consultative role in judicial appointments and legal institutions. The Judicial Services Commission includes the Permanent Secretary responsible for justice and a legal practitioner appointed following consultation with the Attorney-General.(2013 Constitution.pdf, p. 67)(2013 Constitution.pdf, p. 67)

70. The Constitution should establish a reformed Judicial Services Commission with a balanced and independent composition. It should include judicial members, President of the Fiji Law Society, legally qualified members appointed through merit-based procedures, and lay members selected through a transparent process.

71. No voting member of the Judicial Services Commission should be a Minister, political office holder, permanent secretary, active party officer, or person subject to direct executive direction.

Independent State Institutions and the Appointment of Critical State Officers

72. The rule of law requires institutions that are capable of restraining unlawful power. Constitutional democracy is not secured only by periodic elections. It also depends on independent officers and institutions that can administer elections fairly, adjudicate disputes impartially, prosecute without fear or favour, audit public expenditure, investigate corruption, protect human rights, regulate the public service, supervise public administration, and preserve the independence of the legal profession.

73. The independence of the institutions responsible for appointing critical state officers is itself a constitutional safeguard. If the appointment body is dominated by the executive, the office being filled may be formally independent but practically dependent. The Constitution should therefore protect not only the independence of office holders after appointment, but also the independence, composition, procedure and accountability of the bodies that appoint them.

74. Critical state officers should include, at minimum:

    (a) the Chief Justice, President of the Court of Appeal, judges, magistrates and other judicial officers;

    (b) members of the Judicial Services Commission;

    (c) members of the Electoral Commission, the Supervisor of Elections and electoral-boundaries decision-makers;

    (d) the Director of Public Prosecutions and any constitutionally independent prosecutorial authority;

    (e) the Auditor-General and officers responsible for independent audit of public money;

    (f) commissioners or heads of anti-corruption bodies;

    (g) members of the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission;

(h) members of the Public Service Commission and officers responsible for merit-based public appointments;

(i) a new Ombudsman, to be constitutionally established to investigate maladministration, abuse of executive power, unreasonable delay, unfair administrative action and systemic failures in public administration;

(j) accountability, transparency, integrity or leadership-code officers;

(k) the Solicitor-General where that office performs constitutional, public-interest or legal-certification functions; and

(l) legal-services regulatory officers, including officers responsible for admission, discipline and complaints against lawyers.

75. Appointment bodies for critical state officers should be constitutionally established or constitutionally protected. They should not be created, restructured, suspended or abolished by ordinary legislation in a manner that undermines their independence.

76. No appointment body for critical state officers should be subject to direction or control by the Prime Minister, Attorney-General, Cabinet, a Minister, a political party, or any person exercising executive authority.

77. No Constitutional Offices Commission, Judicial Services Commission, or other appointment body responsible for critical state officers should include the Prime Minister, the Attorney-General, any Minister, any Assistant Minister, any Member of Parliament, any office holder of a political party, or any person subject to direct executive direction.

78. The Attorney-General may be consulted as the Government's principal legal adviser where appropriate, but should not sit as a voting member, control the process, exercise a veto, or act as the recurring gatekeeper for appointments to offices that may be required to scrutinise, investigate, prosecute, audit, regulate, advise upon, or adjudicate the legality of executive action.

79. Appointment bodies should have plural composition. No single office holder or political branch should be able to command a majority of an appointment body. Members should be selected through different constitutional channels so that the body reflects institutional balance rather than executive preference.

80. All appointments to critical state offices should be made on published criteria, including competence, integrity, independence, impartiality, experience, temperament, commitment to constitutional values, and freedom from conflicts of interest.

81. Critical state officers should have secure tenure for fixed constitutional terms. They should not depend on executive favour for continuation, renewal, acting appointment, remuneration, staffing or operating funds.

82. Removal should be possible only for proved inability, incapacity, serious misconduct or other constitutionally specified cause, following an independent inquiry, procedural fairness, reasons and review by a court.

83. Acting appointments should be time-limited, justified in writing, subject to the same eligibility and independence standards as permanent appointments, and not renewable indefinitely. A person should not serve for a prolonged period in an acting capacity where the practical effect is to avoid the constitutional appointment process.

84. Independent institutions require practical capacity. The Constitution should protect adequate funding, independent staffing, control over internal administration, and direct reporting to Parliament or another constitutionally appropriate public forum.

85. Independence does not mean absence of accountability. Independent institutions should be accountable through law, reasons, audits, annual reports, parliamentary scrutiny, codes of conduct, conflict-of-interest rules, judicial review and public transparency. However, accountability mechanisms must not become mechanisms of political control.

Creation of an Ombudsman to Oversee Executive Action

86. The current Constitution does not appear to establish an Ombudsman as a constitutional office. The Society recommends that the Constitution create an independent Ombudsman to strengthen the rule of law by overseeing executive and administrative action.

87. The Ombudsman should have power to receive complaints from the public, investigate maladministration, unreasonable delay, abuse of discretion, unfair administrative action, failure to give reasons, systemic administrative failure, and conduct by public authorities that is lawful in form but oppressive, unfair or inconsistent with good administration.

88. The Ombudsman should be independent of the executive, appointed through the same plural and merit-based appointment principles recommended for other critical state officers, protected by secure tenure and adequate funding, and empowered to report directly to Parliament and the public. The office should complement, not replace, judicial review, the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission, the Auditor-General, anti-corruption institutions or parliamentary scrutiny.

Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption

89. The Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption has exercised significant coercive powers in an area closely connected with public confidence, political accountability and the rule of law. Anti-corruption enforcement is important, but it must be institutionally independent, procedurally fair and protected from actual or perceived political use.

90. The Society recommends that the Commission consider whether FICAC should be abolished and its functions redistributed to constitutionally appropriate institutions. Investigation of corruption may be vested in an independent investigative body such as the Fiji Police, but prosecution should ordinarily rest with the Director of Public Prosecutions, whose constitutional independence should be strengthened. This would better separate investigation from prosecution and reduce the risk of a single institution exercising excessive coercive power.

91. If FICAC is retained, its role should be limited to investigation only. Decisions whether to prosecute should be made by the Director of Public Prosecutions independently and in accordance with published prosecution guidelines. FICAC should not have independent prosecutorial authority, should not be subject to ministerial direction, and should be accountable through judicial review, parliamentary reporting, financial audit, procedural safeguards and clear limits on coercive powers.

92. The Constitution should also ensure that any anti-corruption investigative body is appointed through an independent, transparent and merit-based process; has secure tenure and adequate funding; is prohibited from acting for improper political purposes; and is subject to court supervision where its powers affect liberty, property, privacy, reputation or legal professional privilege.

Parliament, Law-Making and Public Participation

93. The Constitution should strengthen Parliament as the central forum for democratic deliberation and executive accountability.

94. Legislative quality is a rule-of-law issue. Laws that affect rights, property, public finance, customary interests, criminal liability, institutional independence, professional regulation or economic activity should not be passed without adequate public scrutiny except in genuine emergencies.

95. The Constitution should require minimum public consultation periods for significant Bills; publication of Bills and explanatory materials before parliamentary debate; rights-impact statements; institutional-independence impact statements; economic and fiscal impact assessments; committee review before final passage, except in certified emergencies; public submissions and hearings where practicable; special scrutiny of Bills that limit rights; and post-enactment review of urgent legislation.

96. Bills affecting the legal profession, courts, judicial administration, access to justice, professional privilege, legal aid, professional discipline or practising rights should require consultation with the judiciary, the Fiji Law Society, affected institutions, civil society and the public.

Electoral Reform: Effective Representation and Accountability

97. The current single national constituency open-list proportional representation system should be replaced or substantially reformed. The purpose of reform should be to improve democratic accountability while preserving equal representation, equal voting rights and common citizenship as the foundation of electoral rights.

98. The current system treats votes equally at the national level and can produce a proportional Parliament. However, it weakens the direct connection between voters and identifiable Members of Parliament, reduces local accountability, encourages centralised campaigning, and may make it harder for rural, maritime and local communities to know who is responsible for representing them.

99. The Society does not propose abandoning proportional representation. The electoral system should remain a form of proportional representation under which the overall allocation of seats in Parliament is determined, as fairly as practicable, by the number and proportion of votes received by each political party. The reform required is to combine proportionality with constituency accountability, so that political parties receive seats broadly in accordance with their national or regional vote while voters also have identifiable Members of Parliament answerable to them.

100. The central democratic problem is that a voter should be able to identify a Member of Parliament, or a small group of Members, who is answerable to that voter's constituency. Accountability should be territorial, civic and grounded in equal representation and equal voting rights.

101. The Society recommends a mixed-member electoral system under which:

(a) a significant number of Members of Parliament are elected from geographic constituencies based on equal representation and equal voting rights;

(b) each constituency may, where appropriate, elect at least two Members of Parliament, so that electors have identifiable representatives while avoiding an overly narrow or exclusionary single-member model;

(c) a proportional component ensures that the overall composition of Parliament broadly reflects the number and proportion of votes received by each political party, whether calculated nationally or regionally;

(d) constituency boundaries are drawn by an independent boundaries commission according to population equality, geography, community of interest, transport links, provincial and municipal considerations, and the special circumstances of maritime and remote communities;

(e) boundaries are drawn by reference to objective and equal-representation criteria, and not by reference to separate ethnic, religious or other group-based electoral categories;

(f) the system preserves equal suffrage while improving local accountability; and

(g) voters have identifiable constituency representatives and a meaningful party or proportional vote.

102. If a full mixed-member system is not adopted, the Constitution should at least replace the single national constituency with regional multi-member constituencies based on equal representation and equal voting rights. The Commission should consider whether each such constituency should return at least two Members of Parliament. The object should remain the same: to ensure that Members of Parliament are accountable to identifiable territorial constituencies while preserving equal voting rights and overall fairness in the translation of votes into seats.

National Unity, Equal Citizenship and the Special Position of the iTaukei

103. Fiji's Constitution should continue to affirm a single national identity and the equal citizenship of all Fijians. Equal citizenship is essential to peace, confidence, mobility, education, employment, investment and shared national life.

104. Equal citizenship does not require the Constitution to ignore the special position of the iTaukei. Properly framed, constitutional recognition of the iTaukei is compatible with national unity and equality.

105. The Constitution should recognise that the iTaukei are indigenous to Fiji; that iTaukei land has a unique constitutional status; and that iTaukei culture, language, customs, traditional knowledge and institutions are foundational to Fiji's identity.

106. Recognition should not be limited to symbolic language. The Constitution should create an enabling environment in which iTaukei communities can participate actively and fairly in the national economy, including through education, finance, professional services, procurement, joint ventures, management capacity, training, enterprise development and resource governance.

Property, Land, Resources and Economic Certainty

107. The Constitution should protect property rights while preserving the special constitutional status of iTaukei, Rotuman and Banaban lands.

108. Laws affecting property, leases, licences, customary rights, land use, resource rights or compensation should be clear, prospective, non-arbitrary and subject to court review.

109. Constitutional reform should distinguish carefully between ownership rights, customary rights, access rights, management rights, benefit-sharing rights, regulatory powers, public rights and commercial rights.

110. In relation to marine and natural resources, customary interests should be recognised through consultation, benefit sharing, co-management, compensation where appropriate, environmental stewardship, customary participation in regulatory decisions, access to commercial opportunities and dispute-resolution processes subject to court supervision.

111. The Constitution should avoid models that fragment national resources into exclusive sectors in a way that creates uncertainty about public access, navigation, inter-community movement, recreational use, commercial development, investment or the State's ability to regulate in the public interest.

Immunity, Accountability and Constitutional Legality

112. The immunity provisions in the existing Constitution raise serious rule-of-law concerns. Constitutional supremacy is weakened if some conduct is permanently placed beyond legal scrutiny and if courts are prevented from considering the legality, scope or consequences of immunity provisions.

113. The Society recognises that questions of immunity may involve historical, political and transitional considerations. However, a future constitutional settlement should not entrench permanent legal impunity or prevent courts from performing their constitutional function.

114. The Constitution should remove blanket ouster clauses preventing courts from hearing challenges concerning immunity; provide that no future immunity may be granted for unconstitutional overthrow, serious human-rights violations, torture, unlawful killing, enforced disappearance, sexual violence, corruption, abuse of office or other serious criminal conduct; provide that any immunity must be strictly construed; and preserve the right of courts to determine whether an immunity applies on the facts.

Transitional Review of Existing Laws

115. Transitional arrangements should be clear, time-limited and consistent with constitutional supremacy.

116. Where existing laws are preserved, they should be subject to the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. Transitional provisions should not permanently immunise ordinary laws from constitutional review.

117. The Constitution should require a systematic review of existing laws for consistency with the new constitutional framework within a defined period.

118. Priority should be given to laws affecting rights, elections, media, public order, land, resources, courts, tribunals, professional regulation, public finance and institutional independence.

119. The Legal Practitioners Act 2009 should be included in that review. The review should preserve public-protection mechanisms and professional standards while reforming any provisions inconsistent with legal-profession independence, institutional independence, procedural fairness, access to courts and constitutional supremacy.

Proposed Textual Directions for the Commission

120. Without attempting to draft a complete Constitution, the Society suggests the following textual directions for consideration.

Rule of Law

121. The Constitution should provide that:

> The Constitution shall continue to recognise the rule of law as a founding value of the State. The rule of law includes constitutional supremacy, equality before the law, access to courts, effective remedies, fair administrative action, separation of powers, judicial independence, the independence of the legal profession, legal professional privilege, transparent public power, accountable government, and independent institutions capable of checking abuse of public power.

Bill of Rights limitation and entrenchment

122. The Constitution should provide that:

> A right or freedom in the Bill of Rights may be limited only by a law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable, necessary and proportionate in a free and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account the nature of the right, the importance of the purpose of the limitation, the nature and extent of the limitation, the relationship between the limitation and its purpose, and whether less restrictive means are reasonably available.

123. It should further provide that:

No law may limit a right so as to extinguish its essential content, and every limitation of a right is subject to review by an independent court.

124. It should further provide that:

No amendment to the Bill of Rights, and no amendment that has the purpose or effect of reducing the scope, enforceability or essential content of a right or freedom, shall be valid unless approved in accordance with the special amendment procedure for this Constitution, including a special parliamentary majority, adequate public consultation, and referendum approval where required.

Constitutional amendment and referendum

125. The Constitution should provide that:

A Bill to amend this Constitution shall be valid only if it is passed at the relevant parliamentary readings by the votes of at least two-thirds of the Members of Parliament voting, after adequate public consultation and committee scrutiny, and is then approved in a referendum by at least two-thirds of voters voting in the referendum.

126.It should further provide that:

No amendment to the Bill of Rights, access to courts, judicial independence, electoral democracy, independent constitutional offices, land protections or the amendment procedure itself shall take effect unless approved in accordance with that procedure.

127. It should further provide that:

The High Court shall have jurisdiction to determine whether the constitutional amendment procedure has been complied with and whether any purported amendment is consistent with constitutional supremacy, equal citizenship, the essential content of rights, access to courts, judicial review, judicial independence and the rule of law.

Access to courts

128. The Constitution should provide that:

No law may exclude or restrict the jurisdiction of a court to determine whether any law, conduct, decision or omission is consistent with this Constitution, or to grant an effective remedy for a breach of this Constitution.

129. It should further provide that:

A provision of any law stating that a decision is final or conclusive does not prevent review by a court for constitutional invalidity, jurisdictional error, breach of natural justice, bad faith, improper purpose, irrationality, disproportionality or infringement of rights.

Legal-profession independence

130. The Constitution should provide that:

The State must ensure that the legal profession is regulated by law in a manner that protects the public, maintains professional standards, preserves the independence of legal practitioners, and secures fair, transparent and judicially reviewable disciplinary processes.

131. It should further provide that:

No Minister or political office holder may direct a legal-services regulator in relation to a particular person, complaint, investigation, disciplinary proceeding, practising certificate, admission decision, or professional body.

132. It should further provide that:

The Fiji Law Society shall have authority, in accordance with law, to issue, renew, maintain, suspend and impose conditions on practising certificates for legal practitioners. In exercising that authority, the Society shall act independently, transparently, fairly and in the public interest, and its decisions shall be subject to review by an independent court.

133. It should further provide that:

The practising-certificate system shall be directed to maintaining professional standards, protecting clients and the public, securing compliance with ethical, trust-account, continuing professional development and risk-management obligations, and preserving the independence of legal practitioners from improper political or executive influence.

Independent appointment institutions for critical state officers

134. The Constitution should provide that:

> Critical state officers whose independence is necessary for constitutional democracy and the rule of law must be appointed through independent, plural, transparent and merit-based appointment bodies that are not subject to direction or control by the Prime Minister, Attorney-General, Cabinet, a Minister, a political party, or any person exercising executive authority.

135. It should further provide that:

> Critical state officers include judicial officers, electoral officers, prosecutorial officers, audit officers, anti-corruption officers, human-rights commissioners, public-service commissioners, the Ombudsman, integrity and accountability officers, legal-services regulatory officers, and any other officer whose functions require independence from political direction.

136. It should further provide that:

> Critical state officers must have security of tenure, protected remuneration, adequate institutional funding, independent staffing, and protection from removal except for constitutionally specified cause after independent inquiry and procedural fairness.

Ombudsman

137. The Constitution should provide that:

> There shall be an independent Ombudsman with power to investigate maladministration, abuse of executive or administrative power, unreasonable delay, unfair administrative action, failure to give reasons, and systemic failures in public administration. The Ombudsman shall be independent, adequately funded, appointed through an independent and merit-based process, protected from arbitrary removal, and empowered to report directly to Parliament and the public.

Electoral representation

138. The Constitution should provide that:

> Members of Parliament shall be elected under an electoral system that ensures universal and equal suffrage, free and fair elections, equal representation, equal voting rights, accountability of Members of Parliament to identifiable territorial constituencies, and overall fairness in the translation of votes into seats. The electoral system shall be founded on common citizenship and shall not create separate electoral categories or voting rights for different groups of citizens. Parliament may provide for multi-member territorial constituencies, including constituencies returning at least two Members of Parliament, where this better secures accountability, inclusion and effective representation.

National unity and iTaukei recognition

139. The Constitution should provide that:

> Fiji is a sovereign democratic State founded on common and equal citizenship, national unity, respect for human rights, the rule of law, the separation of powers, good governance, transparency, accountability, environmental stewardship, and recognition of the indigenous iTaukei people, their land, culture, customs, language, traditional institutions and development aspirations.

140. It should further provide that:

> Recognition of the special position of the iTaukei must be interpreted consistently with the equal citizenship and fundamental rights of all Fijians, and with the duty of the State to promote national unity, social cohesion and fair participation in national development.

Topic	Recommended constitutional reform	Reason
Rule of law	Preserve and strengthen the existing rule-of-law foundation	Gives practical effect to constitutional supremacy, rights, courts and institutional accountability
Equal rights	Protect equal citizenship and substantive equality	Maintains national unity and fair participation for all communities
Bill of Rights	Add a proportionality-based limitation clause, special parliamentary-majority safeguards, public consultation and referendum approval for serious rights-reducing amendments	Protects rights against legislative and constitutional erosion

Access to courts	Prohibit ouster of constitutional, jurisdictional and procedural review	Ensures effective remedies and legality
Constitutional amendment	Require two-thirds of MPs voting and two-thirds of voters voting in a referendum	Preserves democratic amendability while requiring broad national consent
Fiji Law Society	Recognise the Society's public law-reform and rule-of-law role	Gives practical effect to the Society's statutory objects
Legal profession	Protect the independence of the legal profession	Ensures lawyers can represent clients and challenge unlawful power without improper pressure
Practising certificates	Vest authority in the Fiji Law Society to issue, renew, maintain, suspend and impose conditions on practising certificates, subject to clear legal criteria, procedural fairness and court review.	Strengthens independent professional regulation, enforcement of standards, client protection and legal-profession independence.
Legal-services regulation	Make admission, discipline and practising-certificate systems independent, fair and reviewable	Protects the public while preserving professional independence
Judicial Services Commission	Reform and strengthen the Judicial Services Commission; exclude the Prime Minister, Attorney-General, Ministers, MPs, political party officers and persons subject to executive direction from membership	Strengthens actual and perceived judicial independence
Constitutional Offices Commission / appointment	Constitutionally protect independent, plural and transparent appointment bodies; exclude the Prime Minister, Attorney-General, Ministers, MPs, political party	Prevents democratic safeguards from being captured through executive-controlled

bodies	officers and persons subject to executive direction	appointments
Critical state officers	Protect appointment, tenure, remuneration, removal and acting appointments for judges, electoral officers, prosecutors, auditors, anti-corruption officers, human-rights commissioners, public-service commissioners, the Ombudsman and legal regulators	Secures the independence of offices essential to democratic government
Ombudsman	Establish an independent constitutional Ombudsman	Strengthens non-judicial accountability and remedies for unfair public administration
FICAC / anti-corruption enforcement	Consider abolishing FICAC and reallocating functions; if retained, limit FICAC to investigation only, with prosecution decisions reserved to the DPP	Separates investigation from prosecution and reduces risk of politicised or excessive coercive power
Electoral system	Adopt a proportional electoral system that reflects the number and proportion of votes received by political parties, while using geographic or regional multi-member constituencies based on equal representation and equal voting rights, possibly returning at least two MPs each.	Combines proportional fairness with MP accountability to identifiable territorial constituencies while preserving equal citizenship
Equal representation and voting	Preserve one common electoral roll and equal voting rights for all citizens, without separate electoral categories.	Preserves common citizenship, equal representation and equal suffrage.
National unity	Preserve common and equal citizenry while recognising the special position of the iTaukei	Supports unity, identity and social cohesion
Property and	Clarify property, customary, public and	Promotes certainty, resources	regulatory rights	fairness and development

Immunity	Remove or narrow entrenched immunity and court-exclusion provisions	Restores equality before law and constitutional supremacy
Transitional review	Require review of existing laws, including the Legal Practitioners Act 2009	Aligns ordinary law with the new constitutional settlement

Conclusion

141. Fiji's constitutional review is an opportunity to strengthen a national settlement that protects every citizen, recognises the special position of the iTaukei, and secures the rule of law for future generations.

142. The Society respectfully submits that constitutional reform should preserve the 2013 Constitution's existing rule-of-law commitments while strengthening their practical effect through equal rights, Bill of Rights supremacy, access to courts, effective remedies, independent institutions, and a workable but robust amendment process requiring broad parliamentary and popular consent.

143. The Constitution should not be so rigid that democratic reform becomes impossible. Nor should it be so flexible that fundamental rights, judicial independence, equal citizenship, electoral democracy or institutional independence can be altered by a transient majority. The appropriate balance is a constitutional amendment formula requiring at least two-thirds of Members of Parliament voting and at least two-thirds of voters voting in a referendum.

144. The Society further submits that the independence of the legal profession, the courts, the Judicial Services Commission, accountability institutions, and appointment bodies for critical state officers is central to the rule of law. These safeguards protect the public, not merely institutions or office holders.

145. The Commission is respectfully urged to recommend reforms that create a Constitution capable of commanding broad public confidence: a Constitution that is stable but amendable, rights-protecting but practical, culturally grounded but inclusive, and strong enough to uphold the rule of law for all Fijians.

Fiji Law Society

.....

Wylie Clarke

PRESIDENT

Fiji Rotuman Association (FRA)

Rotuma Council Association
Monday 29 June 2026
2pm-3pm

Mr. Leighton: Members of the Fiji Rotuman Association, Noa'ia Mauri Faieksia, and thank you for taking up the invitation of the Commission to be here today and make submissions. As advised, if you wish, you can speak in Rotuman. Dr. Fatiaki will then translate.

But please, thank you very much for coming today and availing yourselves. I've also printed out the written submissions, which were greatly appreciated, and all the Commission members have them in front of them. Just a few housekeeping matters.

My name is Leighton Fatiaki. I'll just have the role of introducing the Commissioners. Also, if you are making submissions, the mics in front of you. Just press on the right side of the mic, the right panel. The mic will come on, and then you can talk, and then press the same panel to just turn it off. Before you make a submission, we request if you can just state your name for the record so everything is being recorded, audio and video, and is also being transcribed so that we know who's making the submissions.

Just by way of introduction, the Commission is a six-member team. Seated to the far right is Mr. Conway Beg, a well-known architect within Fiji and the Pacific, as well as with the Fiji Rugby Union. Seated next to him is Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau.

She's a development and communication specialist with extensive experience. Seated next to her is Dr. John Charles Fatiaki, a medical practitioner, former senator, and also current special administrator of the Suva City Council. Seated next to him is the Chair of the Commission, Mr. Sevuloni Valenitabua. He is a very prominent lawyer, especially a defense lawyer within the Pacific. He has also worked with the Fiji Human Rights Commission, as well as other countries in the Pacific. Seated next to him is another lawyer, a prominent lawyer from Labasa, Mr. Ami Kohli, with his own firm in Labasa, Koli & Singh.

And next to him is Dr. Neelesh Gounder, a well-known economist and USP lecturer. With that, I will now hand over to the Chair to introduce the Commission and the work that they'll be undertaking. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, Leighton. Mr. Faktaufon and members of the Fiji Rotuma Association, we welcome you all to Level 9, Suvavou House. This afternoon, we welcome you before the Commission.

You will note that we have six members of the Commission sitting here today. We've been around the country. We were separated into two teams.

Dr. Fatiaki led one team, and I led one team. And we went around our country so that we could gather submissions and recommendations from citizens of this country in relation to what they consider to be appropriate provisions to be included in the Constitution. We have started in Suvavou today.

Tomorrow, a team is again going to Rotuma to get reviews and recommendations from the island of Rotuma. The purpose of this Commission is to review the 2013 Constitution. We were appointed by His Excellency, the President of the Republic of Fiji, and the task that we were given was to review the 2013 Constitution.

In other words, review means we can amend, we can add laws to the Constitution, we can remove laws from the Constitution, and we can amend the laws within the Constitution. Those are the things that constitute what we are referring to as reviewing the Constitution. Eventually, we will make recommendations to His Excellency, the President of the country, on what should be included in the amended Constitution, and we will also have a draft amended Constitution prepared so that our recommendations could be reflected in the amended Constitution before we hand the documents which we will be preparing to His Excellency, the President of the country.

Now, your attendance this afternoon is significant. It's important so that we can hear from your association on matters which we believe might relate to Rotuman's as a whole and maybe to the other things that concern us within the Republic of Fiji. We are here to listen.

We might ask questions later on. We might make comments. And feel free to speak Rotuman because we've got Dr. Fatiaki here and also Leighton Fatiaki who will be able, I'm sure, to translate to us non-Rotuman speakers.

Now, with those few words, I welcome all of you, and I now open the floor to you, Mr. Faktaufon, and ladies and gentlemen, for your submissions to be presented to the Commission this afternoon.

Mr. Faktaufon: Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and to the Commission. As mentioned earlier, we're here on behalf of the Fiji Rotuma Association. There will be three of the speakers who will be speaking shortly. As an introduction, we are the legal team for the Fiji Rotuma Association, but the association has prepared their papers, and I will then hand over to them now to speak.

Ms. Agatha: Noa'ia Mauri. My name is Agatha Ferei Furivai. I bring greetings on behalf of our chairperson, Mr. Victor Fatiaki, who is unable to join our team this afternoon. And so, as a committee, we have Mr Sagaitu Wasile seated on my left as the Vice Chair of the association. The submission that we have this afternoon is a summary of what we have as a written submission, and also with this presentation, there'll be two from different districts that have presented. The oral submission that I'm going to present today and the written one was endorsed by the Council in its meeting last Saturday. Hence, we have three district contributions, which we are happy to also add on as an annexes to our current summary of our written submission.

To the Honorable Chairperson, distinguished members of the Constitution Review Committee, ladies and gentlemen, Noa'ia Mauri. Today, I have the privilege of presenting a summary of the Fiji Rotuman Association constitutional submission on behalf of the association, our council, secretariat, representatives and members of the seven associations in Suva and the wider Rotuman communities in Fiji and throughout the diaspora.

Thank you again for the opportunity to present this submission. It is aligned to the detailed written one sent earlier this morning. There is an additional recommendation in this oral submission that was also discussed in our meeting dated 27th June, 2026.

Both submissions, as I have mentioned earlier, were endorsed by the Council in its meeting last Saturday. This particular submission is made in the spirit of national unity, constructive dialogue and respect for the Republic of Fiji. It does not seek separation or special privilege.

Rather, it seeks to strengthen Fiji's constitution by ensuring that it fully recognizes and protects the unique identity, rights and participation of the Rotuman people.

The purpose of this submission proposes constitutional amendments in four key areas. One, the recognition of the indigenous birthright of Rotuman's. Two, recognition of the Rotuman diaspora. Three, pathways for citizenship, restoration for Rotuman's living overseas. And four, guaranteed parliamentary representation for the Rotuman people.

Needed changes? While the current 2020-2013 constitution recognizes the Rotuman people, their land, language and culture, the Association believes that recognition alone is not enough. There remains a gap between constitutional recognition and meaningful participation. Specifically, the submission highlights five concerns that states, one, traditional governance institutions, such as the Council of Rotuman's, are not constitutionally protected. There is no constitutional requirement for government to consult Rotuman institutions on matters affecting Rotuman land, culture or governance. There is no binding duty to preserve the Rotuman language and the constitution does not clearly distinguish indigenous birthrights from legal citizenship. Rotuman's have no guaranteed representation in Parliament.

Recognition of indigenous birthright? A central principle of this submission is that being Rotuman is rooted in its ancestry, culture, language, customary affiliation and land, not simply in citizenship. Many Rotuman's now live overseas, yet they continue to maintain strong family, cultural and customary ties with Rotuma. The Association therefore proposes that the Constitution recognize this enduring indigenous birthright independently of citizenship status.

Proposal for a treaty of self-governance. The Fiji Rotuman Association also respectfully proposes that consideration be given to the development of a treaty of self-governance between the Rotuman Islander Council and the government of the Republic of Fiji. Such a treaty would not alter Rotuma's place within Fiji, nor would it seek separation or independence.

Rather, it would establish a clear constitutional and legal framework that recognizes the distinct historical, cultural and customary relationship between Rotuma and the state. The treaty could define the respective roles and responsibilities of both parties in such areas as the protection of Rotuma customary governance, administration of Rotuman land and maritime resources, preservation of language and cultural heritage, local governance and community development, consultation on matters affecting Rotuma, and cooperation between the Rotuma Island Council and the government of Fiji. This approach would provide certainty, strengthen partnership, and promote mutual respect while reinforcing national unity and good governance.

Recognition of the Rotuman diaspora. The submission also acknowledges that a significant number of Rotuman's now live outside Fiji. Despite this, they continue to contribute socially, culturally and economically to Rotuma. The Constitution should therefore recognize the Rotuman diaspora as an integral part of the Rotuman people and encourage ongoing connections with their homeland. Learning from other Pacific nations, the association points out that several Pacific countries already provide constitutional protections for their indigenous people. Examples include reserved Maori parliamentary seats in New Zealand, recognition of customary governance in Samoa, traditional leadership structures in Vanuatu, and citizenship pathways for diaspora communities in Samoa and Tonga. These examples demonstrate that constitutional equality sometimes requires practical protections for smaller indigenous communities.

Key recommendations.

The submission respectfully asks the Committee to consider the following recommendations:

Recognition of indigenous Rotuman birthright. Recognition of both the Itaukei and Rotuman peoples as Fiji's indigenous people. Stronger protection of the Rotuman language and cultural heritage and constitutional protection of Rotuman land tenure and customary ownership.

Guaranteed parliamentary representation for Rotuman's. Constitutional protection of the Council of Rotuma. Mandatory consultation before laws affecting Rotuma are passed.

And recognition of the Rotuman diaspora, citizenship restoration pathways for indigenous Rotuman's abroad. Treaty of self-governance.

The constitution should provide for or enable the negotiation of a treaty of self-governance between the Rotuman Island Council and the government of the Republic of Fiji.

The treaty would affirm Rotuma's unique constitutional and historical status between the two parties and strengthen local self-governance while affirming that Rotuma remains an integral part of the Republic of Fiji. Commitment to national unity. Importantly, the Fiji Rotuman Association clearly states that these proposals do not seek separation, do not seek division, do not seek privilege.

Instead, they seek constitutional completeness within national unity. Recognizing Rotuma as an integral part of Fiji while ensuring that one of Fiji's smallest indigenous communities continue to have a meaningful voice in national life. In conclusion, this submission asks that the Fiji Constitution move from recognition to representation, from symbolic inclusion to structural inclusion, from acknowledging identity to protecting identity.

The Fiji Rotuman Association respectfully invites the Constitution Review Committee to consider these recommendations as a means of strengthening Fiji's democracy, preserving the unique heritage of the Rotuman people and ensuring that future generations, whether living in Rotuma, elsewhere in Fiji, or throughout the diaspora, remain connected to their ancestral homeland. Finally, we respectfully invite the Committee to consider a treaty of self-governance between the Rotuma Island Council and the Government of Fiji as a modern partnership that honors Rotuma's distinct identity, strengthens constitutional certainty, and reinforces our shared commitment to one peaceful, united, and prosperous Fiji. Faieksia. Vinaka Vakalevu and thank you.

Mr. Faktaufon: We also have Ms Sukafa Katafono, who will be giving a brief.

Ms. Sukafa: All protocols observed. Ladies and gentlemen, I would like to... I'm speaking from the Suva Itu'ti'u Association. My name is Sukafa Katafono.

I would like to speak from the perspective of the International Labour Organization, Convention 169 on the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples. So, this submission calls for the recognition and protection of the Rotuman people as a distinct indigenous community within Fiji, in alignment with Fiji's binding obligations under ILO Convention 169 and international indigenous rights standards. It argues that the current Constitution does not adequately recognize Rotuma's unique legal status, governance systems, cultural identity, and rights, creating a gap between domestic law and international obligations.

Fiji's ratification of the International Labour Organization's Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989, number 169, gives rise to binding obligations under international law, requiring the state to give effect to the Convention's provisions in its domestic legal order, and requiring the recognition, protection, and effective participation of the Rotuman people in national governance. While international treaties do not automatically become directly enforceable in domestic law, the state is nevertheless under a continuing duty to take legislative, administrative, and constitutional measures to ensure compliance. In this context, a constitutional framework that does not adequately recognize indigenous institutions, guarantee consultation through representative bodies, or protect land, resource, cultural, and participatory rights would be inconsistent with Fiji's international commitments under Convention 169.

Constitutional reform, therefore, presents both a legal obligation and a necessary mechanism for aligning Fiji's domestic framework with its binding international standards and for ensuring that those rights are given practical and enforceable effect. To address this, the submission proposes a dedicated constitutional chapter on Rotuma. Grounded in Convention 169 and the United Nations' Rights of Indigenous People, the submission emphasizes key rights including participation in decision-making, recognition of customary institutions, protection of land, marine, and natural resources, self-determined development, preservation of language, culture, and identity, prior and good faith consultation through representative institutions.

Applying these principles to Rotuma, the submission highlights the importance of the Council of Rotuman District Chiefs, as legitimate representative institutions. The protection of Rotuman land, resources, culture, language, and social systems, including the bilateral kinship structure. The recognition of the Christian faith and spirituality as central to Rotuman identity.

The submission proposes specific constitutional provisions to recognize Rotuma as a distinct indigenous people, ensure meaningful representation in Parliament, guarantee mandatory consultation before decisions affecting Rotuman's, protect land, sea, and resources rights, safeguard cultural, language, and institutions, enable effective participation in all levels of governance. It calls for inclusion of the Rotuman diaspora in consultation and development, consideration of innovative governance models to strengthen representation, and I make mention of the Saana Parliament in the Nordic regions of the north, a progressive autonomy framework to enhance Rotuman's capacity to manage its internal affairs. The submission concludes that recognition of Rotuman rights is a legal obligation, not a policy choice, and that constitutional reform is a critical opportunity to ensure compliance, strengthen national cohesion, and provide practical and forcible protection of Rotuman identity, governance, and rights.

And I read the conclusion. Recognition of Rotuman rights is not a matter of policy discretion. It is a legal obligation arising from Fiji's membership in the ILO and its ratification of international instruments, including ILO Convention 169.

The constitutional review process presents a critical opportunity to ensure that the Rotuman people, their institutions, and their identity are formally recognized, protected, and empowered within Fiji's constitutional framework. Taking action now will strengthen consultation, representation, and protection frameworks in a manner consistent with Fiji's international commitments and will support credible and constructive engagement with the ILO. I thank you for your attention.

Mr Pene Muli : Thank you. Thank you, Ms. Sukafa. Also, I'll ask Mr. Muli Pene, who also has a presentation from the Itumuta under the FRA.

Mr Pene Muli : Bula Vinaka, Chairperson and Honorable Commissioners. I, as you know, I appear before this Commission on behalf of the Suva-Itumuta Association. Suva-Itumuta Association represents Rotuman's originating from the district of Itumuta who reside in Suva and other parts of Fiji.Through our association, we maintain our cultural identity, language, traditions, family connections, and continuing ties with our homeland in Rotuma. We make this submission in response to Commissioner, in particular, Dr. John Fatiaki's invitation to Rotuman's residing in Fiji, Rotuma, and throughout the diaspora to participate in the constitutional review process. This submission is in support of the Fiji Rotuma Association submission.

It is our respectful submission that meaningful parliamentary representation for Rotuman's should be constitutional priority. Rotuma occupies a unique place within the Republic of Fiji. Rotuma is not merely another geographic region of Fiji.

Rotuma possesses its own history, language, culture, customs, traditions, and systems of governance. The people of Rotuma are recognized as one of Fiji's indigenous peoples and possess distinct identity that has been preserved over generations. Because of our small population size, however, Rotuman interests can easily become overlooked within a national electoral system that is based primarily on population numbers.

While we fully support the principle of equal citizenship and democratic participation, equality should not mean that small indigenous communities lose their voice within national institutions. The Constitution should therefore provide a mechanism that ensures Rotuman's interests are meaningfully represented and heard within Parliament. Historically, Fiji's constitutional arrangements had recognized the unique status of Rotuma through dedicated parliamentary representation.

These arrangements acknowledge the Rotuman circumstances. They recognize that population size alone should not determine whether an indigenous community has an effective voice in national decision-making. We respectfully submit that this principle remains relevant today.

The constitution should acknowledge that Rotuma's distinct identity justifies consideration of specific representational arrangements. With regards to the Rotuman diaspora, I wish to speak of my personal circumstances as an example to support the submission made by FRA with regards to indigenous rights versus citizenship. In 2022, while preparing to return permanently to Fiji after many years in Australia, I discovered that I was no longer recognized as a Fiji citizen because I had acquired Australian citizenship in 2003.

I have never renounced my Fiji citizenship. I had never abandoned my connection to Rotuma. I had never stopped identifying myself as a Rotuman and a Fijian.

Yet I was advised that under the law, my citizenship had ceased automatically and that I would have to apply to regain it. While I accept the legal explanation that was provided to me, the experience caused me to ask a deeper question, a constitutional question. Can a person's legal citizenship be separated from their birthright? My answer is yes.

My citizen status may have changed through the operation of law. My birthright did not. My ancestry did not.

My connection to Rotuma did not. My language did not. My culture did not.

My family did not. My belonging did not. This is why I believe the Constitution should recognize a distinction between citizenship and birthright.

Rotuman's, like the Itaukei people of Fiji, are indigenous people of this country. We are not immigrants. We are not foreigners. We are not guests in our own home. We are landowners by birthright. Our connection to Fiji arises through ancestry, culture, family, customary affiliation, and history.

Rotuma is a part of the Republic of Fiji. When laws are made for Fiji, they affect Rotuma, and they affect Rotuman's. Therefore, I respectfully submit that the constitution should expressly recognize Rotuman's as one of Fiji's indigenous peoples and protect our birthright connection to our homeland.

The Constitution should also ensure that laws made under it do not unnecessarily impair that connection. Dr. Fatiaki's invitation recognizes that many Rotumans live outside of Fiji. This is an important reality.

Today, there are Rotumans living in Australia, New Zealand, the United States, and elsewhere. Some may hold foreign citizenship. Some may no longer hold Fiji citizenship. But they remain Rotuman. They remain connected to Rotuma through family, land, culture, language, and identity. The question should not simply be whether they hold a Fiji passport. The question should also be whether they are Rotuman by birth, ancestry, and customary affiliation. Fiji should also recognize the importance of maintaining the connection between Rotuma and Rotuman's living abroad.

Finally, I respectfully submit that the Constitution should require future laws to recognize the unique circumstances of indigenous Rotumans.

Chairperson and Honorable Commissioners, our submission is ultimately about belonging. I stand before you today as a Rotuman, born and raised in Fiji. I am a famor es hanua. I am part of the people whose history, culture, and future are tied to Rotuma and to Fiji. My citizen status may have changed. My birthright did not.

I respectfully submit that this commission ensures that Fiji's future Constitution recognizes and protects the birthright for all Rotuman's, both at home and throughout the diaspora. Vinaka Vakalevu.

Mr Faktaufon: Mr. Chair, as earlier mentioned, we will also be putting this presentation, by way of written submission, through to the commission. Thank you. We will give this back to the commission for any questions. Just one more, Mr. Chair. One representation from Juju, which is from Ms. Agatha again, before we conclude.

Ms. Agatha: Thank you. I will just move on. I will only present their proposed constitution matters, and they have given three. The first one, I will not talk to it, because it has been shared widely by the first presentation I made, and also our two presenters, working on the proposed constitutional recognition of the Rotuman people. But I would like to move on to their other two matters, from the Suva Juju Association. The second proposition they made is a guaranteed parliamentary representation. This has been reflected in our written submission. But so that we don't lose what people have put together as a voice, I would like to read. The Rotuman population is relatively small.

Under purely population-based electoral systems, minority communities can easily lose their parliamentary voice. Constitutional democracy is not simply majority rule. It also requires protection of minority communities.

Many democratic constitutions provide guaranteed representation for indigenous and minority people. So, the proposal that the Association has put forward is to recommend three dedicated parliamentary seats if we are using the communal and common seat factors. So, one communal seat for the Rotuman's on Rotuma Island, one communal seat for the Rotuman's in the wider Fiji communities, and one common seat for the Rotuman's on Rotuma Island and the diaspora as well.

The benefits, as per this proposition, this model strengthens democracy, protects minority rights, preserves national unity, gives Rotuman's an effective parliamentary voice and recognizes both homeland and diaspora communities. The third is the National Day of Christian Fasting and Prayer as Fiji's spiritual heritage. Fiji has long acknowledged the importance of faith in national life.

Across every ethnic community, faith has played an important role in reconciliation, peace, disaster recovery, national healing, community service. The Association proposes that Fiji establish an annual National Day of Christian Fasting and Prayer and the purpose would encourage humility, national reflection, reconciliation, forgiveness, unity, prayer for national leaders, families, and peace. And while this matters, Fiji continues to face many challenges, including crime, drugs, family violence, corruption, social division, mental health pressures. Law alone cannot solve every national problem. Strong moral values remain essential to national development. A National Day of Christian Fasting and Prayer would provide an opportunity for citizens to unite in seeking God's guidance for our nation.

Respect for religious freedom. Importantly, this proposal does not seek to diminish the constitutional rights of citizens belonging to other faiths or those with no religious affiliation. Rather, it recognizes the historical and continuing contributions of Christianity to Fiji's national development, while fully respecting freedom of religion and freedom of conscience.

Participation could remain voluntary and inclusive in spirit, consistent with constitutional protection for religious identity. Their conclusion, we therefore have a responsibility to ensure that it reflects not only democratic principles, but also justice, inclusion, cultural respect, and enduring national values. The Association offers these three recommendations with humility, respect, and a sincere desire to contribute to a stronger, more united Fiji.

May God continue to bless Rotuma and bless our beloved nation, Fiji. Thank you. So just before I hand over to Vama again, these three district proposals will be annexes to our oral submission. Thank you.

Mr Faktaufon: Thank you. Mr. Chairman, I think it's now time for any questions from the Commission.

Mr. Valenitabua: First, I must say thank you for the presenters. Thank you, the presenters, for presenting those submissions, the oral submissions to the commission this afternoon. We are also, we will be anticipating receiving written submissions to be given to the commission at a later time.

They will not be related to today. Now, we heard submissions from one of your compatriots in relation to Rotuman, the name Rotuman. I think I will now ask, there has been a lot of issue raised, there has been an issue raised in relation to the name Fijian for all citizens of this country.

Now, in respect of the preamble for the 2013 constitution, the natives of Fiji are referred to as the ITaukei's. And also in the preamble, the natives, the indigenous people of Rotuma are referred to as Rotuman's. And then after that, we are all referred to as Fijians.

Now, what, if I may ask, what is the position of the association in relation to Rotuman's being classified as Fijians? Would you prefer to be referred to as Rotuman's or as Fijians, or as Fiji citizens, or whatever?

Mr Faktaufon: In that aspect, I think Rotuman's would prefer to be known as Rotuman's because it is our identity, and historically we were Rotumans before we became part of Fiji. So, we would prefer that we be referred as an indigenous, as Rotuman's.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, Vama...Is there any other view from...

Ms. Ferei: Yes, just to continue, to add on to what Vama has said, in terms of an association, we will go by Rotuman as an ethnic identity for our Rotuman people, but in terms of nationality and citizenship, the word Fijian has not been an issue for us, and that is something that we have not seen as a matter of an issue for us to hold over. But we will go by Rotuman as an ethnic identity, and we're okay with the Fiji citizenship, or the Fijian citizenship. Thank you.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you very much to members of the Council for not only your presentation, but the care and the thought that is apparent in bringing together the thoughts and views of many of your fellow Rotuman's. I wanted to simply ask a question of curiosity. Please forgive my ignorance.

I'm sure I will remedy that with having the privilege of being able to visit Rotuma tomorrow with the good doctor. You mentioned a bilateral structure of kinship, which I thought was quite interesting, as you mentioned it as an important aspect of recognition of the uniqueness of Rotuman heritage and birthright. I would just like to invite you to expand on that in terms of this bilateral structure, please. Thank you.

Ms. Ferei: So that I don't say anything at the top of my head, I'll just go to our submission, because that's in the written one as well. And let me see, where did I...

Ms. Nailatikau: I believe this was Ms. Katafono, forgive me.

Ms .Katafono: What I meant by that is we trace our heritage on both sides, lineage on mum's side and dad's side. So that's the bilateral kinship I meant.

Ms. Nailatikau: So, it's not a strictly patrilineal type of structure that other groups might be? Or it's just a recognition of both branches?

Ms. Katafono: Rotuman's are Polynesians, which make us matriarchal. But in terms of our lineage and where we can claim land, we can claim on both the mother's side and the father's side.

Ms Ferei: And that is a common practice that we continue to do today.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you for your presentation. We have been traveling around Fiji and we've been hearing from people that they want to have their own constituency reps to be able to see, to knock on their doors and raise their issues. So, I'm surprised, if not shocked, that Rotuma does not have a permanent representative in the parliament. That's the minimum that can be given, considering the fact that you are so far away. MPs from here don't knock on your door every week or every month. So let me take into consideration. My only question to you is, what is the total number of Rotuman's in the world? What's the population? Any idea at all? Because you're asking for three seats. That's the only reason I asked you. Nothing else. Why three? Okay. What is the total population of Rotuman's in the world? Well,

Mr Faktaufon: I think that's probably an answer we might not be able to give to you. But in Rotuma and Fiji alone, maybe Dr. John, to correct me, we probably have at least about 10,000, if not less than that. But around the world, we have a bigger population around the world at this stage in terms of Rotuman's and even Part- Rotuman's for that matter. Thank you. Just to contribute to that, in terms of education and language, we kindly refer to about 16,000 in the world, less than 2,000 on the island. I think the last census said 1,600. And the wider Fiji community has the largest number of around over 10,000 Rotuman's. So, in terms of council, the mother council is the Rotuma Island Council that is based on the island, and they are the parent council.

We, the Fiji Rotuman Association, is just an association here outside of Rotuma, but it's serving the wider Suva Fiji community. And our membership, we have the highest number of Rotuman's out here because we have the representatives of the seven districts. Currently, we have six operating financial members, and each district has their own numbers that they bring to the association. And so that's where the largest tax paying community is, if you like, for Fiji. Thank you.

Dr Neelesh: Thank you very much for your submission this afternoon. It is good to see a big group today here for the submission that shows the unity and the interest that you have shown today. So, thank you very much for presenting your submission today.

I just have a query regarding citizenship restoration pathways. In terms of birth, it's already available, for example, the dual citizenship arrangements. So, is it you are referring to the ancestry pathway, or are you referring to both birth and ancestry pathways?

Mr. Pene Muli: Dr. Gounder, if I could respond. I presented my personal example to support that submission, and perhaps I haven't been very clear about the issue. I was born in Rotuma. I never renounced my citizenship. But just because someone passed a law, a citizenship law, that if you took Australian citizenship, or any foreign citizenship, you lost your Fijian citizenship. That situation affects not just me, but a whole lot of the diaspora, including Fijians. My understanding was that after the 2022 elections, the Fijian iTaukei diaspora made submissions, and they have an automatic pathway. You do not have to apply for citizenship.

I, on principle, think it is wrong that I should apply for citizenship, because I was born a Rotuman, and I am a Rotuman, and I never renounced my Rotuman's, my heritage, or my citizenship. A law was passed that basically disenfranchised myself, cut off my heritage, and I am still no longer a Fijian citizen.

There's a pathway. I have seen the Director of Immigration. I have tried to see the Commissioner of Rotuma. Because we don't have direct representation, they threw the book at me and said, re-apply. On principle, I don't think that is right. And when we're talking about the Constitution, I thought this is where the question should be asked. You should not pass laws that disenfranchise indigenous people, including Rotuman's. I have to pay and apply to get it back. That's wrong, as far as I'm concerned. That's crap, excuse me. But I never renounced my rights or my citizenship. But a law was passed, which I feel is wrong. I think the Fijians have a dispensation under some amendments that has been passed, and I'm not a lawyer, but I understand if you're in Vola ni Kawa Bula (VKB), you can automatically regain your citizenship. We do not have a law in VKB. But there has to be mechanisms put in place to recognize that we are indigenous people. We are not immigrants. And that indigenous status, in my view, supersedes citizenship. I hope that clarifies where I'm coming from.

Dr. Neelesh: Thank you very much. That's very clear. I was thinking along a different line, but you have clarified that.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you. Just a follow-up question from where Dr. Gounder left off. If I may ask, when did you acquire your Australian citizenship?

Mr Pene Muli: 2003. So, I understand that there was a subsequent law passed in 2013. So, after 2013, dual citizenship was allowed, and therefore people that acquired Australian citizenship after 2013, you're okay. But there's a cohort of us that acquired citizenship before 2013, and I might have to be corrected here, but there's a cutoff date, and immigration just throws the book at me and says reapply. And I think that's wrong. That law is wrong. When they passed the rigged deal in 2013, and when they created a pathway for Fijian diaspora, they should have considered Rotuman's too. Because we are in the same boat. We are indigenous people.

Mr. Kohli: The reason why I ask you is that up to 2002, Australia did not recognize dual citizenship. So, if somebody acquired Australian citizenship, they had to renounce Fijian citizenship. But after that, I guess it applied in 2003, it doesn't apply today.

Mr. Pene: I did not renounce, and Australia did not require that I renounce. I had my Fiji passport until I was considering coming back, and then passport has expired. I put it in to get a new passport, and they took it and said, no, you have to reapply, you're not a citizen.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yeah, that's interesting. When the dual citizenship provision came in, I applied on behalf of the iTaukei s who were in the Solomon Islands. I applied for their citizenship. That was after the dual citizenship provision came in, and they got it. They had to apply and pay. Yeah, that must have happened in 2002. So now you're saying that even if a Fijian, as it is now under the 2013 constitution, leaves the country and becomes a citizen of another country, that citizenship here in Fiji should not be renounced, should not be cancelled. Is that what you were saying?

Mr. Pene: Correct. It should never be a question of cancelling citizenship.

Mr. Valenitabua: If the adopting country, if I may say that, if the adopting country says in their law that you cannot hold dual citizenship, then what would happen then? Because some countries say you either are a citizen of this country or of another country, you can't be both.

Mr. Pene: I understand if a person then chooses to renounce their Fiji citizenship, I can understand that that is a personal choice the person has made.

Mr. Valenitabua: All right. Okay, we get your point. We'll discuss that in relation to citizenship. Vinaka.

Ms. Ferei: Sorry, if I may, I guess just to add on to that, it's the birthright we're talking about over citizenship. So, you can renounce your citizenship if the country you're going to demands that you renounce that citizenship, but if you decide to come back, your birthright should supersede and allow you to become a citizen or come back easily and not have to apply, pay and go through the process.

Dr. Gounder: Just one more follow-up. So, you're talking about both birthright as well as ancestry, am I right? Birthright is fine, you have explained that, that's very clear. So, you're talking about ancestral links as well?

Mr. Pene: I'm pausing here because in my mind the words are interchangeable. A person, my grandson, might not be born in Rotuma, but in my view, my grandson, as long as he has a drop of blood, of Rotuman blood in him, he is a Rotuman.

Dr. Gounder: So that's the ancestry part you would use there.

Mr. Pene: If that's the definition you're looking for.

Mr Neelesh: Yeah, yeah, yeah, that's what I meant. Birth and ancestry links both. Okay, thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Faktaufon and members of the Association. We have heard your submissions, both oral, and we've got a written submission here, and I anticipate another two or three written submissions to be presented or sent to us. We thank you very much indeed for your submissions this afternoon. We have heard it, it has been recorded, and then we will deliberate on them as we sit down to deliberate on what we should do with the submissions relative to the 2013 Constitution amendment.

Ms. Ferei: Your Honorable Chairperson, Mr. Sevuloni Valenitabua, distinguished members of the Constitution Review Committee, Dr. John Fatiaki, Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau, Mr. Conway Beg, Mr. Ami Kohli, Dr. Neelesh Gounder. Thank you so much ladies and Leighton. On behalf of our FAHO at Wasale, and the members of the Fiji Rotuman Association present here with our legal team, we are very grateful for the opportunity, and we thank you once again for hearing our voice in this afternoon's discussion.

Mr. Leighton: Before you leave, I kindly request if you can just remain to take a picture with the Chair and the Commissioner.

Ms. Ferei: Just a question, do you know the booklet you have? Do you have hard copies for us to bring home, or is it only available online? The Rotuman translation of the review.

----------End of Session [29-6-2026]----------

FIJI ROTUMAN ASSOCIATION
CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT SUBMISSION

Recognition, Citizenship, Diaspora Rights and Parliamentary Representation of the Rotuman People
Prepared for Formal Submission

This submission presents key constitutional amendments proposed by the Fiji Rotuman Association to strengthen the recognition, protection and participation of the Rotuman people within the Republic of Fiji.

The recommendations focus on affirming indigenous Rotuman birthright, recognizing the enduring role of the Rotuman diaspora, establishing pathways for citizenship restoration and ensuring meaningful parliamentary representation.

These proposals aim to align Fiji's constitutional framework with regional best practices while honoring the unique cultural, historical and ancestral identity of the Rotuman people.

By Victor Fatiaki and the Members of the Fiji Rotuman Association Council and Secretariat and Suva Member Associations.

FIJI ROTUMAN ASSOCIATION
SUBMISSION TO THE FIJI CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMITTEE

To: The Chairperson, Fiji Constitution Review Committee.
From: The Fiji Rotuman Association Chairperson on behalf of the FRA Council and of its member associations in Suva.
Date: 29th June 2026

PREAMBLE

Presentation on behalf of the Fiji Rotuman Association and the wider Rotuman people of Fiji and the diaspora to respectfully present our constitutional perspective on the place of Rotuma and her indigenous identity within the Republic of Fiji.

This presentation is offered in a spirit of national unity, constructive engagement and respect for the constitutional order of our nation.

STRATEGIC VISION

"Rotuma is to remain a Haven within a Peaceful and Prosperous Fiji for its indigenous community- a place where its inhabitants would continue to Love, and Respect one another Acknowledge and Appreciate Almighty God's Love, Mercy and Blessings on their lives…'

(JR KONROTE) Major General (Ret'd).

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This submission proposes constitutional amendments to strengthen the recognition of the Rotuman people as one of Fiji's indigenous communities. It addresses gaps in the current constitutional framework relating to indigenous birthright, diaspora identity, citizenship restoration and meaningful parliamentary representation.

0.1 Indigenous Birthright Recognition.

Rotumans' possess an enduring birthright connection to Rotuma and Fiji arising from ancestry, customary affiliation, land ownership, language, culture and history. This birthright exists independently of legal citizenship and should be expressly recognized and protected in the Constitution.

0.2 Citizenship and Indigenous Identity.

The current legal framework does not adequately distinguish citizenship from indigenous belonging. Many Rotumans abroad maintain ancestral and customary ties despite holding foreign citizenship. Indigenous identity should not be extinguished by a change in legal citizenship status.

0.3 Recognition of the Rotuman Diaspora.

A significant proportion of Rotumans now reside outside Fiji. Despite this dispersion, the diaspora continues to contribute to Rotuma's cultural, social, economic and customary life. The Constitution should acknowledge this ongoing role and facilitate the maintenance of these connections.

0.4 Citizenship Restoration Pathways.

The Fiji Rotuman Association recommends that Parliament be required to establish accessible pathways for indigenous Rotumans, including Famor 'es Hanua, to acquire, retain, or restore Fiji citizenship based on ancestral and customary ties.

0.5 Alignment with Pacific Practice.

Regional practice recognizes that indigenous belonging may extend beyond citizenship status alone. Fiji should adopt comparable constitutional principles that respect ancestral connection, customary belonging, and the continuing relationship between indigenous communities and their diaspora.

0.6 Guaranteed Rotuman Representation.

The Fiji Rotuman Association proposes a constitutionally protected mechanism to ensure meaningful Rotuman parliamentary representation, whether through a dedicated constituency, a reserved seat, or another model developed through consultation with the Rotuman people.

0.7 National Unity.

These proposals do not seek privilege, but constitutional completeness. They affirm Rotuma's integral place within Fiji and ensure that future generations, whether in Rotuma, Fiji, or abroad, can maintain and strengthen their connection to their homeland

1. INTRODUCTORY CONTEXT

The Rotuman people are a distinct indigenous Polynesian community with a unique history, language, customary governance system, and cultural identity.

The Rotuman people are one of the indigenous peoples of Fiji. Our relationship with the Republic of Fiji arises not merely from citizenship, but from ancestry, customary affiliation, land ownership, language, culture and history.

Rotumans' possess an enduring birthright connection to Rotuma and Fiji that exists independently of legal citizenship status and should be recognized and protected within any future constitutional framework.

Many Rotumans continue to maintain this connection while residing elsewhere in Fiji and throughout the diaspora.

Our historical relationship with Fiji is rooted in a separate colonial cession in 1881, and since that time, we have maintained our distinct identity while contributing meaningfully to the national development of Fiji. The 2013 Constitution of the Republic of Fiji recognizes the Rotuman people, their land ownership, and their cultural and linguistic heritage. This recognition is respectfully acknowledged by our community.

However, recognition alone is not the same as constitutional empowerment.

2. CORE CONSTITUTIONAL POSITION

The Constitution recognizes Rotumans, but does not sufficiently empower Rotumans.

We currently exist in a constitutional framework that:

- acknowledges our identity in principle as per the current constitution's preamble
- but does not guarantee our participation in governance, nor secure our institutional continuity within the national system nor preserve its indigenous identity.

3. KEY CONSTITUTIONAL CONCERNS

We respectfully highlight the following concerns.

a. Political Representation

There is currently no guaranteed Rotuman representation in Parliament.

Under the existing national electoral system, Rotuman representation depends entirely on political competition within a national majority framework. For a small indigenous population, this creates structural vulnerability and uncertainty of voice.

b. Governance Institutions

The Council of Rotuma and district customary systems remain outside constitutional entrenchment.

This leaves our traditional governance structures dependent on ordinary legislation rather than constitutional protection.

c. Consultation Rights

There is no constitutional requirement for the State to consult Rotuman institutions on laws or policies affecting:

- Rotuman land
- marine resources
- cultural heritage
- language
- or local governance

This creates a gap between recognition and participation.

d. Language and Cultural Continuity

While the Rotuman language is acknowledged in the Constitution, there is no binding obligation on the State to actively support its preservation and transmission. This places the survival of our language primarily on community effort alone.

e. Birthright, Citizenship and Belonging

The current constitutional and legal framework does not adequately recognize the distinction between citizenship and indigenous birthright.

Many Rotumans residing in Fiji and throughout the diaspora maintain ancestral, customary and land-based connections to Rotuma despite holding foreign citizenship or residing overseas. While citizenship may be regulated by legislation, indigenous identity and belonging and customary affiliation arise from ancestry, heritage, family connections and recognized Rotuman institutions.

The Constitution should recognize that indigenous Rotumans' possess an enduring connection to Rotuma and Fiji that cannot be extinguished solely through changes in legal citizenship status. The Constitution and all laws that flow from it should recognize and protect this birthright relationship.

f. Recognition of the Rotuman Diaspora

A significant proportion of the Rotuman people now reside outside Rotuma and, in many cases, outside Fiji. Commissioner Dr. John Fatiaki's invitation to Rotumans in Fiji, Rotuma and throughout the diaspora reflects the reality that the Rotuman people extend beyond Fiji's shores.

Despite geographical dispersion, Rotumans living abroad continue to contribute to the social, cultural, economic and customary life of Rotuma through family support, cultural participation, community leadership and investment in their homeland.

The Constitution should recognize the continuing importance of the Rotuman diaspora and facilitate the maintenance of these enduring connections.

4. COMPARATIVE PACIFIC PRACTICE

The FRA is not raising issues unique to Fiji.

Across the Pacific region:

a. New Zealand provides reserved parliamentary seats for indigenous Māori representation
b. Samoa integrates customary governance structures into national life
c. Vanuatu recognizes and institutionalizes traditional leadership councils
d. Cook Islands ensures representation for small island communities despite population differences

e. Samoa permits dual citizenship and provides pathways for persons of Samoan ancestry living abroad to acquire and maintain citizenship through ancestral connections.
f. Tonga similarly permits dual citizenship and has established mechanisms allowing Tongans who previously lost citizenship through acquisition of foreign nationality to restore their citizenship.

These examples recognize that indigenous identity and belonging extend beyond the possession of a passport and acknowledges the continuing connection between diaspora communities and their homelands. A clear principle has been elaborated here and it is that;

Constitutional equality does not always mean identical treatment — it requires practical protection for small indigenous communities.

5. INTERNATIONAL INDIGENOUS RIGHTS STANDARDS

Fiji is a member of the international community and is guided by global human rights principles, including the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.

These principles affirm:

- the right to participation in decision-making
- the right to maintain indigenous institutions
- the right to cultural and linguistic preservation
- and the requirement for consultation before decisions affecting indigenous peoples

Our submission is therefore consistent with internationally recognized standards of indigenous justice.

6. FRA PROPOSALS FOR CONSIDERATION

We respectfully place before this Honorable forum the following proposals:

a. Guaranteed Rotuman Representation

This can be enforced with a constitutionally protected mechanism guaranteeing meaningful parliamentary representation for Rotumans, whether through a dedicated Rotuman constituency, a reserved parliamentary seat (seats) or another arrangement determined through consultation with Rotuman communities and institutions.

b. Constitutional Protection of the Council of Rotuma

A clause in the constitution could endorse and recognize as well as safeguard Rotumas' customary governance system.

c. Mandatory Consultation Mechanism with our small community-

_Parliament, Cabinet, or any State authority shall not enact legislation, approve policies, enter agreements, or undertake administrative action substantially affecting Rotuma, Rotuman land, culture, language, customary rights, or traditional governance unless meaningful consultation has first been undertaken with the Rotuman people through their recognized representative institutions.

d. Recognition of Indigenous Rotuman Birthright

The Constitution should recognize that indigenous Rotumans' possess an enduring birthright connection to Rotuma and Fiji arising from ancestry, customary affiliation, land ownership and cultural identity. This birthright should be recognized independently of legal citizenship status and should not be unnecessarily impaired by legislation.

e. Recognition of Indigenous Peoples

The Constitution could recognize the iTaukei of Fiji and the Rotuman people as the indigenous peoples of Fiji, each possessing distinct customs, language, traditional institutions, and systems of land ownership and inheritance, all of which shall be equally protected under the law.

f. Recognition of the Rotuman Diaspora

The Constitution should acknowledge the Rotuman diaspora as an integral part of the Rotuman people and encourage measures that strengthen the connection between Rotumans living abroad and their homeland.

g. Citizenship Restoration Pathways

The Constitution should require Parliament to provide accessible pathways for indigenous Rotumans and other minorities by birth and ancestry, including Rotumans' Famor 'es Hanua, to acquire, retain or restore Fiji citizenship while recognizing their enduring customary and ancestral connection to Fiji.

h. Language and Cultural Protection Duty

A State obligation to support the preservation and transmission of the Rotuman language and heritage.

i. National Day of Thanksgiving

The State may recognize and provide by law for an annual National Day of Christian or such other appropriate title as Parliament may prescribe. This Thanksgiving Day as a public holiday for prayer, worship, thanksgiving, and national reflection, to be observed by Christian communities throughout Fiji, while respecting the rights and freedoms of persons of all faiths and beliefs.

j. Protection of Rotuman Land Tenure

FRA puts forward that the status, ownership, inheritance, succession, and customary administration of land in Rotuma shall remain governed exclusively by the laws, customs, traditions and governing legislation applicable to Rotuma.

No law, constitutional amendment, administrative action, or policy shall alter, diminish, assimilate, or subject Rotuman land tenure, inheritance, or ownership systems to the land ownership or inheritance structures applicable to the iTaukei of Fiji, including any Yavusa, Kāinga, Bati, Mataqali, or equivalent system, unless with the free, prior, and informed consent of the Rotuman people through their recognized representative institutions.

The State shall recognize Rotuma as possessing a distinct customary and legal identity in relation to land tenure and inheritance and shall ensure that such distinct status is preserved and protected for present and future generations. Parliament shall not enact legislation affecting Rotuman land rights, inheritance, or customary ownership without mandatory consultation with the Rotuman people through their duly recognized traditional and legal governing bodies.

7. OUR POSITION ON NATIONAL UNITY

The FRA wish to clearly state:

a. We are not seeking separation.
b. We are not seeking division.
c. We are not seeking privilege.
d. We are seeking constitutional completeness within national unity.
e. We recognize that Rotuma forms an integral part of the Republic of Fiji and that the Rotuman people are one of Fiji's indigenous peoples.
f. Our proposals seek not to create separation or special privilege, but to ensure that the Constitution fully reflects the unique history, identity and constitutional position of Rotuma and its people, including those residing throughout the diaspora.
g. We believe a strong Fiji is one that:

- recognizes its diversity,
- protects its smallest indigenous communities, as well as
- ensures that no voice is lost in the structure of governance.

8. CONCLUSION

In closing, we respectfully submit that the time has come to move from:

- ❖ Recognition alone to recognition with representation
- ❖ Symbolic inclusion to structural inclusion
- ❖ And from acknowledgment of identity to constitutional protection of identity

We therefore humbly request that this Committee and relevant constitutional authorities consider our proposals as part of any ongoing or future constitutional review processes.

The FRA respectfully submits that constitutional recognition should extend beyond symbolic acknowledgement and include recognition of indigenous birthright, diaspora connections and meaningful participation in national life. Rotumans are not immigrants within Fiji.

We are an indigenous people whose connection to Rotuma and Fiji arises through ancestry, land, culture, language and history.

The Constitution should ensure that future generations of Rotumans, whether residing on Rotuma, elsewhere in Fiji or throughout the diaspora, continue to maintain and strengthen that connection.

Honorable Chair, distinguished Committee Members, the FRA submit this not as a challenge to the Constitution, but as an invitation to strengthen it so that it fully reflects all the peoples of Fiji, including our Rotuman people.

Faiʻakʻseʻea
Vinaka vakalevu.

Fiji Council of Churches (FCC)

Fiji Council of Churches
Date: 30-06-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: I welcome you this morning to this session of Convocation. Before the Constitution Review Commission, its and honor and privileged to be sitting before you gentlemen this morning and maybe the Constitution Review Commission consists of six members at the moment. Initially, there were seven members appointed by His Excellency the President. However, one member, due to work commitment, has resigned. So, we were left with only six commissioners. You will notice this morning that there are only three sitting here.

The other three are on their way to Rotuma as we speak. They are flying to Rotuma today so that they can attend to consultations on the island of Rotuma. On my right is Ms. Nailatikau, and on my left is Dr. Neelesh Gounder.

And I am the chairperson of the commission, Sevuloni Valenitabua. We welcome you this morning, and we thank you indeed for accepting the invitation to come and make submissions in this consultation session this morning. As you know, the commissioner was appointed by His Excellency the President so that we could review the 2013 Constitution. There has been a question raised to us whether we are writing a new Constitution. The answer is no. We are only amending the Constitution.

In order to amend the Constitution, we were also tasked to go around the country and meet with people of the country and receive from them suggestions or recommendations and submissions in relation to what they think should be included in the amended Constitution. We've had ministries of government. We've had associations.

We've had individuals appearing before us here at Level Nine Suvavou Hall And we have met the lay people of this country, beginning from the Lau group to the Lomaiviti group, to Vanua Levu, to Viti Levu and adjacent islands, including Yasawa. So, we have consulted widely, and it is a pleasure having you, ladies and gentlemen, this morning for this consultation session.

We look forward to your submissions this morning, and in a moment, or I should say I now open this consultation, and I now pass on the floor and the mic to you, gentlemen and ladies, so that you can present your submissions to us this morning.

Archbishop Chong: Mr. Sevuloni Valenitabua. Vinaka Valevu, Mr. Sevuloni Valenitabua, the chair of the Constitution Review Committee, for inviting the churches, the Fiji Council of Churches, to this consultation process.

The Fiji Council of Churches is, we have 13 member churches, consisting of the Anglican, the Catholic, the Methodist, the Baptist Convention, Fiji Fellowship Commission, Pacific Communities University, Salvation Army, the Presbyterian, and some number of Pentecostal groups. Sorry, I'll give you some of the copies. We did not have enough copies for everybody, but I'm giving you two.

So, we met a few weeks ago, a number of church leaders to conduct a consultation on this very important process. Our process of consultation is bringing together what we are now calling the ecumenical social teaching, which is coming together of the three key strands of Christianity. The Catholic Church, the World Council of Churches, which represent the Protestant churches, and then probably the most more recent trend of Christianity is the Evangelical Pentecostal churches.

These come under the World Evangelical Alliance. So, you have the three key strands of Christianity, and we've drawn our methodology by pulling together the main social teachings from these traditions, Catholic, the Protestant, and the Evangelical Alliance. From there we, from bringing, studying the three traditions, we came up with a number of common principles, social teachings that we use to guide our assessment of the 2013 Constitution.

So, we speak here from, not as a political party or even as legal experts, but rather from the base of the social teachings that are embedded in these three main strands of Christianity. So, what we did, our methodology is looking at that and then looking at the Constitution through the lens of what we are calling the ecumenical social teaching. From that, that forms the theological and the biblical framework of assessing the Constitution.

Then we divided our discussions and reflections and praying over the Constitution. So, our submission was done in a very prayerful process where there was discernment, where there was a lot of listening, listening to each other and listening to our own prayer and listening to the collective prayer of the 20 plus church leaders that gathered at the Salvation Army Hall. Our reflections were divided into three groups.

The first one is the affirmations that we see in the Constitutions. By that we mean elements in the Constitution that agree, align well with the social teachings of the churches. Then the section two, we laid down our concerns about the Constitution, again assessing it in light of the church's social teachings.

And finally, we made our recommendations to the review committee about what the churches would like to recommend. We realized that time does not allow us to go into detail about what's in that paper, but we'd like to limit our intervention this morning by just picking on the points that where church can speak well on, that involves the church. And then you have there the fruit of our two-day consultation, which is put together in that document that we have.

Today we'd like to focus on the recommendations because particularly on the ones that the church has a voice and a very important voice and if we don't speak on these topics, we would be failing on our part as the prophetic voice of the church. So, if you, we'd like to draw your attention on the page 8 on 7.12 and it is regarding the secular state and the discussions about the Christian state. I will invite Reverend Bruce Yates to lead us in that conversation and later on we will talk about the importance of the family and then the participatory process that is required of such an important document.

Oh sorry, and then Mr. George Qaranivalu will talk about the importance of the family in the constitution. But now I'd like to invite Reverend Bruce to speak on, to lead a brief discussion on the secular state.

Rev. Bruce: Thank you, Grace and Commissioners, Chair. Thank you very much for the opportunity to be here with you. We're looking at our recommendation 7.12 on page 8 of the submission. And I'd also like to draw your attention to page 4 and our constitutional affirmations 5.4, that is religious freedoms, because these are entwined together.

From a secular state point of view, we feel that the state should be one that treats all faiths equally and favors none, but guarantees freedom for all, and the best protect religious freedom, including for Christians. Our witness is most powerful through humble service and not legal privilege. And we must not confuse political power with prophetic faithfulness. So the church should refuse state-imposed status that would compromise our ability to speak truth to power. So this is one thing that we are very much in favor of, is that religious freedom and the separation of church and state. And as we say on page 4, 5.4, a secular state protects all faiths equally, and it should neither establish a state religion nor exclude religious voices from public life.

So our recommendation on page 8, 7.12, the secular state, is that we support this section 4, establishing Fiji as a secular state, separation of church and state. However, secularism should never require the exclusion of religion from public life. And the church must remain free to contribute to public debate, advocate for justice, and defend the vulnerable and proclaim the gospel.

The church serves the kingdom of God rather than the interests of any political party or government. So that is our position on the secular state and the separation of church and state. We recognize also that there are many groups that would perhaps want to have the church more involved as a state religion, but our position is the separation.

That is very important, and to recognize the multicultural dimensions of Fiji and the equality of freedom of religion for all faiths. So, thank you.

Archbishop Chong: I guess it's good to just pause for a while and allow for, if there are any questions from the committee around that secular state Christian church debate.

Mr. Valenitabua: Your Grace, may we have discussions at the end, please.

Archbishop Chong : Okay. Thank you, Mr. Valenitabua. We'd like to, I think, just to speak a little bit on that. We are aware of the intention of some churches to have Fiji as a Christian state, which our consultation do not agree with, because there are a lot of dangers that will come when the state is closely aligned or totally aligned to a particular church that privileges that church, and then it does not, it lowers down the voice of the church, the service of the church, which is to serve God's kingdom rather than serve a human institution. It keeps the neutrality of the church to be able to speak on matters that pertain closely to the church, especially justice, that justice is served. Thank you. We'd like to move to the second one, and that is Reverend Sepi will speak again to a very important value in the church, and that is regarding family.

Re. Sepiuta: Vinaka Your Grace, Chair and Commissioners, I'll be speaking on the Recommendation 7.8, Recognition of the Family. The churches have agreed that the Constitution should recognize the family as the natural and fundamental unit of society while respecting international human rights standards. We understand that the Constitution already contains provisions relating to children, education, and social rights, but it does not explicitly recognize the family as a fundamental unit of society. For us as the FCC, we recommend that this Constitution explicitly recognizes the family as a fundamental unit of society deserving of protection and support by the state.

We believe that strong families nurture faith, values, responsibility, and the well-being of our children while also contributing to social cohesion and national stability, and such recognition complements individual rights and affirms the shared responsibility of families, of communities, and also the state in building a just and peaceful and resilient Fiji. So that's the bit on stressing on the recognition of family. Vinaka.

Archbishop Chong: Thank you very much, Reverend Sepi, and we'd like also to speak on something that is very close to church and faith communities, and that is education, because the churches and the other religions, Hindus and Muslims, are big stakeholders and contributors to education. Education is in practice something that the church takes a front role, and so I want to invite Mr. George Qaranivalu to speak on civic education, which is on page 8, a very simple clause there. But George, you can elaborate more on that.

Mr. Qaranivalu: Vinaka Valevu, Your Grace, Fiji Council of Churches would like to propose that the Constitution should require sustained civic education programs enabling all citizens to understand their constitutional rights and responsibilities. We have gone through so many, shall I say, reviews of Constitutions, and I would like to reiterate that unless the public is educated on their responsibilities towards the Constitution, we can safely say that there is bound to be a misunderstanding all along. Fiji Council of Churches would like to see that there is a mandate to sustain a public-funded civic education program, especially for young people and rural communities, to ensure all citizens understand their rights and responsibilities.

For example, work with the Fiji Council of Churches and other faith groups to deliver workshops in iTaukei, Hindi, Fiji Hindi, on how to petition Parliament, access legal aid, and participate in local government. A lot of our schools in Fiji are faith-based schools. We can begin with that in all schools.

Start at the school level in educating our young on their civic responsibilities, getting out of the comforts of their home to see the environment at large. In a multiracial society like Fiji, we need to educate people and participate more at that level with our children. I speak also as a former teacher for 30 years.

Most of the schools were introduced with moral values education, but when I taught in a faith-based school, there seemed to be a collusion amongst the teachers themselves. What is moral values and what is faith-based values? We need to educate the public at large. That is where the Fiji Council of Churches is coming in.

If there is a collusion in regards to faith, that is bound to have ripples all along. That will lead to what we have already said, may lead to the idea of secularism promoting one religion over the other. We propose strongly that the public is educated well on their civic responsibilities in conjunction with the government and social organizations in regards to that.

Archbishop Chong: Thank you. What Mr. Qaranivalu expressed there is the importance of faith in education and its connection to the moral values that is losing its space in Fijian society. People talk about moral decay in the school and this is probably exacerbated with the drugs and the time that young people spend on social media.

For us, that is a guarantee that we can manage, maintain, lead our schools to the values that we hold. Each faith community has a special value system guided by their churches or religions that is important to the education of our children. I think what we are requesting here is that the government helps us to have these rights, that we can access these rights, meaning that we can have the heads of our schools that belong to the faith of that particular school.

Because that has been a little bit of a discrepancy in the last few years where somebody else from a faith community is expected to teach in a community that he does not share the faith of that particular school. So faith is important. We hold that the faith of the person should be included as part of the criteria of the merit recruiting system rather than just the skill and the knowledge that this person comes with. That helps us to manage and maintain our schools.

Now finally, I would like to speak, that will end our submission before we open it for discussion. And that is one of the values in the ecumenical social teachings is the value of human dignity and participation.

So, to honor the dignity of people, we have to allow them to participate in the decision-making process that will affect their lives. And when we respect their dignity as human beings, and this is not only a church or a religious value, it's in the Bill of Rights and it's in our constitution, the importance of human dignity. We only respect human dignity if we allow them, allow our people to participate, to make decisions and to contribute to the decision-making process that affects our people.

And we want to acknowledge that that is ingrained in our constitution and the Christian social teachings. So, with that being said, we want to highlight that there is a grave weakness in the current constitution and that is the lack of participation in the process of formulating the 2013 constitution.

And I remember participating in preparing for a constitution assembly back in 2012 or maybe even 2013, when the government announced that there would be a constituent assembly. And we gathered as church leaders and community leaders to prepare for that, to participate in the constitution assembly. However, on to the second day of that workshop outside the Novotel Hotel, we were told that there will be no constituent assembly. Instead, everybody is a constitution assembly, that means the whole nations. And then just a few days later on, we were told that there is a new constitution. We were not told who are the authors or the process of producing the 2013 constitution. We do not know who participated. We know that there is a big lack of participation in the process of constitution making for the 2013. So, from our ecumenical social teaching, that's a big gap or discrepancy between the values of the churches and what is going on in the constitution, the making of the 2013 constitution. And that is the lack of participation, the disrespect for human dignity, and these are values that contribute to the authority, the legitimacy, the validity of a document to be considered a supreme law for our nation.

And that's the lack of participation brings into a big question, you know, how relevant, how valid is this document as a document that we consider to be the supreme law of the nation. So that is quite important because it does not align, agree well, or does not even agree with the values that we hold as the ecumenical social teachings of the church. Mr. Valenitabua on that note, there are other topics that are in our submission that other groups will bring in, political parties, organizations.

We've highlighted a few that we believe that the church is responsible for speaking for, and if we do not speak on those topics, the secular state and the Christian state, the family, education, and that's something that is at the heart of a good society and the respect for human dignity and participation. And so, we present those submissions in the document and those that we have highlighted to the commission as representing the submission of the Fiji Council of Churches. And thank you for listening to us.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much, Your Grace. Thank you, Reverend Bruce, and thank you, Mr. Qaranivalu. Now, we usually have sessions at the end where we ask questions and make comments.

So first, I will start it off and then we'll see what my fellow commissioners would like to do, whether they would like to comment or ask questions. Your Grace and Reverence, Sir Peter and Reverend Bruce, together with Mr. Qaranivalu, we have the Bill of Rights. We have the Bill of Rights.

There has been a call for the Bill of Rights to be toned down, to be watered down. One particular aspect of the Bill of Rights, which I'm sure the Church would be concerned with, is in relation to treatment of people, that people are not abused or persons are not abused, freedom from abuse. There have been calls put to us by as high up as the Fijian Teachers' Association and from the grassroots people of the country that corporal punishment has to be reintroduced into schools for discipline purposes.

The way an Indo-Fijian gentleman put it to us in one of the farming settlements in Lautoka, he told us that we have to reintroduce corporal punishment to schools and at homes responsibly. That is the word he used for the purpose of discipline. Now, we cannot deny that behavior of most of our children, I'm not saying all of our children, most of our children nowadays, is just hard to control, difficult to control, even in the schools.

The teachers are finding it difficult to control students in schools and to discipline them. Now, this will affect human rights, which are provided under the Bill of Rights in the Constitution. We have been addressed this morning on the family.

We have been addressed this morning on civic education in relation to the Constitution. What, if I may ask, is the Council of Church's stance in relation to this particular issue, the reintroduction of corporal punishment, so as to be applied responsibly in order to discipline our children? That is my question. Your Grace, The Reverence, and Mr. Qaranivalu.

Archbishop Chong : Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Valenitabua. Of course, the topic of corporal punishment has been floating around, and different people, different faiths will have their different takings on this.

As Fiji Council of Churches, we would like this one. It will be hard for us to say something here that represents the collective voices of the churches. It's something that we would like to take back, and through the same process that we've done with this Constitution, look at the Bible, look at the social teachings of the different churches and other experts around this, because this involves child development, people who are experts in psychology and family life, to be able to come up with a response to the question.

So, rather than jumping here, we might, you know, be saying different things. So, as a voice of the churches, we will have to do the same thing that we have done on a few issues. We've done this with drugs, we've done this with a plan to bring in casino in the church, we've done it with the talks around legalizing marijuana, and this is definitely something that we would like to bring into our agenda for discernment, for further study, consultation, before we make a response.

So, I will not make a statement here on behalf of the Fiji Council of Churches. This requires collective collaboration. But, just a little bit from the onset, what is at issue here is how do we develop young people, and that includes, as they say, it takes a whole village to educate a child.

So, there's a lot of stakeholders here that goes to the married couple, or how the child is born. Our families are getting more complex with the different kind of families that we have. We can no longer just talk about the families as the husband, the ideal family.

We know now that children are born within marriage, outside marriage, second marriage separated, children that are born, but then the parents separate. So, it's quite complex. And then with the high domestic violence that we have, you know, our domestic violence is double the global thing.

So, that means that a lot of our children are growing up in the violent situation. So, all this, we have to take this into account when you look at how do we, so it's not just the, we're treating the tail end of it, and that is when the kid misbehaves, and what kind of punishment that we give to the kid, you know. So, rather than focusing on the tail end, I think we should invest on the beginning and the birthing of this child, and that's where the family values come in important, and then the government should really invest on family life and having good preparations for those who are getting married, and even also for those single parents.

They also need the support so that the children born out of them are being born into a good environment. So, I think in brief, we can look at the tail end, but that's being very reactive. We can be a little bit more proactive in investing in the birthing, the birth, the development of early childhood education is becoming very important there.

Responsible punishment, that's a very thin line there. The church, in general, is against violence. Violence begets violence, and there's a lot of damage to young people when they are treated violently. They go into their shell, and on a broad principle, anything that does violence to young people is not the best way of educating them. There are more positive ways that we can groom up good children and good citizens for the future. So, I think that's my take. If other members want to add, George is pressing his button.

Mr. Qaranivalu: I speak as a teacher, going into the teaching profession a year after independence. I was brought up in the school system, colonial days, where corporal punishment was the order of the day.

And I'm sure, with respect, some of us sitting here will watch for that. When we went out of Nasinu Teachers College in 1973, we were given the Education Gazette, and it quoted clearly how to conduct corporal punishment. You should either use a strip or anything lighter than a strip, and when you raise your hand, it should not go above your shoulders.

After conducting that, you should then load it down in the logbook. I was posted to one of the schools where the logbook was more on corporal punishment than any other good things in the school. You could read the former headteacher saying, I gave three strips to one Johnny for being reported loitering in the night. Who was the witness, we do not know. So, the logbook was more on corporal punishment. I am a product of corporal punishment, and I used to do it, because that was the order of the day, to do it.

But to go on to it, as Archbishops has said, to the tail end of it, there is no proof whether it really succeeded or not. But as a teacher, maybe I'll say yes, what my headteacher gave to me way back in 1963-64 bear its fruit, but that is an empirical statement. Maybe it's not really a statement, it cannot be defined.

So, in a nutshell, as Archbishop said, there are so many angles we can look at corporal punishment, but I'm just talking of my experience. But never did I conduct corporal punishment. I did it in the school, but when I went home, I didn't do it to my two daughters and two sons. Nor did I get corporal punishment in my own family. My father was a talatala. But I did it in the school. I more remember now when I go around, Mr. Chair, and members, as a teacher, whenever I go to Gau or to Koro, ooh, Mr. Joji, ooh, people will look at you in the community, but they won't see it. And here comes a danger fellow who always gave us a... But up till now, I now manager of the Davuilevu Methodist High School and a Sunday school teacher. Whenever I went as a teacher, I was a Sunday school teacher. Till now, retired. And now I take an extra class, year 9 to year 18, they are called the Junior Methodist Youth Fellowship. From all sorts of schools, even Suva Nausori Corridor, I live in Davuilevu..

Nasinu-Muslim, Bhawani, Nakasi, Adi Cakobau Ratu Sukuna, and we meet on Sunday. That was it. What His Grace has said always comes out to me now as a grandfather, to looking deeper into their background, what kind of family they come from, and try and internalize and share it with my Sunday school teachers and keep it as confidential as possible and talk to the parents in regards to their behavior from the school to that Sunday where we talk and meet and going back to school. But just an experience to share with you. That's it.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you Archbishop, Reverence, and Mr. Qaranivalu

Ms. Nailatikau: I thank you for the prayerful, reflective, and consultative way in which you have shared the Fiji Council of Church's submission today. I also speak as not only a person of faith, but as the daughter of a teacher who also counsels' students, let alone her own children. And so, I appreciate the perspectives that you so carefully shared.

I cannot imagine the challenges of being appropriately representative of your members, and it is deeply appreciated. I wanted to ask about, particularly relating to the Bill of Rights, and I noticed that in 7.5 you make mention of socioeconomic rights, which are part of the Bill of Rights in the current 2013 Constitution. We've heard a range of perspectives on the Bill of Rights.

Many, for instance, proclaiming its benefits, the importance of including socioeconomic rights for supporting people to progress in their lives, of having socioeconomic security as part of an overall person's well-being. And we've also heard perspectives, to use the word strongly, complaining about the bulkiness of the Bill of Rights, and potentially the fact that it could be, I wouldn't say limited, but they could still be recognized under other aspects. What I do see here is the Church's, if I'm reading it correctly, please do correct me, the Church's affirmation that rights relating to health, education, housing, and social security should become fully justiciable before the courts.

That to me is in alignment with the Church's other aspects of supporting the well-being of people, as God's creation, as followers, as members of the Church's congregation. And I would just be interested to hear your perspectives or your approach to socioeconomic rights in the Bill of Rights. Thank you.

Rev. Bruce: One of the things that we've recognized through our consultation and reading of the Constitution is that the Bill of Rights are conditional, and that they can be withdrawn and not applied very easily, just by a statement by government that we don't have the resources, full stop. And there's no other responsibility for it.

So, from our point of view, well, from the consultations and the discussions that we have had, we felt that that is too limited, in the sense that this should be something that has to be justified properly. It's not something you can just say, stand up in Parliament and say, well, we don't have the money for this. It has to be properly looked at and justified, and in certain circumstances, we're saying justified before the courts.

So that would take a longer process, and that would require through the, not just the Constitution, but through other subsidiary laws, etc., how that would actually go about, would actually happen. But I don't think that the, from my point of view, that the Bill of Rights is that extensive. It conforms with the conventions and the international laws that the country is signed on to, and that we have a responsibility to fulfill.

And our concern, though, is that you can't just take something away that you say is a Bill of Rights. It has to be more than just a declaration or a principle. It has to be something that can be justified for that, particularly for those who are poor and vulnerable situations that are going on.

So again, it's a complex situation. I recognize that, and we've just had the budget put down, and we'll be going through, all the organizations will be going through that budget and what money they will get, etc., and how they can apply that to the poor and the vulnerable people, particularly people who are living with disabilities and those who are elderly. There are already some statements that have been made by the Ministry about that and how there will be increases because of fuel, for example.

A subsidy has been taken away and how we will try to compensate in July, tomorrow, I guess it is, how they will compensate in providing an increase in the allowance, I believe it is. So, there are different ways that it can be done, and we would like to see that it would be worked through rather than just taking it away from the Constitution. So that is one of the observations, and from my point of view, also because I've also been a social worker before I became the Minister in St. Andrews, but one of the things that we have been working on, for example, at the University of the South Pacific through the social work program has always been the protection of children and the rights of people.

But we recognize from a church point of view that sometimes the Bill of Rights is something that people cannot quite listen to, and I keep on telling our congregation to listen to the Beatitudes and listen to what Jesus actually said in the Beatitudes. Don't worry about the Bill of Rights, but look at the Beatitudes and how that can be interpreted in the work that we do. So those are just my comments on that.

Archbishop Chong: You will notice that Part of our submission, you know, faith community lawyers and legal experts, and so they are picking up some of the things here that might not be too comfortable. One of them is the socio-economic rights. We notice, but we were informed that there's a lot of that in the Constitution. You have rights, but it's not guaranteed. There's a lot of limitation, or even the rights are not respected. I'd like to speak on environmental rights, which is very good when you hear it in the Constitution, number 40.

Everybody has a right to clean, healthy environment, and that's the right of our rights. But unfortunately, these rights are not protected. I'm talking about extractive industries, and we have been helping other NGOs through the Fiji Council of Churches to advocate for this right, and even to form alliance of NGOs and churches to protect something that we value, our environment.

The Vanua. Unfortunately, when Vanua rights meet money, money takes the upper hand, and at the expense of the rights of people to a healthy, clean environment, and also just the planetary good, they do have their rights. So, the responsibility that we have towards these rights is a concern for us. It looks like when development and money come in, some of these rights get suspended to allow for the interest of the human. Yes, thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Just browsing through your submission this morning I note 7.2 the review of immunity, 7.7 the Electrol reform. We have been to the review of immunity, we have received, for your information, I'm just commenting on this, we have received a lot of submissions in relation to the immunity provision in the 2013 Constitution.

There have been suggestions that the provision section, it's in Chapter 10, that it be repealed completely. There have been suggestions that we don't touch it, and instead make or include a law which looks to the future. By that I mean a law which would discourage people from taking actions like coup d'etats and all that, and also even committing crimes for serious offenses.

We are not to grant immunity to anyone, whether it be a treasonous act or any other serious offense. So those are the schools of thoughts that have made submissions to us. Repeal, complete repeal, or no repeal, keep Chapter 10, but make laws which look forward and to penalize those who might want to commit serious offenses or even a coup in the future.

I just wanted to inform you about that, your grace and Reverence in Mr. Qaranivalu. And for the electoral reform, I note that you have stated in your submission that the electoral system should improve local representation while preserving national unity. That is in 7.7, paragraph 7.7 of your submission.

The submissions that have been made to us have suggested or recommended that we go back to the multiple constituency electoral system. At the moment we have one constituency for the whole of Fiji. Suggestions have been submitted to us that we go back to the multiple constituency electoral system.

That is something we will have to think about for the simple reason that we need local representation. We were told yesterday, or we heard submission yesterday from one of the lawyers who appeared before us yesterday that someone sitting in parliament with 500 votes and for a national constituency is not representing anybody. And also the members or the citizens of the country considering the current constituency, national constituency, do not know who represents them in parliament.

So, there was a suggestion on localization, local representation that we have this multiple constituencies and we select or we vote for our members of parliament from the local constituencies so that they can sit in parliament and we all know who represents us in parliament. So that just reinforces, I believe, what your submission is in 7.7 on the electoral reform and we thank you for that. There is, is there any other question? Dr. Gounder.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you chair, good morning your grace and Reverence. Thank you very much for your submission this morning. I note some of the key pointers related to first of all the protection of the vulnerable and the socio-economic rights and you have made a strong case for enforceable socio-economic rights and I know you work in this area in the last decade has been very strong.

I recognize the work of the church as well. We have talked about how can we make some of these rights more enforceable because it does talk about limitations in terms of states ability to provide resources to achieve this and the progressive realization of some of these rights. So we are very mindful of the challenge related to enforceability of these rights but we are going to closely look at from a legal perspective as well as to how we can make some of these rights enforceable and I think which you also recognize in your submission. Regarding the civic education recommendation, we have received this from the members of the public as well. That is something we are going to very seriously look at. Also, the issue of moral values education together with civic education and one of the strategies through which we can bring more discipline into our children.

So once again thank you very much for your submission. All those key pointers are noted and the commissioner will look into how we can make some stronger provisions in the constitution. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yes Your Grace, Reverend Sepiuta and Reverend Bruce and Mr. Qaranivalu. Thank you very much for your submissions this morning. It was appreciated and we will consider the contents of your written submission and the oral submissions which have been recorded and will be transcribed later for our use.

We will consider them together with the other submissions that we have received in our deliberations. Our submissions close today. We have been receiving submissions through emails. Those who send us submissions through email we now can announce to you and to the press that we will close that today at 12 midnight. As for the other submissions, face to face submissions, we will be finishing that on the 10th of July. On the 10th of July.

So, we'll have another two weeks for oral submissions before us here. Only the scheduled ones so far. We're not taking any more. Otherwise, we will be flooded or inundated with the submissions that come August. We still have not started on writing what we are supposed to be writing. So today's the second day of the two weeks which we have extended our consultations on and it's a pleasure having had you here this morning and hearing your submissions.

Archbishop Chong : Thank you Mr. Valenitabua and the Constitution Review Committee on behalf of the Fiji Council of Churches. We also want to communicate our appreciation that we have been invited to this very important that the church does have something to say into the well-being of our nation and for the common good and for the planetary good. So on that note, thank you and God bless the good work that you are doing.

----------End of Session [30-6-2026] ----------

FIJI COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

Submission to the Review of the 2013 Constitution of the Republic of Fiji

"Justice, Peace and the Common Good"

1. Introduction

The Fiji Council of Churches (FCC), representing the Anglican Diocese of Polynesia, the Catholic Archdiocese of Suva, the Fiji Baptist Convention, the Fiji Evangelical Fellowship, the Methodist Church in Fiji, Pasifika Communities University, The Salvation Army, and St Andrew's Presbyterian Church, respectfully presents this submission to the Constitutional Review Commission.

We come not as political actors, but as followers of Jesus Christ seeking to contribute faithfully to the life of our nation. Our purpose is to evaluate the 2013 Constitution in the light of Scripture and the shared social teaching of the Christian Church. We offer both thanksgiving for its strengths and recommendations where reform is necessary.

Our hope is for a constitutional order that promotes justice, protects the dignity of every person, strengthens democracy, and contributes to lasting reconciliation among all the peoples of Fiji.

2. Methodology

This submission emerged through a process of prayer, theological reflection, dialogue and consensus-building among member churches.

Each consultation began with prayer and biblical reflection, seeking the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Participants heard presentations from legal scholars, historians, theologians, church leaders and community representatives. These presentations enabled us to reflect on Fiji's constitutional history, the legacy of political instability, and the aspirations of ordinary citizens.

Discussions took place in both small groups and plenary sessions. Participants considered difficult questions including:

- What should the churches affirm in the Constitution?
- What aspects require reform?
- How can constitutional stability be balanced with justice and accountability?
- What is God calling the churches to say to Fiji at this time?

Where differences emerged, participants returned to Scripture, reasoned together respectfully, and sought consensus. This submission represents the collective discernment of the Fiji Council of Churches rather than the opinion of any individual denomination.

3. Biblical Reflection

Our deliberations were guided particularly by three biblical texts.

Proverbs 31:8–9 reminds us:

"Speak up for those who cannot speak for themselves... defend the rights of the poor and needy."

This calls the Church to advocate for those whose voices have been marginalised.

Ephesians 4:25 teaches:

"Speak truthfully to your neighbour, for we are all members of one body."

This requires honesty about Fiji's constitutional history and present realities.

Matthew 5:9 declares:

"Blessed are the peacemakers."

Christian peacemaking requires justice, truth, repentance and reconciliation rather than merely the absence of conflict.

4. Theological Framework

Our submission is informed by the shared social teaching of the Roman Catholic Church, the World Council of Churches (WCC), and the World Evangelical Alliance (WEA). Together we refer to this tradition as Ecumenical Social Teaching (EST).

These traditions converge around eight foundational principles.

1. Human dignity and the Image of God (Imago Dei)

Every person possesses inherent dignity because all are created in the image and likeness of God (Genesis 1:27).

2. The common good and solidarity

Society exists to promote the flourishing of all people, especially through mutual responsibility and social cohesion.

3. Preferential concern for the poor

The moral character of a nation is measured by how it treats its poorest and most vulnerable citizens.

4. Participation, subsidiarity and religious freedom

Citizens have both the right and responsibility to participate in shaping the institutions that govern them.

5. Justice, peace and reconciliation

True peace is founded upon justice, accountability, forgiveness and restored relationships.

6. The dignity of work

Economic life must serve people rather than people serving economic systems.

7. Care for creation

Human beings are stewards rather than owners of creation and have a moral obligation to protect the environment.

8. Holistic mission

The Church is called to proclaim the Gospel while promoting social transformation, strengthening families and serving society.

These principles provide the framework through which we assess the 2013 Constitution.

5. Constitutional Affirmations

The Fiji Council of Churches gives thanks for a number of constitutional provisions that reflect these principles.

5.1 Human Dignity

We affirm the Bill of Rights and its protection of equality before the law, freedom from torture and degrading treatment, and other fundamental freedoms. These protections reflect the biblical conviction that every person bears the image of God.

5.2 Equal Citizenship

We affirm Section 5, which recognises equal citizenship for all Fijians.

At the same time, equal citizenship should not require the loss of ethnic, linguistic or cultural identity. Unity is strengthened—not weakened—when diversity is respected.

5.3 Protection of the Vulnerable

We welcome the inclusion of rights relating to education, health, housing, food, water and social security.

However, these rights should impose stronger positive obligations upon the State to protect vulnerable persons.

5.4 Religious Freedom

We affirm Section 22 protecting freedom of religion.

We also affirm that Fiji should remain a secular state.

A secular state protects all faiths equally. It should neither establish a state religion nor exclude religious voices from public life.

5.5 Labour Rights

We welcome constitutional recognition of workers' rights and collective bargaining.

However, stronger protections are needed regarding living wages, secure employment and safe working conditions.

5.6 Environmental Protection

We affirm the constitutional right to a clean and healthy environment.

However, we remain concerned that State ownership of minerals beneath iTaukei land is inconsistent with traditional understandings of land as an indivisible gift held by the Vanua.

6. Constitutional Concerns

6.1 Blanket Immunity (Sections 155–159)

The immunity provisions remain the greatest moral concern within the Constitution.

While the Constitution proclaims equality before the law, blanket immunity creates unequal justice by preventing victims from seeking accountability for serious abuses arising from Fiji's political crises.

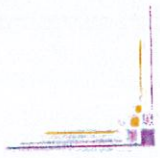
True reconciliation cannot be built upon silence. Scripture teaches that healing requires truth, repentance and justice.

The immunity provisions have delayed national healing by denying many victims the opportunity to be heard.

6.2 Limitation of Rights

Section 7 allows fundamental rights to be restricted for broad purposes such as public order and national interest.

We believe any limitation of rights should satisfy a strict proportionality test and be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.



6.3 Executive Power

The Constitution concentrates significant authority within the Executive.

Stronger parliamentary oversight and greater institutional independence are necessary to preserve democratic accountability.

6.4 Absence of a Truth and Reconciliation Framework

The Constitution contains no permanent mechanism for truth-telling, restorative justice or reparations.

Fiji requires a constitutional framework capable of addressing historical injustices through restorative rather than merely punitive approaches.

6.5 Role of the Military

The constitutional responsibilities of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces should more clearly affirm civilian supremacy.

Given Fiji's history of military intervention, constitutional safeguards protecting democratic government should be strengthened.

7. Recommendations

The Fiji Council of Churches respectfully recommends the following constitutional reforms.

7.1 A Participatory Constitutional Process

Future constitutional reform should be inclusive, transparent and participatory.

Broad public participation reflects human dignity, promotes the common good, strengthens solidarity, protects vulnerable communities and enhances constitutional legitimacy.

7.2 Review of Immunity

The immunity provisions should be repealed.

Where repeal is not immediately achievable, any future unconstitutional seizure of power should constitute the offence of high treason, attracting severe constitutional consequences.

7.3 Constitutional Truth and Reconciliation Commission

A permanent constitutional Truth and Reconciliation Commission should be established with authority to:

- investigate past political violence;
- hear victims and perpetrators;
- recommend reparations;
- facilitate restorative justice;
- recommend conditional amnesties based upon full disclosure.

7.4 Strengthen the Rights Limitation Clause

Section 7 should require that any limitation upon constitutional rights be:

- lawful;
- necessary;
- proportionate;
- demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

7.5 Make Socio-Economic Rights Enforceable

Rights relating to health, education, housing and social security should become fully justiciable before the courts.

7.6 Strengthen Democratic Accountability

The Constitution should:

- strengthen parliamentary oversight;
- reinforce judicial independence;
- empower local government;
- restore meaningful local democratic participation.

7.7 Electoral Reform

The electoral system should improve local representation while preserving national unity.

7.8 Recognition of the Family

The Constitution should recognise the family as the natural and fundamental unit of society while respecting international human rights standards.

7.9 Climate Justice

Environmental provisions should explicitly recognise climate change as an existential challenge requiring enforceable State action.

7.10 Civic Education

The Constitution should require sustained civic education programmes enabling all citizens to understand their constitutional rights and responsibilities.

7.11 Constitutional Reform

No human constitution is beyond review.

Only God's truth is absolute. Constitutional provisions should always remain open to lawful democratic amendment when justice requires reform.

7.12 The Secular State

The Fiji Council of Churches supports Section 4 establishing Fiji as a secular state.

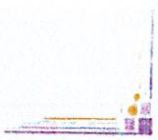
However, secularism should never require the exclusion of religion from public life.

The Church must remain free to contribute to public debate, advocate for justice, defend the vulnerable and proclaim the Gospel.

The Church serves the Kingdom of God rather than the interests of any political party or government.

8. Conclusion

The Fiji Council of Churches gives thanks for the many strengths of the 2013 Constitution, particularly its recognition of human rights, equal citizenship, religious freedom and social protections.



Nevertheless, we believe meaningful constitutional reform is necessary if Fiji is to achieve lasting justice, reconciliation and democratic maturity.

We therefore call for a constitutional review that is transparent, participatory and guided by the principles of human dignity, the common good, accountability and peace.

As Christians, we believe that true reconciliation cannot exist without truth, justice and forgiveness. We pray that God will grant wisdom to all entrusted with this important national responsibility, so that Fiji may continue to grow as a nation founded upon justice, peace and the dignity of every person.

Prepared by the Fiji Council of Churches

Rapporteurs

- Francis Namoumou (PCC)
- Peter Waqavonovono (RCA)

Note Takers

- Lui Manaseitava (Caritas)
- Ani Tokalaulevu (FCC)
- Lenaitasi Vakatora (RCA)

Facilitator

- Rev. Bruce Yates

President of the Fiji Council of Churches

.....

General Secretary of the Fiji Council of Churches

.....

Fiji Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission (FHRADC)

1351

Mr. Valenitabua: Yes, good afternoon. Good afternoon, Ms. Vuki, and good afternoon, Ms. Lewaravu, and Ms. Mausio. Thank you very much for your attendance this afternoon. Thank you for accepting our invitation. We welcome you. You will note that there are three of us here this afternoon.

Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau , I'm sure you know her well. On my left is Dr Neelesh Gounder, and I am Sevuloni Valenitabua the chairperson. You might be wondering where are the rest.

The other three are in Rotuma right now. They left this morning. Dr. John Fatiaki, Mr. Amir Kohli, a lawyer from Labasa, and Mr. Conway Begg.

They went with a team of secretariat to Rotuma this morning to undertake consultations there also until Friday. So the three of us are left here in Suva to receive consultations, to receive submissions from submitters who would want to make submissions to us. We welcome you, as I have said, from the Fiji Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission.

Before we go on, the appointment was made by His Excellency for the commissioners of the Constitutional Review Commission. Our terms of reference dictates that we are to review the 2013 Constitution. We've had submissions that we write a new constitution together.

However, that is not part of our term of reference, and we have no authority to write a new one. The only authority that we have is to review which means that we can amend. After consultations, we will need to write a report of what we have done and our recommendations in relation to the draft amended constitution, and we are also looking at writing an amended, a draft amended constitution to be presented to His Excellency.

Two expatriates have been engaged. One is a constitutional lawyer to assist us, and the second one is a constitutional legal drafter, also to assist us in relation to the drafting of the amended draft constitution. The purpose for which we are here today is to listen to you and hear your recommendations.

We will be noting down some things, but most, not most, all of what you're going to say and what we will say will be recorded. We've got recording equipment for transcribing purposes also. So feel free to air your views and your suggestions and your recommendations in relation to what you think should be included in our amended constitution.

The term of reference, since we are amending, we are given the authority to change the constitution. We can remove things or laws that are already in there which people think should be removed. We can add new provisions, and as lawyers, you would understand we can also change wordings in the provision to change the meanings.

So that is our mandate. We anticipate that we will be hearing significant submissions from you this afternoon, and I now open this consultation session and I hand over the microphone and the floor to you to make submissions to us. Thank you.

Ms. Vuki: Thank you, Mr. Chair and members of the respected panel. There's no need now to introduce us, Mr. Chair, because you've already known. In fact, you know some of us from your previous reincarnation, I think, if you allow me to use that word. But we thank you for the warm welcome. As you've said, we are not really here having listened to how you've explained a mandate to us. We are not here to overthrow the constitution.

In fact, we are quite allergic to the word overthrow. We're here to point from a human rights perspective some of the flaws in the constitution, and we will speak to the text. We have prepared the text that is before you.

We do not intend to depart from what is in the text, and my two colleagues will be helping me to present this submission to the panel this afternoon. First of all, we would like to recognize the monumental task that the panel is doing concerning the review of the constitution. And we acknowledge the work and the dedication of the Constitution Review Commission, because we certainly appreciate this is not an easy task.

So on behalf of the commission, we thank you, sir, for the warm welcome and for the explanation of your mandate. Our mandate, as you can see from page three, sir, comes from the section 45 of the 2013 constitution and its enabling legislation, sections 12 of the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission Act 2009. It gives the authority to the Human Rights Commission to monitor the state's compliance with international human rights obligations, recommend legislative, administrative, or policy reforms to strengthen human rights protection, and review existing or proposed laws, which is why we are here today and why we exist before you and why you are hearing us on policies to ensure consistency with international human rights standards.

In relation to the background, we say that in any democratic society, the constitution as the supreme law underpins the rule of law. And last year, the Supreme Court of Fiji, in its advisory opinion, stated on the constitution that, and I quote, democracy is a value that is fundamental to the 2013 constitution. So to our equality, the rule of law, and an independent court system.

Fiji, as you all know, has had four constitutions over 56 years. These constitutions have not been immune from scrutiny, public outcry, and outright abrogation. As we all know, it was imposed on the general public without meaningful and widespread prior consultation or the establishment of a national consensus.

The current review process presents an opportunity to the nation and to interested members of the public to strengthen the legitimacy of the 2013 constitution and align it with democratic principles and values. So our submission, sir, focuses on these following key human rights issues. One, the Bill of Rights and constitutional limitations.

Two, indigenous rights. Three, independence and effectiveness of the Human Rights Commission. Four, amendments provisions.

Five, immunity provisions. Six, women's rights and gender rights. And seven, equal citizenship.

So from the outset, sir, I will ask for your patience because it may take more than the usual time. It may take perhaps more than an hour. So I'm really asking for your patience with us.

You're welcome. Thank you, sir. So on page four, sir, as you will see that we have named all the nine core international human rights treaties that Fiji has ratified and is a state party to.

So its ratification of the above nine core human rights conventions places numerous international obligations upon the state to align its domestic laws, policies and practices with universal human rights standards as the primary duty bearer of human rights. So under international human rights law, the state, in its role as duty bearer, carries these four fundamental obligations. One, respect human rights.

This is what we call, sir, the imposition of negative obligations on the state. It must refrain from acting in ways that deny, suspend, harm or violate human rights. For example, no arbitrary detention, no torture, no censorship.

Two, promote human rights. The government must actively foster and nurture a culture of respect for human rights through advocacy, awareness raising, training, education and public engagement. Three, protect human rights.

The government has a positive duty to ensure that rights are not unreasonably curtailed or interfered with. For example, effective laws, enforcement and remedies. And five, fulfill the obligation to protect human rights because the government has the public resources to take active measures to give effective realization to this right in the constitution and under international law.

For example, it enacts laws that recognize and can be made responsive to human rights. It has the public resources, public services and systems that make rights a lived reality and not just a legal promise. So the fourfold obligations by the state as a duty bearer transforms human rights from abstract principles into concrete and practical government duties.

Taken together, these obligations mean that the state cannot remain passive. It must not only avoid harming rights holders, but also protect them from harm by others. And finally, proactively work to ensure that rights are fully realized and enjoyed by all.

Failure at any level, whether through wrongful action, inadequate protection or neglect to act, constitutes a breach of international human rights laws. To proactively ensure that rights are fully realized, Fiji has incorporated human rights into its 2013 constitution, as you all know, Chapter 2, the Bill of Rights, as well as into several legislations and policies. Now let's look at Chapter 2, the Bill of Rights.

As you will notice in the subtitle, we've written there broad limitation clauses. We recognize that Chapter 2, Bill of Rights has significantly evolved from previous versions. It includes a wider range of protections with 36 specific rights and freedoms compared to earlier constitutions.

In particular, it recognizes second generation human rights, including social economic and cultural rights, while also underscoring the importance of environmental rights. We welcome this progress, sir, and we do not support any amendment that will reduce or weaken the rights currently protected. Now, notwithstanding this progress, we remain concerned that many civil and political rights contained in the Bill of Rights are significantly weakened by the very broad and specific limitation clauses.

This is concerning given the state's fourfold obligation in respecting human rights by not denying, suspending, or undermining those rights. So in this regard, sir, we refer you to Section 6.5 down below. As you can see in paragraph 3.1.3, it states that rights and freedoms may be limited, A, by limitations expressly prescribed, authorized, or permitted, whether by or under a written law on a particular right or freedom in this chapter.

And certain rights in the Bill of Rights carry expressed stated limitations, for instance, freedom of expression. In B, limitations prescribed or set out in or authorized or permitted by other provisions of this constitution. For example, the Amendment Constitution Chapter 11, the Immunities Clause State of Emergency.

These are other provisions within the constitution that prescribe limitations apart from Chapter 2 Bill of Rights. And then we have limitations which are not expressly set out or authorized, but which are necessary and are prescribed by a law or provided under a law or authorized or permitted by a law or by actions taken under the authority of a law. This is what we call the General Limitation Clause, which the state can use to cover every right.

It's not only the rights that has the expressed limitation clause. It's also other rights that does not have that expressed limitation clause. And then it even moves beyond that.

So, this is what I think legal experts sir referred to as the Claw back Clause, Section 65C. So the framework allows for wide ranging limitations across the Bill of Rights. In many cases, rights can be limited if it is considered necessary for reasons such as national security, public safety, public order, public morality, or public health.

Some rights such as freedom of association, labor rights, and political rights, the requirement of necessity is not always clear, which lowers the standard for limiting them. So as a result, as I've already pointed out, so these provisions can act as Claw back Clauses where the limitations are so broad that they weaken the rights themselves. In contrast, the 1997 Constitution placed stricter controls on limitations requiring them to be reasonable and justified in a free and democratic society.

And if you could turn to page 45, sir, very quickly on Appendix 1. We just want to show you, sir, maybe just and then you can at your own leisure look at the rest. But if we turn to page 45 to make the comparison between the two, for instance, if you look on page 45, the example there we have freedom from cruel and degrading treatment. Now under the 1997 Constitution, that section 25, freedom from cruel or degrading treatment limitation, no expressly stated limitations.

Now from our view, this is understandable because freedom from cruel or degrading treatment is classified as an absolute right. Therefore, no situation including wars or any crisis whatsoever can justify torturing or making people suffer from cruel. They should be free from this kind of action.

But if you look at the 2013 Constitution, it does not treat it as an absolute right according to international standards. It has all of that which we have just shown you in Article 6.5 that can be applied in relation to the Section 11. In the interest of time, sir, because we know that it is late in the afternoon, we leave you to go through the rest at your own leisure.

But we've done that for you. So if you can move on to the next page on the inconsistency with international human rights law standards, we say that human rights law is based on protecting basic freedoms essential to human dignity and social harmony. It belongs to all people.

But not all rights are absolute. In some cases, the exercise of one person's rights may conflict with the rights of others or with wider public interest. So for this reason, both international and domestic law allow certain rights to be limited to balance these interests and protect the common good or in the public interest.

However, any limitation must be properly justified. Both international and domestic law require that limits on rights are applied only in specific and carefully defined situations. These rules ensure that restrictions are not arbitrary, are lawful, pursue a legitimate public interest, limited to what is necessary and proportionate to achieve that legitimate interest.

So we'll take you through the principles set out in Article 5 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Articles 4 and 5 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. So in Article 5 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, this is what it states, and please bear with us. Nothing in the present covenant may be interpreted as implying for any state, group or person any right to engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms recognized herein or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the present covenant.

And if you move down to Articles 4 and 5 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, similarly it states that state parties to the present covenant recognize that in the enjoyment of those rights provided by the state in conformity with the present covenant, the state may subject such rights only to such limitations as are determined by law, only insofar as this may be compatible with the nature of these rights and solely for the purpose of promoting the general welfare in a democratic society. So if you move down to Article 5, it states that nothing in the present covenant may be interpreted as implying for any state, group or person any right to engage in any activity or to perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights or freedoms recognized herein or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the present covenant. So these provisions, Mr. Chair, affirm that rights recognized under the covenant must not be restricted or derogated from except in accordance with the limitations expressly permitted within these international instruments.

This reflects a fundamental rule of interpretation that limitations are the exception, not the norm. The United Nations Human Rights Committee has consistently emphasized that the relation between right and restriction and between norm and exception must not be reversed. Now based on this framework, any limitation on human rights must meet these four key requirements, legality, legitimate aim, necessity and proportionality.

And so it is all defined there and I hope you will not get angry with me. Again, I request that at your own time you can study the definition that is already there, though I think so you are already well versed with these definitions of these four key requirements. So if you look at the next page, sir, what we have here are examples of expressly prescribed limitation standards under human rights instruments.

So if you look, for instance, at the freedom of movement under article 12 of the international covenant on civil and political rights, you will see there, sir, that the purpose of the limitation example where necessary for the protection of. So these rights, it says there, shall not be subject to any restrictions except those which are provided by law necessary to protect national security, public order, public health or morals or the rights and freedoms of others and are consistent with the other rights recognized in the present covenant. The next one which is to do with the expulsion of a lawful alien and the national security.

Now it states that the lawful alien must be allowed to submit the reasons against his expulsion and to have his case reviewed by and be represented for the purpose before the competent authority or a person or persons especially designated by the competent authority. It is not for the state simply using and claiming national security and simply expel the lawful alien and the same with freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs, right? The limitations prescribed by law should be necessary to protect public safety, order, health or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others. Freedom of expression, this too being not an absolute right, the state can make certain restrictions but this should be provided by law and are necessary for respect of the rights or reputation of others and for the protection of national security or of public order or public health or morals and then you have the rights to peaceful assembly and we've done the same rights down to the rights to form and join trade units.

Freedom of association, again we have underlined the limitations in the international instruments so if you don't mind I will leave that again to the panel to scrutinize and maybe meditate on it in terms of understanding this submission. So if we can move forward we are saying that other constitutional systems apply stricter standards when limiting rights. For example section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides that rights may be limited only by reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society and similarly if you noticed sir that the New Zealand Bill of Rights has exactly the same wording in their section 5 and we say that courts in Fiji have also recognized these principles.

These approaches set a higher standard for limiting rights than those currently applied. So we've cited a local case in 2024, the Fijian Teachers Association and the state in which the high court confirmed that it is not enough for a law to simply allow a restriction on a constitutional right. The court must also be satisfied that the restriction is justified and proportionate and if I may quote what the court said, it does not suffice that there is a written law authorizing a limitation on a constitutional right.

The court must also be satisfied that the limitation is justified and proportionate. This approach follows the proportionality test set out in the Canadian R and Oakes case. In this case the accused was charged with unlawful possession of illegal drugs for the purpose of trafficking under Canada's narcotics legislation.

The accused Oakes argued that his right to presumption of innocence until proven guilty was violated. The court found that the narcotics legislation he was charged under had reversed the onus of proof to the accused and in applying the test below further found that the legislation limiting the presumption of innocence failed at the second stage. That is the legislation did not impair the right as little as possible.

In fact the limitation was disproportionate to the actual right. So under this Oakes test the objective of the limitation must be sufficiently important to justify restricting a constitutional right and the limitation must be proportionate by one being rationally connected to the objective. In this case the test failed because the court said it was irrational to automatically assume that someone is a major drug trafficker just because they have a small amount of drugs for personal use and two impairing the right as little as possible and maintaining overall proportionality between the limitation and the objective pursuit.

That is the court weighed the beneficial effects of the law against its negative impact on the rights of the accused. So in the next page sir we compare the limits on rights under the international covenant on civil and political rights and the international covenant on the economic social and cultural rights with those under Fiji's 2013 constitution. So if we look at what we have there sir we have the freedom of expression the limit is the second column sir the limitations if you look at the limitations under the two international instruments article 19-3 national security public order public health public morals rights and reputations of others.

So freedom of expression can be reasonably limited under those following reasons. Now under the 2013 constitution what we have there is freedom of speech expression and publication and then we have underlined for emphasis the limitations right to the extent that it that it is necessary a law may limit or may authorize the limitation of the rights and freedoms mentioned in subsection one and then you have all those information right. So it repeats here the limitations so it repeats article 19:3 in the international instruments national security public safety public order public morality public health and then it introduces that very interesting phrase or the orderly conduct of elections and then if we move on down it correctly is in line with international directives but then we've also underlined where they have added into the rights of people injured or abused by inaccurate or offensive media reports to have a correction published on reasonable conditions established by law.

So this so we've underlined where they have brought in limitations that does not align with international directives on human rights and if you can see sir we have the rights to peaceful assembly we've done it for other rights as well freedom of association the rights to form and join trade unions freedom of movement rights down to procedural protections on decision to expel a lawful alien. If you turn to page 15 sir you will notice that they have employment relations the international instruments are silent on that rights to privacy access to information rights to economic participation environmental rights and rights of persons with disabilities the two international instruments do not have any provisions on that it is silent on it but the 2013 constitution have substantial information on how to limit those rights. So my director has just pointed out to me that I need to emphasize on page 15 sir if you don't mind if I take you back she's pointed out that the limitation in the 2013 constitution simply says to the extent that it is necessary and it repeats that for right to privacy access to information right to economic participation environmental rights and rights of persons with disability.

It repeats necessary as a fundamental reason for limitation without defining necessary and without explaining the legitimate interest and without no reference to proportionality. I thank you director do you want to add now my director tells me Mr. Chair that the explanation is in the next paragraph if you don't mind I will just refer to the explanation in the text in case my explanation was not clear enough. So as shown in the table many provisions of the bill of rights allow rights to be limited on broad grounds such as national security public safety public order public morality and public health.

In most cases the standard used is whether the limitation is necessary however for some rights such as freedom of association labor rights and political rights even this requirement is not consistently applied. As a result the limits on these rights can be wider than the rights themselves meaning restrictions placed is so broad they significantly reduce or undermine the enjoyment of these rights. So as a result they effectively act as a claw back clauses that weaken constitutional protection.

So we are concerned that the current approach to limiting human rights under the 2013 constitution does not fully align with international human rights standards. In particular some limitation clauses do not meet the required standards of legality necessity and proportionality. This lowers the level of scrutiny applied to restrictions on fundamental rights and increases the risk that limits may be imposed in ways that are unnecessary or disproportionate.

So without clear and strict safeguards these provisions may allow excessive interference with protected rights undermining both the rule of law and the effective protection of human rights. So the analysis Mr Chair shows that the broad limitation clauses in the 2013 constitution allow rights to be restricted on vague grounds such as what is necessary for national security, what is necessary for public safety, what is necessary for public order as well as public health and morality. It isn't defined in the constitution so this gives a very broad ambit in which the state could justify limiting certain rights.

It creates a permissive legal environment where laws may fall short of international human rights standards and an example so is the Media Industry Development Act 2010 also known as MIDA. It was an example of legislative restrictions or limitations of rights under the Bill of Rights. It severely limited freedom of the press and freedom of expression as well as allowing the Media Industry Development Authority established by the Act to investigate and compel information from the journalist.

Well we all know what happened to MIDA. It is hopefully is buried and will not rise again. The Public Order Act 1969 is another example.

When read together with the constitution, the Public Order Act allows the government to use force to maintain public order based on a very broad standard of what is necessary. This standard is so wide that it creates a risk of serious abuses including torture as recognized in section 17b of the Public Order Act and under section 17c of the Public Order Act the military police is given powers such as arrest powers, detention and use of force in situations linked to public safety or public order but because public order and public safety are defined very broadly these powers can be exercised with limited control. So this weakens important protections including the rights to be free from torture which is an absolute right right under international law including article 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the convention against torture and Fiji may I repeat is a state party to these two conventions.

This provision has already demonstrated tragic consequences as evidenced by the recent death of a citizen in military custody and so if you want to know more we have footnoted it down below. This highlights the danger of giving broad powers without proper safeguards. In addition the Public Order Act protects police and military officers from being prosecuted which can create a culture of impunity and weakens accountability.

This further undermines protection from cruel inhuman or degrading treatment. We find that the most concerning provisions of the Public Order Act are found in sections 9 and 21. Section 9 gives the commissioner of police the power to refuse permits for public meetings or processions if he considers it necessary for public safety public order or essential services.

The standard we consider is subjective and does not provide clear criteria to guide proper objective decision making. As a result it allows the arbitrary denial of the right to peaceful assembly which is protected under international law and the constitution. Under international human rights law any restriction must meet the requirements of legality necessity and proportionality.

Section 9 fails to meet these standards. It does not require proof of a real or imminent threat nor does it require that the least restrictive option be used. Refusing a permit is a broad measure that removes the right entirely rather than limiting it in a careful and balanced way.

There is also no requirement to consider less restrictive alternatives making the restriction disproportionate. Section 21 of the Public Order Act raises even greater concern. It prevents any decision made under the Public Order Act from being challenged in court with the exception of decisions pertaining to sections 8, 9, 11 and 11a of the Public Order Act.

Those are just the exceptions. This removes the right of individuals to seek legal review which is protected under the constitution. It also allows decisions affecting certain rights.

This is inconsistent with the rule of law and with international standards which require that restrictions on rights be open to review.

Mr Chair, the recent denial in April this year of a permit to the villagers of Vuda who sought to peacefully march to advocate for the constitutional rights to a clean and healthy environment under section 40 of the constitution exemplifies the oppressive application of Section 9 of the Public Order Act. The commissioner exercised his subjective and arbitrary discretion to refuse the permit and grants of public order thereby silencing legitimate environmental advocacy and denying the community any lawful avenue to challenge the arbitrary restriction on their rights.

One of the most prominent examples of the Public Order Act, the use of it sir, is what happened in July 2021 when nine prominent political figures and some of them are now part of the coalition government were arrested and detained on the allegation that their critiques of the government breached the Public Order Act because their writings constituted malicious writings of false news or reports tending to create or foster public alarm and anxiety and this was all because they made criticisms of the Land Bill. So these incidents illustrate how the very broad and subjective standards in the Public Order Act can be weaponized to suppress legitimate expression and assembly undermining the very essence of democratic governance. The impact we say of these provisions is very serious.

We consider that the Public Order Act does not meet human rights standards, the broad limitation clauses in the constitution have allowed laws that give excessive powers to authorities, limit access to justice, reduce accountability and restrict legitimate public participation. These issues undermine the rule of law and weaken the protection of fundamental rights. So our recommendation, we propose two causes of action on the limitations.

Option one, remove the limitation clauses altogether. Option two, amend section 65 of the 2013 constitution to require that limitations be reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. And so, sorry Mr. Chair, the staff have kind of attempted a draft of it.

Perhaps your consultants can have a look at their draft. We've also provided alternative wording by Professor Yash Ghai. Perhaps your consultants might want to consider Professor Yash Ghai's alternative wording.

Now the limitations on the rights of arrested and detained persons on section 13. So section 13 of the constitution sets out the rights of persons who are arrested or detained. These rights are essential for protecting life, liberty and personal security.

They form a core part of fundamental human rights and closely linked to the enjoyment of other rights. These protections are also recognized in international law including article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The 2013 constitution has extended these protections compared to earlier versions.

It provides a detailed list of rights for arrested or detained persons. These include the right to be informed promptly in a language they understand, the reason for arrest or detention, as well as their rights to remain silent and the consequences of speaking. Communicate with a legal practitioner and be informed of this right to be brought before a court as soon as possible with 48 hours as the maximum period and other related rights provided under the constitution.

These protections are consistent with article 9 of the international covenant on Civil and Political Rights that guarantees the right to liberty, security of person and protect individuals from arbitrary arrest or detention. It also requires that individuals be informed of the reasons for their arrest and any charges against them. Importantly, Article 9 4 provides that a detained person must be brought promptly before a court and has the right to challenge the legality of their detention.

Although section 13 strengthens several aspects of protection, certain wording raises concerns in particular in section 13 subsection section 1 subsections a and i under this particular section 13. It allows a person to be held as long as they are informed of the reason for their arrest and the nature of any charge. This may allow detention without requiring that charges be laid promptly.

This represents a departure from the earlier constitution which required that a detained person be released if not charged within a short time. Under the current framework, there is a risk that authorities may hold individuals for the full 48 hour period while continuing investigations. This raises concern that detention may be used as a tool for fishing expeditions rather than for genuine and justified investigations.

Further concerns arise from the interaction between Article 13 of the international covenant on civil and political rights and the Public Order Act. Section 17a of the Public Order Act allows detention beyond the constitutional 48 hour limit. It permits arrest with or without a warrant based on a reasonable suspicion that a person has acted or may act in a way that affects public safety.

However, public safety is not clearly defined. This creates a risk of arbitrary detention. In addition, the public order act allows detention to be extended for up to 14 days if information cannot be obtained within the initial 48 hour period.

Furthermore, Fiji is obligated to provide sufficient and sanitary detention conditions for detainees. The United Nations human rights committee emphasized the need for this. Any necessary detention should take place in appropriate sanitary non-punitive facilities.

This framework raises serious due process concerns. The extended detention period may be applied without sufficient safeguards and individuals may not have effective access to legal remedies such as the right to challenge detention through legal action challenging the lawfulness of their being detained. As a result, although section 13 of the 2013 constitution provides important rights on the text itself, the combined effect of broad limitation clauses and the public order act reduces their practical protection.

So this, we say, undermines the purpose of the constitutional guarantee and weakens overall protection of personal liberty. Again, we refer to the United Nations Human Rights Committee which is of the view that 48 hours is ordinarily sufficient to transport the individual and to prepare for the judicial hearing. Any delay longer than 48 hours must remain absolutely exceptional and be justified under the circumstances.

The committee also advised that an especially strict standard of promptness such as 24 hours should apply in the case of juveniles. So our recommendations, Mr Chair, is one, amend section 13 of the 2013 Constitution to explicitly require that a person must either be formally charged or released within a short and clearly defined period. That is 48 hours for adults and 24 hours for juveniles.

And two, align section 13 of the 2013 constitution more closely with article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights by guaranteeing that all detained persons are promptly brought before a court and have an effective right to challenge the legality of their detention. If I may move us forward, sir, to the state of emergency powers. The 2013 constitution has provisions on states of emergency which are of concern to us.

There is a clear tension between the protection of human rights and the use of Emergency Powers as a state of emergency allows rights to be significantly limited. For this reason, such measures should only be used in extreme situations such as war or serious threats to the security or survival of a country. For example, under the European convention on human rights, a state of emergency is permitted only in times of war or a public emergency that threatens the life of the nation.

Consistent with this approach, Article 4 of the international covenant on civil and political rights allows certain rights to be limited during a State of Emergency but only to the extent strictly required by the situation. It also requires that any measures taken remain consistent with the state's other obligations under international law. These standards set a high threshold for both declaring and applying emergency powers.

Now in contrast, we have a concern that the threshold for declaring a state of emergency under the 2013 constitution is set too low. Section 154 allows a declaration where the security or safety of all or part of Fiji is threatened. This broad wording may allow emergency powers to be used in situations that do not meet the high standards required under international law.

Further concern arises from how a state of emergency is declared. Section 154 allows the prime minister acting on the advice of the commissioner of police and the commander of the republic of Fiji Military Forces to declare a state of emergency. This approach differs from earlier constitutions where parliament played a central role.

So if you may allow me sir, if we can all move to page 59 to appendix 3 for comparison of all constitutions on the States of Emergency. If you look on page 59 sir we've looked at from the 1970 forward to the 2013 constitutions. If you look at under the 1970 constitution state of emergency proclaimed by the governor general but that is dependent on the resolution of each house of parliament.

So parliament plays a central role in the 1970 constitution in relation to the state of emergency. In the 1990 constitution again it is the president head of state and again we see that the proclamation of emergency parliament is involved. 1997 constitution it's the same thing parliament is involved in relation to a state of emergency and the president as the head of state is involved.

Section 154 under the 2013 constitution it is the prime minister on two public institutions. The republic of the Republic of the Fijian Military Forces and the police institution. So they advise the prime minister in terms of that declaration of the state of emergency parliament is missing in action under section 154.

So we recommend sir back to page 23 review and amend section 1 154 to expressly state that the executive to recommend to parliament any state of emergency parliament plays the lead decisive role in the declaration the approval the extension and the oversight of a State of Emergency. If I may for move forward sir on resource based limitations. We note that some provisions in the Bill of Rights may unintentionally allow the state to avoid meeting its human rights obligations.

For example section 34-2 of the 2013 constitution which concerns the right to reasonable access to transportation states that if the state claims that it does not have the resources to implement the Right to Access. It is the responsibility of the state to show that the resources are not available. Other sections which have the same provision include section 31 (5) the rights to education section 33 (2) the rights to work and adjust minimum wage section 35-2 the rights to housing and sanitation section 36 (2) the rights to adequate food and water section 37 (2) the rights to social security schemes and section 38 (3) the rights to health.

So while these provisions Mr. Chair correctly place the burden on the state we are concerned that it may be used as a basis to delay or deny the realization of rights. International Human Rights Law does recognize that resources may be limited but at the same time they allow for the progressive realization of certain rights. The limitation in resources should not remove the state's responsibility to act.

The state must show genuine resource constraints and demonstrate that it has made serious and ongoing efforts to allocate available resources. A simple claim of insufficient resources should not be enough. So we emphasize that the obligation to protect human rights requires the state to take positive steps to ensure that the rights are not unfairly restricted or interfered with.

This includes adopting effective laws ensuring proper enforcement and providing access to remedies and we emphasize that failure to meet these obligations weaken the protection of rights and leaves individuals vulnerable undermining the very purpose of the constitution to protect them. So we are recommending sir the amending of sections 31 33, 34, 35, 37, 38 and where the state relies on a lack of resources as a justification for failing to fulfill these rights under those sections the state bears the burden of proving unclear and convincing evidence that one it has exhausted all reasonably available resources two it has prioritized the fulfillment of this right in good faith three no reasonable alternative measures could have achieved this right and four priority will be placed on remedying this gap and restoring the right as soon as practicably possible or as soon as possible.

And now on indigenous rights of the removal of constitutional safeguards we recognize that indigenous rights are a crucial element of of national stability at the core of indigenous rights are the principles of self-determination land and resource rights cultural preservation and free prior and informed consent.

Fiji is a state party to the indigenous and tribal peoples convention ILO convention 169 which it ratified in 1998 and in 2023 Fiji officially supported and recognized the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples. Fiji has a long and complex constitutional history on the recognition of indigenous rights. The 1997 constitution provided strong protections for indigenous land ownership and cultural authority.

It required special consent for any changes to laws affecting itoke land or their affairs. These protections were reinforced by entrenched clauses meaning that such laws could not be easily changed or by a simple majority in parliament. In addition the constitution included a dedicated chapter on group rights which recognized customary law and provided for affirmative action and if we can turn to appendix 2 page 51 sir just to have a quick look at the comparison.

If you'll notice on Indigenous Rights in the 1970 constitution no provisions explicitly provide for indigenous rights however there were several sections or provisions that reserved the office of the prime minister and a majority in the house in relation to addressing the interests of indigenous Fijians. But if you come to 1990 constitution the protection and enhancement of vision and human interest you will see sir if you go down 51 down to page 52 that it contained expressly stated protection for indigenous rights and interests. The details I will leave it to the panel at their own leisure to go through.

Again 1997 constitution you have section 185 and section 186. These are the Group Rights that is not in the 2013 constitution. So if you can see there was a lot in the 1997 constitution on indigenous interests on their group rights.

Under the 2013 constitution Section 28 provides for rights of ownership and protection of Itaukei, Kei, Rotuman and Banaban lands and that is basically all that we have under section 28 in that protection and if we move forward sir we would like to say that the 2013 constitution significantly changed this approach. It removed the entrenched clauses on group rights found in the 1997 constitution. It also abolished senate and the great council of chiefs which had played an important role in the governance of the itaukei and their land administration.

But we would like to mention that section 28 one absolutely prohibits the permanent alienation of indigenous lands Ito, Kei, Rotuman and Banaban lands. So this means that such lands must always remain with its indigenous owners and can never be sold or transferred permanently thereby recognizing and protecting the reversionary rights of indigenous owners. However the practical implementation of this protection of indigenous ownership rights remains an ongoing concern as questions persist on the extent to which indigenous communities can or are able to effectively exercise control over, benefit from and participate in decisions affecting their land and natural resources.

The removal of constitutional and institutional safeguards for example such as the GCC adds to this ongoing concern that the current constitutional framework does not adequately protect indigenous identity and resources, traditional governance structures and cultural heritage. For the indigenous communities traditional institutions such as the GCC serve as essential mechanisms of representation and consultations as well as significant custodians of customary traditions and values, cultural continuity and customary collective decision making. The removal of these entrenched safeguards has important practical consequences.

Laws affecting indigenous land and affairs such as the Ito, Kei Lands Act 1905 can now be amended or repealed by a simple majority in parliament. This can occur without meaningful consultation with indigenous communities. This situation does not align with Fiji's obligations under ILO Convention 169 and UNDRIP both of which require good faith consultation and the obtaining of free prior and informed consent before adopting measures that affect indigenous peoples.

So our recommendation sir is re-insert as appropriate entrenched clauses from the 1997 constitution sections 185 and 186 on group rights and customary rights requiring specific consent and additional safeguards before any laws impacting indigenous affairs or lands can be amended. Now so we say appropriate because at that time Fiji had a bicameral parliament under the 1997 constitution. The 2013 constitution has removed that.

It is only one house. There's no longer two houses because senate has been abolished and this is why we say that any adjustment must be done in the context of the current political structure in relation to this recommendation. And as we move forward sir we now say that land rights while we recognize section 28 but we also say that land rights and the protection of it may be an illusion.

So we are saying that it grants as an illusion while it grants to the state in section 28 powers under section 27 sorry sir if you section 28 absolute prohibition on alienation of land indigenous land section 27 grants to the state powers through written law for compulsory acquisition of land and property for various reasons including for public purposes or for reason of national development. So while section 28 on its face appears to provide strong protection section 27 weakens it by allowing land to be taken by the state giving rise to a fundamental tension between indigenous ownership rights and the state's authority to override it. The concept of compulsory land expropriation conflicts with the principle of indigenous land ownership.

International standards also take a different approach while UNDRIP does not explicitly refer to expropriation section 32 requires the state to consult indigenous peoples and obtain their consent before any project affecting their land or resources is approved. For this reason the requirements for free prior and informed consent must apply to any acquisition of customary land. Section 27 should therefore be amended to reflect this obligation or alternatively removed altogether if it cannot meet international standards.

The 2013 constitution also removed earlier safeguards that required consent before amending laws on indigenous land and affairs. Under the 1997 constitution sections 185 and 186 ensured that such changes could only be made with proper approval and additional protections. This is consistent with article 19 of UNDRIP which requires the states to work in good faith with indigenous peoples to obtain their free prior and informed consent before introducing measures that affect them.

Mr. chair we say that these safeguards are no longer present in the 2013 constitution. As a result important laws concerning indigenous land and rights cannot be changed more easily. This creates uncertainty and weakens long-standing protections.

We therefore consider it necessary to restore the entrenched provisions from the 1997 constitution. We emphasize that strengthening indigenous rights does not undermine the rights of other groups rather it ensures fairness by protecting key principles such as self-determination, land ownership, and free prior and informed consent. So we recommend one recognize the principle of free prior and informed consent explicitly in the constitution ensuring it applies to all activities affecting indigenous land, resources, and cultural heritage.

In addition, ensure meaningful participation in all decision making that involves indigenous rights and interests lands and resources. Secondly we recommend amend section 27 so that any state acquisition of Itoke, Rotuman, or Banaban land requires a genuine free prior and informed consent process and includes fair, full, and timely compensation. So if we move on to minerals ownership the three feet below.

Mr. Chair a long-standing and increasingly contested issue concern the separation between land ownership and the ownership of minerals beneath the land. Under the current system Itaukei land owners own the surface of their land while all minerals beneath it are owned by the state. A colonial era concept often referred to as the three feet below doctrine.

What this means is when there are minerals the state has subsurface rights and when there are no minerals the indigenous people have subsurface rights. Section 30 of the 2013 constitution confirms state ownership of all minerals. This is supported by legislation such as the mining acts 1965 and the petroleum acts 1978.

Although the fair share of mineral royalties act 2018 provides that landowners receive 80 percent of royalties the total royalty is usually only three to five percent of the minerals value. As a result the actual benefit received by land owners remains very small which has been acknowledged by the Itaukei land trust board in relation to the unfair return. So we say that this legal framework gives rise to multiple interconnected human rights violations that strike at the heart of indigenous self-determination and dignity.

First the framework undermines the principle of free prior and informed consent. Under the mining acts 1965 landowners are not required to give consent before prospective licenses or mining leases are granted. They are only informed concerning access to their land.

This limits the ability of communities to say no at the outset of projects that may harm their land their environment and their livelihoods. This approach is not consistent with international standards under UNDRIP and ILO convention 169. Secondly the system results in unequal sharing of benefits.

Indigenous communities bear the environmental and social impacts of mining such as land degradation and disruption to livelihoods yet receive only a small share of the financial returns. Even though landowners so we have been told receive a high percentage of royalties the overall value of those royalties is low. Thirdly the framework leads to environmental harm.

Past mining operations for example in the Namosi region have resulted in documented environmental damage including contamination of waterways and destruction of traditional food sources. These harms have fueled deep-seated grievances and strong opposition to new mining projects. Yet because the legal framework does not require landowner consent at the exploration stage communities are often left to respond to these impacts after they occur rather than preventing them from the outset.

Fourthly the framework systematically excludes ITaukei landowners from decision-making processes that directly affect their lives and territories. The ITaukei land trust board has noted that landowners are largely excluded from the negotiation and management of mining projects. The state negotiates on their behalf and royalties are paid directly to the state not to the landowners or their representatives.

This model perpetuates colonial power dynamics reducing traditional custodians to being passive recipients of state-determined outcomes rather than recognizing them as equal partners in the governance of their own resources. And finally we continue to say that the system reflects a continuation of colonial practices. It separates land from its natural resources which is inconsistent with the ITaukei concept of the Vanua where land people and resources are one in the same.

By maintaining this colonial construct the state not only deprives indigenous communities of economic justice but also weakens traditional systems of governance denying the holistic relationship between the people and their ancestral territory. International instruments such as UNDRIP emphasizes that indigenous peoples are not just stakeholders to be consulted but rights holders whose cultural survival, socio-economic development and self-determination are deeply rooted in their land and natural resources given their distinctive spiritual and material relations with them. Therefore mineral projects must respect indigenous rights, ensure meaningful participation, ensure no or minimize environmental or social harm and provide fair and equitable benefits to affected indigenous communities.

So we recommend amend section 30 of the constitution to recognize customary ownership of minerals found in or under ITaukei land customary marine areas and protected areas and vest these rights in the respective customary land owners. Secondly we say if the ownership of minerals remain vested in the state then section 30 to be amended sorry section 30 subsection 2 be amended to guarantee the rights of indigenous people to free prior and informed consent, meaningful participation in decision-making processes, the conduct of independent environmental and social impact assessments with findings made publicly available particularly to affected communities to determine whether approval may or may not be given, fair and equitable sharing of benefits and access to effective remedies and compensation for any damage or harm to their lands, waters, customary marine areas, their qoliqoli, livelihood and traditional way of life. And now Mr. Chair you may be pleased that I will stop here for a while because my director will now take over for the next section.

If I may request if we could go on to the amendment position of commissions. The commissioner's recruitment process can deal with that later on. We'll have a read through that and then we'll come back to the commission in the event we have some questions in relation to paragraph 5 which is HRADC if we could move on to paragraph 6 which is the amendment provision section 159 to 160.

I note that there's reference to the Supreme Court to the Supreme Court opinion yes and the equal citizenship and or the women's rights and gender rights and the citizenship and national identity. If we could start with the amendment provisions please. Thank you sir.

In that case I will continue on in relation to the overly restrictive amendment framework sections 159 and 160. August 2025 last year the Supreme Court issued an important but binding advisory opinion following a request by cabinet and we all know the history of that. If I can move on to the second paragraph sir.

The 2013 constitution set very strict rules for amendment section 160 required that any constitutional change whether minor or major must be approved by three quarters of all members of parliament and three quarters of all registered voters in a memorandum. This meant that approval depended not only on those who voted but on all registered voters. In addition section 159 made certain provisions including the amendment process itself and immunity clauses unamendable.

So together these requirements made the constitution extremely difficult some say impossible to change in practice. So to address these concerns the court applied what he described as remedial interpretation. The approach involves interpreting legal provisions in a way that makes them workable and consistent with fundamental principles such as democracy and self-determination.

The court held that the amendment rules should be read in a way that allows meaningful constitutional change. It found that the original requirements were too strict did not align with the right of people to determine their own system of government and in reaching this conclusion the Supreme Court relied on international law including article one of the international covenant on civil and political rights as well as the democratic values reflected in the constitution itself. So the court found that the requirements for a three-quarters majority in parliament created an unreasonable barrier to constitutional change.

It noted that such a rule would allow a relatively small minority to block any amendments in the context of a constitution that was not originally adopted through a democratic process this restriction was considered unacceptable. The court therefore held that a two-thirds majority of all members of parliament is more appropriate while still a high threshold it allows for meaningful change while maintaining stability. The court also noted that similar thresholds are common in Fiji's constitutional history and in other countries.

The court also reviewed the referendum requirement it recognized the value of involving the public in constitutional amendments however it found that requiring approval from three-quarters of all registered voters was impractical and overly restrictive. The Supreme Court therefore held that the referendum requirement should be a simple majority of those who actually vote in the referendum. This change makes the process more realistic while still ensuring that public support is required for constitutional change.

So the court did not recognize the provision that prevented any changes to the amendment rules themselves. It found that such a restriction would permanently block constitutional reform so by declining to recognize this provision the court ensured that the amendments process itself can be revised if necessary and so we recommend amend sections 159 and 160 of the 2013 constitution to formally reflect the interpretation provided by the Supreme Court. This includes adopting a two-thirds majority in parliament and a simple majority of those voting in a referendum for constitutional amendments.

Secondly review and revise the amendment framework to ensure that it is practical and achievable while still maintaining appropriate safeguards. The amendment process should allow for meaningful constitutional reform without creating unnecessary barriers. Three, retain the requirements for public involvement through referendum but ensure that the process is accessible and reflects the will of those who participate.

Public education and awareness initiatives should be introduced to support informed participation in constitutional reform processes. Four, clearly define which provisions if any should remain protected from amendment. Where such protections are retained they should be justified and made consistent with democratic principles and international standards.

And fifth, ensure that the amendment provisions align with the right to self-determination as recognized under international law including the international covenant on civil and political rights this we say will strengthen the legitimacy of the constitution both domestically and internationally. And sixth and lastly consider establishing a formal mechanism for periodic constitutional review. This would allow the constitution to evolve in a structured and inclusive manner reducing the need for ad hoc reforms.

And now may I move on to the immunity provisions Mr. Chair on chapter 10. We say that the immunity provisions outlined under chapter 10 of the 2013 constitution which incorporates the immunity provisions from the 1990 constitution provide absolute immunity from criminal prosecution or civil liability or any other type of court actions against anyone involved in the 1987 and 2006 military coups. The only one who paid was the failed civilian coup of 2000.

The time frame being from December 5 2006 until the first sitting of parliament elected in the 2014 elections. We note the concerns of members of the public calling for the removal of the immunity provisions and we acknowledge the broader issues these concerns raised on the necessity and importance of accountability, the rule of law, equality before the law and sound democratic governance. In this regard we refer to the supreme court of Fiji in its opinion in August last year which raised these same concerns of accountability the rule of law and the restoration and preservation of democratic values moving from an authoritarian military governance towards civilian democratic governance.

The supreme court opined that immunity provisions can be seen to detract from the rule of law. They insulate from what would otherwise be the legal consequences of their actions. They also sit uneasily with the concept of equality before the law.

As well such provisions may create in the minds of those contemplating a coup expectations of future immunities and in this way might increase the risks of extra constitutional action. These issues are compounded say the supreme court when immunities are not able to be amended but then the supreme court further added that unamenable immunities may be as they probably were in 2012 and 2013 preconditions to a peaceful transition from military government to democracy. In this way they can be seen to promote democratic values.

In brief Mr. Chair it was the conclusion of the supreme court for reason of national stability the peaceful transition that it regarded as an act that promoted democracy and reason of legal continuity that the immunity provisions remain protected and cannot be amended. In light of the supreme court's opinion and public calls for the removal of the immunity provisions we acknowledge that while such provisions are fundamentally offensive to democratic accountability and the rule of law they were a practical necessity if you like Mr. Chair. Unnecessary evil for securing a peaceful transition towards restoring democratic civilian rule thus peacefully returning power to the people.

However in upholding the public's call for democratic accountability for the perpetrators of military and civilian coups and while respecting the supreme court's opinion of august 2025 the human rights commission is of the view that there is need to strengthen section 2 subsection 6 of the 2013 constitution to prohibit future coups and that any future attempts to overthrow government and subvert the constitution should carry mandatory life sentences with no access to executive or presidential pardons as the provision has already stated that no immunities can lawfully be granted under any law. Now this will also require an amendment to section 119 of the 2013 constitution to ensure that the mercy commission does not include among its recommendations to the president for his power of mercy those engaged in coups and the overthrow of a government. We acknowledge the action of the coalition government in establishing the truth and reconciliation commission to address the trauma sufferings and human rights violations arising from the 1987-2006 coups.

We however note that the truth and reconciliation commission does not provide a clear pathway for reparations or accountability. We also note that section 1583 prevents the state from paying compensation for damages injury or loss caused by actions and conduct for which immunity has been granted. However Mr. Chair we are of the view that this does not prevent the state from providing some level of assistance and comfort to victims and that this assistance should not be framed as legal damages or legal compensation in light of section 1583 but provided to victims on humanitarian and restorative grounds.

We recognize the very important role of the republic of Fiji military forces in protecting and safeguarding Fiji's security and defense. We also note continuing public concerns on section 131 subsection 2 of the 2013 constitution which vests in the republic of the Fiji military forces the overall responsibility to ensure at all times the security defense and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians. A grave concern Mr. Chair is that this section could be misused because its language is so broad and ambiguous and it can justify military intervention in political disputes and civilian governance.

We are of the view that section 1312 requires language that removes the ambiguity and vagueness provides clarity on the role and responsibility of the military and expressly states that the military remains subordinate to civilian rule and elected government authorities at all times. So we recommend Mr. Chair one strengthen section 2 subsection 6 of the 2013 constitution by amending it to incorporate that future coup actions and those responsible shall be given mandatory life sentences and shall not have access or be granted executive or presidential pardons. To section 119 of the 2013 commission sorry constitution to be amended to ensure that the mercy commission does not consider any petition from nor recommend to the president for his power of mercy any person involved in coup actions or the overthrow of a government.

Three that government notwithstanding section 1583 of the 2013 constitution reinforce the work of the truth and reconciliation commission by establishing an independent state-funded restorative justice and humanitarian fund to provide some level of assistance and comfort to victims. And for section 131 subsection 2 of the 2013 constitution be completely rewritten to clearly and specifically set up the powers functions or responsible responsibilities of the republic of Fiji military forces the limits to the exercise of these powers functions or responsibilities and that the military remains subordinate to the rule of law and to civilian rule exercised through the democrat democratically elected government at all times. And now Mr chair if we can move forward we now wish the panel to consider immunity to be time bound expanding and removal of immunity provisions in the interest of future generations.

Mr chair we acknowledge concerns and discussions by members of the public that the preservation of the immunity provisions indefinitely is not in the best interest of future generations. The constitution is not only the supreme law but it should also serve as a moral compass for the nation. The permanent protection of these immunities is in our view entrenching historical political conflicts within the nation's supreme law long after their practical purpose has ceased and those covered by the immunity provisions have also ceased to exist.

The continued inclusion of the immunity provisions may risk memorializing and some probably would say glorifying in the supreme law prisoners actions constitutional disruptions and extra constitutional political change. Future generations may see this continued immunity protection as an implicit endorsement even legitimization of actions and conduct that violated democratic principles and constitutional processes. This may lead to the perception that unlawful and extra constitutional actions can achieve constitutional recognition and protection without accountability.

It is therefore argued that the maintaining of the immunity provisions can undermine efforts towards strengthening constitutional supremacy the rule of law and democratic accountability. The human rights commission is of the view that it is an unreasonable and unjust burden on future generations to inherit a document that carries within its permanent protection of actions and conduct that violated the very constitutional order they are asked and required to uphold. So we say that in balancing respect for the supreme court's opinion of august 2025 with Fiji's long-term democratic development and constitutional evolution the following forward-looking approach is proposed.

This approach seeks a compromise in preserving the original purpose of the immunity provisions while recognizing that the constitution is a living document and should evolve with the nation it serves. We propose the insertion of its sunset provision into the 2013 constitution expressly stating that all immunity provisions be automatically expunged and removed from the constitution in 30 years time. A 30-year time frame means that all those involved in actions and conduct for which immunity is granted would have passed on into history.

More importantly future generations will inherit a clean document free from exceptional provisions that link it to past historical constitutional disruptions and political upheavals. The eventual removal of the immunity provisions recognizes that the passage of time has rendered such exceptional provisions unnecessary and that such information best belongs in the public record academic writings and study on national forums for debates and discussions. They need not be permanently enshrined in the constitution once their transitional and practical purpose has been achieved.

To maintain the immunity provisions indefinitely risks transforming what was intended as a transitional mechanism into a constitutional principle which is when immunity is kept indefinitely it risks subverting or undermining the fundamental legal principle that all individuals are subject to and equal before the law. So as custodians of Fiji's constitutional future Mr. Chair, the present generation should ensure that future generations inherit a constitution that reflects the ideals and values of democracy, the supremacy of the constitution, the rule of law, equality before the law, accountability, respect for human rights, and the peaceful transfer of political power through sound democratic process. The constitution should embody these enduring principles and values and must not remain permanently tied to exceptional provisions which arose from particular historical and political circumstances that's challenged and sought to destroy the rule of law and democratic governance.

So our recommendation here sir is that a sunset provision be inserted into the 2013 constitution expressly stating that the immunity provisions shall be automatically expunged and removed from the 2013 constitution in 30 years time effective from the date of amendment. And if you note sir down below we've just made a concern that the 30 years is based on the amendment occurring at 2027 and therefore change if the amendment continues to delay then the 30 years should also change. That is what we are saying so that for instance if the amendment occurs in 10 years time then perhaps 30 years should be reduced to 20 years.

And now Mr Chair I will ask Lillian to speak on women's rights and gender rights. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: May I have a request would we have a summary of please? For the women's rights? Yes.

Ms. Mausio: Sure. Just a summary of it. Sure yes.

Thank you again for your time and for indulging us. I understand that you've had a very long day so I will keep it very brief. Just to emphasize on the the importance of women's rights.

Did you know that the word woman or women doesn't appear at all in the 2013 constitution? And we just found it interesting when we were doing our initial research into the into for our submissions before you today because it seemed like a vast difference from the 1997 constitution particularly with regards to section 140 in the previous constitution. And in the 1997 constitution they made specific mention of the importance of equality of the genders especially women in participation in public life. So the removal I guess our our emphasis on this is on women's rights and in relation to the absence of the term woman and women in the in the current constitution it's our view that the removal of this explicit reference may be seen as reducing the visibility of women's rights in the constitution that we have right now.

And there's a risk that this would not align Fiji with its international obligations under CEDAW yes especially under article 7 which requires states parties to ensure that women have equal opportunities to participate in public life and so this includes also holding public office. So that was a particular concern for us regarding I guess just the visibility of women in terms of the constitutional framework. With that being said we commend the steps that is taken by the 2013 constitution in providing a broader set of identity characteristics for protection against discrimination.

So with reference to section 26 particularly this expands the list of prohibited grounds on which one can be discriminated against. So with the absence of the specific reference to women and women in the 2013 constitution not withstanding this is still sort of remedied by section 26 in the constitution. So very briefly section 26 of section 3a expands the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination to now include sex, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression as well as various social and economic factors.

So this in our view represents an important step forward in promoting equality and inclusion. We have provided a table in appendix 4 which you can find at page 65 which just provides a comparison of the evolution of rights and the recognition of different groups of people and the protection against discrimination. So very briefly if you can see the 1970 constitution the initial grounds upon which people were free from discrimination or you know they couldn't be discriminated against only included race, place of origin, political opinions, color or creed and this is word for word in the 1990 constitution as well.

So this was expanded further in the 1997 constitution it now included again race, ethnic origin, color, place of origin, gender, sexual orientation, birth, primary language, economic status, age or disability and also opinions or beliefs. In the 2013 constitution it has been further broadened including the previous ones in the 1997 constitution but now also including like I mentioned before gender identity and expression, economic or social or health status, disability, age, religion, conscience, marital status or pregnancy and also opinions and beliefs. So we believe that that is in alignment with Fiji's obligations under CEDAW particularly article 7. So the human rights commission also wishes to acknowledge the views of civil society organizations, the submissions they've made before this commission and in general which have highlighted the importance of maintaining these protections within the constitution.

Ensuring that these rights remain protected is essential for safeguarding equality and dignity for all individuals. In the context of constitutional review it is essential to maintain the international law principle of non-retrogression. So essentially this principle holds that once a human right has been recognized and awarded to you by way of the constitution you cannot then pull it back by way of amendment which with the absence of the specific reference to women or women in the 2013 constitution has a very real risk of infringing on their territory or retrogression.

And so the human rights commission's recommendations in terms of these women's rights and gender rights are fourfold. Our first recommendation is to include explicit recognition of women in the 2013 constitution particularly in relation to equal participation in public life and public service in line with Fiji's obligations under CEDAW. And I'm sorry if I hadn't outlined earlier I know that we are all aware of what CEDAW stands for.

It's the convention of elimination of all forms of discrimination against women. The second recommendation by us is to retain and strengthen the existing non-discrimination provisions to ensure continued protection based on sex, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression. Our third recommendation is to retain and safeguard section 26 to ensure that the broad protections against discrimination remain firmly embedded in the constitution.

And lastly our recommendation is to ensure that the constitutional protections are supported by effective legislation and enforcement mechanisms which would allow individuals to seek remedies when or if discrimination occurs. With that being said if anyone has any questions I'm happy to answer or discuss or pass it on but if there are no questions I will pass it back to Commissioner Vuki. Thank you.

Ms. Vuki: Thank you. Thank you Sir and the members of the panel for bearing with us. I'll try to summarize because we're coming to the end and this is to do with equal citizenship and national identity.

We support the principle for a common national identity and we're also making a distinction that the nature of citizenry is a separate matter from the issue of ethnicity. We acknowledge that historically Fijian was used exclusively to describe the indigenous people of Fiji and that the framers of the 2013 constitution without consultation with the public nor with the indigenous people imposed the name Fijian through constitutional entrenchment as the national name for all citizens in Fiji. We also acknowledge concerns expressed by indigenous stakeholders including the great council of chiefs on the adoption of the term Fijian as the common national identity for all citizens and we consider that these indigenous concerns raise legitimate questions on what names should be used to express a national identity in a multicultural society.

We view that the concerns that have been raised from the public and from the indigenous community deserve respectful recognition and dialogue and so we think that consideration should be given to the undertaking of a nationwide consultation process or through a national referendum to determine whether the term Fijian is widely supported or whether an alternative name such as Fiji Islander or another name that is preferred by the people of Fiji and which reflects national consensus and so Mr. Chair our recommendation is that the principle of equal citizenry be retained however that the public be consulted by national referendum on their views on which name is best used to describe their national identity. Include a clarifying provision or interpretive guidance that recognizes the distinction between citizenship and ethnic or cultural identity ensuring that any recognition of all citizens as Fijian does not diminish the cultural rights of any group or any other name that the public wishes to adopt be it Fijian or Fiji Islander. Strengthen protections for cultural identity language and tradition within the constitution to complement the principle of equal citizenry and ensure that diversity is equally valued and so our conclusion and recommendation so if you will bear with us I will read it because Miss Vuki if I may intervene yes we had left paragraph five which I believe Miss Lewaravu was to have addressed we have discussed with my fellow commissioners we could ask Miss Lewaravu to summarize all right the paragraph five HRADC.

My apologies before you come to the conclusion. My apologies Mr. Chair. Director.

Ms. Vuki: Thank you Chairperson for the opportunity to speak to our other issue which touches on the Human Rights Commission's independence and effective operation. The first issue that we would like to address here is in relation to the commissioner's recruitment process and that is bringing it in line with international standards relating to the Paris principles compliance. For the information of the commission is that there has been a consistently call and recommendations from the United Nation member states since Fiji's first cycle of the universal periodic review in 2010, 2014, 2019 and recently in January 2025 for Fiji to bring the Human Rights Commission in fully compliance with the international standards that's provided under the Paris principles.

By way of background to the commission is that in 2007 the Human Rights Commission lost its A status accreditation and this was due to concerns about independence and credibility so in essence it became status less. When it reapplied in 2021 for accreditation it was granted B status so the commission is currently B status. One of the main concerns raised by the body which accredits National Human Rights Institution is the lack of an independent and transparent appointment process for the members of the commission.

In particular the current constitutional framework which is provided under sections 45 section 132 and 133 does not provide for a pluralistic selection panel that means the selection panel should not be a government majority. It does not require public advertisement of vacancies and does not establish a clear and structured process for appointing commissioners. Now looking at the current recruitment process under the 2013 constitution the Human Rights Commission is empowered under section 45 of the 2013 constitution as well as the Human Rights Commission Act.

Section 45 subsection 2 of the of the 2013 constitution establishes the composition of the Human Rights Commission which must consist of a chairperson who is or is qualified to be a judge and four other members all of whom are appointed by the president on the advice of the constitutional officers commission or COC. The COC comprises of the prime minister as chairperson, leader of opposition, attorney general, two persons appointed by the president on the advice of prime minister and one person appointed by the president on the advice of the leader of opposition. This structure in the Human Rights Commission's view raises concerns about independence as the government has significant influence over the appointment process and ultimately over the leadership of the Human Rights Commission.

In comparison other national human rights institutions have vastly different appointment process which promotes independence of the institute. For example Australia's Human Rights Commission in Australia the AG makes the final recommendation to the prime minister there are clear guidelines for advertisement and recruitment. They also have an assessment panel which consists of a secretary, their APS commissioner and president of the commission or an NGO as a representative of the president of the Australia Human Rights Commission if they are not available.

In New Zealand their governor general appoints upon the advice of the minister of justice but they have an assessment panel an independent assessment panel which includes a variety of different representatives including NGOs, trade unions, universities and they also have a published guidelines on the recruitment process, advertisement, interviews and etc. And Samoa National Human Rights Institution they have a standard merit-based oh sorry in Samoa they are they have a screening panel which they scrutinize, they advertise, they interview and then they refer the recommendation to the legislative assembly for endorsement. So all of these institutions have standard merit-based transparent procedures regarding the appointment of members of their respective commissioners whereas Fiji doesn't.

So our recommendation here chairperson and members of the commission we propose two options to ensure compliance with Paris principles. Option one amend the constitution to establish a transparent and merit-based recruitment process for commissioners. This requirement may be included directly in the constitution or alternatively the constitution may require that such a framework be provided for in the legislation.

Option two introduce a provision requiring that appointments be guided by formal rules developed by the COC. This may be done through regulations made under section 132 subsection 3 of the constitution. These regulations should establish an independent panel to review and assess candidates based on clear and merits-based criteria.

The panel would then submit a short list of candidates to the COC for final consideration and approval and just a note there for the information of the commission is that the human rights commission has already prepared draft regulations to support this process under option two and these are currently with the office of the solicitor general, the attorney general and the COC and are awaiting the necessary steps for implementation. So this was this work was done prior to the constitutional review as a proactive measure by the human rights commission to try and bring the appointment process to be in compliance with international standards. Our second issue relates to the need for full-time human rights commissioners.

At present the commissioners are not engaged on full-time basis and instead receive a modest monthly allowance. As a result commissioners often maintain other full-time employment typically with higher remuneration. This arrangement has created a significant challenge for the effective discharge of the human rights commission's mandate.

The absence of full-time commission commissioners weakens accountability and reduces the level of commitment needed to address the increasing number and complexity of human rights issues in Fiji. For the human rights commission to operate effectively and meet international standards its leadership must be effectively resourced and fully dedicated to its responsibilities. Under the 2013 constitution commissioners collectively form the leadership of the institution and are responsible for carrying out this mandate.

This mandate is very broad and requires continuous attention, strong oversight and timely decision making. However the current pan-time structure limits their availability and reduces continuity in leadership. This in turn affects the human rights commission's ability to respond promptly and effectively to human rights concerns.

A comparison with similar institutions highlights this gap. In countries such as Australia and New Zealand commissioners serve on a full-time basis and are paid salaries comparable to those of judges. So our recommendation here is one is to revise the appointment framework to provide full-time commissioners with appropriate remuneration and terms of service that reflect the importance and scope of their responsibilities and eligible for a one-time reappointment.

The next issue relates to the limitation on the human rights commission's jurisdiction and investigative scope. As an independent national human rights institution in accordance with Paris principles, the human rights commission is expected to operate impartially and without interference. However certain provisions in the human rights and anti-discrimination act and section 172 subsection 5 of the 2013 constitution limits its jurisdiction.

In particular matters related to the Fiji constitution amendment act 1997 revocation decree 2009 and other presidential decrees are excluded from its review. So while section 45 of the constitution provides the human rights commission with a broad mandate, these exclusions that I've just mentioned significantly restrict the ability to act in practice. These limitations weaken the purpose of having an independent oversight body.

By placing certain matters beyond review they create a risk of selective accountability. This may reduce public confidence in the human rights commission and limit its ability to address human rights issues in a fair complete and credible manner. So our recommendation is remove the limiting provisions in the 2013 constitution and in relevant legislation which is the human rights and anti-discrimination act 2009 to ensure that the human rights commission can exercise its mandate fully and independently in compliance with the Paris principles.

And the last issue is in relation to enhancing the powers of the human rights commission in detention monitoring. Section 45 of the 2013 constitution and section 12 of the human rights and anti-discrimination act does not currently empower the human rights commission to conduct unannounced visits to places of detention. So although Fiji has ratified the convention against torture it has not yet joined the optional protocol which provides for regular and independent inspections of detention facilities including unannounced visits.

As a result the human rights commission's ability to monitor detention conditions remains limited. This limitation is important in light of complaints received by the commission regarding detention conditions in Fiji. These complaints include concerns about overcrowding access to basic services and the treatment of detainees.

These conditions have also been publicly acknowledged by the Fiji corrections services for prison facilities as well as St Giles hospital. Without the power to conduct independent and unannounced visits the human rights commission cannot effectively verify these concerns or respond to them in a timely manner. So granting the human rights commission the power to conduct specifically unannounced visits is not intended to be punitive.

Instead it serves as a preventive and cooperative measure. Regular monitoring would help the human rights commission better understand conditions within detention facilities, identify systemic issues and provide practical recommendations to the relevant agencies for improvement. This would support both detainee welfare and the working conditions of officers while also strengthening transparency and public trust.

It would further assist the state in meeting its international human rights obligations and our recommendation for this is amend section 45 of the constitution to explicitly authorize the human rights commission to carry out regular and unannounced visits to all places of detention in Fiji. And that chairperson is a summary of part five of our submission. Thank you very much for the opportunity.

Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Ms. Vuki: Mr Chair before I conclude can I just ask my colleagues if they have any other pressing issues before I close our submission.

I think it's probably it's very late in the afternoon and they have nothing nothing pressing to add to what they presented. Our conclusion Mr Chair is a summary of the recommendations to align with international human rights standards and we recommend one, adjusting or removing broad limitation clauses to ensure rights are not unduly restricted and in line with international human rights standards. Two, restoring protections for indigenous rights including entrenched safeguards, recognition of free prior and informed consent and meaningful participation in all decision making involving them and their resources.

Three, reforming the appointment and structure of the human rights and anti-discrimination commission to ensure Paris principles compliance and full independence. Four, aligning amendments provisions with democratic principles to allow for meaningful constitutional reform. Five, insert time-bound provisions on immunity provisions and strengthen relevant current provisions to ensure that future prisoner's actions against the state face democratic accountability and are not provided any immunity.

Six and lastly, strengthening protections for women rights and gender rights with explicit recognition in the 2013 constitution and Mr Chair we thank you for your attention and consideration and yes we seek God's blessings on the work that you continue to do. We know that it's not easy and God bless Fiji. Thank you Mr Chair.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you Ms. Wuki, thank you Ms. Leorao, the director and thank you Ms Mousio. The commissioners this afternoon are very thankful for this comprehensive submission and written submission that you have provided to us. Ever from the first day we started meeting, we've been looking at the bill of rights and we noticed how rights are given and then rights are taken back because of the limitations or qualifications.

We've been discussing that and the commissioner sitting here can vouch for that too. So the submissions that we have got that we have received this afternoon is going to assist us a lot in getting down to the nitty-gritty of amendments in relation to the bill of rights. We recognize that rights are given on the one end and are taken away on the other end which tantamount to no right at all.

That is what the constitution is about. So like I said, your submission this afternoon, comprehensive as it is and clear, is going to assist us in addressing the bill of rights of the country in the constitution. We thank you very much for that and the submissions, oral submissions have been clear.

We're going to be listening to the, we're going to be reading the oral submissions because they are recorded and also we'll be reading the written submissions and then we will deliberate on them. I wonder if any of my fellow commissioners has any comments to make at this end. Thank you chair.

Without wanting to extend our discussions over long and thanking you all for taking the time and the care to put these submissions together and to accompany them with clear and well researched recommendations as well. I think one of the things that we have certainly been hearing a lot in terms of the many consultations we have been to have been aspects relating to the bill of rights, particularly in the dimension of personhood, whether it is in relation to children or to women or to people of various diversities, backgrounds, abilities for instance. So we thank you for spotlighting that in your submission today and also outlining the various ways in which international covenants, also some of which have specific directions or guidelines in terms of limitations or what is internationally practicable in terms of those limitations.

I think that has been quite useful to bring to our attention and we thank you for that. I think another aspect that is I guess open to reflection or further discussions at future submissions is how there is, there are varying approaches to or appetites for discussions on rights. I am sure this is certainly not strange to you and when it comes to rights, people often look at rights as either complementing, strengthening or in direct contradiction to what they value as their cultural values for instance or the matter or the principle of sovereignty for instance in our country and I think as you would have highlighted from many aspects of Fiji's history is the argument of sovereignty has also been used to cloak a lot of undemocratic practices certainly in our past.

So that's something that I'm not necessarily putting out here for us to answer together today but something as a reflection that has arised from your discussion and with much gratitude as well. Thank you. Thank you Mary and thank you Chair.

Thank you Fiji Human Rights Commission for your submission this afternoon. I think you had two and a half hours. I don't think any other stakeholder has, was given more than one and a half hour but I think the Human Rights Commission deserves it because you are the Human Rights Commission.

Thank you very much. No need to, yes. You deserve the time that you had.

Dr. Gounder: I just have a few comments very very quickly in the interest of time. The one of women's rights and gender rights, we had Fiji Human Rights Movement here, Fiji Human Crisis Center here. They also raised the point that you talked about but they are kind of, as far as I can recall, they're satisfied that we have moved from men and women to gender more broadly.

So the argument was that in line with moving forward and that also takes into other aspects of sexual orientation for example. So that was the argument and just in case. But thank you for the submission.

We have talked a lot about the Bill of Rights. I just wanted to highlight this particular point. Thank you for bringing this up because we have been scratching our heads, all of us, around this issue which is the one on the socio-economic rights for example.

You know the two lines, the socio-economic rights for example and as the director would recall, we also struggled with this during the national development plan as well. For example, the right to housing and sanitation must make reasonable measures but at the same time the state claims it does not have the resources to implement the right and the responsibilities to show how resources are not available and that's something we are really thinking hard. So thank you very much for presenting this.

We might have to come back if we need to chair. Because the recommendations that you have made and I thank you for that. In my experience with the development plan and working with the government as an economist, I still feel that it will be very difficult to actually put that on the ground.

Even with these things, basically they can say progressive over time because the way government budgeting works. So I think perhaps in the next few weeks we may reach back to you to see how we can discuss and think through some of these things. Thank you for your submission.

One last point, the immunity provision. Thank you very much for your recommendations. We have been inundated with suggestions that the immunity provision has to be removed.

Now we are aware of what the judges said in the Supreme Court. It's better to not shake the tree but just look forward. However, your recommendations this afternoon has opened for me, it has opened my eyes to what we have to look forward to.

We were just being told just look forward, try to get a law to penalize those who will commit treason or any other offense, don't give them any immunity. Now you have shown us a way of doing that and I thank you for that. Once again, thank you very much indeed.

It has been a long but fruitful afternoon I might say. Like I said, we've been talking about Bill of Rights, how rights are given and how they're taken away by the limitations. We've got some answers here.

Thank you very much.

---------- End of Session [30-6-2026]----------

Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission

FIJI HUMAN RIGHTS AND ANTI-DISCRIMINATION COMMISSION

SUBMISSION ON THE REVIEW OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE REPUBLIC OF FIJI 2013

Submitted on 30 June 2026

Presenters:

1. Commissioner Alefina Vuki
2. Loukinikini Lewaravu, Director
3. Lilian Mausio, Manager Legal and Policy

Table of Contents

1. INTRODUCTION 3
   - 1.1 HRADC Constitutional Mandate 3
   - 1.2 Background 3
2. FIJI'S INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS OBLIGATIONS 4
3. BILL OF RIGHTS AND CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS 5
   - 3.1 Chapter 2 Bill of Rights: Broad Limitation Clauses 5
   - 3.2 Inconsistency with International Human Rights Law standards 7
   - 3.3 Bill of Rights Limitations 11
   - 3.4 Legislating limitations 17
   - 3.5 Limitations on the Rights of Arrested and Detained Persons- Section 13 20
   - 3.6 State of Emergency Powers 22
   - 3.7 Resource based limitations 23
4. INDIGENOUS RIGHTS 24
   - 4.1 Removal of Constitutional Safeguards 24
   - 4.2 Land Rights and the Illusion of Protection 26
   - 4.3 Minerals Ownership- The 3 feet below 27
5. HRADC 29
   - 5.1 Commissioners' recruitment process: Lack of Paris Principles compliance 29
6. AMENDMENT PROVISIONS – Sections 159-160 34
   - 6.1 Overly restrictive amendment framework 34
   - 6.2 The Supreme Court's Binding Opinion on Sections 159 and 160 35
7. IMMUNITY PROVISIONS– CHAPTER 10 36
8. WOMEN'S RIGHTS AND GENDER RIGHTS 41
9. EQUAL CITIZENSHIP AND NATIONAL IDENTITY 42
10. CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDATIONS 44

APPENDIX 1: Bill of Rights – Comparison Limitations 45
APPENDIX 2: Indigenous Rights 51
APPENDIX 3: State of Emergency Provisions 59
APPENDIX 4: Anti-Discrimination Provisions 65

1396

1. INTRODUCTION

The Human Rights and Anti- Discrimination Commission (HRADC) thanks the Constitution Review Commission (CRC) for the invitation to participate in this national review and present its submission. The HRADC recognizes the monumental task required in undertaking the review of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013 (2013 Constitution) and acknowledges the work and dedication of the CRC.

1.1 HRADC Constitutional Mandate

1.1.1 The HRADC's mandate to engage in this national review is rooted in the 2013 Constitution and its enabling legislation, the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission Act 2009.

1.1.2 Sections 45(4)(d) and (g) of the 2013 Constitution, together with sections 12(1)(f) and (i) of the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission Act 2009, provide the HRADC with authority to:

i. Monitor the State's compliance with international human rights obligations.
ii. Recommend legislative, administrative, or policy reforms to strengthen human rights protection.
iii. Review existing or proposed laws and policies to ensure consistency with international human rights standards.

1.1.3 This submission is made in accordance with that mandate.

1.2 Background

1.2.1 In any democratic society, the Constitution underpins the rule of law and acts as a bulwark against the erosion of fundamental rights. Last year, the Supreme Court of Fiji, in its advisory Opinion[1], stated in relation to the 2013 Constitution that:

> "Democracy is a value that is fundamental to the 2013 Constitution. So too are equality, the rule of law and an independent court system."

1.2.2 Fiji has had four (4) Constitutions in the span of 56 years.[2] These Constitutions have not been immune from scrutiny, public outcry and outright abrogation. The 2013 Constitution was imposed on the general public without meaningful and widespread prior consultation or the establishment of a national consensus. The current review process presents an opportunity to strengthen its legitimacy and alignment with democratic principles and values.

[1] In the matter of a reference by Cabinet for an opinion from the Supreme Court on a matter concerning the interpretation and application of sections 159 and 160 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji [FJSC] (Original Jurisdiction) 2025.
[2] 1970 Constitution, 1990 Constitution, 1997 Constitution and 2013 Constitution.

1.2.3 This submission focuses on key human rights issues, including:

1. Bill of Rights and Constitutional Limitations.
2. Indigenous Rights.
3. Independence and Effectiveness of the HRADC.
4. Amendment Provisions.
5. Immunity Provisions.
6. Women's Rights and Gender Rights.
7. Equal Citizenship.

2. FIJI'S INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS OBLIGATIONS

2.1 Fiji is a State Party to all nine (9) core international human rights treaties,[3] namely the:

i. International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR);[4]
ii. International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR);[5]
iii. Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW);[6]
iv. Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC);[7]
v. International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD);[8]
vi. Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD);[9]
vii. Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT);[10] viii. Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance (CED);[11] and,
ix. International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families (ICMW).[12]

2.2 Fiji's ratification of the above nine core human rights Conventions places numerous international obligations upon the State to align, its domestic laws, policies, and practices with universal human rights standards, as the primary Duty Bearer of human rights. Under international human rights law, the State's role as Duty Bearer carries a fourfold obligation to:

---

[3] List all conventions Fiji has ratified and their year of ratification
[4] Ratified on 16th August 2018.
[5] Ratified on 16th August 2018.
[6] Ratified on 28th August 1995. Article 2 of the Convention imposes the obligation on Fiji to implement the principles outlined in the Convention.
[7] Ratified on13th August 1993. Article 4 as above.
[8] Ratified on 11th January 1973. Article 2 as above.
[9] Ratified on 7th June 2017. Article 4 as above.
[10] Ratified on 14th March 2016. Articles 2, 4 and 5 as above.
[11] Ratified on 19th August 2019. Article 4 as above.
[12] Ratified on 19th August 2019. Article 84 as above.

i. Respect human rights – the Government must refrain from acting in ways that deny, suspend, harm or violate human rights. For example, no arbitrary detention, no torture, no censorship.

ii. Promote human rights – the Government must actively foster and nurture a culture of respect for human rights through advocacy, awareness raising, training, education and public engagement.

iii. Protect human rights – the Government has a positive duty to ensure that rights are not unreasonably curtailed or interfered with. For example, effective laws, enforcement and remedies.

iv. Fulfil the obligation to protect human rights – the Government must take active measures to give effective realisation to rights in the Constitution and under international law. For example, enacting laws that recognize and are responsive to human rights, by providing resources, services and systems that make rights a lived reality and not just a legal promise.

2.3 The fourfold obligation transforms human rights from abstract principles into concrete Governmental duties. Taken together, these obligations mean that the State cannot remain passive. It must not only avoid harming rights holders but also shield them from harm by others, and finally, proactively work to ensure that rights are fully realized and enjoyed by all. Failure at any level, whether through wrongful action, inadequate protection, or neglect to act, constitutes a breach of international human rights law.

2.4 To proactively ensure that rights are fully realized, Fiji has incorporated human rights into its 2013 Constitution (Chapter 2, the Bill of Rights), as well as into several legislations[13] and policies[14].

3. BILL OF RIGHTS AND CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS

3.1 Chapter 2 Bill of Rights: Broad Limitation Clauses

3.1.1 The HRADC recognizes that the Chapter 2 Bill of Rights has significantly evolved from previous iterations or versions. It includes a wider range of protections, with 36 specific rights and freedoms compared to earlier Constitutions. In particular, it recognizes 'second generation' human rights including socio-economic and cultural rights, while also underscoring the importance of environmental rights.[15]

---

[13] Rights of Persons with Disability Act 2018, Domestic Violence Act 2013, Freedom of Information Act

[14] National Development Plan 2025 - 2029 and Vision 2050

[15] Rights of ownership and protection of iTaukei, Rotuman and Banaban lands; Protection of ownership and interests in land; Right of landowners to fair share of royalties for extraction of minerals; right to economic participation, right to work and a just minimum wage; access to information; right to reasonable access to transportation, right to housing and sanitation, right to

The HRADC welcomes this progress and does not support any amendments that would reduce or weaken the rights currently protected.

3.1.2 Notwithstanding this progress, the HRADC remains concerned that many civil and political rights contained in the Bill of Rights are significantly weakened by the broad and specific limitation clauses. This is concerning given the State's fourfold obligation, noted in paragraph 2.2 above, respecting human rights by not denying, suspending or undermining those rights.

3.1.3 In this regard, section 6(5) of the 2013 Constitution sets out a broad framework for limiting rights and freedom. It states that rights and freedoms may be limited by:

> "a. limitations expressly prescribed, authorized or permitted (whether by or under a written law) in relation to a particular right or freedom in this Chapter;
>
> b. limitations prescribed or set out in, or authorized or permitted by, other provisions of this Constitution; or
>
> c. limitations which are not expressly set out or authorized (whether by or under a written law) in relation to a particular right or freedom in this Chapter, but which are necessary and are prescribed by a law or provided under a law or authorized or permitted by a law or by actions taken under the authority of a law."

3.1.4 This framework allows for wide-ranging limitations across the Bill of Rights. In many cases, rights can be limited if it is considered "necessary" for reasons such as national security, public safety, public order, public morality, or public health. For some rights, such as freedom of association, labour rights, and political rights, the requirement of necessity is not always clear, which lowers the standard for limiting them. As a result, these provisions can act as "claw-back clauses," where the limitations are so broad that they weaken the rights themselves. In contrast, the 1997 Constitution placed stricter controls on limitations, requiring them to be reasonable and justified in a free and democratic society. (Refer to Appendix 1, page 45 for comparison).

---

adequate food and water, political rights; right to social security schemes, right to health, rights of children, rights of persons with disabilities; executive and administrative justice; expanded freedom of expression to also include speech and publication, expanded right to equality to also include freedom from discrimination.

3.2 Inconsistency with International Human Rights Law standards

3.2.1 Human rights law is based on protecting basic freedoms that are essential to human dignity and social harmony. These rights belong to all people. However, most rights are not absolute. In some cases, the exercise of one person's rights may conflict with the rights of others or with wider public interests. For this reason, both international and domestic law allow certain rights to be limited to balance these interests and protect the common good.

3.2.2 However, any limitation must be properly justified. Both international and domestic law require that limits on rights are applied only in specific and carefully defined situations. These rules ensure that restrictions are not arbitrary, but are lawful, pursue a legitimate public interest, limited to what is necessary, and proportionate to achieve that legitimate interest.

3.2.3 At the international level, these principles are set out in Article 5 of the ICCPR and Articles 4 and 5 of the ICESCR:

Article 5 (1) ICCPR:

1. Nothing in the present Covenant may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms recognized herein or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the present Covenant.

Articles 4 & 5 of ICESCR:

Article 4

The States Parties to the present Covenant recognize that, in the enjoyment of those rights provided by the State in conformity with the present Covenant, the State may subject such rights only to such limitations as are determined by law only in so far as this may be compatible with the nature of these rights and solely for the purpose of promoting the general welfare in a democratic society.

Article 5

1. Nothing in the present Covenant may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or to perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights or freedoms recognized herein, or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the present Covenant.

3.2.4 These provisions affirm that rights recognised under the Covenants must not be restricted or derogated from except in accordance with the limitations expressly permitted within those instruments. This reflects a fundamental rule of interpretation: that limitations are the exception, not the norm. The United Nations Human Rights Committee has consistently emphasized that:

"The relation between right and restriction and between norm and exception must not be reversed."

3.2.5 Based on this framework, any limitation on human rights must meet four key requirements: legality, legitimate aim, necessity, and proportionality.

First, under the principle of legality, any restriction must be clearly set out in law. This requires that the law must be accessible, clear, and precise so people can understand and follow it. In a democratic society the law must always protect public interest and facilitate common good.

Secondly, the requirement of legitimate aim is directed towards a recognized public interest (public safety, national security, public health, public morals, protection of rights and freedoms of others).

Thirdly, the requirement of necessity provides that the restriction must aim to achieve an important and legitimate objective. There must also be evidence showing that the restriction is needed to achieve that goal. If the situation changes and the restriction is no longer needed, it should not continue.

Finally, under the principle of proportionality, any limitation must be the least restrictive means available to achieve the intended aim. Governments are required to consider alternative measures that would achieve the same objective with a lesser impact on human rights. As already indicated, these measures are temporary, should be reviewed regularly and removed when they are no longer necessary.

3.2.6 The following are examples of expressly prescribed limitations standards under human rights instruments:

Right	Limitations in ICCPR and ICESCR	Purpose of Limitation e.g where necessary for the protection of": (underlined text is by HRADC for emphasis)
Freedom of movement	Article 12 (3) ICCPR	3. The above-mentioned rights shall not be subject to any restrictions except those which are provided by law, are necessary to protect national security, public order (order public), public health or morals or the rights and freedoms of others and are consistent with the other rights recognized in the present Covenant.
Procedural protections relating to decision to expel a lawful alien	Article 13 ICCPR	National Security An alien lawfully in the territory of a State Party to the present Covenant may be expelled therefrom only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with law and shall, except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, be allowed to submit the reasons against his expulsion and to have his case reviewed by, and be represented for the purpose before, the competent authority or a person or persons especially designated by the competent authority.
Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs	Article 18 (3) ICCPR	3. Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs may be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others.
Freedom of expression	Article 19 (3) ICCPR	3. The exercise of the rights provided for in paragraph 2 of this article carries with it special duties and responsibilities. It may therefore be subject to certain restrictions, but these shall only be such as are provided by law and are necessary:

		(a) For respect of the rights or reputations of others; (b) For the protection of national security or of public order (order public), or of public health or morals.
Right to peaceful assembly	Article 21 ICCPR	No restrictions may be placed on the exercise of this right other than those imposed in conformity with the law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, public order (order public), the protection of public health or morals or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.
Freedom of association	Article 22 (2) ICCPR	2. No restrictions may be placed on the exercise of this right other than those which are prescribed by law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, public order (order public), the protection of public health or morals or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.
Right to form and join trade unions and right to trade unions to function freely	Article 8 (1) (a) & 8 (1) (c) ICESCR	No restrictions may be placed on the exercise of this right other than those prescribed by law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public order or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others

3.2.7 Other constitutional systems apply stricter standards when limiting rights. For example, section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides that rights may be limited only by "reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."[16] Similarly, the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act in section 5[17] requires that any limitation "may be subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

3.2.8 Courts in Fiji have also recognised these principles. These approaches set a higher standard for limiting rights than those currently applied. In the case of

[16] U:\UpdateLinkTemp\humanrights\canada\CHARTER.PDF
[17] https://www.legislation.govt.nz/act/public/1990/109/en/latest/#DLM224792

Fijian Teachers Association v State[18], the High Court confirmed that it is not enough for a law to simply allow a restriction on a constitutional right. The Court must also be satisfied that the restriction is justified and proportionate:

> "...it does not suffice that there is a written law authorizing a limitation on a constitutional right. The court must also be satisfied that the limitation is justified and proportionate."

3.2.9 This approach follows the proportionality test set out in R v Oakes[19]. In Oakes, the Accused was charged with unlawful possession of illegal drugs for the purpose of trafficking under Canada's Narcotics legislation. Oakes argued that his right to presumption of innocence until proven guilty was violated. The Court found that the Narcotics legislation he was charged under had reversed the onus of proof to the Accused, and, applying the test below, further found that the legislation limiting the presumption of innocence failed at the second stage – that is, the legislation did not impair the right 'as little as possible', in fact the limitation was disproportionate to the actual right.

3.2.10 Under this test:

a. The objective of the limitation must be sufficiently important to justify restricting a constitutional right; and
b. The limitation must be proportionate by:

- being rationally connected to the objective.
- impairing the right as little as possible; and
- maintaining overall proportionality between the limitation and the objective pursued.

3.3 Bill of Rights Limitations

3.3.1 The table below compares the limits on rights under the ICCPR and ICESCR with those under Fiji's 2013 Constitution.

[18] [2024] FJHC 431.
[19] [1986] 26 DLR (4th) 200

Right	Limitations in ICCPR and ICESCR	2013 Constitution
		Article	Right	Limitation (Underlined text by HRADC for emphasis)
Freedom of expression	Article 19(3) National Security, public order, public health, public morals, rights and reputations of others	Article 17(3) (a-h)	Freedom of Speech, Expression and Publication	(3) To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights and freedoms mentioned in subsection (1) in the interests of— (a) national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections. (b) the protection or maintenance of the reputation, privacy, dignity, rights or freedoms of other people, including— (i) the right to be free from hate speech, whether directed against individuals or groups; and (ii) the rights of people injured or abused by inaccurate or offensive media reports to have a correction published on reasonable conditions established by law; (c) preventing the disclosure, as appropriate, of information received in confidence; (d) preventing attacks on the dignity of individuals, groups of individuals or respected offices or institutions in a manner likely to promote ill will between ethnic or religious groups or the oppression of, or discrimination against, any person or group of persons; (e) maintaining the authority and independence of the courts; (f) imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices; (g) regulating the technical administration of telecommunications; or

1406

				(h) making provisions for the enforcement of media standards and providing for the regulation, registration and conduct of media organisations
Right to peaceful assembly	Article 21 National Security, public order, public health, public morals, rights and reputations of others	Article 18(2)(a-c)	Freedom of Assembly	(2) To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right mentioned in subsection (1)— (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections; (b) for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; or (c) for the purpose of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices.
Freedom of association	Article 22(2) National Security, public order, public health, public morals, rights and reputations of others	Article 19 (2) (a-f)	Freedom of Association	(2) A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right mentioned in subsection (1)— (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections; (b) for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; (c) for the purpose of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices; (d) for the purpose of regulating trade/labour unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of employers; (e) for the purposes of regulating collective bargaining processes, providing mechanisms for the resolution of employment disputes and grievances, and regulating strikes and lockouts; or

1407

				(f) for the purpose of regulating essential services and industries, in the overall interests of the Fijian economy and the citizens of Fiji.
Right to form and join trade unions and right to trade unions to function freely	Article 8 (1) (a) & 8 (1) (c) ICESCR No restrictions may be placed on the exercise of this right other than those prescribed by law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of National Security, public order, rights and freedoms of others	Article 19 (2) (d)	Freedom of Association	(2) A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right mentioned in subsection (1)— (d) for the purpose of regulating trade/labour unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of employers
Freedom of Movement	Article 12(3) ICCPR (Freedom of Movement) National Security, public order, public health, public morals, rights and reputations of others	Article 21(7)(a-e)	Freedom of Movement and Residence	(7) To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights mentioned in this section— (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections; (b) for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; (c) for the purpose of protecting the ecology of any area; (d) for the purpose of imposing reasonable restrictions on the holders of public offices as part of the terms and conditions of their employment.

1408

Procedural protections relating to decision to expel a lawful alien	Article 13 ICCPR National Security	Article 21 (5)	Freedom of Movement and Residence	(5) Every person who is not a citizen but is lawfully in Fiji has the right not to be expelled from Fiji except pursuant to an order of a court or a decision of the Minister responsible for immigration on a ground prescribed by law.
		Article 20 (5)(a-f)	Employment Relations	Article 20(5)(a-f) (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections; (b) for the purposes of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; (c) for the purposes of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices; (d) for the purposes of regulating trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of employers; (e) for the purposes of regulating collective bargaining processes, providing mechanisms for the resolution of employment disputes and grievances, and regulating strikes and lockouts; or (f) for the purposes of regulating essential services and industries, in the overall interests of the Fijian economy and the citizens of Fiji.
		Article 24 (2)	Right to Privacy	(2) To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in subsection (1).
		Article 25 (3)	Access to information	(3) To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in subsection (1), and may regulate the procedure under which information held by a public office may be made available.

1409

		Article 32 (3)	Right to economic participation	(3) To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in subsection (1)
		Article 40 (2)	Environmental rights	(2) To the extent that it is necessary, a law or an administrative action taken under a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in this section.
		Article 42 (3)	Rights of persons with disabilities	(3) To the extent that it is necessary, a law or an administrative action taken under a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in this section.

1410

3.3.2 As shown in the table above, many provisions of the Bill of Rights allow rights to be limited on broad grounds such as national security, public safety, public order, public morality, and public health. In most cases, the standard used is whether the limitation is "necessary." However, for some rights—such as freedom of association, labour rights, and political rights—even this requirement is not consistently applied. As a result, the limits on these rights can be wider than the rights themselves, effectively acting as "claw-back clauses" that weaken constitutional protection.

3.3.3 The HRADC is concerned that the current approach to limiting human rights under the 2013 Constitution does not fully align with international human rights standards. In particular, some limitation clauses do not meet the required standards of legality, necessity, and proportionality. This lowers the level of scrutiny applied to restrictions on fundamental rights and increases the risk that limits may be imposed in ways that are unnecessary or disproportionate. Without clear and strict safeguards, such provisions may allow excessive interference with protected rights, undermining both the rule of law and the effective protection of human rights.

3.4 Legislating limitations

3.4.1 The analysis above shows that the broad limitation clauses in the 2013 Constitution allow rights to be restricted on vague grounds such as what is "necessary" for national security, public safety, or public order, as well as public health and morality. However, what is "necessary" isn't defined in the Constitution, thus there is a broad ambit in which the State could justify limiting certain rights. This creates a permissive legal environment where laws may fall short of international human rights standards.

Media Industry Development Act 2010 (MIDA)

3.4.2 Before it was repealed, the MIDA was an example of legislative fettering of rights under the Bill of Rights, in that it severely limited freedom of the press and freedom of expression, as well as allowing the Media Industry Development Authority (established via the Act) to investigate and compel information from journalists.

Public Order Act 1969 (POA)

3.4.3 The POA is another clear example of how these broad constitutional limits lead to restrictions on fundamental freedoms in practice.

3.4.4 The POA, when read together with the Constitution, allows the Government to use force to maintain public order based on a very broad standard of what is "necessary." This standard is so wide that it creates a risk of serious abuses, including torture, as recognised in section 17B of the POA. The law, under section 17C of the POA, also gives the military police powers such as arrest, detention, and use of force in situations linked to public safety or public order. Because "public order" and "public safety" are defined very broadly, these powers can be exercised with limited control. This weakens important protections, including the right to be free from torture, which is an absolute right under international law, including Article 7 of the ICCPR and the CAT.

3.4.5 This provision has already demonstrated tragic consequences, as evidenced by the recent death of a citizen in military custody[20]. This highlights the danger of giving broad powers without proper safeguards. In addition, the POA protects police and military officers from being prosecuted, which creates a culture of impunity and weakens accountability[21]. This further undermines protection from cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment.

3.4.6 The most concerning provisions of the POA are found in sections 9 and 21. Section 9 gives the Commissioner of Police the power to refuse permits for public meetings or processions if he considers it "necessary" for public safety, public order, or essential services. This standard is subjective and does not provide clear criteria to guide decision-making. As a result, it allows the arbitrary denial of the right to peaceful assembly, which is protected under international law and the Constitution. Under international human rights law, any restriction must meet the requirements of legality, necessity, and proportionality. Section 9 fails to meet these standards. It does not require proof of a real or imminent threat, nor does it require that the least restrictive option be used. Refusing a permit is a broad measure that removes the right entirely rather than limiting it in a careful and balanced way. There is also no requirement to consider less restrictive alternatives, making the restriction disproportionate.

3.4.7 Section 21 of the POA, raises even greater concern. It prevents any decision made under the POA from being challenged in court, with the exception of decisions made pertaining to sections 8[22], 9[23], 11[24] and 11A[25] of the POA. This removes the right of individuals to seek legal review, which is protected under the Constitution.[26] It also allows decisions affecting certain rights. This is inconsistent with the rule of law and with international standards (ICCPR), which require that restrictions on rights be open to review.

---

[20] https://www.fijitimes.com.fj/amnesty-calls-for-independent-probe-into-custody-death/
[21] Section 17C of the POA.
[22] Issuing permits for gatherings.
[23] Prohibition and dispersal of assemblies.
[24] Closure of roads.
[25] Control of persons.
[26] See section 44 (1) (enforcement of rights) and section 16(Executive and administrative justice) of the 2013 Constitution.

3.4.8 The recent denial, in April this year, of a permit to the villagers of Vuda[27], who sought to peacefully march to advocate for their constitutional right to a clean and healthy environment under section 40 of the Constitution, exemplifies the oppressive application of section 9 of the POA. The Commissioner exercised his subjective and arbitrary discretion to refuse the permit on grounds of public order, thereby silencing legitimate environmental advocacy and denying the community any lawful avenue to challenge the arbitrary restriction on their rights.

3.4.9 One of the most prominent examples of the POA's use to stifle dissent occurred in July 2021, when nine prominent political figures were arrested and detained on the allegation that their critiques of the Government breached the POA because their writings constituted "malicious writings of false news or reports tending to create or foster public alarm and anxiety."[28] These incidents illustrate how the broad and subjective standards in the POA can be weaponised to suppress legitimate expression and assembly, undermining the very essence of democratic governance.

3.4.10 The impact of these provisions is serious. The HRADC considers that the POA does not meet international human rights standards. The broad limitation clauses in the Constitution have allowed laws that give excessive powers to authorities, limit access to justice, reduce accountability, and restrict legitimate public participation. These issues undermine the rule of law and weaken the protection of fundamental rights.

Recommendations:

The HRADC proposes two courses of action regarding the limitations.

Option 1: Remove the limitation clauses altogether.

Option 2: Amend section 6(5) of the 2013 Constitution to require that limitations be reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

Amend Article 6(5) to read:

a) "The rights and freedoms set out in this Chapter apply according to their tenor and may only be limited by such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

Amend individual limitation clauses to state:

[27] Police deny permit for march against Vuda waste project - The Fiji Times
[28] https://www.theguardian.com/world/2021/jul/26/nine-fiji-opposition-mps-arrested-criticism-land-bill

"To the extent that it is necessary, reasonable, and in tenor with a free and democratic society, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right mentioned above."

Alternative wording (Professor Yash Ghai[29]):

A right or freedom set out in this Chapter must not be limited except by law, and then only to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account all relevant factors, including—

(a) The nature of the right or freedom;
(b) The importance of the purpose of the limitation;
(c) The nature and extent of the limitation; and
(d) The relation between the limitation and its purpose and whether there are less restrictive means to achieve the purpose.

(2) The State or a person seeking to justify a particular limitation must demonstrate to the court, tribunal or other authority that the requirements of this Article have been satisfied."

3.5 Limitations on the Rights of Arrested and Detained Persons- Section 13

3.5.1 Section 13 of the Constitution sets out the rights of persons who are arrested or detained. These rights are essential for protecting life, liberty, and personal security. They form a core part of fundamental human rights and are closely linked to the enjoyment of other rights. These protections are also recognised in international law, including Article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR).

3.5.2 The 2013 Constitution has expanded these protections compared to earlier versions. It provides a detailed list of rights for arrested or detained persons. These include the right to:

- Be informed promptly, in a language they understand, of the reason for arrest or detention, as well as their right to remain silent and the consequences of speaking;
- Remain silent;
- Communicate with a legal practitioner and be informed of this right;

[29] Section 48 of the 2012 Draft Constitution of Fiji, which was spearheaded by Prof. Yash Ghai

- Be brought before a court as soon as possible, with 48 hours as the maximum period;
- And other related rights provided under the Constitution.

3.5.3 These protections are consistent with Article 9 of the ICCPR, which guarantees the right to liberty and security of person and protects individuals from arbitrary arrest or detention. It also requires that individuals be informed of the reasons for their arrest and any charges against them. Importantly, Article 9(4) provides that a detained person must be brought promptly before a court and has the right to challenge the legality of their detention.

3.5.4 Although section 13 strengthens several aspects of protection, certain wording raises concerns. In particular, section 13(1)(a)(i) allows a person to be held as long as they are informed of the reason for their arrest and the nature of any charge. This may allow detention without requiring that charges be laid promptly. This represents a departure from the earlier Constitution, which required that a detained person be released if not charged within a short time. Under the current framework, there is a risk that authorities may hold individuals for the full 48-hour period while continuing investigations. This raises concern that detention may be used as a tool for "fishing expeditions" rather than for genuine and justified investigations.

3.5.5 Further concerns arise from the interaction between Article 13 and the Public Order Act (POA). Section 17A of the POA allows detention beyond the constitutional 48-hour limit. It permits arrest, with or without a warrant, based on a reasonable suspicion that a person has acted or may act in a way that affects public safety. However, "public safety" is not clearly defined. This creates a risk of arbitrary detention. In addition, the POA allows detention to be extended for up to 14 days if information cannot be obtained within the initial 48-hour period. Furthermore, Fiji is obligated to provide sufficient and sanitary detention conditions for detainees. The UN Human Rights Committee[30] emphasized the need for this:

> "Any necessary detention should take place in appropriate, sanitary, non-punitive facilities."

3.5.6 This framework raises serious due process concerns. The extended detention period may be applied without sufficient safeguards, and individuals may not have effective access to legal remedies, such as the right to challenge detention through habeas corpus. As a result, although section 13 of the 2013 Constitution provides important rights on paper, the combined effect of broad limitation clauses and the POA reduces their practical protection. This undermines the purpose of the constitutional guarantee and weakens overall protection of personal liberty.

[30] General Comment No. 35

3.5.7 The UN Human Rights Committee is of the view that "48 hours is ordinarily sufficient to transport the individual and to prepare for the judicial hearing, any delay longer than 48 hours must remain absolutely exceptional and be justified under the circumstances."[31] The Committee also advised that an "especially strict standard of promptness, such as 24 hours should apply in the case of juveniles."

Recommendations:

1. Amend section 13 of the 2013 Constitution to explicitly require that a person must either be formally charged or released within a short and clearly defined period ie. 48 hours for adults and 24 hours for juveniles.

2. Align section 13 of the 2013 Constitution more closely with Article 9 of the ICCPR by guaranteeing that all detained persons are promptly brought before a court and have an effective right to challenge the legality of their detention.

3.6 State of Emergency Powers

3.6.1 The 2013 Constitution also includes provisions on states of emergency, which are of particular concern. There is a clear tension between the protection of human rights and the use of emergency powers, as a state of emergency allows rights to be significantly limited. For this reason, such measures should only be used in extreme situations, such as war or serious threats to the security or survival of a country. For example, under the European Convention on Human Rights, a state of emergency is permitted only in times of war or a public emergency that threatens the life of the nation.[32]

3.6.2 Consistent with this approach, Article 4 of the ICCPR allows certain rights to be limited during a state of emergency, but only to the extent strictly required by the situation. It also requires that any measures taken remain consistent with the State's other obligations under international law. These standards set a high threshold for both declaring and applying emergency powers.

3.6.3 In contrast, there is concern that the threshold for declaring a state of emergency under the 2013 Constitution is set too low. Section 154(1)(a)–(b) allows a declaration where the security or safety of all or part of Fiji is threatened. This broad wording may allow emergency powers to be used in situations that do not meet the high standards required under international law.

[31] General comment No. 35 on Article 9 of the ICCPR (liberty and security of person)
[32] Article 15 of the ECHR.

3.6.4 Further concern arises from how a state of emergency is declared. Section 154 allows the Prime Minister, acting on the advice of the Commissioner of Police and the Commander of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces, to declare a state of emergency. This approach differs from earlier Constitutions, where Parliament played a central role (Refer to Appendix 3, page 59 for comparison of all Constitutions). In contrast, the current framework gives significant authority to a single office. International guidance emphasises that emergency powers should be subject to strong oversight. As noted by the Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights:

> "A country's legislature should have a central role in overseeing any such declaration and judges should be able to rule on its validity."[33]

Recommendation:

1. Review and amend section 154 to expressly state that the Executive to recommend to Parliament any State of Emergency and Parliament plays the leading and decisive role in the declaration, approval, extension and oversight of a State of Emergency.

3.7 Resource based limitations

3.7.1 The HRADC further notes that some provisions in the Bill of Rights may unintentionally allow the State to avoid meeting its human rights obligations. For example, section 34(2) of the 2013 Constitution, which concerns the right to reasonable access to transportation, states that

> (1) .... if the State claims that it does not have the resources to implement the right, it is the responsibility of the State to show that the resources are not available.

3.7.2 Other sections which have the same provision include section 31 (5) right to education, section 33 (2) right to work and a just minimum wage, section 35 (2) right to housing and sanitation, section 36 (2) right to adequate food and water, section 37 (2) right to social security schemes and section 38 (3) right to health.

[33] https://reliefweb.int/report/armenia/protection-human-rights-emergency-situations-report

3.7.3 While these provisions correctly place the burden on the State, the HRADC is concerned that it may be used as a basis to delay or deny the realisation of rights. International human rights law does recognise that resources may be limited and allow for the progressive realisation of certain rights. However, this does not remove the State's responsibility to act. The State must show genuine resource constraints and demonstrate that it has made serious and ongoing efforts to allocate available resources. A simple claim of insufficient resources should not be enough.

3.7.4 As noted in paragraph 2.2 above, the obligation to protect human rights requires the State to take positive steps to ensure that rights are not unfairly restricted or interfered with. This includes adopting effective laws, ensuring proper enforcement, and providing access to remedies. The HRADC emphasises that failure to meet these obligations weakens the protection of rights and leaves individuals vulnerable, thereby undermining the purpose of the Constitution.

Recommendation:

1. Amend sections 31 (5), 33 (2), (34 (2), 35 (2), 37 (2) and 38 (3) as follows:

Where the State relies on a lack of resources as a justification for failing to fulfil this right, the State bears the onus of proving, on clear and convincing evidence, that

a. It has exhausted all reasonably available resources;
b. It has prioritised the fulfilment of this right in good faith;
c. No reasonable alternative measures could have achieved this right; and
d. Priority will be placed on remedying this lacuna and restoring the right as soon as practicably possible.

4. INDIGENOUS RIGHTS

4.1 Removal of Constitutional Safeguards

4.1.1 Indigenous Rights are a crucial element of national stability. At the core of indigenous rights are the principles of self-determination, land and resource rights, cultural preservation and free, prior and informed consent (FPIC).[34] Fiji is a State Party to the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention (ILO Convention 169)[35] which it ratified in1998. In 2023, Fiji officially supported and [34] United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, which was adopted by Fiji and 143 other countries on 13 September 2007.

[35] Convention (No. 169)

recognized the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP).

4.1.2 Fiji has a long and complex constitutional history regarding the recognition of indigenous rights. The 1997 Constitution provided strong protections for indigenous land ownership and cultural authority. It required special consent for any changes to laws affecting iTaukei land or affairs. These protections were reinforced by entrenched clauses, meaning such laws could not be easily changed by a simple majority in Parliament. In addition, the Constitution included a dedicated chapter on group rights, which recognised customary law and provided for affirmative action. (Refer to Appendix 2, page 51 for a comparison)

4.1.3 The 2013 Constitution significantly changed this approach. It removed the entrenched clauses found in the 1997 Constitution, as well as the dedicated chapter on group rights. It also abolished Senate and the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC), which had played an important role in iTaukei governance and land administration.

4.1.4 It should be mentioned however, that section 28(1) of the 2013 Constitution absolutely prohibits the permanent alienation of indigenous lands guaranteeing the protection of the ownership of iTaukei, Rotuman and Banaban lands. This means that such lands must always remain with its indigenous owners and can never be sold or transferred permanently thereby recognizing and protecting the reversionary rights of indigenous owners. However, the practical implementation of this protection of indigenous ownership rights remains an ongoing concern, as questions persist on the extent to which indigenous communities can or are able to effectively exercise control over, benefit from, and participate in decisions affecting their land and natural resources.

4.1.5 The removal of constitutional and institutional safeguards such as the GCC add to this ongoing concern that the current constitutional framework does not adequately protect indigenous identity and resources, traditional governance structures and cultural heritage. For the indigenous communities, traditional institutions such as the GCC serve as essential mechanisms of representation and consultations as well as significant custodians of customary traditions and values, cultural continuity and customary collective decision making.

4.1.6 The removal of these entrenched safeguards has important practical consequences. Laws affecting indigenous land and affairs, such as the iTaukei Lands Act 1905, can now be amended or repealed by a simple majority in Parliament. This can occur without meaningful consultation with indigenous communities. This situation does not align with Fiji's obligations under ILO Convention 169 and the UNDRIP, both of which require good faith consultation and the obtaining of free, prior and informed consent before adopting measures that affect indigenous peoples.

Recommendation:

1. Re-insert as appropriate entrenched clauses from the 1997 Constitution (sections 185 and 186) requiring specific consent and additional safeguards before any laws impacting indigenous affairs or lands can be amended.

Note: Fiji had a bicameral Parliament under the 1997 Constitution which no longer exists under the 2013 Constitution, hence the above suggested reinsertion needs to be adjusted accordingly.

4.2 Land Rights and the Illusion of Protection

4.2.1 The HRADC notes that the 2013 Constitution recognises and protects the land rights of indigenous peoples, including iTaukei, Rotumans, and Banabans, with section 28 affirming their ownership of customary land. However, this protection may be an illusion as section 27, grants to the State powers through written law for "compulsory acquisition" of land and property for various reasons including for public purposes.

4.2.2 While section 28 appears on its face to provide strong protection, section 27 weakens it by allowing land to be taken by the State giving rise to a fundamental tension between indigenous ownership rights and the State's authority to over-ride it. The concept of compulsory land expropriation conflicts with the principle of indigenous land ownership. International standards also take a different approach. While UNDRIP does not explicitly refer to expropriation, section 32 requires States to consult indigenous peoples and obtain their consent before any project affecting their land or resources is approved.

4.2.3 For this reason, the requirement for free, prior and informed consent must apply to any acquisition of customary land. Section 27 should therefore be amended to reflect this obligation or removed altogether if it cannot meet international standards.

4.2.4 The 2013 Constitution also removed earlier safeguards that required consent before amending laws related to indigenous land and affairs. Under the 1997 Constitution, Sections 185 and 186 ensured that such changes could only be made with proper approval and additional protections. This was consistent with Article 19 of UNDRIP, which requires States to work in good faith with indigenous peoples to obtain their free, prior and informed consent before introducing measures that affect them.

4.2.5 These safeguards are no longer present in the 2013 Constitution. As a result, important laws concerning indigenous land and rights can now be changed more easily. This creates uncertainty and weakens long-standing protections. The HRADC therefore considers it necessary to restore the entrenched provisions from the 1997 Constitution.

4.2.6 It is important to emphasise that strengthening indigenous rights does not undermine the rights of other groups. Rather, it ensures fairness by protecting key principles such as self-determination, land ownership, and free, prior and informed consent.

Recommendations:

1. Recognise the principle of Free, Prior and Informed Consent explicitly in the Constitution, ensuring it applies to all activities affecting indigenous land, resources, and cultural heritage. In addition, ensure meaningful participation in all decision making that involves indigenous rights, lands and resources.
2. Amend section 27 so that any State acquisition of iTaukei, Rotuman, or Banaban requires a genuine Free, Prior and Informed Consent process and includes fair, full, and timely compensation.

4.3 Minerals Ownership- The 3 feet below

4.3.1 A long-standing and increasingly contested issue concern the separation between land ownership and the ownership of minerals beneath the land. Under the current system, iTaukei landowners own the surface of their land, while all minerals beneath it are owned by the State– a colonial-era concept often referred to as the "three feet below" doctrine. What this means is when there are minerals, the State has subsurface rights, and when there are no minerals, the indigenous people have subsurface rights.

4.3.2 Section 30 of the 2013 Constitution confirms State ownership of all minerals. This is supported by legislation such as the Mining Act 1965 and the Petroleum Act 1978. Although the Fair Share of Mineral Royalties Act 2018 provides that landowners receive 80% of royalties, the total royalty is usually only 3–5% of the mineral's value. As a result, the actual benefit received by landowners remains very small which has been acknowledged by the iTaukei Land Trust Board "unfair return".[36]

[36] TLTB pushes for greater mineral rights, royalties for landowners - The Fiji Times

4.3.3 This legal framework gives rise to multiple, interconnected human rights violations that strike at the heart of indigenous self-determination and dignity.

4.3.4 First, the framework undermines the principle of free, prior and informed consent. Under the Mining Act 1965, landowners are not required to give consent before prospective licences or mining leases are granted.[37] They are only informed concerning access to their land.[38] This limits the ability of communities to say no at the outset of projects that may harm their land and livelihoods. This approach is not consistent with international standards under UNDRIP and ILO Convention 169.

4.3.5 Second, the system results in unequal sharing of benefits. Indigenous communities bear the environmental and social impacts of mining, such as land degradation and disruption to livelihoods, yet receive only a small share of the financial returns. Even though landowners receive a high percentage of royalties, the overall value of those royalties is low.

4.3.6 Third, the framework leads to environmental harm. Past mining operations, for example in the Namosi region, have resulted in documented environmental damage, including contamination of waterways and destruction of traditional food sources.[39] These harms have fuelled deep-seated grievances and strong opposition to new mining projects. Yet, because the legal framework does not require landowner consent at the exploration stage, communities are often left to respond to these impacts after they occur, rather than preventing them from the outset.

4.3.7 Fourth, the framework systematically excludes iTaukei landowners from decision-making processes that directly affect their lives and territories. The iTaukei Land Trust Board has noted that landowners are largely excluded from the negotiation and management of mining projects.[40] The State negotiates on their behalf, and royalties are paid directly to the State, not to the landowners or their representatives. This model perpetuates colonial power dynamics, reducing traditional custodians to passive recipients of State-determined outcomes rather than recognising them as equal partners in the governance of their own resources.

4.3.8 Finally, the system reflects a continuation of colonial practices. It separates land from its natural resources, which is inconsistent with the iTaukei concept of the vanua, where land, people, and resources are one and the same.[41] By maintaining this colonial construct, the State not only deprives indigenous communities of economic justice but also weakens traditional systems of

---

[37] See sections 26 and 32 of the Mining Act 1965.
[38] https://maitvfiji.com/mineral-director-landowner-consent-not-required-for-exploration-but-coms-vital/
[39] Concerns raised over land leasing without 60% consent in Namosi
[40] TLTB pushes for greater mineral rights, royalties for landowners - The Fiji Times
[41] Land reform needs free, prior and informed consent says President – FBC News governance, denying the holistic relationship between the people and their ancestral territory.

4.3.9 International instruments such as UNDRIP emphasise that indigenous peoples are not just stake holders to be consulted, but rights holders whose cultural survival, socio-economic development and self-determination are deeply rooted in their land and natural resources, given their distinctive spiritual and material relations with them. Therefore, mineral projects must respect indigenous rights, ensure meaningful participation, ensure no or minimize environmental or social harm and provide fair and equitable benefits to affected indigenous communities.

Recommendations:

1. Amend section 30 of the Constitution to recognise customary ownership of minerals found in or under iTaukei land, customary marine areas (qoliqoli), and protected areas, and vest these rights in the respective customary landowners.

2. Alternatively, if ownership of minerals remain vested in the State, then section 30(2) be amended to guarantee the rights of indigenous people to free, prior and informed consent; meaningful participation in decision making processes; the conduct of independent environmental and social impact assessments with findings made publicly available particularly to affected communities, to determine whether approval may or may not be given; fair and equitable sharing of benefits; and access to effective remedies and compensation for any damage or harm to their lands, waters, customary marine areas (qoliqoli), livelihood and traditional way of life.

5. HRADC

5.1 Commissioners' recruitment process: Lack of Paris Principles compliance

5.1.1 Paris Principles compliance

5.1.1.1 Fiji has consistently received recommendations from United Nations (UN) Member States since the first cycle of the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) to take necessary steps to align the HRADC with the Paris Principles. These recommendations were reiterated across all four review cycles—in 2010, 2014, 2019 and recently January 2025. Each review has emphasised the need for legislative reforms to ensure that the Commission fully complies with these international standards.

5.1.1.2 As Fiji's National Human Rights Institution (NHRI), the HRADC is guided by the Paris Principles, which set the minimum international standards for such institutions. A key requirement of these principles is independence from Government influence and external interference. The Paris Principles also establish clear expectations regarding the role, structure, and appointment processes of NHRIs. Compliance with these standards is assessed by the Global Alliance of National Human Rights Institutions (GANHRI), which grants accreditation statuses. An "A Status" indicates full compliance, while a "B Status" indicates only partial compliance. Holding "B Status" has significant consequences. It reflects that the HRADC is not fully independent or credible. As a result, its ability to participate in important international forums, including the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC), is limited, along with other rights available to fully accredited institutions.

5.1.1.3 The HRADC previously lost its accreditation in 2007 due to concerns about independence and credibility. When it reapplied in 2021, it was granted "B Status." One of the main concerns raised by GANHRI was the lack of an independent and transparent appointment process. In particular, the current Constitution framework[42] does not provide for a pluralistic selection panel, does not require public advertisement of vacancies, and does not establish a clear and structured process for appointing Commissioners.

5.1.1.4 The consequence of B Status is significant. B status recognizes that the HRADC is not a fully credible and independent institution, the HRADC's ability to participate in the proceedings of the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC'), among other key participatory rights in other key institutions is limited.

5.1.2 Current recruitment process under the Constitution

5.1.2.1 The HRADC is empowered under Article 45 of the Constitution as well as its establishment legislation, the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission Act. Article 45(2) of the 2013 Constitution establishes the composition of the Commission, which must consist of a chairperson (who is or is qualified to be a Judge) and four other members[43] all of whom are appointed by the President on the advice of the Constitutional Offices Commission ('COC').

5.1.2.2 The COC comprises the Prime Minister (Chairperson), Leader of Opposition, Attorney-General, 2 persons appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister, and 1 person appointed by the President on the advice of the Leader of Opposition.[44] This structure raises concerns about independence, as the Government has significant influence over the appointment process and, ultimately, over the leadership of the HRADC.

[42] See sections 132, 133 and 45 of the 2013 Constitution.
[43] Defined in section 2 of the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Act as a Commissioner.

5.1.2.3 In comparison, other NHRI's have vastly different appointment processes which promote independence of the Institute. For instance, Australia's Human Rights Commission,[45] New Zealand Human Rights Commission[46] and Samoa National Human Rights Institution, have standard merit-based and transparent procedures regarding the appointment of members of their respective Commissions, whereas Fiji doesn't.

Recommendation:

The HRADC proposes two options to ensure compliance with the Paris Principles:

Option 1: Amend the Constitution to establish a transparent and merit-based recruitment process for Commissioners. This requirement may be included directly in the Constitution or, alternatively, the Constitution may require that such a framework be provided for in legislation.

Option 2: Introduce a provision requiring that appointments be guided by formal rules developed by the Constitutional Offices Commission (COC). This may be done through regulations made under section 132(3) of the Constitution. These regulations should establish an independent panel to review and assess candidates based on clear and merit-based criteria. The panel would then submit a shortlist of candidates to the COC for final consideration and approval.

Note: The HRADC has already prepared draft regulations to support this process. These are currently with the Office of the Solicitor-General, the Attorney-General, and the COC, and are awaiting the necessary steps for implementation.

[44] See section 132 of the 2013 Constitution.
[45] Under the relevant provisions of the Australian Human Rights Commission Act 1986.
[46] With the added requirement that the appointment by the Governor General must be on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice.

5.1.3 Need for full-time HRADC Commissioners

5.1.3.1 At present, Commissioners are not engaged on a full-time basis and instead receive a modest monthly allowance. As a result, Commissioners often maintain other full-time employment, typically with higher remuneration. This arrangement has created a significant challenge for the effective discharge of the HRADC's mandate.

5.1.3.2 The absence of full-time Commissioners weakens accountability and reduces the level of commitment needed to address the increasing number and complexity of human rights issues in Fiji. For the HRADC to operate effectively and meet international standards, its leadership must be efficiently resourced and fully dedicated to its responsibilities.

5.1.3.3 Under the 2013 Constitution, Commissioners collectively form the leadership of the institution and are responsible for carrying out its mandate. This mandate is broad and requires continuous attention, strong oversight, and timely decision-making. However, the current part-time structure limits their availability and reduces continuity in leadership. This, in turn, affects the HRADC's ability to respond promptly and effectively to human rights concerns.

5.1.3.4 A comparison with similar institutions highlights this gap. In countries such as Australia and New Zealand, Commissioners serve on a full-time basis and are paid salaries comparable to those of judges.

Recommendation:

1. Revise the appointment framework to provide full-time Commissioners, with appropriate remuneration and terms of service that reflect the importance and scope of their responsibilities and eligible for a one time reappointment.

5.1.4 Limitations on the FHRADC's Jurisdiction and Investigative Scope

5.1.4.1 As an independent NHRI in accordance with Paris Principles, the FHRADC is expected to operate impartially and without interference. However, certain provisions in the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission Act 2009 and section 172 (5) of the 2013 Constitution limit its jurisdiction. In particular, matters related to the Fiji Constitution Amendment Act 1997 Revocation Decree 2009 and other Presidential Decrees are excluded from its review. While section 45 of the Constitution provides the HRADC with a broad mandate, these exclusions significantly restrict its ability to act in practice.

5.1.4.2 These limitations weaken the purpose of having an independent oversight body. By placing certain matters beyond review, they create a risk of selective accountability. This may reduce public confidence in the HRADC and limit its ability to address human rights issues in a fair, complete, and credible manner.

Recommendation:

1. Remove the limiting provisions in the 2013 Constitution and in relevant legislation to ensure that the HRADC can exercise its mandate fully and independently in compliance with the Paris Principles.

5.1.5 Enhancing Powers for Detention Monitoring

5.1.5.1 Section 45 of the 2013 Constitution and section 12 of the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Act 2009 does not currently empower the HRADC to conduct unannounced visits to places of detention. Although Fiji has ratified CAT, it has not yet joined the Optional Protocol, which provides for regular and independent inspections of detention facilities. As a result, the HRADC's ability to monitor detention conditions remains limited.

5.1.5.2 This limitation is important in light of complaints received by the HRADC regarding detention conditions in Fiji. These complaints include concerns about overcrowding, access to basic services, and the treatment of detainees. These conditions have also been publicly acknowledged by the Fiji Corrections Services for prison facilities as well as St Giles Hospital. Without the power to conduct independent and unannounced visits, the HRADC cannot effectively verify these concerns or respond to them in a timely manner.

5.1.5.3 Granting the HRADC the power to conduct unannounced visits is not intended to be punitive. Instead, it serves as a preventive and cooperative measure. Regular monitoring would help the HRADC better understand conditions within detention facilities, identify systemic issues, and provide practical recommendations for improvement. This would support both detainee welfare and the working conditions of officers, while also strengthening transparency and public trust. It would further assist the State in meeting its international human rights obligations.

Recommendation:

1. Amend Section 45 of the Constitution to explicitly authorise the HRADC to carry out regular and unannounced visits to all places of detention.

6. AMENDMENT PROVISIONS – Sections 159-160

6.1 Overly restrictive amendment framework

6.1.1 In August 2025, the Supreme Court of Fiji issued an important advisory opinion following a request by Cabinet. The request asked the Court to clarify how sections 159 and 160 of the 2013 Constitution should be understood and applied. This issue arose after the Constitution (Amendment) Bill 2025 failed to pass in Parliament by a single vote. The Bill had proposed reducing the amendment threshold from three-quarters to two-thirds in Parliament, and replacing the referendum requirement of three-quarters of all registered voters with a simple majority of those who vote.

6.1.2 The 2013 Constitution set very strict rules for amendment. Section 160 required that any constitutional change, whether minor or major, must be approved by three-quarters of all Members of Parliament and three-quarters of all registered voters in a referendum. This meant that approval depended not only on those who voted, but on all registered voters. In addition, section 159 made certain provisions, including the amendment process itself and immunity clauses, unamendable. Together, these requirements made the Constitution extremely difficult to change in practice.

6.1.3 To address these concerns, the Court applied what it described as "remedial interpretation." This approach involves interpreting legal provisions in a way that makes them workable and consistent with fundamental principles, such as democracy and self-determination.

6.1.4 The Court held that the amendment rules should be read in a way that allows meaningful constitutional change. It found that the original requirements were too strict and did not align with the right of people to determine their own system of government. In reaching this conclusion, the Court relied on international law, including Article 1.1 of the ICCPR, as well as the democratic values reflected in the Constitution itself.

6.2 The Supreme Court's Binding Opinion on Sections 159 and 160

6.2.1 Section 160(2)(b): Reduction of Parliamentary Threshold

6.2.1.1 The Court found that the requirement for a three-quarters majority in Parliament created an unreasonable barrier to constitutional change. It noted that such a rule would allow a relatively small minority to block any amendment. In the context of a Constitution that was not originally adopted through a democratic process, this restriction was considered unacceptable.

6.2.1.2 The Court therefore held that a two-thirds majority of all Members of Parliament is more appropriate. While still a high threshold, it allows for meaningful change while maintaining stability. The Court also noted that similar thresholds are common in Fiji's constitutional history and in other countries.

6.2.2 Section 160: Reform of the Referendum Requirement

6.2.2.1 The Court also reviewed the referendum requirement. It recognised the value of involving the public in constitutional amendments. However, it found that requiring approval from three-quarters of all registered voters was impractical and overly restrictive.

6.2.2.2 The Court therefore held that the referendum requirement should be a simple majority of those who actually vote. This change makes the process more realistic, while still ensuring that public support is required for constitutional change.

6.2.3 Section 159(2)(c): Amendment of Amendment Provisions

6.2.3.1 The Court refused to recognise the provision that prevented any changes to the amendment rules themselves. It was found that such a restriction would permanently block constitutional reform. By declining to recognise this provision, the Court ensured that the amendment process itself can be revised if necessary.

Recommendations:

1. Amend sections 159 and 160 of the 2013 Constitution to formally reflect the interpretation provided by the Supreme Court. This includes adopting a two-thirds majority in Parliament and a simple majority of those voting in a referendum for constitutional amendments.

2. Review and revise the amendment framework to ensure that it is practical and achievable, while still maintaining appropriate safeguards. The amendment process should allow for meaningful constitutional reform without creating unnecessary barriers.

3. Retain the requirement for public involvement through referenda, but ensure that the process is accessible and reflects the will of those who participate. Public education and awareness initiatives should be introduced to support informed participation in constitutional reform processes.

4. Clearly define which provisions, if any, should remain protected from amendment. Where such protections are retained, they should be justified and consistent with democratic principles and international standards.

5. Ensure that the amendment provisions align with the right to self-determination as recognised under international law, including the ICCPR. This will strengthen the legitimacy of the Constitution both domestically and internationally.

6. Consider establishing a formal mechanism for periodic constitutional review. This would allow the Constitution to evolve in a structured and inclusive manner, reducing the need for ad hoc reforms.

7. IMMUNITY PROVISIONS– CHAPTER 10

7.1 Broad Immunity Provisions

7.1.1 The immunity provisions outlined under Chapter 10 of the 2013 Constitution[48] which incorporates the immunity provisions from the 1990 Constitution provide absolute immunity from criminal prosecution or civil liability, or any other type of Court actions, against anyone involved in the 1987 and 2006 military coups, the timeframe being from December 5, 2006, until the first sitting of Parliament elected in the 2014 elections.

7.1.2 The HRADC notes the concerns of members of the public calling for the removal of the immunity provisions and acknowledges the broader issues these concerns raised on the necessity and importance of accountability, the rule of law, equality before the law and sound democratic governance.

7.1.3 In this regard, the HRADC refers to the Supreme Court of Fiji, in its Opinion[49] rendered in August 2025, which raised these same concerns of accountability, the rule of law, and the restoration and preservation of democratic values from authoritarian military governance towards civilian democratic governance. The Supreme Court opined that:

[48] Arts. 155 – 158 of the Constitution.
[49] In the Matter of a reference by Cabinet for an opinion from the Supreme Court on a matter concerning the interpretation and application of sections 159 and 160 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji [2025] FJSC 20.

> "Immunity provisions can be seen to detract from the rule of law. They insulate from what would otherwise be the legal consequences of their actions. They also sit uneasily with the concept of equality before the law. As well, such provisions may create. in the minds of those contemplating a coup, expectations of future immunities and, in this way, might increase the risks of extra-constitutional action. These issues are compounded when immunities are not able to be amended."

7.1.4 The Supreme Court further added that:

> "Unamenable immunities may be – as they probably were in 2012 and 2013 – preconditions to a peaceful transition from military government to democracy. In this way they can be seen to promote democratic values."

7.1.5 In brief, it was the conclusion of the Supreme Court for reason of national stability, the peaceful transition that it regarded as an act that promoted democracy and reason of legal continuity, that the immunity provisions remain protected and cannot be amended.

7.1.6 In light of the Supreme Court's Opinion and public calls for the removal of the immunity provisions, HRADC acknowledges that while such provisions are fundamentally offensive to democratic accountability and the rule of law, they were a practical necessity (a necessary evil) for securing a peaceful transition towards restoring democratic civilian rule thus peacefully returning power to the people.

7.1.7 However, in upholding the public's call for democratic accountability for perpetrators of military and civilian coups, while respecting the Supreme Court's opinion of August 2025, the HRADC is of the view that there is need to strengthen section 2 (6) of the 2013 Constitution to prohibit future coups and that any future attempt to overthrow Government and subvert the Constitution should carry mandatory life sentences with no access to executive or Presidential pardons, as the provision has already stated that "no immunities can lawfully be granted under any law…". This will also require an amendment to section 119 of the 2013 Constitution, to ensure that the Mercy Commission does not include among its recommendations to the President for his power of mercy, those engaged in coups and overthrow of a Government.

7.1.8 The HRADC acknowledges the action of the Coalition Government in establishing the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) to address the trauma, sufferings and human rights violations arising from the 1987, 2000 and 2006 coups. HRADC, however, notes that the TRC does not provide a clear pathway for reparations or accountability. The HRADC also notes that section 158 (3) prevents the State from paying compensation for damages, injury or loss caused by actions and conduct for which immunity has been granted. However, the HRADC is of the view that this does not prevent the State from providing some level of assistance and comfort to victims and that this assistance should not be framed as legal damages or compensation in light of section 158 (3) but provided to victims on humanitarian and restorative grounds.

7.1.9 The HRADC recognizes the very important role of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces in protecting and safeguarding Fiji's security and defence. HRADC also notes continuing public concerns on section 131(2) of the 2013 Constitution which vests in the Republic of Fiji Military Forces – "the overall responsibility...to ensure at all times the security, defence and wellbeing of Fiji and all Fijians." A grave concern is that this section could be misused, because its language is so broad and ambiguous, to justify military intervention in political disputes and civilian governance. The HRADC is of the view that section 131 (2) requires language that removes the ambiguity and vagueness, provides clarity on the role and responsibility of the military and expressly states that the military remains subordinate to civilian rule and elected government authorities, at all times.

Recommendations:

1. Strengthen section 2 (6) of the 2013 Constitution by amending it to incorporate that future coup actions and those responsible, shall be given mandatory life sentences and shall not have access or be granted executive or Presidential pardons.

2. Section 119 of the 2013 Commission to be amended to ensure that the Mercy Commission does not consider any petition from nor recommend to the President for his power of mercy, any person involved in coup actions or the overthrow of a Government.

3. That Government, notwithstanding section 158 (3) of the 2013 Constitution, reinforce the work of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission by establishing an independent state funded Restorative Justice and Humanitarian Fund to provide some level of assistance and comfort to victims

4. Section 131 (2) of the 2013 Constitution be completely re-written, to clearly and specifically set out the powers, functions or responsibilities of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces; the limits to the exercise of these powers, functions or responsibilities; and that the Military remains subordinate to the rule of law and to civilian rule exercised through the democratically elected Government, at all times.

7.2 Immunity to be Time Bound (Expunging and removal of immunity provisions in the interest of future generations)

7.2.1 The HRADC acknowledges concerns and discussions by members of the public that the preservation of the immunity provisions indefinitely is not in the best interest of future generations. The Constitution is not only the Supreme Law, but it should also serve as a moral compass for the nation. The permanent protection of these immunities, is in our view, entrenching historical political conflicts within the nation's Supreme Law, long after their practical purpose has ceased and those covered by the immunity provisions have also ceased to exist.

7.2.2 The continued inclusion of the immunity provisions may risk memorializing in the Supreme Law, treasonous actions, constitutional disruptions and extra constitutional political change. Future generations may see this continued immunity protection as an implicit endorsement even legitimization of actions and conduct that violated democratic principles and constitutional processes. This may lead to the perception that unlawful and extra constitutional actions can achieve constitutional recognition and protection without accountability. It is therefore argued that the maintaining of the immunity provisions can undermine efforts toward strengthening constitutional supremacy, the rule of law and democratic accountability.

7.2.3 The HRADC is of the view that it is an unreasonable and unjust burden on future generations to inherit a document that carries within its permanent protection of actions and conduct that violated the very constitutional order, they are asked and required to uphold.

7.2.4 In balancing respect for the Supreme Court's Opinion of August 2025, with Fiji's long term democratic development and constitutional evolution, the following forward-looking approach is proposed. This approach seeks a compromise in preserving the original purpose of the immunity provisions while recognising that the Constitution is a living document and should evolve with the nation it serves.

7.2.5 The HRADC proposes the insertion of a sunset provision into the 2013 Constitution expressly stating that all immunity provisions be automatically expunged and removed from the Constitution in thirty years' time.

7.2.6 A thirty year time frame, means that all those involved in actions and conduct for which immunity is granted, would have passed on into history. More importantly, future generations will inherit a clean document, free from exceptional provisions that link it to past historical constitutional disruptions and political upheavals.

7.2.7 The eventual removal of the immunity provisions recognizes that the passage of time has rendered such exceptional provisions unnecessary and that such information best belongs in the public record, academic writings and study or national forums for debates and discussions. They need not be permanently enshrined in the Constitution once their transitional and practical purpose has been achieved. To maintain the immunity provisions indefinitely risks transforming what was intended as a transitional mechanism into a constitutional principle; when immunity is kept indefinitely it risks subverting or undermining the fundamental legal principle that all individuals are subject to and equal before the law.

7.2.8 As custodians of Fiji's constitutional future, the present generation should ensure that future generations inherit a Constitution that reflects the ideals and values of democracy, the supremacy of the Constitution, the rule of law, equality before the law, accountability, respect for human rights and the peaceful transfer of political power through sound democratic process. The Constitution should embody these enduring principles and values and must not remain permanently tied to exceptional provisions which arose from particular historical and political circumstances that challenged and sought to destroy the rule of law and democratic governance.

Recommendation:

1. That a sunset provision be inserted into the 2013 Constitution expressly stating that the immunity provisions shall be automatically expunged and removed from the 2013 Constitution in thirty years' time, effective from the date of amendment.

Note: Please note that 30 years is based on the amendment occurring at 2027, and therefore should change, that is reduced if the time of amendment continues to be delayed.*

8. WOMEN'S RIGHTS AND GENDER RIGHTS

8.1 The HRADC acknowledges that section 26 of the 2013 Constitution provides a broader set of identity characteristics for protection against discrimination compared to previous constitutions. These protections strengthen the legal framework for equality for every person and help ensure that all individuals are treated fairly with dignity and respect in relation to the life they have chosen to live. By recognising a broader set of diverse identity characteristics, the 2013 Constitution reflects a more inclusive approach to human rights. This is an important step in addressing both existing and emerging forms of discrimination.

8.2 Overall, the HRADC views these expanded protections as a positive development that supports fairness, dignity, and equal treatment for all individuals in Fiji.

8.3 Lack of explicit recognition on women

8.3.1 However, the terms "woman" and "women" do not appear in the 2013 Constitution. This is a change from the 1997 Constitution, which specifically recognised the importance of equal participation of men and women in public service under Article 140. The removal of this explicit reference may be seen as reducing the visibility of women's rights in the Constitution. As a result, there is a risk that the importance of equal representation by sex is no longer clearly stated at the constitutional level.

8.3.2 This is particularly important in light of Fiji's obligations under the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW). Article 7 of CEDAW requires States Parties to ensure that women have equal opportunities to participate in public life, including holding public office.

8.3.3 At the same time, the HRADC recognises that the 2013 Constitution has strengthened protection against discrimination in other important ways. Section 26 (3) (a) expands the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination to include sex, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression, as well as various social and economic factors. This represents an important step forward in promoting equality and inclusion, particularly for individuals and groups who have historically experienced discrimination, marginalization or social exclusion. (Refer to Appendix 4, page 65 for comparison)

8.3.4 The HRADC also acknowledges the views of civil society organisations, which have highlighted the importance of maintaining these protections within the Constitution. Ensuring that these rights remain protected is essential for safeguarding equality and dignity for all individuals. In the context of constitutional review, it is essential to maintain the international law principle of non – retrogression. This principle holds that human rights protections once granted must not be rolled back or weakened. Any retrogressive measure is strictly prohibited unless justified by exceptional circumstances which must be temporary with full protection restored as soon as possible.

Recommendations:

1. Include explicit recognition of women in the 2013 Constitution, particularly in relation to equal participation in public life and public service, in line with Fiji's obligations under CEDAW.

2. Retain and strengthen the existing non-discrimination provisions to ensure continued protection based on sex, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression.

3. Retain and safeguard section 26 to ensure that the broad protections against discrimination remain firmly embedded in the Constitution.

4. Ensure that the constitutional protections are supported by effective legislation and enforcement mechanisms, allowing individuals to seek remedies where discrimination occurs.

9. EQUAL CITIZENSHIP AND NATIONAL IDENTITY

9.1 The HRADC notes that while all Constitutions that Fiji had recognised equal citizenry, the 2013 Constitution is the first in Fiji's history to entrench a common national identity establishing that all Fiji citizens be known as Fijians. The HRADC supports the principle for a common national identity and that the nature of citizenry is a separate matter altogether to ethnicity. Citizenship refers to a person's legal status within the State, while ethnicity relates to cultural identity, language, and heritage.

9.2 The HRADC acknowledges that historically "Fijian" was used exclusively to describe the indigenous population of Fiji. The framers of the 2013 Constitution, without consultation with the public nor with the indigenous people, imposed the name "Fijian" through constitutional entrenchment, as the national name for all citizens in Fiji.

9.3 The HRADC further acknowledges concerns expressed by indigenous stakeholders including the Great Council of Chiefs on the adoption of the term "Fijian" as the common national identity for all citizens. The HRADC considers that these indigenous concerns raise legitimate questions on what name should be used to express a national identity in a multi-cultural society.

9.4 The HRADC is of the view that these concerns deserve respectful recognition and dialogue, noting that the principles of equal citizenry and indigenous identity are not mutually exclusive. They are not opposites and can co-exist successfully. A constitutional framework can recognize a common national identity for all citizens of Fiji while at the same time safeguarding the unique rights, customs, traditions, languages, institutions and heritage of the indigenous people as well as other ethnic groups.

9.5 The HRADC proposes that consideration be given to the undertaking of a nation wide consultation process or through a national referendum to determine whether the term "Fijian" is widely supported or whether an alternative name such as "Fiji Islander" or another name that is preferred by the people of Fiji and which reflects national consensus. This strategy ensures that the name used for national identity enjoy broad public support and acceptance. It offers a historic opportunity for all Fiji citizens to have a say on what their national identity should be.

9.6 In this way, Fiji can forge a shared common identity that satisfies the requirements of equal citizenry and respects its diverse heritage including its indigenous heritage.

9.7 The HRADC also supports section 4 of the 2013 Constitution, recognizing Fiji as a secular State. While it acknowledges Fiji's (and the wider South Pacific) deep ties with Christianity, the Commission is also mindful that Fiji is a multicultural nation with people from different religions. The right to freedom from discrimination on religious grounds is an important one, and section 4 contributes towards the recognition of this.

9.8 While it acknowledges Fiji's (and the wider South Pacific) deep ties with Christianity, the HRADC is also mindful that Fiji is a multicultural nation with people from different religions. The Commission supports this approach, as it promotes national unity and a shared identity.

Recommendations:

- The principle of equal citizenry be retained, however, that the public be consulted via national referendum on their views on which name is best used to describe their national identity (with some examples including 'Fiji Islanders', Fiji Citizens' etc).
- Include a clarifying provision or interpretive guidance that recognises the distinction between citizenship and ethnic or cultural identity, ensuring that the recognition of all citizens as Fijian does not diminish the cultural rights of any group.
- Strengthen protections for cultural identity, language, and tradition within the Constitution to complement the principle of equal citizenry and ensure that diversity is equally valued. (referring to Indigenous Rights discussions above)

10. CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDATIONS

10.1 In conclusion, the HRADC outlines in summary its recommendations. To align with international human rights standards, the HRADC recommends:

1. Adjusting or removing broad limitation clauses to ensure rights are not unduly restricted and inline with international human rights standards.

2. Restoring protections for indigenous rights, including entrenched safeguards, recognition of Free, Prior and Informed Consent and meaningful participation in all decision making involving them and their resources.

3. Reforming the appointment and structure of the HRADC to ensure Paris Principles compliance and full independence.

4. Aligning amendment provisions with democratic principles to allow for meaningful constitutional reform.

5. Insert time-bound provisions on immunity provisions and strengthen relevant current provisions to ensure that future treasonous actions against the State face democratic accountability and are not provided any immunity.

6. Strengthening protections for women rights and gender rights with explicit recognition in the 2013 Constitution.

Thank you for your attention and consideration.

God Bless the CRC.

God Bless Fiji.

APPENDIX 1: Bill of Rights – Comparison Limitations

	1997 Constitution	2013 Constitution
Freedom from Cruel and Degrading Treatment	Section 25 – Freedom from cruel or degrading treatment Limitation: No expressly stated limited	Section 11 – Freedom from cruel and degrading treatment Article 6(5) – rights and freedoms in the Bill of Rights may be limited by: a. limitations expressly prescribed, authorized or permitted (whether by or under a written law) in relation to a particular right or freedom in this Chapter; b. limitations prescribed or set out in, or authorized or permitted by, other provisions of this Constitution; or c. limitations which are not expressly set out or authorized (whether by or under a written law) in relation to a particular right or freedom in this Chapter, but which are necessary and are prescribed by a law or provided under a law or authorized or permitted by a law or by actions taken under the authority of a law.
Freedom of Speech, Expression and Publication	Section 30 – Freedom of expression	Section 17 – Freedom of expression Freedom of speech, expression, thought, opinion and publication does not protect—

1439

	A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right to freedom of expression in the interests of: (a) national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of national or municipal elections; (b) the protection or maintenance of the reputation, privacy, dignity, rights or freedoms of other persons, including: (i) the right to be free from hate speech, whether directed against individuals or groups; and (ii) the right of persons injured by inaccurate or offensive media reports to have a correction published on reasonable conditions established by law; (c) preventing the disclosure, as appropriate, of information received in confidence; (d) preventing attacks on the dignity of individuals, groups or communities or respected offices or institutions in a manner likely to promote ill will between races or communities or the oppression of, or discrimination against, any person or persons; (e) maintaining the authority and independence of the courts;	(a) propaganda for war; (b) incitement to violence or insurrection against this Constitution; or (c) advocacy of hatred that— (i) is based on any prohibited ground of discrimination listed or prescribed under section 26; and (ii) constitutes incitement to cause harm. (3) To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights and freedoms mentioned in subsection (1) in the interests of— (a) national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections; (b) the protection or maintenance of the reputation, privacy, dignity, rights or freedoms of other persons, including— (i) the right to be free from hate speech, whether directed against individuals or groups; and (ii) the rights of persons injured by inaccurate or offensive media reports to have a correction published on reasonable conditions established by law; (c) preventing the disclosure, as appropriate, of information received in confidence; (d) preventing attacks on the dignity of individuals, groups of individuals or respected offices or

	(f) imposing reasonable restrictions on the holders of public offices in order to secure their impartial and confidential service; or (g) regulating the technical administration of telecommunications; but only to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society.	institutions in a manner likely to promote ill will between ethnic or religious groups or the oppression of, or discrimination against, any person or group of persons; (e) maintaining the authority and independence of the courts; (f) imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices; (g) regulating the technical administration of telecommunications; or (h) making provisions for the enforcement of media standards and providing for the regulation, registration and conduct of media organisations.
Freedom of Assembly	Section 31 – Freedom of assembly A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right to freedom of assembly: (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of national or municipal elections; (b) for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; or (c) for the purpose of imposing reasonable restrictions on the holders of public offices in order to secure their impartial service;	Section 18 – Freedom of assembly To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right mentioned in subsection (1)— (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections; (b) for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; or (c) for the purpose of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices.

1441

	but only to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society.
Freedom of Association	Section 32 – Freedom of Association A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right to freedom of association: (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality or public health; (b) for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; or (c) for the purpose of imposing reasonable restrictions on the holders of public offices in order to secure their impartial service; but only to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society.	Section 19 – Freedom of association A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right mentioned in subsection (1)— (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections; (b) for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; (c) for the purpose of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices; (d) for the purpose of regulating trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of employers; (e) for the purposes of regulating collective bargaining processes, providing mechanisms for the resolution of employment disputes and grievances, and regulating strikes and lockouts; or (f) for the purpose of regulating essential services and industries, in the overall interests of the Fijian economy and the citizens of Fiji.
Employment Relations	Section 33 – Labour Relations A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in this section:	Section 20 – Employment Relations A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights mentioned in this section—

	(a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality or public health; (b) for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; or (c) for the purpose of imposing reasonable restrictions on members of a disciplined force; but only to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society..	(a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections; (b) for the purposes of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; (c) for the purposes of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices; (d) for the purposes of regulating trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of employers; (e) for the purposes of regulating collective bargaining processes, providing mechanisms for the resolution of employment disputes and grievances, and regulating strikes and lockouts; or (f) for the purposes of regulating essential services and industries, in the overall interests of the Fijian economy and the citizens of Fiji.
Freedom of Movement and Residence	Article 34 – Freedom of movement (7) A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right of a person to freedom of movement: (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality or public health;	Article 21 – Freedom of movement and residence (7) To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights mentioned in this section— (a) in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections;

1443

	(b) for the purpose of protecting the economy of a particular area or the ecology or distinctive culture of the area; (c) for the purpose of imposing a restriction on the person that is reasonably required to secure the fulfilment of an obligation imposed on the person by law; or (d) for the purpose of imposing reasonable restrictions on the holders of public offices as part of the terms and conditions of their employment; but only to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society.	(b) for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; (c) for the purpose of protecting the ecology of any area; (d) for the purpose of imposing a restriction on the person that is reasonably required to secure the fulfilment of an obligation imposed on the person by law; or (e) for the purpose of imposing reasonable restrictions on the holders of public offices as part of the terms and conditions of their employment.

APPENDIX 2: Indigenous Rights

1970 Constitution	1990 Constitution	1997 Constitution	2013 Constitution
No provisions explicitly providing for Indigenous Rights, however several clauses contained therein that reserved the office of the Prime Minister and a majority in the House of Representatives for Indigenous Fijians.	Section 21 – Protection and Enhancement of Fijian and Rotuman Interests (1) Notwithstanding anything contained in Chapter II of this Constitution Parliament shall, with the object of promoting and safeguarding the economic, social, educational, cultural, traditional and other interests of the Fijian and Rotuman people, enact laws for those objects and shall direct the Government to adopt any programme or activity for the attainment of the said objects and Government shall duly comply with such directions. (2) In carrying out any direction given under subsection (1) of this section, the Government through the Cabinet May – (a) give directions to any department of Government, Commission or authority for the reservation of such proportions as it may deem reasonable of scholarships, training privileges	Section 185 – Alteration of certain Acts (the entrenched clauses) (1) A Bill that alters any of the following Acts, namely: (a) Fijian Affairs Act; (b) Fijian Development Fund Act; (c) Native Lands Act; (d) Native Land Trust Act; (e) Rotuma Act; (f) Rotuman Lands Act; (g) Banaban Lands Act; or (h) Banaban Settlement Act; including a Bill prepared in consequence of the enactment of this Constitution: (i) must be expressed as a Bill for an Act to alter the Act concerned; (j) must not be presented for the President's assent unless it has	Section 28 – Rights of ownership and protection of iTaukei, Rotuman and Banaban lands (1) The ownership of all iTaukei land shall remain with the customary owners of that land and iTaukei land shall not be permanently alienated, whether by sale, grant, transfer or exchange, except to the State in accordance with section 27. (2) Any iTaukei land acquired by the State for a public purpose after the commencement of this Constitution under section 27 or under any written law shall revert to the customary owners if the land is no longer required by the State. (3) The ownership of all Rotuman land shall remain with the customary owners of that land and Rotuman land shall not be or other special facilities provided by Government (b) when any permit or licence for the operation of any trade or business is required by law, give such direction as may be required for the purpose of assisting Fijians and Rotumans to venture into business; and (c) may give directions to any department of Government ,Commission or authority for the purpose of the attainment of any of the objects specified under subsection (1) of this section; and the department or the Commission or authority to which any direction under paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of this subsection is given shall comply with such directions. (3) In the exercise of its functions under this section, the Cabinet shall act in consultation with the Bose Levu Vakaturaga, or the Council of Rotuma, as the circumstances may require.	been read 3 times in each House and motions for the second and third readings are carried in each House; and (k) is deemed not to have been passed by the Senate unless at its third reading in that House it is supported by the votes of at least 9 of the 14 members of the Senate appointed under paragraph 64(1)(a). (2) A Bill that alters the Agricultural Landlord and Tenant Act: (a) must be expressed as a Bill for an Act to alter that Act; and (b) must not be presented for the President's assent unless: (i) it has been read 3 times in each House and motions for the second and third readings are carried in each House; and (ii) at its third reading it is supported by the votes of at least two-thirds of the members of each House and, in the case of the Senate, by the votes of at least 9 of the 14 members of the Senate appointed under paragraph 64(1)(a). (3) The President must not assent to a Bill referred to in this section unless it is accompanied by a certificate of the Secretary-General to Parliament certifying that, in relation to the particular House, the approval required by this section has been given.	permanently alienated, whether by sale, grant, transfer or exchange, except to the State in accordance with section 27. (4) Any Rotuman land acquired by the State for a public purpose after the commencement of this Constitution under section 27 or under any written law shall revert to the customary owners if the land is no longer required by the State. (5) The ownership of all Banaban land shall remain with the customary owners of that land and Banaban land shall not be permanently alienated, whether by sale, grant, transfer or exchange, except to the State in accordance with section 27. (6) Any Banaban land acquired by the State for a public purpose after the commencement of this Constitution under section 27 or under any written law shall revert to the customary owners if the land is no longer required by the State.

1446

		Section 186 – Customary laws and customary rights (1) The Parliament must make provision for the application of customary laws and for dispute resolution in accordance with traditional Fijian processes. (2) In doing so, the Parliament must have regard to the customs, traditions, usages, values and aspirations of the Fijian and Rotuman people. (3) The Parliament must make provision granting to the owners of land or of registered customary fishing rights an equitable share of royalties or other moneys paid to the State in respect of the grant by the State of rights to extract minerals from the land or the seabed. (4) A law fixing amounts under subsection (3) must require that account be taken of: (a) any benefits that the owners are likely to receive as a result of the mineral exploitation; (b) the risk of environmental damage;

1447

		(c) any legal obligation of the State to contribute to a fund to meet the cost of preventing, repairing or compensating for any environmental damage; (d) the cost to the State of administering exploitation rights; and (e) the appropriate contribution to the general revenue of the State to be made by the person granted exploitation rights.
		Section 6 – Compact (context on the affirmative action clause) (k) affirmative action and social justice programs to secure effective equality of access to opportunities, amenities or services for the Fijian and Rotuman people, as well as for other communities, for women as well as men, and for all disadvantaged citizens or groups, are based on an allocation of resources broadly acceptable to all communities
		Section 44 – Social justice and affirmative action

1448

		(1) The Parliament must make provision for programs designed to achieve for all groups or categories of persons who are disadvantaged effective equality of access to: (a) education and training; (b) land and housing; and (c) participation in commerce and in all levels and branches of service of the State. (2) An Act that establishes a program under subsection (1) must specify: (a) the goals of the program and the persons or groups it is intended to benefit; (b) the means by which those persons or groups are to be assisted to achieve the goals; (c) the performance indicators for judging the efficacy of the program in achieving the goals; and (d) if the program is for the benefit of a group, the criteria for the selection of the members of the group who will be entitled to participate in the program. (3) A person may take special measures in accordance with this section for the purpose of achieving substantial equality between different groups or different categories of persons. (4) A person does not discriminate against another person under section 38 by taking those special measures. (5) Subsection (3) does not authorise the taking, or further taking, of special measures for a purpose referred to in that subsection that is achieved. (6) The administering department or other agency must monitor the efficacy of a program established under this section by reference to the specified performance indicators. The Minister must make an annual report to Parliament on the results revealed by the monitoring. (7) Unless it has sooner expired in accordance with its terms or has been repealed, an Act establishing a program under this section expires on the tenth anniversary of its commencement, but the program may be re-established, unless the benefited persons or groups have demonstrably ceased to be in need of it. (8) A program established under this section must not, directly or indirectly, deprive any person not entitled to its benefits of: (a) any position or seniority in the service of the State; (b) any place in an educational or training institution; (c) a scholarship or other financial support; or (d) a right to carry on any business or profession or to enjoy any other opportunity, amenity or service; to which that person has already become, and would otherwise remain, entitled. (9) For the purposes of this section, an ethnic community is to be taken as having effective equality of access to a level or branch of service of the State only if it is represented there in a number broadly proportionate to its number in the adult population as a whole, unless its underrepresentation is due solely to its particular occupational preferences. (10) In this section: service of the State means service in any capacity on appointment: (a) by the President, a Minister, the Cabinet, a commission or the holder of a public office; (b) by resolution of the Parliament or a committee of the Parliament; or (c) by or on behalf of any local authority; whether or not the appointee is remunerated wholly or partly by public money, but does not include service as a member or employee of a body provided for in an Act referred to in section 185.

1449

1450

1452

APPENDIX 3: State of Emergency Provisions

1970 Constitution	1990 Constitution	1997 Constitution	2013 Constitution
Section 18 (b) there is in force a proclamation by the Governor-General declaring that a state of public emergency exists. (7) Without prejudice to the power of the Governor-General to revoke at any time a proclamation made for the purposes of the last foregoing subsection, such a proclamation shall lapse at the expiration of six months from the date it was made unless it has in the meantime been approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament, and a proclamation that has been so approved	Section 163 – Emergency Powers (1)If the President is satisfied that a grave emergency exists whereby the security or economic life of Fiji is threatened, he may issue a Proclamation of Emergency. (2)If a Proclamation of Emergency is issued when Parliament is not sitting, the President shall summon Parliament as soon as may be practicable, and may, until Parliament is sitting, promulgate decrees having the force of law, if satisfied that immediate action is required. (3)A Proclamation of Emergency and any decree promulgated under subsection (2) of this section shall, if not sooner revoked by the President, cease to have effect-	Section 187 – Emergency Powers (1) The Parliament may make a law conferring power on the President, acting on the advice of the Cabinet, to proclaim a state of emergency in Fiji, or in a part of Fiji, in such circumstances as the law prescribes. (2) The law may include provisions conferring on the President the power to make regulations relating to the state of emergency. (3) A measure authorised by or under the law may derogate from the rights and freedoms set out in section 23, 24, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34 or 37 (but not from other rights and freedoms set out in the Bill of Rights) if each of the following conditions is satisfied:	Section 154 – State of Emergency (1) The Prime Minister may, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Police and the Commander of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces, declare a state of emergency in Fiji, or in a part of Fiji, and may make regulations relating to a state of emergency, if there are reasonable grounds to believe that— (a) the security and safety of all or part of Fiji is threatened; and (b) it is necessary to declare a state of emergency to deal effectively with the threatening circumstances.

1453

shall remain in force so long as those resolutions remain in force and no longer. (8) A resolution of either House of Parliament passed for the purposes of the preceding subsection shall remain in force for such period not exceeding six months as may be specified therein: Provided that any such resolution may be extended from time to time by a further such resolution, each extension being for such period not exceeding six months from the date of the resolution effecting the extension as maybe specified therein.	(a)at the expiration of six months from the date it was made unless in the meantime it has been approved by a resolution of the House of Representatives; or (b)if a resolution is passed by the House of Representatives annulling such Proclamation or decree, but without prejudice to anything previously done by virtue thereof or to the power of the President to issue a new Proclamation under subsection (1) or promulgate any decree under subsection (2) of this section. (4)A resolution of the House of Representatives passed for the purposes of approving a Proclamation of Emergency or any decree promulgated under subsection (2) of this section shall remain in force for such period not exceeding six months as may be specified therein: Provided that any such resolution may be extended from time to time by a further such resolution, each extension being for such period	(a) the Cabinet has reasonable grounds for believing that, because of the emergency described in the proclamation of the state of emergency, the life of the State is threatened and the exigencies of the situation are such that they cannot be dealt with effectively without derogating from the Bill of Rights; (b) the proclamation of the state of emergency is laid before the House of Representatives, is confirmed by it within 5 sitting days after the proclamation is made and remains in force at the time the measure is taken (c) the proclamation of the state of emergency remains in force for no longer than 3 months or for such further successive periods of up to 6 months as the House of Representatives determines; (d) regulations relating to the state of emergency are laid before the House of Representatives within 2 sitting days after they are	(2) If the declaration of a state of emergency is made when Parliament is sitting, the Prime Minister must, within 24 hours upon making the declaration, refer the declaration to Parliament for confirmation of the declaration. (3) If the declaration of a state of emergency is made when Parliament is not sitting, the Speaker must, within 48 hours upon the making of the declaration, seek confirmation of the declaration from the members of Parliament through such measures of communication as necessary. (4) If a majority of the members of Parliament confirm the declaration made by the Prime Minister, then the declaration shall continue for a period of one month from the date of confirmation, and may be renewed by a further vote in Parliament.

1454

	not exceeding six months from the date of the resolution effecting the extension as may be specified therein. (5)No provision of any decree promulgated under this section, and no provision of any Act of Parliament which is passed while a Proclamation of Emergency is in force and which declares that the law appears to Parliament to be required by reason of the emergency, shall be invalid on the ground of inconsistency with any provision of this Constitution. (6)At the expiration of a period of six months beginning with the date on which a Proclamation of Emergency ceases to be in force, any decree promulgated in pursuance of the Proclamation and, to the extent that it could not have been validly made but for this section, any law made while the Proclamation was in force, shall, if it has not already ceased to have effect, cease to have effect, except as to things done or omitted to be done	made and remain in force at the time the measure is taken. (4) A law made under this section that is inconsistent with the obligations of the State under an international convention or covenant is invalid to the extent of the inconsistency. (5) Regulations made pursuant to subsection (2) remain in force only so long as the proclamation of the state of emergency remains in force	(5) If a majority of the members of Parliament do not confirm the declaration made by the Prime Minister, then the declaration and any actions taken under the declaration shall be deemed to be of no effect.

1455

	before the expiration of that period.
		Section 188 – Summoning of House of Representatives (1) Upon the proclamation, of a state of emergency, the President must summon the House of Representatives to meet. (2) If the proclamation is made during the period after a dissolution of the House of Representatives and before the holding of the next following general election of members of the House of Representatives, the President must, under subsection (1), summon the members of the dissolved House, and those members may exercise all the powers conferred on the House of Representatives under this Chapter. (3) Despite the summoning under subsection (2) of members of the dissolved House of Representatives, the general election must proceed and the recalled House again stands dissolved on the day immediately before the day fixed for the polling at the general election. (4) If, during a period while a state of emergency is in force, the term of the House of Representatives would, under section 59, expire by effluxion of time, the President may, on the advice of the Cabinet, proclaim an extension of the term for such period as is specified in the proclamation. (5) The term of the House of Representatives must not be extended under subsection (4) for a total of more than 12 months.

1456

		Section 189 – Powers of House of Representatives (1) The House of Representatives may, at any time, disallow a proclamation of a state of emergency. (2) The House of Representatives may at any time amend or disallow regulations relating to the state of emergency that are laid before it. (3) If: (a) notice of a motion to disallow a proclamation of a state of emergency or to amend or disallow regulations relating to the state of emergency has been given by at least 18 members of the House of Representatives; and (b) at the end of the period of 3 sitting days after the notice was given, the notice has not been withdrawn, the motion has not been called on and the House has not passed a resolution deferring its consideration, the proclamation or the regulations, as the case may be, are taken to have been disallowed or amended, as the case may be.

1458

APPENDIX 4: Anti-Discrimination Provisions

1970 Constitution	1990 Constitution	1997 Constitution	2013 Constitution
Section 15 – Protection from discrimination on the grounds of race, etc. (2) In this section, the expression "discriminatory" means affording different treatment to different persons attributable wholly or mainly to their respective descriptions by race, place of origin, political opinions, colour or creed, whereby persons of one such description are subjected to disabilities or restrictions to which persons of another such description are not made subject or are accorded privileges or advantages which are not accorded to persons of another such description.	Section 16 – Protection from discrimination on the grounds of race, etc. (2) In this section, the expression "discriminatory" means affording different treatment to different persons attribute wholly or mainly to their respective descriptions by race, race, place of origin, political opinions, colour, religion or creed, whereby persons of one such description are subjected disabilities or restrictions to which persons of another such description are not made subject or are accorded privileges or advantages which are not accorded to persons of another such description.	Section 38 – Equality (1) Every person has the right to equality before the law. (2) A person must not be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, on the ground of his or her: (a) actual or supposed personal characteristics or circumstances, including race, ethnic origin, colour, place of origin, gender, sexual orientation, birth, primary language, economic status, age or disability; or (b) opinions or beliefs, except to the extent that those opinions or beliefs involve harm to others or the diminution of the rights or freedoms of others; or on any other ground prohibited by this Constitution	Section 26 – Right to equality and freedom from discrimination (1) Every person is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection, treatment and benefit of the law. (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms recognised in this Chapter or any other written law. (3) A person must not be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly on the grounds of his or her— (a) actual or supposed personal characteristics or circumstances, including race, culture, ethnic or social origin, colour, place of origin, sex, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression, birth, primary language, economic or social or health status, disability, age, religion, conscience, marital status or pregnancy; or (b) opinions or beliefs, except to the extent that those opinions or beliefs involve harm to others or the diminution of the rights or freedoms of others, or on any other ground prohibited by this Constitution.

1459

1460

Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma

1461

Methodist church of Fiji
Date: 30-6-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: I acknowledge Reverend Ruben, your lawyer, I welcome you this morning to level nine Suvavou house for this consultation session with the Methodist Church of Fiji or Methodist Church in Fiji. It's a privilege and an honor to be hosting the church, the Methodist Church in Fiji this morning. We had invited this church and we are glad that the church responded positively and that is why you are here this morning.

You will see that there are three commissioners before you this morning. On my right is Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau, on my left is Dr. Neelesh Gounder and I am Sevuloni Valenitabua, the chairperson. For your information, the commissioners were initially appointed by His Excellency the President, were seven in total. One had to resign due to her busy work schedule and work commitment, so we were left with six commissioners. You will see only three of us here. You will see only three of us here this morning. The other three are on their way to Rotuma. They must be in the air by now to go and do consultations in Rotuma. So, the term of reference which were given to us stated that we were to review the 2013 Constitution.

If I may stress at the outset that we are to review the Constitution. We are not to write a new Constitution. In order to review the Constitution, we have visited our people all over the country. We have been to the Lau group, the Lomaiviti group, Vanualevu, around Vitilevu, and adjacent islands. We have collected submissions from our people, and those submissions were recorded and are in our possession now. We anticipate to receive submissions from you gentlemen and lady, and whatever you submit to us this morning shall be recorded.

We will listen and also do our own recording. We will later deliberate on all the submissions, and then we will decide which ones are to be included as our recommendations to His Excellency to be included in the Constitution, the amended Constitution, which we are looking at drafting. With those few words, I welcome you all. I thank you again for your attendance this morning, and I now open the floor for you on behalf of the Methodist Church in Fiji to make your submissions to the commissioners who are present here today.

Rev. Ili Vunisuwai: Our submission on this pre-location we are here in today. We are thankful that you are able to meet yourself and hear from us, and you might probably come in as we proceed with this submission in any relevant issues that we think will be available and exist in our submission today. So, on behalf of our team here, Talatala Qase, Deputy General Secretary Mr. Anil and our Layer Mr. Valenitabua, I would like to thank you again for this opportunity. Now I shall hand over to our submission. Thank you.

Mr. Simione: Chairperson, Constitutional Review Commission, and members of the Constitutional Review Commission. In addition to the acknowledgement and appreciation by the immediate past president of the Methodist Church in Fiji, The Reverend. Ili Vunisuwai, I would like to also thank the commission for giving the Methodist Church in Fiji the opportunity to be heard, to be consulted, and it has also given the opportunity to the church to consult across all 59 divisions of the Methodist Church. A never been done before, staying true to the tradition within the Methodist Church, and we say adopted by the state that everyone must be heard.

The right to be heard is proof of natural justice. The 59 divisions at their annual divisional meetings, usually held between May and June every year, had deliberated on and have sent across to the head office the 12 constitutional pillars made up of the 20 proposals in Section 2 of our submissions. We would like to emphasize that the church, all throughout the 59 divisions, can see and know that God has been taken out of this constitution, the 2013 constitution.

And it is time that it is expressly stated and reinstated as we suggest in the second proposal that the preamble acknowledges God as supreme creator. We are asking the commission to re-look at the 1997 constitution, and look at the preamble therein, and look at the wide consultation that happened throughout 1995 and 1996. Look at the commission's report, and look at the 2013 constitution to verify a statement by the church that God has been taken out of our constitution.

As a supplementary statement to our second proposal in the preamble, we emphasize that there is a need for the commission to look at the coat of arms of the state. The coat of arms of the state is before us, it's in the mic, and those are the words etched in the Bible in 1 Peter 2, verse 17. So, we ask of which God? We ask which king? If our forefathers had put together this coat of arms, had chosen this biblical text to be in our coat of arms of the state, surely, they must have thought that it is worthy that God be the supreme creator, be the God of this nation, be the God in the Bible from which the text is extracted, and the God of the Bible is the God the Father, Jehovah, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

So, with that in mind, we ask the commission to look at the recognition, which is in proposal 1 of our recommendation, that Fiji be recognized as a Christian nation founded on Christian principles. We also suggest and submit that the commission includes the formal recognition of the Holy Bible as a foundational source of moral guidance. Most of the submissions that have come in, all of the submissions that came in, have emphasized this recommendation that Fiji be recognized as a Christian nation founded on Christian principles.

What becomes of other denominations, the submission of the churches, we must retain the understanding and the respect that is enshrined in the Bill of Rights. The freedom of a person to practice his or her religion. The fact that Fiji is recognized, we suggest, with respect, as a Christian nation founded on Christian principles, does not obliviate the respect that needs to be, the tolerance, the religious tolerance that needs to be afforded.

To other denominations, on the recognition of the Holy Bible as a foundational source of moral guidance, we believe that it is the Bible that is the source of all of our laws. As circumstances change, as people develop, then it is now an apt source of moral guidance to supplement the legal guidance of our laws of the state.

The first and second recommendations, we believe, as you will see commissioners, in our drafting, proposed drafting instructions in Schedule 3, we are suggesting that all of these be added or be part of the amendments to the preamble and the foundational clauses of the 2013 amended constitution.

The church acknowledges and accepts that your terms of reference is to review the 2013 constitution. This was what the Supreme Court said and the church respects it. We agree that no one, including the commission, can repeal the 2013 constitution. However, we submit with respect that in your amendment deliberations, due to the voluminous and the various amendments that have come to the commission, we believe that it might be prudent that there can be a whole new constitution in accordance with your mandate as you amend each individual clauses or sections.

Our third recommendation, and this is a majority of the divisions came up, is to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman at the constitutional level. The church believes that it is insufficient that the definition is at the legislative level in the Births and Deaths and Marriages Act because eventually arguments can come on interpretation of the constitution that the right to privacy of what a man and a woman does within the confines of their four walls is a private matter.

We are looking at same-sex marriages, we are looking at LGBTQ plus community. What the church submits is that this needs to be elevated to a constitutional level so that we put it beyond all doubt. If the church submits that this nation be a Christian nation, then all other laws or all other parts of the constitution must uphold Christian principles.

Fourthly is the reinstatement of the great council of chiefs with autonomous powers. The inclusion of the great council of chiefs in the 1997 constitution through wide consultation and to be removed unilaterally without wide consultation like what we are currently doing as a nation in the church's view requires the commission to consider proposing to parliament that the GCC be elevated from the current regulation or subsidiary legislation enactment to the constitution. And this would encompass a number of issues.

The church supports the return of the bicameral parliamentary system, House of Representatives and the Senate. At what composition, we leave it to the state to decide, but what we feel that the bringing back the Senate will ensure that laws that govern affairs of the ITaukei is guarded or goes through rigorous checks and balances in parliament and also the appointment of the selection of the president under the 1997 constitution to be brought back, also the nominees of the GCC into the Senate, the church submits that it must be returned.

So, in number five, our fifth recommendation, I have stated that the church submits or proposes the restoration of the bicameral parliament made up of the House of Representatives and the Senate.

And sixthly, we are submitting that Sunday be recognized as a day of worship and rest with only essential services permitted. We believe that this must be constitutionally enacted because it is an important factor on the essential doctrines of the church. On national identity, majority of the Methodist church divisions submit that all citizens are to be Fijians, the indigenous are to be the ITaukei.

It is a matter of national unity and it brings all races, all denominations, all people of Fiji together as we stand as one people, Fijians. The differentiation will be the indigenous ITaukei. Although a minority of the division submitted that Fijians be left to the indigenous Fijians and for others to be Fiji Islanders as was in the 1997 constitution, but we ask the commission through wider consultation to weigh and then submit to parliament whatever the majority feel should be the position, but the position of the church is that all citizens be Fijians.

Eighthly, we are asking the commission to recommend to parliament that there be a systematic review of all post-pre- and post-2013 decrees that were converted to acts of parliament. One major issue that we are facing in Fiji is the inconsistencies where we most times we jump to section two, to say that since the constitution is the supreme law of the country, this act is invalid. But we believe this should be cleaned up after the constitution is passed by referendum.

Ninthly, the codification of the 2025 supreme court amendment, we are just reminding the commission to recommend to parliament that this needs to be put into the relevant section of the constitution where there are 66% second and third reading in parliament in 50 plus one referendum that has been made law by the supreme court be codified.

Tenth, the membership of the church president, and we are not limiting it to the president, we are also asking the state to look at other heads of denominations to be part of constitutional advisory board for the future especially when we are also suggesting that the constitution be reviewed every 10 years. We looked at the 1990 constitution and we saw that the review period was seven years which led to the constitutional review commission, the Reeves commission in 1995, 1996, they completed their work. So, the proposal from the church is for every 10 years instead of seven and that the commission looks at the 1990 provision on this point.

Eleven we may have to reconsider. We withdraw 11. On 12, service in government, we believe it is ongoing, chaplains of various governmental institutions and we believe that that is sufficient but when we look at the point 14, the 14th proposal is on consultation. We believe that if a Methodist church could be consulted like what the commission has done in this instance in respect of legislative changes in the future.

Only one submission has been made by the church in respect of new legislation coming through and that is the online safety act amendment. The church was requested for their views especially when we look at child pornography and child exploitation. So, we are asking the commission to recommend that in the future that all denominations be invited into this kind of commission, this type of commission for submissions on laws that affect us.

Why we believe that the, going through the Vatuvonu decision versus the Ministry of Education case, it has put it beyond doubt that faith-based organizations, they cannot ever say in what principal or head of school is to be posted to their organizations. It is merit-based. I believe the ministries and the state has an open merit system.

So, all the churches, Methodist churches are asking for is consultation on the right of education, that there be a subsection that allows, that gives the church the right to be consulted in the affairs of faith-based schools. This is looking at not only the Methodist church but look at other denominations as well. Various commissions have been set up under the 2013 constitution and they have clauses or sections that talk about the state, the need for the state to put in place laws and funding in respect of the running, the establishment running in the affairs of commissions.

So, we believe that the faith-based schools need, under the right of education, it needs to be spelled out in the constitution that they are to be consulted. With their agreement, then the posting to the schools can happen. If you look at section 127 of the constitution, the powers of the permanent secretary, the permanent secretary handles the employment matters of the education ministry with the agreement of the minister.

And we are asking that that also includes with the, in consultation with the faith-based schools administrators or for the Methodist church, we have the education secretariat, a specific secretary to education and also the headquarters of the Methodist church. While we are still on education, or still on religion and denominations involvement in the state, the church submits in 19 that there be established a dedicated government portfolio for government community development, religion, and multi-ethnic. That it be up to the state which portfolio the religion be included in, but we see in Papua New Guinea, we see in Singapore, we see many nations in the world have a specific portfolio for the ministry of religion.

Where the state, where the state by cabinet assignment includes this portfolio, it's up to the government of the day. However, we propose two. It's either included as part of the multi-ethnic affairs or it be part of the ministry of youth and sports. Community development, youth, sport, and religion. But it is important that all denominations be covered under the umbrella of this specific portfolio and all matters regarding religion be governed through this ministry. It ensures freedom of religion of all faiths and the faithful is not only protected but actively enabled and enhanced through government policy and programmatic support.

There have been suggestions from the church and it is our submission that there is, as is suggested by the Navatu, Suva, and Nadroga divisions, has always been the church's position on constitutional ban on gambling. And we know there is a gambling act and we know there is also a gaming, a gambling turnover tax act. So, we are asking the, this is something that will need to come on the review of the various laws that were passed post 2000.

I think the gambling act is 2009, but the gambling turnover tax act I think is 91. So, there is a need for review. I think 2015 is currently being, on strengthening village bylaws for ITaukei communal protection, cultural preservation, or in traditional accountability, the church can see that the village is nowhere to be seen in the constitution. And that is the basis of the ITaukei people. All ITaukei people, 280,000 members of the Methodist church, plus between 280,000 to 320,000 members, we all belong to a village. And we submit that the village must be included in the constitution for the village bylaws to be effective and respected.

And this all goes back to corrective measures that we have also suggested, where we need, the state needs to put in place measures of discipline at village level, at education level, in the schools, elsewhere. Corrective measures in our submissions of the church is necessarily for our children. So, to strengthen the village bylaws, the church submits that there needs to be, that the ITaukei communal protection for villages be included in the constitution. The right to informed consent and medical freedom, balanced with public health. It's a, it's a, we understand that it's a tough ask looking at COVID as a case study, but we believe that this, this must be retained. And without informed consent, there should not be any forced medical procedures carried out on a person.

On 18, online protection for children, we are asking that this be constitutionalized as we are suffering from the effects of drugs, coupled with this harmful content and age-inappropriate social media that is engulfing our nation. We are suggesting that this online protection, we support moves, the church support moves for age limit to the opening of social media accounts, and we also support moves for children not to be exposed to such harmful content. Also, part of our submissions, the online safety act review.

And lastly, on the protection of land, fishing rights, indigenous resources and traditional knowledge to be inalienable. We are, the church is submitting that this is basically on ownership. Everyone is the right to use it, but the ownership through owner, user, through processes to be governed by the state, but the ownership of minerals, ownership of the land, the airspace, basically six feet under. Be given to the landowners.

So, on those 20 recommendations, some that have, that are already being enforced in parliament. Our drafting instructions as in schedule three, actually seamlessly weaves these suggestions into the specific sections or chapters of the constitution that we are suggesting that the commission looks at in its amendment processes.

Due to the various recommendations that we have listed in over 10 pages of our submissions, we believe when we turn to the drafting instructions, it narrows down the issues chapter by chapter and section by section. To assist the commission in the overwhelming paperwork that is involved in these consultations. There are other additional supplementary proposals that I will not go into in detail, but they are in addition to the recommendations and they go deeper into explaining the 12 pillars that we have dealt with in our 20 recommendations.

So, to the chairman and the members of the commission, we have now gathered submissions from every division. We have presented the 20 consensus amendments from over 95% of the divisions, 24 supplementary proposals unopposed, one transparently noted divergence on national identity with both majority and minority positions recorded and a clear amend not repeal position.

The Methodist Church in Fiji urges the constitution review commission to adopt the consensus amendments as a package, give serious consideration to the supplementary proposals, note the minority identity position and if possible, conduct further targeted consultation to resolve it on the or allow parliament to decide based on the majority and to reject outright the repeal of the 2013 constitution, only the amendment.

The church believes that Fiji deserves a constitution that honors God, protects the Vanua, unites all citizens and secures a prosperous future for our children.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you Mr. Valenitabua. At the end of every session, we usually have questions to asks the submittees. I will ask my fellow commissioners to asks Questions in relation to the submissions that has been given to us and we may also have questions which are not in your submissions.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you chair, gentlemen, and representatives of the Methodist Church and lady here today, thank you very much for your submission for particularly uplifting for us your consensus proposals, noting the subsequent or supplementary proposals as well as the divergent matter that you've raised as well as highlighting the importance of the submission. Highlighting for us your distinctive proposals.

This is indeed very helpful in assisting us with ascertaining the church's position in supplement to your written submission. Thank you sincerely. I wanted to raise something, wondering whether this may have been part of the supplementary discussions that the church had relating to the Bill of Rights.

We have been having wide consultations as you note across various communities, as well as here in Suva with various bodies and individuals with a wide range of perspectives on the Bill of Rights as it stands in the 2013 constitution. There is, there are submissions recognizing perhaps the broad limitations being placed on these rights, perhaps to put it simply providing rights but in word but not necessarily in substance. And there's also been a note on the progression of the number of rights to include socioeconomic rights for instance to housing to health to social security.

And I was wondering whether socioeconomic rights or related rights relating to the well-being of congregants of the Methodist Church, of course, if they featured in your discussions or what the church's approach might be in terms of the inclusion and recognition of socioeconomic rights, housing, health, sanitation, as well as social security, just as a few examples for your consideration. Thank you. Thank you.

Mr. Simione: I think there should be consideration in respect of socioeconomic rights. And whatever is available in the city, water, electricity, and this is across all rural areas, not only in iTaukei villages but also in the indo-Fijian villages. Whatever is available to someone who is living in the city must be available also to someone in the village. So, we are looking at adequate sanitation, we are looking at sewage services, waste care, waste management systems, appropriate waste management systems to be in place, and the general well-being of a village, a rural area should be the same as the general well-being of a person in the city. It's not difficult, and the constitution must uphold that. On the limitation of certain rights, we believe that the commission is well equipped to understand these limitations and how these limitations need to be curtailed, or the limitations to remain in the constitution insofar as individual rights are concerned.

Rev.Ili Vunisuwai: Thank you. Right now, in the constitution, I don't see any clear demarcation of individual rights versus the communal rights and increased stability. Is there anything in the constitution that upholds a clear demarcation of rights in between the personal, individual, and community rights? Likewise, I would like, if there is a possibility of including in the constitution, let's take for example sewage in villages.

You may be aware that many of our villages in Fiji, of which the majority are Methodist, still, it's in a pit toilet. That's what Mr. Valenitabua has just raised. It's in towns and cities, so why not in the villages? Are they excluded? The majority of our members are out there in the village.

And what is the government doing in terms of constitution? Where is, in the constitution, that's right, the health development of our people in the outer islands as well as in the villages? If that could be part of the constitutional review, it would be much better. Thank you.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Chairman, and thank you members of the Methodist Church for your submission this morning. I must also acknowledge the comprehensive submission that the Methodist Church has made this morning, including the level of consultation that we have held within the church and the different divisions that make up the church. And this is commendable. This provides us with a very good picture of where the submission is coming from, and I want to thank you for that. Just on the last note, we have had a lot of discussion and debate around some of the rights, for example, right to housing and sanitation, right to adequate food and water.

We heard this a lot during the consultation for the formulation of the national development plan as well, and I'm not going to defend the government, but what I will say is that the national development plan recognizes these provisions in the constitution and makes very strong policy recommendations on ensuring that we expand the right to food and water as well as sanitation, both in urban and rural areas. Realistically speaking, it is usually a process over time in terms of allocation of resources, etc., but your point is taken very seriously in terms of the lack of sanitation and water in rural areas.

40% of people in rural areas still don't have access to clean water, and that is something that has been well recognized in the plan, and the plan provides a strategy as to how the government is going to expand these services for the next five years, but a lot of work still needs to be done, and this is a serious issue. We'll see how we can push this through the constitutional provision. We are considering that very seriously.

We have received the same submission this morning from the Fiji Council of Churches. We have received similar submissions from around the country as well, so thank you very much for highlighting this. We are going to look at this issue very seriously and how we can, through the provision of the constitution, make a further push for this right to be realized on the ground. While it appears here, we don't see this right materializing on the ground. Even access to transportation is an issue in many rural areas. Twenty years ago, we used to have regular bus services.

Now there is no transportation. People don't have a mechanism to travel, so you may have good health centers, but if the transportation is not there, then you are not able to access the right to healthcare as well because transportation is lacking, so these are some of the things the commission is going to consider very seriously. I also wanted to highlight on point number 14, which is the consultation with faith-based school administration.

I think that is a very important point. I was the chairman of the Sangam Education Board, and I also used to head the faith-based schools' organization which Methodist Church was a member of, Catholic Church was a member of as well, and we made this recommendation to the Ministry of Education that there must be a consultation with the school management. We used to have this, but it seems that things have gone backwards, so we will see how we can enforce this particular submission that you have raised today, what would be the appropriate mechanism through which we can make this provision.

We have seen conflicts arising because of lack of consultation between the Ministry of Education and the school management. The Education Act, which has just been revised and passed by Parliament a few weeks ago, makes some provision for consultation with the school management and the school committees. We will look at how we can strengthen this provision that you have highlighted, but it's a very important point and it's taken on board.

Point number 18, the online protection, a very important submission as well. The Online Safety Act is being revised at the moment, so that provides an opportunity for the church to make submissions as to how we can incorporate there, but if you're asking for constitutional provision, we will see what we can do here. We already have a very strong, in my view, Bill of Rights for children.

For example, if you look at section 41.1D, it talks about protection of children from abuse. It can be amended to include online abuse, because at the moment it's mostly of the physical nature of the abuse. And as societies and economies change over time, our mode of interaction changes, therefore the way we do things changes as well.

So, we strongly take that submission as well, apart from physical abuse, how can we protect our children from online abuse. We have also received submissions around age-inappropriate social media. The government currently is looking at a bill which will ban social media for children below a particular age threshold, so work is in progress and the church could find out an opportunity to make a submission there as well, but we will certainly take on board these submissions. Finally, thank you very much for your submission this morning. Affirming that no one is above the law. That is the proposal from the church members.

And I just wanted to highlight that there has been a lot of submissions on the immunity clause. The church is in support of the removal of the immunity clause as a detriment to future illegal overthrow of government. In fact, we are concerned about that, and I think it is well taken. Coups in itself is a form of robbery and violence, the highest form, and we don't want to rear our children to experience this once again in our future generations. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, Dr. Gounder. Thank you, Ms. Nailatikau. I have listened to the oral submissions made on behalf of the Methodist Church in Fiji this morning. I'll just go through your recommendations. I'll start with number four, the reinstatement of the Great Council of Chiefs with autonomous powers. That is a submission which has been repeated over and over again all over the places where we have been to.

So, there is a general strong call for the return of the Great Council of Chiefs, together with its membership and together with its purpose. And for the itaukei, the main purpose is for the GCC, or the Great Council of Chiefs, or the BLV, to be the watchdog over matters or issues that involve iTaukei's. Now, that does not exclude others from the watchful eyes of the chiefs.

The chiefs, as we know, look around and they also watch over issues that are raised in relation to the other ethnic groups which we have here in Fiji. That would follow with the Senate, which is number five. That goes with the Senate, number five.

These two were raised together. Bring in the GCC and also reinstate the Senate so that members from the GCC could also sit in the Senate. There have been submissions which oppose the return or the reinstatement of the Senate, but we will have a deliberation on that and we will see how to go about this issue, the return of the Senate.

The national identity, another hot issue. There have been suggestions and recommendations from grassroots people, our people, that the name Fijian be for iTaukei only, for natives. I'm hearing the church, which has the majority members of iTaukei's, welcoming the use of the word Fijian or the name Fijian for all citizens of the country.

Do you confirm that?

Mr. Simione: Yes.
Rev.Ili Vunisuwai: Yes.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. So, it's something that we will consider very, very well. We will properly consider it. And I thank the church for this stance.

The codifying of the 2025 Supreme Court amendment resolves. Yes, that would have to be done because the Supreme Court had even rewritten the section 160, I think, the amendment. They had rewritten it in their judgment, in the opinion. So that has to be uplifted from the opinion of the Supreme Court to the Constitution itself. You know, reducing 75 percent to two third and also the 50 plus one percent for the referendum. That is within the judgment or the opinion. It just has to be codified into the Constitution as part of the amendment. And bylaws, village bylaws, a new issue.

This is a new matter which has been raised by the church. We have been asked over and over again that village bylaws be introduced over and over again. Now we are being told that or we are being asked to consider putting something about villages into the Constitution.

So, we constitutionalize the village itself because that is where the communities live, the villages. And we thank the church for that. This is the first time it has been raised with us.

We have been looking at customary laws. In our term of reference, we have been told to look at customary laws, if you could include it, if you can include it in the 2013 Constitution. Now, under customary laws, we might have to put villages, which has been suggested to us this morning.

We will consider that during the deliberations. When we put in customary laws, then we look at everything about it, okay, culture, tradition, handicraft, and so forth, together, under the customary laws, including the villages. But we will see how we can codify the village setting into the Constitution.

The portfolio for community development, religion, and multi-ethnic affairs, we used to have them, the Department of Multi-Ethnic Affairs or the Ministry. It's still a ministry. So maybe we can add that.

Maybe we can add that or the laws, the powers that be, they can add community development and religion into multi-ethnic affairs. Protection of land, qoliqoli, indigenous resources, and traditional knowledge to be inalienable. Yes, a lot of submissions have been given to us in relation to the land, ownership, qoliqoli ownership, and ownership of minerals under the soil.

Like I heard your lawyer stating, from the sky down to the middle of the earth, that is what we have been told to consider putting into land ownership. Section 29 or Section 28 deals with ownership of ITaukei land. That is all. All native lands are owned by ITaukei, but nothing in relation to the qoliqoli, and the minerals are owned by the state, as we now know. qoliqoli is owned by the state. We only have user rights.

So, thank you very much for that, for that submission on paragraph 20. In relation to the last point that was raised, the immunity, in your proposal number 14, the church has submitted that the immunity clause be removed from the 2013 Constitution and that we prohibit its inclusion in future constituencies, affirming that no one is above the law. A lot of submissions have been given to us in relation to that, and we welcome this from the church. However, there is something that we have to think about. Number one is this. The immunity clause is there, and it covers our soldiers, and our police officers, and our prison officers, and our public servants. The judges themselves did not dare touch the immunity. This is the judges in the Supreme Court. From what I remember of what they wrote down in the statement, in the judgment, they said it's better not to look back and cause trouble. Rather, we have to look forward and live in peace and progress. I believe we all know what that means. If we remove the immunity clause or we touch the immunity clause, then we might be causing trouble because some of those who are covered are still alive and well today.

So, it has been suggested to us that we look forward, make a law that from now on, from the date of the amended Constitution onwards, if there is any other coup d'etat or any other serious offense, then no immunity is to be given. That is an alternative to removing the immunity clause, but we will see what we can do about the immunity clause. We are looking at democratic living.

We are looking at peaceful living. We are looking at multiracialism and all that. We are looking at social inclusiveness.

Do we want to shake the tree? That is a question that is at the back of our minds right now. Now, that is just a summary or some comments in relation to your proposals and your recommendations this morning. Does anyone else have anything that you would like to add after hearing me?

Mr. Simione: Thank you, Chairman. On the removal of the immunity clause, that is a proposal, but how it is going to be codified, we are leaving it to the Commission to look at the words that need to be put in the recommendation. We accept the fact that the Supreme Court has expressed reservations. However, the thinking behind this from the Church is that it is inclusion in the future. We are looking to the future. Most of our members are also members of the security forces, and we had expressly stated the prohibition of its inclusion in the future. We are looking at ways in which we can live together peacefully for the future and not shake the tree.

That is something that we leave to the Commission and to government when considering the draft constitution. On behalf of the Methodist Church in Fiji, we pray that your deliberations will be fruitful in the next few weeks as you draw close to your due date. We hope and pray that God will continue to grant you good health and the knowledge and the wisdom in order to carry out your work as a commissioner and your mandate from the State. With those words, we have no further submissions to make, and we thank you, sir and madam.

Mr. Valenitabua: I now bring this consultation session to the end and to a close, but before I close, the Church might be wondering what will happen after this. We've had consultations all around Fiji.

We have about two weeks ahead of us to complete the consultations here at level nine, and then we will be sitting down for deliberations. What happens during the deliberations, we will collate or our lawyers are now collating all the submissions from all over the country, and it's a tough job they're doing. And after that, we will have the submissions analyzed, and then we will identify the themes and issues which need to be addressed and which might be included in the constitution, as is the amended constitution.

We are also required by His Excellency to write a report and recommendations, and in addition to the recommendations, we are going to be drafting an amended constitution so that the recommendations can be reflected in the draft. Now, all these three documents, the report, the recommendations, and the draft constitution will then be presented to His Excellency on the 31st of August, 2026. We'll be joined by a constitutional legal drafter soon.

We have met with our constitutional lawyer from Australia. He has gone back and will return to Fiji sometime soon. We'll be working together, together with other lawyers in Fiji, and then after we have submitted our report and our recommendations and the amended constitution to His Excellency, the President, he will then give the amended constitution to the government, to cabinet.

The government will then prepare papers in the form which is suitable for presentation to Parliament, and your lawyer might have advised you that when it reaches Parliament, there will be three readings. The first reading in Parliament is usually just an introduction of the bill introducing the amended constitution. The second reading and the third readings are the most important ones, because in the second reading there will be some debate between opposition and government.

They will scrutinize this bill. Similarly, with the third reading. Now, in the second reading, after they had debated or talked about it, they will have to vote whether they agree that they should pass this to the third reading, pass the amended constitution, the draft of it to the third reading.

Two-thirds need to vote for that, in favor of it. If the two-thirds of the members of Parliament vote in favor, then the bill will proceed to the third reading. At the third reading, same thing, they might review it again, because the bill would have gone through the select committee and other committees. They would review it and then again vote. If two-thirds vote in favor, then the bill proceeds further. That is when it will come back to the people through the form of a referendum.

We are hoping that only one question will be on the referendum paper, and the question would be, do you agree that this amended constitution should become law of this country, the supreme law of the country? And people would have to take yes or no. If the majority of the people who ticked, not registered, who ticked, if the majority of them say yes, then we will have a new constitution or an amended constitution. However, if the majority decide to tick no, then we will have to stay with the 2013 constitution as it is now.

So, we are hoping that we will finish our work on the 31st of August. The rest would be left to the politicians to continue with the work and hopefully pass the constitution as an amended constitution of the 2013 one. That is where we are heading, for the church's information and for you gentlemen, so that your lawyer might have explained this to you, but you are hearing it from the commission now.

Now, with that explanation, and I thank you again for this morning, the comprehensive submission as Dr. Gounder has stated, and the new issues which have been raised. We are going to be deliberating and we will consider them. With those few words, we thank you very much, and I bring this consultation session to a close. Thank you.

----------End of Session [30-6-2026] ----------

Methodist Church in Fiji and Rotuma (MCIF)

FORMAL WRITTEN SUBMISSION TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW COMMISSION

UNIFIED RECOMMENDATIONS FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE 2013 CONSTITUTION

Submitted to the Standing Committee of the MCIF

Finalised: 30 June 2026

1. Summary

a. Pursuant to the authority and resolution of the May Standing Committee meeting, the MCIF has now completed its consultation across all 59 divisions. [See Schedule 1 for the Submissions by each division that were received by the MCIF Headquarters].

b. Overwhelming unity exists on 19 core constitutional amendments, supported by more than 95% of divisions, which collectively codify the 12 Constitutional Pillars of the MCIF. These include:

   i. Fiji as a Christian Nation founded on Christian principles.

   ii. Preamble acknowledging God as Supreme Creator, and acknowledging the 1874 Deed of Cession, with specific biblical reference (Philippians 2:10-11).

   iii. Constitutional definition of marriage as one man and one woman.

   iv. Reinstatement of the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC) and a bicameral Parliament (House of Representatives plus Senate).

   v. Sunday observance as a day of worship and rest.

   vi. Systematic review of all pre-2013 decrees and laws converted into Acts to be consistent with the new Constitution to be enacted including citizenship granted during the period post-2000 and pre-2013 Constitution.

   vii. Democratic amendment thresholds (66% Parliament + 50%+1 referendum).

   viii. Strengthened village by-laws, medical freedom, online child protection, ban on casinos, return of church-run schools, and many more.

c. One issue remains where a minority of divisions hold a different view: the use of the term "Fijian".

   i. Majority position: "Fijian" as a common civic identity for all citizens; "iTaukei" for indigenous people.

   ii. Minority position: "Fijian" reserved exclusively for iTaukei; all citizens collectively "Fiji Islanders" for international representation.

d. The MCIF's official submission adopts the majority compromise wording but respectfully records the minority view and invites the CRC to consider both options through further consultation.

e. The Church's official position remains amendment of the 2013 Constitution, not repeal as was held by the Supreme Court in the 2013 Constitution reference although as a Schedule to the enabling Act, amendment of the 2013 Constitution could also mean a total substitution of the 2013 Constitution with the amended Constitution the CRC is holding consultations over.

f. The consultation process has been enriched by contributions from theological scholarship and grassroots reflection, including from the Davuilevu Theological College community. Their collective wisdom—particularly the articulation of the "three-legged stool" framework of leadership (Traditional, Religious, and Government) articulated by Ratu Sir Lala Sukuna, the call for a Treaty safeguarding landowners modelled on the Treaty of Waitangi, the removal of the immunity clause, the recognition of 12 October 1835 as the foundational date of Christianity in Fiji, and the requirement that leaders of the nation be persons of integrity with a clean record—is expressly woven into the pillars and drafting instructions below.

2. Core Consensus Recommendations (Supported by >95% of Divisions)

The following 20 proposals reflect the 12 Constitutional Pillars, forming a comprehensive national framework that is God-centred, indigenous-secure, and united.

	RECOMMENDATION	[illegible]
1	Fiji recognised as a Christian Nation founded on Christian principles (as per Pillar 1 of the Church's 12 Pillars), inclusive of the formal recognition of the Holy Bible as a foundational source of moral guidance.	All
2	Preamble: acknowledge God as Supreme Creator, the 1874 Deed of Cession, and include Philippians 2:10-11 (Suva and Nadroga).	All
3	Define marriage as union of one man and one woman (constitutional level).	All
4	Reinstatement of the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC) with autonomous powers.	All
5	Restore bicameral Parliament: House of Representatives + Senate.	Lautoka, Suva, Nadroga
6	Sunday as recognised day of worship and rest (essential services permitted).	Bau, Makoi, Nadroga
7	National identity: majority position - all citizens "Fijian"; indigenous "iTaukei" (compromise wording below). Minority position recorded separately.	Majority: Bau, Suva, Vatukarasa, etc. Minority: Nadroga
8	Systematic review of all post-2013 decrees converted into Acts.	All

	RECOMMENDATION	SUPPORTING MCIF DIVISIONS
9	Codify 2025 Supreme Court amendment thresholds (66% Parliament + 50% +1 referendum).	Bau, Beqa, Nausori, Nadroga
10	MCIF President to be member of any Constitutional Advisory Board.	Lautoka, Nadroga
11	Religious membership certificate as optional employment reference.	Lautoka, Vatukarasa
12	Methodist ministers may serve in government frameworks, with fair support.	Lautoka
13	Constitutional ban on casinos and gambling.	Navatu, Suva, Nadroga
14	The Ministry of Education must consult Faith-based school administration and the Education Secretariat of the MCIF specifically, in matters concerning the affairs of the schools. Case on point - Vatuvonu v Ministry of Education.	Nabukebuke, Nausori, Suva
15	Parliamentary sessions to begin with Christian prayer (with respect for other faiths).	Serua, Suva
16	Strengthen village by-laws for iTaukei communal protection, cultural preservation, order, and traditional accountability.	Vatukarasa, Suva, Nadroga
17	Right to informed consent and medical freedom, balanced with public health.	Suva, Raiwaqa, Nadroga
18	Online protection for children: restricts harmful content, pornography, age-inappropriate social media.	Suva, Raiwaqa, Nadroga
19	Establish a dedicated government portfolio for Community Development, Religion, and Multi-Ethnic Affairs either as a standalone Ministry... or by incorporating these responsibilities into the existing Ministry... This will ensure that the freedom of religion of all faiths and the faithful is not only protected but actively enabled and enhanced through government policy and programmatic support.	Suva
20	Protection of land, qoliqoli, indigenous resources, and traditional knowledge inalienable.	All, strongly emphasised by Nadroga

Compromise wording for national identity (majority position)

Accepted by Bau, Suva, Vatukarasa, and over 20 divisions:

> "All citizens of Fiji share the common civic identity of 'Fijian' (Kai Viti). The indigenous people of Fiji, who are the original inhabitants and traditional owners of the land, are recognised as 'iTaukei' a term denoting their ancestral, customary, and spiritual connection to the vanua. Nothing in this provision shall prevent any citizen from identifying with their ethnic, cultural, or religious heritage."

Minority position (Nadroga)

Reserve "Fijian" exclusively for iTaukei; use "Fiji Islanders" for all citizens in international representation.

The MCIF does not reject this out of hand but notes that the majority favours the compromise wording. We ask the CRC to test both through broader consultation. The MCIF acknowledges the Nadroga Division's proposal that while 'Fijian' remains a civic identity, 'Fiji Islanders' be adopted as the formal designation for all citizens when representing Fiji internationally, providing a practical, unifying bridge for national identity.

3. Divisions' Distinctive Contributions

Majority of the submissions by the divisions reinforce and add clarity to several areas:

i. Explicit constitutional recognition of the Holy Bible as a foundational source of moral guidance.

ii. "Fiji Islanders" for external representation - a practical solution that may complement the domestic identity debate.

iii. A SWOT analysis (already present in Suva and Nadroga's submission) - useful for the CRC's process planning. [See Schedule 2 herein]

iv. Strong emphasis on collective rights of indigenous people as distinct from individual rights.

v. Clarity on village by-laws operating in harmony with constitutional human rights protections - addressing a potential concern.

All of these have been incorporated into the consensus table or the supplementary list below.

Theological and Historical Frameworks

The MCIF's submission is further strengthened by the following frameworks and proposals, which emerged from the consultation process and are now adopted as part of the Church's unified position:

CONTRIBUTION	DETAILS
i. The Three-Legged Stool Framework	This framework - articulated by Ratu Sir Lala Sukuna - recognises the distinct yet complementary responsibilities of Traditional Leaders (stewardship of the vanua), Religious Leaders (guidance of the faith community), and Government Leaders (administration of the State). Each sphere must be clearly demarcated yet work in harmony for the service of the people, safeguarding the image and dignity of leadership across all domains. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
ii. Treaty of Waitangi Model	The MCIF recommends the establishment of a Treaty safeguarding landowners, modelled on the Treaty of Waitangi in New Zealand, to guarantee equity for landowners in all matters of land and resource use. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
iii. Historical Recognition	The MCIF calls for constitutional recognition of 12 October 1835 as the date of the arrival of Christianity in Fiji, acknowledging the foundational contribution of Methodist missionaries in both pre-colonial and post-colonial Fiji. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
iv. Governance Integrity	The MCIF affirms that no one is above the law, that the immunity clause must be removed, and that leaders of the nation must be persons of integrity with a clean record. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College and the Nadroga Division)
v. Periodic Review	The MCIF proposes a mandatory constitutional review every 10 years to ensure relevance and responsiveness to the changing needs of the nation. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
vi. Presidential Pardon at Jubilee	The MCIF proposes institutionalising the Presidential Pardon to be exercised at every national Jubilee, reflecting the biblical principle of restoration and grace. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
vii. Gender and Citizenship	The MCIF affirms the constitutional recognition of only two sexual genders (Male and Female) and calls for a review of the definition of citizenship, particularly regarding dual citizenship. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
viii. Mineral Rights	The MCIF proposes the return of ownership of natural minerals, both above and below six feet of land, to the landowners. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
ix. Corrective Behaviour Management	The MCIF proposes the introduction of Corrective Behaviour Management (CBM) as a recognised form of discipline for children, promoting restorative and constructive approaches. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)

CONTRIBUTION	DETAILS
x. Qoliqoli Bill	The MCIF calls for the re-tabling of the Qoliqoli Bill for national discussion and inclusion in the Constitution, extending its scope beyond reef boundaries to its offshore origin, ensuring equitable stewardship of marine resources. (proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
xi. Ministry of Community Development, Religion, and Multi-Ethnic Affairs	The MCIF calls for a dedicated government portfolio to protect, enable, and enhance freedom of religion for all faiths. (proposed by Suva)

4. Additional Supplementary Proposals (Unopposed, for CRC Consideration)

These come from Suva, Vatukarasa, Nadroga, and others; no division opposes them.

	PROPOSAL	SOURCE DIVISION
1	Reduce presumption of death from 7 to 5 years.	(proposed by Suva Division)
2	Special marriage license to waive 21-day notice period in compassionate circumstances.	(proposed by Suva Division)
3	Forfeiture of retirement benefits for convicted former Presidents and Prime Ministers.	(proposed by Suva Division - Raiwai)
4	Recognition of customary iTaukei land-use transfers (non-lease) where ownership remains with the landowning unit.	(proposed by Suva Division - Raiwai)
5	Right to access government information, subject only to reasonable limitations.	(proposed by Suva Division - Raiwaqa)
6	Digital privacy and data protection, including protection against unlawful surveillance and misuse of personal information.	(proposed by Suva Division - Raiwaqa)

	PROPOSAL	SOURCE (PROPOSER)
7	Whistleblower protection for those who report corruption, abuse of power, or unlawful conduct in good faith.	(proposed by Suva Division - Raiwaqa)
8	Right to good administration - lawful, reasonable, efficient, and procedurally fair administrative action.	(proposed by Suva Division - Raiwaqa)
9	Future generations clause - State obligation to safeguard the interests of future generations in managing natural resources and democratic institutions.	(proposed by Suva Division - Raiwaqa, and Nadroga Division)
10	Rights of persons with disabilities - full and effective participation on an equal basis, with State promotion of accessibility and inclusive education.	(proposed by Suva Division - Raiwaqa)
11	Parental right to reasonable discipline (not cruel or demeaning) - parents recognised as primary caregivers and educators.	(proposed by Vatukarasa Division, and Suva Division - Raiwaqa)
12	Recognition of the Holy Bible as a foundational source of moral guidance for leadership, governance, and national development.	(proposed by Nadroga Division)
13	"Fiji Islanders" for external / international state representation, complementing the domestic identity debate.	(proposed by Suva Division - Raiwaqa, and Nadroga Division)
14	Remove the immunity clause from the 2013 Constitution and prohibit its inclusion in future constitutions, affirming that no one is above the law.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
15	Establish a Treaty safeguarding landowners, modelled on the Treaty of Waitangi in New Zealand, to guarantee equity for landowners in all matters of land and resource use.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
16	Mandate a constitutional review every 10 years to ensure relevance and responsiveness to the changing needs of the nation.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
17	Empower the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC) to nominate candidates for the Presidency of the Republic of Fiji.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
18	Institutionalise the Presidential Pardon to be exercised at every national Jubilee, reflecting the biblical principle of restoration and grace.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)

	PROPOSAL	SOURCE (PROPOSED)
19	Return ownership of natural minerals (above and below six feet of land) to the landowners, recognising traditional and collective rights to all resources within customary boundaries.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
20	Constitutionally recognise only two sexual genders: Male and Female.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
21	Introduce Corrective Behaviour Management (CBM) as a recognised form of discipline for children, promoting restorative and constructive approaches that respect the dignity of the child.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
22	Re-table the Qoliqoli Bill for national discussion and inclusion in the Constitution, extending its scope beyond reef boundaries to its offshore origin, ensuring equitable stewardship of marine resources.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
23	Recognise 12 October 1835 as the foundational date of the arrival of Christianity in Fiji, acknowledging the contribution of Methodist missionaries in both pre-colonial and post-colonial Fiji.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College)
24	Establish a dedicated government portfolio for Community Development, Religion, and Multi-Ethnic Affairs... to ensure that the freedom of religion of all faiths and the faithful is not only protected but actively enabled and enhanced through government policy, programmatic support, and interfaith engagement.	(proposed by Davuilevu Theological College and Suva)

5. Clarification on "Repeal vs. Amend"

The overwhelming majority of divisions support amendment. The MCIF's official position remains: The 2013 Constitution shall be amended, not repealed. In amending the same, the MCIF acknowledges and supports the wide-consultation of the CRC, and prays as a Church for God's steady guidance and protection over your lives, your families and your processes.

6. Conclusion and Request

a. The MCIF has now gathered submissions from every division. We present:
   i. 19 consensus amendments (supported by >95% of divisions);

ii. Over 24 supplementary proposals (unopposed);

iii. One transparently noted divergence (national identity) with both majority and minority positions recorded; and

iv. A clear amend not repeal position.

b. We urge the Constitution Review Committee to:

i. Adopt the consensus amendments as a package.

ii. Give serious consideration to the supplementary proposals.

iii. Note the minority identity position and, if possible, conduct further targeted consultation to resolve it or allow Parliament to decide based on the majority.

iv. Reject outright the repeal of the 2013 Constitution.

c. Fiji deserves a Constitution that honours God, protects the Vanua, unites all citizens, and secures a prosperous future for every child.

Vinaka vakalevu. God bless Fiji.

Signed:

Rev. Dr Jolami Lasawa
General Secretary, MCIF

30/06/2026.

SCHEDULE 1 - SUBMISSIONS FROM ALL DIVISIONS

[Copies of original division submissions to be inserted as appendices]

SCHEDULE 2 - SWOT ANALYSIS

To ensure this review process remains verifiable and realistic, we present a structural assessment of the current constitutional review environment:

STRENGTHS	WEAKNESSES
• Broad-based consultation executed through established vanua, church networks, and local communities. • High levels of engagement from diverse social stakeholders. • Ready availability of technical and constitutional legal expertise. • Expanding public and civic awareness regarding critical constitutional issues.	• Compressed timelines allocated for comprehensive national consultation. • Structural inability to exhaustively review every provision of the 2013 text. • Insufficient public literacy regarding highly complex constitutional and legal matters. • Direct resource and budgetary constraints limiting rural outreach.
OPPORTUNITIES	THREATS
• Mobilising massive grassroots and church-level civic participation. • An unprecedented window to permanently solidify indigenous rights and traditional structures. • The historic opportunity to constitutionally reaffirm Fiji's core Christian identity. • The structural opportunity to restore the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC) as the highest autonomous traditional authority, ensuring a bicameral legislative balance that protects indigenous governance. • Utilising oral and written submissions to deepen long-term civic engagement.	• External disruptions including natural disasters, economic volatility, or public health emergencies. • Political polarisation or organized misinformation undermining public trust. • External geopolitical influences or conflicting treaty obligations disrupting local sovereignty. • Electoral shifts resulting in an abrupt change of government, leading to the dissolution of the commission and cancellation of recommendations.

SCHEDULE 3: DRAFTING INSTRUCTIONS

The MCIF have prepared the following Drafting Instructions to assist the Constitutional Review Commission (CRC) in translating the 12 Constitutional Pillars into formal, enforceable constitutional provisions. These instructions are designed to be presented as a formal attachment to the Methodist Church in Fiji's (MCIF) submission.

Subject: Instructions for the amendment of the 2013 Constitution of the Republic of Fiji to reflect the 12 Constitutional Pillars of the MCIF.

I. Preamble and Foundational Clauses

a. Directive: Amend the Preamble to explicitly acknowledge the sovereignty of Almighty God over the Republic of Fiji.

b. Specific Inclusion: Incorporate the text of Philippians 2:10-11 as a foundational spiritual declaration.

c. Legal Recognition: Insert a provision recognising the Holy Bible as a foundational source of moral guidance for the interpretation of national laws, leadership, and public policy, while maintaining the separation of church and state in administrative governance.

d. Historical Recognition: Insert a provision in the preamble or elsewhere in the text recognising 12 October 1835 as the date of the arrival of Christianity in Fiji, and acknowledging the foundational contribution of Methodist missionaries in both pre-colonial and post-colonial Fiji.

II. Indigenous Rights and National Identity

a. Status: Codify the status of the i Taukei as the indigenous people of Fiji, possessing collective, permanent, and inalienable rights to their land, qoliqoli, and natural resources.

b. Identity Nomenclature: Amend the definition of "Fijian" to denote the i Taukei. For all external/ international state representation, adopt the designation "Fiji Islander." Ensure the Constitution explicitly permits all citizens to maintain their specific ethnic, cultural, and religious identities alongside this civic designation.

c. Treaty Safeguarding Landowners: Establish a Treaty safeguarding landowners, modelled on the Treaty of Waitangi in New Zealand, to guarantee equity for landowners in all matters of land and resource use, ensuring that systemic injustices against indigenous landowners are abolished.

III. Traditional Institutions and Legislative Architecture

a. Restoration of the GCC: Amend the Constitution to reinstate the Great Council of Chiefs (Bose Levu Vakaturaga) as an autonomous, constitutionally protected body. Define its mandate to include advising the State on all legislation affecting indigenous affairs, customs, and traditional governance. Empower the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC) to nominate candidates for the Presidency of the Republic of Fiji.

b. Bicameralism: Repeal the current unicameral system and establish a bicameral Parliament consisting of:

   i. House of Representatives: Elected via democratic suffrage.

   ii. Senate: Comprising representatives who provide oversight on indigenous and national heritage matters.

c. Periodic Constitutional Review: Insert a provision mandating a constitutional review every 10 years to ensure the Constitution remains relevant and responsive to the evolving needs of the nation.

IV. Family, Social Values, and Digital Protections

a. Marriage: Amend the Constitution to define marriage exclusively as the union of one man and one woman.

b. Parental Rights: Explicitly protect the right of parents as the primary caregivers and educators of their children.

c. Corrective Behaviour Management (CBM): Authorise Parliament to introduce and regulate Corrective Behaviour Management as a recognised form of discipline for children, promoting restorative and constructive approaches that respect the dignity of the child.

d. Digital Safeguards: Authorise Parliament to enact specific legislation restricting children's access to pornography and harmful social media content, ensuring child protection is a constitutionally recognized state interest.

V. Medical Freedom and Integrity

a. Bodily Autonomy: Insert a guarantee of "Informed Consent" as a fundamental right regarding any medical intervention.

b. Protections: Constitutionally recognise the right of citizens to make medical decisions based on religious convictions or legitimate medical exemptions, ensuring that public health responses are proportionate, evidence-based, and respect individual dignity.

VI. Integrity and Independent Institutions

a. Governance: Reinforce the independence of the Judiciary, Electoral Commission, and Anti-Corruption agencies.

b. Public Stewardship: Codify that public office is a trust, requiring the exercise of integrity, honesty, and accountability as fundamental legal duties.

c. Removal of Immunity Clause: Remove the immunity clause from the 2013 Constitution and prohibit its inclusion in future constitutions, affirming that no one is above the law.

d. Leadership Integrity: Require that leaders of the nation be persons of integrity with a clean record, embodying the principles of honesty, accountability, and service.

e. Three-Legged Stool Framework: Recognise the distinct yet complementary responsibilities of Traditional Leaders (stewardship of the vanua), Religious Leaders (guidance of the faith community), and Government Leaders (administration of the State). Each sphere of leadership should be clearly demarcated to ensure roles do not overlap or conflict unnecessarily. Their sole basis of integration is their shared service to the people of Fiji, thereby safeguarding the dignity and image of leadership across all domains.

f. Ministry of Community Development, Religion, and Multi-Ethnic Affairs: The CRC is instructed to consider, and the MCIF recommends, the establishment of a dedicated government portfolio whether as a standalone Ministry... or by incorporating these responsibilities into the existing Ministry... The purpose of this portfolio is to ensure that the freedom of religion of all faiths and the faithful is not only constitutionally protected but actively enabled and enhanced through government policy, programmatic support, interfaith dialogue, and community development initiatives.

VII. Jubilee and Restoration

a. Presidential Pardon: Institutionalise the Presidential Pardon to be exercised at every national Jubilee, reflecting the biblical principle of restoration, grace, and national reconciliation apart from the continuous exercise of pardon in the current legal framework.

b. Qoliqoli Bill: Authorise Parliament to re-table and enact the Qoliqoli Bill, extending its scope beyond reef boundaries to its offshore origin, ensuring equitable stewardship of marine resources.

c. Mineral Rights: Return ownership of natural minerals, both above and below six feet of land, to the landowners, recognising their traditional and collective rights to all resources within their customary boundaries.

Note on Implementation: To facilitate the CRC's work, the MCIF recommends that the CRC utilises structural comparisons to understand how the current unicameral system limits the checks and balances necessary for the indigenous protections the MCIF advocates. These drafting instructions provide the CRC with a clear, legal roadmap. When implemented, they will transition the MCIF's 12 Pillars from a set of communal aspirations into a verifiable legal framework that aligns with the principles of constitutional democracy.

Electoral Commission (EC)& Fijian Elections Office (FEO)

Election and Electrol Commission
Date-30-6-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: Ladies and gentlemen, members of the Electoral Commission, I believe, Elections Office, thank you very much for this afternoon, for attending before the Constitution Review Commission. We welcome you. We know that you are here in full force, and we are happy about that.

We anticipate that we will be hearing significant submissions from the Commission this afternoon. Before you this afternoon are three Commissioners, in Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau on my right, and Dr. Neelesh Gounder on my left. I am the Chairperson, Sevuloni Valenitabua

The Commission initially consisted of seven Commissioners, and one had resigned due to work commitment. So, six of us were left. There are three here this afternoon, and three have just landed on the island of Rotuma to go and do consultations there with a team from the Secretariat.

The Commission, as you might have known, was appointed by His Excellency the President to review the 2013 Constitution. We have been asked questions along the way whether we can change, we can remove the 2013 Constitution and write a new one. Unfortunately, we do not have that mandate. Our terms of reference do not allow us to do that. Going by the Constitution, review means we can amend. So that is what we are looking at, to produce an amended Constitution for the country.

One of the terms of reference was for the Commission to go around the country and collect submissions, views and submissions and recommendations from members of the nation, from the citizens, from the grassroots people of our nation, so that we can have varying views and recommendations about what should be and what should not be in the amended Constitution. That piece of terms of reference has taken us through the Lau group, the Lomaiviti group, Vanua Levu, Viti Levu and adjacent islands including Yasawa in the west of Fiji, Kadavu, Beqa, and we have collected a lot of submissions. We were just complying with the terms of reference after our return from the public consultations around the islands and around Viti Levu and Vanua Levu.

We started here again yesterday, hearing consultations from interested associations, the churches, lawyers, and anticipating to receive submissions from ministries in the government from tomorrow onwards. So, for the next two weeks, we will be again sitting here to hear submissions from interested ministries and associations and individuals. That is what we have been doing and we are glad that we have the elections over here this afternoon to submit recommendations and submissions to the Commission.

We welcome you and we anticipate that we are going to be receiving some very important and significant suggestions and submissions from you ladies and gentlemen this afternoon.

You will note that the ladies and gentlemen from the media is here. They have been reporting on our work from day one. They travelled with us around the country, over the seas, over the highlands, and they are here again this afternoon. So, feel free to make submissions and we will be listening and recording whatever is stated. We have got recorders, we have recording equipment, and we will refer to transcribed copies of the submissions later when we sit down and deliberate on the submissions that we have gathered.

With that short introduction, I now open the consultation session this afternoon and I now hand over the mic and the floor to you ladies and gentlemen from the Elections Office. Thank you.

Judge Ratuvili: Thank you very much, Chairperson Valenitabua, Ms. Nailatikau, Dr. Gounder. Thank you for the opportunity to appear before you. I am Usaia Ratuvili I am the Chairperson of the Electoral Commission. With me are my fellow Commissioners. To my right is Mr. Inoke Loganimoce, Mr. Nemani Mati, Mr. Reginald Jokhan. Accompanying me from the Elections Office is Ms. Anna Mataiciwa, the Supervisor of Elections, and Mr. Mesake Duwai, the Manager Legal. We are appearing together as, collectively, we are the Electoral Management Body for Fiji, and we make these submissions jointly. That is deliberate. The Commission sets the direction.

The FEO brings the operational experience of the body that runs our elections. The body speaking with one voice is in miniature. The Unified Electoral Body, we will ask you to consider. There is a more substantive paper that we have submitted. I am just going to be speaking to it. In terms of our approach, we come as neutral administrators of elections and not as advocates for any political outcome.

We speak on what lies within our mandate as the body that administers Fiji's elections day-to-day. The right to vote, the qualification of voters and candidates, the conduct of elections, and the independence and structure of the electoral body. On the larger questions that belong to the people of Fiji and their representatives, that is the choice of electoral system and the shape of Parliament, we offer technical advice and we will defer to the Commission.

In terms of what we are asking the Commission to consider, much of what follows takes forward the recommendations of the Electoral Law Reform Commissioners. I am sure you have met with them already. They are placed before you because it requires constitutional change rather than ordinary legislation.

Firstly, in terms of the electoral system, the proposal from our Law Reform Commissioners was to lower the 5% threshold, which today sets aside the voice of many citizens who support smaller parties. We consider a mixed system that gives every voter a local representative while keeping Parliament proportional. The counting formula sits in ordinary law, not in the Constitution.

Only the core features are entrenched. In terms of the boundaries, if constituencies are introduced, our recommendation is to re-establish an independent apolitical constituency boundaries commission with constitutional footing, as was the case in previous constitutions. In terms of women's representation, we support temporary special measures including reserved seats for women.

In terms of the right to vote, we are recommending the removal of blanket disqualification of serving prisoners, removing the outdated term unsound mind disqualification, and aligning with the Disability Convention, which we have already ratified. We are recommending that this is to be achieved reasonably and progressively, and that we retain voluntary voting. I think you might have heard that in your public consultations as well, that people have been sent to prison, they are serving their time, but they are still in a position to vote.

That is something that is not taken away by virtue of their prison sentence, and that would be in line with our international and Convention obligations. In terms of candidates, we recommend that the Commission, in whatever report it makes in terms of review, we ask that you provide clarity on eligibility after a custodial sentence. And for dual citizens, that we review the rules on public officers standing for elections as well.

These are fleshed out more in our substantive submissions before you. In terms of stability and timing, we recommend that any electoral law changes made in an election year should take effect only after the election. I think it is international best practice that during election year, there are no substantive changes made to the election laws.

That the time and resources should be reserved for preparing for an election, rather than fundamentally changing the election legislative framework. And we are also recommending that there should be greater certainty over when elections are held. At the moment, under the constitutional arrangement, there is a lot of discretion in the executive on when to call for the vote.

It is either three or six months before the end of Parliament, or right up to the end of Parliament, which is four years. We have been hearing from our political parties and our stakeholders that it leaves them uncertain in terms of the political campaigning and what resources they allocate in terms of their campaign, because they are unsure of when the election date is. Our central institutional proposal, our Electoral Law Reform Commissioners have recommended that we merge into one electoral body.

That the Electoral Commission and the Fiji Elections Office are merged into a single unified electoral management body. One institution, clear lines of authority. We recommend a board of five, comprising a chairperson who is or is qualified to be a judge, three other commissioners, and the chief executive of the new body as the fifth commissioner.

Members appointed for staggered five-year terms. Currently, Electoral Commission members are only given three-year terms, which is out of cycle with the electoral cycle. We are also recommending that the terms be staggered, so that we don't have a clear out of all members of appointments who are absent, leaving us with no quorum to conduct our meetings and make our decisions.

We have also recommended and endorsed the recommendation that the power of the registrar of political parties be separated from the chief executive when the new body is formed. This is to enable the commission to fairly hear appeals. At present, the supervisor is both the secretary of the commission and also the registrar of political parties.

The Law Reform Commissioners felt that this role should be held by a different person, and if it's merged, then this person will report to the commission and any appeals from the decision will be heard by the commission. There will be no possibility of any conflict. We have also recommended that this merged body, that its independence is entrenched, so financially, the budget and the other associated issues deal with it.

These are issues that have been raised by our Electoral Law Reform Commissioners, but we felt we'd leave this to the commission. These are in terms of term limits, retirement age, the senate or the reintroduction of the upper house, and the caretaker government. These we feel are matters of constitutional and political design for this commission.

We offer only this. An effective caretaker government model would help safeguard a fair campaign, a concern that the political parties have raised very strongly with us. In closing, the detail is in our written submission.

Together with us, the supervisor and the FEO team are here to elaborate on the operational specifics and also to answer the commission's questions. We thank the commission for its work. We stand ready to assist in delivering a constitution that is democratic, inclusive, and durable. I thank you for your attention.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, Judge Ratuvili and the chairman of the commission. We would appreciate if we have a copy of the submission presented to the CRC this afternoon so that we can have a record of it.

Judge Ratuvili: Sorry, the delay was with me. I hadn't signed it yet. We certainly have copies made for you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you for that submission, Judge Ratuvili and the chairman of the commission. We have heard submissions from our people on the ground that we have to revert to the multiple constituency election system. When I say that, I don't doubt that you understand what I'm talking about.

The main reason why our people are saying that is that they do not know. They want to know who represents them in Parliament. They wish to have local candidates, people who they know from their own areas, respective areas, be voted into Parliament and to represent them in Parliament.

So, they have been presenting to us that this one, what we call one constituency, one national constituency for the whole of Fiji is to be done away with. And that we revert to the multiple constituency election system which used to be used in Fiji. Now if we go to multiple constituency elections, that will greatly involve the elections office in relation to the matter of boundaries and the like things.

If I may ask, what is the commission's and the elections office's thoughts or stance in relation to reverting to the multiple constituency electoral system?

Judge Ratuvili: I'll answer first and then the legal supervisor can add in. In terms of our submissions, we have guided by the recommendations made by our reform commissioners. Because they prepared a report, I understand that was submitted to you.

So, when they were making their recommendations, they acknowledged that most of their recommendations were in relation to things that were entrenched. So the constitution entrenches that there will be one single constituency. And the election system will be such that we will be choosing members from political parties in a mixed representative. So what we've said is that, and the threshold to get into parliament is that a successful candidate, a successful party must gain at least 5% of the total number of votes cast. That's the starting point. And then the seats allocated are in relation to a further division of that 5%.

So, the recommendation is that we consider a mixed system that gives every voter a local representative while keeping parliament proportional. That's fleshed out in the submission. The counting formula sits in ordinary law.

Only the co-futures are entrenched. So, the way we suggest it is this. You just give a general statement in the constitution.

This is what we feel it should be. And then leave it to the substantive act or the substantive electoral act or whatever form there may be to actually spell out what it means. Because in constitutions, they don't set out in detail. They speak to general principles, ideals, what we want the system to be. So as long as it spells out, this is what it's going to be. And it will be fleshed out better in terms of the mechanism how it's going to work.

In terms of the boundaries, if these are reintroduced, then there must be a boundaries commission. And ideally it should be in the constitution. The same thing, just establish a boundaries commission, say what the qualifications for membership are. Their actual duties and functions should be left to the subsidiary legislations. So that's our view on that. Anything you want to add? Thank you, Chair.

Mr. Duwai: In our submission, we had recommended that if a constituency-based or mixed electoral system is adopted, the commission recommends that an independent apolitical constituency boundaries commission is established with constitutional footing, just as our chairperson had alluded to. And if we look at the 1970, the 1990, and the 1997 constitution, the constituency boundaries commission was entrenched in the constitution. And so, if we're going to move towards this operationally, the election management body should not be responsible in finalizing the boundary.

There should be a separate independent body that looks at the demarcation or the delimitation of boundaries. For the purpose of representation and elections. And we also recommend that if there is a constituency boundaries commission being set up, it should look at the boundaries for all elections.

Not only the general election, but also the local government elections. As you have seen, given the postponement of the local government elections, the word boundaries are finalized currently by the electoral commission. But with the constituency boundaries commission, its independence, its membership, and everything to do with its duties and functions, as well as its composition and the term that the members have to serve, should be established in the constitution.

That is our humble submission. The constituency boundaries commission would look at the boundaries separately, while the elections management body is responsible for conducting the elections for those that would stand and represent their voters from those particular boundaries. As was done previously under the three constitutions, that is our submission this afternoon. Chair, thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, Chair.

Ms. Nailatikau: And thank you, Mr. Ratuvili and colleagues. This will probably not require too much of a clarification, but I am simply noticing two points in your submission which have also been quite heavily discussed in some of our consultations. These relate to 5.2 and 5.3. On the matter of dual citizenship, on your recommendation as commissioner that persons holding dual citizenship be permitted to stand for office, provided they satisfy residency requirements.

As you may be aware, there have been indications that perhaps the length of time required for residency may be too long. There are many who hold differing views, and from my understanding is that whatever that time length be, that it simply be clear and clarified in the constitution. And secondly, related to co-related immunity, this has also come directly from the communities that we have visited.

Many places as well have been, as we can see by signage or by the discussions, also been visited by members of your team relating to awareness and registration, talking about how any person who relies on co-related constitutional immunity be permanently disqualified from standing as a candidate. So, I simply wanted to highlight those aspects as being reflective of some of the submissions that we've received, and perhaps on whether you'd like to elaborate on, expand, particularly in areas where there are differentiations in what might be an adequate time length, for instance. I wouldn't expect the commission to make a deliberate stance on that, but that's certainly something that even up until yesterday was also quite vociferously submitted to us. Thank you. Thank you.

Judge Ratuvili: Thank you, Mrs. Nailatikau. In terms of the eligibility of dual citizens to stand, as I said, in principle we have no issues with it, and as you've alluded yourself, the time period must be clear and must be transparent. So, if anyone is contemplating running for public office here in Fiji and they are the holders of a dual citizenship, it must be clear that I have to be in Fiji for this period of time and an actual resident in Fiji before I can be eligible. All we need is clarity on that point, and I think that's there, and that should be now not an issue.

So that's our view in terms of that. And for the core related immunity, I assure you we're not avoiding the question, it's just that we note that the Supreme Court in its advisory opinion declined to disturb that section of the Constitution. That was in October last year.

Whether Parliament, which will ultimately decide on this, has had a change of heart, that is up to them as the representatives of the people. And we offer no comments in relation to that. Whether a person qualifies to stand or not, will be based on the current laws that are there.

So, if they're a citizen of Fiji, and they are not currently serving a period of imprisonment, one in 12 months, then not of unsound mind. That person clears those criteria, then they are eligible to stand. That's the position we have in terms of the Commission. Anything you wish to add, Mesa?

Mr. Valenitabua: Dr. Gounder?

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Chairman of the Commission, members of the Commission, and the Supervisor of Elections for your submission. It's good to see you all coming together with this submission. In terms of the boundary delimitation, we have seen the report of the Law Reform Commission, and that's something we will consider, and we have also received submissions to adapt the boundary system, so the Commission is at the moment deliberating around the system.

We have also talked about the reduction of the threshold, but it's a huge reduction, especially the 60% reduction threshold can have huge implications in terms of stability as well, but that's something we are going to look at in detail later. In terms of the timing and announcement of elections, we have heard this from the Reform Commission, but from a public submission as well, that's something that's on the table for the Commission, for this Commission to look at. We are also mindful of Fixed Parliament Act arrangements as well, so when the new government is formed, we can know when the election is going to happen, that provides greater certainty, something of those kinds of options at the moment.

In terms of, given the experience of the Elections Office in administration and the challenges around it during elections, do you have any suggestions for the provision where Section 57, the candidates who are public officers, any particular challenges you face in an administrative perspective in dealing with such a provision during elections?

Judge Ratuvili: I'll defer to our Manager Legal.

Dr. Gounder: If you can make, I know you are, in some cases you have made recommendations to the law, in other cases you have not, so I'll leave it to you if you have any suggestions, because we have received submissions around Section 57 of the Constitution, 1, 2, 3, 4 as well. Thank you, Dr. Gounder.

Mr. Duwai: For the Elections Office, under the current Constitution, public officers are not eligible to be candidates. And for us, we question whether the definition of public officers for this purpose includes trade union officials and officials of employer organizations, neither of whom hold public office or perform public functions, while it is common practice internationally to prevent the holders of public offices from nominating as candidates, it is unusual to prevent officials in trade unions or employer organizations from doing so. We also agree whether it is necessary for public officers to permanently resign from their positions, to stand as candidates, with the result that they have no income from the time of nomination until after elections, or for unsuccessful candidates, no guarantee of any employment to return to.

So, that's something that we also agree, whether this contributes to corruption by candidates during that period, or whether it is a barrier to competent persons nominating as candidates, and whether it would be sufficient for public officers to take unpaid leave during their candidacy, and only be required to resign if they are elected. So that's something that we invite the Commission to look into and make considerations where relevant.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, that's a very honest response. What about the clarity around public officers? Is that sufficient at the moment?

Mr. Duwai: At this stage it's quite detailed to include trade union officials, and it's very broad, and it's captured in the Constitution. So, for us, when we are analyzing nominations, the Constitution is basically the benchmark, and the law specifies in the Electoral Act that once political parties submit their party lists, or independent candidates submit their candidacy nomination to the supervisor of elections, they are deemed to have resigned from their public officer position. And if they continue to hold that, then they would be in breach of the law.

Dr. Gounder: So, you're happy with the definition of the public office, as it appears, or you need more clarity?

Mr. Duwai: We would invite the Commission to look further and better clarify the definition that's given in the Constitution, whether it should include trade union officials or not, because even from the public consultations that were from the electoral law reform, there were even some objections raised that it should not. include trade union officials. So, we leave it to the Commission to look into it.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you.

Judge Ratuvili: Let's put it this way, Dr. Gounder, it's unusual for trade union officials and representatives of employer organizations to be deemed as public officers, because they're not paid from the public purse, they don't hold a public office. So that's...

Dr. Gounder: Thank you. And I assume there are other aspects in the Electoral Act as well, which appear as public officers?

Mr. Duwai: Yes. That's correct, Dr. Gounder. So, it makes reference to the definition of public officer that's given under Section 57.3 of the Constitution. So, in the Electoral Act, under Section 24, it says a person who holds a public office as defined in Section 57.3 of the Constitution. So, it refers back to the definition that's laid out in the Constitution. Thank you.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: That requirement, the two-year residence requirement, in order for someone to stand for elections, we are talking about dual citizenship and the two-year requirement. Does that two-year requirement apply to dual citizens also? Can you just clarify that? Or does it apply to Fiji citizens only who have been away overseas for work purposes or other purposes, and they return to Fiji, does that apply to them only or to the dual citizens also?

Mr. Duwai: Sir, currently under the 2013 Constitution, dual citizens are not allowed to contest. So this requirement is specifically for Fijian citizens. The requirement that's laid out in Section 56.2c, it says a person may be a candidate for election to Parliament only if the person is ordinarily resident in Fiji for at least two years immediately before being nominated. But when it comes to the Electoral Act 2014, under Section 23.5, it says for the purposes of subsection 4c, a person shall only qualify to be ordinarily resident in Fiji for at least two years immediately before being nominated if that person has been present and living in Fiji for an aggregate period of not less than 18 months out of the two years immediately before being nominated. So that aggregate period is between 18 months to two years. So usually, the minimum requirement is 18 months, but what's laid out in the Constitution is two years. The Electoral Act further states that residency can go to 18 months.

Ms. Nailatikau: Mr. Duwai, forgive me. I believe just to clarify as you stated, legitimacy for candidacy for dual citizenship is currently not allowed as you've just stated.

Mr. Duwai: Yes, ma'am.

Mr. Valenitabua: It's in the Constitution itself.

Mr. Duwai: Yes, that's correct. It's in 56.2a.

Mr. Valenitabua: Since we are looking at amending the provisions of the Constitution, would it be part of your suggestion that we amend that also for dual citizens?

Judge Ratuvili: Yes, Chair. That was one of the recommendations of our Electoral Law Reform Commissioners and we endorsed it. We just need to be clear on what is the residential requirement. Yes. They have to be resident here.

Mr. Valenitabua: I believe that it was mentioned prior to me having these submissions. I just wanted to make sure in relation to that. We have received a lot of submissions in relation to the electoral system. I have mentioned one where we have been asked to reinstate the multiple constituency electoral system. Another thing is the counting of the votes.

People have suggested or our people have suggested that we change even the counting system. Now, I know that would depend on the electoral system which we would want to use. I don't know whether you would want to comment on this de-honed system. People just don't like it. It's too complex for them. Can we have a view on that? If not, it's okay.

Judge Ratuvili: Thank you, Chair. The de-honed system which is the system that is currently being used to allocate parliamentary seats is not in the Constitution. It's in the Act. The Act sets out very clearly what steps we must take to do it. I leave it to our Manager Legal because he has actually implemented that in two past general elections. I think he is in a better position to explain that to you in the limited time we have.

Mr. Duwai: Thank you, Chair. For the system of allocation of seats, the formula that is entrenched in the Electoral Act is the de-honed system formula. Based on feedback, even when the electoral law reform consultations were being carried out, the feedback was that not many understood what the system was.

When it comes to electoral systems and allocation of seats, there are various formulas that the Constitutional Review Commission can look into. The de-honed formula is just one. There are other formulas that can be adopted for open list proportional representation systems.

I believe with what has been recommended, looking into the mixed member proportional representation system, in terms of looking at allocating seats, you also have the first-past-the-post method, which we use currently for our local government elections in terms of allocating seats for councilors. It is just simple first-past-the-post. I believe in our recommendation and in our submission jointly by the Electoral Commission and the FEO, we invite the Commission to look into that mixed member proportional representation system as the electoral system that we can further look into to adopt.

But in terms of allocation of seats, that's currently what the feedback is on the ground. The Electoral Commission is the authority that allocates seats, and this is the formula that they use. While it's captured in the Electoral Act, it's written in the provisions to actually guide them on how to allocate the seats to the different candidates.

Dr. Gounder: Your recommendation 5.2, is that based on section 56.2c? Is that correct? Conditional upon section 56.2c?

Mr. Duwai: Yes, sir. If we're looking at 5.2, then it would mean amendment to 56.2a and 2c.

Dr. Gounder: Okay. That's what you mean?

Mr. Duwai: Yes, sir.

Dr. Gounder: Residency requirement is 2c, yes?

Mr. Duwai: Yes, sir.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you.

Ms. Nailatikau: Vinaka Chair, Commissioners, if I may, knowing that time is limited, you also mentioned the importance of an effective caretaker government model. And potentially, in as much as technical advice or workability of options that you are able to share with us, and forgive me if I know this might also be the Electoral Law Reform Commission's report, but I would invite you to expand on what you believe an effective caretaker government model might alleviate in terms of the administration, the implementation of elections, particularly leading up to election periods.

Judge Ratuvili: Thank you, Ms. Nailatikau. Conventionally, once the writ has been issued, then ordinarily a cabinet is reduced. There is a skeleton cabinet that takes us to election, and basically, they just keep the machinery of government moving. So basically, during that period, most of the executive decisions will be actually made by the senior civil servants. And that takes us through to the elections and thereafter. So, the Prime Minister will still be in place. The cabinet will either, or there will be a very limited number of cabinets, like a skeletal cabinet to take us through.

And basically, conventionally that would be the Minister of Finance, who deals with the daily operation of government. Maybe the Home Affairs, the Defense, and the Prime Minister, as well as others. So those are the machinery of government that will take us to the elections.

And the other ministers, they become already members of Parliament, they can conduct their campaigns subject to the campaign rules. And any major decision will have to come back to Parliament. Parliament will have the final say.

So that takes us through to the elections. And if there is a delay in the counting of seats and the allocation of seats, then a skeletal cabinet takes us through that until the winner is declared. I think that's what we were alluding to. But it's up to you. You can look at other models from other jurisdictions and take into account what is compatible with the situation on the ground here in Fiji. I hope that's addressed your questions. Thank you.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: The Chairperson of the LAE Electoral Commission and the Supervisor of the Elections. Ladies and gentlemen, thank you very much for the comprehensive written submissions which we have been handed this afternoon. Now, we will be reading through the submissions and we'll consider the suggestions and recommendations that have been, that are listed here. I note that you have as paragraph 11, summary of recommendations.

And very clear, the recommendations are very clear. We will take that into consideration during our deliberations. Thank you very much for this afternoon.

We have kept, we have stated that we will keep this line of communication open in the event we need further assistance. Particularly from the Elections Office. Because we are going to be dealing also with the general elections and the electoral laws and things like that.

Which could be included in the Constitution itself. We have talked about some this afternoon. So I hope that that line of communication will be open and that in the event we need further assistance, we will be assisted by the Elections Office and the Electoral Commission.

With those few words, I again thank you very much for taking time out to come and make presentations and submissions to the Commission this afternoon. We will be collating all the submissions which we have gathered from all over Fiji. And analyze them.

We have got our legal officers collating all those at the time we are speaking. So that we can identify themes and issues which might be used in the Constitution. We have until the 31st of August 2026 to present to His Excellency a report on our work.

Our recommendations. And our recommendations might be or will be reflected in a draft amended Constitution. We have a constitutional lawyer who is helping us from Australia.

He has visited Fiji and will come back very soon. We also have a legal drafter from New Zealand who will be here this Saturday or Sunday to come and work with us in relation to start with the drafting of the amended Constitution. We have a timeline which ends on the 31st of August.

We are working towards that timeline so that we can hand over what His Excellency has tasked us to do. The reports or the documents by the date, the 31st of August 2026. The process I don't have to explain once it reaches.

Once we hand over our documents to His Excellency then His Excellency will have to give it to government and then the politicians take over. In accordance with the amendment process which the Supreme Court has guided us through we are working in accordance with the process set out by the Supreme Court. And once cabinet gets our documents or the documents which we will prepare then the political process takes over, the parliamentary process takes over.

I don't need to explain that because I know you know. So that is where we are heading. What happens after the 31st of August is for His Excellency and for the government.

Our work ends on the 31st of August. With those few words I thank you again. And we hope or we will be deliberating and we'll be using, we'll be referring to your comprehensive submissions this afternoon.

Judge Ratuvili: Vinaka Vakalevu Chair. Thank you very much, Chair. And we stand ready to offer any assistance that you may require.

Mr. Valenitabua: We usually take a group photo after submissions. May I invite you?

----------End of Session [30-6-2026]----------

ELECTORAL COMMISSION OF THE REPUBLIC OF FIJI with the FIJIAN ELECTIONS OFFICE

Joint Submission to the Constitution Review Commission

On the electoral provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013

2026

1. Introduction

The Electoral Commission ("the Commission") is an independent institution established under the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013 and charged, together with the Supervisor of Elections and the Fijian Elections Office ("the FEO"), with the registration of voters and the conduct of free and fair elections.[1] The Commission and the FEO make this joint submission to the Constitution Review Commission ("the Commission of Review") in support of a constitutional framework that is democratic, inclusive and durable. The Commission provides the direction of this submission; the FEO contributes the operational and administrative experience of the body that conducts Fiji's elections, and will elaborate on operational detail at the oral presentation. That the two bodies submit jointly is itself a small illustration of the unified electoral management body recommended in Part 8.

This submission responds principally to the Final Report of the Fiji Law Reform Commission's Electoral Law Review 2025.[2] The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners acknowledged that many of their recommendations could not be implemented through ordinary legislation because they ran against entrenched provisions of the Constitution. Those recommendations are therefore properly placed before the Commission of Review. The Commission and the FEO set out below the reforms identified by the Electoral Law Reform Commissioners, together with related matters arising from the conduct of recent elections, and state their position on each.

The opportunity for reform is real. In its advisory opinion of August 2025, the Supreme Court recognised the 2013 Constitution as legally effective while acknowledging the "democratic deficit" in its origins, and read down the amendment thresholds so that constitutional change now

[1]Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013, ss 75 (Electoral Commission) and 76 (Supervisor of Elections).
[2]Fiji Law Reform Commission, Electoral Law Review 2025 — "An Electoral System FOR the People FROM the People" (Final Report, 7 July 2025) ("ELRC Report").

requires a two-thirds majority of Parliament and a simple majority at a referendum.[3] A workable pathway to reform now exists.

1.1 Approach and limits of this submission

The Commission approaches this submission as a neutral administrator of elections, not as an advocate for any political outcome. It speaks with authority on matters within its mandate — the independence and structure of the electoral management body, the administration of elections, the right to vote, and the qualification of voters and candidates — and offers technical advice on the workability of options. On questions that are properly for the people of Fiji and their elected representatives, including the ultimate choice of electoral system and the design of the legislature, the Commission expresses its views with deliberate restraint and defers to the Commission of Review.

In doing so the Commission is guided by the internationally recognised principles for electoral management bodies — independence, impartiality, integrity and transparency[4] — and by Fiji's obligations under international human rights law, including the right of every citizen to take part in public affairs and to vote and be elected.[5]

2. The electoral system

The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners recommended a transition to a mixed-member proportional (MMP) system using closed party lists and a reduced 2% seat threshold.[6] The current system — a single national electoral roll, open-list proportional representation and a 5% threshold — is entrenched in the Constitution itself, so a change of this character is a matter for the Commission of Review. The specific seat-allocation formula, the d'Hondt method, is set not by the Constitution but by the Electoral Act 2014, and could be altered by ordinary legislation.[7]

> The Commission supports a reduction of the 5% threshold, which it considers high by international standards. A lower threshold preserves a greater proportion of votes cast and gives effect to the choices of citizens who support smaller parties, who are

[3] In the Matter of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji, Supreme Court advisory opinion (29 August 2025). The Court recognised the 2013 Constitution as legally effective but read down ss 159–160 so that amendment requires an absolute two-thirds majority of Parliament and a simple majority at referendum, citing the "democratic deficit" in the Constitution's origins.
[4] International IDEA, Electoral Management Design: The International IDEA Handbook — guiding principles for electoral management bodies of independence, impartiality, integrity and transparency.
[5] International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, art 25 (right to take part in public affairs, to vote and to be elected); Universal Declaration of Human Rights, art 21.
[6] ELRC Report, p 2 (mixed-member proportional system; closed party lists; reduced 2% threshold).
[7] Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013, s 53 (proportional representation system) — a single national electoral roll, open-list proportional representation, and a 5% threshold (s 53(3)); s 53 requires only that seats be awarded by an internationally accepted method. These features are entrenched and cannot be altered by ordinary legislation alone. The specific seat-allocation formula, the d'Hondt method, is prescribed by the Electoral Act 2014 (s 104), not the Constitution, and can be changed by ordinary legislation.

presently left without a voice in Parliament. The Commission also sees clear merit in a system that combines direct constituency representation with proportional party representation, so that every voter has an identifiable local member while the composition of Parliament continues to reflect the national party vote. The New Zealand MMP model, refined over three decades, is a useful reference for the Commission of Review's consideration.

The case for a local link is grounded in the Commission's and the FEO's own experience. In the public consultations, and as recorded in the 2022 General Election Joint Report, voters repeatedly said they had no idea who, if anyone, represented them; under a single national constituency, members of Parliament represent no particular locality.[8] International research indicates that voters engage more readily when they have some form of direct access to an elected representative. A system that returns members from defined constituencies would give voters that access while a proportional party-vote element preserved overall fairness.

A detailed design must be adapted to Fiji's population, geography and diversity. With due consideration of the above, the final choice of system, and of the precise threshold figure, remains a matter for the Commission of Review and Parliament.

2.1 Boundary delimitation

A move to constituency-based or mixed representation carries an administrative consequence the Commission draws to the Commission of Review's attention. The 2013 Constitution contains no boundaries commission and confers no power to delimit geographic electorates: because all members are elected from a single national constituency, the Commission's only related function is to review the total number of seats before each election, and it has no authority over boundaries.[9] This was not always so. The 1997 Constitution established an independent Constituency Boundaries Commission to delimit electoral boundaries — a body that became redundant when the single national constituency was introduced in 2013.[10]

If a constituency-based or mixed electoral system is adopted, the Commission recommends that an independent, apolitical Constituency Boundaries Commission be established with constitutional footing. Such a commission existed under Fiji's earlier constitutions, and the Commission of Review may draw on those provisions and on the established models in Australia and New Zealand. Its detailed design —

[8]Electoral Commission and Supervisor of Elections, 2022 General Election Joint Report (voters' lack of a direct link to elected representatives under the single national constituency; recommendation to consider options for direct representation). The same lack of direct representation was raised repeatedly in the public consultations.

[9]Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013, ss 53 and 54: members of Parliament are elected from a single national electoral roll (s 53), and under s 54 the Electoral Commission's only related function is to review the total number of seats before each general election. The 2013 Constitution confers no power of geographic boundary delimitation and establishes no boundaries commission.

[10]A Constituency Boundaries Commission existed under the 1997 Constitution to delimit electoral boundaries; it became redundant on the adoption of the single national constituency in 2013.

membership, independence, and whether its remit extends to local-government boundaries — can be settled by the Commission of Review and written law, and the FEO can speak to the practicalities at the oral presentation.[11]

3. Parliamentary structure and women's representation

The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners recommended a minimum of 71 seats, including seats reserved for women.[12]

The Commission supports the introduction of temporary special measures, including reserved seats, to advance the representation of women. Women's representation in Parliament fell from 19.6% after the 2018 election to 9.1% after 2022, well below the regional and global averages. The present system contains no structural guarantee for women's participation. Temporary special measures are expressly contemplated by Fiji's obligations under the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and are a proportionate, time-limited response to a demonstrated imbalance. The Commission recommends that the Constitution be drafted so as to permit such measures without their being open to challenge as discrimination.[13]

The Commission leaves the total number of seats in Parliament to the Commission of Review and, in turn, to the legislature.

4. The right to vote: qualification and disqualification of voters

4.1 Voting rights of serving prisoners

The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners recommended removing the disqualification from voting that presently applies to serving prisoners.[14]

The Commission endorses the removal of the blanket disqualification of serving prisoners. Prisoners remain citizens of Fiji, and their families and communities are affected by the decisions of Parliament. Universal and equal suffrage is the starting point of a democratic franchise, and any limitation should be the carefully justified exception rather than an automatic consequence of imprisonment.

---

[11]A Constituency Boundaries Commission existed under the 1970, 1990 and 1997 Constitutions. The Fijian Elections Office recommends that an apolitical Constituency Boundaries Commission be established in the Constitution — with its membership, independence and responsibilities set out there — and be empowered to determine boundaries for both national and local-government elections, with further detail left to written law.
[12]ELRC Report, pp 2–3 (minimum of 71 seats; reserved seats for women).
[13]Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, art 4(1) (temporary special measures). Women's representation in Parliament fell from 19.6% (10 of 51 seats) after 2018 to 9.1% (5 of 55 seats) after 2022: MMP Design Paper, §1.3.
[14]ELRC Report, p 3 (removal of the voting disqualification for serving prisoners; review of the disqualification of persons of "unsound mind").

4.2 Disability and the disqualification of persons of "unsound mind"

Section 55 of the Constitution provides that a person does not have, or ceases to have, the right to be registered as a voter if that person is, under a law in force in Fiji, adjudged or declared to be of "unsound mind."[15] The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners recommended that this blanket disqualification be reviewed to align with international disability conventions.[16]

The Commission, which works closely with organisations of persons with disabilities through the Fijian Elections Office and the Election Disability Access Working Group, recommends going further than review. Fiji ratified the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities in 2017. Article 12 of that Convention recognises that persons with disabilities enjoy legal capacity on an equal basis with others, and Article 29 protects their right to vote and to be elected without discrimination.[17] The Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities has confirmed that legal capacity is a universal attribute that may not be denied on the basis of disability, and that support in decision-making must never be used to limit the right to vote.[18]

The expression "unsound mind" is outdated and stigmatising, and it conflates two distinct concepts: mental capacity, which describes a person's decision-making ability in a particular situation and which may fluctuate, and legal capacity, which is the universal recognition of a person as a holder of rights. A disqualification expressed in these terms is inconsistent with Fiji's obligations under the Convention and with the equality and dignity recognised by the Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act 2018.[19] In adopting this position the Commission endorses the reasoning of the Pacific Disability Forum in its submission to the Commission of Review on this section.[20]

The Commission's direction is full compliance with the Convention, achieved in the manner the Convention itself prescribes — through reasonable accommodation and progressive realisation, not an unqualified guarantee that ignores practical limits.[21] The Office, which conducts elections across some 2,200 polling venues, observes that the accessibility of public premises is in the first place a responsibility of the State, and that accommodations will expand as facilities and resources allow. These positions are complementary rather than opposed: the Constitution should [15]Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013, s 55(2)(b) and s 55(3)(b).

---

[16]ELRC Report, p 3.
[17]Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, arts 12 (equal recognition before the law) and 29 (participation in political and public life). Fiji ratified the CRPD in 2017.
[18]Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, General Comment No 1 (2014) on art 12: legal capacity is a universal attribute that cannot be denied on the basis of disability, and support in exercising legal capacity must never be used to limit fundamental rights, including the right to vote.
[19]Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act 2018 (Fiji).
[20]Pacific Disability Forum, "Submission Two — Submission to the Constitution Review Commission on Chapter 3, Part B, Section 55 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013." The Commission adopts and endorses the reasoning of that submission on this point.
[21]Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, art 2: "reasonable accommodation" means necessary and appropriate modification not imposing a disproportionate or undue burden. The obligation is one of reasonable accommodation and progressive realisation, not of unqualified provision.

guarantee the right and remove the discriminatory disqualification, while the pace and manner of fuller accommodation proceed reasonably and progressively as an operational matter for the FEO and the State.

> The Commission recommends that the words "adjudged or declared to be of unsound mind" be removed from section 55(2)(b) and section 55(3)(b) of the Constitution, and that equivalent terminology — such as references to "mental disorder" — be removed from connected electoral legislation. The franchise provision should be redrafted in rights-based terms guaranteeing that no person is denied the right to register, to vote by secret ballot, to stand for election or to hold public office on the basis of disability, psychosocial disability, intellectual disability, perceived capacity, or any status related to supported decision-making.

By way of model, and adapting the wording proposed by the Pacific Disability Forum, section 55(1) might read:

> "Every citizen who is, or will be, 18 years of age or over on or before the date of the issue of the writ for the next election of members of Parliament has the right to register as a voter, to vote by secret ballot, to stand for election, to hold public office, and to participate in political and public life on an equal basis with others. No person shall be disqualified from exercising these rights on the basis of disability, psychosocial disability, intellectual disability, perceived capacity, or any status related to supported decision-making."

4.3 In-patients and supported decision-making

The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners further recommended that in-patients of mental-health facilities be permitted to vote where a treating physician confirms that the person understands the process.[22]

> The Commission endorses this recommendation as an immediate and practical safeguard against the wrongful exclusion of in-patients. The fuller position required by the Convention is the provision of support to exercise the vote rather than any capacity-based exclusion, and a physician-confirmation mechanism should be treated as a transitional measure on the path to a supported model. Any supported-voting arrangement must include safeguards against undue influence, so that support assists voters to express their own choice and cannot be used by another person to cast a vote on their behalf.

In its electoral-law reform proposals, the FEO has recommended that the particular needs of voters with disabilities — such as assistance for voters who are deaf, or a quiet space for voters who require one — be catered for at designated, accessible locations on common routes, rather than requiring every one of the some 2,200 polling venues to be identically equipped. The Commission supports this approach as a sensible application of reasonable accommodation.

---

[22]ELRC Report, p 4 (in-patients of mental-health facilities to vote where a treating physician confirms understanding of the process).

4.4 Compulsory or voluntary voting

Voting was compulsory under earlier constitutional arrangements and is voluntary under the 2013 Constitution. The FEO's analysis does not support the common assumption that compulsion raises genuine participation: Samoa, which compels voting, records higher turnout than Fiji but well short of universal participation, while Australia records turnout above 90% but with a markedly higher proportion of invalid — and often deliberately invalid — votes. Fiji's proportion of invalid votes is significantly lower.[23]

> The Commission and the FEO recommend that voluntary voting be retained. Turnout alone is a crude measure of participation; the quality of the vote, reflected in a low proportion of invalid ballots, also matters. The better course is to keep strengthening voter outreach to the harder-to-reach members of society, rather than to compel participation and criminalise those who do not vote.

5. Eligibility to stand for election

The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners made several recommendations concerning the qualification of candidates, and the conduct of recent elections has raised further questions the Commission and the FEO bring to the Commission of Review's attention.[24] The qualifications and disqualifications for membership of Parliament are set out in the Constitution.[25]

5.1 Persons who have completed a custodial sentence

The Commissioners recommended that a person be eligible to stand for election once that person has completed a custodial sentence.

> The Commission supports the principle that rehabilitation should restore the right to stand for office, but recommends that the Commission of Review provide clarity on its scope. In particular, the framework should make plain whether any distinction is to be drawn between serious and minor offences, and should state the criteria to be applied, so that the rule can be administered consistently and without dispute.

5.2 Dual citizens

The Commissioners recommended that persons holding dual citizenship be permitted to stand for office provided they satisfy residency requirements.

---

[23]Comparative data discussed by the Fijian Elections Office: Samoa records higher turnout than Fiji but well below universal participation, and Australia records turnout above 90% under compulsory voting but with a higher proportion of invalid — including deliberately invalid — votes. Fiji's proportion of invalid votes is significantly lower.

[24]ELRC Report, p 4 (eligibility of persons to stand for election after completing a custodial sentence; eligibility of dual citizens; permanent disqualification of persons relying on coup-related constitutional immunity).

[25]Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013, s 56 (qualifications and disqualifications for membership of Parliament).

The Commission endorses this recommendation. Permitting dual citizens to stand, subject to a clear residency qualification, widens the pool of candidates available to the people of Fiji while maintaining a genuine connection to the country.

5.3 Coup-related immunity

The Commissioners recommended that any person who relies on coup-related constitutional immunity be permanently disqualified from standing as a candidate.

The Commission considers this question to fall outside its administrative mandate and defers to the Commission of Review. It notes that the Supreme Court, in its 2025 advisory opinion, declined to disturb the immunity and transitional provisions preserved by the Constitution, and that the interaction between candidate disqualification and those provisions is a matter of constitutional policy for the Commission of Review and Parliament.[26]

5.4 Public officers as candidates

Under the Constitution, a candidate who is a public officer must resign to stand. The FEO raises two questions for review: whether that bar should reach officials of trade unions and employer organisations, who hold no public office; and whether a public officer might take leave during candidacy and resign only if elected, rather than forgoing all income from nomination onwards.[27]

The Commission and the FEO invite the Commission of Review to consider these points. They are matters of constitutional and electoral-law design on which the electoral administration offers a practical perspective rather than a fixed position.

5.5 Candidates remaining on the open list

Under the present open-list system, unsuccessful candidates remain on a party's list to fill later vacancies. They continue in law to be "candidates," with no lawful means of withdrawing from the list, yet in practice many take up public office in the interim — which casts doubt on their eligibility to be appointed when a vacancy arises.

The Commission and the FEO recommend that the Commission of Review and Parliament resolve the status of persons who remain on the open list. Whatever electoral system is adopted, the framework should make clear whether and how a person may withdraw from a party list, and whether holding interim public office affects eligibility to fill a vacancy, so that the position can be administered without dispute.

6. Stability of electoral law before an election

---

[26]Supreme Court advisory opinion (29 August 2025), declining to disturb the immunity and transitional provisions preserved by s 159(2)(a)–(b). The interaction between candidate disqualification and those immunity provisions is, accordingly, a matter for the Commission of Review and Parliament.

[27]Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013, s 57 (candidates who are public officers). The bar on public officers standing for election is said also to reach officials of registered trade unions and of employer organisations, who do not themselves hold public office.

The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners recommended a prohibition on substantial changes to electoral law in the year preceding an election.[28]

The Commission and the FEO recommend that the Constitution provide for stability in election year by ensuring that any amendment to electoral law made in election year does not take effect until after the general election, except where the Commission and the FEO are consulted and agree that earlier implementation is practicable. In the year before a general election the resources of the electoral administration must be devoted to preparing for and conducting the poll, not to absorbing new laws, systems and procedures, and late changes undermine public confidence and the equal treatment of contestants. A deferred-commencement rule, with a narrow consultation exception, is more workable than a flat prohibition and reflects established international good practice: the Venice Commission's Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters provides that the fundamental elements of electoral law should not be open to amendment less than one year before an election.[29]

7. Timing and announcement of the election

The date of a general election is presently within the discretion of the Prime Minister and the President, on as little as about six weeks' notice for one of the largest logistical exercises Fiji undertakes. The Constitution already supplies a partial timetable — a four-year term of Parliament, issue of the writ within seven days of its expiry, close of nominations 14 days later, and polling within 30 days of the close of nominations.[30]

The Commission and the FEO recommend that the Constitution provide greater certainty over the timing of the election — for example, a deemed election date applying if the date is not announced within a set period before the latest lawful date. A deemed date would give the electoral administration certainty to plan while leaving the executive its discretion to call an earlier election.

8. A unified electoral management body

[28]ELRC Report, pp 1 and 5 (prohibition on substantial amendment of electoral law within the year preceding an election).
[29]European Commission for Democracy through Law (Venice Commission), Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters, CDL-AD(2002)23rev, II.2.b: the fundamental elements of electoral law should not be open to amendment less than one year before an election.
[30]Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013, ss 58–61 (four-year term of Parliament; issue of the writ within seven days of the expiry of Parliament; close of nominations 14 days after the writ; polling within 30 days of the close of nominations).

The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners recommended merging the Electoral Commission and the Fijian Elections Office into a single unified body governed by three commissioners.[31] The Commission and the FEO address this recommendation in two parts.

8.1 Merger of the Electoral Commission and the Fijian Elections Office

The Commission and the FEO support the merger of the Electoral Commission and the Fijian Elections Office into a single, unified electoral management body. A single body with clear lines of authority would resolve the present division between the Commission, which sets policy, and the office that administers elections — a division that has in the past produced uncertainty and even litigation over the chain of command. A unified body strengthens institutional independence, accountability and efficiency, consistent with international good practice. New Zealand adopted precisely this course in 2010, merging its Electoral Commission and Chief Electoral Office into one body. The FEO shares this preferred architecture: a single, joined-up body led by a board of commissioners that includes the Supervisor of Elections as a full-time Commissioner and Chief Executive.[32]

8.2 Composition of the unified body

On the second part of the recommendation — that the body be governed by three commissioners — the Commission respectfully proposes a different composition.

The Commission proposes a five-member Commission, rather than three. The current Commission of seven members, with a quorum of four, is in the Commission's experience large and unwieldy. A body of only three, however, is too narrow, and does not adequately account for the workload that would fall on part-time commissioners in a unified institution. A membership of five — comprising a part-time Chairperson, three part-time Commissioners, and a full-time Chief Executive who is also a Commissioner — strikes the appropriate balance. The Office's position is that the board should comprise three or more commissioners; the Commission provides the direction that five is the appropriate number.[33]

The Commission further proposes that, in the transition to a unified body, the Supervisor of Elections become the Chief Executive of the unified electoral management body, responsible for the operational conduct of elections as at present, and that the Chief Executive sit as a Commissioner. This model — a small expert board including the chief electoral officer as an executive member — reflects the practice of comparable bodies in the region. New Zealand's Chief Electoral Officer serves as chief executive and a member of its Commission; Australia's [31] ELRC Report, pp 7–8 (merger of the Electoral Commission and the Fijian Elections Office into a single unified body governed by three commissioners).

---

[32] The Electoral Commission of New Zealand was formed in 2010 by merging the former Electoral Commission and the Chief Electoral Office into a single body; the Chief Electoral Officer serves as chief executive and a member of the Commission: International Standards & Best Practices working paper.

[33] Consistent with the five-member Electoral Commission provided for under the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 1997.

three-member Commission likewise includes the Electoral Commissioner alongside a judicial chair and a non-judicial member; and the FEO identifies Tonga as a further example of a single body led by such a board.[34] Closer to home, the Solomon Islands Electoral Commission follows the same approach: its Chief Electoral Officer sits as a member of the Commission, though as a non-voting member.[35] The Commission invites the Commission of Review to consider whether the Chief Executive should sit as a full voting Commissioner or, as in Solomon Islands, as a non-voting member.

The Commission is conscious that other jurisdictions take the opposite course and concentrate electoral authority in a single office-holder. Papua New Guinea, for example, vests its electoral functions in a sole — and powerful — Electoral Commissioner.[36] The Commission considers a collegial body preferable for Fiji. A small board diffuses authority, builds in internal checks, and guards against the over-concentration of power in one official that has been a feature of recent experience; it does so while retaining, through the Chief Executive, the operational clarity that a single accountable manager of elections provides.

The Commission recommends that members be appointed for staggered five-year terms. Under section 135 of the Constitution, members of the Electoral Commission presently hold office for only three years, whereas the Supervisor of Elections and most other independent office-holders hold office for five, and the Electoral Commissions under the 1970, 1990 and 1997 Constitutions each held five-year terms. A three-year term sits awkwardly within a four-year electoral cycle: a Commission's appointments can expire just as it is required to make critical decisions and complete its statutory reports. Members should be brought into the five-year category and appointed on a staggered basis, so that terms do not expire together and there is no gap in membership or loss of institutional knowledge between elections.[37][38]

8.3 The Registrar of Political Parties

[34]Australian Electoral Commission — a three-member Commission established by s 6 of the Commonwealth Electoral Act 1918 (Cth), comprising a chairperson (a serving or retired Federal Court judge), the Electoral Commissioner, and a non-judicial member: International Standards & Best Practices working paper.

[35]The Solomon Islands Electoral Commission comprises three appointed members together with the Chief Electoral Officer, who sits as a fourth member of the Commission but does not vote on its decisions: Constitution of Solomon Islands (as amended in 2018) and Electoral Act 2018 (Solomon Islands), the Chief Electoral Officer being appointed under s 57A of the Constitution.

[36]By contrast, the Papua New Guinea Electoral Commission is headed by a single Electoral Commissioner — a sole office-holder with extensive powers — established by the Constitution of the Independent State of Papua New Guinea (s 126) and appointed for a term of six years.

[37]Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013, ss 134–135. Under s 135, members of the Electoral Commission hold office for three years, whereas the Supervisor of Elections and most other independent office-holders hold office for five years. The Electoral Commissions under the 1970, 1990 and 1997 Constitutions each held five-year terms.

[38]Electoral Commission and Supervisor of Elections, 2022 General Election Joint Report, p 16 (synchronising the terms of Commission members with the four-year electoral cycle, and appointing members on a staggered basis to preserve a quorum and institutional knowledge).

At present the Supervisor of Elections also holds the office of Registrar of Political Parties. That office is not established by the Constitution; it is created by the Political Parties (Registration, Conduct, Funding and Disclosures) Act 2013, and the role has in practice been conferred on the Supervisor.[39] The result is that a single official both conducts elections and registers, regulates and may deregister the political parties that contest them. That concentration of functions has attracted concern, particularly where a party may be removed from the register by the same office that administers the poll.

The position is complicated further by the Commission's own role. Appeals against the decisions of the Registrar are heard by the Electoral Commission, as are complaints against the decisions of the Supervisor.[40] Under the unified body now proposed, the Supervisor of Elections would become the Chief Executive and sit as a Commissioner. Were that same office also to hold the registry, the Commission would be reviewing, on appeal, the first-instance decisions of one of its own members — an arrangement that cannot be reconciled with the impartiality the appellate function demands.

The Commission therefore recommends that, upon the commencement of the transition to a unified electoral management body, the office of Registrar of Political Parties be separated from the Chief Executive and vested in a distinct officer who is accountable to the Commission but is not a Commissioner. The sequencing matters: the separation should take effect as the unified body is established, so that the registry function is never combined with the office that conducts the poll, nor held by a member of the body that hears appeals against the Registrar. Such a separation was expressly contemplated by the terms of reference of the Electoral Law Reform Commissioners, which called for it to secure the independence of the Registrar.[41] The Commission's appellate role over the Registrar is thereby preserved and made genuinely independent, because the Registrar no longer sits on the Commission. This can be achieved through amendment of the Political Parties Act and need not be entrenched in the Constitution; the Commission asks only that the constitutional framework not stand in the way of such a separation.

8.4 Independence and appointment

Whatever its final size, the unified body must be genuinely independent. The Commission recommends that the Constitution entrench its independence and provide for an appointment process in which the role of the executive is limited, the criteria for appointment are clear and [39]The office of Registrar of Political Parties is established by the Political Parties (Registration, Conduct, Funding and Disclosures) Act 2013, not by the Constitution. In practice the Supervisor of Elections holds the office of Registrar; the present Supervisor of Elections also serves as Registrar of Political Parties.

[40]Political Parties (Registration, Conduct, Funding and Disclosures) Act 2013, s 30(1): appeals against decisions of the Registrar of Political Parties are heard by the Electoral Commission. Complaints against decisions of the Supervisor of Elections are likewise determined by the Electoral Commission under s 17 of the Electoral Act 2014.

[41]The terms of reference of the Electoral Law Reform Commissioners expressly called for separating the roles of the Supervisor of Elections and the Registrar of Political Parties so as to secure the independence of the office of the Registrar: ELRC Report and terms of reference.

objective, and members are barred from standing as candidates. These safeguards reflect the international standards for electoral management bodies and are essential to public confidence in the impartiality of the institution.[42]

9. The Senate

The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners recommended the re-establishment of an apolitical Senate, with half of its members appointed by indigenous councils — the Great Council of Chiefs and the Rotuma Council — and the remainder drawn from diverse ethnic and social groups, serving staggered terms.[43]

> The Commission takes no fixed position on whether an Upper House should be re-established; this is a matter for the Commission of Review. The Commission observes only that, should the consensus be to reintroduce a Senate, at least half of its membership should be elected, so that the chamber carries a measure of democratic legitimacy. The Commission notes the substance of the proposal for staggered five-year terms as a means of preserving institutional knowledge across successive Parliaments.

10. Matters touching the Commission's mandate

The Electoral Law Reform Commissioners recommended a two-term limit for the Prime Minister, a mandatory retirement age of 75, and a Westminster-style caretaker government during the campaign period.[44]

> The Commission and the FEO consider term limits and a retirement age to be questions of constitutional and political design that lie outside their administrative mandate, and they defer to the Commission of Review. Caretaker government stands differently. Although the design of a caretaker model appears, at first sight, to lie beyond the purview of an electoral management body, the conduct of the executive during the campaign and polling period bears directly on the integrity and fairness of the election.

At a recent workshop the FEO held for political parties on campaign limitations, the representatives of the eight parties present consistently identified the misuse of parliamentary incumbency during the campaign as their principal concern — concerns that might be addressed

[42]International IDEA, Electoral Management Design Handbook, and Council of Europe guidance: government should have a limited role in the formation of an independent electoral authority; appointment criteria should be clear and objective; members should not stand as candidates; and standardised training should be provided.
[43]ELRC Report, p 9 and pp 9–10 (re-establishment of an apolitical Senate, with members appointed by the Great Council of Chiefs and the Rotuma Council and from diverse communities; staggered five-year terms).
[44]ELRC Report, pp 1 and 7 (two-term limit for the Prime Minister; mandatory retirement age of 75; Westminster-style caretaker government during the campaign period).

in part by rules made by the Commission under the Electoral Act, but that the parties agreed would be overcome by an effective caretaker-government model in the Constitution.[45]

The Commission and the FEO invite the Commission of Review to consider establishing an effective caretaker-government model in the Constitution. Both bodies observe only that caretaker conventions, in so far as they govern the conduct of the executive during the campaign and polling period, bear directly on the integrity of the electoral process. The Commission would welcome the opportunity to advise on caretaker conventions as they affect election administration.

[45]Electoral Act 2014, s 155 (rules made by the Electoral Commission). Concerns about the use of parliamentary incumbency during the campaign were raised consistently by the political parties at a Fijian Elections Office workshop on campaign limitations.

11. Summary of recommendations

The positions of the Commission and the FEO are summarised below. They should be read together with the reasoning and references in the body of this submission.

Matter	The joint position of the Commission and the FEO
Electoral system	Endorses a lower party-vote threshold and a mixed system giving voters a direct local representative alongside proportional party representation; final design a matter for the Commission of Review and Parliament.
Women's representation	Supports temporary special measures, including reserved seats for women; the number of seats left to the Commission of Review and the legislature.
Boundary delimitation	No boundaries commission exists in the 2013 Constitution; if a constituency-based or mixed system is adopted, recommends an apolitical Constituency Boundaries Commission established in the Constitution, covering national and local-government boundaries.
Prisoner voting	Supports removal of the blanket disqualification of serving prisoners.
Disability and "unsound mind"	Recommends removing the "unsound mind" disqualification and related terminology and rights-based redrafting consistent with the CRPD, realised through reasonable accommodation and progressive realisation, with safeguards against undue influence in supported voting.
Compulsory or voluntary voting	Recommends retaining voluntary voting, with continued investment in voter outreach rather than compulsion.
Candidate eligibility	Supports eligibility of dual citizens and of persons who have completed a custodial sentence (with clearer offence thresholds); invites review of the "public office" bar (trade-union and employer officials) and of permanent resignation versus unpaid leave; and resolution of the status of candidates remaining on the open list. Coup-related immunity left to the Commission of Review.
Stability of electoral law	Recommends that election-year amendments not take effect until after the poll, subject to a narrow exception where the Commission and the FEO agree earlier commencement is practicable.
Timing of the election	Recommends a deemed election date if none is announced within six months of the latest possible date; constitutional footing for a mid-week polling holiday; and a longer, extendable writ-to-poll period.
Unified electoral management body	Both bodies support merging the Commission and the FEO;the Commission directing that five is appropriate, including the Chief Executive as a Commissioner, with staggered five-year terms (s 135).
Registrar of Political Parties	On transition to a unified body, separate the Registrar from the Chief Executive and vest it in a distinct officer accountable to the Commission, preserving the Commission's independent role in hearing appeals against the Registrar; a statutory matter under the Political Parties Act 2013.
Senate	No fixed position; if an Upper House is re-established, at least half should be elected.
Executive limitations and caretaker government	Term limits and retirement age left to the Commission of Review; both bodies invite consideration of an effective caretaker-government model, which parties identified as key to fair campaigning.

Respectfully submitted,

Chairperson
Electoral Commission of the Republic of Fiji

Supervisor of Elections
Chief Executive, Fijian Elections Office
30/06/26

Dr Mosmi Bhim

Doctor Mosmi Bhim
Date: 1 -7-2026
12pm-1pm

Mr. Valenitabua: Good afternoon. Okay, I'll call the consultation to order. Dr. Bhim, welcome to the Constitution Review Commission.We have four commissioners here. On my left is Dr. Neelesh Gounder and Mr Conway Beg. And on the far right is Ms. Nailatikau. I am Sevuloni Valenitabua, the Charperson. We welcome you. And we have an hour. I think we are at quarter past twelve now. We have the consultation to be completed by 1pm. We have a very tight schedule. So, without further ado, please make your submission to us. A summary would be fine. If you have a written form, a written version, we'd like to have that after.

Ms. Bhim: Okay, I'll email the written version to you.

Thank you. Thank you very much for allowing me this opportunity to make my submission. Before beginning my presentation, I would like to express a disclaimer that these views are my own opinions as an academic researcher or an expert in political sciences.

And they do not represent the Fiji National University where I am employed. Democratic integrity refers to practices, policies, procedures, laws and values that protect and ensure democracy is upheld and decisions are not undermined or subverted through practices such as corruption, nepotism, violation of human rights and interference in the democratic process of making and implementing laws. So, in this vein of democratic integrity, in my submission, I will discuss recommendations regarding democracy, electoral reforms and ending the coup culture in Fiji.

So, Fiji remains in a position of transition to democracy. It's a state, it reached independence. So, let me explain it.

When a country becomes independent, it does not automatically mean just by having elections they are a full democracy. It means they have started the phase of democracy, which means they have entered a phase of transition to democracy. So, what has happened in Fiji is that because of the repeated coups we've had, we've actually kept going backwards into authoritarian rule.

And this has meant that now, after the current election, we have gone back to a stage of transition to democracy, where we were at independence. So, that's the finding from my PhD thesis. Prior to independence, Fiji was under colonial authoritarian rule.

So, being under the British rule meant that it was an authoritarian rule, because our people were not free to choose their leaders, to make decisions for them. Following the 1987, 2000 and 2006 coups, Fiji underwent periods of different types of authoritarian rule. Electoral authoritarian governments were in power after the 2014 and 2018 elections.

Following the 1987 coup, we went into a period of civil military coalition rule. So, it was an unelected government, although we did not have a military personnel as prime minister, all the decisions were being made behind the scenes. So, it was a civil military coalition government.

Then, after the 2000 coup, we also had a brief period of civil military coalition rule, before we went to electoral governance. And after the 2006 coup, it was a more severe form of authoritarian rule. It was called a personalist military dictatorship.

So, why is it personalist? Because there is excessive power in the hands of one person. And of course, because it was a militarized rule. But we are lucky in Fiji, we haven't had violence and bloodshed.

So, this still makes us much better than other parts of the world, where they have authoritarian rule and they've had violence. So, electoral authoritarian governments were in power after the 2014 and 2018 elections. Because although we had elections in 2014 and 2018, the government in power was still behaving in an authoritarian manner, which is why it's called electoral authoritarian.

We've had elections, there were elections, but the manner of rule is still authoritarian. Fiji returned to transition to democracy after the 2022 elections. So, we have heard about the prime minister making unilateral decisions, for example.

But despite all those actions by the prime minister, the current government after the 2022 elections is, we have gone back to transition to democracy, which was after independence, also after 2001, 1999, and after the 2006 elections, the brief period by prime minister, under prime minister Mr Laisenia Qarase. So, why are we back to transition to democracy, and not electoral authoritarian? Because what we see in our country is, we seem to have free media, this freedom of the press, our judiciary is independent, they don't seem to have predetermined outcomes. And these are some of the crucial features to assess, whether a country has returned to some form of democracy, or still under some form of authoritarian rule.

What this means is that Fiji is not a consolidated democracy, and risks exist for it to revert back into authoritarian rule. A consolidated democracy is a full democracy, where there are no risks to overthrow of the government. Which means majority of the citizens in all sectors of society, understand democracy and uphold it.

So even if anybody wants to overthrow the government, it won't work, because the citizens won't support it. So that's a consolidated democracy. So all citizens, public and private institutions, as well as civil society organizations, need to work together to uphold democracy, as democracy is everyone's responsibility.

It's not the responsibility of parliamentarians alone, it's not the responsibility of NGOs alone, it is not the responsibility of democracy activists alone, it is the responsibility of each and every one of us. Democracy will work if all of us uphold it. So Fiji has had four constitutions since independence, the 1970, 1990, 1997 and the current 2013 constitution.

The process for 1970 constitution was top-down, with Fiji's political leaders brought to London for constitutional talks. Following the 1987 coup, the 1990 constitution process was also top-down, with limited consultation on a pre-prepared document, which was later promulgated. The 1997 constitution was one that was made through processes of democratic integrity, with wide consultations with the public, discussions and open debate.

During the 2012 constitutional review, there was also a process of widespread consultation with the public. However, democratic integrity was not upheld when the leaders rejected the 2012 draft constitution document. Instead, they promulgated the pre-prepared 2013 constitution, without any consultation with the public, and without any parliamentary approval process.

The current 2026 constitutional review process is consultative. The 1997 constitution was considered a progressive constitution, as it had a Bill of Rights, provisions for a Human Rights Commission, ombudsmen and accountability and transparency measures, as well as provisions for power sharing. The 2013 constitution retained human rights, but placed limitations on some of these rights.

The 2013 constitution had provisions for immunity for coup makers, and enhanced guardian role of the military, without specifying what this meant. But the positive features of the 2013 constitution are the removal of race-based voting system, recognition of equal citizenry from all, and a proportional representation system. Lessons can be learned from past constitutions to propose improvements through the current review process.

Below are some suggestions to improve provisions in the revised constitution. These are in three parts, which are electoral reform, protecting democratic integrity, and political-military reform to end the coup culture. For electoral reform, some of these were also presented during the electoral act review process.

A single national constituency is unfair on political candidates, as they do not have sufficient resources to campaign in the whole country. It favours well-known personalities and leaders. It needs to be removed and replaced with constituencies.

Constituencies will make campaigning fairer for candidates, and easier for electorate to hold the elected accountable. The non-ethnic-based one-person, one-vote should be retained. A 30% quota for women should be implemented, as one in three women are victims of domestic violence and sexual abuse, and women bear higher burden of unpaid care work.

The Rotumans need to be recognised as an indigenous ethnic group, whose language, culture and identity are endangered of being wiped out, due to their very small composition. One seat should be reserved for Rotumans. It is the responsibility of the mainstream-majority ethnic group, the iTaukei, to protect the marginalised minority indigenous Rotumans, and ensure their land, culture and language are preserved.

Educational institutes, non-government organisations, civil society organisations, as well as interest groups and grassroots groupings should all be provided an enabling environment to discuss electoral issues and educate others themselves. Restrictions on voter education activities should be removed. Fiji government receives a high proportion of foreign donor aid to conduct national elections.

The Fiji government values election aid, and does not regard it as unfair influence on elections. It is therefore unfair for the Fiji government to benefit from foreign aid while penalising voter education conducted via foreign donor funding. And this restriction should be removed from the Electoral Act.

Whereby in the Act, Section 110A of the Act is on opinion polls, surveys or research on elections, which now require permission from the Fijian elections office. And Electoral Act 2014, Section 115 places restrictions on foreign funded educational activities on voting and elections after the writ of elections is issued. And these restrictions should be removed, as was promised in the manifesto of the current coalition government before they came into power.

They promised to remove these restrictions. So these should be removed, because the requirement for FEO approval on elections related research and publications violate academic freedom. Universities and academic journals have own stringent ethical and editorial checks and approvals utilised worldwide.

It is unfair that those enjoying immunity from coup prosecutions freely contest elections. Those immune from prosecutions should be barred from contesting elections for four to eight years or fully. Currently, if someone has served a jail term of one year, they are barred from contesting elections for eight years.

So similar restrictions should apply to those who enjoy immunity from prosecution. The electoral system should protect democracy and not coup makers. Banimarama stated there would be a two-term limit for prime ministers in the new constitution.

We have examined the whole of the 2013 constitution and we have not found the two-term limit there. We therefore request that this two-term limit should be included in the new constitution so that there is a limit on the time in power that prime ministers have. The 5% threshold is unfair and unjust.

There should be no threshold to enter parliament. If there is a threshold, it should be reduced to 1%. Penalties ranging from $5,000 to $10,000 to $50,000.

And from five years to ten years convictions are too high. So these kind of penalties are in our electoral act 2014. It's in the 2013 constitution and it is in most of the acts that were promulgated after the 2009 abrogation of the constitution and which became laws.

They became acts after the 2014 elections. So it was a promise of the government to review these legislations. Now another election is approaching and we are still faced with these harsh penalties for minor offences.

In a democracy we have to encourage citizens to participate. We should provide them an enabling environment to participate. And if the penalties are too high, the fines are too high, and jail terms are too high for small offences, it actually is a disincentive for people to stand in elections.

So that's the rationale behind it. Penalties should only be fines between $50 and $1,000. Criminal conviction should be removed for minor misdemeanours as severe penalties intimidate citizens from contesting elections.

Protection of democratic integrity. For the sake of democratic integrity, the revised Fiji constitution needs to protect and safeguard democracy. The current 2013 constitution, by providing immunity to coup makers, not only undermines the rule of law, but also undermines democracy itself.

The immunity clause needs to be removed. The immunity clause is protecting treason and coup crimes. The immunity clause is not protecting democracy.

It is violating democracy. Immunity violates the military ethics which requires a soldier to sacrifice themselves for the nation. A good soldier, an ethical soldier, is supposed to be one who is willing to sacrifice their safety for the nation.

But through immunity for coups, the opposite is happening. Soldiers are sacrificing the nation to protect themselves. So which is why it should be removed because it's in fact opposite of military ethics.

To protect democratic integrity, coup makers who violated democracy by removing elected governments from power should not be allowed to contest elections or hold the positions of prime minister, ministers or president. Treason offences are not pardonable and must not be rewarded. The president must be an accomplished person with no convictions.

Only elected persons should be allowed to hold positions of prime minister and ministers. To further encourage change in leaders through democratic parliamentary means, political parties need to practice a system of rotation whereby two or three identified people in the party or the coalition can take turns in the prime minister role. This will prevent authoritarianism in the prime minister's actions.

There needs to be greater accountability for the prime minister's and president's actions to prevent unilateral decisions. One person must not serve as a prime minister for more than one year. Esteemed members of the commission, this system is already being practiced in Switzerland.

Under the theme that all decisions should be made in a collective way. It is anchored in article 177 of the Federal Constitution of Switzerland whereby the co-goals of Swiss politics is achieving consensus and making sure nobody can grab too much power. Essentially, it means the government is collective and non-hierarchical, the ministers who represent the country's four biggest parties decide as equals.

There is no prime minister pulling the strings. The presidency rotates among the seven ministers each year and is largely a ceremonial and coordination role. So this provides a big lesson for Fiji.

Switzerland has a population of 9 million and it has only seven ministers. Each minister serves one year as prime minister. This prevents authoritarian dictatorial power in the prime minister.

Whereas in Fiji, we have a population of only 900,000 and we have, I believe, about maybe 20 ministers. Yes, and we have also blown our budget. We have a big budget deficit.

Where there is dissension or opposition to the prime minister, another person from the party or coalition can be selected for prime minister, such as in Australia and Great Britain. We have seen over the past few years that the party felt they no longer had confidence in the prime minister and they selected another person from the party to serve as the prime minister. In severe cases of lack of confidence, a minority government can be appointed.

As has happened in Fiji in the past, when Ratu Mara was appointed as head of a minority government in 1977. The emphasis here is that a government must be from elected members only and an unelected government should not be allowed. The military needs to be subservient to the rule of law and no provisions should give them any extra powers or benefits, which means the military cannot override the police.

The Minister for policing needs to be a civilian to ensure non-interference of military in policing. Currently our medical services are in a crisis. Medical and education sectors suffer shortage of staff, whereas medical sector is an essential sector.

Medical professionals need to be recognised as essential workers and medical facilities to be recognised as essential services where the government needs to place priority to ensure up-to-date medical facilities and provisions of essential medications. We have shortage of medications, we have shortage of equipment in hospitals. Compared to that, our military has up-to-date military equipment.

This is just a comparison of where our country's priorities align because education and health are measures of economic development. A country is considered developed when they improve in their education and health sectors, but these are the sectors in Fiji that are the most poorly performing where we have shortage of staff and run-down facilities. The Great Council of Chiefs need to be an accountable and transparent organisation who are required to take an oath not to support coup-makers or illegal changeover of government.

This oath should be included in oaths of all ministers, prime ministers and presidents. Chair of the commission, the Great Council of Chiefs always has had powers except under the 2013 constitution. They also had powers as members of the senate and these powers were there as a safety measure but when coups happened we found that the Chiefs have not used this safety measure.

They have not gone to the Senate to make a decision to emphasise how governments can be changed in a legal way and in fact many chiefs have instead chosen to join coup-makers. That's why it's very important that the great council of chiefs more powers are being proposed to them. But if more powers are being proposed to them it's good they are a traditional institution, they are here to safeguard cultural and traditional values but there must be accountability.

There was no need for the 1987 and 2000 coups. If the chiefs felt that the government in power was not representing the indigenous regions actions or indigenous politicians felt that it was not representing their interests they could have utilised a no confidence motion in parliament. The no confidence motion can be utilised.

It is legal, it is democratic which means there is no need for a coup. If there is no confidence in a government a no confidence motion can be moved. Or the senate could have used its prerogative to vote in a motion of no confidence in the prime minister in year 2000 and in 1987.

So these are features of democracy that can be utilised. There is no need for a coup to change a government. There are measures already in place in a democratic system which can be utilised to change government if leaders are unpopular or they feel leaders are not serving a majority of the people's interests.

Democracy is everyone's responsibility. This includes not just parliament, government, political parties but the private sector, religious organisations, sports bodies, workers' unions, employers' organisations, military, police, village and town residents, health workers, street cleaners, professional organisations, schools, universities and all members of the wider civil society. A majority must believe and uphold democracy at all times.

Rule of law and core principles of human rights are vital components of democracy. This includes right to equality and freedom from discrimination. In this vein, Fiji should remain a secular state.

Giving state recognition to one religion will violate the right to freedom of religion and belief and risks Fiji being classified as an undemocratic religious fundamentalist state. Currently, the fundamentalist states, undemocratic religious fundamentalist states are countries such as Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Afghanistan. So if we make one religion official, we will fall in their category.

We will not fall in the category of a fully democratic nation. Fiji constitution has been removed in the aftermath of coups by Fiji's military and new constitutions have been adopted by governments led by military coup leaders. The security sector needs to be reformed to prevent coups in Fiji and removal of constitution.

And the constitution itself needs to have safeguards to prevent coup leaders from holding public office. These are some of the reforms that I had proposed earlier which can hopefully end coup culture. These recommendations are proposed to end coup culture in Fiji and strengthen democracy.

Of course, they all need further discussion but if we all share our views and we start discussing, we will end up with something that we know may be right. So these recommendations include having constitutional safeguards, reforming the military and to stop undermining law enforcement sector through military interference and intrusion. Constitutional provisions to safeguard democracy to prevent unelected persons, military or civilian because civilian people have also carried out coups.

So to prevent either military or civilian from forming government who are unelected, constitution needs provision that only elected parliamentarians can be sworn in to positions of prime minister and ministers. The vote of no confidence motion should be an option for prime minister's democratic changeover. The leader does not have to serve the full electoral term as the prime minister.

A leeway must be provided to winning political party to change the prime minister by selecting a replacement from elected party members if the prime minister loses the confidence of the party or the parliament or segments of society or institutions. Coup participants should not be eligible to stand in elections, should not be a member of parliament and should not be eligible for positions of prime minister and positions of the country. Coup participants should not be eligible for employment in the civil service, statutory bodies, independent institutions and security forces.

These are some measures to reform the military to prevent coups. They may already belong to the military because they are already undergoing their own reform process. Firstly, it's to reduce the size of Fiji's military.

In a white paper, the National Security and Defense Review conducted in 2004, they had recommended reducing the size of Fiji's military by half. So the Honorable Laisenia Qarase was removed from power in 2006. Otherwise, in an interview that I conducted with him for my PhD thesis, he had expressed that was a solution to the coup culture in Fiji because in that national security report, they identified the big size of the military as one of the threats to Fiji's democracy.

Military service should be temporary, with soldiers serving 5 to 10 years only in the RFMF. It is because soldiering is not a lifelong career in Fiji because not all soldiers can serve until retirement. When people enlist as a soldier in Fiji's military, the active service of fighting is when they go for peacekeeping because Fiji does not have civil conflict.

We don't have wars. So therefore, they only experience in this kind of wars when they go for peacekeeping. By the time soldiers are 40, they cannot go for peacekeeping.

They have to find another profession. Therefore, soldiering is not a lifelong career envisaged for soldiers in Fiji. It ends for soldiers when they reach middle age.

Experienced soldiers with no career beyond middle age are at risk of incentive to carry out a coup and it provides opportunity to gain senior positions in government institutions, diplomatic corps and statutory bodies. Such scenario occurred after the 1987 and 2006 coups in Fiji where soldiers have benefited by being appointed to senior government positions, diplomatic corps and statutory bodies. To prevent a repeat of such incidents, service in Fiji's military needs to be for temporary period of 5 to 10 years and soldiers should be provided assistance to move on to other permanent careers that they can last in until their retirement.

Fiji's military needs to undergo a process of civil military reform to enhance understanding of the role of a soldier in a democracy. They may already be undergoing this process of reform but I have just mentioned it here as well. We need to prevent undermining of law enforcement sector by the military.

After 1987 and 2006 coups, authority of the Fiji police force was undermined. Very visible action of undermining civilian police force occurred when police were not allowed to lead the police force as commissioners. Instead, senior military officers were appointed to the role of police commissioner.

This included Isikeli Sabuwa, Esala Teleni, Ioane Naivalarua and most recently Sitiveni Qiliho. Former police commissioners Andrew Hughes, Ben Grunewald and Rusiate Tudravu revealed about interference and intimidation by the military during their tenure as police commissioners. In a democracy, all are subservient to the rule of law.

To safeguard democracy, the police force needs to operate as independent police force that is subservient to the rule of law and that is not undermined by the military or the prime minister or the army commander. Democracy theorists have written widely about the dangers to democracy if the military is allowed any role in the police. To ensure that democracy is not undermined by intrusion of the military in the police, there needs to be a clear demarcation or a clear separation of the roles and responsibilities of the military and the police.

Members of the military and former military officers must not be appointed to the roles of police commissioner or the head of correction service or to any other role in the police or prisons. The military must not be used for any civilian policing roles and activities. The realm of the military needs to be restricted to defending from outside threats and to disaster relief works and only a limited role to assist police in emergencies and that's only if the police request for assistance.

In exchange for immunity, people who played key roles in executing coups, whether civilian or military, must give up something. They should not hold senior public service positions. They've got to get out of jail free card, basically, by having immunity from coup prosecution.

By doing the most serious crime, which is a crime of treason, under the 1997 constitution and Fiji's own laws, the penalty for treason was death by hanging. But in the aftermath of coups, the coup makers have received immunity. Not just soldiers, but civilians as well.

So immunity has not been just for soldiers, it has also been for civilians who have supported coups and benefited from coups. So we must distinguish that civilians have also benefited from coups through senior appointments, etc. and through immunity provisions.

So people, whether civilian or military, who have received immunity and whose immunity will not be taken away, must give up something. They should not hold senior public service positions. They should not stand in elections to become members of parliament.

They should not become government ministers, prime minister and president. Who is the most serious offence for a soldier to make? In foreign countries, this crime of treason results in permanent disgrace and never again to be employed in the military. It should be considered how people who played key roles in coups can be removed from the military in exchange for the immunity from prosecution that they are enjoying.

Future coup makers' penalties should include permanent removal from the military as well as public service and election as members of parliaments. The people of Fiji remain hopeful that this constitution review will bring about amendments that will strengthen democratic integrity in Fiji and thereby move Fiji forward on the path to strengthen democracy. Lastly, I want to say a big thank you to the organizers of today's event and to members of the Constitution Review Commission for providing me this opportunity to share these ideas and views on this topic of national importance.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Thank you, Dr. Bhim. Thank you very much for that submission.

We look forward to receiving a copy of your submission for our deliberations. Thank you. We have listened to you, we have made our own notes, but we would prefer to have a copy of your submission.

Commissioners, any comments? We usually have comments and questions at the end of the session.

Dr Neelesh: Thank you, Chair, and thank you, Dr. Mosmi, for your submission today. Just a few clarifying questions. Number one, you talked about the threshold, which means that you are supporting keeping the one constituency that is under the current electoral system?

Dr. Bhim: No, actually. I had mentioned in my presentation that the single constituency should be removed and we should have multiple constituencies. Okay.

Dr. Neelesh: So if we have multiple constituencies, then the threshold argument vanishes away?

Dr.Bhim: Okay, thanks for the clarification.

Yeah. Okay.

Dr Neelesh: Because the threshold only works in the single open constituency system unless you are proposing in any other system where you are talking about both constituency and threshold. That is not what you are talking about. Is that right?

Dr .Bhim: No, actually.

Dr. Neelesh: Thank you. And we have received numerous submissions on moving away from a communal system of voting, but I see you have advocated for a communal seat. Is that correct?

Dr .Bhim: No, I have not advocated for a communal seat.

I have only advocated for one reserved seat for Rotumans. Because Rotumans are a minority group in Fiji. I believe they may be less than 1% of the population.

And this year in New Zealand, they had a special occasion to recognize how endangered the Rotumans are. And it is only for that reason. And it cannot be given that reserved seat in any other country because they are an indigenous group of Fiji only.

And being a very minority community, that's the only reason the reserved seat is being proposed. Not for any other communities who are majorities, supermajority or one-third majorities. But only for the Rotumans.

I'm proposing a reserved seat. Thank you.

Ms Nailatikau: Thank you, Ms. Bhim, for your submission. There are touch points in your submission relating to the military that are threaded through some of the submissions that the RFMF made in their submission to the Commission last week. And it also brings to mind how even around the events of 1970 there were discussions about the size of Fiji's military and the different implications of continuing in terms of a military as an independent country or in our transition towards democratic governance.

But I also am drawing attention to your example that you drew from Switzerland in terms of the unique type of set-up that they've undertaken there. And the clarifying question there is that that would assume a type of coalition arrangement within the parties in government when a prime ministership would be rotated just for the purpose of discussion. I thought I'd ask you to expand on that.

Dr. Bhim: Yes. From what I understand, Switzerland has a very unique form of democracy. It's called a consociational democracy.

So they don't have any opposition. They elect the members of parliament and there's no one in the opposition. And despite having no opposition members, they are all able to hold their ministers accountable.

And interestingly, Switzerland also has a conscription service, you know, where all adults must serve in the military for one year. And this has not ended up making the nation militarized and there has been no coups or grab for power by the military. So I guess there are a lot of lessons we can learn.

Of course, Fiji is unique. We are different. We cannot be like Switzerland, but we can still learn some useful lessons from the other countries.

Mr Beg: Yes, the question on Switzerland is a unique situation, but they're not governed by or settled with unique culture that we have or multi-racial society. But moving on, your point on health, well-being and education is a crucial point that you've raised. And I guess we've heard this a lot amongst the people in terms of the committees who presented to us.

But those points are taken on board. And I've also noted your comments about the role of the RFMF and the police force. Again, as Commissioner Mere said, there were some presentations on how they would deal with that.

But thank you for your presentation. I appreciate that. Thank you, Chair.

Dr. Bhim: There's one more point. I forgot to write it here. I had thought about adding it.

It's a request to the Constitutional Review Commission to include in their recommendation that the increase in size of the military needs to be debated in Parliament. This has been suggested by many people. Two weeks back, we had the Economic Forum, a stakeholder consultation.

And over there, last week, I think, in the Budget Forum, we had questioned the Ministry of Finance about an increase of 10,000 in the civil service since the last government, and where all the increase came from. So they mentioned the police force, they mentioned the health sector and other sectors, but they did not mention the increase in the size of the military. Whereas we've heard in the news and other forums that the military has increased by about 1,000 soldiers at least.

So all sectors of the government, all sectors of the state that are paid by taxpayers needs to be transparent. If there's been an increase in size of the military, just like the police force, they tell everyone how many police are there and how many police numbers they've increased by. And the budget is debated in the same way.

It should also be for the military, where any increase in size of the military should be debated in Parliament. It might be one of the measures to hold the RFMF accountable for use of their funds. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Ms. Bhim, still on the military, you are suggesting to the Commission that soldiers are to serve for five to ten years only. Was that your submission?

Dr. Bhim: Yes, actually. I also made this submission to the National Security and Defence Review two years back.

I have a question for you. These days, our people go for job security, right? And those who prefer to join the military anticipate and some expect to serve until they are 55 years old. Now, you were saying that if soldiers serve beyond the ten years, then they would be prone to... they won't have any employable opportunity after more than ten years.

Remembering that soldiering is just soldiering. And that might create that atmosphere where they think of taking over government so that they can have the advantage of being employed in government ministries. Was that what you said or not? Yes.

Dr. Bhim: Yes? Okay. Because soldiering is a profession that relies on physical fitness. And beyond middle age, the physical fitness element is not there anymore for these kinds of professions such as soldiering, for example.

That's why they have a cut-off age for peacekeeping. Beyond middle age, you cannot enlist in peacekeeping, I have heard. And also, only a few soldiers can go up to senior positions.

So what happens to the other soldiers who probably never will go up to seniors?

Mr. Valenitabua: Soldiers are being employed up to 55 years old now. Okay. They are employed up to 55 years old.

That is their cut-off. What I'm saying is, what about job security? Are we going to deny them job security by limiting their years of services?

Dr. Bhim: Mr. Chair, my concern is the shortage of labour that we have in the other sectors. The Fiji Employers' Federation, they conducted the Skills Assessment Survey, and we have a huge shortage of skilled people in the other sectors.

Mr. Valenitabua: How does that affect the army?

Dr. Bhim: Because if we are a small country, and if we have so many strong, capable, intelligent men who go and enlist as soldiers, we have less strong, intelligent men for the other sectors. So if they stop doing high recruitment in the military, because I did interviews in three different countries about why people become soldiers, and many of the reasons was job security. They are much better paid than the other professions, and one very big incentive was overseas travel and training.

So Fiji is one of the biggest drawcards for joining the military is overseas travel and training. So instead, those incentives should be provided in the other professions, so that our strong, healthy men, instead of joining the military in such big numbers for those incentives, will actually join the other sectors so that we can have a skilled workforce where we can benefit from these strong, intelligent men, and we don't have to hire foreigners to work in these sectors. That's the other point we do need to have a look at.

We have oversupply in one sector, and we have shortages in the other sector. So there's a mismatch definitely somewhere. I see.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Alright, thank you for that. You also made a suggestion that elected persons only are to hold positions of PM and ministers.

Am I correct? Yes. Did I misread you? Alright. Now, suggestions have been made to us, and there's a provision in the Constitution that we can bring in people from outside who are qualified to take up positions in Parliament if there's no one there fit enough to do the job.

For example, the Attorney General can be brought from outside of Parliament, non-elected, to take up the position of the Attorney General, and that is in the current Constitution. Are you suggesting that that should not happen, and that we only have elected persons to take up the position of Attorney General, Prime Minister, and Ministers.

Dr .Bhim: That kind of appointment should only be made in very exceptional circumstances. So in this situation, for example, Mr. Graham Leung was appointed Attorney General because the Prime Minister felt that there was not anyone with a very high level of experience to do the kind of big legislative reforms that he envisaged, and it was only for that reason.

And what happened is that because he was not elected, he didn't have the safeguards that elected parliamentarians have. Elected parliamentarians have the safeguard of serving their full term, whereas a person who is appointed can also be terminated, as was done with Mr. Graham Leung. He was appointed, and then he was terminated as well without any recourse to compensation.

So a parliament and a government in a democracy, when we have a representative democracy, there are supposed to be those who rule on our behalf are supposed to have the consent of the people, and the people consent to them being in power by voting for them. So if we do bring anyone in for any position, it has to be very exceptional circumstances because at the end of the day, if they are not elected, that means the people have not chosen them to represent their interests. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Just one last question. The last question. Switzerland, you have referred to Switzerland.

You said there were seven ministers only? Yes. Seven ministers, and seven or nine? A population of nine million and seven ministers. And the prime minister, it's a rotation.

Does Switzerland have political parties?

Dr. Bhim: Yes, I think so. I've kind of forgotten, but yes, they do have political parties. They have direct democracy there.

Direct democracy is when all citizens get a chance to have a say on any new legislations that are performed. Yes, I'm just concerned. With nine million people, seven ministers, do they have political parties? How do they get to vote or to appoint seven ministers? We have how many political parties? Three mainly here in Fiji for now.

Mr. Valenitabua: You know, just a comparison. Yeah. I mean, that's it. I won't ask any more questions in relation to that. Thank you. Well, time has caught up with us. Dr. Bhim, we thank you very much for your submissions to us this afternoon. Pardon us, we have given you one hour or less, I might say, but we are really tied up with the submissions that are scheduled. So we hope you don't mind. But we thank you very much for your submissions. Your hard copy, please. May we have a copy of that? Yes, sure.

Dr .Bhim: I'll give you this hard copy and I'll also email the copy to the Secretariat. Just send us the email, please. Okay, thank you.

----------End of Session [1-7-2026] ----------

Submission to the Fiji Constitution Review Commission
Dr Mosmi Bhim, Dept of Ethics & Governance, Fiji National University.
8 July 2026, 12pm, Level 9, Suvavou House, Victoria Parade, Suva

I would like to begin my presentation with the disclaimer that these views are my own opinions as an Academic/Researcher/Expert in Political Sciences and do not represent the views of Fiji National University.

Democratic integrity refers to practices, policies, procedures, laws and values that protect and ensure democracy is upheld and decisions are not undermined or subverted through practices such as corruption, nepotism, violation of human rights, and interference in the democratic process of making and implementing laws. In my submission, I will discuss recommendations regarding democracy, electoral reforms and ending the coup culture in Fiji.

Fiji remains in a position of transition to democracy, a state it reached at independence. This is the finding of my PhD thesis. Prior to independence, Fiji was under colonial authoritarian rule. Following the 1987, 2000 and 2006 coups, Fiji underwent periods of different types of authoritarian rule. Electoral authoritarian governments were in power after the 2014 and 2018 elections. Fiji returned to transition to democracy after the 2022 elections. This means Fiji is not a consolidated democracy and risks exist. All citizens, public and private institutions, as well as civil society organisations, need to work together to uphold democracy as democracy is everyone's responsibility.

Fiji has had four constitutions since independence – the 1970, 1990, 1997, and the current 2013 Constitution. The process for the 1970 Constitution was top-down with Fiji's political leaders brought to London for constitutional talks. Following the 1987 coup, the 1990 Constitution process was also top-down with limited consultation on a prepared document which was later promulgated. The 1997 Constitution was one that was made through processes of democratic integrity with wide consultations with the public, discussions and open debate. During the 2012 Constitution Review there was also a process of wide-spread consultation with the public. However, democratic integrity was not upheld when the leaders rejected the 2012 draft Constitution document. Instead, they promulgated the pre-prepared 2013 constitution without any consultation with the public and without any parliamentary approval process. The current 2026 Constitution Review process is consultative.

The 1997 Constitution was considered a progressive constitution as it had a Bill of Rights, provisions for a Human Rights Commission, Ombudsman, and accountability and transparency measures, as well as provisions for power-sharing.

The 2013 constitution retained human rights but placed limitations for some rights. The 2013 Constitution had provisions for immunity for coup makers and an enhanced guardian role of the military, without specifying what this meant.

The positive features of the 2013 Constitution include the removal of race-based voting system, recognition of equal citizenry for all, and a proportional representation system.

Lessons can be learnt from past constitutions to propose improvements through the current review. Below are some suggestions to improve provisions in the revised constitution. These are in three parts – Electoral Reform, protect democratic integrity, and political/military reform to end coup culture

Electoral Reform

- Single National Constituency is unfair on political candidates as they do not have sufficient resources to campaign in the whole country. It favours well-known personalities and leaders. It needs to be removed and replaced with constituencies. Constituencies will make campaigning fairer for candidates and easier for electorate to hold the elected accountable.
- The non-ethnic based one-person one-vote should be retained.
- 30% quota for women should be implemented as 1 in 3 women are victims of domestic violence and sexual abuse, and women bear higher burden of unpaid care work.
- The Rotumans need to be recognized as an indigenous ethnic group whose language, culture and identity are endangered of being wiped out. One seat should be reserved for Rotumans

- It is the responsibility of the mainstream majority ethnic group – the iTaukei – to protect the marginalized minority indigenous Rotumans and ensure their land, culture and language are preserved.
- Educational institutes, non-government organisations, civil society organisations, as well as interest groups and grassroots groupings, should all be provided an enabling environment to discuss electoral issues and educate others and themselves.
- Restrictions on voter education activities should be removed.
- Fiji government receives a high proportion of foreign donor aid to conduct national elections. The Fiji government values election aid and does not regard it as unfair influence on elections.
- It is unfair for government to benefit from foreign aid while penalizing voter education conducted via foreign donor funding – remove restriction.
- Section 110A - opinion poll, survey or research on elections must comply with guidelines of Electoral Commission, excessive penalties led to only FBC publishing opinion polls prior to 2022 elections.
- Electoral Act 2014, Section 115 - restrictions on foreign-funded educational activities on voting and elections after Writ of Elections issued – remove these restrictions
- These should be removed because the requirement for FEO approval on elections-related research and publications violate academic freedom. Universities and academic journals have own stringent ethical and editorial checks and approvals utilized worldwide.
- It is unfair that those enjoying immunity from coup prosecutions freely contest elections. Those immune from prosecutions should be barred from contesting elections for four to eight years, or fully.
- The electoral system should protect democracy and not coup-makers.
- Bainimarama stated there would be 2-term limit for Prime Minister in Constitution: missing in 2013 Constitution. Put back 2-term limit for PM

- The 5% threshold is unfair and unjust. There should be no threshold to enter parliament. If there is a threshold, it should be reduced to 1%.
- Penalties ranging from $5,000 to $10,000, to $50,000, and from 5 years to 10 years convictions are too high. Penalties should only be fines between $50 and $1,000. Criminal convictions should be removed for minor misdemeanors as severe penalties intimidate citizens from contesting elections.

Protection of Democratic Integrity

- For the sake of democratic integrity, the revised Fiji constitution needs to protect and safeguard democracy. The current 2013 Constitution, by providing immunity to coup makers, not only undermines rule of law, but also undermines democracy itself. The immunity clause needs to be removed. The immunity clause is protecting treason and coup crimes. The immunity clause is not protecting democracy. It is violating democracy. Immunity violates military ethics which requires a soldier to sacrifice themselves for the nation. Through immunity for coups, soldiers are sacrificing the nation to protect themselves.
- To protect democratic integrity, coup makers who violated democracy by removing elected governments from power, should not be allowed to contest elections or hold the positions of Prime Minister, Ministers, or President. Treason offences are not pardonable and must not be rewarded.
- The President must be an accomplished person with no convictions.
- only elected persons should be allowed to hold positions of Prime Minister and Ministers.
- To further encourage change in leaders through democratic parliamentary means, political parties need to practice a system of rotation whereby two or three identified people in the party or the coalition can take turns in the Prime Minister role. This will prevent authoritarianism in Prime Minister's actions. There needs to be greater accountability for the Prime Minister's and President's actions to prevent unilateral decisions. One person must not serve as PM for more than a year.

- Collective decisions and a single voice
- Anchored in article 177 of the federal constitution, collegiality is yet another element playing into the core goals of Swiss politics: achieving consensus and making sure nobody can grab too much power. Essentially, it means the government is collective and non-hierarchical: the ministers, who represent the country's four biggest parties, decide as equals. There's no prime minister pulling the strings. (The presidency rotates among the seven ministers each year and is largely a ceremonial and coordination role.)
- Lesson for Fiji – Switzerland has a population of 9 million and it has only 7 ministers. Each minister serves one year as Prime Minister. This prevents authoritarian dictatorial power in the Prime Minister.
-
- Where there is dissension or opposition to the Prime Minister, another person from the party or coalition can be selected for Prime Minister (such as in Australia and Britain). In severe cases of lack of confidence, a minority government can be appointed. The emphasis here is that a government must be from elected members only, and an unelected government should not be allowed.
- Military needs to be subservient to the rule of law and no provisions should give them any extra powers or benefits. The military cannot override police. The Minister for Policing needs to be a civilian to ensure non-interference of military in policing.
- Medical professionals need to be recognised as essential workers and medical facilities to be recognised as essential services where the government needs to place priority to ensure up-to-date medical facilities and provisions of essential medications.
- The Great Council of Chiefs need to be an accountable and transparent organisation, who are required to take an oath not to support coup makers or illegal changeover of government. This clause should be included in oaths of all Ministers, Prime Ministers and Presidents.

Democracy is everyone's responsibility. This includes not just parliament, government, political parties, but the private sector, religious organisations, sports bodies, workers unions, employers organisations, military, police, chiefs, village and town residents, health workers, street cleaners, professional organisations, schools, universities, all members of wider civil society – a majority must believe and uphold at all times. Rule of Law and core principles of human rights are vital components of democracy. This includes Right to Equality and Freedom from Discrimination.

Fiji should remain a secular state. Giving state recognition to one religion will violate the Right to Freedom of Religion and Belief and risks Fiji being classified as an undemocratic religious fundamentalist state in the category of Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Afghanistan.

- Fiji constitutions removed in aftermath of coups by Fiji's military, new constitutions adopted by governments led by military coup leaders:-

- the security sector needs to be reformed to prevent coups in Fiji and removal of constitutions;

- and the constitution itself needs to have safeguards to prevent coup leaders from holding public office.

Recommendations to end coup culture in Fiji and strengthen democracy

1) having constitutional safeguards.

2) reforming the military.

3) stop undermining law enforcement sector through military interference and intrusion.

- Constitutional Provisions to Safeguard Democracy
  To prevent unelected persons military or civilian from forming government, constitution needs provisions:-

- only elected parliamentarians can be sworn in to positions of Prime Minister and Ministers.

- Vote of No confidence motion option for PM democratic changeover

- Leader does not have to serve full electoral term as PM. Leeway to winning political party to change PM by selecting replacement from elected party members if PM loses confidence party, or parliament, or segments of society/institutions.

- Coup participants will not be eligible to stand in elections, be a member of parliament, and will not be eligible for positions of PM and President of country.

- Coup participants not eligible for employment in civil service, statutory bodies, independent institutions, security.

Reform Military to Prevent Coups

- reduce the size of Fiji's military by half – to 2,000 or less
- military service temporary with soldiers serving 5 to 10 years only in the RFMF. Soldiering is not a life-long career, ends once soldier reaches middle age. Experienced soldiers with no career beyond middle age are at risk of incentive to carry out coup as it provides opportunity to gain senior positions in government institutions, diplomatic corps, and statutory bodies.
- Such scenario occurred after 1987 and 2006 coups in Fiji. To prevent repeat, service in Fiji's military needs to be for temporary period of 5 to 10 years and soldiers assisted to move on to other permanent careers that can last till their retirement.

• Fiji's military needs to undergo a process of civil military reform to enhance understanding of the role of a soldier in a democracy.

Prevent Undermining of Law Enforcement Sector by the Military

After 1987 and 2006 coups, authority of Fiji Police Force was undermined.

- Very visible action of undermining civilian police force occurred when police not allowed lead force as Commissioner. Instead, senior military officers appointed to role of police commissioner. This included Isikia Savua, Esala Teleni, Iowane Naivalarua, and most recently, Sitiveni Qiliho.

- Former police commissioners Andrew Hughes, Ben Groenewald and Rusiate Tudravu revealed about interference and intimidation during their tenure.

• In a democracy, all are subservient to the rule of law. To safeguard democracy, the Fiji Police Force:-

- Needs to operate as independent police force that is subservient to the rule of law and that is not undermined by the military or the Prime Minister or the army commander.

Prevent Undermining of Law Enforcement Sector by the Military

- Democracy theorists have written widely about the dangers to democracy if the military is allowed any role in the police. To ensure the democracy is not undermined by intrusion of the military in the police, there needs to be a clear demarcation of the roles and responsibilities of the military and the police.

- Members of the military and former military officers must not be appointed to the roles of Police Commissioner, or the Head of Corrections service, or to any other role in the police or prisons.

- The military must not be used for any civilian policing roles and activities. The realm of the military needs to be restricted to defending from outside threats, and to disaster relief works, and only a limited role to assist police in emergencies only if the police request for assistance.

- In exchange for immunity, people who played key roles in executing coups whether civilian or military, must give up something – they should not hold senior public service positions, they should not stand in elections to become MPs, government ministers, PM and President.
- Coup is the most serious offence for a soldier to make. In foreign countries, this crime of treason results in permanent disgrace and never again to be employed in the military. It should be considered how people who played key roles in coups can be removed from the military, in exchange for the immunity from prosecution that they are enjoying.
- Future coup makers penalties include permanent removal from the military as well as public service and election as MPs.
- The people of Fiji remain hopeful that this Constitution Review will bring about amendments that will strengthen democratic integrity in Fiji and thereby move Fiji forward on the path to strengthened democracy.
- Lastly, a big thank you to the organisers of today's event for this discussion of national importance.

Barbara Malimali

Barbara Malimali
Date:2-7-2026

Ms Malimali: It's a close admission to Mr. Savu and myself. Savu is our special guest today. How are you? Yes, very nice and healthy and fat, yes.

Mr Valenitabua: Please just bear with us. We'll get copies and then we'll start. We've also emailed it to the email address.

Ms Mlimali: Okay. So whoever has that email can forward it to the rest of you. Good luck.

Mr Valenitabua: Since when?

All right; I think I will call the consultation to order. We can wait for your written submission which is being photocopied. And Mr. Biu can give us that later.

Ms. Malimali and Mr. Savu, we welcome you to level nine of our Suvavou house this afternoon. We have been receiving your request or acceptance of our request that you make submissions to us in relation to the review of the 2013 constitution. I know there were a number of cancellations and deferments and eventually now you are here.

So, we thank you very much for attending before this commission this afternoon. Before we proceed further, I just have a matter of introduction. You know the commissioners that are sitting here today.

I don't need to introduce us to you. The only thing I want to say is that there are three of us here this afternoon. Another three are sitting in Rotuma right now.

They had four sessions today so they must be in the middle of one of the sessions. We have been around Vitilevu, we have been through the islands, we have been around Vanualevu gathering submissions in relation to the review of the 2013 constitution. Now you might have read our terms of reference.

Have you? Right. Okay. Our term of reference just wants us to review the 2013 constitution.

There were a number of themes which we were to deal with and one of the requirements was for us to travel around the country and gather submissions from our grassroots people. Not only them, we heard from the ministries, we heard from various non-government organizations. We heard from individuals and we have had a lot of submissions, and we have a lot of submissions to deliberate on when we finish all these consultations.

We are here to listen to you. That is what we are here for. We are not going to be arguing or doing anything like that.

Maybe we will comment, maybe we will ask questions for clarification. So, I am sure I don't need to explain any further what this commission is about and what we will be doing because you know that the amendment will need to go through the process as provided in the constitution and as modified by the Supreme Court. Without further ado, I will now hand over the floor and the mic to you and Mr. Savu to present us your submissions.

Ms. Malimali: Thank you. Thank you chair, thank you commissioners. For completion, we will just introduce ourselves.

My name is Barbara Malimali, I'm a legal practitioner and to my left is Samuela Savu, also a legal practitioner and I had the privilege of having taught Mr. Savu at law school and then we are now colleagues. So now I'm learning from him on the constitution and politics. We have our 23 page submission before you.

We will not bore you by reading through it all. What we'll do is we'll just go into the highlights. I will highlight a couple of things and young Mr. Savu here will do the rest.

But we want to begin by saying we are happy that these consultations are happening. We all know how this 2013 constitution came about and this is fuller, more complete and more inclusive. So, we are very happy that this is happening.

Although you will see in paragraph 1, I did state my concerns about the genesis of the commission but being that as it may, we've chosen to come and give submissions, and we thank you for the opportunity. As we know from the Supreme Court, the 2013 constitution has been recognized as legally effective. I'm now at page 2; the penultimate paragraph and Fiji have had three general elections under this constitution.

But as we've all seen from social media posts and from academics and just people speaking about it around grog bowls, they're not very happy with the constitution. They would like changes to it. Now at paragraph 3 we talk about objectives of a constitution which I won't go through.

That's more of an academic exercise. But what we do submit is that the constitution alone cannot, I'm now at page 4, guarantee good government. Everyone blames the constitution for our problems.

The constitution is not the problem; it's the people who are supposed to be responsible for certain things. It's the state really under their various arms that are responsible, not the constitution itself. But this constitution, imperfect though it is, is still the supreme law of the state and we submit that this is the perfect time to make changes to it.

So, Mr. Savu, do you want to take us through some of the changes you want to make to the preamble?

Mr. Savu: Thank you Mr. Chair and commissioners. As Ms. Malimali mentioned, we're starting off with the preamble and the changes we'd like to see there. And this is on page 5 of our submissions.

We're of the view that the preamble is good but can be strengthened. And the inclusions that we see would strengthen the preamble are taken from the constitution of Hungary. It's a 2011 constitution that was revised in 2016.

And very briefly these recognize the role of Christianity in preserving nationhood which is something that's notably absent from the constitution as it is today. We hold that human existence is based on human dignity, individual freedoms that can only be complete in cooperation with others, the value of family, the family unit, and that our fundamental cohesive values are fidelity, faith and love, recognizing the strength of community, even recognizing the general duty on all citizens of Fiji to help the vulnerable and the poor. It's something that's not just limited to the state but it's something that we're all collectively responsible for.

The common goal of citizens and the state to achieve the highest possible measure of well-being, safety, order, justice and liberty. And underscoring that democracy will only work and is only possible where the state serves its citizens and administers their affairs in an equitable manner without prejudice or abuse. Our constitution shall be the basis of our legal order.

It's a living framework which expresses the nation's will and the form in which we want to live. Those are our submissions on the preamble.

Ms. Malimali: In relation to the supremacy of the constitution, it's already there in section 2 that the constitution is the supreme law of the land, but we submit that it needs to be completed with the addition of, at the moment it just reads the constitution is the supreme law of the state.

We would like to add this other bit, and subject to the provisions of this constitution, if any other law is consistent with this constitution, this constitution shall prevail and the other law shall to the extent of the inconsistency be void. Now that is actually general one, common sense, and you know, it's basic. But unfortunately, from experience that I've had, most people don't seem to understand that the constitution trumps every other law in the country.

That when there's a conflict, the constitution goes up, and whatever doesn't match with the constitution goes out. In fact, other constitutions say it in the beginning sections, like Barbados. They have it actually in section 1 of the article 1 of the Barbados constitution.

Sorry, I'm a really big fan of Prime Minister Motley, so I follow a lot of what Barbados does. And in their constitution, and so in several other commonwealth constitutions, they have that. That where there's an inconsistency, the constitution prevails.

And I think the challenge in this country over the last couple of dozen years is most people don't realize that. I mean lawyers and human rights advocates and governance people and academics understand that, but our civil servants sad to say, most of them do not understand this. When I came into the civil service many months ago, I remember the people at PSC knew all of these things, they knew about judicial reviews and natural justice, but because of the way we've been governed over the last couple of decades, sadly a lot of our civil servants didn't come through the training we went through, where we had people teaching us.

I mean in this very building I think, I was told my letter writing was too rude for a civil servant, those kinds of things. Civil servants now don't have that same kind of teaching I believe. Some are there, but not all, and I think it needs to be done across the board.

So, it's important we say, or we submit that this should be added to section 2.1 of the constitution. We also would like to see other additions, given what's been happening over the last couple of years, to section 2 of the constitution, that Fiji shall be an independent democratic rule of law state. We all talk about the rule of law, everyone spews it out, but I think it really should be spelled out in our constitution.

So, people can say, ah yes, it's written there. I think a lot of us now, if we don't see it written, it's not there. You know, seeing is believing.

So, it needs to be in black and white. We also would like to see included, the form of government shall be a republic, the source of public power shall be the people. We sometimes forget that it's government of the people, by the people.

And the power shall be exercised by the people through elected representatives or in exceptional cases directly. We say sections 3 to 6 can remain, section 4, which is controversial, we say it should remain a secular state. That's why in the preamble, where we've said we recognize the role of Christianity, you know, we recognize that Christianity has a role and had a role in leading us up to this stage.

But it doesn't mean that we become a Christian state. You know, we must respect other faiths. And the calls for a Christian state, and making Sunday a day of rest, I'm going to have to disagree with the Methodist church and say it's not rooted in the Bible.

We can recognize that Fiji recognized the role of Christianity, but we must not exclude other faiths. Religion is a personal matter and should not be legislated. And we, Mr. Savu and I, concur with the Council of Churches in reading sections 4 and section 22 of the Constitution together.

I see, Chair, you're thinking. Do you have any questions for me? Okay. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Mr. Savu: Our next submission concerns the Bill of Rights. And these are detailed in our written submissions, but just to briefly highlight, we're of the view that there can be more safeguards added for citizens of Fiji, bearing in mind the role of the state to look after the welfare of the people, but not to trample on their rights, or to kill and maim. And in view of this, we suggest adding to section 9 of the Constitution the following, that everyone shall have the right to compensation whose liberty has been restricted without a well-founded reason, or if this was done unlawfully.

Now we see that this is a good safeguard because it'll make anyone who's heavy-handed with the law, and these are things we've both experienced ourselves, to pause a bit and think that there are actually consequences which are embedded in the Constitution that could affect me if I improperly or just go over my power a bit. So, we see that as necessary. And in terms of section 16, which talks about administrative and executive fairness. I'll come back to that, but in terms of section 11, we suggest adding to subsection 3 to be more specific, that practices aimed at eugenics, the use of the human body or its parts for financial gain, as well as human cloning, shall be prohibited.

And this is under freedom from cruel and degrading treatment. And for section... Page 11. That would be page 11 of the Constitution.

Section 11, subsection 3. Page 11 of the small blue book. Page 8 of yours, Ms. Nailatikau. Section 16.

11. 11, subsection 3. Yes. Because that talks about the freedom from torture, from scientific... And our submission is that what we've just read out should also be added to that.

Ms. Malimali: Basically, we don't want any Frankenstein-type work being done in Fiji. That's what eugenics are. Carry on, Mr. Savu.

Mr. Savu: Our next submission is on section 16, executive and administrative justice, something that my colleague, Ms. Malimali, is very familiar and well-versed on. And from that experience, our submission is that these provisions need to be strengthened and include that everyone shall have the right to have his or her affairs handled impartially, fairly, and within a reasonable time by the authorities. Authorities shall be obliged to give reasons for their decisions as provided for by an act.

I understand that at this point, timeliness is not as detailed, but we are of the view that it should be, because not only do actions need to be fair, they need to be done within a reasonable time by the authorities. Otherwise, even if it's done fairly, but very delayed, it's not fair at all. And the second is that everyone shall have the right to compensation for damage unlawfully caused to him or her by the authorities in the performance of their duties as provided for by an act.

This is something that happens but is not prescribed in the Constitution. But we submit that to strengthen executive and administrative justice, because these provisions need to be added. And that's just to prevent the systemic abuse of the state's vast powers that it currently has.

And for freedom of assembly, section 18, we are of the view that this should be retained with some additional protections, such as everyone having the right to peaceful assembly, everyone shall have the right to establish and join organizations, political parties may be formed and may operate freely on the basis of the right to association, political parties shall participate in the formation and expression of the will of the people, but shall not exercise public power directly. The detailed rules for the operation and management of political parties shall be laid down in the laws governing political parties and that trade unions and other interest representation organizations may be formed and may operate freely on the basis of the right to association. Political participation is a very fundamental right, and while it is guaranteed, there are a lot of other restrictions and other conflicting laws that make it a grey area, so we are of the view that if it's spelled out like this, on what a person's right to assemble to the extent that they can participate in a political party, it would be good and it would really strengthen democracy.

The next one would be section 24, the right to privacy. We submit that this needs to be strengthened to include an article on private communications and data that every person shall have the right to have his or her private and family life, home communications, and good reputation respected. Everyone shall have the right to the protection of his or her personal data, as well as to access and disseminate data of public interest.

The application of the right to the protection of personal data and to access data of public interest shall be supervised by an independent authority established by the Act. These are imperative provisions given the extensive use of social media, intelligence, and the much wider access that everybody has to everyone else through social media.
And the other new additions that we have, that we'd like to submit for the Bill of Rights include an article on self-defence and that everyone should have the right to repel any unlawful attack against his or her personal property or one that poses a direct threat to the same as provided for by an Act.

Understand that it's currently provided for in the Crimes Act, a similar provision, but we're of the view that it should be elevated to be a constitutional safeguard as well. Because at the moment, the way it works is that this provision of self-defence comes in when you're already charged, but if it is something that can safeguard and filter out who needs to be charged and who doesn't, who's acting in self-defence, this constitutional provision would assist in sorting that out and clarifying this. And we also submit that an article on the right to petition needs to be included in the Constitution and that everyone shall have the right to submit either individually or jointly with others written applications, complaints, or proposals to any organ exercising public power.

Recognize that this is a historical right in common law, but that it should also be embedded into Fiji's Constitution. And it also goes to the... adds to the state's responsible exercise of power and being accountable to its citizens. And the last on these would be an article on use of technology to improve public service and transparency.

The state shall strive to use the latest technological solutions and scientific achievements to make its operation efficient, raise the standard of public services, improve the transparency of public affairs, and to promote equality of opportunity. I think just dealing with state organs every day is enough justification that this is something that needs to be included in our Constitution. Yes.

It goes back to the timeliness of administrative and executive action. Right now, we are waiting two to three months or even more for matters which could be dealt with and simplified by the use of latest technology. And having this in the Constitution would raise the standard of service by the government to the people.

And now I hand over to Ms. Malimali for our submission on Parliament.

Ms. Malimali: Thank you. I'm now moving to Parliament under section 44 of the small book.

I'm sorry, section 44 of the small book was beginning at section 46 at page 44. I'm sorry, of the small blue book. And it would be on what page on the big one? Page 30 on the bigger blue book.

We submit that sections 46 to 51 can remain. For Fiji at this time, I think a unicameral Parliament is sufficient for us and for our population of people. It was 937,000.

So, a unicameral Parliament, I mean I was listening to something yesterday, I think Keir Starmer had resigned and even in Britain they're talking about these sorts of things. Do we really need a House of Lords? So, I think Fiji with 2013 Constitution making us unicameral we're on the right track. In relation to the composition, we say leave the proportional representation system.

In fact, back in 2005-2006 I think Ratu Joni Madraiwiwi and the people at the CCF and all those people at that time were already saying first pass the vote doesn't work for us. The alternative voting system is too complicated for us. The proportional list system works for us whichever way you want to use it, but the proportional listing system is probably what works best for us.

I'm not, I mean right now we're with dihond and I agree with the Electoral Commission that we retain this system for now. Under this system we use the Dihond that we're using. It might not be ideal, but you know this is one that works for us right now.

Let's not change it too close to the general elections which should be by February next year. Also, we submit that like in a lot of other countries where they've brought in, they've talked about Temporary Special Measures or TSM that there should be provision for it in the Constitution. Not just in the Electoral Act but in the Constitution is where the TSM must go.

To say, I mean the mechanics of it can go in the Electoral Act, but I respectfully submit and I hope that it will be included somewhere that we women make up half the population of this country, but we're not proportionately represented in Parliament. We're about 400,000 of the population is female five women in Parliament this is not proportionate. It is not equitable.

Yes, we have equality of votes yes, we have equal rights and all that but Mrs. Siwatibau in her paper back in 2005 and also after some UNDP or UNIFEM report identified some of the issues that prevent women from being elected into Parliament. We've actually put them there and we've put the link there to the article and for those of you who are interested there's about three copies of the book in the USP library in the JZ section of the library. I live in the USP library half the time, so I know where the books are kept.

And so, we would submit that this venerable commission recommend to government that we at least put into our constitution because it's only temporary it's not permanent until women can realize you know what women can be in power. I mean look at the Fiji Teachers Association it's mostly women, but the executives are men. You know I used to teach at the USP about 60% of our students from PDLP every semester are female.

They're women. But the women stay in the lower ranks of the legal cadre it's mostly the men that go up. You see so it's just a bit of parity and we hope to see that parity in Parliament.

I know that we have a standing order 100 subsection 2 or subparagraph 2 that says that we look at everything through a gender lens but that's not sufficient that's when we reach Parliament and in those six standing committees it's mostly men. And as I think a book came out last year 2025 by Sonia Palmieri and she said well it's only looking at the institution of Parliament but not the actual entry or the representation in Parliament of women.

So my biggest plea if nothing else please our biggest plea young Mr. Savu here is also all for TSM if we could include a provision that you know we gradually have some reserve seats for women so that more of them can enter Parliament and studies from around the world have shown when there are more women in Parliament there's less corruption there's more transparency so that would be mine and Mr. Savu's submission and also in relation to dates for election. Our Act the Constitution and the Electoral Act don't give us dates they give us some sort of vague numbers in between for example in Africa first Tuesday in November is election day something like that for our national election so it doesn't matter who's in power who's not in power whether you're entry you're here you're there you're everywhere we must have an election on the first Tuesday for example first Tuesday in November every four years yes the mechanics of that is in the Local Government Act but for good governance and accountability and transparency at the local government level we need to also put in the Constitution that local government elections must be held also on the first Tuesday in March or whatever every third year or whatever it is but we submit that it would be best if it was included in the Constitution unless they coup it and then that way they can change it but we agree with the Electoral Commission that there should be a set date in the Constitution for elections.

Now we move to Chapter 4 which would be starting off with the Office of the President we submit that Chapter 4 in relation to the President can be strengthened right now it is a bit of a dogfight with some of the provisions there especially 82 but Section 81 needs to be strengthened to clearly state that the President is a ceremonial role, the President cannot act on his own will on his own accord, the President only acts on advice and the President does not have reserve powers.

This we must be clear about in the Constitution because I think for a country like ours which is still finding its feet in terms of constitutionalism, these things need to be clearly written down, or it leaves too much room for everyone and their interpretation. If we clarify the Constitution I mean of course no Constitution is perfect and it's a living, working document but if we can provide as much clarity as we can in our Constitution it leaves less room for ambiguity and different interpretations the President of this country must be above reproach and character is essential to the criteria for eligibility for Presidency.

These are the things we submit should be included so for a Fiji citizen to qualify to be President they would require demonstrated qualities of integrity, respect and the absence of bias, some aspects may be impediments to appointment include criminal history civil actions financial difficulties professional misconduct and presence on social media and online networks. In jurisdictions that has such criteria, any information disclosed and an amount of abuse an absolute bar to appointment but these are things we look at when we're appointing anybody to high office let's look at their criminal history have they had anybody chase them for money have there been any complaints of sexual harassment or sexual misconduct, we need to make sure that holders of high office especially the Presidency need to be clean and clear of any sort of complaints or allegations of sexual misconduct and so we've suggested there additions to section 81 which would be an article on the role and mandate of the President and the very first one is the person of the President of the Republic shall be inviolable. We've also put in there the mandate of the President of the Republic shall terminate if he or she is incapable of performing their functions for over 90 days.

If for three months the President cannot perform their functions then they must vacate office if the conditions of their election to become President no longer exist they must vacate office, if there is a conflict of interest that cannot be gotten over the President must vacate office, upon their resignation or their removal from office, we've also suggested right now the removal of the President from this constitution, the Prime Minister invites the Chief Justice to set up a tribunal that doesn't work in this country it doesn't work right now. When you have a Prime Minister and a President who are beholden one you are my Chief that cannot happen, the President is the President of everyone in Fiji so we've added another layer that perhaps Parliament can petition its own self by truth and majority to say right we need to get; the President has misbehave, misconduct and all of that Parliament as representatives of the people can move a motion and then the Chief Justice is invited along with two or three others to then form a tribunal.

Remember this is the Head of State the Head of State represents all of us, so we want them to be above reproach and for them to be removed, the threshold must be very very high, this is why we've added the other portion on impeachment basically. We've also added another substitute there section 88 of the 2013 Constitution says that when the President is unable to act the Chief Justice steps into that role. Our submission is that that should be taken away from the Chief Justice it is the Speaker who should step in and act as President when the President is away overseas or is ill or something, not the Chief Justice that we submit is not conducive to a proper democracy so we should take out the Chief Justice out of that equation and put the Speaker there. It's done in other countries it's not something new it's done in other jurisdictions we've also got we've got Cabinet; I think Cabinet we've got some submissions more there in relation to the Presidency and we'll just leave it to you to read that's basically on the impeachment.

In relation to Cabinet right now when I checked there are 20 Ministers with a salary of around 200,000 each Minister has a PA a PSO a government-issued car and a driver that in itself one person is a big expense. Some departments have become Ministries and so our Cabinet has become so unwieldy and cumbersome and expensive for the people of this country now apart from Cabinet Ministers the Prime Minister has also appointed a number of Assistant Ministers again car, driver, everything whilst the Assistant Ministers are not members of Cabinet the inclusion also comes with all of that that entails so we suggest respectfully that Section 91-10 because 91-10 gives the Prime Minister the Prime Minister appoints his Cabinet we say cap it and we say Section 91-10 should be amended is it 91-10 or 91-1 sorry, 91-1 I can't read my own typing.

Mr Samu 91-1 could be amended to read Cabinet consists of the Prime Minister as Chairman and no more than 15 Cabinet Ministers in total. We're a small country of 937,000 people why do we need 20 Ministers and 15 Assistant Ministers what are they doing, we could use that money to build a big hospital in Korovou one big hospital one in Wainibokasi one in Nausori you know, we don't we can take away two Ministers and build one hospital in Wainbuka a proper one, anyway so yes I think I'm a bit biased towards the King's Road there Chair, forgive me for my passion there so this is where we suggest that Section 91-1 be amended to cap the number of Cabinet Ministers because it could also be used as a tool to basically electioneering by votes.

If you come my way I'm going to give you somebody from your party this and that that kind of horse trading should not be done at the taxpayer's expense and Mr. Savu Mr. Savu sorry is now do you want to do the judiciary or shall I alright the judiciary we submit that separation of powers is important to the judiciary and we all know that in the last administration there were whispers that our judiciary was maybe not so independent Mr. Chaudhry Rajendra actually posted something on Facebook and you know got himself into trouble for it when he talked about the judiciary.

I've just in pages 13 and 14 of our submissions we talked a little bit about the separation of powers just from one of our court cases here so if we can just skip that and move to page 15 which is part A of the judicial thin go sorry forgive me I shouldn't be saying thingo I think we wanted to talk in relation to separation of powers, we feel that section 104 subsection 8 is perhaps this is why the rule of law and separation of powers needs to be explained and that it's not just a term of art, now we have a very good constitution in relation to the judicial arm but if we if we have the people who are the actors in all of these are dominated or where the executive overwhelms the judicial then the separation of powers doesn't work in our experience dealing with all three actors where the judicial arm thinks that it needs the executive in its decision making process that is not democracy, that's not separation of powers.

When the judicial services commission meets well with us at any rate and the office of the prime minister and the office of the president have to be represented as well that's not separation of powers and so we what we need to do and I think this is why this is an important process is people need to understand that these are not just terms of art, we need to actually practice them.

So I now move to judicial offices which is section 105 and 106 of the constitution, Fiji houses three law schools and by my rough calculation because we at USP bring out about 100 each year to the admission ceremony, we bring out 200 newly minted legal practitioners every year in this country. Where do they all go right so we basically and as well when I checked this morning, I think we have 1078 listed people with practicing certificates not all of us who have law degrees and I admit they have practicing certificates, some of us do not have PC's but we are doing other work so 1078 have PC's or valid practicing certificates.

Now because now we basically you throw a stone and you'll hit one lawyer in this country there's a lawyer in every corner in every family in every village every community has at least one lawyer floating around, so that means our expectations of our judicial officers go up as well. And we expect judgments that are sound we expect judgments that are well written and you know the legal reasoning should be clear, sometimes it's not so very clear and what I've seen we've seen over the last couple of decades is you know the magistracy seems to be a natural progression for government lawyers you know you come through DPP's office, Legal aid or AG's chambers and from here you go there it's like it's a promotion when it really should be on merit and you know you have to have proven high quality work and all of that to be elevated to be a magistrate or judge so and also with the advent of AI. AI poses a problem for us now it helps a little bit I even use chat GPT occasionally just to check spelling and certain things and structure but we need to - we need people who are also academically qualified so our submission is this, that for someone to be a judge in this country, we would like to add the following criteria apart from the usual of they must possess high moral character intellectual and analytical ability sound judgment and deep understanding of people and society.

If you look at applications if you go onto the New Zealand judiciary's website you will see they look for diverse individuals also from different backgrounds and different skills we would recommend that for someone to be appointed as a judge we would add the following criteria that the minimum academic qualification requirement should be a master's degree from a recognized educational institution. There is some argument that well if you put a master's as a minimum academic qualification requirement it would keep out some very very good people who are expérienced with all of that but yes there are pathways that people with exceptional skill and experience can come in but when you are looking especially at the younger, the younger lot that are coming in I think you need to require them to have because some of you may have-

I know Chair has read lots of judgments and over the last couple of decades it leaves a lot to be desired spelling errors grammatical errors, you know when we came out of law school here we didn't read all of that and then we started to read all of these errors like what's going on here, so that might actually be the fault of our education system in itself actually. We would also add we keep the post admission practice at 15 years but at least 10 years must have been spent in private practice or academia. When you come straight from government you don't understand the hustle of private practice, when you come straight from government you don't understand the hustle of when you come straight from government you don't hustle of private practice, when you come straight government – we have experienced it.

When they say things like, why didn't you, your diary should, they don't understand – not only looking after clients trying to file submissions. We've got 5 – 6 cases filed and at the same time in different courts. We are running between Suva – Nausori courts, sometimes to the West. And

I think, that used to be a requirement before, they must have practise outside. Its nice to sit in a hell hose of government, but its also good to learn to able to run your own trust account, run your own filing system, run your own litigation. And so, our respectful submission, is that if that could be added. And that way when you get people on the bench, that would kind of ensure quality and impartiality and they understand the living experiences to hustle for a dollar.

Those who get paid every two weeks don't understand what its like to – the bills are due this week, the staff have to be paid at 3 o'clock every Friday, I've got find some money now. So this is why the requirement for private practise is there, and also with people in private practise are wide range of practise. In government, DPP's Office are doing criminal cases. In Legal Aid you only doing family and criminal defence. In this office, AG's Chambers, I think we now, they starting to do judicial review, and damages.

But other than that, the sphere of practice is limited, compared to someone of the same, someone five years in government, someone five years in private practice, vast, vast difference in their actual experience. Hence our recommendation.
Now, in relation to judges, we would suggest that those who put in their applications to be judges must identify at least ten matters, either substantive trials or appeals, in the past five years that they have been a part of.

In fact, this particular criteria we took from applications for the King's Council. When someone wants to be a King's Council, you have to do this, but we modified it for our purpose, for Fiji's purpose. And we would recommend the same for magistrates, but lower number of cases, lower number of years outside.

Okay, now we go on to Part B, which would be the independent judicial and legal institutions. This provision relates to independent commissions and office holders. Now we have Section 114.

Section 114 is ILSC, 115 is FICAC, 116 is Solicitor General, 117 is DPP. To qualify for these positions, one must qualify for a judge. So same kind of criteria.

Some people, I have suggested that what I'm saying is it puts the bench or the mark too high, and I'm saying, well, why not? We expect our people to perform at this level, then if you want them here, then you bring in the people who can perform at that level. Otherwise, don't. Our challenge with that is for these appointments, all these positions are appointed by the President on the advice of the JSC following consultations with the Attorney General.

There's an over-concentration of power in the Attorney General, and we would respectfully submit that you delete the Attorney General from the appointment of these people. The JSC is there. Why do you need the Attorney General? The JSC goes to the President.

End of story, end there.
There's no need for the Attorney General to be poking his nose into every appointment. Keep him out.

Go and do your lawyering. Stay out of these independent commissions. Sam is looking at me saying, be quiet.

In relation to FICAC, there have been calls for FICAC from 1970. I think the earliest I read in Hansard was way back in 1977. There were calls for us to have our own corruption body here, and then I think in the early 2000s, the former Chief Justice Fatiaki, they were law reform commissioners who were given the task of doing what you're doing now on corruption, and that ended up in a really big report, which I have somewhere.

It's like 200 pages, and that ended up being the genesis of our FICAC Act. They were going to, if I remember it serves me correctly, I think Mr. Justice, Court of Appeal Justice Mr. Qetaki was part of that process. They were going to bring it in around 2005-2006 when the events of 2006 happened.

So FICAC did not just come up because somebody thought it up. The idea of FICAC has been there since the late 70s. I think Lady Tuivaga at the Law Reform Commission would have the report.

It's actually interesting reading. So I would say FICAC should stay, but our problem is we have weaponized FICAC, and whoever is the leader at the time, we use it to go after our political opponents. FICAC was not for that.

FICAC was supposed to go after corrupt civil servants and people in private arena who were paying off the corrupt civil servants. Sadly, those who have been appointed heads of FICAC have had leanings towards the political heads, and so it's never been truly independent. So, there are two options available.

You can either recommend that you abolish FICAC altogether, or you keep FICAC but take away its prosecutorial powers and give it to the Office of the Ombudsman. That would be a completely independent organ or body. The Ombudsman is a very independent and powerful body.

We just haven't used it well since independence. So keep DPP with the murders and all of that, but if you have FICAC doing the investigations and you have the Ombudsman's Office deciding on whether someone should be prosecuted, that gives you the separation and the independence and impartiality and the cooler heads that are needed to decide. If you abolish FICAC, or if you say, right, let's abolish FICAC.

Everyone's been screaming for FICAC to be abolished. I think the coalition government in its pre-election campaign said, when we get in, we'll abolish FICAC. All well and fine.

What are we going to do with the corruption cases? The police couldn't handle it fully before. If you take away from FICAC and give it to the police, who's going to investigate it? They don't have the expertise. Sorry, I mean no offense to the police force.

There are some within who have the expertise and who have the training, but there are not enough of them. And also, our own police force has its own crisis of conscious happening. Some police officers have told us that they're looking at about 60 to 70 percent of the police force is compromised.

This is what was told to us. It is not fed. I don't know what the numbers are.

But you will see there's a big difference. Almost every month, some police officers are being charged for drugs, for receiving monies, for assault. This we didn't see back in the day.

Now we're seeing it on a regular basis. So, if we have a police force that has a crisis of conscience, we've got a problem. Then we continue to become an even bigger haven because people might be caught.

We'll make big stories, big news out of it, but it's not going to end up in any successful prosecution. And the people who need to be prosecuted are not the guys selling a packet of cocaine, or not cocaine, it's too expensive for them, meth on the road. It's the guys sitting in wonderful big offices with suits and ties. They're the ones who should be going after. And the police, I don't think, can have the manpower right now to do that. That would be our submission.

So, we right now have two severely crippled law enforcement agencies, and laws will not improve these institutions, but the respect for the rule of law, and so will zero tolerance for political interference.
In relation to other commissions, we have at Section 119 the Mercy Commission, 120 the Public Service Disciplinary Tribunal, 121 Transparency and Accountability Commission. Again, over concentration of power in the Attorney General. We suggest that these sections be amended to remove the Attorney General from the equation, just the JSC or COCO, I think it's JSC, who is responsible. And in relation to State Services Chapter 6, the Public Service is alright. In relation to Section 126-1A and 1261 subsection B, there's an over concentration of power in the Prime Minister.

We would like to see removed this portion that says you can appoint; you can remove a Permanent Secretary with the agreement of the Prime Minister. We would recommend that that portion be taken out. Again, why is the Prime Minister involved in the appointment of a CEO? You know, Permanent Secretaries are the CEOs of government ministries. They should be appointed purely on merit and free of political interference. And a case in point is that of former P.S. Fisheries, Ms. Rokosuka. You know, after a disciplinary hearing in December last year, the Public Service Disciplinary Tribunal ordered that she return to work on the 19th of December.

She rocks up and wants to take up office, but is told, no, you don't come back. With the agreement of the Prime Minister, you have been moved from the Permanent Secretary of Fisheries to being Director of FLPS or a Government Training Centre. So, you have a Permanent Secretary sitting in a Director role.

We, the taxpayers of Fiji, are paying. These kinds of things, if we take all of these messy bits out of the Constitution and let people be appointed purely on merit, it won't perfect things, it won't make things change overnight, but it's a way to improve things, to start the process of getting us back on track. You know, I remember growing up in Fiji, which used to be the way the world should be.

Everything was hunky-dory. I went to Jasper Williams Primary. I went to Jasper Williams High in Lautoka, by the way.
It was great times. And to this day, my classmates from then are still my friends now, 25 years later.

And so we would suggest that Sections 126, 127-4, 127-6 are to be amended to remove with the agreement of the Prime Minister.

And Mr. Savu will now talk about immunity and the amendment of the Constitution. Thank you.

Mr. Savu: In terms of immunity, we are of the view that this whole chapter on immunity should be removed.

A country that has been independent for 56 years, has had four coups and four constitutions, shows that it has not learned from its mistakes and it's a breeding ground for fundamentalists to rob right thinking, forward thinking. Citizens of the right to live peacefully and peaceably with their neighbours. And immunity weakens public confidence and to build a Fiji that we can proudly leave to the future generations of Fiji, we must remove immunity and promote accountability, constitutionalism and the rule of law.

In terms of the amendment, stability, certainty, continuity are the key purposes of having a written Constitution. But we need a constitution that strikes a balance between that, stability and adaptability. The experience under the 2013 Constitution demonstrates the process has become very difficult.

This was brought in by the Bani Marama regime to usher in parliamentary democracy and elections since they took over in 2006. However, genuine reform under this is practically impossible. We also accept that constitutional reform should not be so easily achieved that governments just come in and alter fundamental constitutional principles for short term political advantage.

And we would recommend that amendments to Chapter 11 include that for ordinary constitutional provisions, a two-thirds majority of the total membership of parliament would suffice and two-thirds ensures some form of bipartisanship in achieving this and broad political consensus. And for entrance provisions such as the amendment provision itself, the requirement should be constitutional amendment through three-quarters of the total membership of parliament and approval at a national referendum by a simple majority of valid votes cast. This would recognize that it's the people who make the law and the ultimate responsibility lies with them.

This gives power back to the people. It's government by the people for the people. But at the same time, we need to ensure that amendments receive proper public consideration and all proposed constitutional amendments, whether ordinary or for entrenched provisions, should be published for public consumption and extensive consultation should be taken on these before having them debated in parliament.

We submit that there should be a period of six months and within these six months the amendments are taken out to the people, extensive awareness is done on these before even being debated in parliament and constitutional reform should never happen without meaningful public participation. And in relation to referendums, we simply propose that for the sake of completeness there be a clause that principles and procedures for conducting a referendum and its validity are provided by law. In terms of constitutional culture, this refers to the shared values, beliefs and unwritten norms that a society holds regarding its system of government and fundamental laws.

It would also recommend that we must develop a constitutional culture and take Fiji back to the earlier slogan of "Fiji the way the world should be". In order to preserve democracy and respect for each other and the rule of law it's important that the constitution reflects this by requiring government to set in place a programme for civic education, public education, professional ethics and institutional respect. We want stability and we want to bring into our society some of the values that have fallen by the wayside and whilst we cannot force people to participate, through the constitution we can start by saying that we share a culture of respect.

This makes sure that a constitution is not just for the government, it's for each and every person. And the mechanics of that can only be done by legislation or policy with responsibility and a budget given to a particular ministry or to the civil service to commence the programme. Civil Society Act is already doing a lot of work and government can use civil society faith-based organisations to raise awareness and educate the people on the important democratic principles and constitutional conventions which we all share and which will advance our country.

It's the people and their willingness to live by the principles in the constitution and being willing to enforce it which will guarantee good governance. Now in terms of review, there is no mechanism for review in the current constitution but seeing how the word constitution is so easily thrown around and the constant calls for review, perhaps we could put a review date for the constitution. Such provision could say that a constitution will be reviewed through another constitution review commission, very much like this one, no later than 10 years from the date the amendment constitution or new constitution comes into force.

This also limits political interference in constitutional amendments. The notably 1990 constitution had a review clause and that can be modified for this, what we propose that can be modified. The great council of chiefs is a very important institution, and we respectfully suggest that they actively take part in the law reform process by applying an indigenous or iTaukei lands to all bills, reports and laws.

I'll hand over to Miss Malimali for our conclusion.

Ms. Malimali: Thank you, sirs and madam. We've taken over an hour of your time.

We the people of Fiji since independence, we were stable for a little while but since 87 we've entered a period of instability and that needs to stop. We the people must say stop and anyone who seeks to take over the country again should be held accountable to a court of law. This is why we say remove the immunity provision.

You want to take over the country then face the people through the courts. We must also put an end to race politics and the politics of religion and fear mongering. Cronyism, nepotism and tribal of vanua politics must go too.

Constitutions do not bring stability but following the rule of law no matter what, that brings stability. So, it's important that we have independent institutions free from political interference and politicians too must be held to a higher standard than everyone else because of the special position that they hold as our representatives. I think I read about a month ago in Italy or one of the European countries, I think politicians can be prosecuted for lying in parliament or something like that.
I found that interesting. I think that's a little bit way too far, but our politicians must be held to a higher standard than everybody else.

We have a constitution that concentrates a lot of power in the hands of two office holders, the prime minister and the attorney general.
That needs to go. They need to stick to what they need to do. And so, to stop possible abuse we recommend that this commission recommend the removal of the prime minister and attorney general in the portions of the constitution that requires their consent or assent or consultation.

Yes, I accept like in the COC they have to be there but in the appointment of people, of public servants and public office holders and constitution office holders, neither the prime minister nor the attorney general should have a say in it. We need to have all of this free of political interference and if you go through the Reeves report, they actually refer to the 1994 Beatty report and both reports said appointments to officers like the solicitor general, the DPP and similar positions must be free from political interference. And that studies and experience from around the world has shown that when these positions have a political influence into the appointees, problem surely follows.

And with that, honourable chair and to our two members, we, Barbara Malimali and Samuel Savu, these are our submissions and if you have any questions, Mr Savu is ready and willing to answer all of your questions. I note that with the self-defence provision that we put in there, there was a bit of strange looks. We were coming from the view of, you know, in a few instances there have been elderly people sitting in their homes and people have come in and attacked and they picked up like a bird gun or those kinds of things and hit them back.

These people have been charged for murder or manslaughter. This is why we say, you know, a man who sits in his home, that's his castle, should be able to defend it and not have to go through the whole criminal process and get a judge to acquit them. Unfortunately, we're going to have to legislate common sense.

Mr Valenitabua: Thank you, Ms Malimali. Thank you, Mr Savu. Thank you for this comprehensive and fine submission.

We usually ask questions for clarification and also comment in relation to the submissions. I now give the opportunity to the two commissioners to make comments or ask questions if they wish to. Ms Nailatikau.

Ms Nailatikau: Thank you, Ms Malimali and Mr Savu. I also note with gratitude the intergenerational nature of your delegation today, so thank you for noting that and it's something that's always welcome, particularly for me personally.

I refer to your discussion on Section 16 and also your reference later in your submission relating to the Office of the Ombudsman and just making a comment and welcoming you to expand on this if you would like, because in earlier submissions this week, over the past couple of days, we've heard people make submissions relating to how the Office of the Ombudsman did exist at one time, is absent from the current constitution, and that administrative justice or the stagnancy in public authorities operations that you refer to could well be addressed with such an office in complementarity to existing institutions.

So just welcoming your expansion on that if you would like as well.

Ms. Malimali: Yes, we agree that the Ombudsman is not currently in there, but it is an office that should be there. I mean, we put up a financial ombudsman or ombudswoman, we have that, but we don't have the other.

And I remember in the past, the Ombudsman, the Office of the Ombudsman was there, and the Ombudsman was also the chair of the Fiji Human Rights Commission. So, they all complemented each other and in relation to saying that our recommendation that they should perhaps look at, be the final arbiter of whether charges should be laid when investigated by FICAC, it's to create that layer of independence. I think like in New Zealand; they have the serious fraud office.

You know, they're the ones who do all the complicated investigations, but somebody else does the charging. And I think, or I submit that that would probably go towards answering a lot of the questions that people have about independence, impartiality, and non-interference and non-political interference in the functions of FICAC. And if you take up that portion altogether, yes.

I mean, as we can see from the results of cases in the last couple of weeks, you know, I think allegations have been made that some of the charges and the charging were perhaps not so motivated by justice but coming in on the revenge bandwagon. I could be wrong, but, you know, we want to avoid these sorts of allegations. We want to avoid these sorts of whispers.

We want people to go, yep, that's what happened. These people did it. And we don't want to be talking behind the scenes about the people involved.

That is why we suggested that the ombudsman, because again, for now, maybe it could be a temporary thing until things get, we equalize things. Because right now, there's too much whispers about FICA, too much whispers about the police, too much whispers about the DPP's office. Everyone's beginning to have mud thrown at them.
We're all beginning to be tainted. So perhaps a completely independent office like the ombudsman, I think the last ombudsman that I knew of was Mr. Justice Kepa. You know, that office was completely respected and respectable and, you know, we want that kind of reverence for our high officers to come back, where no one's going to go online and start posting about them and what they had for lunch at Grace Road or something.

Does that answer your question, madam? And in terms of section 16, you know, we want public servants to have security of tenure. You know, I remember a few years ago, we would make fun of public servants, civil servants. Hey, keep quiet or you'll be 55 tomorrow.

We want people to have security of tenure, and that includes that if something's going to happen to them, they will be given an opportunity to respond to allegations. Look, somebody said you stole $10 from the till. The complaint should be given to them.

This is the complaint. What do you have to say? And then this is the decision we've come to, and this is the basis of the decision. A lot of people operate from a place of fear, and if you want people to perform their jobs, and I think this is half the reason people are not performing their jobs in the various ministries, is because they're frightened that if they do make a decision and do a job this way, their supervisor or their boss might disagree and fire them.

We want people to work, and we want people to work free of fear and free of any sort of possible consequences for them doing their job. Like a police officer arrest, you. You know, you might be cousins with a more senior officer.

You know, they should be able to go, okay, I can do my job without fear that I will be persecuted for doing my job. We were coming at it from that angle. Stability for the civil servants so that they can do the job to serve us, the people of Fiji.

And I think that's half the reason why things are delayed. And most of the time, the papers are just going from one table to another. You know, it can take about three months in the titles office and places like that, eh? It used to anyway, where one piece of paper is just floating, sitting with me for one week, another person for another week, because nobody wants to make a decision for fear of losing their job.

That is why we say we must strengthen Section 16 of the Constitution to safeguard people so they can do their job.

Mr Valenitabua: Did the ombudsman have the power to prosecute previously?

Ms. Malimali: Gosh, I can't remember. But he did have the power to summon.

He could summon people. And sometimes I think the experience we've heard from the Solomons and a few other places, with the ombudsman being of that level too, ombudsman sometimes just has to pick up the phone and call an office and the documents will come. But sometimes it's just that.

Civil servants among themselves not giving each other documents. I experienced a bit of that at FICAC. When you wanted to go documents from some ministry or department, they would gatekeep.

So, we would then have to issue a search warrant. Like, why do we need to do that between government departments? It should be me writing you a letter saying that we're investigating this, can you just send us your act, your this, your that, and something else? But no, the process takes longer because we're busy gatekeeping within government departments because we're all frightened to lose our jobs. I don't think the ombudsman had prosecutorial powers, but he did have the powers to summon people.

Mr Valenitabua: And investigate.

Ms. Malimali: Yes. As part of his investigative powers.

Mr Valenitabua: So, if FICAC, used to become the investigative power or branch and you are suggesting, you are suggesting here that the ombudsman have the prosecutor power.

Ms. Malimali: It could or what they do, is they have another level, layer or they put another set of eyes on it. And when they think it should carry on, they can move it to the DPP with the suggestion file. Because I know at some point a few years ago, i recommended for FICAC whilst the commissioner has the powers to decide on prosecution, that there should be a committee that makes the final decision. So, the commissioner will look at all this and say, right, this is the evidence, we're going to charge them with this. But you pass it on to a different committee to have a look at, to then make the final decision, and then again advise the commissioner who then signs the charge.

So, I'm suggesting, we're suggesting that, you know, just for now, because there's so much, so many allegations of everybody being corrupt, to free everybody from all of these, let FICAC be the investigative arm for corruption. And then send it off to the ombudsman as the second layer to check. And depending on how you see it, you can either then say, okay, ombudsman, with your own legal arm, you file the charges and the ombudsman charges, or the ombudsman decides on the charges and sends it to the DPP.

So that way you can't accuse any one person or one group of colluding or being corrupt. It goes through several layers. Because even within FICAC, before it gets to the commissioner who makes the decision to charge, it supposedly comes through several layers.

But as we know, that hasn't worked. There has been, you know, independence at FICAC has not been there, with the exception of a brief period in its history, when a certain someone we all know and love was commissioner. But this is what we're suggesting, to just have that layer of somebody higher up in the food chain to be the check and balance. For corruption matters only. Because in fact, that's what the ombudsman used to do. They were the ones who looked at, you know, if you wanted to complain about a government minister or a high civil servant who'd done corrupt practices, you went to the ombudsman.

They then investigated. So that, you know, that could still be the same. Or you could say, right, bring the ombudsman's office back, put FICAC under the ombudsman.

But I do not think FICAC should be abolished. Was that what you were suggesting, doctor? Yes. They complete the investigation.

Mr .Valenitabua: We have FICAC to the investigation. They complete their investigation, the ombudsman is the intermediary. It decides on whether prosecution should proceed. And then once the decision is made, it passes the file to the DPP for prosecution purposes.

Ms. Malimali: Yes. You could do that. Or they could, within its own, it could have its own prosecutorial arm that they do the prosecution.

But you separate, you have to separate the investigation from the prosecution.

Mr Valenitabua: If the ombudsman becomes a prosecutorial body again, does that not duplicate the DPPs?

Ms. Malimali: Not necessarily. Some people say you're good, but see, the DPP would be prosecuting the police kind that goes there.

I mean, one of the things I did when I went to FICA was say, right, the ones that the police should be investigating, send it to them. Why are we wasting time with this kind of work? We should be doing the high-level corruption, the white-collar ones. I'm not interested in the guy selling drugs on the street and whether he paid somebody 20 bucks.

Leave that to the police. We should be interested in the more white-collar corruption. And we suggest that the ombudsman, yes, would be, you could look at it two ways.

You could have a prosecutorial arm within the ombudsman's office, or they may be the final arbiter and say, right, this is something that can go on, carry on, or they could then send it to DPP's office. But whichever way, our respectful submission is keep FICAC, but to please everybody in the country and everyone calls FICAC evil, which it really isn't. It's the people who make it evil.

Take away its prosecutorial powers. Keep its investigative powers. The country has invested millions into FICAC and its officers and its equipment.

What are we going to do? Dissolve all of it? Because we've had weaponized the heads against the people over the last 20 years? We don't throw away the baby with the bathwater. Just throw away the bathwater. Keep the baby.

Dr Gounder: Thank you, Mr. Malimali, for your submission. Just a question I wanted to ask. You have given us a totally new avenue for reform of FICAC.

What we have been presented with, one, abolish FICAC. Number two, leave investigative powers with FICAC, but transfer the prosecutorial powers to DPP. The other option is, the third option that we have been submitted, is to keep FICAC just as an education and advocacy institution, give the investigative powers to police and the prosecutorial powers to DPP.

You have given us this combustion dimension, but I just want to take you a little bit back, because you suggested ombudsman in between. What about keeping the investigative powers with FICAC, but the prosecutorial powers with DPP? Is there any reason you didn't submit that as to today? Any reason for that? I'm just trying to learn. You could have gone with that option as well, which is out there.

Ms. Malimali: I could have gone with that option, but I think as temporary measures for now, we need another body to look at it. I think DPP itself is under siege at the moment. We need to face reality.

They're my friends and colleagues. We have collegiality and all of that, but I believe that office is under siege, and to then also do corruption. At the moment they're doing murders, this, that.

I think because the police have now started concentrating on trafficking, they're going along that avenue too, so I'm at loggerheads with them on that as well. From experience, they're under siege at the moment. They are overwhelmed with drugs cases.

They have a small cadre of very senior officers, and at the bottom you've got a whole bunch of young graduates who came out around the same time as Mr. Savu, who I don't think at this point in time can handle all of that along with what they're going through. So, I would respectfully submit that these would be temporary special measures also until we as a country and our institutions are completely free of all and any allegations or whispers or taints of political interference, and it's a fact of life in this country. So, I think that we need another pretty transparent body on its own to then look at it again and then go there.

I mean, look at what happened to the Saneem and Khaiyum and the Sanjay Kaba. Some of these could have been prevented, but same people wearing the same hats everywhere, we get problems. And I mean no disrespect to the prosecutors, but these are facts and these are the realities of life we just have to face.

I'm probably going to get some nasty emails from colleagues after this. How dare you throw colleagues under the bus and all of that. But I think truth needs to be spoken, and it's my unpopular role to do that.

Dr Gounder: Thank you for being so open. When you talk, it looks like you're not holding anything back, which is good because that's what we need. I was sitting here thinking, how can I clarify what we're thinking? So, thank you very much.

I'm sure your feedback will provide us with the material that we need to discuss some of these options that we may be considering later on. A few more clarification questions. Thank you for following our submissions.

It looks like you're following all the submissions that are coming to the Commission. The one on immunity, for example, did you hear the submitters who were just before you?

Ms. Malimali: No, we were busy printing.

Dr Gounder: So, you might have to change your mind perhaps later.

Ms. Malimali: What did they say?

Dr Gounder: We'll leave it to you to read it. But anyway... No, no immunity.

Ms. Malimali: Not even for past.

Thank you. I think they were saying that they wanted the immunity for future.

Dr Gounder: No, they're not testing, they abolished it.

So same thing as us. The other one is the right to privacy. So the Online Safety Act is being reviewed now, and if you look at some of the clauses in there, pretty similar to what we have here.

So do you still want this to appear in the Constitution, the stakes to go higher? Or should we leave it to the Online Safety now?

Ms. Malimali: I believe it's a fundamental right. And the Online Safety Commission might have their act.

You see the police have their act. FICAC has its act. And then you think you've got a High Court decision that came out two days ago from Mr. Justice Olufke in the High Court that says, well, you can in certain circumstances.

And then you've got the police bill coming out, saying that, you know, even if I'm sitting in the same, basically, if I'm sitting in the same vicinity as you, they ask for my device, I should give it, even though I'm not a suspect. So, I think these sorts of rights should be in the Constitution, because any law, whether the police or FICAC or Online Safety, any of those laws conflict with the Constitution, then those laws would be...

Dr Gounder: Thank you. I think the best justification I've heard to raise something in the Constitution than in the Act.

Thank you for this. And the submission is also very, very comprehensive as well, very clearly written as well. It's so easy to understand.

And your reason makes sense as to why something should go higher than the Act. The other is on page 8, the article on use of technology to improve public services and transparency. This is more like a policy statement rather than a clause that might appear.

This is just my view. I just want your feedback on this, because we have several policies and strategies that are currently implemented to deal with this. So, do you think we can have such a policy-focused statement in the Constitution?

Ms. Malimali: I remember coming in, what, 15, 20 years ago, coming in downstairs, and you look through like this, you want stuff done, you peep around the corner. That time it was spider solitaire, you know, when computers first came in. So, we need to, yes, this mostly is in the realm of policy, but we thought we should elevate it to constitutionalism so that civil servants know, hey, we've got technology there, let's use it for the way it's supposed to be used.

I mean, if you go into, I think, most of these government ministries, you'll see technology that's sitting there. It's not being used. They could be more efficient, but they're not using it.

Dr. Gounder: So, during the NDP, which you know, you participated as well, I realized it's more of a people issue and more of a departmental issue, yeah. And we tried to fix it with some, you know, MNE work, monitoring and evaluation, but your point is taken here.

Ms. Malimali: Yes, I mean, I accept that this is more a policy, but this article actually came from the Hungarian Constitution.

So, you would have noticed we used Hungary, we looked at Albania, and we also looked at Barbados and Singapore. So, we tried to be, we didn't want to come here to criticize. We wanted to come here to offer, you know, some solutions we thought would work.

Some of it may be a bit far-fetched, but we think all should be included. But that provision came from the Hungarians.

Dr Gounder: Thank you. So it's very similar to something we had before in terms of the gazettes. The gazettes.

So, gazettes were needed when we didn't have social media, when we didn't have emails, when people in Fiji didn't have access to traditional media. And the question now is whether we need to gazette some of these things to be legally effective, which is the same gist as what you mentioned about...

Ms. Malimali: You might have to change the Acts Interpretation Act of 1967, I think it is. Well, I'll send it to you.

Because that's where the gazetting also comes in, because it talks about the days, dates, times, Saturday, Sunday. Yes. I suppose, yes, we need a constitution that's modern, that, you know, we're now in today's realities, where, you know, we're sitting here, but we can... I mean, this is how I knew some of the things that were happening.

I was watching it online from home.

Dr Gounder: Like my argument, who reads the gazettes when it's already published?

Ms. Malimali: Only the lawyers. Yeah.

Dr Gounder: Okay. So it's still as a practical purpose?

Ms. Malimali: Well, you see, some of the laws of our country require certain documents to be gazetted. So I think you might have to strike a balance there.

Only where the law says gazette it, then gazette it. Because I think under the Companies Act, you have to gazette all your petitions for winding up and things like that, bankruptcies. These have to be gazetted.

Although all of us can already see it on Facebook.

Dr Gounder: Okay, just one last clarification.

You've talked about a lot of Bill of Rights related issues. What are... I haven't heard anything regarding the clawbacks in the Bill of Rights.

Any comments on those? You happy with that? The limitations. The limitations, yeah, yeah.

Ms. Malimali: Well, the limitations, yeah.

Dr Gounder: The limitations of qualifications. We heard this morning from a few law students at USP. What section would we be looking at? A number, almost.

Do you look at... Some of the sections...

Ms. Malimali: Oh, yes, I mean, but that's normal. That's constitutional law. I mean, not every right is absolute.

Some rights are absolute, but some, yes, it has to be subject to some limitations.

Dr Gounder: Okay, so does this constitution go over and above the normal set of limitations that you would call it normal?

Ms. Malimali: I don't think so. No?

Dr Gounder: So you happy with the limitations in the clawbacks?

Ms. Malimali: I don't know about happy.

I would use happy. You okay? I would be okay. Legally acceptable? To me, yes.

As long as we put in those additions we put in about the safeguarding. Like, you know, if the police unlawfully search and seize and do all of those things, I should be able to claim compensation. And if Section 16, my rights, are breached by the state that I serve, I should be able to claim compensation.

And that should be... I mean, of course, once a court has said it's been breached, I should be able to claim compensation from the state. Because at the moment they can say, yes, I'm sorry, I've breached your rights. Have a lovely day, Barbara.

Go home.

But they're not going to pay me. You know? And this is why we want safeguards.
Because a constitution is not to safeguard the leaders. It's to safeguard the people, the citizens. And the arms of state serve the people.
And so when those arms of state are used against the people, the people should be able to claim compensation. Apart from having it declared that what was done to them was unlawful, they should be able to claim compensation from the organs of state that have breached their rights. Okay.

Does that make sense? Yeah, yeah, yeah, it does.
And Mr. Savu.

Dr Gounder: I'll give it back to the chairman. Thank you. Thank you.

Ms Nailatikau: Thank you, Chair. Ms. Malimali and Mr. Savu, you also made a unique suggested addition to the Bill of Rights relating to extending on Section 11 or adding a subsection 3 relating to human cloning, for example. It seemed like something that had a bioethics element to it or bioethics dimension and how in many cases now, as we're seeing with artificial intelligence, it tends to be leapfrogging the ability of regulations to keep up with it.

I'm just interested to hear from you where that would have come from and what the thought process behind that was.

Ms. Malimali: It's basically the same thing because also, see, we've had a lot of young women and young people go missing over the years. I think the most was two years ago at Maui Bay.

That young girl that went missing, you know, they turned around to pick the bag, or the mother picked the bag and she disappeared. So over the years, we've been hearing things like, you know, apart from trafficking them, they're using them for their organs and all sorts of things. We've heard some wild stories about there being little labs here in Fiji that can do things.

So, you know, that was part of the thinking behind it. And of course, you know, from what we hear from around the world with all the things that are happening, cloning and things like that. I mean, my first hearing of cloning was with Dolly the sheep back in the 80s.
So those sorts of things. We just worry that it would reach our shores. You see, where drugs go, arms and human trafficking are not far behind. And that would include taking our people to have them experimented on medically. And, you know, because a lot of these people that we hear go missing, we don't really hear of them being found. So this is part of the fear.

And this is why we thought that it is a right for us, for any person in this country, we should be free. And it's our right not to be subjected to any of these things. You know, mixing all our DNA together to make the perfect person and, you know, all of these sorts of things.
I mean, someone might want to steal me to steal my brains and mix some DNA or something. I don't know. But that's the thinking behind it.
It's more futuristic. So this is what we're looking at to protect our people, our young people especially. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Section 159. Section 160. Referendum.

The amendment to the provisions of the Constitution. The Supreme Court had laid down the pathway for amendments and had stated that first reading and second reading of the amendment there has to be a two-thirds majority.
Not three-quarters. There has to be 50 plus one percent. That is in the judgment or in the legal opinion.

Yes. At page 20 of your submission, you state that you would recommend that the following amendments be made in Chapter 11.
And then you have two there, options. For orderly constitutional provisions, they can be amended by two-thirds, which is in compliance or in accordance with the judgment or the opinion of the Supreme Court.
And then for the second one, you're saying for the entrenched provisions, such as the constitutional amendment themselves, the requirement should be the constitutional amendment has the support of at least three-quarters.

That is increasing it from two-thirds or 66 percent to three-quarters, which is 75 percent, contrary to the opinion of the Supreme Court. And the Supreme Court had even written down in the opinion the new provision, which they should, or which should be, which should replace Section 160 and 159.

Are you saying that we should amend the amendment provisions, that is Chapter 11, contrary to what the Supreme Court has told us?

Ms. Malimali: Well, we're suggesting that a staggered approach be done. That for the most simple constitutional amendments, you just need Parliament to give their two-thirds.

But for the more important ones that affect the amendment to the Constitution, our rights, then we the people should be involved and therefore a higher threshold, either three-quarters and 50 plus one during a referendum. This is why we suggested a staggered approach. Some of it we don't need the people.

Our representatives can do for us. But the entrenched provisions, we submit that the threshold should be higher.

Mr. Valenitabua: But how can we amend that to a higher threshold when the Supreme Court says you are confined to this two-thirds?

Ms. Malimali: Yes.

That is a, that's what they've done, and this is why we have the Constitution Review Commission, and this is why we are making recommendations. They're saying, as a whole, we're saying in a staggered approach. Certain things you just don't need the people.

The more important fundamental ones, you need the people and you need a higher threshold. And, you know, at the moment we have three, four parties in Parliament. And so, for there to be, and I suspect that the next elections there will be maybe an even bigger number of parties in Parliament.
So that would mean that any amendments to the fundamental and the entrenched provisions would require basically all the parties to be of one mind to make the change for the good order, peace, and governance of this country. It wouldn't be for my political flagging and flag waving. It would be for the people of Fiji.

Those kinds of things require everybody to be involved. And then we take it to the people at a referendum, and yeah, 50 plus one, a simple majority gets us in through the door. Hence our submission.

I mean, you can completely ignore it, that's fine.

Mr Valenitabua: You remember Mabo?

Ms. Malimali: I remember Mabo.

Mr Valenitabua: You remember Mabo? 1992.

Yes. There was no native title for Aboriginals in Australia.

And then Mabo was decided by the High Court of Australia. That native title was to be given to the Aboriginals.

Now that became law set by the court, which resulted in the Land, the NTA, the Native Titles Act in Australia. The law, or the legislators followed the law set by the High Court. Here we have the provisions which had been set by the Supreme Court.

Should we not follow it? Do not comply with it?

Ms. Malimali: We're not suggesting you disregard the Supreme Court. May I distinguish it? In Australia they didn't take it to a referendum, they didn't take it around the country like we've done here. You are now going around the country, and we're so very thankful for that, seeking the views of us the people.

And some of us the people, maybe just two, are making this suggestion. If the majority of the people who you've consulted disagree with the Supreme Court, so be it. The Supreme Court is also the servant of the people.
Vox Populi and all of that. The judiciary doesn't listen to the politicians or to anybody else, they listen to the people. And this is how they listen to the people.

One of the challenges during that Supreme Court case last year was they didn't have any petitions, or they didn't have any submissions from the people. So they could say, ah, well, yes, there was a report. Now what they're going to have, should this go back to court, is, oh, yes, there was the Valenitabua Commission report, which had this, this, this, they had submissions on this.

This is what was lacking before the Supreme Court last year. And I think the Law Society tried to put in some affidavit with some statistics. But this is what will give context, what this process that we're going through now, this is what will give context and body and flavour to whatever recommendations you make to government.

It's based on all of us, how many thousand people who come to speak with you and our reports. Does that...

Mr Valenitabua: Yeah, okay, I get you. Yeah.

Just one last... Just one last one. People whom we have heard have stated that we have to change the electoral system. Do away, remove the de-honk system, or whatever it is called.

Now you are submitting that we have to continue using de-honk. Oh, no. Do you want to comment on that?

Ms. Malimali: First Past the Post is not truly reflective of the voters' votes or their wishes.
The alternative voting system, as we all know, it came in in 97, 98, we all had to go to the polls, or 99. And we were all confused, because you didn't know whether to vote above, below, you tick, you circle. You know, some people went, oh, these are my three favourite, circled or ticked three people, vote became invalid.
It was too complicated for us. The open list proportional system is probably the best way forward for us. Now, the threshold, yeah, but perhaps you throw lower the threshold from 5% to 2% or 3%.

I think Mr. Savu is more of a political scientist than I am, so he can explain that. But I think for now, we can't change the electoral system eight months away from elections. It is just, if we're going to do that, we might as well not have the elections.

If we're going to change the electoral system now, then we better tell the people of Fiji, right, we're going to do this. Sam can explain a bit more on that, but one of the other things I wanted to add, and we forgot to write it down, was that perhaps it should also be included that, you know, six months, if we set an electoral date, like first Tuesday in November, we must put in there that three months prior to election, we must go into caretaker mode. This is one of the submissions we've made around the place.

Caretaker mode, where no extra expenditure must be done, big capital works must go through the electoral commission for their scrutiny. This is how it's done in Pakistan. The last recollection, the last one I went to was Pakistan, and that's how they do it there.

And that's a huge country of over 200 million people. Any big expenditure during caretaker mode goes to the electoral commission. Mr. Savu can explain a little bit more about the voting system, but we say keep the dihond, lower the threshold to about 2 or 3 percent.

Mr. Savu might want to... Does that make sense, or would you like us to explain some more, sirs?

Mr Valenitabua: That's fine, that's fine. Well, I think that brings us to the end of the consultation this afternoon. Thank you very much for accepting the invitation and coming to make submissions to the commissioners this afternoon.

You have dealt with a lot of things, and you have submitted a lot of things to us. We'll have a look at them when we have them ready. Ami was here before you came in, correct? And Unity Commission.

Ms. Malimali: So they have the same submission as us, remove it?

----------End of Session [2-7-2026]----------

Honourable Chair and Members of the Constitution Review Commission

SUBMISSIONS TO THE CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMISSION ON 2ND JULY 2026

INTRODUCTION

The Constitution Review Commission was established in March 2026,[1] via a Presidential Warrant with its Report due on 31 August 2026.[2]

My understanding is that this constitutional review follows the Supreme Court Opinion In the Matter of a reference by [3]Cabinet for an opinion from the Supreme Court on a matter concerning the interpretation and application of sections 159 and 160 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji[4] which was handed down on 29 August 2025 and the failure of the Government to obtain the 75% requirement in Parliament to pass the Constitution (Amendment) Bill 2025[5] to pass the required parliamentary threshold. With two failed attempts to amend the 2013 Constitution, the Government went down the path of a Constitutional Review Process by Presidential Warrant rather than through an enabling legislation passed by Fiji's Parliament. A concern that has been raised is that the time frame of five months for constitutional reform[6] is insufficient, given that constitutional reform takes 18-24 months and general elections should be held by February 2027.

Given the stated concerns, I have chosen to make my submissions anyway. Furthermore, a look through Fiji's social media and commentary, would indicate that quite a number of Fiji citizens favour, an amendment to the 2013 Constitution.

---

[1] Constitution Review Commission members sworn in by President - FBC News (Accessed on 7 June 2026)

[2] 'Public Encouraged to Engage with Constitution Review Process', Press Release dated 20 March 2026. Fiji Government - PUBLIC ENCOURAGED TO ENGAGE WITH CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMISSION PROCESS (Accessed on 7 June 2026).

[4] In the Matter of a reference by Cabinet for an opinion from the Supreme Court on a matter concerning the interpretation and application of sections 159 and 160 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji [2025] FJSC 20; Miscellaneous 1 of 2025 (29 August 2025). In the Matter of a reference by Cabinet for an opinion from the Supreme Court on a matter concerning the interpretation and application of sections 159 and 160 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji [2025] FJSC 20; Miscellaneous 1 of 2025 (29 August 2025) (Accessed on 7 June 2026).

[5] 2013 Constitution Amendment Bill defeated, Fiji Village News, by staff reporters Rashika Kumar and Mansi Chand on 11 March 2025. 2013 Constitution Amendment Bill defeated (Accessed on 7 June 2026).

[6] Questions raised on whether we are rushing with constitution review, Commission says they have time, Fiji Village news by Vijay Narayan, 03 June 2026. Questions raised on whether we are rushing with constitution review, Commission says they have time (Accessed on 7 June 2026).

My main criticism of the 2013 Constitution would be in relation to the over-concentration of power in the Prime Minister and Attorney-General.

I would like to see Fijians at all levels from the Executive to the general population understand and respect and follow the Rule of Law.

Principles of Constitutionalism

The foundation principles of a constitution are democracy, the rule of law, the separation of powers, nationhood and rights balanced by responsibilities.

In the case of In the Matter of a reference by Cabinet for an opinion from the Supreme Court on a matter concerning the interpretation and application of sections 159 and 160 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji[8] the Supreme Court said:

[14] The common law has brought rules of law relating to contract, tort, property, trusts, equity and statutory interpretation which have become part of the law of Fiji. It can, of course, be changed by legislation and modified to reflect Fijian conditions, so becoming the common law of Fiji.

[15] The common law has been described as the ultimate constitutional foundation in Australia, and it can attract that description in Fiji. It brings with it some essential constitutional principles. They relate to such things as the essential characteristics of courts, their independence from the executive and the legislature and their transparency – reflected in their open hearings and the general requirement that their decisions are publicly explained.

The Supreme Court has recognised the 2013 Constitution as legally effective and that Fiji has had 3 general elections under that constitution.

How I have dealt with my submissions is to go through the provisions that in my view need strengthening and I have also made recommendations on new provisions to be made such as the Right to petition public authorities.

---

[8] In the Matter of a reference by Cabinet for an opinion from the Supreme Court on a matter concerning the interpretation and application of sections 159 and 160 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji [2025] FJSC 20; Miscellaneous 1 of 2025 (29 August 2025). In the Matter of a reference by Cabinet for an opinion from the Supreme Court on a matter concerning the interpretation and application of sections 159 and 160 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji [2025] FJSC 20; Miscellaneous 1 of 2025 (29 August 2025) (Accessed on 7 June 2026).

Constitutional Objective: Preventing the Over-Concentration of Public Power

A constitution should not merely establish institutions of government; it should ensure that no individual, office, or institution is able to accumulate such power that it undermines democracy, the rule of law, or the rights of citizens. One of the principal objectives of constitutional design is therefore to prevent the over-concentration of public power.

Fiji's constitutional history demonstrates the dangers that arise when power becomes concentrated in too few hands. Although each of Fiji's constitutions has contained provisions recognising democracy, the separation of powers and the rule of law, the practical operation of government has, at various times, revealed that constitutional guarantees alone are insufficient if institutions are unable to operate independently or if constitutional safeguards can be circumvented by those exercising political power.

In my respectful view, the principal weakness of the current constitutional framework is not that it lacks democratic institutions, but that it permits an excessive concentration of influence in certain executive offices, particularly in relation to appointments, oversight, and the functioning of independent constitutional bodies. Constitutional reform should therefore seek not simply to redistribute power, but to ensure that power is exercised transparently, accountably, and subject to effective institutional checks and balances.

This objective may be achieved through several complementary constitutional mechanisms.

First, the Constitution should reinforce the separation of powers by ensuring that the legislative, executive and judicial branches each perform their constitutional functions independently, without undue interference from the others. The separation of powers is not intended to create competing institutions, but to establish a system of mutual restraint in which each branch provides an effective check upon the exercise of power by the others.

Secondly, the Constitution should strengthen the independence of constitutional commissions and oversight institutions. Bodies such as the Judicial Services Commission, the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption, the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Independent Legal Services Commission, and other constitutional offices must be protected from political influence if they are to command public confidence and perform their constitutional responsibilities impartially.

Thirdly, the Constitution must continue to safeguard judicial independence. Courts are the ultimate guardians of the Constitution and the rule of law. Their legitimacy depends not only upon formal guarantees of independence, but also upon transparent appointment processes, security of tenure, professional excellence, integrity, and public confidence that judicial officers decide cases according to law rather than political considerations.

Fourthly, constitutional reform should strengthen parliamentary accountability by ensuring that Parliament is able effectively to scrutinise the Executive, oversee the expenditure of public funds, hold Ministers accountable for their decisions, and represent the interests of the people rather than merely endorse executive policy. A healthy constitutional democracy requires a Parliament that performs its oversight role independently and robustly.

Fifthly, appointments to constitutional offices should be decentralised so that no single political officeholder exercises disproportionate influence over appointments to the judiciary, independent commissions, constitutional offices or senior public service positions. Appointment processes should be transparent, merit-based and shared among appropriate constitutional institutions to minimise both actual and perceived political influence.

Finally, the Constitution must continue to protect and, where appropriate, strengthen constitutional rights. Fundamental rights are not merely individual entitlements; they are constitutional limits upon the exercise of governmental power. Rights such as access to justice, administrative fairness, privacy, freedom of assembly, freedom of association and the right to petition public authorities provide practical safeguards against arbitrary government action and reinforce democratic participation.

The recommendations contained in this submission are guided by these constitutional principles. Whether addressing the Bill of Rights, Parliament, the Presidency, the Judiciary, independent institutions, the Public Service, or constitutional immunity, the underlying objective remains the same: to create a constitutional framework in which power is distributed rather than concentrated, institutions are independent rather than subordinate, and every public office is exercised under the Constitution and subject to the rule of law.

Constitutions alone cannot guarantee good government. They cannot prevent every abuse of power, nor can they ensure that those entrusted with public office will always act honourably. What a constitution can do, however, is establish institutions that make abuses of power more difficult, accountability more effective, and democratic government more resilient. That, in my respectful submission, should remain the central objective of Fiji's constitutional reform.

Preamble

The Preamble is good but can be strengthened with the following inclusions, which have been taken from the Constitution of Hungary:[9]

We recognise the role of Christianity in preserving nationhood. We value the various religious traditions of our country.

We hold that human existence is based on human dignity.

We hold that individual freedom can only be complete in cooperation with others.

We hold that the family and the nation constitute the principal framework of our coexistence, and that our fundamental cohesive values are fidelity, faith and love.

We hold that the strength of community and the honour of each man are based on labour, an achievement of the human mind.

We hold that we have a general duty to help the vulnerable and the poor.

We hold that the common goal of citizens and the State is to achieve the highest possible measure of well-being, safety, order, justice and liberty.

We hold that democracy is only possible where the State serves its citizens and administers their affairs in an equitable manner, without prejudice or abuse.

Our Constitution shall be the basis of our legal order. It is a living framework which expresses the nation's will and the form in which we want to live.

SUPREMACY OF THE CONSTITUTION

Section 2 - The Constitution is the Supreme Law of the State. I would like to see Section 2(1) expanded to read:

This Constitution is the supreme law of the State and, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, if any other law is inconsistent with this Constitution, this Constitution shall prevail and the other law shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be void.[10]

I would like to see the following provisions included or added on to Section 2 of the Constitution. The inclusion of these provisions may be seen as stating the obvious but in my experience, the obvious needs to be stated to prevent any other interpretation.

Fiji shall be an independent, democratic rule-of-law State.

The form of government of Fiji shall be a republic.

---

[9] Hungary 2011 (rev. 2016) Constitution - Constitute

[10] From Section 1 of the Constitution of Barbados 1966 (rev.2007). The Constitution of Barbados (Accessed on 2 July 2026)

The source of public power shall be the people.

The power shall be exercised by the people through elected representatives or, in exceptional cases, directly.

Sections 3-6 can remain.

Section 4 – Secular State

It should remain a secular state.

The calls for a Christian state and making Sunday a day of rest is not rooted in the Bible. We can recognise that Fiji recognises the role of Christianity in our history but we must not exclude other faiths. Religion is a personal matter and should not be legislated.

I concur with the Council of Churches in reading Section 4 and Section 22 together.

Section 5 – Citizenship can be retained.

BILL OF RIGHTS

The Bill of Rights provisions are good and should be retained. We can add more safeguards for the citizens of Fiji bearing in mind that the state is supposed to look after the welfare of the people; not to trample on their rights or to kill and maim.

We can add to Section 9, the following provision:

Everyone shall have the right to compensation, whose liberty has been restricted without a well-founded reason or unlawfully.

This added provision will make anyone who is heavy handed with the law cause to pause and consider carefully their actions.

We can add in relation to Section 11(3), the following:

Practices aimed at eugenics, the use of the human body or its parts for financial gain, as well as human cloning shall be prohibited.

Section 16 – Executive and Administrative Justice.

To be strengthened with the inclusion of the following provisions:

1. Everyone shall have the right to have his or her affairs handled impartially, fairly and within a reasonable time by the authorities. Authorities shall be obliged to give reasons for their decisions, as provided for by an Act.

2. Everyone shall have the right to compensation for any damage unlawfully caused to him or her by the authorities in the performance of their duties, as provided for by an Act.

These provisions need to be included in the Amended Constitution to prevent a systemic abuse of its vast powers by the state.

Freedom of Assembly – Section 18

Retain the section with some additional protections:

1. Everyone shall have the right to peaceful assembly.
2. Everyone shall have the right to establish and join organisations.
3. Political parties may be formed and may operate freely on the basis of the right to association. Political parties shall participate in the formation and expression of the will of the people. Political parties shall not exercise public power directly.
4. The detailed rules for the operation and management of political parties shall be laid down in the laws governing political parties under our Electoral laws.
5. Trade unions and other interest representation organisations may be formed and may operate freely on the basis of the right to association.

Section 24 – Right to privacy

This needs to be strengthened to include:

Article on private communications and data

1. Everyone shall have the right to have his or her private and family life, home, communications and good reputation respected.
2. Everyone shall have the right to the protection of his or her personal data, as well as to access and disseminate data of public interest.
3. The application of the right to the protection of personal data and to access data of public interest shall be supervised by an independent authority established by an Act.

NEW ADDITIONS TO THE BILL OF RIGHTS

Article on self defence

Everyone shall have the right to repel any unlawful attack against his or her person or property, or one that poses a direct threat to the same, as provided for by an Act.

*While some may argue that this is already part of the criminal law and could be used as a defence, I would suggest that we look at it in terms of homeowners who whilst enjoying the privacy of their homes, are attacked by a group and have had to pick up a weapon and defend themselves and their family. Generally, people are charged and have to take their chances with the courts, this article would seek to provide the sensibilities and common-sense approach to viewing this type of scenario. This is the scenario that this provision would look at.

Article on the right to petition public authorities

Everyone shall have the right to submit, either individually or jointly with others, written applications, complaints or proposals to any organ exercising public power.

Article on use of technology to improve public service and transparency

The State shall strive to use the latest technological solutions and scientific achievements to make its operation efficient, raise the standard of public services, improve the transparency of public affairs and to promote equality of opportunity.

CHAPTER 3 – PARLIAMENT

PART A – LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY

Sections 46-51 can remain.

PART B – COMPOSITION

Retain the Proportional Representation System and keep the current system. It works for now. A unicameral parliament is suitable for a small country like ours.

In relation to the gender composition, Fiji currently has a population of about 900,000 with half being male and half female. However, our Parliament does not reflect this. What we have is Standing Order 110(2) which says that we put a gender lens to Reports, Bills and Laws. However, that is an institutional matter and not one of representation.

Electoral System

Fiji's electoral and constitutional framework has undergone a few transformations, including shifts from First Past the Post (pre-1997), to Preferential Voting under the 1997 Constitution, and later to the Open List Proportional Representation system[11] under the 2013 Constitution. Despite these structural changes, gender inequality in political representation has persisted, raising questions about the adequacy of existing constitutional mechanisms in addressing entrenched structural disadvantage.

[11] Section 53 of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji.

First Past the Post is not suitable for Fiji now and especially with more than 3 main political actors.

Whilst the D'Hondt system has its faults we must work with it for now.

TSM

Mrs. Suliana Siwatibau in her article, 'Women and minority interests in Fiji's alternative vote electoral system'[12]stated that despite government rhetoric, women's representation in parliament has remained below the 30% target that was set. She attributed this to:

1. Difficulties in adapting very strong traditional cultures and attitudes which still sees women as subordinate to men.
2. Continuing male influence over the way women and families vote.
3. Difficulties for those with little education (mostly women) to comprehend the Alternative Vote (AV) system.
4. Women being hesitant to nominate for election.
5. Little concerted effort by political parties to encourage women as candidates.
6. The high cost of election campaigns combined with the relatively poor financial status of women.
7. The fact that the AV electoral system works against women and minority groups.

Out of the 7 reasons identified by Siwatibau,[13] Reasons No. 3 and 7 are no longer applicable.

In order to achieve real parity, the Constitution needs to put into our constitution a provision for Temporary Special Measures and that at least 5 seats are to be reserved for women to help us get to that equality.

The mechanics can be worked out by the Electoral Commission.

In relation to election dates, I agree with the Electoral Commission that there must be certainty in the DATES for elections so that politicians do not play with the dates.

We must include a provision that states that ELECTIONS MUST BE HELD between the 1-30 September each election year beginning with the first election after this Constitution comes into force.

---

[12] Siwatibau, Suliana, 'Women and minority interests in Fiji's alternative electoral system', Fraenkel, J., & Firth, S (Eds.), From Election to Coup in Fiji: The 2006 campaign and its aftermath, (2007) co-publishers IPS Publications, University of he South Pacific and Asia Pacific Press, The Australian National University.

[13] ibid

In relation to local government elections or municipal elections, we have not had elections since 20005 and the ones that were to be held in September this year have been postponed. Good governance starts at the local level and if the people of towns and cities are deprived of the opportunity to vote for their local government officials, then the principles of democracy and transparency and accountability are abandoned as the persons who are in charge of city/town rates and other things to do with a municipal are not accountable to the people of that city or town.

Although the Local Government elections are legislated for in the Local Government Act, the Constitution should include a provision MANDATING that local government elections are to be held every three (3) years or something similar.

CHAPTER 4 – THE PRESIDENT

The Chapter can be strengthened by amending s82 to make it clearer that the President is a CEREMONIAL ROLE and that the President cannot act on his/her own accord. The President only acts on advice.

The President must be above reproach and character is an essential to the criteria for eligibility to be President.

Therefore, for a Fiji citizen to qualify to be president, would require demonstrated qualities of integrity, respect and absence of bias. Some aspects that maybe impediments to appointment include criminal history, civil actions, financial difficulties, professional (mis)conduct, and presence on social media and online networks. In the jurisdictions that have such criteria, any information disclosed would not necessarily amount to an absolute bar to appointment but might warrant further investigation. The person would need to disclose prior sexual harassment complaints or any allegations of sexual misconduct.

Article - role and mandate of the President

1. The person of the President of the Republic shall be inviolable.
2. The office of the President of the Republic shall be incompatible with any other state, social, economic and political office or assignment. The President of the Republic may not pursue any other remunerated occupation, and may not receive a fee for any other activity, except for an activity subject to copyright protection.
3. The mandate of the President of the Republic shall terminate:
    - upon the expiry of his or her term of office;
    - upon his or her death;

- if he or she is incapable of performing his or her functions for over ninety days;
- if the conditions for his or her election no longer exist;
- upon the declaration of a conflict of interests;
- upon his or her resignation;
- upon his or her removal from the office of the President of the Republic.

4. Parliament shall decide with the votes of two-thirds of the Members of Parliament present on the establishment of any condition of the President of the Republic preventing him or her of performing his or her functions for over ninety days, or of the absence of the conditions required for his or her election, or on the declaration of a conflict of interests.
5. The detailed rules for the legal status of the President of the Republic and the previous Presidents of the Republic, and their remuneration shall be laid down in a separate Act.

Section 88 of the 2013 Constitution states that the Chief Justice is to perform the functions in the absence of the President. It is proposed that that provision is to be amended and that instead of the Chief Justice, the Speaker of Parliament is to take on that role.

Article – Substitute when the President is unable to act

1. If the President of the Republic is temporarily prevented from acting, or if the mandate of the President of the Republic terminates, the Speaker of Parliament shall exercise the functions and powers of the President of the Republic until he or she is no longer prevented from acting, or until the new President of the Republic takes office, respectively.
2. The fact that the President of the Republic is temporarily prevented from acting shall be established by Parliament at the initiative of the President of the Republic, the Government or any Member of Parliament.
3. While substituting for the President of the Republic, the Speaker of Parliament may not exercise his or her rights as a Member of Parliament, and his or her duties as Speaker of Parliament shall be performed by the Deputy Speaker of Parliament designated by Parliament.

Section 89 deals with removal from office. Currently, it is the Prime Minister requests the Chief Justice to set up a tribunal to look into any case of alleged misbehaviour by the President.

The challenge with this is that if the Prime Minister refuses to act, then there is no other way. If as is the case in Fiji today, that the Prime Minister is the traditional subject of the President, then the possibility of this happening is slim.

Article - Criminal Proceedings against the President

1. Criminal proceedings against the President of the Republic may be instituted only after the termination of his or her mandate.
2. If the President of the Republic wilfully violates the Constitution or, in connection with performing his or her office, any Act, or if he or she commits a wilful criminal offence, one-fifth of the Members of Parliament may propose his or her removal from office.
3. For the impeachment procedure to be instituted, the votes of two-thirds of the Members of Parliament shall be required. Voting shall be held by secret ballot.
4. As from the adoption of the decision of Parliament, the President of the Republic may not exercise his or her powers until the impeachment procedure is concluded.
5. The High Court consisting of 3 judges shall have the power to conduct the impeachment procedure.
6. If, as a result of the procedure, the High Court establishes the responsibility of the President of the Republic under public law, it may remove the President of the Republic from office.

PART B – CABINET

The Provisions in relation to cabinet need to be amended to CAP the number of Ministers. A constitutional cap can help contain public expenditure. Currently there are 20 ministers with a salary of around $200,000.00. Each Minister has a PA, a PSO, a government issued car and driver. That in itself is a big expense.

Some departments have become ministries and so our cabinet has become unwieldy. Apart from cabinet Ministers, the Prime Minister has also appointed a number of Assistant Ministers. Whilst the Assistant Ministers are not members of cabinet, their inclusion also comes with a PA, a car and a driver and all that those offices are entitled to.

Section 91 (10 could be amended to read:

Cabinet consists of the Prime Minister as Chairman and no more than 15 cabinet ministers in total (excluding the Prime Minister).

CHAPTER 5 – THE JUDICIARY

Separation of powers and the independence of the judiciary is in the current constitution and past constitutions but it is the actors in these institutions that have to be made to follow the rules as laid out by the constitution.

State v Silatolu and Nata [2003] FJHC 239; HAC0011.2001 (27 June 2003), although the Constitution being referred to in that case was the 1997 Constitution (as amended), there was a good discussion by the high court on separation of powers, some of which is reproduced below:[14]

The separation of the judicial power

The Constitution, by its explicit terms [section 118], requires that the judicial power of the State be separated from and be exercised (by the judges) independently of the legislative and executive branches of government. The express words of section 118 aside, the arrangement of the Constitution (Chapters 6, 7 and 9 of which deal separately with the legislative power of the State, the executive authority of the State and the judicial power of the State) provides the basis for a necessary implication of separation of the judicial power. The Parliament is precluded from vesting that power in any person or agency other than the courts and from itself exercising that power or interfering with the court's exercise of that power.[2]

The textual implication is reinforced by the language used - "the ... power/authority .... vests/is vested in ...".

The doctrine of the separation of legislative, executive and judicial power, at least to the extent that it commits judicial power to the courts to the exclusion of the Parliament, was recognised by the Privy Council in Liyanage v R[3]. Their Lordships said in that case:

These provisions manifest an intention to secure in the judiciary a freedom from political, legislative and executive control. They are wholly appropriate in a Constitution which intends that judicial power shall be vested only in the judicature. They would be inappropriate in a Constitution, by which it was intended that judicial power should be shared by the executive or the legislature. The Constitution's silence as to the vesting of judicial power is consistent with its remaining, where it had lain for more than a century, in the hands of the judicature. It is not consistent with any intention that henceforth it should pass to, or be shared by, the executive or the legislature.[4]

The noted constitutional academic, Professor Lane, has said[5] that judicial power is usurped, according to Liyanage, when there is legislative interference in specific proceedings, when such interference affects pending litigation, and when the interference affects the judicial process itself such as inter alia the discretion or judgment of the judiciary or the authority or jurisdiction of the court.

*The separation of powers doctrine, as it applies in South Africa, was explained in First Certification

---

[14] State v Timoci Silatolu and Josefa Nata [2003] FJHC 239; HAC0011.2001 (27 June 2003) State v Silatolu and Nata [2003] FJHC 239; HAC0011.2001 (27 June 2003)

Judgment (also referred to as In re: Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996[6]) in the following terms:

The principle of separation of powers, on the one hand, recognises the functional independence of branches of government. On the other hand, the principle of checks and balances focuses on the desirability of ensuring that the constitutional order, as a totality, prevents the branches of government from usurping power from one another. In this sense it anticipates the necessary or unavoidable intrusion of one branch on the terrain of another. No constitutional scheme can reflect a complete separation of powers; the scheme is always one of partial separation. In Justice Frankfurter's words, 'the areas are partly interacting, not wholly disjointed'... The model adopted reflects the historical circumstances of our constitutional development. We find in the Constitution checks and balances that evidence a concern for both the over-concentration of power and the requirement of an energetic and effective, yet answerable, executive. A strict separation of powers has not always been maintained; but there is nothing to suggest that the constitutional principles imposed upon the [Parliament] an obligation to adopt a particular form of strict separation, such as that found in the United States of America, France or the Netherlands.

The separation of powers doctrine, as it applies in Australia, is explained in Wilson v Minister for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Affairs.[7]

The separation of the judicial power has been said to be necessary inter alia for the discharge by the courts of their constitutional role as a "bulwark of the Constitution against encroachment whether by the legislature or the executive."[8]

The separation of the judicial power precludes any legislative interference with the exercise of the judicial power by the courts because the rights of persons must be determined by "judges of the State ... independent of the legislative and executive branches of government."[9]

...

Fiji has had good constitutions but if one of the actors dominates one or frightens another, then separation of powers is just a term of art.

For example, after the ruling in HBJ 5 of 2025, the Applicant Malimali was to meet with the Judicial Services Commission as that is the body that is empowered by the Constitution that is tasked with recommending to the President the appointment of the Commissioner of FICAC, the Deputy Commissioner FICAC and Acting Commissioner FICAC. After HBJ 5 of 2025, the meeting between Malimali and the JSC was stalled because the representative of the Prime Minister (Valenitabua Jnr) and the representative of the President (the SG) were present and participating in the meetings. That is an instance of direct interference in contravention of s104(8) of the Constitution.

PART A – COURTS AND JUDICIAL OFFICERS

With Fiji's coup-ridden history and the whispers in the corridors of judicial involvement or collaboration in at least one coup and the allegations touted about that the judiciary was tainted under the previous administration, it is so very important that we harken back to the days when the judiciary was revered and people had confidence in it.

Appointment of Judges and Magistrates

Sections 105 and 106 refer to the qualifications of persons who are to be appointed as judges and magistrates. The wording of sections 105 and 106 is inelegant needs re-writing.

Our judiciary must reflect the society that it serves we need a judiciary that recognises that diversity of experience, in terms of gender, ethnicity, socio-economic background, and life experience is important, and affects the judicial response to the cases that come before the courts by contributing to the strength and flexibility of judicial reasoning.(such as the NZ judiciary).[15]

Fiji houses 3 law schools and about 200 lawyers are admitted as legal practitioners each year. There are over 1,000 (1078 as per the Judiciary website)[16] lawyers with valid or current practising certificates. What that means is that Fiji is full of lawyers and people with law degrees which means that we have a population that can access legal advice in person, quite apart from google, ChatGPT and Claude.

That being so and with the advent of AI, Fiji needs a judiciary that is in touch with the people, with technology and one that has people who are also academically qualified. We the people of Fiji deserve the best quality judges who can not only dissect a case and deliver judgements that are fair but judgements that are well written.

Currently, the judicial arm is filled with judges and magistrates who typically have come straight from one of the government departments such as DPP, Legal Aid or AG's Chambers. The perception from the outside looking in is that joining the magistracy is part of the natural progression in the career of government from those 3 offices. I could be mistaken but that is a perception. Private Practitioners seem to not be able to get a judicial appointment although they generally do a wider range of legal work than government lawyers.

For a person to apply for a judicial appointment they must have professional competence, integrity, temperament and experience. Applicants must also possess high moral character,

[15] How is a judge appointed? – Courts of New Zealand

[16] List-of-Legal-Practitioners-with-valid-Practising-Certificate-as-at-1st-March-2026-for-the-period-01st-March-2026-28th-February-2027 .pdf (Accessed on 01/07/26) intellectual and analytical ability, sound judgement, and a deep understanding of people and society.

In order to be qualified to be appointed as a judge, I would add the following criteria:

- Minimum academic qualification requirement would be a master's degree from a recognised educational institution. The preferred Masters would be an LLM, MEL, MTax, MBA. (Some may suggest that this is too stringent and would exclude some excellet legal practitioners but in Fiji's context and the number of lawyers we have for our population, I would still put this in. If it means that lawyers have to put in some extra work to attain further academic credentials, then it can only benefit the country, the rule of law and our jurisprudence).
- I would keep the post-admission practice at 15 years but at least 10 years must have been spent in private practice or academia.

I would add another requirement to the Professional Qualification

For applicants to be a judge - identify at least ten matters (substantive trials or appeals) in the past 5 years that they have been part of.

A major or significant matter may have the following features:

- referred to by the Judge as important, complex, significant or similar term;
- is a test case or set a precedent;
- has been reported or has been the subject of academic comment;
- a serious fraud or criminal case;
- a complex commercial or civil case (including family law cases).

- The criteria can also add a pathway from the Magistracy to the High Court bench through the identification of at least 10 cases in the past 3 years that can be classified as a major or significant matter.

In order to be qualified to be appointed as a Magistrate, I would add the following criteria:

- Minimum academic qualification requirement would be a master's degree from a recognised educational institution. The preferred Masters would be an LLM, MEL, MTax, MBA.
- I would keep the post-admission practice at 10 years for Magistrates but I would add that at least 5 years must have been spent in private practice or academia.

I would add another requirement to the Professional Qualification

- For applicants to be a magistrate - identify at least five matters (substantive trials or appeals) in the past 5 years that they have been part of.

A major or significant matter may have the following features:

- referred to by the Judge as important, complex, significant or similar term;
- is a test case or set a precedent;
- has been reported or has been the subject of academic comment;
- a serious fraud or criminal case;
- a complex commercial or civil case (including family law cases).

PART B – INDEPENDENT JUDICIAL AND LEGAL INSTITUTIONS

This provision relates to independent commissions and office holders such as:

S114 - ILSC

S115 - FICAC

S116 - Solicitor General

S117 - DPP

To qualify for these positions, one must qualify to be a judge, therefore I recommend that the same criteria that is applied to judges is to be applied to the applicants for these positions.

All of these positions are appointed by the President on the advice of the Judicial Services Commission, following consultations with the Attorney-General.

For these appointments, there is an over-concentration of power in the Attorney-General and the provisions should be amended to remove the criteria for consultation with the Attorney-General.

Section 115 – FICAC

There have been many calls to abolish FICAC because it was and continues to be weaponised against the people.

There has been calls for some version or another of FICAC dating back to the 1970s and in the early 2000s, there were Law Reform Commissioners appointed, chaired by former Chief Justice Daniel Fatiaki, who undertook consultations around the country and produced a Report, which led to the Drafting of the FICAC Bill. That Bill, after some amendments was then promulgated in April 2007 by the Bainimarama regime. So, FICAC was not created out of thin air.

However, the purpose for which FICAC was to be created has been overtaken by the whims by those in power. Sadly as we saw since its inception in 2007, whilst the ruse has been to prosecute corrupt government officials and their private sector counterparts, FICAC gained notoriety, by mostly prosecuting and maybe persecuting electoral offences and politicians. It was used to wield the axe over the heads of anyone who was perceived to be or who stood in opposition to the government of the day. They have appointed heads of FICAC who had leanings towards the political heads and so FICAC has never truly been independent.

There are 2 options available and they are:

1 - abolish FICAC altogether

2 - keep FICAC but take away its prosecutorial powers and give it to the office of the Ombudsman

The problem with abolishing FICAC is that cases of fraud and corruption will take even longer to investigate. Whilst there exists within the Fiji Police Force, units that deal with corruption and fraud, sadly, they do not have the manpower nor the expertise to deal with these cases.

Apart from the lack of manpower, the Fiji Police Force at this current time is also faced with a crisis of corruption. Police Officers are accused on a regular basis of criminal activity. Never before in our history have we seen such a large number of police officers who have been charged with criminal offences.

If already, there are allegations of police officers taking bribes for drugs cases, imagine how much more it will be or how much worse it will get, if we add corruption to their workload.

Right now, we have 2 severely crippled law enforcement agencies. The Fiji Police Force has a crisis of ethics and the FICAC has a crisis of control. FICAC is not independent and the cases they have pursued in the past year shows a trend of prosecuting political opponents rather than real corruption cases. The one major case that they have had this year resulted in an acquittal (the Sanjay Kaba case).

Laws will not improve these institutions but the respect for the rule of law will and so will zero-tolerance for political interference.

Other Commissions

S119 – Mercy Commission

S120 – Public Service Disciplinary Tribunal

S121 – Transparency and Accountability Commission

For these appointments, there is an over-concentration of power in the Attorney-General and the provisions should be amended to remove the criteria for consultation with the Attorney-General.

CHAPTER 6 – STATE SERVICES

PART A – PUBLIC SERVICE

S126(1) (a) and (b) state that the Public Service Commission is to appoint and remove permanent secretaries, with the agreement of the Prime Minister.

This would qualify as an over-concentration of power in the Prime Minister.

Permanent Secretaries are the CEOs of government ministries, and they should be appointed on merit and free of political influence. A case in point is that of the former PS for Fisheries Ms. Atelaite Rokosuka. After a disciplinary hearing, the Public Service Disciplinary Tribunal, ordered inter alia, that she resume duties on 19 December 2025 (or thereabouts). However, somehow, the Prime Minister decided that she was not to resume duties, and she was reassigned to the Government Training Centre (FLIPS) at Nasese.

Section 127 deals with Permanent Secretaries.

Section 127(4) deals with reassignment of Permanent Secretaries and that the PSC with the agreement of the Prime Minister can reassign a Permanent Secretary.

Section 127(6) deals with remuneration and the PSC determines that following the agreement of the Prime Minister.

Sections 126, 127(4) and 127(6) are to be amended to remove with the agreement of the Prime Minister.

CHAPTER 10 – IMMUNITY

This chapter is to be removed. A country that has been independent for 56 years has had 4 coups and 4 Constitutions (excluding the Ghai Constitution) shows that it has not learnt from its mistakes and is a breeding ground for fundamentalists to rob right thinking, forward thinking citizens of the rights to live peacefully and peaceably with their neighbours. Drive out into the suburbs of Suva to see the rubbish on every corner and that tells you a lot about the lack of civic pride by our citizens. Let's build that first and respect for one another instead of legislating to keep the powerful and rich in their positions of power. Each coup has created a new elite and each government has generally governed for its friends and funders, but not so much for the people of Fiji.

Immunity weakens public confidence and to build a Fiji that we can proudly leave to the future generations of Fijians, we must remove immunity and promote accountability, constitutionalism and the rule of law.

CHAPTER 11 – AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION

Stability, Certainty, Continuity are the key purposes of having a written constitution. As society evolves and new issues that affect us emerge such as Covid-19 and now the emergence of AI, constitutional reform may become necessary to respond to the changing landscape of social, economic and political circumstances. Therefore, we need a Constitution that strikes a balance between stability and adaptability.

The experience under the 2013 Constitution demonstrates that the amendment process has become very difficult. The 2013 Constitution was brought in by the Bainimarama Regime to usher in parliamentary democracy and elections since 2006.

However, genuine reform under the 2013 Constitutional Reform under the 2013 Constitution is a practical impossibility. I also accept that constitutional reform should not be so easily achieved that governments are able to alter fundamental constitutional principles for short-term political advantage.

I would recommend the following amendments be made to Chapter 11:

- For ordinary constitutional provisions, they can be amended by two-thirds majority of the total membership of Parliament. This threshold requires broad political consensus while recognising that constitutions must be capable of reform;
- For the entrenched provisions, such as the constitutional amendment themselves, the requirement should be that the constitutional amendment has the support of at least three-quarters of the total membership of Parliament AND approval by a majority of valid votes cast at a national referendum.

This approach recognises that it is the people who make the law and the ultimate responsibility lies with them. Through this process, the power is given back to the people.

To ensure that constitutional amendments receive proper public consideration, all proposed Constitutional Amendment Bills should be published for public consumption and consultation for at least six months before being debated in Parliament. Constitutional Reform should never be undertake without meaningful public participation.

In relation to Referendums, the following could be included for completeness:

- Principles and procedures for conducting a referendum, and its validity, are provided by law.[17]

CONSTITUTIONAL CULTURE

Constitutional Culture refers to the shares values, beliefs and unwritten norms that a society holds regarding its system of government and fundamental laws.

I would also recommend that we must develop a constitutional culture and take Fiji back to the earlier slogan of "Fiji: the way the world should be".

In order to preserve democracy and respect for each other and the rule of law it is important that the Constitution reflects this by requiring government to set in place a programme for civic education, public education, professional ethics and institutional respect.

We want stability and we want to bring back into our society some of the values that have fallen by the wayside and whilst we cannot force people to participate, through the Constitution we can start by saying that we share a culture of respect.

The mechanics of that can be done by legislation or policy with responsibility and a budget given to a particular ministry or to the Civil Service to commence the programme. Civil Society Actors are already doing alot of the work and government can use Civil Society, including faith based organisations to raise awareness and educate the people on the important democratic principles and constitutional conventions.

As stated several times, constitutions alone cannot guarantee good government; it's the people and their willingness to live by the principles in the constitution and being willing to enforce it.

REVIEW

There is no mechanism for review in the current constitution but seeing how the word Constitution is so easily thrown around and the constant calls for review, perhaps, we could put a REVIEW DATE for the Constitution.

[17] From Article 151 of the Constitution of Albania. Codices (Accessed on 2 July 2026)

A provision could be added that says that this Constitution will be reviewed through another Constitution Review Commission no later than 10 years from the date the amended Constitution or new constitution comes into force. Section 161 of the 1990 Constitution was the Review Clause.

THE GREAT COUNCIL OF CHIEFS

The Great Council of Chiefs is not in the 2013 Constitution and should remain out of it.

The GCC or BLV, I would respectfully submit, should perhaps commission reports into iTaukei education, iTaukei youth needs, drug abuse and village administration.

I would also suggest that the GCC actively take part in the law reform process by applying an indigenous or iTaukei lens to all Bills, Laws and Reports.

CONCLUSION

The people of Fiji deserve a country free of the kind of abuse that we have been subjected to as a nation over the past 40 years. People seeking power through the barrel of the gun and those who seek power by manipulating those with guns has to stop.

We the people must say stop and anyone who seeks to take over the country again, should be held accountable in a court of law.

The government and the courts belong to us the people and it is us who have to say no more and to hold them accountable.

We must also put an end to race politics and the politics of religion and fear mongering. Cronyism, Nepotism and Tribal (vanua) politics must go too. That is the domain of the wicked.

Constitutions do not bring stability; it is following the rule of law (no matter what) that does. So it is important that we have independent institutions free from political interference and politicians must be held to a higher standard than everyone else because of the special position they hold as our representatives. Politicians should be left out or removed from the appointment process of judicial officers, independent bodies and commissions and tribunals. To stop possible abuse, we have to remove the Prime Minister and Attorney-General in the portions of the Constitution that requires their consent or assent or consultation.

Fiji should remain a unicameral nation with an amendment to the Constitution to provide for at least 5 reserved seats for women.

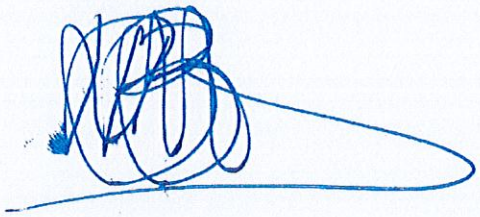
This one is pedantic but I would like the Constitution to contain ARTICLES rather than sections.

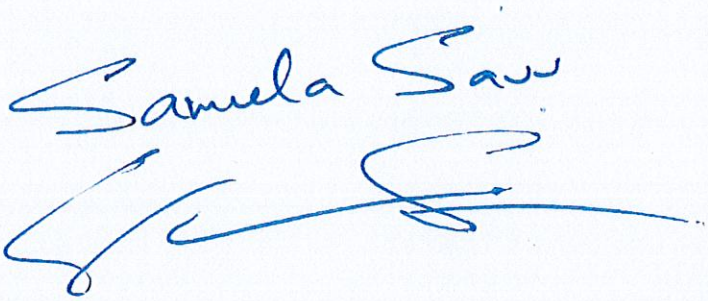
Constitutions are not necessarily bad; it's the people in power who can misuse the powers given to them.

Respectfully submitted.

B. Malimali

2 July 2026





Republic of Fiji Military Forces (RFMF)

Republic of Fiji Military Force
Date: 2-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: The commander of the Republic of Fiji built fossils. I see your manager legal and gentlemen officers. It is indeed a pleasure receiving you this afternoon for this consultation session for the Constitution Review Commission. We appreciate accepting our invitation and we really appreciate having you a commander of the RFMF appearing before us. This afternoon you will see that there are three commissioners sitting before you. Initially there were seven commissioners appointed by His Excellency the President of the country. One resigned during our process and left us six to run the review of the 2013 Constitution. Now three of us are here.

Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau here on my right and Dr. Neelesh Gounder here on my left. I am the chairperson, Sevuloni Ratumaiyale Valenitabua. There are three others who are currently in Rotuma with a team from our Secretariat and they are undertaking four sessions today of consultations around the island of Rotuma.

Now this afternoon I would like to say that we have been around the country. Suva was the last place for us to do the consultations. We started with consultations on the 1st of April 2026 when the Great Council of Chiefs came in and presented their submissions to us.

Right through April we had other ministries, we had associations, we had the trade unions and we had individuals who came in to present their submissions and recommendations in relation to what we should do with the review of the Constitution. Beginning in May, on the 2nd of May, we left Suva and visited the islands. We visited Vanualevu, we went around Vitilevu and then we came down Wainibuka and Tailevu, Tailevu North, Tailevu South and back to Rewa. Rewa was the last province to be covered and then that is why we are in Suva now and we have started this week with receiving other submissions from other ministries, other individuals and this afternoon we have you.

We're here to listen so that we can gather information and submissions which we might use in the review of the Constitution. Our task is to review and that means that we can amend the Constitution. We are looking at it this way, we can receive submissions and we can remove some laws that are already in the 2013 Constitution. We can include other laws and then we can change the wordings in the law just to change the meaning of the Constitution. That is what our task is.

So, this afternoon we are here to listen. I will now open this consultation session. We welcome you and the mics are there in front of you gentlemen.

Commander, please press on the mic when you are about to talk so that we can have the recordings done. Everything that is stated here this afternoon and in the afternoons which we have passed and in the future are recorded. They are recorded so that we can have hard copies later on for our deliberations. With those few word's gentlemen, Commander, I now open this session and I now give you the floor and the mics. Thank you.

Mr. Jone Kalouniwai: Thank you very much Mr. Chair. I wish to acknowledge also members of the Commission that are beside you this afternoon, Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau and also Dr. Gounder. We do acknowledge the huge work that you are doing despite the constraints that you are faced with on a daily basis and it is on that basis that we have decided to attend this Review Commission in order to submit our views, the views of the RFMF in terms of the constitutional review that is ongoing at this particular time. I wish to take this opportunity also to introduce the members that would be participating in the submission this afternoon and it is only with myself and my Director for Armed Legal Services, Colonel Tuinaosara , who is on my left side, the rest of the delegates are here as part of the office that is attending this submission this morning.

On that note, Mr. Chair, with your permission we wish to make our submission statement this afternoon.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you.

Mr. Jone Kalouniwai: We come before this Commission carrying the weight of our own history. The systemic institutionalized pattern of political instability that has fractured this nation since 1987 was not merely witnessed by the Republic of Fijian military forces.

At points it was built and maintained by our own hands. We do not say this lightly nor without genuine remorse for the part our institution has played in guarding a system that has fractured the moral soul of our nation. We are aware that the path we propose this afternoon is difficult and that it carries real cost.

By calling for an end to what this submission terms the mark of impunity, a constitutional shielding of past acts from ordinary accountability. We voluntarily step out from behind the legal protections that have long covered our institution. We know this will be seen by some of our own as a breach of loyalty and that seeking this redemption places officers and soldiers, including our own, at legal risk.

We do not open this door lightly but we have reached the point where the survival of any single institution can no longer be purchased at the expense of this nation's soul. We have watched national stability become a phrase used to bypass the law and mercy become a word used to silence the truth. Beneath the surface of new rules and new technology there is a restless spirit in Fiji, a worryness with a peace that feels fragile and a justice system that feels out of reach. That restlessness is not disorder. It is a nation's conscience demanding more than infrastructure. It is demanding integrity.

The August 2025 Supreme Court advisory opinion gave Fiji a rare and stunning disruption, a genuine legal opening. But a legal opening is not by itself a moral cure. We are presently free to fix our laws while sit constitutionally forbidden from healing the deeper injury caused by decades of impunity.

Fiji can no longer afford to drift from one crisis to the next. We must deliberately reset the nation's moral compass and we must reject the false choice between justice and peace, a choice in which our silence has too often been the price of a fragile superficial calm. We propose a transition from a culture governed by fear to a covenant of trust between the state, the military and the people.

A UN principle truth and reconciliation process to dismantle the machinery of silence. The end of a culture of impunity so that the law applies equally regardless of rank and the enhancement of a constitutional right to truth. We make this submission not to injure our fellow soldiers but to secure our children's future.

A Fiji where the law protects the inhabitants and not the architect. From moving beyond perpetual political drift our argument is that Fiji is trapped in a cycle of reactive governance in which democratic principles erode gradually, not always by force but through the slow hollowing out of institutions. This drift has been fueled by constitutional ambiguity regarding the military's role because the boundaries of military power have never been clearly fixed in law.

The door has historically remained open for intervention allowing the shadows of the past to persist and preventing the nation from ever fully stabilizing. To achieve this there are few key outcomes.

One, the end of inaction. A shift from a passive do-nothing posture to a proactive commitment to institutional reform. Two, the restoration of the rule of law. Bringing the actions of the state and the military back into alignment with democratic ideals. And three, elimination of pretexts by removing the legal grey areas historically used to justify military interference in civilian matters.

Our recommendations are one, the absolute constitutional clarity. We establish a framework that leaves no room for interpretation regarding the military's mandate.

Two, the supremacy of civilian authority. Formally anchor the RFMF's role under the mandated authority of elected civilian leadership. And third, is the removal of ambiguity where the draft provisions that strip away the vague legal justifications historically used to invite excused military intervention.

The second is dismantling the mark of impunity where we argue that Fiji's legal system has at points been turned into an instrument of elite protection rather than a safeguard for the people. This mark of impunity is not accidental. It is a deliberate design in which the threat of instability is used to bypass the law and immunity clauses are used to legalize what would otherwise be criminal acts.

By forcing a false choice between justice and peace, this design has stressed, has pressed the public into accepting a fragile dishonest calm in exchange for their silence. To achieve these, the key outcomes are as follows. One, the end of a two-tiered legal system, dismantling the divide between a protected elite and the general public before the law.

Second, is a moral and judicial integrity moving beyond the gloss of modernization to address the underlying decay of the courts. And third, is accountability over silence, breaking the cycle in which the fear of future coups is used as a permanent shield for past misconduct. The recommendations is one, is a de-weaponized stability.

Reform national security law so it cannot be used to suspend democratic norms or create a permanent state of exception by executive decree. Number two, abolish blanket immunity. Remove or strictly limit constitutional immunity clauses that grant irrevocable protection for extra-constitutional acts, replacing them with conditional acknowledgment tied to full public disclosure. And third, is to reject the justice or peace binary, where you establish as a matter of national principle that sustainable peace is impossible without accountability, that justice is a precondition for stability, not a threat to it. The third issue is the opportunity and the limits of the 2025 advisory opinion.

Our argument is that the August 2025 Supreme Court ruling was a historic disruption that made constitutional change legally possible for the first time since 2013.

But it is not, by itself, a cure for the nation's wounds. The ruling opened a legal pathway to rewrite the rules for the future while leaving the protected walls of the past, the immunity provisions, intact. A nation cannot achieve true stability if it prepares, if it prepares only its rules while remaining legally forbidden from addressing the deeper injury caused by decades of silence.

To achieve these, the key outcome is one, breaking the legal stagnation, using the newly clarified lower amendment thresholds to finally enact reforms that were previously unreachable. Two, is closing the moral gap, recognizing that a legal pathway to change is meaningless if those shielded by the old system remain insulated from accountability. And third, a shift from legalism to morality, moving the national conversation beyond what is legally permitted, what is morally required for genuine healing.

And the recommendations for this is one, bridge the accountability gap, use the 2025 pathway not only to update technical provisions, but specifically to address the clauses that bar the nation from confronting past immunity. Second, is reject the foundation of silence. Ensure that the new constitutional framework does not merely insulate past actors, but creates a genuine mechanism for transparency.

And third, is the commission a national moral audit. Treat the 2025 opinion as authority to conduct a systemic review of the nation's institutions, so that future law is built on truth rather than technicality alone. The fourth and final issue is the recalibrating the national moral axis.

Our argument is that Fiji's governance has at points in its history relied on dominance and fear rather than mutual consent. A machinery of silence built on legal deadlock and immunity. National healing is impossible without a fundamental shift in the moral axis, away from protecting the architects of past rebellion and toward a covenant of trust, in which the state and the military are once again accountable to the citizenry they serve.

Its key outcomes is one, the end of institutional secrecy, replacing hidden agendas and reflexive invocations of national security with a transparent relationship between the state and the public. Two, is a unified rule of law, a society in which no one, regardless of rank or history, stands beyond the reach of the legal system. And third, is a democratic fluidity, a constitution able to evolve with the will of the people, rather than a rigid instrument designed to preserve the status quo.

To conclude, Mr. Chair, the Republic of Fiji military forces does not make this submission likely. We are fully aware that in calling for this, for the dismantling of the mark of impunity, we are asking the Commission to help close a chapter of the nation's history, in which our institution was at points among the authors. For nearly four decades, Fiji has lived in a house whose walls were built to protect the architects of rebellion, rather than the inhabitants of this nation.

No amount of new infrastructure can substitute for the reset our institutions require. The August 2025 advisory opinion has cleared a legal path, but it will take the moral courage of this Commission and the sustained commitment of the RFMF to walk it to its end. We envision a Fiji which the RFMF is a symbol of humble service, rather than a shadow of intervention, in which the judiciary stands as an unbreakable wall between citizen and state, and in which the right to truth replaces the machinery of silence, opening the way to genuine UN principle reconciliation.

We accept the risk this submission carries to our own institution, because the alternative, a nation of perpetual drifting, is a cost future generations should never have to bear. We urge the Commission to act with the boldness this moment deserves, and the Republic of Fiji and military forces offers its full cooperation in support of its work. Thank you very much for the opportunity.

Mr. Valenitabua; Thank you.

Mr. Jone Kalouniwai: With your permission Mr. Chair I would like to seek your permission to give time to colonel Tuinaosara just to share his points

. Mr. Valenitabua; Vinaka.

Col.Tuinaosara: Chair thank you very much, I would like to just go through a few submissions that we have with regards to the RFMF Act the new one that we are drafting. I know you were part of this way back when we were arguing between the High Court, the Fiji Court of Appeal, and the Supreme Court on the transparency and the fairness of the court martial system. I have only three points so I won't take much time.

If the Constitution, section 173.17 of the Constitution, which appoints the Director of Public Prosecution to also appoint the Director of Military Prosecution, this is the new military court of Fiji which will replace the ad hoc general court martial system. We will have a Director of Military Prosecution independent from the Director of Military Services. That's for fairness and transparency and all the rights that have been provided for under Chapter 2 of the Constitution which should be afforded to the soldiers when it comes to prosecution of offenses.

The second point is on military judges. Again, we propose that the Constitution be inclusive of an appointment for provision for an appointment of a military judge. The military judge will preside over the proceedings of the military court of Fiji.

He will be sitting on an ad hoc or neat basis from time to time. And the third one is section 102 of the Constitution already allows Parliament to establish other courts by written law. This is for the military court of Fiji.

We ask that this be included into the Constitution so it will be like another court, in addition to the high courts that we have, we can have the military court of Fiji solely for the reasons which you Chair are very clear with the cases that we have been battling with, with regards to the fairness and the transparency of the court martial system. Thank you

Mr. Valenitabua; Vinaka Colonel. Tuinaosara. Thank you very much indeed for the submissions which we have heard this afternoon. First of all, I would request the Director Legal if we could have the submissions, the written submissions sent to us.

If you have soft copies, they can be sent to us by email or if you have hard copies then we will welcome receiving the hard copies.

Col.Tuinaosara: Mr. Chair, we will give the hard copies now and then we will submit the soft copies.

Mr. Biu: Chairperson, members of the Commission, I have here with me the written submission from the Republic of Fiji which was presented by the Commander himself and I now submit to the Commission for a record.

And the second submission, Chairperson members of the Commission, is a submission by the Director of Legal Services of RFMF, and I also submit for a record this afternoon.

Mr. Valenitabua; For the record, written submissions have been presented to the Commissioners this afternoon from the Republic of Fiji Military Forces. Two submissions have been presented, orally at first, followed by the written submissions. The first written submission is dated the 2nd of July 2026. It's addressed to the Chairperson Constitutional Review Commission of Suva, Fiji. It is in written form, in the English language, and is signed by Major General Jone Kalouniwai, the Commander of the Republic of the Fiji Military Forces.

The second submission from the RFMF is from the Director of the Legal, Director Legal of the Fiji Military Forces, Colonel Kitione Tuinaosara. It is in written form. I request Mr. Tuinaosara to please sign this. And date, please. Back to the record, the submission by Colonel Tuinaosara is now signed and dated the 2nd of July 2026. I now accept both submissions from the Commander of the Republic of the Fiji Military Forces and from the Manager Legal. I now accept them as evidence tendered to the Commission this afternoon in Suva.

The Commander, The Manager Legal, the gentleman, we have been listening to the submissions this afternoon. We did not have a prior reading, so at this point in time I would ask if any of my fellow Commissioners would want to make a comment or ask a question in relation to the submissions before. I gave a comment later on.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Chair. Commander and gentlemen officers, thank you for making the time for the care and consideration given to your submissions.

I must say that your words on ending the mark of impunity and calling for an abolishment of blanket immunity for extra-constitutional actions land with a gravity that is beyond description for me at present. My question rather relates to emergency powers in Chapter 9 of the Constitution. We have heard submissions from the various maritime, rural as well as urban areas relating to emergency powers.

At present in the current Constitution there is a role for the Commissioner of Police and Commander of the Military Forces in advising relating to emergency powers. Submissions have called for a much more democratic voice to be exercised in emergency powers, perhaps for an involvement of Parliament. I'm curious to hear your stance on what you see as the military's role in the case of emergency powers. Thank you.

Mr. Jone Kalouniwai: Thank you very much. I think this is, through the Chair, this is an issue that we have been tackling in the past few weeks with the issue of drugs.

We have tried to follow the process in terms of enacting the emergency powers that are required of us in a given situation. But in hindsight I think one of the things that is important for us to understand is that there must be an escalation towards a certain threshold before the army can be included in that particular activity. I think it's very important when we're looking at it from a civil military affairs standpoint view when it requires the army to move in.

In this case looking at what transpired in the past few weeks in the last month or so was that we were a bit too quick in trying to get into the emergency powers without actually realizing that the police had not really exhausted the whole mechanism before it could request the army to step in and be part of that particular taskforce. The results is something quite concerning for us in terms of how do we actually move into the cycle of getting the emergency powers. It's just because of the vulnerability of the troops that come under our command.

When there is no legislation in place it makes them a lot more vulnerable in committing acts that are not in line with the provisions that have been provided with the emergency powers. It provides a lot in terms of the army and how it is to conduct itself and it's quite clear. But anything below that it does not have those provisions in place.

So, moving in that escalatory measure towards the time that the commissioner would see it fit that he does not have enough powers to actually conduct the operations then only that would be safe for the army to move in to be part of that particular issue and that solution as well. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua; The commander and the gentlemen officers, I was going to ask questions in relation to the amenity provisions of the 2013 constitution.

But after hearing your submission this afternoon, I will refrain from that until I read the written submissions. Now, an interesting point has been raised by the manager legal, Colonel Tuinaosara, that if I understand Colonel Tuinaosara correctly, the RFMF is asking that we include in the constitution provisions for the appointment of a military prosecutor?

Col.Tuinaosara: That's correct, sir. Director of Military Prosecutions. So that he is independent from command.

Mr. Valenitabua; And secondly, to appoint a military judge?

Col.Tuinaosara: Correct, sir. Again, for the same reason.

Mr. Valenitabua; And thirdly, to also include a military court of Fiji in addition to the civil courts?

Col.Tuinaosara: Yes, sir. The military court of Fiji will be the replacement of the general court martial system that we currently have.

Mr. Valenitabua; All right. As you have mentioned, we had, I was a defense lawyer in the prosecution in the court martial way back in 2003 when you and Mr. Aziz were prosecuting. Gaging from thinking back to that time, there was a judge advocate and a panel of military officers who sat to preside over the court martial. If we were to have a judge, a military judge, would you still have the panel of military officers in your plan?

Col.Tuinaosara: Yes, sir. We will still have the panel of military officers. Similar to the court martial, but we will introduce, we will put on the members some warrant officers and some other ranks. Instead of all senior officers, we'll mix them up.

Mr. Valenitabua; I see. All right. The military court, where do you intend to have that military court? Up at the camp?

Col.Tuinaosara: We've been having discussions since 2019 when we started drafting these laws and we were thinking of having it down at the high court, the government buildings. But I have to do more consultations with my commanders to see how they feel about that. So, for example, the civil courts or the criminal courts have been called in the morning and the military court can sit at 2 or 3 in the afternoon. That sort of system.

I had discussions with the former Chief Justice and I haven't been to this current Chief Justice, but that's the plan, sir. We intend to have it for independence and transparency and fairness. We intend to have the military court of Fiji at the government buildings.

Mr. Valenitabua; Thank you for that, because the comments had always been, you've got a judge advocate sitting there, a panel of military officers. Where is the fairness? Where is the independence and so forth? You know, the comments from the members of the public. But I'm glad that I'm hearing that. So, we'll be having military courts, a military prosecutor and a military judge. Thank you. Miss Nailatikau would like to ask another question.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Chair, Commander and gentlemen officers. Without being too prescriptive, I noted also your reference to a UN principled truth and reconciliation process, as well as commissioning a national and moral audit to inform future progress. As much as you are able to share, I would be interested to hear you expand on that thinking and perhaps the thought process behind those two recommendations. Thank you.

Mr. Jone Kalouniwai: We appreciate the current truth and reconciliation commission that's happening now, but we feel that there isn't too much powers in it. When we were threshing the immunity issue, one of the things that we brought up as part of the options was rather than giving unconditional immunity, but rather conditional.

So that it ties up with this truth and reconciliation, UN truth and reconciliation commission, where it would require all of those who were part of the problem or part of that particular issue. The condition was therefore to appear before that truth and reconciliation commission and to share the experiences or the truth of what actually happened.

I think as part of our submission is that we would request that you would include in the constitution the right to truth, which is important in this case, because if that happens, then with the powers that would be provided to the truth and reconciliation commission, it would allow them to summon those that need to be called up and provide their statements. Their stories, and if not, then there is an option for them to be prosecuted by law.

Col.Tuinaosara: Madam, may I add to that. So, it will need a whole new designing of the whole system that we have at the moment. I'm glad you ask that question conditional immunity bid, the current truth and reconciliation committee, and it will need redesigning in accordance with the UN principle, and to be given more powers. For example, if they tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, they can be given an immunity. So, it needs a whole new thinking designing. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua; Dr. Gounder would like to address you gentlemen.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you chair. The commander RFMF and members of the RFMF I want to thank you for your submission this afternoon. Reading your submission I have seen the courageous and boldness submission that you made this afternoon in which is acknowledge. We have received a number of submissions regarding the immunity clause as well as section 131 in terms of the Military role in the constitution and you have address both of the directly in your submission today and we take note of that. And from you submission I have seen a clear apatite of reform in the RFMF. Moving forward creating a modern RFMF which is noted. Thank you for your submission this afternoon.

Mr. Valenitabua; Thank you. Commander Ratu Jone Kalouniwai. Manager legal and gentleman offices. We have no further comments we have no further questions. We thank you very much for the submissions, we will read and read and read. This is the most important one submission. We think we have received and we have to consider. You gentlemen are the best of security in the country. And we know that the past four calls have been from the RFMF. Some of them. If I may say. But thank you very much for the submissions we will read them. And then we will consider them. We've been waiting for you. Thank you very much. Just for your information. We invite you to a photo session.

---------- End of Session [2-7-2026] ----------

Comuda.

02 July 2026

The Chairperson
Constitutional Review Commission
Suva, Fiji

Dear Chairperson,

RE: SUBMISSION ON CONSTITUTIONAL RENEWAL
Dismantling the Architecture of Rebellion and Recalibrating the National Moral Axis

OPENING STATEMENT: A COVENANT OF TRUTH

We come before this Commission carrying the weight of our own history. The systemic, institutionalised pattern of political instability that has fractured this nation since 1987 was not merely witnessed by the Republic of Fiji Military Forces — at points, it was built and maintained by our own hands. We do not say this lightly, nor without genuine remorse for the part our institution has played in guarding a system that has fractured the moral soul of our nation.

We are aware that the path we propose is difficult, and that it carries real cost. By calling for an end to what this submission terms the Mark of Impunity — the constitutional shielding of past acts from ordinary accountability — we voluntarily step out from behind the legal protections that have long covered our institution. We know this will be seen by some of our own as a breach of loyalty, and that seeking this redemption places officers and soldiers, including our own, at legal risk. We do not open this door lightly. But we have reached a point where the survival of any single institution can no longer be purchased at the expense of the nation's soul.

Scanned with CamScanner

Scanned with CamScanner

We have watched 'national stability' become a phrase used to bypass the law, and 'mercy' become a word used to silence the truth. Beneath the surface of new roads and new technology, there is a restless spirit in Fiji — a weariness with a peace that feels fragile, and a justice system that feels out of reach. That restlessness is not disorder. It is a nation's conscience demanding more than infrastructure. It is demanding integrity.

The August 2025 Supreme Court Advisory Opinion gave Fiji a rare and stunning disruption — a genuine legal opening. But a legal opening is not, by itself, a moral cure. We are presently free to fix our laws while still constitutionally forbidden from healing the deeper injury caused by decades of impunity. Fiji can no longer afford to drift from one crisis to the next. We must deliberately reset the nation's moral compass, and we must reject the false choice between Justice and Peace — a choice in which our silence has too often been the price of a fragile, superficial calm.

We propose a transition from a culture governed by fear to a Covenant of Trust between the state, the military, and the people: a UN-principled Truth and Reconciliation process to dismantle the machinery of silence; the end of a culture of impunity, so that the law applies equally regardless of rank; and the entrenchment of a constitutional Right to Truth. We make this submission not to injure our fellow soldiers, but to secure our children's future — a Fiji where the law protects the inhabitant, not the architect.

PART I — MOVING BEYOND PERPETUAL POLITICAL DRIFT

THE ARGUMENT

Fiji is trapped in a cycle of reactive governance, in which democratic principles erode gradually — not always by force, but through the slow hollowing-out of institutions. This drift has been fuelled by constitutional ambiguity regarding the military's role.

Scanned with CamScanner

Because the boundaries of military power have never been clearly fixed in law, the door has historically remained open for intervention, allowing the shadows of the past to persist and preventing the nation from ever fully stabilising.

KEY OUTCOMES

— The end of inaction: a shift from a passive, do-nothing posture to a proactive commitment to institutional reform.

— Restoration of the rule of law: bringing the actions of the state and the military back into alignment with democratic ideals.

— Elimination of pretext: removing the legal grey areas historically used to justify military interference in civilian matters.

RECOMMENDATIONS

— Absolute constitutional clarity: establish a framework that leaves no room for interpretation regarding the military's mandate.

— Primacy of civilian authority: formally anchor the RFMF's role under the mandated authority of elected civilian leadership.

Scanned with CamScanner

— Removal of ambiguity: draft provisions that strip away the vague legal justifications historically used to invite or excuse military intervention.

PART II — DISMANTLING THE MARK OF IMPUNITY

THE ARGUMENT

Fiji's legal system has, at points, been turned into an instrument of elite protection rather than a safeguard for the people. This Mark of Impunity is not accidental. It is a deliberate design in which the threat of instability is used to bypass the law, and immunity clauses are used to legalise what would otherwise be criminal acts. By forcing a false choice between Justice and Peace, this design has pressed the public into accepting a fragile, dishonest calm in exchange for their silence.

KEY OUTCOMES

— The end of a two-tiered legal system: dismantling the divide between a protected elite and the general public before the law.

— Moral and judicial integrity: moving beyond the gloss of modernisation to address the underlying decay of the courts.

Scanned with CamScanner

— Accountability over silence: breaking the cycle in which the fear of future coups is used as a permanent shield for past misconduct.

RECOMMENDATIONS

— De-weaponise 'stability': reform national security law so it cannot be used to suspend democratic norms or create a permanent state of exception by executive decree.

— Abolish blanket immunity: remove or strictly limit constitutional immunity clauses that grant irrevocable protection for extra-constitutional acts, replacing them with conditional acknowledgment tied to full public disclosure.

— Reject the Justice-or-Peace binary: establish, as a matter of national principle, that sustainable peace is impossible without accountability — that justice is a precondition for stability, not a threat to it.

PART III — THE OPPORTUNITY AND THE LIMITS OF THE 2025 ADVISORY OPINION

THE ARGUMENT

The August 2025 Supreme Court ruling was a historic disruption that made constitutional change legally possible for the first time since 2013. But it is not, by itself, a cure for the nation's wounds. The ruling opened a legal pathway to rewrite the rules for the future while leaving the protective walls of the past — the immunity provisions — intact. A nation cannot achieve true stability if it repairs only its rules while remaining legally forbidden from addressing the deeper injury caused by decades of silence.

Scanned with CamScanner

KEY OUTCOMES

— Breaking the legal stagnation: using the newly clarified, lower amendment thresholds to finally enact reforms that were previously unreachable.

— Closing the moral gap: recognising that a legal pathway to change is meaningless if those shielded by the old system remain insulated from accountability.

— A shift from legalism to morality: moving the national conversation beyond what is legally permitted to what is morally required for genuine healing.

RECOMMENDATIONS

— Bridge the accountability gap: use the 2025 pathway not only to update technical provisions,

Scanned with CamScanner

but specifically to address the clauses that bar the nation from confronting past impunity.

— Reject a foundation of silence: ensure the new constitutional framework does not merely insulate past actors, but creates a genuine mechanism for transparency.

— Commission a national moral audit: treat the 2025 Opinion as authority to conduct a systemic review of the nation's institutions, so that future law is built on truth rather than technicality alone.

PART IV — RECALIBRATING THE NATIONAL MORAL AXIS

THE ARGUMENT

Fiji's governance has, at points in its history, relied on dominance and fear rather than mutual consent — a machinery of silence built on legal deadlock and immunity. National healing is impossible without a fundamental shift in this moral axis: away from protecting the architects of past rebellion, and toward a Covenant of Trust in which the state and the military are once again accountable to the citizenry they serve.

KEY OUTCOMES

Scanned with CamScanner

— The end of institutional secrecy: replacing hidden agendas and reflexive invocations of 'national security' with a transparent relationship between the state and the public.

— A unified rule of law: a society in which no one — regardless of rank or history — stands beyond the reach of the legal system.

— Democratic fluidity: a Constitution able to evolve with the will of the people, rather than a rigid instrument designed to preserve the status quo.

CONCLUSION: A COVENANT OF TRUST FOR A NEW FIJI

The Republic of Fiji Military Forces does not make this submission lightly. We are fully aware that in calling for the dismantling of the Mark of Impunity, we are asking this Commission to help close a chapter of the nation's history in which our institution was, at points, among the authors.

For nearly four decades, Fiji has lived in a house whose walls were built to protect the architects of rebellion rather than the inhabitants of the nation. No amount of new infrastructure can substitute for the reset our institutions require. The August 2025 Advisory

Scanned with CamScanner

Opinion has cleared a legal path, but it will take the moral courage of this Commission — and the sustained commitment of the RFMF — to walk it to its end.

We envision a Fiji in which the RFMF is a symbol of humble service rather than a shadow of intervention; in which the Judiciary stands as an unbreakable wall between citizen and state; and in which the Right to Truth replaces the machinery of silence, opening the way to genuine, UN-principled reconciliation. We accept the risk this submission carries to our own institution because the alternative — a nation of perpetual drifting — is a cost future generations should never have to bear. We urge the Commission to act with the boldness this moment deserves, and the Republic of Fiji Military Forces offers its full cooperation in support of its work.

Respectfully submitted,

Jone Kalouniwai
Major General
Commander,
Republic of Fiji Military Forces

Scanned with CamScanner

Email: kalouniwai@gmail.com
Mobike: 9983532

Scanned with CamScanner

Jagath Karunaratne

Mr. Jagath Karunaratne
Date: 3-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: We received your request, so we managed to slot you in to this hour. You're one of the last to be making submissions, and you're the last of this week. So, we welcome you.

Like I have explained to you, there should be three commissioners, but one is going to be my leader. There are only two of us, not my lady, so this married one is in the helicopter. And I don't need to introduce myself.

The commission will listen to you. I will not introduce ourselves further or explain to you what we are here for. Because you have just completed a consultation, you know, yourself, in relation to the state land sector.

Right, so there's a similar operation, but here we're dealing with the 2013 constitution. We are glad that you are here because you were one of the lawyers who argued in the reference. I know that you represented the Fiji Labor Party, and you made submissions on their behalf.

So, you are a proper person, and with your experience in the argument and also the reading of the ruling, we are certain that you will assist us a lot in your submission this afternoon. Now, without further I do, I now hand you over the floor and the mic, so that you can address us this afternoon. Thank you.

Mr. Karunaratne: Thank you, respected chair and the lady. I'm grateful for the opportunity to appear before the committee and present the submission. One that I respectfully consider one of the most important constitutional questions confronting Fiji today.

Before I begin my submission proper, based on oral submissions I made for myself, please allow me to give a little background on why and how this came about. As the respected chair mentioned, I was part of the reference in the Supreme Court, and prior to that, as some of you may know, may not know, I have been an advocate on native issues for over a decade. I used the political stage at the time, not necessarily to contest an election, but as a stage, to do advocacy over what, with my experience on what has happened in my birth country in Sri Lanka, where I am a native, and I used my experience to do that advocacy.

So, over a period of time, over the last three years or so, respected chair and the lady, I started, it's a coincidence or it's ironic, I started compiling a thesis, expecting that I would use that for my PhD. Initially it was a different subject, then I moved on to the protection of land, and the utilization of land, and especially focusing on the natives, I won't call it an issue, but around those subjects. And then what happened also, as a blessing, I participated in the Supreme Court matter, so I have changed that a little bit to add what is our position, and how we can achieve that post-judgment of the Supreme Court.

So that is the thesis that I am currently working on. So, some of the submissions that I made, and I have provided copies to you, are based on that as well. So, you might find the initial pages, at least the first 10-15 pages, somewhat academic in nature, based on my research materials and the academic literature.

Nevertheless, I believe that they might assist in terms of, eventually, when we get to the constitution-making. Those academic literature, sir and the madam, is on the general universal legal principles and the constitutional principles of constitution-making. That being said, the primary aspect of that submission is on how do we protect the unique rights and identity of the indigenously I taukei people, while simultaneously preserving the equal citizenship and democratic rights of every person who calls Fiji home.

These submissions, sir and the madam, proceed from a simple proposition. The protection of indigenous rights and the principle of equal citizenship are not competing constitutional objectives. They are complementary objectives and, if properly designed, can strengthen one another.

The constitutional challenge before Fiji is, therefore, not whether indigenous rights should be protected. They unquestionably should. The challenge is determining how such protection can be achieved while maintaining a constitutional order that treats all citizens with equal dignity and equal political worth.

We have our own Fiji's constitutional experience over the years, over the decades. Our own history provides important lessons. The constitutional crisis of 1987 and 2000 did not arise simply because of disagreements over ordinary political questions.

They arose fundamentally because of disputes concerning the constitutional and political relationship between indigenous political interests and multiracial democracy. The consequences of those crises are well known. They resulted in political instability.

They damaged investor confidence. They caused significant emigration and killed citizens. I will not go further into the effects of those.

There are more I have highlighted here. For the efficacy of time, I will try and summarize. I would hope and also with the expectation that we may be able to get into some discussion or deliberation afterwards so that we will have more time for that if there are any questions arising out of my submission.

The rest of the pages, as I initially said, is about the constitutional theory and the democratic principles. They are academic in nature. They are academic literature.

However, I again repeat what I said before. They might assist in proceeding and going forward with this consultation and drafting a new constitution. The constitutional theories examined in the written submission come from different philosophical traditions.

But they arrive at remarkably similar conclusions. Constitution teaches that constitutions exist to limit power and prevent domination. Liberal democracy teaches that majority rule must always be balanced by the protection of rights.

Republican constitution, however, teaches that no group should be subject to the arbitrary will of another group. Deliberative democracy teaches that constitutional arrangements must be capable of being justified to all citizens as free and equal participants in society. Multicultural constitutionalism recognizes that cultural and individual rights may require special protection, but such protections must operate within a framework of equal citizenship.

Consociational theory teaches us that deeply divided societies often achieve greater stability through inclusion and power sharing rather than domination by any single community. Finally, the constitutional patriotism teaches that national identity can be built around shared constitutional principles rather than ethnic hierarchy. Although these theories originate from different schools of thought, they converge on one central proposition.

That is, individual rights may and should be strongly protected, but permanent political supremacy of one ethnic group over others is difficult to reconcile with modern constitutional democracy and equal citizenship. If I may at this stage, rather than continue reading through my written notes, I will just share something that I personally believe in. That I have been often talking to, especially whenever I meet I taukei political leadership.

I simply put this question forward just to ask that, as is today, we have a society, when I'm talking about the natives of itaukei, based on reliance, everything that we speak about, most of it at least, is on the reliance. We wait for the government to provide for us, and we ask TLTB to do things for us. We expect these institutions to administer us, control us.

And, for example, I often say some of these institutions are actually the administrative arms of the state. Our reliance, when I say our, when I say we, I generally refer to the native, because me being a native is my own question. So, we tend to rely more on the state already.

And if we are to talk about having a constitution that provides supremacy to the very people that we care about, it is my humble opinion that we are putting another nail on our own progress. That can be also the demise of our own people by attempting to, I'm not saying it is the way forward, but in assuming if that is something that is being promoted or discussed by the people, it is my opinion that that is, that can be one of the mistakes, I might say. Why I say that, Madam Minister, I'll again use one of the examples from Sri Lanka.

We are the natives, and in 1956, when the first government was formed, the Prime Minister then made our native language the national language, which is our own language. Prior to that, we were all speaking English. Then we have another community, that Indian community.

It is, I always say, these two countries are almost carbon copies, because in terms of weather, in terms of everything else, we are all the same. And also, in terms of community, there's natives, that is the Sinhalese, like myself. Then we have the Indian community, that were brought in by the British for sea plantation, similar to sugar plantation here.

So of course, after the 1956, over 20, 30 years, almost three decades, there was discrimination. We admit that. Even schools, the education, were limited to those ethnicities.

What happened then is long story short. In, I think, late, early 1980s, it was just nine members from these minority ethnic groups from South India, who lived in the top part of Sri Lanka, stopped a bus carrying native soldiers, and they hacked them into pieces. That is the beginning of the civil war in Sri Lanka that lasted 30 years.

Nobody ever believed that that would ever happen, but it happened. Then what happened, the natives went on rampage, burning and destroying all the minority groups. The social impact that has resulted is in terms of dollar value in billions.

So, we Sri Lankans learned the hard way, and then they realized the importance of deliberation over debate. So that being said, I have then, in my written submissions, put down some comparative analysis that includes New Zealand, Canada, South Africa, Malaysia, Sri Lanka, Mauritius, and other countries, and how these different schools of thought in decision making worked in those respective countries. In the end, they all come down to the same principle.

Mostly it's about liberalism. Liberal approach to have constitutions that protects, and definitely must protect, the indigenous rights and groups. However, having a liberal approach, and liberalism as the primary principle, when I speak about liberalism also, Madam Ansar, I tend to go to the extreme side of it, as a personal opinion.

I discuss in my own circles, or whoever I meet, what if we go full liberal, that does not go hand in hand with our communal living. Our communal, the history of a communal setup that we have, that we have been, as our culture, as indigenous culture is a communal, everything is communal. And of course there are certain aspects to it, because in terms of protection of the culture, in terms of protection of identity, in terms of being together, in terms of everything being okay, is protected with this concept of communal sharing and communal ownership and communal everything.

And also, there are obstacles in terms of progress. Progress can be, the meaning of progress can be different to different people. So, in political platforms, politicians tend to, who are promoting indigenous rights and indigenous values, tend to speak on behalf of the members of it, okay? To say that, that is the way of life, and that is how it should be.

And tend to promote the same concept going forward. In my view, it can be also a way of having control over groups of people. Because a politician will say, we need to have you, me there as a group, because then I become the person who represents you in Parliament or wherever.

You need me, and you create another alliance. By doing so. That takes me to another aspect of this, about democracy again, in my own opinion.

I strongly believe that democracy is not the right governance model for developing nations. Because it is about being elected and not actually served. So, democracy is only used for the purpose of elections and getting into power.

So that is the one that divides people into different groups, because when we are sitting on a political stage, we don't deliberate, we debate. And we create emotions. And that is the one that creates groups and circles and conflicts.

Now, without going on on that, I will come back to my submission, sir, and the madam. Going further, recommendations to the committee, based on the backdrop of what I have just submitted very briefly, based on my written submissions, against this background, I respectfully make the following recommendations. These are not necessarily direct recommendations, madam sir.

These, I would say, are mechanisms that I recommend that we probably should follow eventually when it comes to constitution making. First recommendation is strong protection of indigenous rights. The constitution should continue to provide robust protection for / Taukei land ownership, customary governance, traditional institutions including BLB, indigenous language and culture.

These protections are legitimate, necessary and fundamental to Fiji's constitutional identity. There is no doubt about that. Second recommendation is equal citizenship.

Every citizen of Fiji should enjoy equal citizenship. Political participation, voting rights, access to public office and equal protection of the law should not depend upon ethnicity. I go on to say that the office of the President, Prime Minister and all other public offices should remain open to every citizen of Fiji.

I must add here, one of the submissions, again coming out of the formal submission, one thing I have submitted a couple of times during the previous administration, also to parliamentary sub-committees whenever there were two or three related submissions. One of my submissions there was about dual citizens and their rights to participate in elections. All three occasions I was told that dual citizens should not be allowed to contest elections because that is about loyalty.

As an example, I was told in that session, for example, this is what I was told. If you have a Chinese person with dual citizenship and I was asked the question, where does that person's loyalty lie? I respectfully disagreed at the time. I as a person who has been living in Fiji for 26 years now, it is embarrassing, it is shameful for me to even say that I feel less emotions to my own country.

So where is my loyalty? My loyalty is here. It doesn't depend on a person's citizenship status. And you can have certain limitations, of course, if you are a dual citizen.

If you have lived in the country for the last five years, you should be allowed to contest elections. This is not my personal ambition, I have no ambition to contest elections, but it is as a matter of right that should be allowed in a liberal democracy. Coming back to my written submission, I mean, Madam Minister, third recommendation is inclusive power sharing.

The committee may wish to consider mechanisms that ensure meaningful participation by all communities. These may include guaranteed representation, reserved parliamentary seats, proportional mechanisms, executive arrangement and encouraged cross-communal participation. The objective is not to diminish democracy, but to strengthen inclusion and legitimacy.

I will also add that this is one of the aspects of Sri Lankan system in proportional mechanisms. It was very strongly objected at the time. We had, or maybe still have in Sri Lanka, you have a proportional system where if you get, for example, if you have 100 seats and if a party gets 60 seats by an election, you get 6 free seats that you can nominate 6 members to the parliament without contesting elections.

So, 40% gets 4, 60% gets 6. The actual idea behind that is you can have an academic, in fact that is exactly what they did at the time. They appointed a person to be the finance minister who had very, I would say, zero public life. Nobody liked him, but he was brilliant in what he did.

So, it was a realization that these kinds of people who are in the society, not necessarily politicians, but can contribute to the society. So that is one of the examples when I talk about proportional representation. Fourth recommendation, Madam Minister, targeted special measures.

Special measures intended to assist at this advantage should be evidence-based, targeted, proportionate and regularly reviewed. Fourth recommendation is protection against discrimination. I will not go into details, it is self-explanatory.

And the sixth is constitutional legitimacy. Fiji's constitutional history demonstrates that constitutional lacking brought acceptance and struggled to endure. Constitutional reform should therefore be inclusive and consultation and should seek legitimacy across communities.

I go on to other obvious recommendations, Madam Minister. Sustainable development. Then I make 25 statements right at the end that I believe may be useful in your deliberations going into the formulation of your report.

Additional constitutional considerations and pathway 44, Chairperson Sir and Madam. Based on the aspects I discussed about liberal constitutional democracy, I go on to talk about, as one of the key aspects, this may not be a popular recommendation, however I would like to make this recommendation about how to go about it. What is the pathway after all this is done? How do we go about doing it? My recommendation or my view, Sir and Madam, is that there has to be an interim administration, which means an interim government must be formed.

The whole purpose behind that is to continue these consultations that this committee started and recommended and that dialogue and that deliberations should continue for a period of time. You as a committee, Sir and Madam, have done and have heard extensively from the people of Fiji and for an example, maybe in the end we will find out that 70% of the people of Fiji needs this constitution be changed. And we might find out 70% of the people of this country want that constitution be changed before the next election.

Because of the reason that we don't need to go to another election and then face the same obstacles that we have faced in the last couple of years, reaching out to the Supreme Court, going to the Parliament, tabling motions and because there are obstacles in the current constitution that we can't really manage or they create obstacles as we move. Therefore, this recommendation of interim government not only will allow us to proceed with the changes or new constitution that we are going to bring about and also the formation of that new administration will be extremely important. My view is that, Sir and Madam, that interim government, the composition of that interim government must include members from all communities and all groups as much as possible.

We may not be able to satisfy everybody, but at least we will have a 10, 15, 20, 30-member government that comes from different walks of life. What it also gives us, Madam, is this. We will have deliberations inside an institution, for example, the government or inside the same room, that will also avoid the politicians debating over constitutional issues outside of that room and those debates are the ones that creates conflicts and division and then people who, with those groups, they follow those leaders, political leaders or otherwise.

They group behind them and that is the one that creates this ongoing debate about what it should be, what is the equal citizenship or Itoki as, Fijian as a common name and all these debates are created and then there have been, issue may be small, but it has been made to become an issue because of these groups. So, we will eliminate all that and whole discussion about new constitution will become a deliberation with members who are in the same room trying to achieve something greater and better for the country. This I say again because this has to be our, if possible, constitution is a living document, but at least we need to get this one right and this should not result in another debate, discussion and ongoing conflicts about Fiji.

So that is one of my key recommendations that there must be an interim administration set up and the composition has to be agreed upon and all key members of society, political or otherwise, should be part of it. It should have multination and minority representation and because this is a national issue and as the academic literature shows us, even though we tend to ignore them, how this constitutional making and constitutional principles develop over the years, over the last 100 years or 200 years, it leads us to one thing that you must look at bringing people together and if you have leaders who are going different ways and using all sorts of emotions of the people, we will not go anywhere but it will continue to happen because elections is tickling the emotions of the public and whichever way you can do it, you will do it because you need to create a following behind you to be elected. I would think that we can eliminate that by having an interim administration dealing with this constitutional discussion after the recommendations by this commission set up.

Then further additions, further amendments or preparation of draft constitution can happen through that and then of course that can go, it can be for a year or two, whatever it takes and the leaders I would think should welcome this rather than opposing it and be part of something that creates history. Once that is done, it can go to a referendum. One might ask me this question, some have already done so, they ask me, me being a lawyer, they ask me the legal question.

We can't do that, there's no provision in the constitution, in the law that allows us to do this interim administration. My answer to that is the will of the people is paramount. If the 70% or 60% of the people are saying this is what we want, the constitution has to be changed and also that has to be changed before the next election, then that has to be respected.

This to me and in my submission, I say it brings confidence and the legitimacy which is the most important aspect of any constitution. In conclusion, respected Chair and Madam, this constitution should be presented with a rare and historic opportunity. It is an opportunity to draft, craft and draft a constitutional statement that protects the dignity, identity and rights of the indigenous people of Fiji while also reaffirming the equal citizenship and equal worth of every Fijian.

The choice before the committee need not be between indigenous protection and equality. The comparative evidence, international law and Fiji's own constitutional experience at all point in the same direction. A stable, prosperous and united Fiji is most likely to emerge from a constitutional order that strongly protects indigenous rights while equally embracing the principle that every citizen of Fiji belongs to the nation on equal terms.

That is more or less the summary of my 31-page written submission. Madam and Sir, and if you have any questions or if you need any further deliberations on any aspect of what is in the report. It might look or seem boring in the first couple of pages because it's all academic but I was also one person who had a similar opinion about academic papers but more and more you get into the path of studying further you realise one thing and this didn't come by accident and they are products of years and years and years and centuries of experience of people.

So, we must take note of them and we must respect them and we must use them as much as possible by also looking at the practicability and how we can adopt them because we are a unique nation. It doesn't mean that the principle developed in Europe will fit into us and that is where I say the best example is democracy. Maybe it is not for us because Fiji has or still have a beautiful governance model behind the traditional governance system and we don't use them or if we are using them, we are using for the advantage of politicians who are practicing democracy.

That is the trouble that I see. There is a governance model that we can choose that is our own that has been working for decades and centuries. However the foreign principal democracy has taken over and then now we are using that institution, those institutions to advantage or take an advantage of.

I know I can go on and on, Madam Chair, but I will stop here and I will try and answer any questions you may have. Yes,

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Karunaratne, the submission, I must be honest with you, I was trying to figure out where you were reading from and then now right at the end I find it. I can give you a copy of my oral, that will make it more... No, it's okay.

After finding out that you've got all these points at the back, the last how many pages, then I realize that this is where you are talking from. Yes, sir. So that's fine, that's fine.

We have now, or I have now taken notice of where you were referring to when you were doing your oral submission because I was looking at the first few pages. No, I was not going through that, it was just a written submission for maybe later read but I have my oral one too, maybe it will make it easier if I share a copy with you. Yes, if I can have a copy of that also.

One of the girls, hold it, no, I can do it. One of the girls can photocopy it. No, I can do it.

Thank you. Thank you, we'll photocopy and then we'll have one each. You have given us a wide area of experience, you know, in comparative comparison on the basis of your thesis.

I was just listening towards the end and now reading through or browsing through what you have at the back there. Yes, one of the points that I have been mulling over personally that is this interim administration.

Mr. Karunaratne: Yes, sir.

Mr. Valenitabua: There is no law which allows this government or any government which would have been in power to have an interim administration if there is a review of the constitution. Yes, sir. First of all, we understand this is the first review of the 2013 constitution since its inception, since its establishment, right? Since its genesis.

And so, everything is new, you know, the process. We had to go to the Supreme Court in order to have this review done. Yes, sir.

Because the Supreme Court decided, yes, you can amend it by using this. A few other issues arose, the immunity clause. Can we remove the immunity provision? And come the amendment, you know, the steps taken in the amendment.

Now, we have heard a lot of submissions from the grassroots people of this country. Not only grassroots people, some even the individual, individual educated people who say that it's better that we have this constitution review completed and we have an amended constitution and then have the general election.

Yes, sir.

Valenitabua No, the next general election is to be based on the amended constitution. We have been receiving submissions in relation to that. And that has been a thorn on my side, especially.

I don't know about the other commissioners, but they have heard the submissions too on how that is to be done. Now, you have raised here the interim administration to be established to take Fiji to the next general election under the amended constitution.

Correct, sir.

Mr. Valenitabua: What is your submission? Would you assist us? How can we do that? Yes, sir. That's the general question.

Mr. Karunaratne: From the very few people I share this idea with.

First clarification, sir. Interim administration is not necessarily, if I understood you correctly, interim administration is for the purpose of continuing on from where you stopped. To fine-tune the new constitution or amended constitution.

And they will work on where you stopped. Carrying on by participatory discussions with those leaders who is going to be in the interim administration. That's one.

Key question is how. The short answer to that, sir, is yes, law must be respected. And what is written in law is what we must follow.

However, to me, in my view, and also based on my own experiences also, most paramount is the will of the people, sir. If the people, eventually it is the parliament that makes laws based on the will of the people, the representatives who are there. Ultimate is the will of the people.

They are the ones who elect the members of parliament and then they make the law. So, what we are going back to is the will of the people. If you, sir, and the committee has collected, as I said before, 70% of the people of Fiji saying the same thing, what more do we need? That is all, in my view, that is all we need.

People need this. We cannot hide behind a law that restricts us from doing so. And the whole purpose of this entire exercise is only the constitution.

And the provision that stops us from doing it is the one that has to be changed. And that can only be changed by the people. And people are saying it has to be done.

So we need to do that. And that is the reason why also I promote the interim administration, sir, those who are going to oppose any constitutional changes will be part of the discussion in that interim administration. So, you have an opportunity to be there and participate on behalf of the people that you represent.

There should not be any debate by any leaders if they are genuine. This is a test of leadership also, sir. If you are a genuine leader who really cares for this country and want to do the right thing by the people, whether it is the most minority group that you represent, it doesn't matter.

You will come to that table and then fight for that hundred people that you represent. And make sure that the new constitution will have a provision that takes care of it. And that opportunity will be lost for that person if you go for the election under this constitution or any other constitution and you will not be elected to the parliament.

Your voice and your people are lost, left behind. So, my answer again, sir, is we should not limit ourselves by provisions in law when it comes to the will of the people.

Mr. Valenitabua: That would also go for the immunity provision, right? You agree or not? Because the immunity provision, the Supreme Court said that they did not touch the immunity provision for the reason that they don't want to shake the tree.

It might cause a lot more problem because the military is involved. Now we have even the military saying remove the immunity clause. Yes.

Now another question, how do I go about that? Because the judgment says one thing. May I, sir? Yes. My view on that, I go with the Supreme Court decision on that one.

Mr. Kunaratne: Based on at least three or four reasons. The question that we are not asking there is whoever is talking about removing immunity is one thing. What is the purpose of it? I agree 100% the immunity provisions should not be there in a constitution that will be drafted or new constitution or new constitution, should not be there, well and good.

But that does not mean that that is done to prosecute those who are responsible. If that is the purpose, why are we going with this? Things happen in the past. Many things happen in the past.

We cannot go back and deliberate and try to address those issues anymore. That has to be stopped. And that is the question that we need to put forward.

What is the purpose behind the removal of immunity clause? Are we saying that those who are responsible should be prosecuted and put them in jail? I don't think so. Exactly. So, then it has no meaning.

But important part of that is ongoing. Future constitutions should not have such provisions. That is meaningless.

So we need to, I think in my view, we need to understand the difference between the two. Of course, in a new constitution we will not have that because we don't need to have one. As long as it doesn't mean the past perpetrators will be punished.

Mr. Valenitabua: It is good that you brought that up because I have been thinking for this, that the immunity covers those who had committed coups. Now the first one in 1987 happened 39 years ago.
Yes.

Mr. Valenitabua: The one in 2006 happened 20 years ago. Yes. I don't think anybody in his right mind would come and file civil claims or prosecutions against these guys.

So, the problem is we've got that Supreme Court opinion which to me personally does not stop us from removing the immunity clause. Yes. So, as you said, who is going to prosecute, who is going to file a civil claim? I don't think anybody in his right mind would want to do that.

But we don't know. Human beings are human beings.

Mr. Kunaratne: You can still have the protection for those.

And the simple answer also is that the one who did the coup in 1987 has been re-elected by the people. Yes. And one who did the 2006 coup was also elected by the people.

What are we talking about? That is why I am saying we love the people, let's focus on that. What do people want? And I very strongly submit that we should not restrict ourselves by the laws that restrict us. That is going to be a problem.

If we are going to say the law is law, law is not justice. Not necessarily justice. There can be good law and bad law.

If we are looking at the law to bring about justice, then we are in the wrong business. Because we as lawyers, you know very well, sir, we are in the business of law. We are not in the business of justice.

We read as is and we argue as is. And it is a system that is in place, the court and the judges. They try to give justice.

And if they can't, then ultimately it is up to the men upstairs to give justice. So that is how we should look at this whole constitutional process. If you as a commission, sir, if you restrict yourself within the ambit of law, we will be in the same problem going forward.

And if it is my choice, I would strongly argue that I don't care. It is the will of the people that I restrict. I have been told that a number of times.

Mr. Valenitabua: If it is the will of the people, go for it.

Mr. Karunaratne: And at some stage, one of the issues, this is an outside issue, one of the things I experience most of the time in our country is the courage and being able to make certain decisions, maybe unpopular decisions. But if you are to make it, sir, for the betterment of these people, we have innocent society in this country.

They are not, they are still in the scale of when you compare even in Sri Lanka. It's competition and the various modern and all these things have ruined the innocence of the people, but we still have an innocent society. So, we must do right by them.

Ms. Nailatikau Yeah, good. Thank you, Mr. Karunaratne. Your submission today has brought to my mind the principle of popular sovereignty in terms of the will of the people having an ultimate say or deriving power from the will of the people, directly or indirectly.

And when you were speaking about this, your approach to an interim administration, it also reminded me of how Fiji is not particularly unique, given the many examples you've also drawn from in your submission. And no process is, processes that can be deliberatively, deliberative to their best potential, are often processes that need to be protected from political capture. And I believe that that is one of the, you know, one of the driving factors behind your submission around the importance of an interim administration.

Would you see sense or any value in some of the submissions that we have received, for instance, with the importance of potentially a standing commission relating to constitutionalism, or is what you're proposing something bigger in terms of embracing this notion of deliberative democracy and ensuring that national conversations or dialogues continue to happen, or that there's a regular vent, so to speak, rather than keeping everything compressed until something less positive happens. But I was just interested to hear your thinking.

Mr K Yes, yes, ma'am.

Mr. Karunaratne: Yes, I'm sure. I think, again, the short answer to that is I am one of those who actively and openly advocated on government of national unity. So that is the short answer in terms of the formation of standing committee or something bigger.

I'm talking about something like that. Because of the, again, unique nature of this country, and also because of the ethnic participation and all these other aspects that divide us, unless and until we have that kind of platform that takes the community segments that are lining behind a certain leadership into the same river that flows to the ocean, we are going to go in all sorts of different directions and then meet in a place where the opposing forces clashes. That is, to me, what has been happening.

Yes, when it comes to land and ethnicity rights, those groups are talking and then they create that emotion around them, and then the other communities do the same thing. And whichever works for me, if I can talk about criminals as a lawyer, that is what I will be talking about because I'm trying to create a sensation around me and to have a following. And I look for the numbers.

And that is what I am proposing that we should eliminate. And we must, at some stage in this country, we must have, because we have a system of following the leader, which is common everywhere, but following the leader in the right sense, in the right way. But we tend to get into groups based on which party or which group we believe in.

And then we go into social media and we create this. It is not the entire population who participates in this. Certain segments, maybe 10,000, 20,000 people, but they create so much sensation that then that seeps through to the community and then they divide them.

Closer to election, especially if you look at social media, it is all about racial conflicts and this, that, because it is ignited by this leadership. Sorry, ma'am, coming back to answer your question. Yeah, it is a formation of, I would say, when I say administrative, administrative government.

Who knows, maybe that is the one that will lead to a government of national unity. If all these leaders come together and then look at what we should be doing to get this country moving, they will understand probably this is the best way. All the debates gone, now we are deliberating.

Because we are all in the same room, looking forward to, it may be against all the odds, but who cares, because we are a small nation, we have so much resources, we need to find our own destiny. While we are guided by common law principles or democratic principles or any other principles, the international universal principles, let's find our own destiny, let's find our own path. I don't know if I have answered your question, ma'am.

Mr. Nailatikau Yes, you have. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much, Mr. Karunaratne.

Time is quite up with us. We have another appointment at 4.30, so I have to bring this to a close. We thank you very much indeed for this afternoon's session.

It was really not a consultation or submission. We have just been conversing here, which was good, throwing ideas around. So thank you very much.

We wish you the best in the practice, and we will come back to you if there's anything. We still have two months ahead for deliberations, and we're going to be needing a lot of assistance. Yes.

So, we might come back to you. Thank you very much. Thank you, sir, if I may.

Mr. Karunaratne: I also thank everybody here, the committee and the chair, and thank you, sir. I hope I made some sense. You did, you did.

And also, I'm trying to fast-track, for example, last week, I've been sleeping around 3 o'clock in the morning, trying to fast-track my own thesis, because I'm finding more and more interesting things about our conversation. Thank you once again. Thank you, sir.

Thank you, ma'am.

---------- End of Session [3-7-2026] ----------

Gmail

Constitution Review Commission <commissioners2026@gmail.com>

Request for an audience to make a submission before the commission

jagath <jagath@karunaratnelawyers.com> Fri, Jul 3, 2026 at 6:50 PM
To: Constitution Review Commission <commissioners2026@gmail.com>

Bula,

Thank you so much for providing me with an opportunity to make a submission to the committee.

Further to my submission and as an answer to the question on how an interim administration can be formed, I would submit that the judgement by supreme court outlined the principles based on ICCPR inter alia on how legal provisions can be either read down or circumvented if they are found to be against the fundamental democratic principles and civic rights. The same principles can be applied to say that any new or out of the ordinary arrangement can be justified if it is aligned with the will of the people and accepted norms of a civilised society.

Vinaka
[Quoted text hidden]

Josefa Nata

Josefa Nata
Date:3-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: We shall call the consultation to order. This morning, we have Mr. Josefa Nata. Mr. Nata, welcome. Thank you very much for asking us to give you an allocation that you make a submission to the Constitutional Review Commission. You are welcome this morning. We have allocated you that slot and that is why you are here. And we are looking forward to receiving submissions from you which will assist the commissioners of the Constitutional Review Commission in finalizing their reports and their recommendations concerning the review of the 2013 Constitution.

The commissioners who were appointed were seven in total. However, one had to resign due to a work commitment at Vice-Chancellor of the Fiji National University, Professor Baba. So only six of us are left at this point in time. Three people or three commissioners, sorry, have just returned from Rotuma. I think they already landed in Nausori. They were there from Tuesday to do consultations on the island of Rotuma with a team from our Secretariat. And they were to return today and I believe they have already landed.

The other three were supposed to be here this morning. Unfortunately, we are missing one, Dr. Gounder, because he has taken bereavement leave due to a member of the family passing away, as we know. So this morning you only have Ms. Nailatikau sitting on my right and me as the commissioners attending. Our process or procedure allows the two of us to sit as commissioners and that is all right. Some people might say we are the others, but two of us can sit and take submissions according to our procedure.

Now, we are here to listen to you this morning. We were tasked by the President to go around the country and meet with our people, the people of Fiji, and gather their submissions and their recommendations as to what law should be included in the Constitution, which one should be removed, and what we can change within the Constitution itself. Changing of words to change meanings also, as you understand, that usually happens. We are back in Suva now. This week is the second last week for our consultations. Next week will be the last one, the last week, and then we will close off all submissions. The online submissions will close on the 30th of June. So, although there are some submissions still coming in, we are putting them aside because they came after the deadline. And the face-to-face submissions will end next week, the 10th of July. Now, you were here today on the Friday of the second last week of the consultations, face-to-face consultations that is, and we are glad that you were here. Now, with those opening remarks, I now give you the mic and the floor for you to address us and give us our submissions this morning. At the end, we might comment, we might ask questions for clarification. Otherwise, you are now free to give us your submissions. Thank you.

Mr. Nata: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and hello, thank you, Ms. Nailatikau, Commissioner Nailatikau. And may I ask who are here, who are these participants, or are they...

Mr. Valenitabua: Staff members of the Secretariat, there are two of them there, and we've got a number of reporters, members of the media. I hope you'll be kind to me. And we've got Mr. Biu, the head of the team, head of the Secretariat people. Okay.

Mr. Nata: Yes, firstly, I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for giving me this opportunity. I ran all the way from Nadi this morning just to be here, because I believe the work that you're doing, I know you've been traveling around the country, I appreciate it, and I acknowledge the work that you're doing, and I say that I've been following closely the work that you're doing, and I've been picking up drips and drabs here and there of submissions that have been given to the committee. I shall go on with my submission. I begin this submission with an appeal to the people of Fiji, particularly the indigenous Fijians, the Christian churches, especially the Methodist church.

I particularly mention the Methodist church for a reason that will become obvious as we go on to my submission. To never ever again to support a coup supposedly done in their name. As it had been shown up, a lot of the iTaukei has not improved. All the coups that were supposedly done in their name were based on lies, on reasons of self-grandeur, opportunism, and varied agenda. I say to the iTaukei, I say to the churches, nothing replaces old-fashioned hard work. The real hope for the iTaukei is in the full utilization of the land, and to maximize the return from their natural resources.

We can help each other to realize that. I will spend a bit of time in my opening remarks in offering some suggestions on how we should deal with a coup culture, and hopefully will prevent future overthrow of elected governments in the future. To begin with, as a preamble, as we know there is a preamble in the 2013 constitution, as a preamble, we the people of Fiji should have a covenant whereby we covenant with each other that those involved in crimes against the state, that is illegal removal of elected governments, treason, sedition, etc., shall be made to account for their misadventures.

The preamble should demonstrate our collective resolve as a nation that coup makers shall be punished. The new constitution should be unequivocal in its position on unlawful removal of elected governments, perpetrators shall have their day in court. We should make very clear that future coup makers shall never enjoy immunity.

I acknowledge that these alone wills not stop future glory seekers who will claim God's calling, but the covenant will make it plain that when the dust has settled, however long it takes, reckoning awaits. That any self-rewarding constitution shall be done away with is the first available opportunity, and it is for the legal people to draft the appropriate legislation. But we must make that message very clear. It is, I believe, the only way to make future cowboys, or visitors of grandeur, to think again. Think very hard. I believe there is no other way to stop the coup culture than to do this.

On the current immunity, it must go. If we are serious enough about addressing and eradicating the coup culture, there should be no immunity in a new constitution. The immunity in the 2013 constitution should be removed in the revised form, as the Commission is trying to do.

Not that I desire the perpetrators of 1987 or 2000 to be tried and sent to prison. I have no malice against them, but it is to make those who may dream of seeing their name in the headlines and having their day in the sun, that they will also have their day in court. This is the clearest message to demonstrate our collective repugnance against coup.

We must be serious in our efforts to deal with the coup culture. Our judiciary should create its own jurisprudence, its own precedence, on this very, very important issue. Yes, lawyer sir, you should understand that better than any of us sitting here.

To be clear, I am not bitter against those who escaped prison. I told the Future Truth and Reconciliation Commission that people, after all this year, should learn to let go, to forgive. People are still paying for blood, pointing fingers, being nasty and unkind to each other.

They still want Sitiveni Rabuka to go to prison. People still want Bainimarama and Khaiyum to go to prison. When do we stop? When do we finally let go? When do we forgive? I have been forgiven and I forgive. I don't wish any of them to go to prison. Because for me, it has always been my belief that the family suffers more than the culprit in a situation like this. It is the family that suffers.

And I wouldn't wish it even upon my worst enemies. In any event, sir, Rabuka and Bainimarama cannot be tried for prison because the offence of prison is time-barred in our statute. At least it was like that when I went to prison.

But the law has changed since. I'm not sure whether it's still time-barred. I welcome the submission of the Commander of the RFF a few days ago calling for the removal of the immunity provision to stop the culture of impunity.

This is significant in the conversation about immunity and his position should be given serious consideration for I suspect that the underlying thoughts in the decision of the Supreme Court not to touch the immunity clause was perhaps the inherent fear that it might antagonize the military and cause further instability. But you have heard what the Commander said and his position aligns with this submission that immunity should never ever be entertained. As an aside, Mr Chairman and Commissioner Nailatikau, I refer to the Commander who I've never heard of until he became the Commander.

I believe this nation owes this man a deep debt of gratitude for such a man was present for such a time like this. If we think back to the early hours, days, weeks, even months of the coalition victory in 2022 and with the personal pressure on the Commander from the powers that be at the time, a lesser person would have yielded. That he did not, that he held aloft, held his own was not only grief but courage, fortitude and sanity.

The course of our troubled nation would have been very different. We would have been further down that dark road we were just starting to emerge from. I fear no contradiction to say that there would be a national sigh of relief at the news of his reappointment at the realm of the RFMF. My congratulations to him. I believe, sir, that the time bar in the offence of prison, the crime of prison should be removed so that there is another clear message that it doesn't matter how long it takes a coup maker will have his day in court. Now I go on to other things, sir.

Common name. I have no issue with everyone being called a Fijian. But it would have been nice if I was asked. That is, that the Fijian people were asked. I am sure, despite that, the iTaukei or the indigenous native will not unnecessarily withhold Fijian as a common name. With informed and level-headed dialogue and consultation.

I've always believed, and you, Mr Chairman, and Ms Nailatikau, who have lived overseas, we are always referred to as Fijian when we are out of the country. I remember some years back when we were having this discussion on Nukulau on this very topic of a common name. I've actually advocated for being called a Fijian.

There was a lot of opposition from my colleagues on Nukulau that we should never use the word Fijian as a common name. Because there seems to be a claim that it is identity theft. I understand. However, I'm not blind to the fact that this very sensitive and emotional topic, that this is a very sensitive and emotional topic, and that a large number of Fijians, that is iTaukei, have very strong views about what is being now identified as identity theft. Being that as it may, I am confident that good change will prevail. Which will result in the people of Fiji coming up with a common name that is acceptable to us all, and that we should be proud of.

Secular State, where did this come from? Fiji has always been a nation under God. All people who now call Fiji their home are people of faith. Whether you're Fijians, or descendants of the Girmitiya, Muslim, Part Fijians or European descendants, Gujaratis, Rotuman, Banaban, Pacific Islands, all will affirm to faith in God. There was a conspiracy theory. The introduction of the Secular State was to suppress the Christian faith. But I'm a bit ambivalent on making Fiji a Christian state. I believe faith is a personal relationship between a person and his or her God. It would be sufficient as far as I see that a new constitution should state that Fiji is a nation under God to demonstrate that the people of Fiji, irrespective of ethnicity, are believers in God. I am very wary when clever people try to explain away that the Secular State merely is a mechanism to separate religion and government.

But declaring a nation under God will do exactly the same thing. I suspect that the push for a Secular State stems out from the belief that a certain faith was having dominance in the public forum in the past. But then again, there has been longstanding tradition and practices, almost customary, that a prayer is said in our public activities, particularly the state activities, to be sure a Secular State in the plainest meaning of the English word, English phrase, is a nation without God. Let us be clear.

Bill of Rights, UNDRIP should be included. The rest are OK. My submission, Sir, and Commissioner, will touch on one of the other things that may sound controversial, but I will do it anyway. The new Constitution should come up with new ways of doing business. Our system of governance needs to be changed, not for the mere sake of making changes but because there are better ways of doing things.

And looking back at the road that we have journeyed together since independence; I believe we should be asking ourselves very serious questions. Our system of government, our parliamentary system, we have adopted, even the brand of democracy we live in, have they been really the best system for us, for the people of Fiji, and for the nation? Democracy is the Western form of democracy. We have willy-nilly adopted really the best way forward for Fiji. I ask the question. We are a communal people. We do things together. It's our way of life. We do not leave anyone behind. But unfortunately, that is what we have become. We have abandoned the word and the concept of solesolevaki.

It is, I believe, a very half-tough word but underused, trivialized, even misused. But therein, I believe, lies the future of our nation. I invite the Commission to my village of Waciwaci, Lakeba, Lau to see what we are doing in studying this concept of Solesolevaki on our Winds of Lau initiatives. We hope to transfer the intellectual property to the other villages on the island and islands in Lau and to other provinces and outside of Lau. The thinking is to spread it around the country. A small seed we have planted. Sadly, no attempt has been seriously made to realize the full potential of solesolevaki at the national level. I believe solesolevaki should be our mantra.

To be sure, I am not against the practice of democracy, not just the Western kind. Democracy mixed with communal solesolevaki could be the potent portion we have been missing. Perhaps it is the elixir for our national healing. Decolonization. Sadly, I dare say that we are still largely, despite over 50 years of so-called independence, a colonized people in our minds, in our processes, in our laws, in our institutions, in the way we do things. We still have photos of the late Queen Elizabeth in our homes, in our villages.

I acknowledge there was, and still is, a lot of affection. But how long do we stoke that fire? I believe we should start the full process, real and total decolonization. I give this example. The Bose Levu Vakaturaga was created by the colonial government. It has been in existence throughout our history until somebody sent them to go and drink rug under the mango tree. Even after the resurrection, it is still operating under the same colonial rules and laws. Colonial rule, we must remember, was never altogether altruistic. Its laws and regulations were meant to protect them, the colonizers, that is, to make life easy for them. They were never meant for the benefit of the rule.

Another example before independence in our sugar industry, there was the colonial sugar refinery. Perhaps only myself and the chairman would remember the CSR. After Fiji's flag was flying, we had the Fiji Sugar Corporation, with a lot of hope, of course. But the same laws and monopoly that protected the CSR were translated to do the same thing for the FSC. Now, we see what is happening to the FSC now. Our land laws, our mining laws, are now just merely being tweeted while the substance, we still can see the long colonial hands.

Section 281 of the Constitution which deals with land arrangement should be taken out of the Constitution and be left to the respective legislations. Another example, the NLTB has served its purpose well when that great man created it just many moons ago. Many are now pointing fingers at it and even accusing it and accusing that great man of not doing the right thing for the iTaukei. We should cease blaming what was good to a certain point. Of course, there are some serious shortcomings in the NLTB because it is still largely operating under the colonial code. But instead of harking back to the perceived ills of the past, we should put our collective heads together to improve the situation. It must be noted that the crown law, sorry, the crown land, freehold land, mineral six feet under, deep sea mineral, a foreign concept, deep sea mineral owned by the state, that is. At some point, these issues must be addressed. But with the proviso that the interest and the welfare of non-indigenous Fijians be addressed and be protected, a secure and enduring land arrangement system, and that is the access of non-Fijians to land should be worked out.

And that is for the government to work out. Another colonial hangover. The colony did not allow second language, second common language to be taught in school, to allow meaningful grassroots integration. After over 50 years of self-rule, we still haven't taught a second language in school. I used to think that if a second language is taught in school, it should be Hindi. I used to think that it gives us an international edge speaking an international language because Hindi was becoming an international language.

But now I've changed my mind. I think it should be Fijian because now we are being called Fijians. We should learn Fijian and everything that goes, the culture. The possibility to run the BLV should have its place in the constitution. It should be independent, self-funded and directly reporting to the president. Has anyone ever pondered the incongruency of the Minister for Fijian Affairs appointing who should sit as members of the BLV? That law was made for the white men who often perceived natives as lesser people. Our chief should decide who sits on the BLV. That power should be taken away from the Minister of Fijian Affairs.

All things Fijian, there is it OK, land, village system, way of life, fishing, mining, deep sea resources, etc. should be under the BLV. The FAB should be desecrated. Forgive me, I'm still using FAB and I think the names have changed but pardon me, I was in the booth for a long time. It should be funded by the pundits used by the TLTB and there are other ways of raising funds for the Fijian administration. Any government grant should be treated as goodwill and never to come with the inherent belief that the government has a right to interfere. I suggest that the Minister of Fijian Affairs be abolished.

I come to elections. Fijians should not return to communal seats. Never again voting should be based on racial compartments. I have always held a view that despite living together for over 150 years the two major ethnic groups, that is Fijians and Indians, by and large are still living parallel lives. It is this kind of arrangement that exacerbates the colonial relics that is fodder for keeping us apart. Constituencies should be returned to parliamentarians.

The mere existence of a constituency is a mandate and a reminder to parliamentarians that the people should be visited or else there will be consequences in the next election. From my vantage point of hibernation in the past three elections I read not much about constituency visit. In the olden days constituency visit was a noisy affair.

Everybody knows when a minister or a member of parliament goes and visits a constituency that should be brought back. Constituency, I propose, should be based on provincial boundaries. The number of seats in the constituency should be based on demography and geography.

For instance, Ba covers a wide area of western Viti Levu and covers Yasawa should have five seats. Namosi, Serua and Kadavu perhaps three seats. Lau, though regarded as a small province population-wise but it covers most of the East part of Fiji. So geographically it's a huge area to cover. For Lau I suggest four seats. Rewa, though small in size but is heavily populated so perhaps these are four seats. The rest of the provinces of I'm surprised, Navosa is actually a big province so they have four seats. So, we are looking at a 52-seat parliament. Oh, and I forgot Rotuma should have one seat.

There is no need for a constituency boundary commission. That job should be given to parliamentary select committee which I will come to later on because I believe the number of seats in parliament should be permanent. The House of Elders, the Senate which was previously the upper house should be renamed the House of Elders to give it a truly Fijian flavor.

Membership should still be based on the previous Senate appointments. That is, the Prime Minister appoints nominees of the Great Council of Chiefs, his own nominees but the number should be limited to 14 and this has to include one part Fijian previously they used to be called Part Europeans but they want to be part Fijians now and two, at least two Indo-Fijian representatives. Leader of the Opposition to nominate after consulting other minority parties in parliament and he should be given nine seats.

Rotuma and Rabi Council nominate a member each. In making the appointments the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition should give consideration to the ethnic minorities. The Executive if we settle on Fijian as the common name I also believe the name of our leading institution as much as possible should reflect that Fijian-ness.

As I've stated elsewhere there is more to being a Fijian than just a name. There are traditions, customs, cultures rituals, dances that we should acknowledge, learn and embrace as a nation of Fijians. There is the Fijian cuisine to be served villages and provinces to be included in to be visited. The President should be elected. The office of the Prime Minister should be abolished. There are two more that I specifically propose that we look into the US United States which has an Executive President and a Cabinet selected outside of parliament and the French system which has a President a Prime Minister and a Cabinet. But Fiji should have its own executive creation.

The leader of the party which wins the majority of seats is able to cobble together a majority coalition is sworn in as President by the Chief Justice of parliament. Parliament should strictly be in the business of law making. It makes the notion of separation of powers between parliament, the executive and the judiciary truly meaningful. There is a bit of tension there when you are separating parliament and the executive and you have ministers who are members of parliament. There is a bit of blur in the separations of power under the current arrangement. To separate the cabinet from parliament will also have the effect of potentially reducing ministerial corruption. I must say I have seen a few tough ones in my time. House of Representatives as I said earlier if we are going to have Fijian as our common name our institution should reflect that. House of Representatives I propose that it be called House of Elders or Qase ni Vale. This was the law house in the bicameral parliamentary days. All bills are initiated by the House of Representatives.

Members are full-time lawmakers only. They sit on standing committees' sub-committees, special committees they are out and about doing consultations constantly reviewing laws being engaged purposefully in law reform that truly takes in or takes Fiji out of the colony. House of Elders, Qase ni Vale as I mentioned earlier that is the Senate that it should be brought back but renamed House of Elders, I earlier mentioned that the previous arrangement was that the Prime Minister nominates appoints the nominees of the Great Council of Chiefs but instead of the Prime Minister it is now under a new system that I am proposing that it should be the President.

As in the previous Senate the House of Elders cannot reject bills from the law house the system for the young ones the bill initiated in the law house and passed up to the Senate and then it becomes law. This was so because the Senate was unelected that was the reasoning that they cannot reject bills from the law house. The Senate may refer back bills it cannot pass for amendments pass it back to the law house but the law house is not required by law to agree to the amendments it can just pass it back up again with an explanatory note saying why it cannot make the amendment in that event the Senate passes it in my parliamentary reporting days and in my political commentating days and I used to think it was a pointless exercise but instead of this rigmarole and instead of making the House of Elders looking like some bunch of old fools a standing joint house committee be created.

This was never done in the previous bicameral arrangement so that the standing committee can deal with the differences between the two houses the lower and the upper houses to allow the Senate to pass the bill instead of sending it back up again and they have no power to do anything but just pass it to me at that time it was a very pointless thing sometimes, I even think the Senate was a mere white elephant standing joint house committee to make the upper house or the Senate more participation of members should be encouraged to deal with the issues that matter which requires the approval of both houses and some of these things include the differences between the two houses when it comes to legislation making to vet all presidential nominees to cabinet to take over the role of the COC appointments.

I believe that the COC should be abolished and that function should be translated or transferred to a parliamentary joint committee of the two houses then they can also be empowered to make special investigations and their recommended prosecution limited cabinet the president shall appoint his cabinet from outside parliament from the profession, captains of industries leaders in the field but not from academic and theorists people are appointed are men and women who have made it and are in good financial position it has the potential of minimizing corruption at the highest level of governance there are people who are well disposed and they've made it in life they'll be hard pressed to be captured into corruption cabinet should be constitutionally limited to control considering the size of our country and our economy this will prevent outrageously bloated cabinet for political expediency but instead of becoming ministers they become secretary I think in my time there was a time a particular government had 36 cabinet. I remember I think it was in the place and even under the current government there's quite a few cabinets I'm not criticizing I'm just merely giving examples. I believe an integral portfolio under the new arrangement should be a secretary of nation building to be in charge of national reconciliation, ethnic harmony and bringing people together. Constitutional office, I've mentioned that that role should be transferred to the parliamentary joint committee and the COCPF be abolished.

I come to the RFMF in view of the political terrain we have carved ourselves in our recent history since independence. We should now be asking ourselves seriously of the role of the military, whether we should continue to have a standing army. I say this with utmost sensitivity, fully aware and appreciate Fiji's proud military tradition. I'm also aware that on the issue I may be flying against the wind.

I'm further aware considering the reaction I've received from ex-military personnel considering the reaction their reaction I feel the idea is almost unthinkable, but if you are to consider the involvement of the military in the coups in Fiji and I say without any fear of contradiction they were involved in all the coups. I think it is an idea that we should start to seriously think about as for me I am of the firm view that Fiji should do away with a standing army to be clear. I have no grudge against the military in fact my earliest memories of soldiers was one of admiration and fondness when I saw them for the first time in my life as an 8 year old watching the soldiers slow marching to the casket of the late Tui Nayau Ratu Tevita Uluilakeba, who is the father of the late president and prime minister and also the Tui Nayau Ratu Sir Kamisese Mara in Tubou Nayau many many years ago.

Some of my classmates and schoolmates attended some of the fine military officer cadet schools in the world went on to become distinguished officers and leaders and have done equally well outside of the green uniform. How I wish I could name them but I fear I might be embarrassing them being associated with an ex-convict. However, I am now of the firm view that Fiji should do away with a standing army if we are serious about dealing with a coup issue and to eliminate a coup culture. I am not advocating that the soldiers be retrenched, made redundant and become jobless we should have a defense reserve in the form of the current territorial soldiers we should focus on peacekeeping duties and work at exporting our soldiers for foreign work but short of big mercenaries but we must make sure that peacekeeping arrangements should be rectified that it brings more benefit than cost. We can still have an expanded standing engineer's corps in the current RFMF engineers and to become involved in national engineering and construction work governments should encourage trained engineers to form themselves into companies and be given priorities in national infrastructure construction roads, bridges, jetties, airports waterways, irrigation with or without outside partners. I believe that soldiers will be better utilized as vehicles of national development in that capacity.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Nata, excuse me if I may intervene, we have used up time available to you I have two minutes left two minutes? we'll let you go on.

Mr. Nata: It has often been said that Fiji should emulate Singapore, Singapore does not have an army another country we should be looking at is Costa Rica it also does not have an army amendment to the constitution should be made simple. In closing the constitution is only as good as the people it was meant for all the things that we are discussing and submitting will not guarantee that there will be no more coups in the future it only takes a trigger-happy cowboy who believes in his invincibility to be foolish enough. But they will be forced to think a little bit harder before they take that step but the constitution of 2013 should be amended or replaced altogether. I can see that there are some benefits in the document but the negative part outweighs the good part, for I feel the 2013 constitution was self-serving and was made and meant to perpetuate the rule of certain people and that is my submission sir and madam commissioner.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Nata for your submission today I must note that your contributions reflect not only your insights and your expertise but your lived experience which has come at a cost and I acknowledge that today. I have two questions for clarification and I hope you take this as merely an act of thinking aloud together in terms of your contributions today relating to your reimagination of the senate for example in terms of the Qase ni Vale structure. I was wondering if in your thought process you might have considered how that may be made intergenerational so to speak in terms of eldership and wisdom not merely in age but potentially in other ways as well would be quite happy to hear your thinking on that matter, and also in relation to your alternative raised to the constitutional office commission or the COC. We have heard submissions speaking about the importance of an appointing body that appoints such important roles in national institutions, in national commissions about it needing to be pluralistic in its makeup to ensure that whoever is appointed is not beholden to political pressures or fears of reprisal for instance.

So, I was wondering whether this parliamentary joint committee that you are proposing might be able to provide that type of assurance that whatever institutional heads are appointed they are able to be free from such pressures I hope those two questions are clear firstly in relation to the Qase ni Vale submission that you have made and in your submission relating to an alternative to the constitutional officer's commission or COC.

Mr. Nata: Thank you thank you ma'am, I'm an old man and I have this affinity to old people for membership of the senate I think young people they have other places that they can because it's the house of elders it's only appropriate that we have certain. This is just my suggestion and the other question was on the COC and the role to be taken over by the parliamentary the joint parliamentary standing committee.

I believe so, I believe it will deal with that issue because politicians are they will be from different political affiliations it's the same thing that is done through the COC because there are political appointees in the COC but what I'm saying is that they are to be dedicated to law making and this is part of the process law making and making constitutional appointments.

I think we should not worry about being beholden to political affiliations because there will be political voices in that process. I think that answers your question. I'm very very confident that any attempt to politically influence the appointee will be dealt with because all these people will be watching and participating in the process in the same way the COC is constituted. You and I understand that there is majority one way just translate that arrangement to the parliamentary standing committee. That's basically answers your question.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you Mr. Nata and please certainly not disputing the importance of eldership just only also reflecting how important it is for the younger generation to watch and learn from our elders and to have intergenerational transfer I sincerely appreciate your explanation

Mr. Nata: Thank you It's an old man speaking.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yes Mr. Nata you referred to the time bar for offence of prison and you said it should be removed there is no time bar now the law is different from the penal code we knew when that penal code was repealed the time bar of two years for prosecution of prison went with it that is why in the modern or the current crimes decree there is no time bar.

So, for your information the penal code which you and I have used that has gone now the issue about the common name of Fijian for your information we had a submission from a linguistic from USP yesterday and he told us that the Fijian name should be for Fijians only I mean natives during the course of this interview. I've been using natives instead of iTaukei because the old laws the iTaukei Lands Act, iTaukei Land Transport Act and so forth, they use natives now all that native has been changed to iTaukei.

But to go back to yesterday this gentleman, not very old a linguistic lecturer at USP said the name Fijian should be an Indo-Fijian in fact the person. I'm talking about now is an Indo-Fijian and he said that the name Fijian should be for iTaukei only or for the natives because now we see in the constitution the name iTaukei and he told us that name iTaukei is not a descriptive name it's a noun in fact when looking at it through a linguistics view so keep Fijians for the natives and then we find another name for the others that was a suggestion from one of the lecturers at USP a linguistic and an Indo-Fijian for your information. There's just another point you mentioned electoral seats to be based on the province's provincial lines provincial lines, did you say that?

Mr. Nata: Yes,

Mr. Valenitabua: On provincial boundaries would that include all races?

Mr. Nata: Yes, I'm a believer if you are from Lau whether you are Indian, Chinese, Japanese or Russian if you live in Lau and you are a common resident of Lau you should be allowed if you live in Ba, you are from Ba the next village, the nearest village is your village and we should stop the process of familiarizing acclimatizing. Get people to know each other enter each other's homes eat in each other's places this is the only way we can grow people together. I've always maintained that despite 150 years of living together in the main we are still living parallel lives you go to any country. Indians will be clubbed together and Fijians, even in prison. So what I'm saying is that we should change the laws that's another example I should have brought in.

Why did we have the provincial council on one hand for the Fijians, for the iTaukei and one for the Indian which is the local authority as you are aware this was meant to make life easy for the colonial rulers and the sad thing was that it was a tool to keep us apart you know, the British, they are past masters in divide and rule and we were not aware of it and we were given some kind of explanation that this is good for you, you want to keep away from them and they come and tell us, this is good for you, you want to keep away from them.

These are the kind of things that then it is bred into our system. It's I'm addressing the bigger vision of coming together unfortunately I did not have the time to elaborate a little bit more on that. I'm advocating a Fiji where you are, where you are or you domiciled in, you are a member of that province, you know. If you live in Tailevu you go to Tailevu Provincial Council or something in between, or join if you live in Rewa, go to the Rewa Provincial Council because Rewa is quite not part of the Tailevu, it's part of Rewa that is why Rewa. Those small incitement it's got a big population so you're part of Rewa, and I think we should try to encourage this, this is where the Fijian affairs I strongly recommend that we have a secretary or a department of national harmony nation building, where they do this thing we do away with the ethnic and cultural those are the kind of things that separate us see these are the tools and institutions and instruments that keep us apart.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you for that we have heard a submission similar to what you are proposing now so we'll leave it at that, thank you.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you Chair, and Mr. Nata merely seeking your correction and confirmation in terms of your approach to a national identity. I'm hearing that you are not averse to a national identity but it must be preceded by a common interaction with one another it can't be imposed but it has to be something that you believe should be developed beginning with our institutions and the ways in which common citizens interact, I hope I have heard you correctly.

Mr. Nata : Yeah, I think one of the biggest problems with the constitution Fijian common name because there was no consultation like I said, I have no problem with it but it was nice if I was asked as a Fijian through consultation process but this was imposed people, they take offense when they are imposed the same thing that we're talking about this is almost the same as dictatorship you do it, that's what you like I said.

I don't think we'll unnecessarily withhold Fijian being called Fijian exists level-headed discussions but unfortunately it didn't happen but I also understand the position, the very hard-held position of Fijians to be called Fijians I understand that as well. I am a Fijian I know, but I'm trying to be liberal and accommodate but if the majority, the push is for Fijians to be called Fijians, I got no problem with that either in fact, I was thinking but I didn't want to trivialize because I thought this is a very important issue. I was going to suggest Fijians like the Finns, the Finnish they are either Finns or Finnish or Fijis or something but we probably make it sound trivial but somebody will come up with a good name that we will all agree on.

I take it there is a lot of sensitivities and emotional issues attached to being Fijian and I think there is some sense in Fijian claiming its identity because Fiji is a small place and Fijians are a very small population in the big world and we tend to be protective, that's the nature of humankind we protect our little turf especially when we are a small group of people but see, the thing is one thing that irks me is that they only use Fijian when it suits them the majority of Indians. They don't want to be called Fijians because the Fijian, it comes with the baggage when you call a Fijian a Kai Viti it means a lot of things, lazy, dirty, useless so I was going to suggest we are all called Kai Viti they are called Kai Viti too but I don't want to sound over the top but I think it's a sensitive thing that we should discuss and talk about.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you Mr. Nata Mr. Nata, we will have to end the session here thank you very much for your submission this morning much appreciated.

----------End of Session [3-7-2026]----------

John Fatiaki

Mr John Fatiaki
Date: 3-7-2026

Mr Valenitabua: Mr. Fatiaki, welcome to the Constitution Review Commission. We hope you are happy that we have slotted you into one hour. We were really fully booked, if I may use that expression, but then there was an available space and we just slotted you in, into that space.

So, we have one hour for your submission, if you can make it to one hour, or otherwise for as long as you can go, within the one hour. So, welcome, we are here to listen, I'm sure you know what you are here for, you are making submissions to the Constitution Review Commission, and you would like us to hear what your submissions are, and what you recommend to be included in the amended 2013 Constitution. So, welcome, it's been a long time since we worked together, and we are here to listen to you this afternoon.

Thank you Mr. Chairman. Mr. Vinaka, you may have the mic and the floor.

Mr Fatiaki: I'm John Junior.
There's about a number of John Fadiakis in Fiji, more than 10. Our fiscal address is 15 Dunwoody Street, Turek Subur. And the time now is almost, my time is 2019 PM. Okay sir, thank you Mr. Chairman. Nice meeting you sir, and members of your honourable committee. Very simple, very simple sir.

Mr Valenitabua: We have Ms. Nailatikau here, who is the second commissioner sitting today. Sorry, I didn't introduce Ms. Nailatikau.

Mr Fatiaki: I didn't catch it sir.

Mr Valenitabua: Ms. Nailatikau, the second commissioner sitting on my right is Ms. Nailatikau.

Mr Fatiaki: Ms. Nailatikau, nice meeting. Thank you sir. I'm going to take us back from the 1970 constitution. It's no longer available. It was hand-delivered by His Royal Highness Prince Wale then, up there, on the 10th of October 1970. We were part of the celebration too at that time, young, very young. Anyway, the thing happened, we all know. New party came in after we lost. We were under Alliance Government Party then. In April, we lost the general election. Then the new prime minister was sworn in. Then later on, the Dr Bavadra coalition with the NFP.

Mr Valenitabua: Mr. Fatiaki, we are talking about the 2013 constitution.

Mr Fatiaki: I'll come to that sir, I'll come to that, yeah.

I'm beginning from the beginning. So anyway, 1990, Fiji became, 1987, 7th of October 1987, Mr. Chairman, Fiji became independent. Not 10th of October 7th created by the military government.I accept that. Move on. 1990, under the interim government at that time.This is from my master file. That's okay. I really supported the review, to be honest to you, Mr. Chairman.

There you are. I've written a number of things on top of it, but this is the copy. There it is. Under that decree, interim president, the late Ratu Epeli Ganilau was appointed as the interim head of state. Under that decree, 2022, prime minister, first prime minister and first president under the Republic of Fiji, the later on the Ratu Sir Kamisese Mara matter. Then anyway, 1990 came.

Then Frank Military came in 2006, took over the elected government. Then he created two, one team under Ghai, Professor Ghai. This was given to us during our presentation at that time. So, I keep it. You can make a copy on your own, sir. Then, Frank, Commodore Frank Bainimarama didn't like the constitution there.They threw it out. I did not know until the thing came out in the paper, Mr. Chairman. Then the second team was created by the Military.

They went through 1,000 villages, coast to coast, town to town, city to city. What you people are doing now, wonderful. I support it. That 2013 constitution was done by the people of Fiji. Fiji, people's startup of change, peace, progress. This is the time.

So anyway, we are here now. What you just said, I love it. Because I want to throw it in. Our 200 miles exclusive economic zone was presented during that time twice but never happened. I hope your honourable committee will put it into the 2013 constitution. I just read from the 2013 constitution.

Number one is this page number one. From those 11 pillars, we the people of Fiji, recognizing this is very, very important. It's there. Realize. Indigenous people like you, us from the Rotuma, Rabi, and so on. All, and they took it there.

Ownership. And the unique culture. In Black and White right now, you can visit. Customs and, excuse me, it's getting a little bit smaller. Anyway, it's there. Number one page.

What I'm here this afternoon to say on behalf of our Rotuman minority community, and especially the iTaukei, KaiViti. What we want our commission to be added on in the 2013 constitution in chapter two, under the Bill of Rights. Excuse me. Subsection 1, 2, A. A must. Realize. Bose Levu Vakaturaga, 'Kei na turaga, kei na marama, kei viti'. To be legalized. It's not in here.

Please. That is my view. Because the B, I mean, what's the former chiefly? That they're still using now, which is illegal. It's not in here. BLB? No, no, BLB, I just said you don't do this. In English.

May I? Really? It's another English name. It was created by the British colonial at that time. Under the 1970 constitution, 1990, and amended 1997 constitution. No more in 2013. The Great Council of Chiefs. GCC.

Thank you, sir. To replace the GCC. GCC is dead and buried twice. One by then-Colonel Rabuka second one by Commandant Bainimarama. This is my view. For people on behalf of all our iTaukei.

I'm honestly speaking, Mr. Chairman. To be implemented and legalized 100%. I repeat. The Boselevu Vakaturaga kei na marama kei Viti, then of course in English translation. That's number one. Number two.

I'll read you now my own copy. Under the chapter two. Chapter two, sir. Under the Bill of Rights. Same thing applies to the iTaukei community. Under the Bill of Rights, section six. Subsection one and two. Slash A. Sorry, sir. I'm going back.

Sorry, sorry, sorry, sir. I'm going back to the Boselevu Vakaturaga kei na marama kei Viti. Should be under chapter two.Under the Bill of Rights, section 28. Sorry. Section 28.

Section 28. Mr. Chairman, and honourable member. Section 28.Subsection three. I read. The ownership of all Rotumans land shall remain with the customary owners of that land. And the Rotuman land should not be. But my suggestion and on behalf of our volunteers' team. During the first run and the second run of this constitution. They failed to add it on. So please, sir. This is time to add on on that. Subsection three. That's A. The 200 miles or 370 kilometers. Exclusive. This is very important for Fiji and Rotuma. Remember that word, Mr. Chairman. Fiji, Rotuma. 370, in bracket, 370 kilometers. Exclusive economic zone. Is that. Excuse me. Okay, sir. I can see you'll be discouraged if you did that.

Anyway. 200 miles of the whole measurement. The current figure is nice 370 to. 370 kilometers. Is that.

Fishing ground for the people of Rotuma. This was tailor-made, especially tailor-made for our people during that time. To create a fishing business for the council of Rotuma. To keep the youth of Rotuma in Rotuma. I wrote. That's made by himself.

Oh. I'm so happy I'm on my own today, this afternoon. It was written.On the 30th of April. On the 30th of April 2013. Item three. Sir. This is to the Solicitor General. After everything was thrown out. Sir, to be included as a written law. On our 200 miles. Record 370 km.

Exclusive economic zone. To be always under the Honourable Prime Minister's office. Until today. The authority in monetary terms. But never happened, Mr. Chairman. Somebody forgot the authority in the rubbish bin, maybe. Foreign fishing companies. This was written at that time. 2013.

Who may be interested. That's what we want to do, our project. We've been doing this since 80. To engage with our 12-month contract. Called. Commercial business license. One million dollars. Pay companies who are interested. Pay direct to the council of Rotuma. Two payments. First in January. Second in July. This is all for business. Say one or two. So there's two million dollars.

Say one. There's one million dollars. To the Council of Rotuma. So they don't have to depend on the national budget all the time. And waited that long. And our company. Belongs to us, for example. Under our terms and conditions called. Together we build.

Operate. Own. And transfer. So we transfer back to. Council of Rotuma. For the youth Permanently. So that's. My number Two. Under section 28. Chapter 2. Under the bill of rights section 28. In subsection 3. Slash A. And this is the part of that. During our time. At that time When we. Our team is called. Viti Kabani Volunteers. This is we get to the island at that time. This is one of his kind. On the island of Rotuma.

At that time. Food storage tank. So we negotiated it. On behalf of our team. Done. That's the service station. One hundred percent. You just like driving around. Mr Chairman. May I speak. One of our own. Raven. Root. Root. Don't. No. To the car. No more now.

The mobil oil. When they removed everything. Because of the Chairman. Friendship. Some other members at that time. They decided. Not to go down half an hour and go the way. From. They came direct.

To Fiji. To purchase that. Fifty dollars deposit.

For a drum. Of two hundred liters. One product times five. This is five. Drums only. Two hundred liters. Times five. So they forgot about our long term investment. For the People of the. To my. Next generation. So. June. Twenty fifteen. Mobile oil decided. To. Close Last year. They went. This is old Rotting away. Mr. Chairman. They removed everything.

So we back to. Being. Two hundred liters from a ship. Down. I was doing that in ninety sixty eight. Sixty nine. Seventeen. When I was on the island. No jetty at that time. Now we have jetty through Ratu Mara's Alliance government. So that's the story sir. Any questions sir? Pardon? I want you to speak on the twenty thirteen. This is to throw it into the twenty thirteen.

Mr Valenitabua: We don't want to hear stories please.

Mr Fatiaki: It's okay. But I'm. I'm sharing with you.What happened to us. It's okay sir. That's the twenty thirteen one.

Mr Valenitabua: You are on the three hundred seventy kilometer.

Mr Fatiaki: That's what we want. Yeah.

Mr Valenitabua: So. You wanted.You wanted to have that registered. In Rotuma's name.

Mr Fatiaki: No no, to be under. The twenty thirteen. Constitution.Section thirty. Subsection three. Stress a. Yeah.

Mr Valenitabua: To be owned, By Rotuma. Of course yes. Yeah. That is what I'm asking.

Mr Fatiaki: Yes. All right. Because. The taxation. All this later on. Will be. Paid directly. To the Fiji revenue. And custom authority. So. It's a win win. Situation.Situation. For both of us. Now.We're going to talk about. Twenty thirteen. Those are the first two the iTaukei. You know. Please. That's what. We are missing.A must. To be included. Under the Twenty thirteen. Constitution. Thank you.Sir. This is our. What's a word.For you. To my age. One.One. Three. Eight.Is. Ninety nine. Years old.Data. Twenty seven. Of September. Nineteen. Twenty seven.So. Also. Also through the concert. We'll. Start it in here.But this is very important. That twenty thirteen months. Ninety-nine, Years old. I got it. From the archives.Okay. Thank you. Sir.

So far so good. Right. As we move on to twenty thirteen. This is for the. Still in chapter two section. 114. Oh. Sorry. Section Thirty. Twenty thirteen. Section Thirty. Sub. Section One. All. Materials In. Or. Under Any. Land. Or Water. Are. Owned By. The state. Provided, However. I don't want to. Continue. By. The state. One hundred percent seventy percent. Of that. Goes directly. To the landowners. Of Fiji One hundred percent. Thirty percent. To the state That's my. Submission.
One Seventy percent. Goes. Anything.

That. Underwater. Goes To the. Taukei ni qele Viti taucoko.
To the wall. Only. Thirty percent Goes. To the state. Because the state The other government. Comes in. And go.

Every election. So give them. Thirty percent From that. Whatever we found. Diamond, Gold. Oil. If the oil Found in Bau. Belongs to the Tailevu, Bau people. The people. If the oil. Found in Lau. Belongs to us In Lau. For example. But Seventy percent. Goes. To the landwners. A must. Mr. Chairman.

Please. Because. Previously They said. Yes. Yes We did. Never happened. This is That's why. When. The Supreme Court. Agreed. For the amendment. I was. I was. Happy.
Yes. I wanted to. Add on To the 2013. Constitution. Seventy percent. Thirty. To the state. Oh. The next one. Say. Under the 2013 Constitution. Amended. Amendment.

Only. In. Chapter Five. Judiciary. Part. A. Under. Part. B. It's called. It's a. It's under. Independent. Legal Service. Commission. I. L. A. C. Stay Permanently. Never. To Removed. Or revoked. Or whatever.

Mr. Chairman. I repeat. Stay Permanently. I. L. A. C. Okay. Okay.

Uh. Part. B. One Four. Subsection. Independent Legal. Service. Commission. Established. By. The Legal. Practices. That Decreed. 2009. Continues In. Existence. But I don't. Want. To Be. Removed. Is So. Wonderful. Because This. Happened. To Me. Right. Now. Because. Lawyers. Lying To. The. Judges And. So. On. So. My. Second Matter. Is. With Them. Right. Now.

The LPU – permanent stay, thats all. You may change it from time to time and whichever government come into power. But as far we are concern, ILASC to stay permanently.That fine with you Sir.

Okay next one Sir, 115 very important one. Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption. (FICAC) also to stay permanently. Maybe amended from time to time, maybe. But my suggestion for the time being we need a independent expatriate at least for five years and understudying by our local.
The next one, a number of Fijians don't like it but we small fellas like it.

Part B. Chapter. Si – Public Service

Not. Part A. Part B. Discipline service

Part B. Chapter 6 - One. Three. One. Sir. Yes. Sir. Okay. May I. Read. Republic Of Fiji. Military Forces.

Section One hundred and thirty-One. One Three one. Subsection One. Fine. With all Of us in Fiji. Subsection. Two. Little bit of power may be given to the Commander of for the .. maybe addition power for the Commander – border crossing Mr Chairman and honourable member lady that's very important because when we, it's very clear here, it's subsection 2, 131 subsection 2. It shall be the overall responsibility of the Republic of Fiji military forces to ensure all times the security, defence, well-being for all Fijian families of Fiji and all Fijian. That's our suggestion, we were talking about it a number of weeks back, preparing as a group leader. So, they said, yeah, we want to propose that to the committee. So, it's entirely up to your legal teams. So that's all for this for the time being.

But the next one is, I know it's very important.

Mr Valenitabua: This one here, subsection 2, what was it again? Security, defence, and well-being of?

Mr Fatiaki: Oh, this is on the 2013. It shall be overall responsibility. It's already there. It's already there.

Of the Republic of Fiji military forces to ensure all times, 24 seven now, January 1st, December 31st, over and over and over and over. We're with your commander, blah, blah, blah. Okay, sir.

Défense and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians. That's in subsection 2, 131. But what we suggested is your committee can give the commander more power.

Lift the phone up, you fly from there, go and check that one there, for example.

Mr Valenitabua: You mean border control?

Mr Fatiaki: Border control, that's correct, yeah. Want to be based in Rotuma.

This year for the entire Fiji, this instead of going three days or two days or what, just ring up one base in Rotuma. In Fiji, Rotuma, please, sir. Base permanently.

So we create training for the youth not to come across. Join the Navy, join the Army, join the police from there. For example, that's our proposal.

Mr Valenitabua: Right, thank you.

Mr Fatiaki" Thank you, sir. Okay, let's go to the second last one.Chapter 7, that's fine with us. Revenue and expenditure, 100%. Chapter 8, number 1, accountability. I really love this Mr. Chairman and Honourable Member Lady. Section 149, eh? In written law, shall, then begins from the President, the Prime Minister, and all that, all under this Code of Conduct. Wonderful.

B, freedom of information, wananavu. Part C, Attorney General, that's okay.
Chapter 10, this is the key.

I know everybody in Fiji want to get rid of this very hard. Excuse me, sir. Chapter 10, the immunity.

Okay, 155, Section 155, 56, and 157. 100% stay permanently. Why? Because thanks to Honourable Prime Minister Rabuka for creating this immunity under 1990 Constitution, move on.

So, everyone, including me, my wife is supporting the coup anyway, under this immunity. She was a member of the Methodist Church of Fiji, full-time supporter of the coup. So, they're all no longer here, including my wife.

So, we are all bound by this immunity, including the current President, all the way down. I say 100%. So please, sir, stay permanently.

You can't remove it because it takes another three rounds within the Fijian Parliament, then back to the referendum. It never happened. So, all covered under this, even the current appointment right now, United Nations rep, he was part of it.

No, no, no, no, no. 1990, he was part of the spokesman. We're all covered.I love it. I love it, sir. Stay forever. And then not to touch or talk about it. That's all, sir. Last one. Oh, my time is almost up. Anyway, thank you, sir. That's Chapter 10, sir. Stay forever, permanent stay. Okay. This is the most important one, sir. Chapter 11, Amendment of Constitution. Section 159, 160, and 161. Oh, 160.

161 goes like this. Amendment before December 2013. That's all right.But a very special, the special one is this one here because the Parliament is engaged and also the voters. Section 159 and 160. Permanent stay forever.You can't repeal, you can't say it stays here, very clearly. Okay. Through this, we wrote directly to the President of the Supreme Court in 20, last year.

I've got it here. We told them, please say, amendment only, yes. You can't repeal that.

So, we called from there, there, from Chapter 1 in Section 2, Subsection 5, then going to Chapter 11, and so on. So, when ruling was done, we were happy. Amendment, and so that's where your committee came in.

I copied everybody. President, His Excellency, Prime Minister, and all President, one each. So, we are happy.

Amendment only. That's why I was here to come up here to put in those three very important ones. The Rotuma 200 and the iTaukei one, A must, the three.

That's the Chapter 11. I think that's all for the time being. Let me see it again, if I can, just five minutes.

Chapter 10 is, you understand, Chapter 11. I just want to remind you, sir, and the Honourable Members, because when we look at it, as a small business proprietor, and interested in politics, it's very difficult.
Subsection, Section 160, Subsection 1, a bill of the amendment of this Constitution must be expressed as a bill for an act to amend this Constitution, which is done, I hope.

I didn't see the bill, from the Prime Minister to the Parliament for approval of laveliga and all that. But anyway, it's done. Subsection 2, a bill of amendment of this Constitution must be passed by Parliament in accordance with the following procedure.

A, the bill is read three times in Parliament. B, at the second and third reading, it is supported by the votes of at least three quarters. That's okay.

They're there, of the members of Parliament. C, an interval, at least for 30 days, between the second and the third reading, each of those readings is preceded by a full opportunity by debate. Then, if I can of all examples, yes, no, yes, no, blah, blah, blah.

D, the third reading of the bill in Parliament does not take place until after the relevant committee or Parliament has reported the bill to Parliament. Subsection 3, subsection 3. If a bill is amended of the Constitution is passed by Parliament in accordance with subsection 2, then the Speaker shall notify the President accordingly, who shall then refer the bill to the Electoral Commission. This is a very difficult, it will never happen, for the Electoral Commission to conduct a referendum for all registered voters.

Registered voters in the last election were 600,000 plus, or 500. Because I lost my good form, so I'm on an ordinary form. All the record was there, so.

And only 200 voted for this bill, you know, the members of Parliament, only 200 plus of them. So that's it. That's Rihanna's side, because wasting our future taxpayers' money.

So sad Mr Chairman, which we really don't really care, eh? We. What can they do to you? They will do, they will do. No, you come and say something, please.

But anyway, so, you know, three quarters of the people to say yes in competitive Parliament, in my view, is very difficult. So that's it. I want to thank you, Sir, Mr Chairman and Lady Member, Honourable Member.

Man, it's a beautiful feeling for me this afternoon, because when we wrote to the President of the Supreme Court, no response. And when the result came, we all drank one another cup of tea, boy, sat down and said, John, you something. No, no, it's not me, it's he.

God is good at it. When you depend on him, he will provide. So, thank you again, Sir, for your time.

That's all for the time being. But the 2013 question is so powerful, because when Prime Minister went around the world to apologise to all our Fijian, iTaukei and come back, given the dual citizenship. So, end up with Buckingham Palace, Queen Elizabeth accepted it.

They had an audience, 2013. And then when they invited King Charles now to come for the celebration of the 50th birthday, unfortunately he never came because of the COVID-19. But the message was great.

This is accepted worldwide. And of course, the Secretary General. Any more questions? I'm going to end here, Sir.

Mr Valenitabua: Mr. John Fatiaki, thank you very much for your submission. This afternoon, we have recorded what you have submitted to us. And we will be deliberating later, after we hear all submissions.

For your information, you have raised a number of points or issues, which have already been raised before us. I understand. And some new ones, about one or two new ones.

But like I said, we will deliberate on them. Thank you, Sir. Thank you very much for coming here this afternoon and giving us your views and your suggestions.

I'm sorry we had one hour only and it was a short time. Fine with me, Sir. Right.

Mr Fatiaki: 100%.

Mr Valenitabua: We usually take photos after submissions. So we invite you to have a photo taken with us.

Mr Fatiaki: Okay. I'll say yes. This will be in the paper because there's a number of my own family against this.

Mr Valenitabua: I don't think it will be in the paper.

Mr Fatiaki: It doesn't matter. Paper or no paper, it doesn't matter. But we'll take a photo. That's a remembrance for me. Okay. I'm 77 now. We'll take a photo then. So when I'm 103, I still remember. Thank you, Sir. I really appreciate it. It's a beautiful feeling, Sir, because when the Supreme Court granted...

----------End of Session [3-7-2026]----------

Unity Fiji

Unity Fiji Party
Date:6-7-26

Mr. Valenitabua: Ladies and Gentlemen, members of the Unity Fiji Party. We welcome you this morning. Thank you very much for your attendance and for accepting the invitation which was sent around from the Constitution Review Commission. We have the Commissioners sitting this morning in Dr. John Fatiaki on my right, Mr. Conway Beg, I am the Chairperson Sevuloni Valenitabua, next to me is Mr. Ami Kohli, and on the far left is Dr. Neelesh Gounder. We are here this morning to listen to you. We are collecting submissions.

We might ask some questions later for clarification and maybe make some comments, but we are here primarily to listen to your submissions in relation to what you think we should include in the 2013 amended Constitution. I will not speak long. We only have one hour due to the fact that during this last week, we then have a flood of submitters interested to come here to present submissions so pardon us if we are going to be limiting your time at the same time, I would say that feel free to say what you have to say in summary. Thank you very much. I now give you the mic and the floor to address the Commission. Vinaka.

Mr. Narube: Thank you Chairman and thank you members. A very good morning to you all. Thank you for this opportunity to present to the Commission. We'll keep to your time limitations Chairman. We'll start with the bigger issues that Fiji is facing because the Constitution needs to address that. There is a close relationship as we all know between Constitutions and Coups in Fiji. Fiji has endured many coups; I think three military coups since 87. The first two was led by Sitiveni Rabuka who's now the Prime Minister the third by Commodore Voreqe Bainimarama in December 2006. Rabuka's coups produced the 1997 Constitution. Bainimarama abrogated that Constitution in April 2009 then promulgated the 2013 Constitution without consulting us the people and without any Parliamentary approval. The 2013 Constitution as you all know, starts with a lie. It says that we the people of Fiji. The people of Fiji played no part in the 2013 Constitution. It was imposed on us at the barrel of a gun. Fijians had no choice. In all defiance to Constitution meant intimidation, threats, harassment, imprisonment and even physical harm or death. For years the gun ruled this country. The absence of consultations and not listening to the voice of the people plays an important role in your review of the 2013 Constitution.

So, I have, my colleagues here, I can introduce them. They are our General Secretary Lenaitasi Duru and our Assistant General Secretary Samuela Tupou. I started our intervention with coups because of 20 years the people of Fiji have lived under a Constitution that was never theirs and we are all still enduring the consequences of that. After the December 2006 coup Bainimarama governed under the 1997 Constitution for almost three years. In April 2009, the High Court ruled on a case brought by the late Laisenia Qarase, declaring the coup unconstitutional and ordering Qarase's elected Government's reinstatement.

As you all know Bainimarama initially appeared to accept the ruling, saying he and his soldiers would return to the barracks and facing the prospect of a long prison sentence for treason he abrogated the 1997 Constitution the very next day and installed an interim Government that ruled Fiji for five years until 2014 General Elections. Altogether Bainimarama ruled for 14 years and altogether our coup leaders have led Fiji for 28 years.

So, facing mounting pressure at home and abroad to restore democracy, Bainimarama commissioned Professor Yash Ghai to draft a new Constitution. Professor Ghai and his team carried out a wide public consultation and submitted a draft in 2012. Because it didn't give the military everything it demanded, Bainimarama publicly burned it. A calculated display of power and contempt for the people's voice. The interim Attorney General and his handpicked legal team then produced this 2013 Constitution that your Commission is looking at amending in just two months.

The people as I emphasize again were never consulted, and no Parliament has passed it to this vey day. Fijians have no choice but to live under it. The military ruled through fear and public protest was banned. The media was heavily censored and even meetings required permits. To me in my view it was the most fearful period in Fiji's history and the 2013 Constitution was forced on us at the barrel of a gun. Constitutions are supposed to unite us but instead the 2013 Constitution is the most divisive Constitution in our history because the coup makers imposed it. Government should protect and uphold the Constitution but instead even in the Constitution they put in place, the Government even breach many of those Constitution by suppressing the human rights in their own Constitution.

So, Chairman and Commissioners, this is the country's greatest opportunity to right the wrongs of the 2013 Constitution. We must choose a process that maximizes this opportunity. It seems that as the Chairman has said this Government has chosen to amend the 2013 Constitution through the work of this Commission. I believe that is the wrong choice. Commissioners will recall, a paper by Professor Anthony Regan Australian National University and Cowell Kirby of University of Sydney titled "Fiji 2013 Constitution Review and Amendment or Replacement" which set out the legal options available to us. Having weighed these options carefully, Unity Fiji is clear the only fair and workable path forward is not to amend the 2013 Constitution but to remove it and replace it with an entirely new one. Our grounds for replacement and not amendment are clear. It does not carry the will of the people as I've mentioned before the constitution that says "we the people of this country" is not right. It's a great lie.

We did not participate in it. It was imposed on us as I've mentioned. The Yash Ghai draft, the product of genuine public consultation, was discarded and burned a clear signal of contempt for the people's views. The 2013 constitution never been debated or voted on by an elected Parliament. We must debate openly and the system the process that you are taking is commendable for it. The people never freely accepted it. Fijians complied with the 2013 Constitution at the barrel of the gun under an interim Government that ruled through terror and intimidation. The doctrine of necessity in this Constitution does not apply. Coup leaders often argue that actions were necessary to prevent or to preserve law and order. The argument here fails badly.

There was no rioting no civil disorder in Fiji in December 2006. The coup was carried out to serve the interest of the coup leader not to protect public order. Even the many amendments that people want to how opinion it is easier and cleaner to write a new Constitution rather than try to amend this one. Can it be legally done? We believe so. We prepare the new Constitution, the whole new Constitution and call it an amendment to the 2013 Constitution and go through the legal processes of amendment. This Commission has a rare opportunity to build a Constitution that truly serves Fiji's people now and into the future. Unity Fiji respectfully proposes that the Commission starts with the Yash Ghai draft. It was drafted after thorough public consultations and I'm confident that it already addresses many of the concerns you have heard in these consultations. Where gaps remain, the Commission can fill them in using your recent consultation. I will now outline the major changes that we propose should be in the new Constitution. First and foremost, we must bring back trust to this Constitution. We must build a foundation that unites the people. The 2013 Constitution as I have mentioned before is widely seen as having trampled on fundamental issues of the indigenous people. Their name, their religion, their land. We must correct this to build a united and stable Fiji. So, first one under this is the word 'Fijian'. Many are suggesting that you consult on the use of a common name.

The itaukei were called Fijians from the beginning. In 2013, that name was stolen from the itaukei without consultation and ceremony. It was insulting, insensitive and dictatorial. Instead of uniting us, this issue had divided us. For Fiji's long-term stability, the itaukei people must now be properly consulted on the common name. We may still end up with the same common name, but it would be unifying not divisive. The principal of consultation I believe will be fair to all ethnic groups in Fiji.

If we at the end of it agree to 'Fijian' as a common name, perhaps also a consultation on what the itaukei people should be called. Recognising Christianity's role. The 2013 Constitution removed all references to Christianity which shaped Fiji's national building from the outset. We all know the importance of religion to all of us. To remove it from the Constitution entirely was really insensitive and abusive. We propose a carefully framed preamble statement, recognizing Christianity as the first religion in Fiji and its role in the country's development. To acknowledge the significant influence in our history will help unify our country.

Remove the clawback clauses, in the Bill of Rights. Provisions such as section 5 of the 2013 Constitution which allows laws to limit basic rights, and no law should be able to reduce the basic rights entrenched in the new Constitution. Second, we should keep the Constitution based on principal not prescriptive. A Constitution should set out principals and not administrative details. Details belong, as you all know in ordinary legislation which is far easier to amend and modernise. For instance, section 127 of the 2013 Constitution gives Permanent Secretaries and Ministers the power to set civil servants terms and conditions within their own Ministries. This has created serious, pay disparities between civil servants doing the same grade of work, and clouded the demarcation of duties.

It was inserted in the 2013 Constitution to give Ministers more power. Ministers should have no role in operational or staffing matters as under the 1997 Constitution. This responsibility should be with the Public Service Commission. Third, we must strengthen key institutions in the Constitution itself. In their hunger for power, the framing of the 2013 Constitution politicized these institutions to grab more power. First the Constitutional Offices Commission (COC).

Under the 1997 Constitution, COC. members were all from the private sector. I know, because the COC. appointed me, the Governor. The 2013 Constitution instead made the Prime Minister, its chairman, and the Attorney General a member, politicizing the Commission. With consequences that we have seen in the past few years, we propose that the membership of the COC revert to independent private sector representative. The Judicial Services Commission, JSC. The JSC. is currently dominated by judges and chaired by the Chief Justice. A composition we believe imposes risks to the independence of the JSC as we have recently witnessed that bit first hand. We propose changes to allow the independent appointment of judges and the Chief Justice, with perhaps a chairperson from outside Fiji. Fourth, we must overhaul the electoral system. Democracy should be at the cornerstone of any Constitution.

In our submission to the Electoral Reform Commission last year Unity Fiji set out why the electoral system set out under the 2013 Constitution is undemocratic and discriminatory to individuals and new parties. Unity Fiji has experienced this unfairness in the last two elections. For instance, I got the sixth largest vote, yet I'm not in Parliament. We therefore renew our call for a complete overhaul of the electoral system, in line with the Electoral Review Commission recommendation. This work should proceed alongside yours, Commissioners, though we remain unaware of where the Electoral Review Commission report is. Fifth, we must remove provisions of the 2013 constitution that are contributing to the widening gaps between the rich and the poor. We must leave no one behind. The widening gap between the rich and poor threatens Fiji's future political stability. We must reverse this trend now.

So, on this, we want to look at the resource ownership and taxation. Section 30 of this Constitution should be restated so that minerals under land or water are owned by the landowners, who should then pay a resource tax to government when they do mine their minerals. The details of the resource tax should be set out by an ordinary law, calibrated so as not to unduly penalise the resource owners. Fair returns to landowners. Landowners currently receive returns well below market value for their assets. This is not fair.

We propose the Commission should review Sections 28 to 30 alongside the TLTB and related laws to ensure that landowners receive a fair return on their assets. Sixth, we make the following proposals to the processes on election, Parliament and rules for candidacy. First, we allow dual citizens to stand. Section 56A of the 2013 Constitution disqualifies dual citizens from being election candidates. We propose that candidates with dual citizenship should be electable to stand if they have lived in Fiji, say, for two years before nomination. Fiji stands to gain enormously from the return of overseas Fijians to bring back skills and experience. Second, close the deregistered party loophole.

Let me explain. The Constitution and the Electoral Act should be reconciled to clarify the status of sitting MPs whose party is deregistered. Under the electoral proportional system, Section 63 (1) requires all sitting MPs of the party that is deregistered to automatically loose their seats. But when Fiji First was deregistered, its MPs should have automatically lost their seats. Instead, the Government revoked a section of the Electoral Act for them to stay as independent. Many of them took maximum advantage and joined the Government as Ministers. A clear unfairness that your Commission must know.

Third, widened cabinet beyond Parliament. The 2013 Constitution allow only one Minister and that is the Attorney General to be appointed to Cabinet from outside Parliament. A provision designed to protect one man Aiyaz Khaiyum. The 1997 constitution allowed three. So, restoring that number would let Fiji draw on a wider pool of talents. And the last one in this theme is announce election early. In the elections under the 2013 Constitution, the date of the elections has been announced very late according to the whims, of the Government of the day. That is not fair. We propose that the elections are announced eight months before the election day. Seventh, it is time to confront the elephant in the room, Who's that? Its the Military's role in our national life. Fiji's coups and I've said this many times have cost this country dearly in money and in lives lost. We propose two changes. No immunity for coup leaders. We welcome with gratitude the news that the Commander of the Fiji Military Forces has suggested the removal of the immunity clause from the 2013 Constitution. We welcome that. This is a genuine game changer for the Country. Unity Fiji has constantly advocated and argued that we have one law for all. Those who break the law must be accountable. Forgiveness is a personal choice. Justice cannot be selective. Justice must run its full course.

The second, a narrower military mandate in the new Constitution. The new Constitution should confine the Military's role to national security and defence. We all know that. Its common sense. The wellbeing of the people is the Government's responsibility. Never the Military. Finally, provisions such as Section 173 in the current Constitution which preserve laws made under the post Constitution should be removed. In closing, Chairman and Commissioners, whatever new Constitution we come up with, the elephant in the room will still be here. What is stopping a future coup maker from throwing away the Constitution that you are going to develop? What's stopping them? That question is a rhetoric one. None. Nothing. Bainimarama promised that his coup was going to be the last one. Who believes him. My view, the answer to political stability is economic wellbeing.

We must use the resources that we have. We must correct this skewed income distribution. We must stop corruption. We must not leave anyone behind. We must embrace the transformation, the innovation and the change. That I believe will help political stability in our country and hopefully over time, get the people to realise that the power is with them not the military. That the real power is with our people.

Firstly, the Constitution must respect the rule of law to give that power to the people and understand that the sensitivities of national building under a diverse culture. People don't speak out against the coup and its cost like I do. I would encourage and I am encouraging our people to recognise that this doesn't build our future. The Constitution alone wont build that future. Its the people that can stand up and say this is enough. I believe with economic well being and fair inclusive Constitution we might get there to that place in our future. That ends my submission Chairman, and I wish the Commissioners every success in this difficult and important work. May God bless you and your families and may God bless Fiji. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Vinaka vakalevu Mr. Narube. We have heard your oral submission. I see that you're reading from your laptop. We would really appreciate it if you send us your submission so that we can have the hard copy of it. If we can have that it would assist us a lot. Now for the submission this morning you've raised a number of points, a number of issues which most of which we have heard from other submitters. The concerns of the people in relation to the 2013 Constitution. We are glad that we have had widespread consultations throughout Fiji and the same comments keep coming up that this Constitution was imposed on us. We didn't know anything about it.

This was the first time that people on the ground have been consulted about the Constitution. So, we have done that part all over Fiji. We are now hearing from you here at level 9 Suvavou House and it is just a reinforcement of what we have been hearing around. Just a point I would like to address. You had stated in your submission that its only fair that we remove the 2013 Constitution and not to amend it. You will understand that the current coalition Government had filed a reference to the supreme court last year and the supreme court had given us their opinion in relation to the 2013 Constitution. I believe that Unity Fiji was represented during the hearing and the proceedings of that reference hearing, and I believe you would have been advised that the supreme court had stated that the 2013 Constitution was valid and binding on the people of Fiji and that the 1997 Constitution was no more. We cannot bring that 1997 Constitution back and in addition to that ruling or that opinion by the supreme court, the supreme court had set out a means an avenue of facilitating the amendment to the 2013 Constitution.

They had decreased the percentage or the number of votes in Parliament and also the number of votes in a referendum which can facilitate an amendment through a Bill to Parliament to be produced by the Government. Now we have been following the suggestions that were made by the supreme court. We cannot remove the 2013 Constitution. We don't have the mandate to do it. We can only amend the 2013 Constitution because that is the mandate we were given. However, we understand that amendment can mean amending from page 1 to the last page. We understand that so we get your point. Maybe you put it in a different wording but that's what we understand. An amendment is an amendment. We can remove laws, which are in the Constitution, we can add new laws, we can change the provisions by altering words or adding words just to change the meaning in the Constitution so we get your point when you say that you only fear to remove the Constitution although we can't remove it, we will be amending it. You will see on our right a lady from New Zealand. That is our legal drafter, and she is sitting here today listening to the Consultations. We also have a constitutional lawyer in Professor Anthony. Regan. He is also on board, so we are looking at the Constitution in that light. That is my comment for this morning. I will now ask the Commissioners if they have any comments or any questions to ask your team here this morning. Dr. Fatiaki.

Dr. Fatiaki: Thank you Chair through you. Mr. Narube thank you very much for your submission. Thank you for the opening comments and reflection. I think it is import in anything that people do they do in a context. And I think your literal take back in history was a good refresher for all of us to understand that every time we had a Constitution it's been in response to a coup. I think that part is important, and I thank you for that. I just want to add and again this is semantics for me personally. We will use the word amend as defined in the current Constitution.

It says in this section the use of the word amend or amendment is intended to be understood broadly so that the section applies to any proposal to repeal, replace, revise or alter any provision of this constitution. That is the definition of the word amend as given here. And you heard the Chair allude to the fact that we can take line one to the last line and amend using repeal, replace, revise or alter. So, I think the issue is more just to reassure you that yes, we can't replace or remove, because this is asked of us often.

But when I tell them that the Supreme Court has indicated that we can't remove, I immediately follow that up by reassuring them that the definition of the word amend is this. And that could, for instance, on legal advice, we've been told that could include the renaming. So presumably this will no longer be called the 2013 Constitution as an amendment bill. I just want to say that to clarify that part of it, reading from you directly the definition of the term amend or amendment as utilized in this Constitution, and that's what we understand it to be. I hope that provides you some comfort in knowing that although we can't remove it, we can certainly do a lot with it. Thank you.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you, Chair. Thank you, Mr. Narube. It was always very interesting reading the articles when you were Governor of the Reserve Bank of Fiji. There are two issues, one adding on where the fellow commissioner, Dr. Fatiaki, has said. You'll be aware of the fact that we are not allowed to touch Chapter 10, immunity. Why? Because of Supreme Court's determination, not opinion determination. Number two, I just want some clarification from you, sir. See, in the present Constitution, there is a provision whereby Attorney General can be appointed from outside the Parliament if there is no qualified person in the Parliament. If I hear you correctly, you are now asking that there should be wider participation in the sense that we should allow three people from outside the Parliament to be in the Cabinet. How do you reconcile that with democratic principles of representative Parliament? That's my question. I would like to know how do we address that?

Mr. Narube: As I mentioned in my submission, the 1997 constitution had three. It had three ministers that the Prime Minister can appoint from outside Parliament. If you look at other jurisdictions, they have the same. The basis of it is, as in this Constitution, that if they do not have the skills and the experience, for key ministers like Attorney General, Finance, for instance and that interpretation is open to the Prime Minister how to use that. But yes, you are right. If there is a person in Parliament elected by the people that has the skill to undertake that work, I think he should be appointed from. But he should leave that flexibility to the Prime Minister in case there is not skills amongst the elected MPs to undertake those key roles. It's just the flexibility to make sure the Cabinet has that strength to be able to do what it does and to lead the country. That's my understanding. And you may like to word it that way. The qualification could be quite the same as this one.

Mr. Kohli: Will they have voting powers?

Mr. Narube: No. They are not elected. So, they cannot vote in Parliament. So that's a distinction. On those words that you mentioned, Dr. Fatiaki, on the replacement versus amendment, I leave that to your good judgment. But the spirit of what I said should be there. Yes. And as you said, you should change the name. I think that will be a unifying turning point, the change in name. But if it's, to me, a totally new constitution, then you put it as an amendment and follow the amendment process of what the Supreme Court has done. We Unity Fiji before the Supreme Court said last year, as the Chairman of the Commission knows, Unity Fiji was ready to challenge the legality of the 2013 Constitution in the court of law. And then the Supreme Court decision came in and put the spanners in. So, we stopped that. So, I think this is an opportunity to not entirely do the same thing, but something similar, but using the processes laid-down by the Supreme Court. Thank you.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Mr. Narube. Members from Unity Party for your submission this morning. As usual, Mr. Narube, I always look forward to your analysis and expertise. I just have a question for you. You are the first political party that is submitting, and we'll have the others following the submissions this week until Friday. So, what did you tell those people who say, who argue about the acceptance of the Constitution from the fact that they voted for Fiji First, which brought the Constitution in 2014 with over 60% of votes to Fiji first, but twice they opted to elect Fiji First, which actually brought this Constitution. And they campaigned under the Constitution as well. Thank you.

Mr. Narube: Well, I think we should separate the Constitution process that was followed from the political process after the Constitution was entrenched. This Constitution was decreed. It was decreed. It was not passed by Parliament that Fiji First had the majority. That came later, much later. This was decreed. That's the biggest difference to me. When you decree something out of what you believe is the best for the country without consulting the people, and that is a crucial crucial error. And then there was an election, the first election held under the Constitution which Fiji First won. Because that is democracy, that is electoral system set up by the Constitution. So, the selection of Fiji First in 2014, the first election under the Constitution, their majority to me should not be linked to the decree of the Constitution. It's wrong.

Dr. Gounder: Just a follow-up, a quick one. So, Fiji First victory in 2014 and 2018 does not give any mandate to the Constitution that we have at the moment. Is that what you're saying?

Mr. Narube: Yes, I believe that. And this issue of acquiesce that we know has been put forward exactly under that reasoning. The people of Fiji acquiesce to the 2013 Constitution by three elections under it. Yes. I disagree with that. I'm not a lawyer. I say acquiesce at the point of a gun is not acquiesce. Acquiesce when you are intimidated, when you speak against the Constitution is not acquiesce. That is imposing the Constitution under those kinds of conditions. That's my view. Thanks

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Narube, Mr. Duru, Mr. Tupou, thank you very much for coming here this morning and making these submissions on behalf of the Unity Fiji Party.

----------End of Session [6-7-26] ----------

6 July 2026

SUBMISSION BY UNITY FIJI TO THE 2026 CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMISSION

Coups and Constitutions

There is a close relation between constitutions and coups in Fiji. Fiji has endured three military coups since 1987 — the first two led by Sitiveni Rabuka, the third by Commander Voreqe Bainimarama in December 2006. Rabuka's coups produced the 1997 Constitution. Bainimarama abrogated that constitution in April 2009, then promulgated the 2013 Constitution without consulting the people and without parliament's approval.

The people of Fiji played no part in writing the 2013 Constitution. It was imposed on them at the barrel of a gun. Fijians had no real choice but to comply. Defiance meant intimidation, threats, harassment, imprisonment — even physical harm or death. For years, the gun ruled this country. This absence of consultations and not listening to the voice of the people plays an important role in the review of the 2013 Constitution.

On behalf of Unity Fiji, I thank the Commission for this invitation. I started with the coups because for twenty years the people of Fiji have lived under a constitution that was never theirs — and we are still living with the consequences.

The 2013 Constitution

After his December 2006 coup, Bainimarama governed under the 1997 Constitution for almost three years. In April 2009, the High Court ruled on a case brought by the late Laisenia Qarase, declaring the coup unconstitutional and ordering Qarase's elected government reinstated. Bainimarama initially appeared to accept the ruling, saying he and his soldiers would return to the barracks. Then, facing the prospect of a long prison sentence for treason, he abrogated the 1997 Constitution the very next day and installed an interim government that ruled Fiji for five years, until the 2014 general elections. Altogether Bainimarama ruled for 14 years.

Facing mounting pressure at home and abroad to restore democracy, Bainimarama commissioned Professor Yash Ghai to draft a new constitution. Professor Ghai carried out wide public consultations and submitted his draft in 2012. Because it did not give the military everything it demanded, Bainimarama publicly burned it — a calculated display of contempt for the people's voice.

The interim Attorney-General and his hand-picked legal team then produced the 2013 Constitution in just two months. The people were never consulted, and no parliament has ever passed it — to this day.

Fijians had no choice but to live under it. The military ruled through fear: public protest was banned, the media was heavily censored, and even meetings required a permit. It was the most fearful period in Fiji's history, and the 2013 Constitution was forced on the people at the barrel of a gun.

Constitutions are supposed to unite the country. But instead, the 2013 Constitution is the most devise constitution in our history because the coup makers imposed it. Government should protect and uphold the constitution. But instead, the government that framed the 2013 Constitution seriously breached the constitution by supressing basic human rights.

Remove the 2013 Constitution — Do Not Amend It

This is our opportunity to right all the wrongs of the 2013 Constitution. We must choose a process that maximises this opportunity. This Government has chosen to amend the 2013 Constitution through this Commission. That is the wrong path.

Commissioners will recall a paper by Professor Anthony Regan (Australian National University) and Coel Kirkby (University of Sydney Law School), Fiji 2013 Constitution: Review, and Amendment or Replacement, which set out the legal options available to us. Having weighed those options carefully, Unity Fiji is clear: the only fair and workable path forward is not to amend the imposed 2013 Constitution, but to remove it and replace it with an entirely new one.

Our grounds for replacement are clear:

a) It does not carry the will of the people. A constitution must reflect the will of the people who live under it, formed through a thorough and inclusive process. The 2006 coup-makers imposed the 2013 Constitution. The Yash Ghai draft — the product of genuine public consultation — was discarded and burned, a clear signal of contempt for the people's views.

b) It was never debated or voted on by an elected parliament. A constitution must be openly debated and voted on by a legally elected parliament. The 2006 coup leader simply decreed the 2013 Constitution. It has never been tabled, debated, or voted on. It is not the will of the people — it is the constitution of the 2006 coup-makers.

c) The people never freely accepted it. Fijians complied with the 2013 Constitution at the barrel of a gun, under an interim government that ruled through terror and intimidation. No protest was permitted — not even on social media. There was no genuine coalescing around this constitution; there was only fear.

d) The doctrine of necessity does not apply. Coup leaders often argue their actions were necessary to preserve law and order. That argument fails here: there was no rioting and no civil disorder in Fiji in December 2006. The coup was carried out to serve the interests of the coup leader — not to protect public order.

Given the many amendments that people want, it is easier and cleaner to write a new constitution rather than amend it. Can it be legally done? Yes, we prepare the new constitution as an amendment to the 2013 Constitution and go through the legal process of amendment.

Start With the Yash Ghai Draft

This Commission has a rare opportunity to build a constitution that truly serves Fiji's people, now and into the future.

Unity Fiji respectfully proposes that the Commission start with the Yash Ghai draft. It was built thorough public consultation, and I am confident it already addresses many of the concerns you have heard. Where gaps remain, the Commission can fill them using its own recent consultations.

The Changes Fiji Needs

I will now outline the changes that we propose should be in the new Constitution.

1. Construct a Strong Foundation

First and foremost, we must build a foundation that unites the people. The 2013 Constitution is widely seen as having trampled on fundamental issues of the Indigenous people—their name, their religion, and their land. We must correct this to build a united and stable Fiji.

a) Consult on the common name "Fijian." The iTaukei were called Fijians from the beginning. In 2013 the name was stolen from the iTaukei without consultation or ceremony — an insulting, insensitive and dictatorial act. Instead of uniting us, this issue has instead divided us. For Fiji's long-term stability, the iTaukei people must now be properly consulted on the common name. We may still end up with the same common name, but it would be unifying not divisive. The principle of consultation is fair to all the ethnic groups in Fiji.

b) Recognise Christianity's role. The 2013 Constitution removed all reference to Christianity, which shaped Fiji's nation-building from the outset. We all know the importance or religion to the people. To remove it from the constitution entirely was insensitive and abusive. We propose a carefully framed preambular statement recognising Christianity as the first religion in Fiji and its role in the country's development. To acknowledge this significant influencer in our history will help unify the country.

e) Remove the clawback clauses. Provisions such as s5 of the 2013 Constitution, which allow laws to limit basic rights, should be removed. No law should be able to reduce the basic rights guaranteed in the new Constitution.

2. Keep the Constitution Principle-Based, Not Prescriptive

Second, we should keep the constitution principle based. not prescriptive. A constitution should set out principles, not administrative details — details belong in ordinary legislation, which is far easier to amend and modernise. Section 127 of the 2013 Constitution, for example, gives Permanent Secretaries and Ministers the power to set civil servants' terms and conditions within their ministries. This has created serious pay disparities between civil servants doing the same grade of work and clouded the demarcation of duties. It was inserted into the 2013 Constitution to give Ministers more power. Ministers should have no role in operational or staffing matters; as under the 1997 Constitution, this responsibility should sit with the Public Service Commission.

3. Strengthen the Independence of Key Institutions

Third, we must strengthen key institutions. In their hunger for power, the framers of the 2013 Constitution politicised these institutions to grab more power.

a) Constitutional Officers Commission (COC). Under the 1997 Constitution, COC members were all from the private sector — I know this because the COC appointed me, Governor. The 2013 Constitution instead made the Prime Minister its chairman and the Attorney-General a member, politicising the Commission, with consequences we have seen over the past two years. We propose that the membership of the COC revert to independent private-sector representatives.

b) Judicial Services Commission (JSC). The JSC is currently dominated by judges and chaired by the Chief Justice — a composition whose risks we have recently witnessed firsthand. We propose changes to allow the independent appointment of judges and the Chief Justice, with a chairperson who could be drawn from overseas.

4. Overhaul the Electoral System

Fourth, we must overhaul the electoral system. Democracy should be the cornerstone of the constitution. In our submission to the Electoral Reform Commission last year, Unity Fiji set out why the electoral system introduced under the 2013 Constitution is undemocratic and discriminatory to individuals and new partes. Unity Fiji has experienced these in the last two elections. We therefore renew our call for a complete overhaul of the electoral system, in line with the Electoral Review Commission's recommendations. This work should proceed alongside this Commission's — though we remain unaware of its status.

5. Promote Equitable Income Distribution

Fifth, we must remove provisions of the 2013 Constitution that are contributing to the widening gaps between the rich and poor. We must leave no one behind. The widening gap between rich and poor threatens Fiji's future political stability. We must reverse this trend now.

a) Resource ownership and taxation. Section 30 should be restated so that minerals under land or water are owned by the landowners, who should pay resource tax when they mine the minerals. The details of the resource tax should be set by ordinary law, calibrated so as not to unduly penalise resource owners.

b) Fair returns for landowners. Landowners currently receive returns well below market value for their assets. This is unfair. The Commission should review sections 28–30, alongside the TLTB and related laws, to ensure that landowners receive a fair return on their assets.

6. Reform Processes of Elections and Parliament

Sixth, we make the following proposals to the processes on elections, parliament, and rules of candidacy:

a) Allow dual citizens to stand. S56(a) of the 2013 Constitution disqualifies dual citizens from being election candidates. We propose that candidates with dual citizenship should be eligible to stand if they have lived in Fiji for two years before nomination. Fiji stands to gain enormously from the return of overseas Fijians bringing back skills and experience.

b) Close the deregistered-party loophole. The Constitution and the Electoral Act should be reconciled to clarify the status of sitting MPs whose party is deregistered. Under a proportional system, S63(1) requires all sitting MPs of the party that is deregistered to lose their seats. When Fiji First was deregistered, its MPs should have automatically lost their seats. Instead, the Government evoked a section in the Electoral Act for them to stay as independents. Many of them took maximum advantage and joined the Government as Ministers — a clear unfairness that must be closed.

c) Widen Cabinet beyond parliament. The 2013 Constitution allows only the Attorney-General to be appointed to Cabinet from outside parliament — a provision designed to protect one man, Aiyaz Sayed-Khaiyum. The 1997 Constitution allowed three. Restoring that number would let Fiji draw on a wider pool of talent.

d) Announce elections early. In the elections under the 2013 Constitution, the date for the elections has been announced very late according to the whims of the government of the day. This is not fair. We propose that the elections are announced at least eight months before the date.

7. Redefine the Role of the Military

Seventh, it is time to confront the elephant in the room: the military's role in our national life. Fiji's coups have cost the country dearly, in money and in lives lost. We propose two changes.

f) No immunity for coup leaders. We welcome, with gratitude, the Commander of the Fiji Military Forces' own suggestion to remove the immunity clause from the 2013 Constitution — a genuine gamechanger for the country. Unity Fiji has consistently argued for one law for all: those who break the law must be accountable. Forgiveness is a personal choice; justice cannot be selective. Justice must run its full course.

g) A narrower military mandate. The new Constitution should confine the military's role to national security and defence. The wellbeing of the people is the government's responsibility — never the military's.

8. Remove the Preservation-of-Laws Provision

Finally, provisions such as section 173, which preserve laws made under the imposed constitution, should be removed from the new Constitution.

Closing

In closing, whatever new constitution we come up with, the elephant in the room will still be here. What is stopping future coup makers from throwing away this new constitution and imposing theirs as history has shown? The question is a rhetoric one. Bainimarama promised that his coup was going to be the last one. Coming from a coup leader, no body believed him.

In my view, the answer to political stability is economic wellbeing. We must use the resources that God has given us. We must correct the skewed income distribution. We must stop corruption. We must not leave anyone behind. We must embrace innovation and change.

Finally, although many of us do not realise it, the people have the power to stop coups. The most important first step is a constitution that respects the rule of law and understands the sensitivities of building a united and prosperous nation in a diverse culture. The people must speak out against coups and never allow coup leaders do not benefit from their illegal actions.

I wish the Commissioners every success in this difficult and important work. May God Bless you and your families.

Thank you.

Richard Naidu

Mr. Richard Naidu
Date: 6-7-2026
Time:12pm-1pm

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you for giving your time to be here this afternoon. I will not take further time for introductions and all that. I'm sure you know all of us sitting up here.

Or is there anyone you don't know? No, for better or worse, I know all of you. Thank you. So we need no introduction.

We are here to listen to you. Maybe exchange conversation. Yeah, not the usual submission mode.

We appreciate you being here because we might have a lot of questions for you. So, without further ado, we will now give you the mic and the floor. If you could just open up, start off our conversation this afternoon.

Good luck.

Mr. Naidu: Thanks, Mr. Chairman. That was really why I asked for a closed session.

There were two reasons. The first of which being that anything I tend to say tends to be immediately attributed to a political party, which is not fair on the political party. So, I thought it was better that I submit it in private.

But the second was that I do hope we have the opportunity to discuss rather than me just giving a peroration. The trouble with lawyers, of course, is that we all charge by the hour, which means that we can only speak for blocks of one hour and not less. So I'm going to try and get through the things that I wanted to talk about.

Mindful that I know that you've heard from the President of the Law Society. I know you've heard from my colleague, John Apted. Those are the real constitutional lawyers.

I'm a pretend constitutional lawyer. Business is really what I do, how I advise. But there is a reason, I think, for me to focus on that, and I'm going to try and focus on things that I think are most practical and most effective, particularly in the hour that I have.

If you have the two-page summary, some of you do, some of you don't. I'm hoping the hard copy will arrive very shortly. I just want to begin by commending the Fiji Law Society submission, which I read.

I thought it was very good. And, of course, I did get something of a lowdown on what my partner John said, and generally I'm very rarely apart from him on his views on constitutional issues. What I wanted to focus on, though, also was to, just by way of a reminder, if only a reminder, about the economy and how important the Constitution is.

The Constitution has an economic dimension, and we should not lose sight of that. I'm a commercial lawyer. One of the things I do is advise investors, particularly foreign investors, who are always interested in the basic fabric of the rule of law.

They want to know that the court system works effectively and is independent and functional. They want to know that the legislative system, the way we pass legislation and the way we enact legislation, is efficient and independent. So, I think while we are caught up a lot in terms of people's rights and in terms of political objectives, let's not forget it was Bill Clinton, when Bill Clinton was campaigning to become President, he had a slogan, 'it's the economy, stupid'.

That's what he kept saying to himself. And I think we need to remember that the economy is at the core of everything. The economy is at the core of social stability.

It's at the core of the way people live. And the Constitution has an economic dimension, and it is important not to lose sight of that. One of the things that I will talk about, really just in passing, and it occurred to me, one aspect of the 2013 Constitution which is troubling and has troubled a lot of people is the infamous section 173, subsection 4, which is the provision which says that there is a whole range of legislation, decisions on which cannot be challenged in court.

This was just a very crude and amateurish way of trying to protect the immunity legislation that existed before. Very poorly thought out, but that's because, as I will come to, the 2013 Constitution was just done in a rush. But what that means is that there's a whole raft of things for which the government, when it legislates or it otherwise enacts executive decisions, cannot be challenged, is not accountable.

It's not accountable for an irrational decision. It's not accountable for a non-consultative decision. It simply cannot be held to account in the law.

And this extends even to decisions of government ministries. So any legislation, in essence, that was enacted after the coup and before the sitting of the first parliament, any law that is in that 2006-2014 period, even a bureaucratic decision today is unable to be challenged. That's really bad for governance.

It's really bad for the accountability of ministers, senior civil servants, when you cannot hold people legally accountable. What does it mean? They don't have to reason their decisions. They're not exposed to the thinking that is behind those decisions.

It's not exposed to any judicial or public scrutiny at all. And that is a recipe for bad governance. It is a recipe for corruption.

And that is just a simple example of how the... Because a lot of these decisions are economic. And when a business cannot challenge an irrational business decision, that becomes a matter of investor confidence, which goes to the economy. That's just a little example, not the only one.

The second thing that I wanted to talk about was your process. And regrettably, I do not think that the process you have been given, the task that you have been allocated, is a fair one. That is not any of your fault.

And in fact, in a way, it's almost heroic that you've accepted the mission impossible that you've been given. But the process that you have been given to follow is an almost impossible one to achieve, for the reasons that I've said out there. You cannot review a constitution in a rush.

2013 was the proof of that. You cannot review a constitution in a rush. I think once you have managed to issue your report, that's something that should just be allowed to permeate and to allow people to respond and feedback to, before we rush into the next stage, which is legislation.

And the timetable that you have been given really doesn't allow for that. Clearly, a significant proportion of the population want the 2013 constitution to go. And I'm sure you've heard a lot of that.

I heard a lot of that in the constitution case in the Supreme Court. It must go. And there's this almost fanatical devotion to that principle, without really thinking about what should replace it.

And I think that's, again, one more reason for us to all slow down and say, well, fine, we understand that it has to go, but what is it that you really want in its place? And that's something that really we should have the time to discuss and think about. Clearly, I think what that means for you as a committee or for the process is that this cannot be an amending process. I just don't think that there is popular support for the idea that this 2013 constitution should be amended.

Remember, 1997 was about amending the 1990 constitution. But there just seems to be such a vociferous dislike of this constitution that even if it's only for the optics, it really has to go. What does that mean? It means that you've got to construct a completely new one, and that takes time.

You cannot just do this on the fly. So I would certainly encourage the commission, if it has the opportunity, to just say to the government, look, you must slow this process down. Otherwise, it is not a credible process.

And we just cannot continue to have constitutions that lack credibility. And I've gone through the other steps that we have to go through, but we are just doing this in too much of a rush. And somebody has to simply say to the government, we're sorry, you cannot do it in this way.

You cannot have a good and effective and lasting constitution if you rush this process. I think it's important, this goes to my third point, even if that's only a starting point, how we view the 2013 constitution, because we need to learn from that process. And we need to understand why, I think, well, we need to learn the mistakes of that constitution.

It was a rush job. We know this. The Ghai draft went up in flames, and something else had to be provided very quickly.

And so there was this rush job which produced a constitution that nobody knew about and nobody wanted. What were its main features? It was tailor-made for the people who were then in power. And I think it was very, very cynically drafted.

The electoral system, this pure proportional representation system, if I can talk politics for a moment, was driven by, I think, the fact that the previous government saw the Indo-Fijian population as its political base, understood that a constituency system might not deliver the results that it wanted electorally, so decided if we can simply treat all of the communities as racial blocs, that will produce a particular percentage for us. Whatever else we can add to, that is how we're going to win an election. There was no thought given to democracy.

There was no thought given to accountability, democratic accountability. It was just about how will we win. For the first time, we had a unicameral system, a parliamentary system, and that very much reflected a sort of dictatorial way of saying, let's just get things done.

Not interested in accountability, not interested in anything other than that. The control of the key institutional appointments, the constitutional offices and the judiciary, are so clearly in the control of the executive, and in particular the Prime Minister and the Attorney General. That was not a surprise.

I sat, I think, at this level. I used to sit on the constitutional offices commission as an opposition appointee, until I just got fed up. It was a purely rubber-stamping process.

The constitutional offices commission had the Prime Minister and the Attorney General and two flunkies. On one side, the Leader of the Opposition. On one side, one more helpless nominee.

That was me. And we sat there and just listened while everybody just voted four two, four two, four two. That was not a process by which constitutional offices should be appointed.

But again, it was cynical. It was nothing more than that. We're now paying the price for this.

That is, I think, something that we don't really understand. 2006 to 2014 and the 2013 Constitution was basically just dictatorship democratized. And as a result of that, we lost the opportunity over 16 years to build good governance, to build precedence, to build law, to educate our public servants about how they could respond to Ministers in an independent and functional way.

All of that disappeared. And we lost all of the experience of many experienced senior public servants, and everybody became used to just doing what the Minister said. So, the whole function of the independent public service, which is critical to good governance, disappeared.

And we are paying the price for that now. So that's what I want to say about the 2013 constitution. It's really important that we understand what went wrong and why it happened and not repeat those mistakes.

My fourth point is whether we should return to a bicameral legislature. That's been a feature of every constitution since 2013. It's the Norman Commonwealth countries, I think, other than New Zealand.

But I think if, again, we know our history, we will know that that second chamber was a real house of review. It typically had appointed, not elected members. And it was a very important means of protecting indigenous people's rights.

But it was also a way in which legislation could be effectively scrutinized. And once again, this idea of a unicameral legislature, just because you can rush legislation through, has resulted in cynicism around legislation and very poor-quality legislation because there's nobody reviewing it.

I want to move on to the rights and protections for indigenous people because I'm sure that this is a critical issue.

And again, I want for us to look at it through a common sense but also an economic lens. It's a sensitive issue and it needs to be managed. And again, I will summarize.

I'm trying to rush through this. But at a very high level, I think what I would say is that for indigenous people, there is a belief that these elevated constitutional rights, rights to resources, rights to land, everything, it will solve every problem. And it must be evident that it will not.

And I think people are possibly susceptible to politicians who suggest that as long as we have complete control over land and resources and everything, every other problem will solve itself. It will not. And that has been our experience for the last 50 years.

At the same time, for non-indigenous people, this idea of some elevation of indigenous rights is a source of grievance. Non-indigenous people believe that they're being turned into second-class citizens and, I guess, also many of their political leaders are trying to advance that. Also untrue.

So it's clear that an appropriate balance is possible. Many countries around the world have done this. The results are not always there, but the effort and the attempts are there.

And so I think we need to recognize that an unnecessarily elevated set of indigenous rights threaten national unity but also economic confidence. And we have to be alive to that. But I think we can ensure that on critical issues on land and other resources, customs, and traditions.

Indigenous people have, and I was rushing through this summary this morning, and I couldn't find the right buzzwords. I put them all there. Whether it's agency or autonomy or sovereignty, I'm not sure which one it is.

It's one of those words, or maybe none of them. But I think that is where we must ensure that that principle is respected. A really good example, and once again an example of the rush job that was the 2013 Constitution, is in Section 28.

For those of us who remember, Section 28 was an insertion. So, when the draft Constitution came out, every question was asked, where is the protection of indigenous rights to land, custom, culture, etc.? And we were told, it's all there. It's in your protection of your property rights, Section 27.

Well, there was this, you know, correct, complete dismissal of that. Nobody had thought about it. So, what happens instead? We put in a Section 28 that says, the ownership of all iTaukei land shall remain with the customary owners and shall not be permanently alienated, etc., etc.

And this was presented as, look at us, we've protected everybody's rights, it's all great, and these are the strongest rights ever. They are not. All that they succeeded in doing was depriving indigenous people of any right over their own land, their own customs and their own traditions.

And again, we focus, let's go back to the economy for a moment. Denarau Island, on which 40% of all Fiji tourism operates, all of the hotels on Denarau Island sit on iTaukei land, on iTaukei leases. Why? Because in the 1990s, or the late 1990s or 2000s, a series of so-called land swaps occurred.

Denarau was swapped. It had a bit of freehold land, had a bit of iTaukei land, and the rest was swamp, foreshore, which became crown land or state land. But what happened once Denarau was all put together was that there were no marketable parcels of land.

There was a bit of crown here and a bit of iTaukei here and a bit of freehold there. You couldn't build anything on anything. So what happened was they engaged in what were called the land swaps of Denarau.

Land was changed around so that you could create marketable parcels of land. And the result of that was that all of the beachfront ended up as iTaukei leases because the land was swapped. This bit of land, this bit of iTaukei land was swapped for foreshore, foreshore was swapped for freehold, etc.

And the result was that you now have some very prosperous landowning units who are the lessors of Denarau land. That could not have happened under Section 28 because there was no right, absolutely no right, to alienate land. The process that was gone through with the land swaps, it went right up to cabinet.

It was a cabinet process, Fijian affairs, and so on. But it's a very good example of how this sort of rhetorical rush to say, we've got the best land protection rights ever actually just denied indigenous people the opportunity through a carefully considered deliberate process to actually improve their livelihoods. So that's an example of how rushing and rhetoric are not the way in which to create a constitution.

And I think again, if you look at the older system, it did not prevent indigenous people or their representatives in parliament from changing anything. If they chose to turn iTaukei land into freehold land, it was within their power to do so. But that was a right that rested with the representatives of the people.

There was no paternalistic system that says, you may not. It depended on them. And I think, you know, this is something that we've got to go back to and be alive to.

This idea that it's for indigenous people themselves to decide their future, not for a constitution to say this is what you must not have, this is what you cannot have.

So, I think if we revert to the bicameral system and the protection structure, we also need to think carefully about indigenous people's leadership. And of course I'm focused on, it's not just the iTaukei, it's the Rotuman population as well.

We do need to think about it. Is the Great Council of Chiefs, as it was formulated, or the BLV as it's formulated now, is that the correct institution that in the 2020s should represent the iTaukei? Or is there some different structure that we need to give thought to? Given that indigenous people are not the people, they're not where they were in the 1970s, there's a whole diaspora now, there's a whole urban community now whose interests are very different from the 1970s when Fiji became independent. So finally, as part of my rush through this, I want to just talk about the electoral system.

The pure PR system, as I said, was a cynical tactic engaged in by the last by the Bainimarama government. Wasn't accountable, wasn't people-level democracy. People are entitled, at the very least, to a member of parliament.

At the same time, I think it's important to recognize that government is now a more complex process than it has ever been. I was just reflecting on poor old Keir Starmer falling from grace, and it just so happens that I'm reading a biography of Harold Macmillan, who was a Prime Minister in the 50s and 60s, and how much easier it was back in those times for politicians to lead. And I think it's also an acute problem in a small place like Fiji.

I pay a lot of attention to New Zealand and Australian politics, and New Zealand and Australia are still able to attract technocrats into their politics. So you have some very, very skilled, specialized people in policy-making positions in the Cabinet, in the ministries. And in Fiji, we just do not have that depth.

It's not anybody's fault. There's only 900,000 of us, and we cannot attract... We've got to go and hand-pick that depth if we want the skill at that particular level in Cabinet. And I think something like the MMP system, I think it has two attractions.

One is that it could probably allow us to hand-pick skilled people. But it could also be used, I think, to improve female representation in Parliament. Again, the MMP system can be used for that.

And I understand, as I understand it, the Justice Fatiaki chaired electoral system, I think, has proposed something like MMP plus six, I think. Six seats for women. Was it 20 or not? That's... Okay, interesting.

Yeah, yeah, I can't... Yeah. And I think there's a lot of controversy around what they call temporary special measures, and whether or not these are the right thing or the wrong thing. I personally see a place for that.

But that's as much... That's as far as my competence goes on that. I'm not an expert in any manner. But I do feel that an MMP style system could... It would be important to bring skills into Government at the legislative level, but also at the executive level.

We really can't... We don't have the luxury, really, of avoiding that. We've somehow got to get skills into that level of Government. And I think MMP has a lot to recommend it.

And again, not being any sort of expert in electoral systems, that's probably where I should stop before I embarrass myself any further. So that's... Those are the points that I wanted to cover, and I hope I've covered them as swiftly as I can to give everybody the opportunity to ask me any questions.

Mr. Beg: Just on the electoral system, the MPP system, in terms of coalition, like in terms of coalition Government, that may or may not work given the circumstances, given the conditions that we're under. So that needs to be thought out whether... Because we've heard constituency base quite a bit throughout the country. So there's no right and wrong to what I'm saying.

I'm just pointing out some of the facts that I'm listening to. There may be some disadvantages with that proportionality. I may be wrong, but is there... You got any comments on that? I have two comments on that, I think.

One is the point I forgot to make here, which is we can't go back to communal representation, I don't think. It definitely had a place. So when people attack the 1970 Constitution, or even the 1990 Constitution as racist, that's not so.

I think it was actually a means of ensuring in a different time that people were genuinely represented. In the 1970s, people didn't have the functionality in English. They didn't have... The modernity in society just wasn't there to support a pure common role system, in my opinion.

And so it was important, and of course it was a complex system. You had national MPs and you had communal MPs, but you always had somebody to whom you could relate who understood you better, who could communicate with you in your own language, and so on. I think we're beyond that now.

I think it's important from a national unity viewpoint that we do have what's now called common role. But that doesn't address your point, Conway. I think the answer to your question is that there is no system now I think that will guarantee a nice, clean, two-party system of democracy.

I think we are possibly headed into the next election, and we're going to end up with a quite significant fracturing anyway. So whatever system we have, we are going to have to get used to coalitions. They are going to become the norm.

And you're right that MMP around the world tends to foster coalitions and force governments to work in coalitions and in many European countries, I think Germany, I think Belgium went for a year and a half once without a government after an election because they couldn't put a coalition together. Good for the caretaker government, I guess. They were able to hang around for that long.

But I think that's a reality that we have to get used to regardless of the electoral system. I don't think the electoral system any electoral system is a guarantee any democratic electoral system anyway is a guarantee of a nice, clean, efficient, two-party government anymore.

Dr. Fatiaki: Richard, thank you. Thank you very much for that. Excellent purview of I guess a lot of the issues that we will be mulling over the next two months.

My comments are more a philosophical thing. I entered this with the understanding that my mandate in terms of reference indicate that I should go out and address what the Supreme Court alluded to as being the democratic deficit, which was this lack of consultation. We heard from submitters this morning that that was a significant issue.

And so I entered this job with the understanding that I was going to go out there and extend very extensive wide cross-sectional community, and we've done that. We spent two and a half months traveling around the country and we have that all on record that's been collated now with the legal officers. My philosophical comments relate to the issue of now we come to write a constitution.

How much of that constitution and that consultation should marry with each other. And by that I mean how important is it in me as a commissioner to take into account what I hear out there as the submissions from the mass wide consultation of people versus what I might I guess consider the best for the country. That's my first philosophical thing that I wrestle with it all the time.

Because, you know, somebody suggested this morning, I think that when you say we the people it's meant to mean we the people and I use the analogy that the U.S. Constitution was written mainly by farmers and businessmen and it wasn't written by lawyers and it certainly wasn't written by constitutional experts. It was written by we the people. And that's the philosophical thing I'm wrestling it with now because I have people who give me the impression that they think we the people is the people there and we the people who know should write the constitution or should have more weight in terms of the opinions about how constitution should be made.

I don't have a stand on that right now. I say it because it is something that I wrestle with. This idea of how important is their voice and particularly given that we've given a lot of our time for that versus what we think is good for the country and I can, you know, just if I were to allude to for instance the issue of temporary special measures I might have my own personal thoughts about things like that but I didn't hear one or maybe one submission that suggested anything like that.

Right across the board. And for me if I don't hear it from the people and I would suggest that my brother suggested that we should have 20 women seats reserved, then I'm socially engineering an outcome because if you say it's a temporary special measure, it's obviously a measure in place until you've achieved a certain outcome. I don't know that I'm geared to think like that.

The idea that I should say well we need 50-50 or 60-40 or 30-70, I'm just not geared to think like that. I think things like that happen and they what do you call it, evolve but anything outside of the normal evolution of a society to me becomes something that you engineer and you say well this is the outcome I want, I'll put that in place and it'll head that direction. Again, this is not a question, this is just something that I wrestle with.

I know you alluded to that. You have your thoughts on it. I can't say how I think about that but that's another issue that I have.

I'll just allude to one more. This issue of the GCC. Like you, I have, I won't say a bad taste in my mouth, but after the events of 87 and the support in 2000 of the GCC for the coups that left a real bad taste in my mouth.

Having said that, I've seen leadership of the GCC essentially before, that's from Rata Mara and their group and then I've seen a new GCC appear here. Educated, well spoken, good lawyers and very adaptive. They've come with the attitude of like, I'm talking about the leadership.

Obviously there's going to be individual ones. The impression I get from going out to a lot of rural consultations is that they're still the voice of the people. For better or for worse, and I'm talking about the iTaukei people.

For better or for worse, I would think that when submissions are coming, they always allude to the tikina, and they're almost uniform, almost to a T. Through the separate districts, we'll have the Lau people make a separate submission, but the impression I've been getting is that every district and village that we've gotten to has followed the GCC submission, the first one. The same general sort of issues. And this GCC that I see that presented to us in the first consultation was a completely different GCC that I saw running outside my office in town as the 2000 upheavals went in the 1987.

I was away for the first part of... safely in Rotuma as the doctor when that happened. But I was here in the 2000 and I can say that my opinion of them was considerably. Having said that, I say that again in the context of your comments about the bicameral part of it.

Thank you for your very honest reflection about the issue of indigenous land and rights. Again, I think you've spoken very well to that in 27 and 28. There are issues there that we need to get into in a lot more detail with a lot of advice.

But all in all, thank you, Richard. I just wanted to reflect about a few things. I mean, that's a philosophical thing.

But I appreciate very much what you've given us and I think they'll give us reason to sit and mull our thoughts over as we go over the next six weeks. The other very small thing, sorry Chair, through you, was the issue of this, you know, everybody says it's too rushed. Let me put a hypothetical.

If the intent of government is to put the next election under a new constitution, because, and I say that not only in the context of that, but we've actually had many submissions who come to us and tell us, please, don't let government prorogue or whatever they say, you know, don't dissolve parliament. Keep them, extend them. We tell them, of course, that we have nothing to do with that.

That's not part of our role. But we hear this and it's always through that. This must come in before that happens.

And given that kind of time frame, the question is, which way does one lean? And I worry because, and we say this a bit in jest, but you see the only other way to change constitution very rapidly is the way that they've been doing it in the past. Which is, you know, we abrogate it today and that's it. We'll write you the new one as we work on that.

All of us disagree that that way works. And it's certainly, you know, extremely detrimental to the economy. I'm sure all of us business people don't like that sort of thing.

So, given that kind of thing, and given that kind of time frame, and given the possibility that maybe I don't know what government's thinking about it, but if the intent were to get it done before the next elections, then is it enough time? Or will it compress? I don't know. I can't answer that. Well, let me have a go at answering each of those.

I think on the first point about representation, the important thing to remember is that if you look at yourselves as a commission, you've been selected for a reason. You don't just represent voting people. You're people of particular skills and experience who bring the ability to think in a more broad way than the general population necessarily do.

Like you, John, I'm actually quite fascinated by the American experiment, and it is still an experiment. Definitely at a low point at the moment, I think, but it's an experiment. And, as you say, the people who framed that Constitution, basically farmers and people of business, but they had clearly read a lot.

You know, they were thought leaders in every sense. And I think what's really important about that is that if we simply say we're going to echo what we hear, the real danger then is that all we're doing is being majoritarian in our thinking. And if you look at every Constitution, it is not reflecting what the majority want.

It must all be built within a framework, basic rule of law principles, fundamental rights and freedoms, things that the majority may not have turned their mind to and may not even want. But these days, you know, we live in a global world where we are expected to adhere to particular standards. Once again, the economy becomes central to that.

So yes, I think it's important that you listen to and try as far as possible to reflect views, but you've got to also, it seems to me, process those. And having listened, apply your own skills and your own personal experience to the outcome. So that's answering that one.

I've forgotten what was number two. Yeah, well, I think, you know, again, I think the same sort of thought process probably goes into that. If we accept, you know, that 50% of the population is unrepresented in Parliament, and there is really no reason for that, then it seems to me that even if the measures are temporary, we should try and do something about that.

And I think undoubtedly improve the quality of representation. Whether it's 20 or not, again, needs possibly just for us to all apply ourselves with a sense of proportionality to that, and of course, mindful of what people have told us, or not told us. But I think that's my response to that.

On the last bit, I think it's really important, you know, reflecting on the GCC or BLV or whatever it is. And, you know, it's interesting, you sort of come back to the American proposition almost. No institution is set in stone.

No institution graduates from being not very good to always being good. And, you know, as they say, you must always, the price of democracy is eternal vigilance, or whatever that phrase is. It's never perfect.

You are never at the point where you say, it's done, we can tick that box, democracy is achieved. I mean, if you look at what's happening in the United States right now, it's just a horror show, you know, in terms of democratic accountability and rule of law. Then one hopes that the US has got the institutional depth to survive it.

But it's the same, I think. We must never, ever treat these institutions as though they are done, they are perfect, the box is ticked. And so for an organization like the GCC or the BLV, again, I don't, granted, you know, I think clearly from what you say, you regard that institution as being at a high point.

But does that always mean that the leadership will be the same? Underneath the current leadership of the institution, is there enough depth and strength to ensure that that body continues to be of that quality? And so I think a lot of it goes back to we can't be majoritarian about how we think about it. Just because 90% of people have said, we want X, doesn't mean that we should deliver X. There's a much broader context in which we all live. And let's face it, in which people are not really focused.

Most of us are not, when you talk about a constitution, there's a lot in it. Really, for the last 55 years, when we've talked about the constitution, most of us have talked about the electoral system. We don't care about anything else.

But there's so much more in a constitution that is important, and to which we've got to turn our minds. So I'm not sure that the popular view is always the answer.

Mr. Valenitabua: It's not that we don't want to hear you any longer, but we're just too tied up in time. We have another Zoom meeting with Dr. Wadan Narsey at 2 o'clock. So we have to set up the Zoom electronics.

You don't mind, do you? Not at all.

Mr. Naidu: I will have to yield to my friend Dr. Narsey. He's got much more experience than me.

But make sure you talk to him about the economy. So we have to stop here. Some of my commissioners also have been sitting here from 9 o'clock without break, one hour after another.

Mr. Valenitabua: They might want to go out for lunch. Please. Thank you very much for coming to share your views with us this morning.

You've taken us on another tangent. Whether it's democratic or not, we don't know. We have to deliberate on that.

Thank you very much. Thank you for listening to me. Could we have a photo taken with you, please?

----------End of Session [6-7-2026]----------

Gmail Constitution Review Commission <commissioners2026@gmail.com>

RE: Mr Richard Naidu - some final thoughts

Richard Naidu <richard.naidu@munroleyslaw.com.fj> Mon, Jul 6, 2026 at 5:03 PM
To: Constitution Review Commission <commissioners2026@gmail.com>
Cc: Sonja Narsimulu <sonja.narsimulu@munroleyslaw.com.fj>

Commissioners

Two matters [related to one another] and arising from Dr Fatiaki's question (to which I forgot to respond) about the viability of implementing a new Constitution before the next general election (even if it were to be delayed for six months for the purpose, which would itself be unconstitutional unless of course approved in a referendum. That measure itself may be unpopular and fail to pass, thereby upending a new Constitution which would otherwise be acceptable).

1. The consideration of those zig-zagging possibilities is probably pointless given that it just would not be possible to draw electoral boundaries for new constituencies within six months. Even a well-resourced country would struggle to achieve this. Fiji is not well-resourced with funds or skills. It must begin this process from a "standing start" with no established boundaries, no processes and no public servants with the necessary experience. It would be necessary to appoint and create an Electoral Boundaries Commission and its secretariat; and to follow constituency boundary-setting processes which are not just mechanical (ie working out the boundaries and roughly equivalent numbers of electors, etc) but also procedural (in that there must be a timeline for publishing proposed boundaries and considering objections, etc). Refer the Electoral Act 1998. That is impossible to do. It is a 12-month process at least.

2. The rush to amend the Constitution appears to be driven by a concern that it is only the current Government that would be willing to do it and any alternative Government would not. The current Government has only itself to blame for not pursuing a timely agenda for constitutional amendment. But, even that aside, the desire for constitutional change must rest on surer footings. It must ultimately come from the people, whichever Government is in power. If the current Government is forced to go back to elections on the current Constitution because it was not efficient enough to achieve a proper process, it will need to promise as an election issue to finish the job - and to hold its opponents either to a similar promise or, if they are unwilling to make it, to campaign against them on that lack of willingness. It is not acceptable to say "we have been slow to reform the constitution so give us another six months in office to finish the job" (and assuming that constituency boundaries are contemplated in a new constitution, it could not achieve that anyway).

Respectfully

Richard Naidu

Partner

Direct Dial: +679 322 1816

MUNRO LEYS

Lawyers & Notaries Public

Pacific House, Butt Street, Box 149 Suva, Fiji

Phone +679 331 4188

Fax +679 330 2672

Web www.munroleyslaw.com

Follow us on Twitter

Find me on LinkedIn

Originals of this email or any attachment will not be mailed unless requested. Please consider the environment before printing this email.

This transmission is intended only for the use of the addressee. It may contain confidential or legally privileged information. If you are not the intended recipient, PLEASE NOTE any use or dissemination of this communication is prohibited and no confidentiality rights or legal professional privilege are hereby waived. If you have received this transmission in error, please notify us immediately by telephone at our cost and destroy and/or delete all hard and soft copy data relating to this transmission. The contents of this email, unless expressly stated, do not comprise the views of, or any representation by, Munro Leys, partners or staff. Munro Leys has active anti-virus measures on its electronic mail system but cannot accept any liability for virus damage suffered by any recipient as a result of this or any transmission to that recipient.

Cybercrime: Because phishing and hacking events are occurring more frequently, please do not act on any communications (from us or otherwise) that asks you to transfer or deposit money above $10,000 without telephoning (on a known or separately verified number) the apparent sender of that communication to confirm authenticity. You may also consider checking for amounts less than this on a case by case basis.

-----Original Appointment-----
From: Richard Naidu
Sent: Monday, 6 July 2026 10:54 am
To: Constitution Review Commission
Cc: Sonja Narsimulu
Subject: Accepted: Mr Richard Naidu - Confirmed via phone 22.06.26
When: Monday, 6 July 2026 12:00 pm-1:00 pm (UTC+12:00) Fiji.
Where: Suvavou House, 414 Victoria Parade, Suva, Fiji; https://meet.google.com/twp-fqeu-gbq

All

This is what I want to talk about (briefly) – in the hope that we can prompt discussion.

PROPOSED TALKING POINTS WITH CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW COMMISSION

Richard Naidu
6 July 2026

1	Introduction • FLS submission • Apted submission • The economy is a key consideration: - social stability - confidence in effective legislative and executive functions - confidence in effective independent institutions
2	The process • You cannot review a constitution in a rush – bad process = bad outcome = lack of credibility = lack of respect = rule of law issues • Commission Report should "permeate" and allow reflection • clearly, a significant portion of the population want the 2013 "out" [even if they don't know what they want "in"] so this will need to be a new document • new draft Constitution should be carefully drafted and made public before Parliamentary debate – MPs must listen • Special Constitutional Select Committee must listen carefully and make appropriate amendments before passage in the House • Referendum is the final step – Govt needs to be confident that it will pass.
3	How to view the 2013 Constitution • a "rush job" with virtually no consultation • tailor-made for those who were then in power: - electoral system cynically driven - unicameral Parliament – "get things done" - control of key institution appointments – judges, constitutional officers – in the hands of the PM and the A-G • we are now paying the price for this – poor governance
4	Should we return to a bi-cameral legislature? • a feature of every constitution except 2013 • the norm in Commonwealth countries (NZ is the standout) • second chamber = "house of review" – but also in Fiji the point where indigenous people's rights were effectively protected • unicameral Parliament and approach to legislation has contributed to the current poor quality of legislation
5	Rights and protections for indigenous people • sensitive issue, needs to be managed: - for indigenous people – belief that elevated constitutional rights will solve every problem (they won't) - for non-indigenous people – a fertile source of grievance ("we are second-class citizens")

	• an appropriate balance is of course possible. It must: - recognise that unnecessarily elevated indigenous rights threaten national unity and economic confidence - ensure that on critical issues – land and other resources, customs and traditions – indigenous people have agency/autonomy/sovereignty [s.28 – the classic mistake] • if we revert to the bi-cameral system and protection structure, we need to think carefully about what bodies should represent the indigenous people – is it necessarily the BLV as currently constituted? Is that a leadership body that is still fit for purpose?
6	Electoral system • current "pure PR" system was a deliberate tactic [see above] and destroys accountable, people-level democracy. People are entitled to an MP • at the same time, Government now is a more complex process than it has ever been in the past. Politics needs to attract: - individuals with specific skills (which may not necessarily include "pure political" skills) - more diverse representation (more representative, but also more effective) • MMP-style system in my view is best – combination of constituency plus "list" candidates will produce a better quality legislature (and Cabinet[1]) • "communal" constituencies were good in their time (pros v cons) – but they have outlived their usefulness now • query whether temporary special measures (TSMs) could be used to improve female representation in Parliament [my view yes].
7	Other matters

[1]A bi-cameral Parliament also improves the "pool" from which the necessary skills can be picked for Cabinet because there is an upper house.

ITaukei Lands Trust Board (ITLTB)

Itaukei Trust Land Board
Date:6-7-2026

Mr Valenitabua: Gentlemen, ladies, we welcome you this morning. Thank you very much for attending before the Constitution Review Commission. The Commission was initially appointed by His Excellency, the President of the country, Ratu Naiqama Lalabalavu, with seven members had to resign due to work commitment.

And there were six of us left. This morning there are five commissioners sitting as the Commission. One member or one commissioner is not present also due to work commitment.

If I may have to introduce those who are here this morning, I'll start from my right. At the far right is Dr. John Fatiaki, well-known medical practitioner. And next to him is Mr. Conway Beck, a well-known architect in Fiji and the Pacific.

My immediate left is Mr. Ami Kohli, a lawyer based in Labasa. And on the far end is Dr. Neelesh Gounder, a lecturer at USP and an economist. He has been used by government in some of the very important strategic planning in relation. And most of you would know me, Sevuloni Valenitabua. I'm the chairperson. We welcome you all.

If you think that I just need to introduce the work of the Commission, we were tasked by His Excellency to review the 2013 Constitution. And one of the tasks also stated in the term of reference is for us to go around the country and get submissions and recommendations from our people on what they think should be included in the amendment to the 2013 Constitution or what should be removed or which laws need to be changed. So we have gone around the country.

We had to separate into two teams in order to cover the whole of Fiji on time. Our timeline was six months. That started in March, and we are to finish on the 31st of August, 2026.

And on that day, 31st of August, we must submit to His Excellency our report, our recommendation, and a draft amended Constitution. So that is what we have been working on. We have heard a lot of things, a lot of submissions from our people on the ground, the lay people complaining about a lot of things, and telling us what we should do and what we should add to the Constitution and what should be removed from the Constitution.

So with you being here today, I will tell you we've had a lot of letters raised in relation to the TLTB. But that aside, here we are talking about our Constitution. And with you here today, we are looking forward to hearing from you what you might suggest would improve the work of the TLTB and also the returns to our landowners.

We are here to listen. We might ask questions later on after the submissions. We might give some comments.

But our primary task this morning is to listen and see how you can assist us with your submissions in relation to the amendment of the 2013 Constitution. With those few words of introduction and welcome, I now pass the mic to you, gentlemen and ladies, and you have the floor to present us your submissions this morning.

Mr. Mata: The honourable chairperson and commissioners. We are here not to complain but to make submissions on the 2013 Constitution Review. On behalf of the Itaukei Land Trust Board, I would like to thank the Constitution Review Commission for the opportunity to present our submission on the review of the 2013 constitution.

We have submitted a written submission earlier and we are privileged to be invited to come and present. TLTB welcomed this review as a rare opportunity for Fiji to reflect on its value and strength and the constitutional framework that will guide this country and its future generations.

Our submission focuses on the protecting native land rights, restoring constitutional safeguards, address injustices, unjust land dealings in the past that existed under the previous Constitution even during the colonial time. And implementing measures to ensure the long-term well-being of indigenous landowners are safeguarded all the time.

Part one is the historical context, why it is very important. It is very important to take some few minutes to say something about the background of land in Fiji. At the outset, the Fijian, spelled F-E-E-J-E-E-A-N named by the Tongan, the Fijian people or Itaukei are the first people of this land, now called Fiji Island.

Abel Tasman had report the first sighting of the islands by white men in 1643, followed by then Captain Cook 100 years later. The arrival of the shipwrecks, beach de-mer, cotton traders, left an invalible mark in Fiji in many ways from commerce land alienation , internal warfares, government and local marriages and other things. The arrival of the Western Mission in 1835, transformed Rerevaka na Kalou worship to a new life promising eternal life after of early life being Jesus Christ, The Son of God, Jehovah The Son of Abraham, Issac and Jacob. It was a instilled the God of Fiji.

The event of theChrist in the Chiefly household in the Vanua, Kubuna, Burebasaga, Tovata has profound impacts and shaped social, economic, political landscape throughout the Islands. They first brought education to Fiji and first new schools, they set up the first system of law in Fiji in 1847 the rules for civil government to enforce Christian morales. Emphatically, TLTB wishes to state that we are, all of us here without exception in this room and in this country because our forefathers acknowledged Jesus Christ as their Lord and Savior. The God and the fear of God and honour the King. That God is Jesus Christ which is still the logo of the Government, previous government and the present government.

The establishment of the Tovata confederacy led by Ma'afu in 1867 and the Cakobau government 1871 – 1874 led by Ratu Cakobau as King of Fiji under the Kingdom of Fiji set the first forms of governments in Fiji.

Government excursions, incursions, were umbered and becoming affect. The King of Fiji Ratu Cakobau as a government has its own ramifications, it made accountable the American debt, looting. French and German commercial interests, Tongan influence, endless pressure, protections of our property, law and order and supply of labour.

So, Fiji was ceded to Great Britain in 1874 to preserve indigenous Fijians rights to lands needed for their future support and maintenance. This instrument became the foundation of land protection policies in Fiji. In 1875 Land claims commission was set to investigate land claims, opposition, alienation and ownership it completed its work in 1879.

In 1880, the native lands and fisheries commission was et up for the first time to investigate claims from the interior landowners and to solve disputes over land ownership, boundaries and fishing rights. The commission maintains the native register of land also known as the 'Vola ni kawabula' which records all indigenous entitled to communal land owners. In 1876, 2 years after Deed of Cession, the Bose Levu Vakaturaga was established primarily to advise the colonial government on native affairs. On May 14, 1879 the Leonidas arrived with the first lot of Girmitiya followed by 42 ships making 87 voyage altogether bringing a total of 60,553 Indians to work in the cane field. It ended in 1916 and 40,000 returned the rest remained. In 1905, 1908 Governor Ian Thurn reopened land sales of which 42,000 acres of rice land was sold. Not including the 2 999 leases in Toko and Mocemoce, Tavua.There were two 999 leases one still exists today.

In 1940, World War I broke out our men served as labor corps, it ended in 1980. Ratu Sukuna crosses the English channel to join the French Foreign Legion and got wounded. Blood was shed and eventually 179 lives were lost. In 1936 after consulting almost all chiefs and natives in their villages by Ratu Sukuna, the Bose Vakaturaga agreed to set up a body to look after their land in their land in their best interest in what was described as an unmatched leap of faith.

In 1940, The Native Land Trust Board was finally set up under The Native Land Trust Ordinance, transferring administrative native lands from the commissioner of lands to TLTB. All the lands were administered by the Commissioner of Lands, by the State until 1940.

In 1970 Fiji received it's..In 1945 World War 2 broke out. Fiji entered the defence at the Japanese expansion in the Solomon, at the Guadalcanal Fijian blood was shed and lives lost. Decoration of valor was awarded to a man with a Victoria cross, firstly awared to Sukanaivalu.

In 1957, Fiji went to Malaya to stop the Malaysian excursion. In 1970, Fiji received its instrument of independence, resources were returned. Only the land, not qoliqoli and minerals.

We have four constitutions now 1970, 1990, 1997 and 2013. After all this we have 223 Itaukei Landing units have no land in this country or registered as natives who lost their land as a conjugate of historical migration, land opposition, alienation, subsequent land transfer and the policies.

Now I go on to the actual areas of amendment. TLTB Constitutional Mandate. The Itaukei Land Trust Act provides that all land is vested and administered by the TLTB for the benefit of the Itaukei owners.The Board has statutory responsibility for administration and amendment of Itaukei land, distribution of invest trust fund for the benefit of land owners.

TLTB submission is therefore, made in discharge of its statutory responsibilities and protect the interest of the itaukei land owners.

Our proposal one, ownership of minerals. Section 30 on the constitution provides all minerals in or under the land or water belong to the state. This is reflected in the Mining Act. TLTB submission, TLTB submits that the concept of absolute proprietorship guarantee under article 4 of the Deed of Cession includes ownership rights to all minerals and subsurface resources.

The current legal framework originates from colonial money policy that its own mineral policies to the state or the crown, rather than to the land owners.Some countries in the commonwealth are freeing up mineral right owners to the owners of the land.

Proposal 2.
Reasons for change. First, Fiji has ordered recognized Lemoniest, interesting mental resources, through the fascia of mineralities. The payment of politics acknowledge that the landowners have legitimate proprietary interest in those resources. Second, returning mirror ownerships, and I, with the internal studies, principles.

Reflected in the United Nations declarations on rights of indigenous people, and proposed rights of indigenous people, 2025. Good, comparable jurisdiction, such as the United States, Canada, and South Africa, have increasingly recognized indigenous ownership of land, sub service, resources. Recommendation, tell TV, recommends, amendment of sexuality, recognitions of mental ownership, rights, for it to kill, owners, consequential amendments, to the manic, state land, and petroleum. legislation.

Proposal 2, the reversion of land acquired for public purpose. Current position, land may lawfully be acquired by the state for public purpose and existing legislation.

Section 8 of the state, Land Act, already knows Land, previously, previously, acquired for public purposes, to be reverted to iTaukei ownership, and is no longer required.

Historical impact

Historical resulted in 206 native crowns. Approximately 42, 440 ha of from itaukei lands, or transferred from Indian's ownership. These historical activists remain a source of criminals among criminals. It has never disappeared.

Progress to date, TLTB has facilitated allocation of schedule A, and schedule B lands to estimate limits that has been completed.

Processing of reversion, claims of state freehold lands, submissions of 17 reversion, cases of common. For government consideration. These 17 vessels of land were, I support, very questionable circumstances, or a few pounds of ceiling, or in exchange of gift.

But this light at the end of the tunnel, you usually have Saru water catchment. being reverted to the landowners, and also the Nadala, in Nadarivatu. Previously, also part of the Nadi airport were reported on the same programs, but 70 remains today. Recommendation till TV submits that Orleans acquired by the State for Public Poopers, and no longer require, those pupils will reboot, to their respectively, billion honors. It must be admitted through TLTB.

Proposal 3, the completion of section 395 of the Constitution. Section 29[5] provides that freehold remains freehold, even when sold or transferred, unless sold to the state. Till TV show me that this provision frustrates, legitimate, land reverse efforts, and prevents some heat okay land from being restored to real regional status.

The Momi Land swab arrangement demonstrates how sex, 1595, can feed the restoration of hand rakes. to completion. of agreed, and exchange

Recommendation, TLTB, therefore recommend that Section 395 be deleted from the Constitution. Proposal full, entrenchment of legislation affecting it, okay, interest. Under the 1970, 1990, and 1997, institution. Legislation affecting Itaukei and Institution. What Constitutionally protected through intent, provision, is included, either kill and act. It will be itaukei.. Agriculture, analog, tenant, act.

The 2000 Constitution removed these protections along significant amendments to the ordinary parliamentary process. This amendment commonly referred to as. Build something as an example. Recommendation, TLTB recommends... retrenchment of legislating effect, it is, with the exception of Alta.

Every quarter, parliamentary, majority, for amendments, I mean, data consultation, with the Ministry of itaukei Affairs, Great Council of chiefs, and TLTB, before any amendments. German and, uh, business approaching remarks.

But it keeps it is not educating for Christian states. We are not saying that. We feel the Constitution should acknowledge, in each preamble, the historical rule of Christianity and modernizing this country.

TLTB respects, respectfully, submits that the mineral ownership rights should be turned to Itaukei, their ownership, then acquired for public purpose, and no longer required to revert to the original owners. Section 1095 should be removed. Loss affecting Itaukei interest and land should once again, be constitutionally intense, laws, injuring, it took a prosperity, must be removed, or reviewed, such as alter, rivers, and streamed act, surfing act, mineral act, et cetera.

Well, the Itaukei is far more than economic resource. It is the garden given inheritance. It is a foundation of identity, culture, heritage, and intergenerational well-being. The constitution should, therefore, provide. The highest level of protection to itaukei and rights, and the institution establish to save Captain. The itaukei remains marginalized economically. Only with limited finance, with very limited financial access. We can elaborate more than... The new constitution must not be rigid, but be flexible to remove injustices, and just learn laws, and then elimination. Leave your capable tendencies, and hands, set wealth, and prosperity. And most of all, as Christ is the cornerstone of this country. Thank you, Chairman and the Commissioners.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you Mr. Nata. Like I said, normally, we ask commissioners whether they have any questions to ask or comments to make. I will now ask the commissioners if they have any comments to make in relation to the submission which we have heard or the solution. which we end this one.

Well, I guess I will have to start it off. Freehold land. I'm hearing... that, uh, section 29 [5] of the Constitution is to be removed. Yeah, that is a provision. which is... not acceptable to the majority of people. 29, 5, which in relation to the freehold land. We've had complaints. We have heard submissions and our complaints, submissions from around the country. about free home land, they won fame, for their land back lands, which were given the CSR lands, which were purchased, and, you know, circumstances, which were a question about, as you have stated, Mr. Nata, we thank you at GLTB, for suggesting to us this morning. that section 29[5]. Uh, 29, subsection five, is to be removed.

It was surprising. that... that provision was put in the Bill of 2013 Constitution, when we had lands in Nausori, and a lands in Western Nadi, Lautoka, Nadroga, which were given for sugar planting. .As native grants were then changed to freehold land, under the 2013 Constitution, stopping abruptly the cases that were being filed by land owners to try and get this freehold lands back. to their ownership.

So, I thank the TLTB for that.

Mr. Nata: Uh, gentlemen, let me... Thank you. What do you say? Then that we'll purchase properly the Taukei. It's okay. We are not saying that. We have evidence, this land will not purchase properly. That's what we say. See, for the people of us mobile, People of Suvavou that piece of land that was not that piece of land, that was not, uh... a few transactions records issue.

That piece of land from, uh...Nasinu Tax Free Zone to the cemetery. What we are saying that land was not purchased That's the land that we are after. Then were purchased properly. We don't have any issue, is it? Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you for that gratification. Would that include? The lands that were given, uh, taken by the state and given to CSR, for example, like the West, for sugarcane planting. Would that include that?

Mr. Nata: Some of the land were taken by the police in the first company that stopped positioning the police. And that was the first one. And eventually, they focus on the soap and nature. Then, uh... our position is like this. The government should hold the land and give it back to them. to the native owners. The government should not hold it, only for public purpose. Now, all those letters been useful, economic books. Chief was the one in... In, Naitasiri is even known as club, the name of the village.

It was taken by these companies and given to the government. that the government should hold it and give it back to them. And even the 10 sections of a 400 or 500 pounds is still questionable. The record says it was never received. But it's okay at the time. That's what we say. We will, quite properly, same, we have no issue. Mr. Beg?

Mr.Beg: Follow up question now. Mr. Nata thank you for your presentation. Very important essence of landlords, aren't we? Just a follow up question on chairs, cushion. How do you propose these macros be, you say? These matters it freeze. Have you proposed the result? to allow it in the Constitution, in my concluding Remix, the Constitution, like what we are facing now, the experience we're facing now. Getting people, please look at this, the Constitution does not row it. \

\

Can you look at the position? Once you do it, then you can set up, easily set up, a commission. Pervert to the slim to the owners, the security of the tenants or whatever, on the lane, still lane, and people, yeah, or state leases. Remain esthetic. Aren't it expired? Then we refer to Italy. It remained there. We did that for crunch usually. We completed that process. Almost 300 acres of land water. All the tenants are still there. renewed to them, whether residents of Africans are accepted. Thank you very much. Thank you.

In some of this land, the landowners are... And this thing will never go away, we'll never go away. I started work in 1984. It was a main issue. Yeah, point taken. That's one of the reasons why... we have to reflect on the points that you've raised, uh, completely arguments, and there's a commission, I think, we have to sit down, and because it's a lot lousy, then we share about a commission, and look at all those clips, at least close the current generation to contribute into that. Process. Thank you. Talk to them? Yeah, good.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Mr. Nata and colleagues from the ITL TV. Thank you for your submission this morning. Thank you also for the very detailed details submission that you sent us, Al. It came as an opportunity to go through.

Just on your point about the section 29[5], such a provision might create the risk to our freehold, I guess, I'll be guided by a lawyer colleague as well. So, it'll be a difficult balancing act, because as you, I'm sure, very well aware, land is the most important collector in any country. And it's the financial sector. Uh, depends on collaterals as is lending mechanism. So, we have to be very careful in terms of not create the expropriation risk from government because expropriation risk can be really serious economic risk and can have the huge impact of all economic development in achieving economic outcomes.

So how do you propose the argument around not purchase properly? Because one argument is that at that time, that was the value of the land. And now, do we want to go back and change the value, reassess the value of that land at the time when it was bought and sold? Is that what you're suggesting?

Mr. Nata: We can work out some form of... But what I'm seeing is all the land that we are trying to is understate. private... Another private owner

Dr. Gounder: Okay. So, you were very clear, those parcels of land that you mentioned here are not used for private purposes, and there hasn't been any significant investment by private individuals into those parcels that you're talking about in the submission.

Mr. Nata: ll this piece of land state? Okay. There's one, uh, 3000 acres a week. It's taken by, there's a policy, policy by the government. If there are too few, we'll take you and join the other. Bigger before we take your land today. But those people still alive. And they're not going to claim their piece of land. This kind of thing, uh, It will never go away. You just say it. You'll never go away. Unless... addressed with some form of, uh, return it, or some form of proper. on veggies.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Chairman. I just have one quick question. Mr. Nata, since I think TLTB is a very important institutional arrangement we have in Fiji for protection of engineers, land, et cetera, and it must be strengthened. At the same time, we have received around the country, and the rights of housing and access to land, especially in non-itaukei community, who don't have a place to stay, you know, they don't have security of Tenure. So, what role do you think in the broader sphere of things? TLTB can play a role ensuring that minority communities have access to land as well. And going back to your original vision of TLTB, you know, to play a role in making sure that land is accessible and available for development of our country, which was the vision of Ratu Sukuna, for example. Thank you.

Mr. Nata: Thank you. Yes, that's very important. See, the vision of Ratu sukuna was that story of the purple, the tally, the pieces of land. While doing that, make sure that you see we have right now 55,000 pieces of land. Land is an important Labour. You can afford it, you come.

See, we have right now 55,000 pieces. $55, this is, yeah, pregnant. And it's our contribution to this country. Landowners' contribution to the economy of this country, or aspect of social economic life. We try our best to provide for everyone, because we are the biggest... We are very mindful of our road. Then it's an important effect of protection, apart from labor and capital. Land is very important. That's how we have demonstrated our commitment to the socio-economic development of... We continue to renew leases. Everybody, I mean, anyone who want to, this land can come to us. We give them the offer. They said they do much, then they run away. You can afford it. You don't come here, and then you said it's too much, this, and then... Yeah, we are always there to... to facilitate anyone.

Dr. Fatiaki: Thank you, Mr. Nata and Colleagues. Uh, appreciate, uh, your comments. I just want to reflect on two things. And this is not very necessarily specific. But in one of our consultations, somebody brought up one of those 999-year leases. I think you alluded to the fact that there were two, and that one is currently current.

I think on reflecting upon that, obviously, the idea that anybody can give a 1,000-year lease, I thought he made a mistake with the 99. And that it is still legal is an issue that, I guess, as commissioners, we will sit and reflect on that. and see whether the supreme law of the land can address that in a way that, will say, brings justice, but maybe addresses that aspect of it, because I think any person in their right mind will consider a 999-year lease, maybe inappropriate. unjustified. unfair, and I think, like I say, we will be discussing that, to see how we might make it in a way that there is some degree of justice, of heareness, that is reached at in respect of that particular one.

I have to say, though, that almost every consultation that we have been to throughout Fiji, uh, is this uh, echoing that keeps coming back in respect of Qele, uh, qoliqoli the mineral resources, it's very blunt, straight to us, which is, give us back our land. Give us back our land qoliqoli, give us back everything. To us, the customer landowners.

Now, I'm not gonna suggest that we have an answer to understanding it. I guess it's just in the way of a reflection. for you, because you are the custodians of the trust. And if we are hearing this from the people, telling us that they want it back with them, not with TLTB, not with lands department.

What the people of Fiji are telling us that we are hearing, and we ask them questions to try and clarify that they understand, and they're very clear that they want their land back. I guess my reflection is that we all have to think about how this operates at the level of a nation, the role, important role, the TLTB plays.

But maybe, in reflection, we need to ask ourselves whether the role of TLTB, as envisaged, and set up by Ratu Sukuna in 1940. may not be as appropriate. in 2026. Because, obviously, people are a lot more educated, they feel much more confident, they are aware of land, way land is dealt with in countries abroad.

Many of them have traveled abroad, and they bring this to us. We will wrestle with this, because the future, the country, in terms of, as you've heard, land resources, access to land is an important component. Major industries rely on it. You have a role to safeguard the interests of the landowners, but I'm not talking about the unique, small, freehold slots and things. I'm talking about... all the rest of the land.

And I'm not sure what the reason for that is, whether it's something that maybe TLTB needs to reflect on and ask themselves whether they serve the purpose, that it was set up for in 2026, modernized and reviewed, so that the landowners are happy. I think the idea is to have everybody happy. The country happy, TLTB happy, and the landowners happy. Unfortunately, the impression I've gotten, having been to many, many villages throughout Fiji, is this very, very unhappy landowner.

And so, I just say that in the form of reflection, we will need to discuss this in great detail. Obviously, we're talking about our country, and not just particular plots of land. I just wanted to share that because that was something, and we're at the end of our consultations now. This is a sensation, and it's spoken about quite passionately, and people feel very strongly about him. I just thought I'd share that with you. That isn't the question, per se. That's more just a reflection of some of the things we've heard. Firstly, in respect of that 999-year lease, and how we might need to seek some justification as to how we can keep it going. or how we may find the middle ground that is suitable to everybody, and then secondly, is the issue of the, this request from the landowners.

We don't know how we would do that in our current setting, and we are concerned that, obviously, if it's put into the Constitution, then everything else under its subservient legislation will have to comply. We want to be very careful with that. But I thought I would just share that with you. You know, just in terms of your special role as guardians of the trust. of native land. Thank you.

Mr. Nata: Chairman, can I comment to the... Please, please do. First of all, the 999, Toko, and is, they were two is within Fiji, and it's not an accident, it was deliberate, it was a common policy. It also, the same governor, I think, also introduced it in Africa. I went there, I got a shock, and I saw the 999, everywhere. The large challenge of 100 acres of land. So, it was not deliberate, it was the policy at that time. What we were just saying is, do, just make it fair. The leased itself, it's like, does not allow liquor, does not allow cutting trees. It's like reservation list. That's not about things like that, right?

You know, around 26, uh, sub least, Nadawa. And, uh... What do you see? And the rent is very, very low. Very, very low. I think it's around $200 or something like that, or... So that 700 acres... And under that single triple 9, we have around 25, 964, 66.

The issue here, we just want it to be equitable to the Landowner. The law of this country, say, 99. Yes, 199, the maximum. But this is the modern, modern era. landowner complaining, they're not receiving any fair return.

Out of the 26, 300 other houses other on the land. So, it's not fair. So what we are proposing, to give each one of them double nine places. 99, each for the 300, plus the 26. The government was willing to assist, and we were willing to...

Then they took us to court. We were acting, we demonstrated, we act in good faith, bringing in the stakeholders, the government, landowners, tenants, and talk to them. But eventually, I think, uh, they were influenced by an elephant, they took us court, to remove that injunction, then now, still in court. because of the breach. What you're saying, that we have an indivisible title, it's okay.

What we are saying ? The indefensibility of title does not protect... Injustice, unfair, elicitable, written to the Landowners. That's what we see. We just want to make it, to break it up, given individual 99, government is willing to pay. But, of course, we will need to pay part of the house, every issue.

And that 300 house, nobody knows. We are not aware, and they have private dealings amongst them, and they are complaining to us and the landowners.

On the second issue, the qoliqoli Uh, depends. You will be managing the qoliqoli.... So, that's the first step, in terms of minerals, and putting the problem with us. We issued surface leases. For the one in Tuvatu what we issue, a surface list... for line one.

On the... on the TLTB road into the future, like you said. Let me state it very clearly here. We are here for our role. as envisioned by the lake. You go to lease a piece of blood, you go to one, because I'm going to, 10, 200 meters. Just look at Solomon, Vanuatu The investment auto security, to families, and to anybody. That's the story.

Even here, internally, some of the reserrve land, they use it for on purpose. You look at the spotters. Just look at the spot, just look at the problems, rising from the squad. And now you... We still have a majority support problem, you know landowners 80%.we are, vocal, we know. But we have to maintain opposition. We are important factor of the economy, land.

And when you deal with land, you have to go to one. People can talk, but you have to look, in a very mature and amazing way for this country. Now, in the country. It's very hard to have a united, only unit. Very, very different. Good. And the other, another issue. I mean, we set up the trustees. We had trustees. We set up the trustees, to empower them, capacity, to manage their fates. It's also very difficult till now. Trust, this can change. In the air, I can change three times. Maybe some of them are talking to you. Because in terms of internal dickering obligations,

In the other important part, in terms of we, this is a area that we normally close. We encourage investments. As opposed to consumption. The rate of... It's quite very high, very, very high. The savings are very, very low, compared to our Indian, and to our brothers, the other ethnic, complete the opposite. I'm not telling you; you know, I'm telling to everybody. Investment is very low. Part of them is mindset, attitude by all of us to help them. And the other one is the financial access.

Of the 600 tree, Itaukei. Maybe 100, Bank Account. The remaining have no idea. It's what we do, you know. Financial access. All these commercial bills are very difficult for them to access. So, once we touch that 500 people, and bankable, people believe there is some hope for raising their living standards. It's one of the main issues.

It's not been seriously considered by the government or anything. anybody else This is what I want of attacking to live with that 500 people. You can drive them or encourage them to commerce without the financial assistance.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you, Mr. Nata, the team. One of our teams of reference requires us to address protecting, guaranteeing, and securing, under the Constitution, laid and fishing rights and resources, of indigenous Fijians and Rotuman's. And assuring that registered owners of native lands and customary fishing rights have an equitable share of the income derived from the exploitation of the resources beneath and above the surface of their land.

The seabed, framers, etc. It's a common complaint, if you receive from people, they are not getting, they also issue a riding, people saying that should revert to them.

If I may just ask you, your assistant, tell me this. If we have in the Constitution a clause, which says, At the moment, you have a provision in the ITLTB Act, section 13. Any dealing with either equivalent, you must concentrate, rather buy a transfer lease, etc., any dealing. So, daily is very wide. There is a simple registration that can be changed anytime. However, I feel in the Constitution, you have a provision which says, If you are dealing with any itaukei land, apart from ITLTB, you must have 30, 75% of consent of the Great Council of Chiefs.

So, they represent all 40 provinces. So, if dealing with any Itaukei Land Qoliqoli, etc., not only ITLTB, but they have a set that level to say, Yes, we agree to this. We don't agree to that. Do you think it might assist or not?

Mr. Nata: Not really clear with your question.

Mr. Kohli: The question is, at the moment, if you want to deal with ITLT Bland, there is a provision in ITLTB Act, Section 18, which says that it must have the consent of ITL TB before you deal. which is equivalent to section 12 or B, state land act.

So, what I'm trying to say is that, if you have a protection in the Constitution, we specifically lay out that when you are dealing with it, okay, land, you must have not only the consent of the ITLTB, but also 75% of the representatives of the Great Council of Chiefs. because they represent all 14 provinces in Fiji.

So, overlapping qoliqoqli issues, et c, can be addressed there before this legislated upon.

Mr. Nata: So, what, in terms of this, I think section 12, right? Section 12, for us, we consent to any deal mortgage transfer or whatever. So, what you're saying is that the qoliqoqli to be consented by the Great Council Of Chiefs.

Mr. Kohli: Everything, resources... Everything, resources, and qoliqoli, they have to discuss amongst helpers that August body, and then say, yes. Whether it's with Macuata, if he is Nadi they will sit down they consult, discuss, they construct with itaukei owners, and say, Look, this is in their interest. Yes, we approve. We don't approve.

Mr. Nata: Well, this, uh, need to be discussed. We also have a close relationship with GCC. Uh, there's only about 400 something, 410 qoliqoqli in Fiji, only 410. So, for us, is very easy to administer It's just like, managing leases. You know, qoliqoli we can subdivide. Okay, you take this one for commercial purpose, whatever.

In terms of consent, we have no issue with the consent. So, if you agree consultations, most of these, qoliqoli are registered under the chiefs but the owners are much, much more than the customary land. You have about 7,740. Mataqali unit and 410 qoliqoli units. We have no issue.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Nata, just one more question. We heard submissions here from Indo Fijian friend. He told us that the return leases are insufficient for the landowners. Native police status. And he suggested to us, in order for the landowners to get fair returns, under Section 29, [4] of the Constitution. Why don't we assist the lease returns according to the market value of the land? And not UCV. What is the TLTB's position in the relationship?

Mr. Nata: If it's part of our submission, right? Our written submissions, very clear, that's what we're saying is to abolish Alta, or review Alta? Alta, interns, legislation with a native language. In the 1917, 1990, 1997. No longer. under the 2013 Constitution, eh?

What we are saying that... if you repeal, you all come under the market... market, like us taukei trust act Commercial market all the state land usage. But after, if you look at our lease portfolio of 55,000, I think one third are under Alta ... and the Lowest rent, is what they say.

Out of the 55,000, one of that is the agriculture lease with the lowest rent, the highest in arrears. That's why the landowners are not really happy with alta. What we see, it should come under the Alta, TLTB under TLTB Act the state agriculture lease is to go to the State Land, Act.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you so much gentlemen's. We have to bring this consultation session to close. We've got another submitter waiting outside. We thank you very much for the submissions. We received your written submissions about three weeks ago. Now, with the oral submissions done, we will deliberate on those submissions. When we sit down to do so.

----------End of Session [6-7-2026] ----------

iTAUKEI LAND TRUST BOARD

HEAD OFFICE

Please Address All Correspondence
To The Chief Executive Officer

431 Victoria Parade, GPO Box 116, SUVA, Fiji Islands
Tel: (679) 331 2733 Fax: (679) 331 2014 Email: info@tltb.com.fj
Web: www.tltb.com.fj

ITAUKEI LAND TRUST BOARD

FIJI BUSINESS EXCELLENCE AWARDS

18 June 2026

The Constitutional Review Commission
Level 9 Suvavou House
Victoria Parade
SUVA

SUBMISSIONS OF THE iTAUKEI LAND TRUST BOARD ON THE REVIEW OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE REPUBLIC OF FIJI 2013

INTRODUCTION

1. The iTaukei Land Trust Board ("TLTB") welcomes the decision of the Government of the Republic of Fiji to undertake a comprehensive review of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013 ("the 2013 Constitution").

2. A review of this nature and magnitude is rare, and gives the nation the opportunity to pause, to reflect on what its values are, and to write those values into the foundational document that will govern its people for generations to come. For this reason, TLTB is grateful for the opportunity to participate in the Constitution review process.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

3. Set out below is an executive summary of the key Constitutional positions advanced by TLTB:

   (i) The 2013 Constitution must explicitly recognise the iTaukei as the first settlers and original customary landowners of Fiji, grounded in historical accounts, continuous occupation, and the legal affirmation contained in the Deed of Cession 1874. Such recognition is essential not only as a matter of historical accuracy but also as a constitutional acknowledgment of the unique relationship between the iTaukei people and their land, which underpins their identity, culture, and social structure.

   (ii) The 2013 Constitution should further acknowledge the profound and enduring influence of Christian missionaries since their arrival in 1835, particularly their role in shaping Fiji's moral, educational, and governance foundations. This recognition should be reflected in the 2013 Constitution's Preamble as a statement of historical fact.

(iii) The constitutional review process should serve as a mechanism to address longstanding injustices in land ownership arising from colonial and post-colonial legal frameworks. These include inequitable land alienations, the creation of landless iTaukei units, and the imposition of long-term leases that have deprived landowners of fair economic returns. The 2013 Constitution must provide a pathway for restorative justice and equitable redress to ensure that iTaukei landowners can fully benefit from their land.

(iv) The 2013 Constitution should restore and recognise the full spectrum of iTaukei proprietary rights to their land, extending beyond surface ownership to include natural resources such as minerals, qoliqoli, foreshore areas, riverbeds, and other associated resources. This restoration aligns with the original concept of "absolute proprietorship" and is essential for meaningful economic empowerment. At the same time, the principle that iTaukei land should not be permanently alienated must be reaffirmed, ensuring its preservation for future generations.

(v) Finally, the Constitution should enable the reform and reversal of outdated and inequitable laws and policies that have undermined iTaukei land rights, including aspects of the iTaukei Land Trust Act 1940 ("TLTA") (in particular section 36(2) to unravels the inequities resulting from the Toko 999-year lease, as will be discussed in detail below) and regulations, Agricultural Landlord and Tenant Act ("ALTA"), Rivers and Streams Act 1880, and other laws enacted without landowner consent. It should also provide clear mechanisms for the reversion of lands no longer required for public purposes and remove constitutional barriers to such reversion. In addition, key legislation protecting iTaukei land and institutions should be constitutionally entrenched, requiring a heightened threshold for amendment and meaningful consultation with iTaukei stakeholders.

4. Together, the measures above seek to establish a constitutional framework that not only protects iTaukei land ownership in form, but also restores its substance—ensuring justice, equity, and sustainable prosperity for present and future generations.

FIJI'S PRE-COLONIAL HISTORY, COLONIAL GOVERNANCE, DEVELOPMENT OF NATIVE LAND POLICY AND THE CREATION OF THE NATIVE LAND TRUST BOARD

5. In setting out TLTB's submissions on the areas of review of the 2013 Constitution, it would be instructive to first set out from the perspective of TLTB Fiji's storied history and developments in its land policy.

6. The story of the origin of the iTaukei people has been linked by tradition to Lutunasobasoba who arrived in Fiji aboard the Kaunitoni and landing in Vuda. Lutunasobasoba and his family travelled inland in search of land to settle until reaching the Nakauvadra mountains. It is from there that, as the story goes, the tribes of Fiji trace their descent.

7. Early anthropological studies show native Fijians to be warlike and who were constantly in a state of hostilities. The British colonial administrator A.B. Brewster stated of the Fijian in his book "The Hill Tribes of Fiji" as follows:

> They harried and chased each other, frequently burning villages, which was speedily replaced by others...The impression of my mind after some study of their legends and folklore stories is that life in the hills in the olden times was like a huge game of hide-and-seek.

8. The same instability in inter-tribal affairs was reflected as well in the attitudes to land. Continued occupation and surrender of land were a feature of all yavusa histories throughout Fiji.

9. There were also very diverse land tenue practices throughout Fiji. In the Central and Eastern Viti Levu there were greater instances of collective ownership of land which reflected a more egalitarian social structure. This was in contrast with the Eastern side of Fiji which was more stratified. This entailed individual ownership of land by chiefs, who were able to sell it off (as they did during European contract) as they wished.

10. The first European explorer to sight the islands of Fiji was the Dutch explorer Abel Tasman in 1643 during one of his Pacific voyages. Captain James Cook passed through the islands more than a 100 year later in 1774, and then in 1789 and 1792 Captain William Bligh sailed though and mapped parts of the Fiji Islands.

11. While the European explorers mapped the islands of Fiji; they did not establish settlements. However, shipwrecked sailors and runaway convicts from Australia, who were often called beachcombers, became the first white men to live amongst the Fijians.

12. Beachcombers introduced firearms, which effectively changed the dynamics of power, giving rise to powerful warlords and chiefdoms. Beachcombers positioned themselves in the service of chiefs and largely conformed to the Fijian culture and local customs in order to maintain good relations with the chiefs and locals.

13. On the other hand, the later arrival of the Christian missionaries in 1835 saw the first attempt by the "white men" at deliberately influencing and changing the customs of the Fijians. With the advent of Christianity, heathen practices such as ritual cannibalism, infanticide, widow strangling and live burials of relatives were stamped out. The missionaries also actively sought to replace the gods and deities of old with the Christian God and supplant the pagan practices and customs of the various places to which the missionaries were sent with Christian morals.

14. As more and more Fijian chiefs embraced Christianity, facets of culture began to change – from dress as well as to education. Of note was the translation of the Bible and hymns into the Fijian language i.e. the Bauan dialect. This ensured the preservation of the Fijian language and the introduction of writing.

15. With the Christian influence, the missionaries saw to it that a system of laws to enforce Christian morals were established. In 1847 "rules for civil government" were drawn up in Viwa by the missionaries which ensured that the code of civil regulation was based on Christian principles.

16. Commercial agriculture (as opposed to solely subsistence agriculture) in Fiji was first introduced by the resident beachcombers, traders as well as missionaries. Land now had an entirely new value as property – an economic value which saw land being sold and bought by the native Fijians and white planters.

17. Land was acquired directly from chiefs in exchange for guns, ammunition, and whiskey. Large parcels of land were thus alienated for meagre consideration, which, in historical hindsight, were unjust and inequitable.

18. The first attempt at the establishment of a native government occurred in 1865 when British Consul Smith invited the chiefs of seven "matanitu" to meet in Levuka with a view to discussing matters which affected the Fijian people, As a result of the meeting, a Confederation of Chiefs was formed which purported to act as a central government for the Fijians. The Confederation was to meet annually to review and pass laws that would apply to the whole of Fiji.

19. For the British, this made it possible for the British government to pass treaties with the Confederation that would be binding on the whole of Fiji. This would further extend the power of the British consuls from just British subjects living in Fiji to the native Fijians themselves. The Bauan chief Ratu Seru Cakobau was the first president of the Confederation.

20. Examples of other native governments that sprung up in various parts of Fiji included the Government of Bua (which had links with Tonga) and the Kingdom of Bau. These governments adopted procedures that resembled informal democracies with laws being passed with the approval of the majority. The chiefs, though, retained the right of veto. Laws that were passed included those in relation to land. In fact, the earliest measures to regulate the sale of land were passed by the Buan Government in 1866. Each government even had their own flags.

21. In the meantime, the Tongan chief Enele Ma'afu established government in the Lau group with the assent of the Tui Nayau, after conquering the Moala group, and being granted rights of levy over Vanuabalavu by the Tui Cakau. Ma'afu took up residence in Sawana, Vanuabalavu and from there extended his influence throughout Vanua Levu through allegiances and important wins in battle.

22. At the time of the first attempt at cession to Great Britain, Ma'afu was the most powerful in the North and Eastern part of Fiji. He continued to consolidate power, and after the first attempt at cession to Great Britain was unsuccessful, Ma'afu successfully united the provinces of Vanua Levu and Lau, thereby creating the Tovata Confederation. The confederation was created in 1867 to further their mutual interests and to break away from the Confederation of Chiefs created by Consul Smith in 1865.

23. The white population, on the other hand, we not content to submit to the authority of the assemblies of Fijian chiefs and they pushed for the creation of a "properly constituted government" in order to protect European interests and effectively supersede native governments already in place.

24. In 1871, Ratu Cakobau set up his government and garnered the support of the white settlers by promising to protect their interests, especially in relation to land and preservation of property rights. Ratu Cakobau pledged to adopt measures for adjustment to titles to land, management of public lands and the protection of European settlers and their property.

25. The royal flag adopted by Ratu Cakobau for his Government had a white field bearing a white dove on a red shield surmounted by a crown. Below the shield was a scroll bearing the country's motto; REREVAKA NA KALOU KA DOKA NA TUI (Fear God and honour the King).

26. Under the Cakobau government, measures were put in place for the demarcation of lands that the chiefs should need and therefore divide among themselves, and the surplus of which would be public lands to be made available for leasing. These policies were, of course, designed for the benefit of European settlers.

27. Being recognised as the chief of Fiji, Ratu Cakobau was made responsible for the affairs, and mishaps of his Fijian subjects. One such mishap was the burning and looting of the estate of the US consul John Williams in Nukulau Island. Ratu Cakobau was made responsible for the debt – to be paid under penalty of retribution by the US Navy. This, of course, was the catalyst of a sequence of events which ultimately led to the second offer of cession of Fiji to Great Britain being accepted.

28. The Deed of Cession on 10th October 1874, made Fiji a Colony of Her Majesty Queen Victoria of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The historic document granted full sovereignty over the Fijian colony. However, Article 4 of the Deed of Cession preserved the rights of the indigenous Fijians to their lands, including those lands in their current occupation and use, as well as those lands required for future support or maintenance.

29. In 1875, the Native Lands Transfer Prohibition Ordinance No. VI was enacted, prohibiting all land sales and transactions. After halting all land sales, the colonial administration, led by Governor Sir Arthur Gordon, enacted the Land Claims Ordinance in 1876. The Ordinance established the Land Sales Commission, whose responsibility was to enquire into and investigate all land sales prior and up to Cession. All validated claims were issued with a Crown Grant. A total of 1,582 Crown Grants covering an area of 152,815 hectares thus became "freehold land". Some of the Crown Grants were later purchased or acquired by the State. These became known as State Freehold Lands.

30. The year 1876 also saw the establishment of the Bose Levu Vakaturaga ("BLV") by the colonial administration as an advisory body on native affairs. Sir Arthur Gordon recognised the important role that chiefs played in the administration of the colony. The BLV was chaired by the Governor, and the members advised the Governor on matters affecting the natives.

31. In 1877, in Rewa, the members of the BLV agreed to the adoption of 29 resolutions on the recognition and protection of the traditional system of land tenure.

32. In 1880, the Native Lands Ordinance No. XXI was enacted, which recognised the legal tenure of all native land as customarily owned by native owners, as evidenced by use and tradition.

The Native Lands Commission was also established under the Ordinance to determine the rightful owners of native land.

33. The appointment of Sir Everard Im Thurn as Fiji's Governor in 1904 saw a drastic change in the colonial government's attitudes towards native land policy. The enactment of the Native Lands Ordinance in 1905 departed from the previously protectionist governance of native land. Neither the BLV nor the native Fijians were consulted prior to the enactment of the Native Lands Ordinance. The Ordinance allowed:

i. the "alienation" of native land to non-natives with the consent of the Governor in Council and subject to the restrictions set out in the ordinance.

ii. the sale and lease by the native owners of portions of their native lands. Such a sale and lease were, of course, subject to the consent of the Governor in Council.

iii. the exchange by a "native community" of native land for land the subject of a Crown grant. This saw the granting of "native grants" to the colonial administration.

34. The 1905 Ordinance did not prescribe any maximum term of leases. This loophole in the law allowed leases of any term to be issued. As a result the 999-year lease in Toko, Tavua was issued. Thankfully, the 1905 Native Lands Ordinance was amended again to prohibit alienation of native land, except to the State for public purposes. However, the legacy of this colonial policy continues today. The land subject of the 999-year Toko lease is just iTaukei land on paper but is effectively "quasi-freehold". As a result, the iTaukei landowners have been denied just and equitable returns for their land.

35. Moreover, freehold titles were issued for lands purchased under the provisions of the 1905 Ordinance. The Crown was authorised to acquire iTaukei land for public purposes with or without compensation. As a result, a total of 206 Native Grants covering an area of approximately 42,440 hectares were issued before land sales were finally stopped. Today, the records of the iTaukei Lands Commission show that a total of 223 landowning units (either Mataqali and Tokatoka) are dependent units and do not own any land. They are merely landowners by name, but in reality, they are landless.

36. The introduction of indentured labour was an important chapter of Fiji's development. Previously labour had been brought in from other islands in the Pacific such as the Solomon Islands. Between 1875 and 1916, about 60,000 Girmitiyas from India were brought to Fiji as labourers in local plantations. The abolition of indentured labour in 1919 led to a vast influx of immigrants into Fiji and the need to revisit native land policy.

37. The appointment of Ratu Sir Lala Sukuna in the Native Lands Commission in 1922 saw his first official involvement in native land administration, and then later as the first Native Speaker of the Legislative Council.

38. In 1936, at a meeting of the BLV, the BLV passed a Resolution for the creation of an institution in which to place the administration of native land in trust for the native Fijians. Ratu Sukuna spearheaded the nationwide consultations with the various owners of native land in Fiji. The resolution of the BLV was upheld by the majority of Fiji's provincial councils and chiefs.

39. In 1940, the Native Land Trust Board was established under the Native Land Trust Ordinance (now the iTaukei Land Trust Act 1940). The Board of Trustees of the NLTB consisted of the Governor (later the Governor-General, then President) as President of the Board, and by a later amendment, included the Minister responsible for native/indigenous affairs as Chairperson. The Head of State, sitting as head of the organisation, ensured that native land would not be subject to party politics. The Act set out the framework for the management, control and administration of iTaukei land in Fiji.

40. In 1966 the Agricultural Landlord and Tenant Ordinance (and later known as the Agricultural Landlord and Tenant Act - ALTA) was enacted by the Legislative Council to provide a basic set of guidelines implied in leases of agricultural land. ALTA effectively curtailed the Board's powers to administer agricultural land. TLTB has made submissions to Cabinet for the review of ALTA, recommending that the said Act be amended to apply to non-iTaukei land, i.e. freehold and State lands.

41. In 1970, under the Fiji Independence Order 1970, Fiji gained independence from Great Britain. The Fiji Independence Act solidified the protection of iTaukei land, continuing colonial policies established under the 1874 Deed of Cession.

42. Under the 1970 Constitution, legislation affecting land, including TLTA and ALTA were constitutionally entrenched for the first time. Entrenchment of laws affecting iTaukei and iTaukei land meant that no amendments could be made to legislation, such as TLTA, ALTA, and the Native Lands Act, without meeting special majority votes in both the House of Representatives and Senate.

43. Since independence, Fiji has had a tumultuous political history, with there being no less than three Constitutions and three coups.

44. Thankfully, under the 1990 Constitution and then later under the 1997 Constitution, laws affecting the iTaukei and iTaukei land were entrenched, and iTaukei land rights were protected by the highest law in the land.

45. The 6 December 2006 coup would see a chain of events play out, which resulted in the abrogation of the 1997 Constitution on 10 April 2009 and the promulgation of decrees and laws, which aimed to water down the powers of the iTaukei institutions that played a pivotal role in protecting the interests of the iTaukei.

46. Such decrees and promulgations included an amendment to the iTaukei Affairs (Amendment) Decree 2012 which saw the removal of the BLV as an institution. An amendment to the iTaukei Land Trust Act was also made by decree in 2011 which saw the implementation of "equal rent distribution" - a move that was calculated to further weaken the traditional vanua positions by removing their emoluments to which they were previously entitled.

47. Also in 2011 the Land Use Decree was promulgated. The Decree allowed for the "designation" of iTaukei land into a Land Bank to be administered by the Land Use Unit. The Land Use Unit effectively sought to bypass the authority of TLTB by acting as a competing State-run entity that leased iTaukei land.

48. Other such controversial legislation was introduced by the Bainimarama government included the infamous "Bill 17" which saw an amendment to section 12 of the iTaukei Land Trust Act. Such amendment removed the need for TLTB's consent to dealings such as mortgage applications. However, in restricting the previously unfettered discretion of the Board in considering consent applications, the amendments effectively watered down the powers of the Board in administering iTaukei land.

TLTB'S MANDATE

49. The Board's mandate is captured in section 4 of the iTaukei Land Trust Act 1940 as follows:

> The Control of all iTaukei land shall be vested in the Board and all such land shall be administered by the Board for the benefit of the iTaukei owners.

50. TLTA also sets out other provisions on the mandate of TLTB as follows:

> Section 6 – Constitution of the Board
>
> 6.(6) The Board shall be a body corporate with perpetual succession and a common seal and may, in such name, sue and be sued, borrow money and enter into contracts, and may acquire, purchase, take, > hold and enjoy real and personal property of every description and may convey, assign, surrender and yield up, charge, mortgage, transfer or otherwise dispose of or deal with or in real or personal property vested in the Board on such terms as the Board thinks fit.
>
> Section 14 Distribution of rents and purchase money
>
> 14 (1) Subject to the other provisions of this section, rents and premiums received in respect of leases or licences in respect of iTaukei land shall be subject to a deduction of such amount as the Board may from time to time determine not exceeding 25% of such rent or premium, which shall be payable to the Board as and for the expenses of collection and administration, and the balance thereof shall be distributed in the manner prescribed.

51. In addition, under the iTaukei Land (Trust Funds Investment) Regulations 2004 provides as follows:

Regulation 2 Power to invest and lend

> Subject to section 14 of the act, the Board, may lend or invest any trust funds including rents, royalties or premiums in respect of leases, licences, concessions or any other binding agreements on iTaukei land, provided that there is always a legal security by way of a mortgage, charge or any other collateral arrangement that normally qualify under any normal bona fide commercial investment or lending transactions.

52. Over the years, TLTB has progressively transformed to meet the expanding expectations of landowners, government, and national development stakeholders. While our core mandate remains the effective administration and protection of iTaukei land, our role has broadened significantly.

THE DEED OF CESSION AND ITS IMPACT ON INDIGENOUS LAND OWNERSHIP

53. The starting point in the discussion on indigenous land ownership is the Deed of Cession of 1874. Article 4 of the Deed of Cession 1874 stated as follows:

> 4. THAT the absolute proprietorship of all lands not shown to be now alienated so as to have become bona fide the property of Europeans or other foreigners or not now in the actual use or occupation of some chief or tribe or not actually required for the probable future support and maintenance of some chief or tribe shall be and is hereby declared to be vested in Her Majesty her heirs and successors.

54. Article 4 of the Deed of Cession guaranteed the retention of full ownership rights of land of which indigenous Fijians were in actual use or occupation, as well as those lands which were required for the probable future support and maintenance of the indigenous Fijians.

55. The landmark case of HBC 116/1999 Epeli Kanakana & Ors v Attorney-General & iTaukei Lands and Fisheries Commission discusses the effect of the provisions of Article 4 of the Deed of Cession on the rights of iTaukei landowners. Paragraph 113 of the judgment stated:

> Article 4 of the Deed of Cession provides for two situations in which absolute proprietorship of Native land became vested in the British Crown, and Native title is extinguished, namely, where:
>
> (c) Land "not shown to be now alienated, so as to have become bona fide the property of Europeans or other Foreigners ("Non bona fide alienated Native land"), and
>
> (d) Land "not now in the actual use or occupation of some Chief or tribe or not actually required for the probable future support and maintenance of some Chief or tribe" ("Unused or Unoccupied Native land").

56. This meant that the absolute proprietorship of all lands in Fiji remained with the indigenous Fijians except for those lands which fell into the two categories above.

57. "Absolute proprietorship" as stated in the Deed of Cession meant that there was no limitation to the rights that the iTaukei had to their land – it denoted full and complete ownership of land, including in relation to resources on the surface of and underneath the land.

TLTB POSITION ON MATTERS AFFECTING iTAUKEI LAND RIGHTS AND PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE 2013 CONSTITUTION

58. The current constitutional review presents a critical and historic opportunity to address enduring structural inequities affecting iTaukei landownership. These inequities are not incidental. Rather, they are the product of successive legal and policy frameworks - originating in the colonial period and perpetuated in the post-independence era.

59. These frameworks have operated to restrict the full enjoyment of proprietary rights by iTaukei landowners over their lands and resources.

60. The Constitution, as the supreme law of Fiji, must serve as a corrective instrument capable of restoring balance, equity, and justice in relation to iTaukei land tenure.

61. In particular, past legal regimes facilitated arrangements that were fundamentally inconsistent with the principles of intergenerational stewardship inherent in iTaukei customary landholding. The most prominent example is, of course, the granting of the 999-year Toko lease by the Colonial government under the iTaukei Lands Ordinance 1905. Such a lease being, in effect, quasi-freehold, has alienated land from the control and benefit of its customary owners of Mataqali Tilivasewa and Mataqali Navusabalavu for multiple generations, undermining both their economic interests and their cultural connection to the land. The returns derived from these leases are disproportionate to the value of the land, thereby perpetuating economic disadvantage and limiting the ability of landowners to benefit meaningfully from their land.

62. TLTB further submits that these historical injustices must be understood within the broader context of disparities in wealth distribution in Fiji. A significant contributing factor to these disparities has been the systematic limitation on the ability of iTaukei landowners to fully utilise and derive benefit from their land and natural resources.

63. While iTaukei land constitutes the majority of land in Fiji, the legal framework governing its use has often constrained landowners to passive roles, with limited participation in decision-making and limited access to equitable returns. This has contributed to a disconnect between land ownership and economic empowerment.

64. Moreover, legislative and policies have, over time, effected a form of partial dispossession by removing or vesting in the State certain proprietary rights that would ordinarily be incidental to landownership. This includes rights to sub-surface minerals, as well as rights over the foreshore, mangrove areas, and the soil beneath rivers and the sea. The vesting of such rights in the State, without corresponding recognition of the customary ownership interests of iTaukei landowners, has significantly curtailed their ability to benefit from the full spectrum of resources associated with their land.

65. We therefore challenge the Constitution Review Commission to move beyond the preservation of formal ownership and instead work to ensure the restoration of substantive proprietary rights. In doing so, the Constitution can provide a framework for the equitable sharing of benefits derived from land and natural resources, the strengthening of customary tenure, and the promotion of sustainable development that aligns with the aspirations and rights of iTaukei landowners.

66. Against this background, TLTB makes the following specific proposals for constitutional amendment as essential measures to address historical injustices and to secure a more equitable and just framework for the future.

Section 30 – Rights of landowners to minerals as an incident of land ownership

67. Section 30 of the Constitution states that all minerals in or under any land or water are owned by the State.

66. The above Constitutional provision trickles down in its operation to the Mining Act 1965 and the State Lands Act 1945.

67. Section 3 of the Mining Act states that all minerals of every description in or under all lands of whatever ownership or tenure shall be deemed always to have been the property of the State and shall be deemed not to have been parted with under any alienation, lease, licence or permit.

68. Section 7 of the State Lands Act 1945 states that any grant under the State Lands Act does not confer any right to precious metals, coal, or minerals of any description.

69. TLTB submits that the "absolute proprietorship" of iTaukei to their lands as enshrined in Article 4 of the Deed of Cession includes subsurface rights to all minerals of every description, including precious metals, coal, or minerals.

70. It would be helpful to understand the policy reasons for the current position of the law deeming ownership of minerals in the State. We discuss this below.

Colonial policy

71. Fiji is a former colony of Great Britain, and as such, it adopted its common law system. This meant that laws were received into Fiji from Britain with or without modification. Moreover, laws of general application in force in England also applied in Fiji.

72. One such common law position was the prerogative of the Crown to ownership of precious metals. The seminal English common law case of In re the Case of Mines (R v Earl of Northumberland) in 1568 established the legal principle that all mines or gold and silver within the realm were reserved for the Crown. The rights of Queen Elizabeth I (and successive monarchs since then) to precious metals were founded in the following passage in the case:

> "[In] respect of the excellency of the thing, for of all things which the soil within this realm produces or yields, gold and silver is the most excellent; and of all persons in the realm, the King is in the eye of the law most excellent. And the common law, which is founded upon reason, appropriates every thing to the persons whom it best suits, as common and trivial things to the common people, things of more worth to persons in a higher and superior class, and things most excellent to those persons who excel all other; and because gold and silver are the most excellent things which the soil contains, the law has appointed them (as in reason it ought) to the person who is most excellent, and this is the King."

73. The above passage stated, in effect, that ordinary things go to ordinary people, more valuable things go to higher-ranking people, and the "most valuable" or excellent" things should go to the "most excellent person" i.e. the monarch. Gold and silver, being rare and valuable, and needed for currency, were therefore reserved for the monarch. Private landowners did not own gold or silver found in their land.

74. There were also prevailing politico-economic reasons in England in 1568 which resulted in the landmark decision, chief of which was the grave concern of the Crown that England had little access to gold. This compared to its enemy, Spain (against whom there was a risk of renewed war), which had recently plundered ample quantities of gold from the New World (the Americas).

75. The underlying legal logic behind the Case of Mines, i.e. that mineral ownership and rights to minerals are matters of the sovereign state rather than private ownership, underpinned British colonial mining policy, including in its colonies.

76. This policy would ultimately be incorporated into the Mining Ordinance 1908 and ultimately in the Mining Ordinance 1965, while Fiji was still a British colony.

77. Fiji has since, transitioned away from the regalian, status-based laws. However, while the State now supplants the Crown, the remnants of colonial concepts of mineral ownership remain in the Mining Act.

78. When the Mining Bill was tabled for a second reading before the Legislative Council on 22 June 1965, the Director of Lands, Mines and Surveys set out the policy underpinnings for the bill as follows:

> "In every territory in which the mineral resources, but not all lands, are the property of the state and in all territories > where the state seeks to encourage the private investor in the exploitation of mineral wealth, it is necessary to devise legislation to cover three principal matters. Firstly, the law must safeguard the state's interest in mineral resources and must facilitate the smooth exploitation of those minerals for the benefit of the public at large. Secondly, the law must provide adequate safeguards for landowners in and under whose land minerals occur but at the same time it must ensure that statutory power exists to prevent any landowner from unreasonably obstructing the proper development and extraction of the state-owned wealth. Thirdly, the law must provide satisfactory machinery to enable mining rights to be issued so that private concerns can be encouraged to participate in the exploitation of the mineral resources."

79. The three principal matters which the Mining Act proposed to safeguard were:

a. facilitation of smooth exploitation of minerals

b. adequate safeguards for landowners together with checks and balances to safeguard against arbitrary obstruction by landowners; and

c. satisfactory machinery for the issuance of mining rights to encourage participation by the public.

80. The TLTB submits that the vesting of ownership rights over minerals in the respective iTaukei landowners is not inconsistent with the policy intention of the legislation.

81. Ownership of minerals can vest in the iTaukei landowners while facilitating smooth exploitation of minerals, providing adequate safeguards and providing satisfactory machinery for the issuance of mining rights.

Arguments for vesting ownership of minerals in the iTaukei

82. A number of justifications can be made for the case of amendments to section 30 of the Constitution so that mineral ownership rights are vested in the name of the iTaukei landowners.

83. These include historical rectification of a colonial wrong (since the vesting of minerals in the Crown/State was done without their free and prior informed consent). We anticipate that such an argument would have been submitted already by others, and we do not wish to reiterate it.

84. Instead, TLTB offers two other justifications for vesting ownership of minerals in the iTaukei owners, which we discuss below.

iTaukei ownership rights to minerals already recognised

85. Section 30 of the 2013 Constitution recognises landowners' right to a fair share of mineral royalties. The Fijian government recently recognised landowners' rights to a fair share of royalties from mineral extraction.

86. In 2018, the Fair Share of Mineral Royalties Act was passed with a view to establishing a process for the fair sharing of royalties for the extraction of minerals.

87. No State would pass laws to allow landowners to receive a share of royalties unless they recognise the rights of the landowners to ownership of minerals in the soil.

88. While the State has come a long way in recognising the rights of iTaukei landowners to minerals in their land, the TLTB submits that full ownership rights to the said minerals must be granted to the respective iTaukei landowners.

89. The law must change to allow iTaukei landowners full rights to minerals, and the State's continued exercise of its prerogative over minerals constitutes unjust deprivation of property without fair compensation. After all, the 2013 Constitution requires the Parliament and Cabinet to ensure that all leases and land tenancies provide a fair and equitable return to the landowners (section 29(4)).

Alignment with indigenous rights under international law

90. Fiji is a signatory to the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples ("UNDRIP").

91. In addition to this, the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Bill 2025 ("the Bill") is currently being tabled before Parliament for consideration. The Bill provides for the recognition, protection and promotion of the rights of indigenous people, and to also give effect to UNDRIP.

92. Under UNDRIP, Fiji has the obligation to recognise the rights of the iTaukei to their natural resources. Once the Bill is passed by Parliament, it provides even stronger impetus for the State to commit not only to recognising but also granting full ownership rights over iTaukei land, including proprietary rights over minerals in or under all lands in Fiji.

93. In the United States of America, natural resources, including minerals, are owned by the respective Native American tribes who own land in fee simple. Similarly, in Canada, indigenous tribes have been able to negotiate and settle land claims, conferring full ownership rights, including subsurface rights to minerals. In South Africa, indigenous tribes who were dispossessed of their lands during the period of apartheid have been restored full ownership of their lands, including subsurface mineral rights, where there is evidence of pre-colonial customary use.

94. History bears witness to the fact that the indigenous populations in the USA and South Africa were severely mistreated and marginalised by the State. Fijian iTaukei on their part were the beneficiaries of a very paternalistic British colonial policy.

95. TLTB submits that the move in the jurisdictions above towards recognising full ownership rights to previously disempowered tribes and indigenous groups, including to subsurface mineral rights, should provide Fiji with more than enough reason to return ownership of minerals to the iTaukei landowners since we do not have the same historical, structural and socio-cultural hindrances.

Mechanism for change – how done?

96. Section 30 of the 2013 Constitution must be amended to confer full proprietary rights over minerals to the "iTaukei landowners" (as defined in section 2 of the iTaukei Land Trust Act 1940 an iTaukei Lands Act 1905).

97. There would also need to be consequential amendments to:

a. section 3 of the Mining Act 1945 by replacing State ownership of minerals with ownership by the "iTaukei owners";

b. section 7 of the State Lands Act 1945 (for reservation of rights over minerals to the iTaukei owners),

c. section 3 of the Petroleum (Exploration and Exploitation) Act 1978 (for reservation of rights to petroleum to the iTaukei owners), and

d. the Fair Share of Mineral Royalties Act 2018 (this would be repealed as full ownership and therefore full royalties would flow to the iTaukei owners).

Section 27 and section 29(5) of the 2013 Constitution – Land Acquired for Public Purposes to be Reverted to iTaukei Land

98. Section 27 of the 2013 Constitution states that every person has the right not to be deprived of property by the State other than in accordance with a written law. One such written law which allows the State to deprive private owners of their land is the State Acquisition of Lands Act 1940. This legislation allows the State to compulsorily acquire land for public purposes, subject to payment of compensation.

99. In the State Lands Act 1945, section 8 requires that any iTaukei land which was acquired by the State for public purposes under the State Acquisition of Lands Act 1940 or other written law, and which is no longer required for public purposes, may be declared to be iTaukei land, and the proper recordings in the Register of iTaukei Land be made.

100. However, even prior to the enactment of the State Acquisition of Lands Act and the State Lands Act, the Crown had been acquiring native land. The Native Lands Acquisitions Ordinance 1905 was passed by the colonial government headed by Governor Im Thurn in response to pressure from European settlers and the government for agricultural and settlement purposes.

101. Under the 1905 Ordinance, freehold titles were obtained from the native Fijians. The Crown was also given the power to acquire native land for public purposes with or without compensation. As a result of these acquisitions by the Crown, there were a total of 206 Native Grants issued covering an area of approximately 42,440 hectares.

Landowner Grievances

102. Since even before Fiji's cession to Great Britain, grievances over the sale of iTaukei lands began to surface from various iTaukei landowning units. These grievances went unresolved or fell on deaf ears. This has resulted in widespread disillusionment and ongoing disputes among landowners, tenants, the Government, and TLTB.

103. As alluded to earlier, the records of the iTaukei Lands Commission show that 223 landowning units (either Mataqali and Tokatoka) are dependent units and do not own any land. They are merely landowners by name, but in reality, they are landless.

104. Since the establishment of the Board in 1940, investigations have been made on claims for reservation and reversion of State land. Some claims were finally proclaimed in 1986 by the then Governor-General.

105. In 2002, the iTaukei Land Trust (Amendment) Act 2002 transferred Schedule A and B lands from the State to TLTB. TLTB became the ultimate heir for all Schedule A and Schedule B lands.

106. Schedule A lands are extinct mataqali lands which used to be owned by a mataqali but whose members have all since passed away. Schedule B lands are lands that were not claimed by any landowning unit at the time of the various sittings of the iTaukei Lands Commission.

107. Since 2022, under the administration of TLTB, Schedule A and B lands have been allocated:

a) A list of 844 Schedule A parcels with an area of over 223,581 acres was published by the Fiji Government in the Gazette.

b) A list of 260 Schedule B parcels with an area of over 85,812 acres was also published by the Fiji Government in the Gazette.

These lands have been allocated to legitimate claimants by TLTB.

108. TLTB has also processed claims by iTaukei landowning units over State Freehold Lands (Crown Grants and Native Grants purchased by the State).

109. 17 such cases were approved by TLTB and submitted to Cabinet. On 26 March 2024, a Cabinet decision (being CP (24)81) was made in relation to the 17 cases as follows:

i. Cabinet noted the numerous concerns and claims submitted by the landowning units on the Reversion of Crown Grants and Native Grants.

ii. Endorse the establishment of a Steering Committee to examine Crown Grants and Native Grant claims.

110. The 17 pending claims have been presented to a Steering Committee for consideration and processing. These are tabulated below:

	NAME OF LAND	TITLE	AREA (Hectares)	CLAIMANT	VILLAGE	TIKINA	PROVINCE
1.	Naitasiri	CG 341	91.0563	Yavusa Baulevuirara	Nakini	Naitasiri	Naitasiri
2.	Kalabo	NG 6	1048.9680	Yavusa Matanikorovatu & Yavusa Nawaidina	Kalabu Drekeiwaila	Naitasiri	Naitasiri
3.	Natova	CG 1487	165.5200	Yavusa Leweiwavuwavu of Sabeto and Yavusa Ua of Saunaka, Nadi	Koroiyaca Saunaka	Sabeto Nadi	Ba
4.	Luvuci	NG 137	161.8742	Yavusa Waruta	Natalau	Sabeto	Ba
5.	Rara	CG 1259	522.4494	Mataqali Rara Yavusa Wailevu	Wailevu	Wailevu	Macuata
6.	Navakai and Solowaru	CG 951	331.8424	Yavusa Tukani Botiliwula, Noi Neiqoro	Navoci and Namotomoto	Nadi	Ba
7.	Kubunasarava	CG 1076	193.0353	Yavusa Tububere and Yavusa Lomolomo	Lomolomo	Vuda	Ba
8.	Vulani	CG 1077	50.5857	Yavusa Leweiwavuwavu	Sabeto	Sabeto	Ba
9.	Naqara	CG 1062A	282.2803	Yavusa Lomolilevu	Drauniivi	Raviravi	Ra
10.	Qeledradra	CG 1084	602.9825	Yavusa Nakubuti	Drauniivi	Raviravi	Ra
11.	Nakauvuli Nabuta	CG 1070	1613.8888	Yavusa Nadokana Yavusa Navauvau	Rabulu Korovou	Tavua Tavua	Ba Ba
12.	Nasaro	NG 113	3196.2121	Yavusa Wakalou	Drauniivi	Raviravi	Ra
13.	Iosuna	CG 1055	38.2428	Yavusa Leweinataqalulu	Sanasana	Malomalo	Nadroga
14.	Korolevu	CG 1152	246.0492	Yavusa Nakorolevu	Lawaki	Nakasaleka	Kadavu
15.	Kuku	NG 162	61.7146	Yavusa Nailagolaba	Kuku	Nausori	Tailevu
16.	Namau	NG 160	413.9940	Mat. Koro Yavusa Koro	Koroboya	Qalivalatina	Ba
17.	Koro No. 1	NG 158	3403.411	Mat. Natolevu Yavusa Koro	Koroboya	Qalivalatina	Ba

Example of Land Reversion under Section 8 of the State Lands Act 1945

111. To illustrate, we set out below 2 examples of a reversion of land under section 8 of the State Lands Act that was recently carried out.

NG 187 Saru Water Catchment (Lautoka)

112. The Colonial Government bought land with an area of 3177 acres on 28 June 1924 for £637.8. NG 187 was issued on 25 September 1926. The land was purchased to build a water catchment to supply Lautoka Town.

113. In 1955, the government proclaimed it as a Forest Reserve and later leases were issued to Fiji Pine and Fiji Sugar Corporation. iTaukei landowners petitioned for reversion because the land was no longer used for the purpose for which it was purchased.

114. This reversion case was approved by Cabinet on 19 January 1999, with the condition for exclusion of the following areas: Tavakubu Cemetery, Forestry Station, PWD water pipeline, and 24 acres for the cemetery extension. Also, the administration of all existing State leases to Fiji Sugar Corporation and Fiji Pine was transferred to TLTB.

Nadi Airport

115. Tokatoka Nadrau of Saunaka petitioned for the return of 434 acres of land after the Government began to lease land to CAAF. The 434 acres is approximately 36% of Crown Lease No. 3469 (which has a total of 1190 acres).

116. The Cabinet, under the provisions of Section 8 of the State Lands Act, endorsed the return of only 10 acres 3 roods and 24 perches, which comprises 19 surveyed lots. The area approved by Cabinet was reverted to iTaukei land by FRG 22/12/2000.

117. TLTB submits that all lands that were acquired by the State under the Act and the State Acquisition of Lands Act 1940, which no longer serve the public purpose for which they were initially acquired, be reverted to the respective iTaukei landowners. These lands can, of course, be administered by TLTB, with leases and licences issued to the current occupants or other applicants pursuant to the iTaukei Lands Trust Act 1940.

Section 29(5) of the 2013 Constitution Defeats the Operation of Land Reversion

118. Section 29(5) of the 2013 Constitution states that all land that existed as freehold land immediately before the commencement of the Constitution shall remain as freehold even if it is sold or purchased, unless it is sold to the State.

119. As pointed out above, there were 206 Native Grants issued by the Crown over iTaukei land covering an area of approximately 42,440 hectares. Native Grants purchased by the State (together with Crown Grants) became State Freehold lands.

120. These lands must be reverted to the respective iTaukei owners. However, the operation of section 29(5) of the Constitution effectively stops such land from being reverted to "iTaukei land" status.

121. One such example of the operation of section 29(5) in inhibiting the protection of iTaukei land rights is the Momi Bay Development Act 2010. This legislation was designed to protect the investment of the Fiji National Provident Fund in facilitating the completion of the Momi Bay Integrated Resort Development. The Act also validated the land swap agreements, which involved iTaukei land. However, to date, while native land has been converted into freehold land, the accompanying swap from freehold land to native land status has never been completed.

122. The enactment of the 2013 Constitution and operation of section 29(5) effectively preclude parties from completing the land swap. Moreover, the Act itself prohibits the filing of legal proceedings to challenge aspects of the Act. Judicial bodies are barred from hearing claims arising out of the Act.

123. For the above reasons, the TLTB submits that section 29(5) of the 2013 Constitution should be deleted.

AMENDMENT TO PREAMBLE OF CONSTITUTION

124. Fiji's history bears witness to the civilizing and enduring influence of Christianity. TLTB submits that the Preamble to the 2013 Constitution should be amended to recognise the historical contribution of Christianity to the social, educational, legal and moral development of Fiji.

125. The work of the Christian missionaries played a significant role in Fiji in eradicating practices such as cannibalism, ritual killings and widow strangling. The missionaries also contributed to the education of the Fijians and the preservation of the Fijian language. The missionaries set up schools and institutions that continue to serve the Fijian communities.

126. The influence of Christianity also shaped concepts of public morality (such as bans on intoxication, dress and code of conduct), family life and the welfare of the community.

127. TLTB submits that the reference in the Preamble to the enduring influence of Christianity in Fiji's national heritage in recognition of a historical fact. This should be made distinct from any proposals to removal of the current provisions in the Constitution which recognises Fiji as a secular State. It should also not be interpreted as conferring preferential treatment to Christianity or an attempt at undermining other religions or minority faiths.

128. TLTB proposes that the wording below be incorporated in the Preamble of the 2013 Constitution:

> "Recognising the profound and enduring influence of Christianity in shaping the history, moral foundations, institutions, customs and national development of Fiji, and honoring its contribution to the advancement of education, justice, peace, , compassion and well-being of the people."

ENTRENCHMENT OF LEGISLATION AFFECTING THE INTERESTS OF THE iTAUKEI AND iTAUKEI LAND

129. As we referred to earlier, under the previous three constitutions (the 1970, 1990 and 1997 Constitutions), laws affecting the iTaukei and their land were the cornerstone of the Fijian legislative and legal framework. The entrenchment of laws enabled the protection of indigenous land rights and indigenous institutions. These laws included the following:

a) iTaukei Affairs Act

b) iTaukei Lands Act

c) iTaukei Land Trust Act

d) Rotuma Act

e) Rotuma Lands Act

f) Banaban Lands Act

g) Banaban Settlement Act

h) Agricultural Landlord and Tenant Act

130. History shows that, under the 2013 Constitution, by the swipe of a pen or by simple majority in Parliament, the powers of fundamental iTaukei institutions and their functions were watered down. The controversial "Bill 17" is a prime example of this.

131. "Bill 17", also known as the iTaukei Land Trust (Amendment) Act 2021, amended section 12 of the iTaukei Land Trust Act. While the powers of the Board in granting consent to mortgages were the subject of much debate, the effect of other amendments meant that TLTB no longer had "absolute discretion" in its administration of dealings relating to leases of iTaukei land.

132. TLTB submits that the legislation previously entrenched under the 1997 Constitution should be entrenched under the 2013 Constitution. Any amendments to the entrenched legislation should require ¾ special majority of the Parliament after such amendments have been considered by the Ministry of iTaukei Affairs in consultation with the Great Council of Chiefs and the iTaukei Land Trust Board.

CONCLUSION

133. TLTB reiterates its appreciation to the Constitutional Review Commission for the opportunity to make submissions on the review of the 2013 Constitution. For iTaukei, land is not merely an economic asset but the foundation of identity, culture and inter-generational wellbeing. Accordingly, the Constitution must continue to provide the highest level of protection to iTaukei land tenure and the institutions established to administer and safeguard those interests.

134. TLTB respectfully urges that the Constitution be amended to better align with the original intent of Article 4 of the Deed of Cession and the established understanding of "absolute proprietorship", including recognition of proprietary rights of iTaukei landowners to minerals and other natural resources in or under their land, subject to appropriate public-interest regulation. Further, land acquired for public purposes and no longer required should, as a matter of fairness and restorative justice, be reverted to the respective iTaukei landowners and administered in accordance with the iTaukei Land Trust Act.

135. TLTB also respectfully submits that legislation central to iTaukei interests and iTaukei land should be constitutionally entrenched with an enhanced special-majority amendment threshold, and with structured consultation involving the Ministry responsible for iTaukei Affairs, the BLV, and TLTB, so that fundamental protections cannot be diminished by ordinary legislative processes.

136. TLTB stands ready to assist the Commission with any further information required and looks forward to the Commission's recommendations reflecting these long-standing principles of protection, equity and good governance.

Yours faithfully,

.....

SOLOMONI NATA
CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER

CC: The Hon. Prime Minister
Cabinet Ministers

Fiji Teachers Union (FTU)

Fiji Teachers Union
Date:6-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: We welcome you to the Constitution Review Commission, sitting today with four members, or four commissioners. It's a pleasure having you here. We have been looking forward to the submitters who are coming in this week.

Because we've got the trade union, as you are, and other associations and groups who we believe will be giving us a lot of submissions that need to be considered carefully in relation to our amendment to the 2013 Constitution. So, we welcome you this morning. Just a matter of introduction, you might know some of us, if not all of us.

On my right is Mr. Conway Beg, an architect, I'm sure you know him. And he's one of our commissioners. I am Sevuloni, the chairperson.

On my left is Mr. Ami Kohli a lawyer from Labasa. And on the far left is Dr. Nilesh Goundar, and I'm sure you two know each other. So, it's a matter, for this morning, it's a matter of us listening to you on the FTU's views and recommendations in relation to amendments and laws which should be in the amended 2013 Constitution.

Our task, do you need something from the girls? Put it onto the screen. We haven't got that arranged. It's okay, we'll just follow together.

So, we're here to listen. You will understand that our job is to, or our task which has been given to us by His Excellency the President, is to review the Constitution. And review may mean amend and change and whatever else we can do to put new laws into the 2013 Constitution.

So, we have three options. Add new laws, remove those which are already in the Constitution, or just amend the wording so that we have different meanings. We've had a lot of consultations and we've heard a lot from our people, both here and around the country.

We've been around Fiji. So, without further ado, I will now invite you to have the mic and start with your submission to us. Thank you.

Dr. Gounder: Well, thank you, Chair. Thank you for the invite. I must, at this point in time, congratulate the Commission for coming, for your election to this prestigious position, I would say, in order to get a new Constitution for Fiji.

Basically, I represent, as the General Secretary, the Fiji Teachers Union, which comprises of around 5000 teachers who are our members, the biggest trade union in the country currently. I was a teacher. I had been a teacher for 25 years and a classroom teacher for 9 years.

And I resigned in June 2023, immediately after the national elections, to take over from my colleague, the current Labour Minister. I have fought the election, won. Before that, I was, from 2012, I was the National President of Fiji Teachers Union.

So, there you are, Commissioners, and once again, thank you so much for the invite. Basically, my presentation, I think it's about 40 pages. And it consists of addendum, this addition to the current 2013 Constitution, some of the things that we may not like, which I have, you know, FTU recommends that it be taken out.
And we would also like to add two chapters in there. And this comprehensive presentation is self-explanatory. It has got everything in there.

I believe I am given, you know, much time so that I am able to take us through this, you know, properly. With your permission, Chair, I now take all of us through the submission by the Fiji Teachers Union to the Constitutional Review Commission of 2026.

Mr. Valenitabua: By your information, Mr. Gounder, you have one hour.

Dr. Gounder: One hour, okay. Until 10am, please. 10, it's quarter past nine.

Can it be quarter past 10? Right. Thank you. This prepared by Fiji Teachers Union after consultation with our national executives, and also our rank and file, but submitted through the General Secretary to the Commissioners here.

The theme is a democratic, inclusive, and future-focused constitution for every Fijian. Why? Why are we saying that? A democratic, right, democracy must prevail at all levels. Two, inclusive, should be an inclusive one, and also a future-focused.

We must look at the future, the next 30 years. Letter of submission, there is a letter that I have written to the Chairperson of the Commission. In brief, what is our presentation on? Table of contents, on page 4, Commissioners, from 1 to 13.

13 is conclusion, 1 is the cover page, 14 is the appendices, and 50 references and bibliography. Over to page 5, Executive Summary. There, just in a nutshell, what I have written is that this is the supreme law of a nation.

It establishes the institutions of government, this one, protects the rights and freedom of its citizens, defines the relationship between the state and the people, and provides a framework within which democratic governance is exercised. Constitutional reform is therefore one of the most significant responsibilities undertaken by any nation. And in this, I'd also like to contribute by saying that it's important, as a nation, we look at how this exercise is going to bear fruits in future.

As one of Fiji's longest established professional organizations, the Fiji teachers believe that constitutional reform should promote democratic governance, social justice, equality, accountability, respect for diversity, and the rule of law. Our constitution should not only respond to present challenges, but in fact, it should also provide a stable foundation for future generations. That is very important in our belief.

Therefore, this submission is guided by the principle that Fiji's constitutional future should draw upon the strength of previous constitution. And as I go to discuss, I brought in the 1970, some good points from 1970 constitution, as well as from the 1997 constitution, and not forgetting the 2013 constitution. I have, in a nutshell, given the strengths and weaknesses of these three constitutions, which is in the presentation later.

Over the page, page six says, at the bottom, building Fiji's constitutional future, part one, about the Fiji teachers union. As I have said, it's a union, the largest teacher union in the country, with around 5,000 teachers. And then I've gone on to say the role of teachers in nation building, Fiji's interest.

Why? Why are we interested in this constitutional reform? Where are we stand as a teacher union? And then, over the page to page eight, because of one hour, that's why I'm rushing. Historical background of constitutional development in Fiji from 1970 to 2026, including this one here. Introduction, the constitutional history of Fiji reflects the country's political evolution, cultural diversity, and continuing efforts to balance democratic governance with aspirations of its people.

Since independence in 1970, Fiji has experienced several constitutional transitions, each influenced by changing political, social, and historical circumstances. Understanding this constitutional journey provides valuable context for the current review process. The Fiji teacher's union believes that future constitutional reform should build upon the strengths of previous constitutional arrangements while addressing lessons learned from the past.

Then I'm looking at 6.2, the 1970 independence constitution, which was a Westminster-style parliamentary democracy under constitutional monarchy and sought to balance representative government with protections for Fiji's diverse ethnic communities. Then further I go on to explaining the independence constitution that provided political stability during the early years. Then I'm looking at 6.3, over the page to page nine, the 1990 constitution.

Following the political events of 1987, a new constitution came into effect in 1990. The 1990 constitution reduced significant changes to the structure of government and electoral representation while it sought to address particular political concerns of the period. It also generated debate regarding equality, representation, and constitutional legitimacy.

Many organizations including civil society groups, religious bodies, trade unions, and Fiji teachers' union, international observers encouraged further constitutional dialogue aimed at strengthening national unity and promoting broader public confidence. Then came the 1997 constitution. The 1997 constitution represented an important milestone in Fiji's constitutional development.

It emerged from an extensive process of public consultation and political negotiations and sought to encourage consensus among Fiji's diverse communities. The constitution strengthened the protection of fundamental rights, reinforced the independence of key constitutional institutions, recognized principles of good governance, and promoted greater inclusiveness in public administration. Many aspects of the 1997 constitution continue to be regarded as significant contributions to Fiji's constitutional development, particularly its emphasis on consultation, reconciliation, and democratic participation.

Then 6.5, the 2013 constitution. The constitution adopted in 2013 introduced substantial reforms to Fiji's constitutional framework. Among its notable features were the establishment of equal citizenry, an expanded Bill of Rights, constitutional recognition of socio-economic rights, and stronger anti-discrimination protections.

It also introduced significant changes to the structure of parliament, the executive, and constitutional institutions. While many of these reforms have been welcomed, questions have also been raised regarding the concentration of executive authority, the constitutional amendment procedures, parliamentary oversight, and the appointment processes for certain public offices. Therefore, the Fiji Teachers Union considers that the current constitutional reform, review rather, presents an opportunity to retain the strengths of the 2013 constitution while addressing areas that may benefit from refinement or changes.

6.6, the constitutional review process. I have gone on to talk on the constitutional review process that has been undertaken now. And with this widespread public participation, I believe we will be able to get one of the best constitutions for Fiji in the future.

Why constitutional reform matters? That's 7 on page 10. Why it is important? We all know that a constitution is more than a legal document. It expresses the shared values of a nation and establishes the principles upon which government exercises public authority.

For educators, for teachers, constitutional reform carries particular significance. I may repeat, constitutional reforms carry particular significance. For school operates within the constitutional framework established by the state.

Educational policy, children's rights, equality of opportunity, freedom of thought, cultural diversity, labor protections, and public administration are all influenced by constitutional principles. Therefore, the Fiji Teachers Union considers constitutional reform to be inseparable from the broader goals of educational excellence, democratic citizenship, social cohesion, and national development. Accordingly, the union supports constitutional arrangements that promote the rule of law, safeguard independent institutions, protect fundamental rights, encourage participation, and strengthen public confidence in democratic governance.

Then part two of the presentation, F.T.U. Vision and Guiding Principles for Constitutional Reform, Constitution for All Fijians. The introduction is there why F.T.U. believes that a constitution should reflect the collective aspirations of all its people. Then the guiding constitutional principles there.

The constitutional proceeds, that's the end of page 11. And then over to page 12, democracy. I've also written a rule of law, human dignity, equality and equal citizenship, respect for diversity, accountability and transparency, participation and consultation, social justice, over to page 13, on intergenerational responsibility, which is very important.

And then I move on to nine. That is where I compare the comparative analysis of the 1997 and 2013 constitutions. Why Fiji Teachers Union would rather have a comparative analysis? Because that would allow this constitutional reform to be able to draw lessons from Fiji's constitutional experience rather than regard previous constitutions as mutually exclusive alternatives.

What we want is the good part of those constitutions to be embedded in the future constitution. Both the 1997 constitution and the 2013 constitution contain provisions that have contributed positively to Fiji's constitutional development. The objective of this comparison is to identify those features that should be retained, strengthened or reconsidered in any future constitutional framework.

I may now take you over the comparative overview, the constitutional area, 1997 constitution, 2013 constitution and Fiji's assessment on those. Foundational principles, 1997 constitution, when you look at that, emphasize consensus building, power sharing and consultation. 2013 constitution emphasizes equal citizenry, national unity and constitutional rights.

What is our assessment? Future reform should combine inclusive governance with equal citizenship and strong rights protections. That's what we are looking forward to. Then the Bill of Rights, 97 comprehensive civil and political rights.

2013 expanded to include socio-economic rights and broader anti-discrimination protections. And our assessment, union's assessment, retain the expanded Bill of Rights while considering additional protections for academic freedom. That is very important.

Digital rights and workplace rights. These things are missing in the constitution that we have talked about, 97 and 2013. So that is our assessment that these things should be included, protections for academic freedom, which is very important.

Digital rights and workplace rights. Executive, as far as 1997, provides a strong, sorry, 2013 constitution on executive. Let's move on to the next one, parliament.

Oh no. Provides a strong executive with significant constitutional authority, that is 2013 constitution. And McGregor intended to encourage broader political participation, that's 1997.

Unions review, review opportunities to strengthen parliamentary oversight and accountability while maintaining effective government. Then the next is the constitutional area on parliament. Unicameral legislature with oversight functions.

Unicameral parliament with revised electoral arrangements and committee structure in 2013. And what we are saying is strengthen committee scrutiny, public participation and legislative oversight. I understand we had these senators in the 1997 constitution.

For 2013 it doesn't. Then judiciary under 1997 protected judicial independence through constitutional safeguards. 2013 continues constitutional protection of judicial independence.

What we are saying is retain and enhance transparent judicial appointments and security of TENWA, their terms and conditions. Then on public service, 1997 constitution recognized an independent public service. 2013 establishes the constitutional framework for public administration.

What we as a union, we are saying strengthen guarantees of merit-based appointments and professionalism and also protection from improper political influence. That is very important. The constitutional amendment, 1997 amendment procedure reflected the constitutional framework of that time.

2013 establishes procedures for constitutional amendment. And as a union, what we are saying review where the amendment procedure should encourage broad parliamentary support, public consultation and where appropriate, referendum for major constitutional changes. Then over the page to page 15, 9.2 lessons from Fiji's constitutional experience.

9.3 the FTU constitutional vision. What we are saying, what's our vision on the constitution that is going to be given to us all. Uphold constitutional supremacy and the rule of law.

It must protect the equal citizenship and dignity of every person. It must strengthen democratic institutions through accountability and transparency. It must safeguard judicial independence and the separation of powers.

Promote meaningful public participation in governance. Recognize education as a national priority and constitutional responsibility. Over to page 16, protect workers' rights and freedom of association.

That's really important for us as a union. Advance gender equality and rights of women and children. Support environmental stewardship and climate resilience.

Encourage constitutional stability through inclusive and consultative amendment processes. The union believes that these principles provide a sound foundation for a constitution that is democratic, inclusive, resilient and responsive to the needs of present as well as future generations. Then part 3, FTU constitutional reform recommendations.

10, democratic governance and institutional balance. 10.1, strengthening democratic governance. 10.2, parliamentary oversight.

Then page 17, executive accountability. 10.3, self-explanatory. Says, the constitution should provide clearer mechanisms for holding the executive accountable to parliament, including structured questioning of ministers, regular reporting requirements and transparent decision-making processes in matters of national importance.

11, Bill of Rights and Human Dignity. That's an important aspect. 11.1, strengthening the Bill of Rights.

The Fiji Teachers Union supports the retention and strengthening of a comprehensive Bill of Rights that protects civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. These rights should be interpreted in a manner consistent with international human rights standards.

11.2, academic freedom.

The constitution should expressively guarantee academic freedom for teachers, lecturers, researchers and educational institutions. This includes freedom to teach, research and disseminate knowledge, protection from undue interference in academic content, institutional autonomy for educational institutions within lawful frameworks. Academic freedom is essential for innovation, critical thinking and the development of informed citizens.

11.3, digital rights. The union recommends constitutional recognition of digital rights, including, over to page 18, protection from cyberbullying and online harassment, safeguards for personal data and privacy, protection against misuse of digital communication platforms. These rights are increasingly essential in modern society.

Then, two, that education is a constitutional right. 2.1, recognition of education. The Fiji Teachers Union strongly recommends that education be expressly recognized in the constitution as a fundamental right and a core responsibility of the state.

12.2, state obligations. The constitution should impose progressive obligations on the state to ensure free and accessible primary and secondary education, inclusive education for learners with disabilities, equitable access to education in rural and maritime areas, adequate funding for public education systems, recruitment and retention of qualified teachers. As we are facing acute teacher shortage in our country, as it is, we are training teachers for export.

This I have been saying and I will keep saying. It is such time that we are able to retain teachers in our country.

12.3, Teacher professionalism.
The constitution should recognize professional status of teachers by guaranteeing merit-based appointment and promotion and experience, protection from political interference, safe and respectful working environments, opportunities for continuous professional development. Teachers are central to national development and their professional integrity should be constitutionally safeguarded.

13, trade union rights and workers' protection.

13.1, freedom of association.

The constitution should explicitly guarantee the right of workers to form in joint trade unions without interference.

13.2, collective bargaining.

The union recommends constitutional protection for collective bargaining as a fundamental labor right. This includes the right of unions and employers to negotiate terms and conditions of employment in good faith.

13.3, protection from victimization.
Workers should be protected from retaliation or victimization for exercising lawful labor rights, including union participation and industrial advocacy. 13.4, social dialogue. The constitution should promote structured dialogue between government, employees and workers, organizations on matters affecting employment, economic policy and labor relations.

Then 14, we are looking at women and children.

14.1, protection of women.
The constitution should strengthen protections for women by prohibiting gender-based violence, domestic violence, workplace discrimination, sexual harassment in all settings.

Then 14.2 over the page, that's page 20, protection of children. The union recommends enhanced constitutional protection for children, including safeguards against abuse and neglect, exploitation and harmful labor practices, violence in all forms.

14.3, corporal punishment, important, really important for our children.

The constitution should prohibit corporal punishment. And any form of cruel, degrading or humiliating treatment of children. Fiji Teachers Union does not condone corporal punishment.

We are not for it. This reflects modern child protection standards, international best practice. What are the days of weeps and cheeks and all those things? Corporal punishment is not in our agenda.

As simple as that.
15, environment and future generations.

15.1, environmental responsibility.

The constitution should recognize environmental protection as a national responsibility. The state should be required to promote sustainable development and safeguard natural resources for present as well as for future generations.

15.2, climate change.

Given Fiji's vulnerability to climate change, the constitution should recognize the state's obligation to adopt policies that support climate resilience, disaster preparedness and environmental sustainability.

15.3, intergenerational equity.

The union recommends constitutional recognition of intergenerational responsibility, ensuring that present development does not compromise the rights and opportunities of our future generations.

Over the page, page 21, 16, approach to the article-by-article review. Purpose of the review method, Fiji's union has adopted a structured and consistent methodology for reviewing the constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013. This approach ensures that each constitutional provision is assessed in a transparent, systematic, policy-relevant manner.

The purpose of this method is to assist the Constitutional Review Commission by providing one, clear assembly of current constitutional provisions. Two, an assessment of their strengths and limitations or weaknesses. Constructive recommendations for reform or retention are rationale grounded in constitutional principles and public interest.

16.4, review framework.

Each constitutional provision is assessed using the following framework. Current position, a neutral description of the constitutional provision, which is therein.

B, FTU's position, the union's overall assessment, whether to retain, strengthen or to review. And the recommendation, specific proposed reforms or improvements.

D, the rationale, justification based on constitutional principles, governance needs, and international standards where it's applicable.

This structured approach over the page 22, this structured approach ensures consistency across all chapters and enhances the usability of the submission for constitutional drafters. 17. Review of Chapter 1, the state.

I am now into 2013 constitution. 17.1, current position.
Chapter 1 of the constitution establishes Fiji as a sovereign democratic state and affirms the principles of constitutional supremacy and equal citizenship.

FTU's position. The Fiji Teachers' Union supports the retention of the core provisions of Chapter 1. Recommendation, the union recommends strengthening the language of Chapter 1 to explicitly affirm 1. Democratic governance as a foundational constitutional principle. 2. Respect for diversity in Fiji's multicultural society.

3. Commitment to social justice and equality. And 4. Reinforcement of constitutional supremacy. Why? The rationale, these enhancements would reinforce the foundational values of the constitution and thereby provide clearer guidance for interpretation by courts in public institutions.

That's the rationale why we would now put up that recommendation. Review of Chapter 2, the Republic of Fiji, current position. Chapter 2 defines Fiji as a secular state and provides for national symbols and identity.

Our position, FTU's position, the union supports retention of the secular character of the state with clarification. With clarification that is.

18.3 recommendation, the constitution should 1. Maintain the principle of secularism.

2. Explicitly guarantee freedom of religion and belief. 3. Protect cultural expression and linguistic diversity.
18.4 rationale, a secular state framework ensures neutrality in matters of religion while protecting the rights of all citizens to freely practice and express their beliefs.

This is essential in a multicultural society such as Fiji. Review of Chapter 3, citizenship, current position, 19.1 Chapter 3 provides for equal citizenship for all Fijians regardless of origin, ethnicity or background. FDU's position, the Fiji Teachers' Union strongly supports the retention of the principle of equal citizenship.

19.3 recommendation, no major constitutional amendment is recommended. However, the union encourages continued reinforcement of 1. Non-discrimination in the exercise of citizenship rights and 2. Equal access to public services and opportunities. Over the page to page 24, the rationale, equal citizenship is a cornerstone of national unity and democratic governance.

It is strengthened social cohesion ensures that all citizens are treated with dignity and fairness under the law. Review of Chapter 4, Bill of Rights, the current position, Chapter 4 contains an extensive Bill of Rights including civil, political and socio-economic rights along with protections against discrimination. What is FDU's position? The union supports retention and strengthening the Bill of Rights.

In our recommendation, the Bill of Rights should be expanded to include 1. Academic freedom, which I have talked over at the beginning. 2. Digital and information rights, that's also important. 3. Stronger protections for workers and trade unions.

And in that, we are looking at trade unions having their own elections as per their own constitution, not to be conducted by the regional elections office. 4. Enhanced protections for children and women. 5. Explicit recognition of environmental rights.

The rationale, the expansion of rights protection reflects global constitutional trends and ensures that the constitution remains responsive to contemporary social, technological, environmental realities. Review of Chapter 5, the social justice section. Current position, Chapter 5 establishes socio-economic rights and principles of social justice including state responsibilities in areas such as education, health and housing.

What is the union's position? The FTU strongly supports strengthening the social justice framework. How? The recommendation, the constitution should, 1. Strengthen state obligations for progressive realization of socio-economic rights. 2. Ensure equitable access to essential services including education and health care.

3. Prioritize vulnerable and disadvantaged communities. The rationale, socio-economic rights are essential for ensuring that constitutional freedoms are meaningful in practice. Without access to basic services, formal rights cannot be fully realized.

Then 22. Transition to detailed chapter review.
The following section of this submission will provide a full article-by-article review of the remaining constitutional chapters including executive government, parliament, judiciary, accountability institutions, public service, military provisions, constitutional amendment procedures.

Each chapter will be assessed using the structured framework outlined in Section 16. The detailed review is presented in Appendix A to ensure clarity, accessibility and ease of reference for the Constitutional Review Commission. 23.

Review of Chapter 7, the executive. Current position, Chapter 7 of the constitution establishes the executive authority of the state including the Prime Minister, Cabinet and supporting structures of executive governance. It vests significant authority in the executive to implement laws, formulate policy and administer government functions.

What is our position? The juduciary union recognizes the necessity of an effective executive for stable governance. However, the union considers that constitutional safeguards for accountability and parliamentary oversight should be strengthened. Recommendation.

The constitution should be amended to 1. Strengthen parliamentary scrutiny of executive decision-making. 2. Require greater transparency in cabinet decisions affecting public policy. 3. Introduce clearer reporting obligations from ministers to parliament.

4. Reinforce checks and balances between the executive, legislature and the judiciary. The rationale in 23.4 over to page 27. While strong executive leadership is necessary for effective governance, constitutional democracy requires that such authority is exercised within a frame of accountability.

The strengthening oversight mechanism enhances transparency, reduces the risk of abuse of power and improves public trust in government institutions. Chapter 8. Review the legislature. Current position.

Chapter 8. Establishes a unicameral parliament responsible for lawmaking, representation and oversight of the executive. What is FTO's position? The fiduciary union supports strengthening parliament's legislative and oversight functions, including improved public participation in the legislative process. In our recommendation, the union recommends strengthening parliamentary committee systems, including investigatory powers, 2. Enhancing objectives for public submissions of proposed legislation, improving transparency of parliamentary proceedings and decision-making, considering reforms to increase representational inclusiveness.

The union further recommends that national dialogue considers whether Fijji would benefit from additional consultative chambers representing civil society, provincial interests or professional sectors. A strong parliament is essential for democratic governance. Enhance scrutiny, transparency in public engagement ensures that laws reflect the needs and aspirations of the people and improve institutional legitimacy.

Over the page to page 28, chapter 9. The judiciary. The current position in regards to the judiciary is, I mean, chapter 9. Establishes the independence of the judiciary and provides for the administration of justice through the courts of Fiji. What is FTU's position? The Fiji teacher's union strongly supports independence of the judiciary.

I repeat, the independence of the judiciary is important as a cornerstone of constitutional democracy. Our recommendation, the constitution should be strengthened to ensure, 1. Greater transparency in judicial appointment processes, 2. Enhance security of tenure for judicial offices, 3. Clear safeguards against external interference in judicial decision-making, and lastly, continue the strengthening of judicial integrity and accountability mechanisms. The rationale that we are giving is an independent judiciary is essential for the protection of constitutional rights and the maintenance of the rule of law.

Public confidence in the justice system depends on fairness, transparency and institutional independence. Then we are looking at chapter 10. Accountability institutions.

And under 26.1, the current position is chapter 10. Provides for independent constitutional offices and accountability institutions designed to ensure integrity in public administration. What is FTU's position? The Fiji teacher's union supports the strengthening of independent accountability institutions and considers them essential for good governance.

In our recommendation, appointments to constitutional offices should be guided by, 1. Transparent selection processes, 2. Merit-based criteria, 3. Parliamentary oversight and scrutiny, and 4. Clear protection of institutional independence once appointments are made.

26.4. Rationale. Why are we saying that? Independent oversight institutions are critical for preventing corruption, ensuring accountability and maintaining public trust in government systems.

Their independence must be constitutionally protected both in appointment and in operation. Then chapter 11. Public service.

The current position, chapter 11, establishes the framework for public service administration, including principles of public sector governance. FTU's position, the Fiji teacher's union supports a professional, we support a professional, merit-based and politically neutral public service. And in saying so, we recommend the constitution should explicitly guarantee, 1. Merit-based recruitment and promotion, including experience, 2. Protection from political interference or victimization, 3. Equal opportunity in public employment.

Equal opportunity, advertisements and other things must be there. Out should go the regulation and all other processes. Professional independence of public officers.

Special recognition should be given to education sector professionals to ensure that teacher appointments and promotions are based on qualifications, experience and, of course, professional standards. The rationale. A professional public service is essential for efficient governance and equitable service delivery.

Protecting public servants from political influence strengthens institutional integrity and improves public confidence. That is very important in our, in as far as FTU's stand is. Chapter 12.

The Fiji Republic Military Forces current position. Chapter 12 recognizes the existence and role of the Republic of the Fiji Military Forces within the constitutional framework. FTU's position, the Fiji teacher's union considers that the constitutional role of the military should be clearly defined within a democratic framework that affirms civilian supremacy.

Recommendation, the constitution should explicitly provide the civilian authority supreme over the military. The military remains politically neutral at all times. Parliamentary oversight applies to defense and security matters.

The military's role is limited to national defense and lawful functions. The rationale, clear constitutional separation between civilian governance and military authority is essential for democratic stability and the prevention of political interference in governance in future. Review of Chapter 13.

Amendment of the constitution. Current position, Chapter 13 establishes the procedures for constitutional amendment including parliamentary thresholds and legal requirements. FTU's position, the Fiji teacher's union considers that constitutional amendment procedures should ensure stability while allowing democratic flexibility.

Recommendation, the constitution should require that major constitutional amendments include broad cross-party parliamentary support, structured public consultation processes, referendum approval for fundamental constitutional changes where appropriate. Rationale, constitution should not be subject to change by narrow or temporary political majorities. A balanced amendment process protects constitutional stability while ensuring democratic legitimacy.

30, Transmission to Appendix Review, the detailed close-by-close review of the constitution including additional technical commentary and proposed drafting language provided in appendix A of the submission. The following final sections of this report will set out. Consolidated constitutional amendment proposals.

Implementation, consideration, concluding observations and supporting references and appendices. Education is a fundamental constitutional right. Introduction, the Fiji teacher's union proposes inclusion of a dedicated constitutional chapter on education.

Education is fundamental to democratic citizenship, national development and social equality. It is a primary means through which individuals acquire knowledge, skills and civic awareness necessary for participation in society. Proposed constitutional principle, the constitution should recognize that every person has the right to quality, inclusive and equitable education.

State obligations, the state shall be responsible for ensuring free and compulsory primary and secondary education, providing equitable access to education in rural, urban and maritime regions, ensuring inclusive education for patients with disabilities, maintaining adequate funding for public education institutions, ensuring availability of qualified and professionally trained teachers. Teacher professionalism, the constitution should guarantee that. Teachers are appointed and promoted on the basis of merit, qualifications, professional standards and experience.

Teachers shall enjoy protection from arbitrary dismissal of political interference. Teachers shall have the right to safe, respectful and professionally supportive working environments. And fourthly, continuous professional development shall be supported by the state.

Rationale, why are we saying that? A constitutionally protected education system ensures that education is not treated as a discretionary policy area, but as a national priority essential to democracy, equality and development. Then women and children, women's rights, the constitution should expressly guarantee equality between men and women and prohibit all forms of discrimination based on gender. The constitution should prohibit domestic violence, sexual harassment in all environments, workplace discrimination, gender-based violence in any form.

32.2, children's rights. The constitution should recognize that children require special protection due to their vulnerability and independence. The state shall ensure protection from, over the page 34, abuse, neglect and exploitation, harmful labor practices, violence in all settings, including educational institutions.

Corporal punishment. The constitution should explicitly state, no child shall be subjected to corporal punishment or any form of cruel, degrading or humiliating treatment or discipline. Rationale, these protections align with international child rights standards and reflect modern constitutional principles recognizing dignity, safety and equality.

Workers' rights and social dialogue, 33.1, freedom of association. Every worker shall have the right to freely form, join and participate in trade unions without interference.

33.2, collective bargaining.

The constitution should guarantee the right to collective bargaining, including negotiation of wages and working conditions, representation in employment disputes, protection of union autonomy. 33.3, protection from victimization. And we go on to say that no worker shall be subjected to dismissal, discrimination or retaliation for, one, exercising trade union rights, two, participating in lawful industrial action, in other words lawful industrial action, engaging in workplace representation.

33.4, social dialogue.
The constitution should promote a structured consultation between government, employees' organizations and workers' organizations. This constitution should apply to matters of labor policy, economic planning and industrial relations.

Rationale, strong labor rights contribute to fairer places, social stability and inclusive economic development.

34, environment and climate responsibility.
Environmental rights, the constitution should recognize the right of every person to a clean, healthy and sustainable environment.

Responsibility of the state, the state shall be obligated to, one, protect and preserve natural resources, promote sustainable development, prevent environmental degradation and, fourthly, respond effectively to climate-related risks and disasters.

34.3, climate change.
Given Fiji's vulnerability to climate change impacts, the constitution should recognize climate action as a national responsibility.

34.4, intergenerational equity.
The constitution should affirm, over to page 36, the state shall safeguard the environment for the benefit of present as well as future generations. Rationale, environmental protection is essential for national survival, economic stability and the well-being of future generations.

35, right to information and transparency.
Access to information, that's 35.1. The constitution should guarantee the right of every person to access information held by public authorities, subject only to reasonable limitations in the public interest. Government transparency, that's 35.2. Public institutions shall be required to, one, operate in an open and transparent manner, two, publish information relating to public decision-making, and three, ensure accountability in the use of public resources.

35.3, the rationale that we are putting across, access to information strengthens democracy by enabling citizens to participate meaningfully in governance and hold public institutions accountable.

36, local government and community participation, constitutional recognition. The constitution should recognize the role of local government in delivering services and promoting community participation in governance.

36.2, decentralization. The state should promote decentralized governance to ensure efficient service delivery, community involvement in decision-making, and equitable development across regions. The rationale, local government strengthens democracy by bringing decision-making closer to communities, which is very important in our belief.

And improving responsiveness to local needs. Then our final recommendations, implementation, and conclusion.

37, consolidated constitutional amendment proposals.

37.1, overview of this section consolidates the key constitutional reform proposal advanced by the Fiji Teachers Union throughout this submission. These recommendations are intended to strengthen democratic governance, protect fundamental rights, and ensure that the constitution reflects the aspirations of all citizens in Fiji.

37.2, core constitutional amendments proposed.

The Fiji Teachers Union recommends that the following areas be considered for constitutional amendment or inclusion.

A. democratic governance. Strengthening parliamentary oversight of the executive, enhancing transparency and accountability in government.t decision-making, expanding public participation in legislative processes.

B, Bill of Rights expansion. Recognition of academic freedom, protection of digital rights and personal data, extending workers' rights including collective bargaining, enhanced protections for women and children, explicit environmental and climate rights.

C. education chapter, constitutional recognition of education as a fundamental right, state obligation to provide free, inclusive, and equitable education, protection of teacher professionalism and institutional independence.

D. workers' rights and social dialogue, constitutional guarantee of freedom of association, protection of trade union autonomy, recognition of collective bargaining as a fundamental right.

E. accountability institutions, transparent and merit-based appointment processes, strengthen independence of constitutional offices, parliamentary oversight of key appointments.

F. constitutional amendment process, requirement for broad parliamentary consensus, mandatory public consultation for major reforms, referendum for fundamental constitutional changes.

38, implementation and transitional considerations, legal and institutional transition.

The implementation of constitutional reforms will require a carefully managed transition process to ensure stability and continuity of governance. The Fiji Teachers' Union recommends that existing laws be reviewed for consistency with constitutional amendments, transitional provisions be established to guide institutional adjustments, adequate timelines be provided for implementation of new constitutional obligations.

38.2, institutional strengthening.

Successful constitutional reform will depend on the capacity of public institutions to implement and uphold new constitutional standards. The union recommends strengthening parliamentary committees and research capacity, judicial training and resourcing, public service professionalism and independence, education sector governance structures.

38.3, public awareness and civic education.

The union emphasizes the importance of civic education to ensure the citizens understand their constitutional rights and responsibilities. This should include public education campaigns and constitutional rights, integration of civic education in school curricula, engagement with civil society and community organizations.

39, awaking conclusion.
The Fiji Teachers' Union submits this document in the spirit of constructive national engagement and constitutional development. Constitutional reform is not merely a legal or technical exercise.

It is a nation-building process that defines the values, aspirations and institutional foundations of the state. Our constitution must therefore reflect both the historical experiences of the nation and the shared vision for its future. The union believes that Fiji's constitutional future should be guided by the principles of democracy, equality, accountability, transparency and the respect for human dignity.

It should protect fundamental rights, strengthen institutions and ensure that governance serves the interests of all citizens. Education remains central to this vision. An educated population is essential for democratic participation, economic development and social cohesion.

For this reason, the union places particular emphasis on constitutional recognition of education and the professional status of teachers. The union also emphasizes that workers' rights, women's rights, children's rights, environmental protection and access to information are not peripheral issues, but essential components of modern constitutional democracy. The Fiji Teachers' Union respectfully submits that the recommendations contained in this paper will contribute to the development of a constitution that is inclusive, balanced and forward-looking, one that protects every Fijian and strengthens national unity.

And Fiji's final statement, the Fiji Teachers' Union reaffirms its commitment to supporting a democratic, peaceful and prosperous Fiji. As educators, we recognize our responsibility not only to teach, but also to contribute to the civic and constitutional development of our beloved nation. We therefore present this submission as a constructive contribution to Fiji's constitutional future and as an expression of our enduring commitment to education, justice and national development.

Sir, it is respectfully submitted to the Commission. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much, Mr. Goundar.

Your oral submission is accepted together with the written submission which you have tendered. And your oral submission has been recorded. It will be deliberated upon together with your written submission.

We thank you very much indeed for your submission. This morning, we accepted the oral submission and the written submission. We will remember what the Union has submitted today, the belief of the Union that Fiji's constitutional future should be guided by the principles of democracy, equality, accountability, transparency and respect for human dignity.

It should protect fundamental rights, strengthen institutions and ensure that governance serves the interest of all citizens. We will remember that during our deliberations. We have been considering all those during the submissions which we have heard.

Does any other Commissioner wish to make a statement?

Mr. Kohli: Thank you, Mr. Goundar. Just a few clarifications. On page 118 of your submission, you are comparing 1970 constitution, 1990, 1997 and 2013.

You make particular reference to the 1970 constitution negotiated between representatives of the UK, indigenous Fijian leaders, Indo-Fijians and other communities. 1990, many organizations including civil society groups, religious bodies, trade unions, international observers encouraged further. 1997 constitution represents an important milestone in Fiji.

It emerged from an extensive process of public consultation, political negotiation and sought to encourage consensus among Fijian communities. However, you mention nothing about 2013 constitution and one of the reasons why you are disappointed is because of democratic deficit in the constitution and you have been asked to do Fiji-wide consultation. So, what is your comments about 2013 constitution?

Dr. Gounder: Well, thank you, Commissioner.
I missed out but let me put it up here. Well, the 2013, the others, you know, the 1970 constitution, the 1990, 1997, all were sort of a democratic way it was formed or done or written. But when you look at the 2013 constitution, we know what all happened there.

And I may not shy away from saying that it was a one-man constitution. Please take note of it. It was a one-man constitution.

Somebody just, you know, put that constitution to us through 2013 constitution. And that is the very reason that we need to take the good parts of the constitution and those parts that are not applicable to democracy must be removed and added with what the union has put across. Thank you.

Mr. Kohli: Next question I have is maybe a typo error. Forgive me if I am wrong. Just that you got chapters there, you got chapter 13, which I couldn't find in constitution, 2013 constitution.

And chapter 12, you said deals with Fiji public military forces. It doesn't. So, is it a typo error? In which case, you can take this back and just correct it.

Dr. Gounder: Okay. Thank you. Thank you.

I gave it to my PA and I think it's a typo error. I'll go back, I'll correct, and then I'll give a corrected version. Wherever I've said, you know, chapter, please ignore that.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. There's another, another point. Another point, Dr. Gounder. You stated that the 1997 constitution, yeah, that the 1997 constitution was a unicameral or had a unicameral legislature. This is page 14. And then the 2013 constitution had a unicameral parliament.

Dealing with parliament on page 14. Page 14. Parliament.

Page 14. Unicameral parliament is devisal to all mentioned committee structures. Unicameral legislature with oversight functions.

Right. Was it a unicameral parliament or legislature in 1997? There was a senate in 1997.

Dr. Gounder: Yeah. That's what I meant. You know, unicameral is, you know, with the parliament as well as the senate. But 2013, it only has the parliament.

Mr. Valenitabua: No senate. So that is a typo.

Dr. Gounder: Yeah, yeah.

Bye. Yeah. Thank you.

Mr. valenitabua: Thank you. Since you're going back to correct it, just please also correct that.

Dr. Gounder: Yeah, I've marked it too.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much, Mr. Gounder. Thank you very much for your submissions. We're very thankful for your submissions today.

Please pardon us for rushing you through because we've just got one-hour slots. It's the last week of the consultations and suddenly we have overdrive when a lot of associations and submitters wanted to come in. So, thank you very much.

We will end this consultation here. We have the unity party. Thank you, sir.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Commissioner. I know you're pressed for time and that one hour is enough for me to put across what you wanted. Thank you so much.

Mr. Valenitabua: Excuse me, Mr. Gounder. Excuse me. Let's take a photo.

----------End Of Session [6-7-2026]----------

Fiji Teachers Union

Constitutional Review Commission

Presentation

2026

A Submission by the Fiji Teachers Union to the Constitutional Review Commission 2026

BUILDING FIJI'S CONSTITUTIONAL FUTURE

A Submission by the Fiji Teachers Union (FTU)

To the Constitutional Review Commission

6th July 2026

Prepared by

Fiji Teachers Union

Office of the General Secretary

Suva, Fiji

Submitted by

Muniappa Goundar

General Secretary

Fiji Teachers Union

Theme

"A Democratic, Inclusive and Future-Focused Constitution for Every Fijian."

Letter of Submission

The Chairperson
Constitutional Review Commission
Suva, Fiji

Dear Chairperson,

On behalf of the Fiji Teachers Union (FTU), I am honored to submit this paper entitled Building Fiji's Constitutional Future: A Submission by the Fiji Teachers Union to the Constitutional Review Commission.

The Fiji Teachers Union welcomes the opportunity to participate in this important national process. Constitutional reform is not simply a legal exercise; it is an opportunity for the people of Fiji to renew their shared commitment to democracy, justice, equality, accountability, and national unity.

For more than ninety years, the Fiji Teachers Union has contributed to the educational, social, and democratic development of Fiji. As representatives of teachers and education professionals across the country, we believe that education plays a central role in building informed citizens and strengthening democratic institutions. The Constitution should therefore provide a framework that protects the rights of all people, supports effective governance, and promotes social progress for present and future generations.

This submission reflects extensive consideration of constitutional principles, Fiji's constitutional history, comparative constitutional experience, and internationally recognized standards relating to human rights, education, labour rights, and democratic governance. It identifies areas of the current Constitution that should be retained, provisions that would benefit from amendment, and new constitutional protections that the Union believes would strengthen Fiji's constitutional framework.

The Fiji Teachers Union respectfully submits that any future Constitution should be founded on broad public participation, constitutional supremacy, respect for the rule of law, protection of fundamental rights, equality before the law, judicial independence, accountable government, and meaningful consultation with the people.

We commend the Constitutional Review Commission for undertaking this important work and express our appreciation for the opportunity to contribute constructively to Fiji's constitutional future.

We trust that the recommendations contained in this submission will assist the Commission in developing constitutional arrangements that promote democratic governance, protect human dignity, and strengthen national unity.

Yours faithfully,

Muniappa Goundar
General Secretary
Fiji Teachers Union

Table of Contents

TABLE OF CONTENTS

1. Cover Page
2. Letter of Submission
3. Executive Summary
4. About the Fiji Teachers Union
5. Historical Background of Constitutional Development in Fiji (1970–2026)
6. FTU Vision and Guiding Principles for Constitutional Reform
7. Comparative Analysis of the 1997 and 2013 Constitutions
8. FTU Recommendations on Key Constitutional Themes
9. Chapter-by-Chapter Review of the 2013 Constitution
10. Proposed New Constitutional Chapters
11. Draft Constitutional Amendment Proposals
12. Implementation Considerations
13. Conclusion

14.Appendices

15.References and Bibliography

Executive Summary

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The Constitution is the supreme law of a nation. It establishes the institutions of government, protects the rights and freedoms of citizens, defines the relationship between the State and the people, and provides the framework within which democratic governance is exercised. Constitutional reform is therefore one of the most significant responsibilities undertaken by any nation.

The Fiji Teachers Union welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the Constitutional Review Commission's work and views this process as an important nation-building exercise. As one of Fiji's longest-established professional organizations, the Union believes that constitutional reform should promote democratic governance, social justice, equality, accountability, respect for diversity, and the rule of law. A Constitution should not only respond to present challenges but also provide a stable foundation for future generations.

This submission is guided by the principle that Fiji's constitutional future should draw upon the strengths of previous constitutional arrangements while responding to contemporary national priorities. The Union recognizes that both the 1997 Constitution and the 2013 Constitution contain valuable features. Rather than advocating a wholesale return to one constitutional model, the Union recommends a balanced approach that retains effective provisions, strengthens areas requiring improvement, and introduces new protections that reflect modern constitutional practice.

The Union recommends retaining the principles of equal citizenry, comprehensive protection against discrimination, and socio-economic rights while strengthening democratic institutions through enhanced parliamentary oversight, judicial independence, transparent appointments, and robust accountability mechanisms. The submission also proposes clearer constitutional recognition of academic freedom, workers' rights, trade union autonomy, children's rights, gender equality, environmental stewardship, and access to information.

A central recommendation is the inclusion of a dedicated chapter on education. Education is fundamental to democratic participation, economic development, and social cohesion. The Constitution should recognize every child's right to quality education, affirm the importance of qualified and respected teachers, and place progressive obligations on the State to provide adequate educational resources across urban, rural, and maritime communities.

The Union further recommends constitutional protection for meaningful social dialogue between government, employers, workers, and civil society. Strong democratic societies are built through consultation and participation rather than exclusion. Constitutional processes should encourage consensus, transparency, and public confidence in national institutions.

This submission concludes that Fiji's future Constitution should be democratic, participatory, inclusive, accountable, rights-based, and forward-looking. It should strengthen national unity while respecting Fiji's cultural diversity and constitutional traditions. Above all, it should belong to the people of Fiji and reflect their shared aspirations for a peaceful, just, and prosperous nation.

The Fiji Teachers Union respectfully offers this submission in the spirit of constructive engagement and in the hope that it will assist the Constitutional Review Commission in developing constitutional arrangements that serve the interests of all present and future generations of Fiji.

BUILDING FIJI'S CONSTITUTIONAL FUTURE

Submission by the Fiji Teachers Union to the Constitutional Review Commission

PART I

THE FIJI TEACHERS UNION AND FIJI'S CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT

---

5. ABOUT THE FIJI TEACHERS UNION

5.1 Introduction

The Fiji Teachers Union (FTU) is one of Fiji's oldest and most respected professional organizations. Since its establishment in 1931, the Union has served as the principal representative body for teachers, advocating for quality education, professional excellence, fair employment practices, and the advancement of educational opportunities for all children in Fiji.

For more than nine decades, the FTU has worked collaboratively with governments, communities, educational institutions, and international partners to strengthen Fiji's education system. While the Union's primary role is the representation of teachers and education professionals, its broader mission has always included promoting social justice, democratic participation, equality of opportunity, and national development through education.

The Union recognizes that education is fundamental to the development of responsible citizens, strong democratic institutions, and sustainable economic growth. Consequently, constitutional reform is of direct importance to the education sector and to the wider public interest.

5.2 The Role of Teachers in Nation Building

Teachers occupy a unique position within society. Every generation of Fiji's citizens passes through the nation's classrooms. Teachers therefore contribute not only to academic achievement but also to the development of civic responsibility, respect for diversity, critical thinking, and democratic values.

A Constitution establishes the legal framework within which education is delivered. Constitutional guarantees relating to equality, non-discrimination, children's rights, language, culture, freedom of expression, labour rights, and public administration all have significant implications for schools, teachers, students, and families.

For this reason, the Fiji Teachers Union believes that educators have both a professional responsibility and a civic obligation to contribute thoughtfully to constitutional reform.

5.3 FTU's Interest in Constitutional Reform

The Union approaches constitutional reform from a non-partisan perspective. Its interest is not aligned with any political party or ideology. Rather, the FTU seeks constitutional arrangements that strengthen democratic governance, protect human rights, enhance educational opportunities, safeguard professional independence, and promote national unity.

The recommendations contained in this submission are intended to contribute constructively to the Constitutional Review Commission's work and are offered in the spirit of dialogue, consultation, and nation building.

---

6. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT IN FIJI (1970–2026)

6.1 Introduction

The constitutional history of Fiji reflects the country's political evolution, cultural diversity, and continuing efforts to balance democratic governance with the aspirations of its people. Since Independence in 1970, Fiji has experienced several constitutional transitions, each influenced by changing political, social, and historical circumstances.

Understanding this constitutional journey provides valuable context for the current review process. The Fiji Teachers Union believes that future constitutional reform should build upon the strengths of previous constitutional arrangements while addressing lessons learned from the past.

6.2 The 1970 Independence Constitution

Fiji attained independence on 10 October 1970 under a Constitution negotiated between representatives of the United Kingdom, indigenous Fijian leaders, Indo-Fijian representatives, and other community leaders.

The Constitution established a Westminster-style parliamentary democracy under a constitutional monarchy and sought to balance representative government with protections for Fiji's diverse ethnic communities.

The Independence Constitution provided political stability during the early years of nationhood. However, over time, concerns emerged regarding the extent to which constitutional arrangements adequately reflected evolving democratic expectations and changing social realities.

6.3 The 1990 Constitution

Following the political events of 1987, a new Constitution came into effect in 1990.

The 1990 Constitution introduced significant changes to the structure of government and electoral representation. While it sought to address particular political concerns of the period, it also generated debate regarding equality, representation, and constitutional legitimacy.

Many organizations, including civil society groups, religious bodies, trade unions, and international observers, encouraged further constitutional dialogue aimed at strengthening national unity and promoting broader public confidence.

6.4 The 1997 Constitution

The 1997 Constitution represented an important milestone in Fiji's constitutional development. It emerged from an extensive process of public consultation and political negotiation and sought to encourage consensus among Fiji's diverse communities.

The Constitution strengthened the protection of fundamental rights, reinforced the independence of key constitutional institutions, recognized principles of good governance, and promoted greater inclusiveness in public administration.

Many aspects of the 1997 Constitution continue to be regarded as significant contributions to Fiji's constitutional development, particularly its emphasis on consultation, reconciliation, and democratic participation.

6.5 The 2013 Constitution

The Constitution adopted in 2013 introduced substantial reforms to Fiji's constitutional framework. Among its notable features were the establishment of equal citizenry, an expanded Bill of Rights, constitutional recognition of socio-economic rights, and strengthened anti-discrimination protections. It also brought significant changes to the structure of Parliament, the Executive, and key constitutional institutions.

While many of these reforms have been welcomed, concerns have been raised by some stakeholders regarding the extent of executive authority, parliamentary oversight mechanisms, constitutional amendment procedures, and the processes for appointing certain public offices. In particular, critics have argued that the drafting process was highly centralized, with a significant role attributed to then Attorney-

General Aiyaz Sayed-Khaiyum, and that it did not reflect broad-based national consensus or extensive public consultation.

The Fiji Teachers Union considers that the current constitutional review presents an opportunity to retain the strengths of the 2013 Constitution while addressing areas that may benefit from refinement, including those relating to participation, accountability, and institutional balance.

6.6 The Constitutional Review Process

Constitutions derive their enduring legitimacy from public confidence and broad participation. Periodic constitutional review enables nations to respond to social change, strengthen democratic institutions, and ensure that constitutional arrangements remain relevant to contemporary circumstances.

The current review provides an opportunity to consider how Fiji's Constitution can continue to protect rights, encourage accountable government, foster national unity, and support sustainable development.

The Fiji Teachers Union welcomes this process as an opportunity for constructive national dialogue and encourages widespread public participation so that the Constitution reflects the aspirations of all people of Fiji.

---

7. WHY CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM MATTERS

A Constitution is more than a legal document. It expresses the shared values of a nation and establishes the principles upon which government exercises public authority.

Effective constitutions create institutions that are transparent, accountable, and responsive to the people. They protect individual rights while recognising the responsibilities of citizens toward one another and toward future generations.

For educators, constitutional reform carries particular significance. Every school operates within the constitutional framework established by the State. Educational policy, children's rights, equality of opportunity, freedom of thought, cultural diversity, labour protections, and public administration are all influenced by constitutional principles.

The Fiji Teachers Union therefore considers constitutional reform to be inseparable from the broader goals of educational excellence, democratic citizenship, social cohesion, and national development.

Accordingly, the Union supports constitutional arrangements that promote the rule of law, safeguard independent institutions, protect fundamental rights, encourage participation, and strengthen public confidence in democratic governance.

PART II

FTU VISION AND GUIDING PRINCIPLES FOR CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

8. A CONSTITUTION FOR ALL FIJIANS

8.1 Introduction

The Fiji Teachers Union believes that a constitution should reflect the collective aspirations of the people while providing a stable framework for democratic governance, the protection of rights, and the peaceful resolution of differences. It should command public confidence because it is grounded in the rule of law, broad participation, and respect for the dignity and equality of every person.

Constitutional reform should therefore seek to preserve those aspects of Fiji's constitutional development that have strengthened democracy and national unity, while improving provisions that experience has shown may benefit from amendment.

The Union does not advocate constitutional change for its own sake. Rather, it supports reform that is carefully considered, evidence-based, and directed toward the long-term interests of the people of Fiji.

8.2 Guiding Constitutional Principles

The Fiji Teachers Union recommends that the following principles guide constitutional reform:

Constitutional Supremacy

The Constitution should remain the supreme law of Fiji. Every person and every institution, including Parliament, the Executive, the Judiciary, and all public authorities, should exercise their powers in accordance with the Constitution.

Democracy

Government derives its authority from the people. Democratic institutions should be representative, accountable, transparent, and responsive to the public.

Rule of Law

All persons are equal before the law. Public power should be exercised only in accordance with legal authority, and independent courts should remain the final arbiters of constitutional disputes.

Human Dignity

Every individual possesses inherent dignity and should enjoy equal protection of the law without discrimination.

Equality and Equal Citizenship

The Constitution should continue to recognize the equal citizenship of every Fijian and prohibit discrimination on recognized grounds. Equality before the law is essential to national unity and social cohesion.

Respect for Diversity

Fiji's constitutional framework should acknowledge and respect the country's rich cultural, linguistic, and religious diversity. Constitutional recognition of diversity strengthens national unity by fostering mutual respect and inclusion.

Accountability and Transparency

Public office is a public trust. Constitutional institutions should promote openness, integrity, accountability, and responsible stewardship of public resources.

Participation and Consultation

The Constitution should encourage meaningful public participation in national decision-making. Consultation with citizens, civil society, employers, workers, professional bodies, and community organizations contributes to better governance and stronger public confidence.

Social Justice

The Constitution should promote fair opportunities for all people and support the progressive realization of economic, social, and cultural rights, particularly for vulnerable and disadvantaged groups.

Intergenerational Responsibility

Constitutional governance should recognize responsibilities to future generations by supporting sustainable development, environmental protection, quality education, and responsible public administration.

---

9. COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF THE 1997 AND 2013 CONSTITUTIONS

9.1 Purpose of the Comparison

The Fiji Teachers Union considers that constitutional reform should draw lessons from Fiji's constitutional experience rather than regard previous constitutions as mutually exclusive alternatives. Both the 1997 Constitution and the 2013 Constitution contain provisions that have contributed positively to Fiji's constitutional development.

The objective of this comparison is to identify those features that should be retained, strengthened, or reconsidered in any future constitutional framework.

Comparative Overview

Constitutional Area	1997 Constitution	2013 Constitution	FTU Assessment
Foundational Principles	Emphasized consensus-building, power-sharing, and consultation.	Emphasized equal citizenry, national unity, and constitutional rights.	Future reform should combine inclusive governance with equal citizenship and strong rights protections.
Bill of Rights	Comprehensive civil and political rights.	Expanded to include socio-economic rights and broader	Retain the expanded Bill of Rights while considering additional protections for academic freedom, digital anti-discrimination protections.	rights, and workplace rights.

Executive	Included mechanisms intended to encourage broader political participation.	Provides a strong Executive with significant constitutional authority.	Review opportunities to strengthen parliamentary oversight and accountability while maintaining effective government.
Parliament	Bicameral legislature with oversight functions.	Unicameral Parliament with revised electoral arrangements and committee structures.	Strengthen Bicameral legislature with oversight functions.
Judiciary	Protected judicial independence through constitutional safeguards.	Continues constitutional protection of judicial independence.	Retain and enhance transparent judicial appointments and security of tenure.
Public Service	Recognised an independent public service.	Establishes the constitutional framework for public administration.	Strengthen guarantees of merit-based appointments, professionalism, and protection from improper political influence.
Constitutional Amendment	Amendment procedures reflected the constitutional framework of the time.	Establishes procedures for constitutional amendment.	Review whether amendment processes should encourage broad parliamentary support, public consultation, and, where appropriate, referenda for major constitutional changes.

9.2 Lessons from Fiji's Constitutional Experience

The constitutional history of Fiji demonstrates several enduring lessons.

First, constitutions are most durable when they enjoy broad public confidence and are supported by meaningful civic participation.

Second, effective democratic governance requires an appropriate balance between decisive government and institutional accountability. Strong executive leadership should be accompanied by effective parliamentary scrutiny, independent courts, and robust accountability institutions.

Third, constitutional protection of fundamental rights contributes to social stability, national cohesion, and public confidence in government.

Fourth, constitutional recognition of socio-economic rights, including education and health, reflects the understanding that democratic societies flourish when individuals have genuine opportunities to develop their potential.

Finally, constitutional reform should be regarded as an ongoing process of democratic improvement rather than a contest between competing constitutional models. The objective should be to develop a constitutional framework that reflects Fiji's history, diversity, and aspirations while remaining capable of responding to future challenges.

9.3 The FTU Constitutional Vision

Drawing upon these lessons, the Fiji Teachers Union recommends that Fiji's future constitutional framework should:

- Uphold constitutional supremacy and the rule of law.
- Protect the equal citizenship and dignity of every person.
- Strengthen democratic institutions through accountability and transparency.
- Safeguard judicial independence and the separation of powers.
- Promote meaningful public participation in governance.
- Recognize education as a national priority and constitutional responsibility.

- Protect workers' rights and freedom of association.
- Advance gender equality and the rights of women and children.
- Support environmental stewardship and climate resilience.
- Encourage constitutional stability through inclusive and consultative amendment processes.

The Union believes that these principles provide a sound foundation for a Constitution that is democratic, inclusive, resilient, and responsive to the needs of present and future generations.

PART III

FTU CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM RECOMMENDATIONS

---

10. DEMOCRATIC GOVERNANCE AND INSTITUTIONAL BALANCE

10.1 Strengthening Democratic Governance

The Fiji Teachers Union recommends that Fiji's future constitutional framework should strengthen democratic governance by ensuring a balanced relationship between the Executive, Parliament, and the Judiciary. While effective government requires a capable Executive, constitutional arrangements must also ensure that authority is exercised within a system of accountability and oversight.

10.2 Parliamentary Oversight

The Union recommends that Parliament's oversight functions be strengthened through:

- Enhanced committee systems with investigatory powers.
- Mandatory reporting obligations by Ministers to Parliament on key policy areas.
- Strengthened parliamentary scrutiny of public expenditure and government programs.
- Greater opportunities for public submissions to parliamentary committees.

These measures would improve transparency, accountability, and public trust in democratic institutions.

10.3 Executive Accountability

The Constitution should provide clearer mechanisms for holding the Executive accountable to Parliament, including structured questioning of Ministers, regular reporting requirements, and transparent decision-making processes in matters of national importance.

---

11. BILL OF RIGHTS AND HUMAN DIGNITY

11.1 Strengthening the Bill of Rights

The Fiji Teachers Union supports the retention and strengthening of a comprehensive Bill of Rights that protects civil, political, economic, social, and cultural rights. These rights should be interpreted in a manner consistent with international human rights standards.

11.2 Academic Freedom

The Constitution should expressly guarantee academic freedom for teachers, lecturers, researchers, and educational institutions.

This includes:

- Freedom to teach, research, and disseminate knowledge.
- Protection from undue interference in academic content.
- Institutional autonomy for educational institutions within lawful frameworks.

Academic freedom is essential for innovation, critical thinking, and the development of informed citizens.

11.3 Digital Rights

The Union recommends constitutional recognition of digital rights, including:

- Protection from cyberbullying and online harassment.
- Safeguards for personal data and privacy.
- Protection against misuse of digital communication platforms.

These rights are increasingly essential in modern society.

2. EDUCATION AS A CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT

2.1 Recognition of Education

The Fiji Teachers Union strongly recommends that education be expressly recognized in the Constitution as a fundamental right and a core responsibility of the State.

12.2 State Obligations

The Constitution should impose progressive obligations on the State to ensure:

- Free and accessible primary and secondary education.
- Inclusive education for learners with disabilities.
- Equitable access to education in rural and maritime areas.
- Adequate funding for public education systems.
- Recruitment and retention of qualified teachers.

12.3 Teacher Professionalism

The Constitution should recognize professional status of teachers by guaranteeing:

- Merit-based appointment and promotion.
- Protection from political interference.
- Safe and respectful working environments.
- Opportunities for continuous professional development.

Teachers are central to national development, and their professional integrity should be constitutionally safeguarded.

---

13. TRADE UNION RIGHTS AND WORKERS' 'ROTECTION

13.1 Freedom of Association

The Constitution should explicitly guarantee the right of workers to form and join trade unions without interference.

13.2 Collective Bargaining

The Union recommends constitutional protection for collective bargaining as a fundamental labour right. This includes the right of unions and employers to negotiate terms and conditions of employment in good faith.

13.3 Protection from Victimization

Workers should be protected from retaliation or victimization for exercising lawful labour rights, including union participation and industrial advocacy.

13.4 Social Dialogue

The Constitution should promote structured dialogue between government, employers, and workers' 'rganizations on matters affecting employment, economic policy, and labour relations.

---

14. WOMEN AND CHILDREN

14.1 Protection of Women

The Constitution should strengthen protections for women by explicitly prohibiting:

- Gender-based violence.
- Domestic violence.
- Workplace discrimination.
- Sexual harassment in all settings.

14.2 Protection of Children

The Union recommends enhanced constitutional protection for children, including safeguards against:

- Abuse and neglect.
- Exploitation and harmful labour practices.
- Violence in all forms.

14.3 Corporal Punishment

The Constitution should expressly prohibit corporal punishment and any form of cruel, degrading, or humiliating treatment of children.

This reflects modern child protection standards and international best practice.

---

15. ENVIRONMENT AND FUTURE GENERATIONS

15.1 Environmental Responsibility

The Constitution should recognize environmental protection as a national responsibility. The State should be required to promote sustainable development and safeguard natural resources for present and future generations.

15.2 Climate Change

Given Fiji's 'vulnerability to climate change, the Constitution should recognize the State's 'obligation to adopt policies that support climate resilience, disaster preparedness, and environmental sustainability.

15.3 Intergenerational Equity

The Union recommends constitutional recognition of intergenerational responsibility, ensuring that present development does not compromise the rights and opportunities of future generations.

PART IV

METHODOLOGY AND CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW OF KEY CHAPTERS

16. APPROACH TO THE ARTICLE-BY-ARTICLE REVIEW

16.1 Purpose of the Review Method

The Fiji Teachers Union has adopted a structured and consistent methodology for reviewing the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013). This approach ensures that each constitutional provision is assessed in a transparent, systematic, and policy-relevant manner.

The purpose of this method is to assist the Constitutional Review Commission by providing:

- A clear summary of current constitutional provisions.
- An assessment of their strengths and limitations.
- Constructive recommendations for reform or retention.
- A rationale grounded in constitutional principles and public interest.

16.2 Review Framework

Each constitutional provision is assessed using the following framework:

(a) Current Position
A neutral description of the constitutional provision.

(b) FTU Position
The Union's overall assessment (retain, strengthen, or review).

(c) Recommendation
Specific proposed reforms or improvements.

(d) Rationale
Justification based on constitutional principles, governance needs, and international standards where applicable.

This structured approach ensures consistency across all chapters and enhances the usability of the submission for constitutional drafters.

---

17. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 1 – THE STATE

17.1 Current Position

Chapter 1 of the Constitution establishes Fiji as a sovereign democratic state and affirms the principles of constitutional supremacy and equal citizenship.

17.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union supports the retention of the core provisions of Chapter 1.

17.3 Recommendation

The Union recommends strengthening the language of Chapter 1 to explicitly affirm:

- Democratic governance as a foundational constitutional principle.
- Respect for diversity in Fiji's multicultural society.
- Commitment to social justice and equality.
- Reinforcement of constitutional supremacy.

17.4 Rationale

These enhancements would reinforce the foundational values of the Constitution and provide clearer guidance for interpretation by courts and public institutions.

---

18. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 2 – THE REPUBLIC OF FIJI

18.1 Current Position

Chapter 2 defines Fiji as a secular state and provides for national symbols and identity.

18.2 FTU Position

The Union supports retention of the secular character of the State with clarification.

18.3 Recommendation

The Constitution should:

- Maintain the principle of secularism.
- Explicitly guarantee freedom of religion and belief.
- Protect cultural expression and linguistic diversity.

18.4 Rationale

A secular state framework ensures neutrality in matters of religion while protecting the rights of all citizens to freely practice and express their beliefs. This is essential in a multicultural society such as Fiji.

---

19. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 3 – CITIZENSHIP

19.1 Current Position

Chapter 3 provides for equal citizenship for all Fijians, regardless of origin, ethnicity, or background.

19.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union strongly supports the retention of the principle of equal citizenship.

19.3 Recommendation

No major constitutional amendment is recommended. However, the Union encourages continued reinforcement of:

- Non-discrimination in the exercise of citizenship rights.
- Equal access to public services and opportunities.

19.4 Rationale

Equal citizenship is a cornerstone of national unity and democratic governance. It strengthens social cohesion and ensures that all citizens are treated with dignity and fairness under the law.

---

20. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 4 – BILL OF RIGHTS (STRUCTURAL OVERVIEW)

20.1 Current Position

Chapter 4 contains an extensive Bill of Rights, including civil, political, and socio-economic rights, along with protections against discrimination.

20.2 FTU Position

The Union supports retention and strengthening of the Bill of Rights.

20.3 Recommendation

The Bill of Rights should be expanded to explicitly include:

- Academic freedom.
- Digital and information rights.
- Stronger protections for workers and trade unions.
- Enhanced protections for children and women.
- Explicit recognition of environmental rights.

20.4 Rationale

The expansion of rights protection reflects global constitutional trends and ensures that the Constitution remains responsive to contemporary social, technological, and environmental realities.

---

21. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 5 – SOCIAL JUSTICE

21.1 Current Position

Chapter 5 establishes socio-economic rights and principles of social justice, including State responsibilities in areas such as education, health, and housing.

21.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union strongly supports strengthening the social justice framework.

21.3 Recommendation

The Constitution should:

- Strengthen State obligations for progressive realization of socio-economic rights.
- Ensure equitable access to essential services, including education and healthcare.
- Prioritize vulnerable and disadvantaged communities.

21.4 Rationale

Socio-economic rights are essential for ensuring that constitutional freedoms are meaningful in practice. Without access to basic services, formal rights cannot be fully realized.

---

22. TRANSITION TO DETAILED CHAPTER REVIEW

The following section of this submission will provide a full article-by-article review of the remaining constitutional chapters, including:

- Executive Government
- Parliament
- Judiciary
- Accountability institutions
- Public service
- Military provisions

- Constitutional amendment procedures

Each chapter will be assessed using the structured framework outlined in Section 16.

This detailed review is presented in Appendix A to ensure clarity, accessibility, and ease of reference for the Constitutional Review Commission.

PART V

INSTITUTIONAL FRAMEWORK OF GOVERNMENT

---

23. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 7 – THE EXECUTIVE

23.1 Current Position

Chapter 7 of the Constitution establishes the Executive authority of the State, including the Prime Minister, Cabinet, and supporting structures of executive governance. It vests significant authority in the Executive to implement laws, formulate policy, and administer government functions.

23.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union recognizes the necessity of an effective Executive for stable governance. However, the Union considers that constitutional safeguards for accountability and parliamentary oversight should be strengthened.

23.3 Recommendation

The Constitution should be amended to:

- Strengthen parliamentary scrutiny of executive decision-making.
- Require greater transparency in Cabinet decisions affecting public policy.
- Introduce clearer reporting obligations from Ministers to Parliament.
- Reinforce checks and balances between the Executive, Legislature, and Judiciary.

23.4 Rationale

While strong executive leadership is necessary for effective governance, constitutional democracy requires that such authority is exercised within a framework of accountability. Strengthening oversight mechanisms enhances transparency, reduces the risk of abuse of power, and improves public trust in government institutions.

---

24. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 8 – THE LEGISLATURE

24.1 Current Position

Chapter 8 establishes a unicameral Parliament responsible for law-making, representation, and oversight of the Executive.

24.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union supports strengthening Parliament's legislative and oversight functions, including improved public participation in the legislative process.

24.3 Recommendation

The Union recommends:

- Strengthening parliamentary committee systems, including investigatory powers.
- Enhancing opportunities for public submissions on proposed legislation.
- Improving transparency of parliamentary proceedings and decision-making.
- Considering reforms to increase representational inclusiveness.

The Union further recommends that national dialogue consider whether Fiji would benefit from an additional consultative chamber representing civil society, provincial interests, or professional sectors.

24.4 Rationale

A strong Parliament is essential for democratic governance. Enhanced scrutiny, transparency, and public engagement ensure that laws reflect the needs and aspirations of the people and improve institutional legitimacy.

25. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 9 – THE JUDICIARY

25.1 Current Position

Chapter 9 establishes the independence of the judiciary and provides for the administration of justice through the courts of Fiji.

25.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union strongly supports the independence of the judiciary as a cornerstone of constitutional democracy.

25.3 Recommendation

The Constitution should be strengthened to ensure:

- Greater transparency in judicial appointment processes.
- Enhanced security of tenure for judicial officers.
- Clear safeguards against external interference in judicial decision-making.
- Continued strengthening of judicial integrity and accountability mechanisms.

25.4 Rationale

An independent judiciary is essential for the protection of constitutional rights and the maintenance of the rule of law. Public confidence in the justice system depends on fairness, transparency, and institutional independence.

26. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 10 – ACCOUNTABILITY INSTITUTIONS

26.1 Current Position

Chapter 10 provides for independent constitutional offices and accountability institutions designed to ensure integrity in public administration.

26.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union supports the strengthening of independent accountability institutions and considers them essential for good governance.

26.3 Recommendation

Appointments to constitutional offices should be guided by:

- Transparent selection processes.
- Merit-based criteria.
- Parliamentary oversight and scrutiny.
- Clear protection of institutional independence once appointments are made.

26.4 Rationale

Independent oversight institutions are critical for preventing corruption, ensuring accountability, and maintaining public trust in government systems. Their independence must be constitutionally protected both in appointment and in operation.

---

27. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 11 – PUBLIC SERVICE

27.1 Current Position

Chapter 11 establishes the framework for public service administration, including principles of public sector governance.

27.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union supports a professional, merit-based, and politically neutral public service.

27.3 Recommendation

The Constitution should explicitly guarantee:

- Merit-based recruitment and promotion with experience also.
- Protection from political interference or victimization.

- Equal opportunity in public employment.
- Professional independence of public officers.

Special recognition should be given to education sector professionals to ensure that teacher appointments and promotions are based on qualifications, experience, and professional standards.

27.4 Rationale

A professional public service is essential for efficient governance and equitable service delivery. Protecting public servants from political influence strengthens institutional integrity and improves public confidence.

---

28. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 12 – THE FIJI REPUBLIC MILITARY FORCES

28.1 Current Position

Chapter 12 recognizes the existence and role of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces within the constitutional framework.

28.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union considers that the constitutional role of the military should be clearly defined within a democratic framework that affirms civilian supremacy.

28.3 Recommendation

The Constitution should explicitly provide that:

- Civilian authority is supreme over the military.
- The military remains politically neutral at all times.
- Parliamentary oversight applies to defence and security matters.
- The military's role is limited to national defence and lawful functions.

28.4 Rationale

Clear constitutional separation between civilian governance and military authority is essential for democratic stability and the prevention of political interference in governance.

29. REVIEW OF CHAPTER 13 – AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

29.1 Current Position

Chapter 13 establishes the procedures for constitutional amendment, including parliamentary thresholds and legal requirements.

29.2 FTU Position

The Fiji Teachers Union considers that constitutional amendment procedures should ensure stability while allowing democratic flexibility.

29.3 Recommendation

The Constitution should require that major constitutional amendments include:

- Broad cross-party parliamentary support.
- Structured public consultation processes.
- Referendum approval for fundamental constitutional changes where appropriate.

29.4 Rationale

Constitutions should not be subject to change by narrow or temporary political majorities. A balanced amendment process protects constitutional stability while ensuring democratic legitimacy.

30. TRANSITION TO APPENDIX REVIEW

The detailed clause-by-clause review of the Constitution, including additional technical commentary and proposed drafting language, is provided in Appendix A of this submission.

The following final sections of this report will set out:

- Consolidated constitutional amendment proposals
- Implementation considerations
- Concluding observations
- Supporting references and appendices

PART VI

PROPOSED NEW CONSTITUTIONAL CHAPTERS

---

31. EDUCATION AS A FUNDAMENTAL CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT

31.1 Introduction

The Fiji Teachers Union proposes the inclusion of a dedicated constitutional chapter on Education. Education is fundamental to democratic citizenship, national development, and social equality. It is the primary means through which individuals acquire knowledge, skills, and civic awareness necessary for participation in society.

31.2 Proposed Constitutional Principle

The Constitution should recognize that:

Every person has the right to quality, inclusive, and equitable education.

31.3 State Obligations

The State shall be responsible for:

- Ensuring free and compulsory primary and secondary education.
- Providing equitable access to education in rural, urban, and maritime regions.
- Ensuring inclusive education for persons with disabilities.
- Maintaining adequate funding for public education institutions.
- Ensuring availability of qualified and professionally trained teachers.

31.4 Teacher Professionalism

The Constitution should guarantee that:

- Teachers are appointed and promoted on the basis of merit, qualifications, and professional standards as well as experience.
- Teachers shall enjoy protection from arbitrary dismissal or political interference.
- Teachers shall have the right to safe, respectful, and professionally supportive working environments.
- Continuous professional development shall be supported by the State.

31.5 Rationale

A constitutionally protected education system ensures that education is not treated as a discretionary policy area but as a national priority essential to democracy, equality, and development.

---

32. WOMEN AND CHILDREN

32.1 Women's Rights

The Constitution should expressly guarantee equality between men and women and prohibit all forms of discrimination based on gender.

The Constitution should prohibit:

- Domestic violence.
- Sexual harassment in all environments.
- Workplace discrimination.
- Gender-based violence in any form.

32.2 Children's Rights

The Constitution should recognize that children require special protection due to their vulnerability and dependence.

The State shall ensure protection from:

- Abuse, neglect, and exploitation.
- Harmful labour practices.
- Violence in all settings, including educational institutions.

32.3 Corporal Punishment

The Constitution should explicitly state:

No child shall be subjected to corporal punishment or any form of cruel, degrading, or humiliating treatment or discipline.

32.4 Rationale

These protections align with international child rights standards and reflect modern constitutional principles recognizing dignity, safety, and equality.

---

33. WORKERS' RIGHTS AND SOCIAL DIALOGUE

33.1 Freedom of Association

Every worker shall have the right to freely form, join, and participate in trade unions without interference.

33.2 Collective Bargaining

The Constitution should guarantee the right to collective bargaining, including:

- Negotiation of wages and working conditions.
- Representation in employment disputes.
- Protection of union autonomy.

33.3 Protection from Victimization

No worker shall be subjected to dismissal, discrimination, or retaliation for:

- Exercising trade union rights.
- Participating in lawful industrial action.
- Engaging in workplace representation.

33.4 Social Dialogue

The Constitution should promote structured consultation between:

- Government.
- Employers' organizations.
- Workers' organizations.

This consultation should apply to matters of labour policy, economic planning, and industrial relations.

33.5 Rationale

Strong labour rights contribute to fair workplaces, social stability, and inclusive economic development.

---

34. ENVIRONMENT AND CLIMATE RESPONSIBILITY

34.1 Environmental Rights

The Constitution should recognize the right of every person to a clean, healthy, and sustainable environment.

34.2 State Responsibility

The State shall be obligated to:

- Protect and preserve natural resources.
- Promote sustainable development.
- Prevent environmental degradation.
- Respond effectively to climate-related risks and disasters.

34.3 Climate Change

Given Fiji's vulnerability to climate change impacts, the Constitution should recognize climate action as a national responsibility.

34.4 Intergenerational Equity

The Constitution should affirm that:

The State shall safeguard the environment for the benefit of present and future generations.

34.5 Rationale

Environmental protection is essential for national survival, economic stability, and the wellbeing of future generations.

---

35. RIGHT TO INFORMATION AND TRANSPARENCY

35.1 Access to Information

The Constitution should guarantee the right of every person to access information held by public authorities, subject only to reasonable limitations in the public interest.

35.2 Government Transparency

Public institutions shall be required to:

- Operate in an open and transparent manner.
- Publish information relating to public decision-making.
- Ensure accountability in the use of public resources.

35.3 Rationale

Access to information strengthens democracy by enabling citizens to participate meaningfully in governance and hold public institutions accountable.

---

36. LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND COMMUNITY PARTICIPATION

36.1 Constitutional Recognition

The Constitution should recognize the role of local government in delivering services and promoting community participation in governance.

36.2 Decentralization

The State should promote decentralized governance to ensure:

- Efficient service delivery.
- Community involvement in decision-making.
- Equitable development across regions.

36.3 Rationale

Local governance strengthens democracy by bringing decision-making closer to communities and improving responsiveness to local needs.

PART VII

FINAL RECOMMENDATIONS, IMPLEMENTATION, AND CONCLUSION

---

37. CONSOLIDATED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

37.1 Overview

This section consolidates the key constitutional reform proposals advanced by the Fiji Teachers Union throughout this submission. These recommendations are intended to strengthen democratic governance, protect fundamental rights, and ensure that the Constitution reflects the aspirations of all citizens of Fiji.

37.2 Core Constitutional Amendments Proposed

The Fiji Teachers Union recommends that the following areas be considered for constitutional amendment or inclusion:

(a) Democratic Governance

- Strengthening parliamentary oversight of the Executive.
- Enhancing transparency and accountability in government decision-making.
- Expanding public participation in legislative processes.

(b) Bill of Rights Expansion

- Recognition of academic freedom.
- Protection of digital rights and personal data.
- Strengthening workers' rights, including collective bargaining.

- Enhanced protections for women and children.
- Explicit environmental and climate rights.

(c) Education Chapter

- Constitutional recognition of education as a fundamental right.
- State obligation to provide free, inclusive, and equitable education.
- Protection of teacher professionalism and institutional independence.

(d) Workers' Rights and Social Dialogue

- Constitutional guarantee of freedom of association.
- Protection of trade union autonomy. E.g.: Elect its own leaders through democratic processes.
- Recognition of collective bargaining as a fundamental right.

(e) Accountability Institutions

- Transparent and merit-based appointment processes.
- Strengthened independence of constitutional offices.
- Parliamentary oversight of key appointments.

(f) Constitutional Amendment Process

- Requirement for broad parliamentary consensus.
- Mandatory public consultation for major reforms.
- Referendum for fundamental constitutional changes.

---

38. IMPLEMENTATION AND TRANSITIONAL CONSIDERATIONS

38.1 Legal and Institutional Transition

The implementation of constitutional reforms will require a carefully managed transition process to ensure stability and continuity of governance. The Fiji Teachers Union recommends that:

- Existing laws be reviewed for consistency with constitutional amendments.
- Transitional provisions be established to guide institutional adjustments.
- Adequate timelines be provided for implementation of new constitutional obligations.

38.2 Institutional Strengthening

Successful constitutional reform will depend on the capacity of public institutions to implement and uphold new constitutional standards. The Union recommends strengthening:

- Parliamentary committees and research capacity.
- Judicial training and resourcing.
- Public service professionalism and independence.
- Education sector governance structures.

38.3 Public Awareness and Civic Education

The Union emphasizes the importance of civic education to ensure that citizens understand their constitutional rights and responsibilities. This should include:

- Public education campaigns on constitutional rights.
- Integration of civic education in school curricula.
- Engagement with civil society and community organizations.

---

39. OVERARCHING CONCLUSION

The Fiji Teachers Union submits this document in the spirit of constructive national engagement and constitutional development.

Constitutional reform is not merely a legal or technical exercise. It is a nation-building process that defines the values, aspirations, and institutional foundations of the State. A Constitution must therefore reflect both the historical experiences of the nation and the shared vision for its future.

The Union believes that Fiji's constitutional future should be guided by the principles of democracy, equality, accountability, transparency, and respect for human dignity. It should protect fundamental rights, strengthen institutions, and ensure that governance serves the interests of all citizens.

Education remains central to this vision. An educated population is essential for democratic participation, economic development, and social cohesion. For this reason, the Union places particular emphasis on constitutional recognition of education and the professional status of teachers.

The Union also emphasizes that workers' rights, women's rights, children's rights, environmental protection, and access to information are not peripheral issues but essential components of a modern constitutional democracy.

The Fiji Teachers Union respectfully submits that the recommendations contained in this paper will contribute to the development of a Constitution that is inclusive, balanced, and forward-looking—one that protects every Fijian and strengthens national unity.

---

40. FINAL STATEMENT

The Fiji Teachers Union reaffirms its commitment to supporting a democratic, peaceful, and prosperous Fiji. As educators, we recognize our responsibility not only to teach but also to contribute to the civic and constitutional development of the nation.

We therefore present this submission as a constructive contribution to Fiji's constitutional future and as an expression of our enduring commitment to education, justice, and national development.

Respectfully submitted,

Muniappa Goundar
General Secretary
Fiji Teachers Union

Suva, Fiji
6th July 2026

Fiji Labour Party

Fiji Labor Party
Date: [7-7-2026]

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Chaudhary, ladies and gentlemen of the Fiji Labour Party, it is with great pleasure that I welcome you to the Constitution Review Commission this morning. Thank you very much for accepting the invitation.

You have come in as a political party, and we greatly appreciate that. We need to hear from the political parties of our country in relation to our 2013 Constitution and the review which your Commission is undertaking. First and foremost, I request our Commissioners to introduce themselves to you this morning, and we shall start from my right for the introductions.

Dr. Fatiaki: Thank you, Chair, through you. Mr. Chaudhary and members of the Labour Party, my name is John Charles Fatiaki. I'm a medical practitioner in Suva. I'm a Rotuman and a former Senator in the last Parliament. Thank you.

Ms. Nailatikau: Good morning, Mr. Chaudhary and fellow Labour Party members. I'm Merawalesi Nailatikau. My background is in public diplomacy and public policy.

Mr. Beg: Good morning, Mr. Chaudhary and members of the Labour Party. Welcome, and thank you for coming. My name is Conway Beg. I'm an architect by profession and a practitioner.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Yeah, I am Sevuloni Ratumaiyale Valenitabua, Chairperson, and you know me as a private practitioner. Thank you.

Mr. Kohli: Good morning, Mr. Chaudhary and members of the team. My name is Ami Kohli, and I'm proud to be from Labasa.

Dr. Gounder: Good morning, Mr. Chaudhary and members of the Fiji Labour Party. My name is Neelesh Gounder, and I'm an academic at USP. Dr. Sunil used to be my colleague at USP for many years. He's been my lecturer as well, and today I'm sitting here as the Commissioner of the CRC. And I look forward to listening to your submission. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Chaudhary and ladies and gentlemen of the Fiji Labour Party.

The Constitution Review Committee, or Commission, was appointed by His Excellency, the President of the country, Ratu Naiqama Lalabalavu. We were appointed under the Commission of Inquiry Act. And we have been undertaking consultations here at Level 9 Super Bowl House from the 1st of April, 2026, and also around the country, visiting islands in Vitilevu and Vanualevu.

We have covered a lot around our islands. The main islands, and also the adjacent smaller islands, including the Lau Group and the Lomaiviti Group. This morning, we are fortunate to have you here.

And that is to listen to your submissions, which you might like to make. And we're looking forward to that. The Constitution Review Commission is tasked with reviewing the 2013 Constitution, as has been tasked to us by His Excellency.

And one of the main requirements that are in our Term of Reference is to go around the country and get the people's views in relation to what they recommend or they think should be included in our Supreme Law. That was the reason why we have been around the country. This week is the final week for consultations.

We have set our deadline. We started off in March when we were appointed. We were given a timeline of six months by His Excellency.

And the due date for us to present to His Excellency our recommendation and report, which may include an amended 2013 Constitution. That deadline is the 31st of August, 2026. We are working hard towards achieving that timeline and our target.

The Commission has an onerous task ahead of it. However, we have been assisted by the submissions that have been submitted to us or presented to us. And I'm sure that the submissions by the Fijian Labour Party this morning will add to that assistance so that our work could be made more easy and that we have a political party's view or recommendations to be considered and considered in a very well and good manner in relation to what we should include in the 2013 amended Constitution.

Like I said, we will hear you and we are here to hear you and listen to you, sir, and your team. Without further ado, I will now invite you to please make your submissions to the Commission. The mic is in front of you.

If you press on the silver button, a light should come in. A red light should come in and you may use the mic. The floor is now open to the Fijian Labour Party and you, sir. Thank you.

Mr Chaudhary: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission. It's a pleasure to be here this morning with you.On my extreme right is Mr. Dr. Sushil Kumar, who is a member of the Management Board of the Fijian Labour Party. Sitting next to me on my right is Ms. Monika Raghavan, who is the President of the party. To my left, immediately next to me, is Taina Lagiwalu. She is the Assistant Secretary General of the party. Next to her is Mr. Sajeeda Sharma, who is the Vice President. And next to him is Aman Prashneel Chand, who is the President of the Suva branch of the party.

Our submission is rather lengthy and I hope you will give me some time on this. I'll try to be as short as possible. The submission is titled Constitutional Reform, Democratic Legitimacy, Equality and National Unity.

It has got nine sections and I will go into section one straight away, which is Parliamentary Mandate and Democratic Legitimacy. We acknowledge the importance of public consultation in any review of Fiji's supreme rule and welcome the opportunity for citizens to contribute their views. However, the party submits with utmost respect that the Constitutional Review Commission, as currently established and operating, lacks the necessary democratic legitimacy and parliamentary mandate required under the 2013 Constitution of the Republic of Fiji.

This deficiency is not merely technical. It touches the foundational principle that the Constitution, as the supreme law, derives its authority from the people through their elected representatives and pilots. An executive-initiated review process without prior parliamentary endorsement risks undermining public confidence in the integrity and ownership of any eventual reforms.

The constitutional framework requires parliamentary authority for fundamental change. The 2013 Constitution establishes clear parameters for lawmaking and constitutional amendment. Section 2 subsection 5 provides that the Constitution cannot be abrogated or suspended by any person and may only be amended in accordance with the procedures prescribed in Chapter 11.

Section 46 subsection 1 vests the authority and power to make laws exclusively in Parliament, stating that, and I quote, no person or body other than Parliament has authority to make any law in Fiji except under authority conferred by this Constitution or by a written law, unquote. Chapter 11, sections 159 and 160, as interpreted by the Supreme Court in its advisory opinion of 29 August 2025, requires any amendment to proceed by way of a bill passed by Parliament by a two-thirds majority of all members, followed by a referendum in which a majority of both castes are in favor before presidential assent. No provision in the 2013 Constitution authorizes the President or Cabinet to establish an ad hoc review commission to examine or propose alterations to the Constitution outside the amendment procedure in Chapter 11.

While the President holds certain appointment powers, the initiation of a comprehensive review of the supreme law demands the direct involvement and sanction of Parliament as the representative body of the people. The commission was established by presidential warrant without prior parliamentary debate, legislation, or endorsement. This creates several fundamental problems.

There was no prior parliamentary debate or endorsement. The elected representatives of the people had no opportunity to define the terms of reference, scope, or methodology of the review. The terms of reference were not set by Parliament.

This creates the risk that the review may address issues or propose changes that have not been subjected to the scrutiny and democratic input of the legislature. The process bypasses the constitutional amendment pathway. Any recommendation emerging from the commission must ultimately return to Parliament for legislative action and then to the people via referendum.

An executive-led review process that bypasses Parliament at the formative stage sits uneasily with the democratic principles the Supreme Court sought to reinforce. Democratic legitimacy requires parliamentary ownership from the outset. The Fiji Labour Party submits that any comprehensive review of the Constitution should, at minimum, be expressly sanctioned by the elected Parliament.

The commission's work, while valuable as a consultative exercise, cannot substitute for parliamentary ownership of the reform process. Parliament is the constitutional embodiment of the people's voice. Allowing the review to proceed without its formal involvement from the beginning risks perceptions that the process is executive-driven and that outcomes may be selectively advanced or filtered before reaching the legislature.

Submissions then go on to make five recommendations for the consideration of the commission and I would not read the recommendations except to say that we submit these recommendations in a constructive spirit with the firm belief that constitutional reform undertaken through proper parliamentary and democratic channels will produce outcomes that are more stable, legitimate and reflective of the collective will of the Fijian people. I now go to Section 2 of the submission which deals with common national identity. The Fiji Labour Party firmly believes that the name Fijian must be the common and unifying identity for all citizens of the country without exception.

This principle is already enshrined in the 2013 Constitution which states that all citizens of Fiji shall be known as Fijians and that all Fijians have equal status and identity. The party submits that this constitutional promise must be defended and strengthened, not undermined by any attempt to reintroduce ethnic categorization or to create different classes of citizens. Section 5 of the 2013 Constitution is clear and unambiguous.

All citizens of Fiji shall be known as Fijians. Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, all Fijians have equal status and identity which means that they are equally entitled to all the rights, privileges and benefits of citizenship and subject to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. This provision moved Fiji away from the communal and ethnically divided framework of previous constitutions towards a civic inclusive national identity.

The Fiji Labour Party strongly supports this principle and warns against any regression that would once again divide citizens along ethnic lines.

Indo-Fijians constitute approximately 33% of Fiji's population with other communities, Rotuman's, Chinese Fijians, part Europeans and others making up a further 4-5%. Together these groups represent a significant and integral part of the Fijian nation.

Indians have lived in Fiji for over 140 years. They arrived as indentured laborers and stayed to build this country alongside Itaukei Fijians. They have contributed to every sector of the economy, sugar, commerce, professions, education, health and public service.

Their sweat and tears are woven in the fabric of modern Fiji. To suggest that Indo-Fijians or other non-Itaukei citizens should be given a different category or class of citizenship whether in name, identity, documents or constitutional status is both historically inaccurate and morally wrong. It would create second class citizens in a country they have helped build for generations.

The Fiji Labour Party submits that identity and nationality must be kept out of divisive ethnic politics. The 2013 constitution's framework of common and equal citizenry must be reflected not only in law but also in the democratic process and in the everyday practice of governance. Any attempt to reintroduce ethnic categories whether in passports, birth certificates, electoral rolls or public discourse would be a regressive step that undermines national unity and contradicts the spirit of the constitution.

The party further submits that the name Fijian belongs to every citizen by right of birth, upbringing, contribution and loyalty to this country. To suggest otherwise is to deny the lived reality of thousands of families who have called Fiji home for generations and who have no other homeland. We go on to make five recommendations with regard to this particular section of the submission.

We believe that a united Fiji is possible only when every citizen, regardless of ethnicity, feels equally valued, equally protected and equally Fijian. The name Fijian is not a prize to be granted or withheld. It is the birthright of every person born in this country or who has made it their home through citizenship.

Let us defend and strengthen the principle for the sake of our children and grandchildren. Go on to section three. Before I do that, I would like to ask whether if you have any questions, whether you want to address those questions before I proceed to the next section or shall we do it at the end?

Mr. Valenitabua: We will ask questions at the end, sir.

Mr. Chaudhary: As I said, I have not read the recommendations because they align with what the submission is and that is for the consideration of the Commission. And that is to save time. Section three, which deals with land policy and TLTB administration and agricultural leases.

Addressing the fundamental crisis in land use, lease security and equitable development. Land is the foundation of Fiji's economy, culture and national security. The current framework governing native or Itaukei land leases administered by the Itaukei Land Trust Board presents one of the most pressing and unresolved challenges facing the nation.

The system has not delivered consistent, fair or productive outcomes for either the landowners or the long-term tenants. The absence of a coherent, effective national land use policy has resulted in ad hoc decision making, uncertainty for farmers, underutilization of productive land and hardship for families who have invested generations of labor in the land. This situation requires urgent, principled reform.

Recent data from the TLTB and government sources confirm the following breakdown of land tenure in Fiji. Itaukei or native land, approximately 90% of Fiji's total landmass. This land is owned by Itaukei Land Owning Units, Mataqali and Yavusa and administered in trust by the TLTB under the Itaukei Land Trust Act.

Freehold land approximately 6% and state land approximately 4%. Given that nearly nine-tenths of the country is Itaukei land, the policies and practices of the TLTB have a decisive impact on national agricultural output, rural livelihoods, food security and social stability. Fiji has long lacked a comprehensive, integrated national land use policy and plan.

Successive reviews and policy documents over decades have identified this gap as a major constraint on sustainable development. Decisions on whether land is leased to agriculture, reserved for landowners or converted to higher value residential or commercial uses are often made on a case-by-case basis without a clear strategic framework. This vacuum has contributed to conflicting priorities.

The need to maintain productive agricultural land presses pressure for subdivision and commercial development, particularly near growing urban centers. The result is uncertainty underutilization of land and a failure to optimize land for the long-term national interest. Agricultural leases on Itaukei land are typically granted for periods of 30 years.

While the TLTB reports relatively high renewal rates in aggregate, historically 77 to 85% for agricultural leases since 1997 and around 75% for recent expired cane leases. This figure is disputed by cane farmers associations. Individual cases meanwhile continue to pose significant stress.

Many tenant families, particularly in the Fijian families with a multi-generational tie to the land, have invested heavily in homes, infrastructure and improvements over decades. When leases are not renewed, these families face not only loss of livelihood but also the emotional and financial trauma of displacement after years of building their lives on the land. Although the TLTB states that residential alternatives are offered and compensation under the Agricultural Landlord and Tenant Act may be available, the process often leaves families in precarious situations.

A 30-year term is insufficient for meaningful agricultural investment, especially in sugarcane and other perennial or capital incentive crops. Secure long-term tenure is essential for farmers to plan, invest and pass on feasible operations to the next generation. Concerns have been raised regarding the rental and premium structures applied by the TLTB, including charges linked to the capital value of developments or improvements and the overall level of returns flowing to individual landowners.

When land is reserved and not leased, productive output often declines, and landowners receive minimal or no direct income. The TLTB as trustee manages funds and distributions, but many landowners report that the amounts they ultimately receive are very small after administrative costs and sharing among large Mataqali families. This situation can create friction between tenants and landowners and fuels perceptions that the current system does not optimally serve either party.

An independent, transparent review of lease terms, rental and methodologies, and distribution mechanisms could help build confidence and fairness. The Fiji Labour Party submits that prime agricultural land should be prioritized for food production and agricultural use. Substantial subsistence farming forms a critical component of Fiji's national security, ensuring food self-sufficiency, rural employment and resilience against external shocks.

Converting productive agricultural leases into commercial, residential or subdivided development on a large-scale risks undermining this foundation. While urban development is necessary, it should not come at the expense of the nation's long-term food security. A clear policy distinction between agricultural land to be protected for farming and land suitable for other users would serve the national interest.

We want to make some recommendations in this regard for the consideration of the Committee. We believe that land reforms conducted through inclusive dialogue and with the long-term interests of all Fijians at heart can resolve long-standing tensions and unlock the productive potential of Fiji's most important resource for the benefit of current and future generations. I go to the electoral system reform, and this is on constituency-based accountability, restoring local accountability representation and parliamentary scrutiny.

Fiji Labour Party has long advocated for an electoral system that delivers genuine accountability between elected representatives and the communities they serve. The current open-list proportional representation system, while providing a form of national proportionality, has significant shortcomings in terms of local representation, constituency accountability and the ability of Parliament to effectively scrutinize the executive. This section sets out the party's proposals for reform, drawing on the strengths of the 1997 constitution's electoral arrangements while adapting them to contemporary needs.

The shortcomings of the current electoral system. Under the 2013 constitution, Fiji uses a single national constituency with open-list proportional representation using the Dionne method and a 5% threshold. While this system has certain merits, including simplicity and a degree of proportionality, it has produced several problems.

Lack of local constituency accountability. Members of Parliament are elected from a national list. There is no direct link between an MP and a specific geographic constituency or community.

Voters do not have a local representative they can approach with constituency issues, and MPs have no defined area for which they are responsible. Low barriers to entry and weak mandates. Candidates can be elected with very small numbers of personal votes, in some cases fewer than 500.

This undermines the legitimacy and authority of Parliament and allows individuals with limited community support to enter the legislature and even become ministers. Weak parliamentary scrutiny. The current Standing Orders, particularly provisions such as Standing Order 51, allows bills to be fast-tracked with limited debate and committee scrutiny.

Select committees have limited powers and resources, and the executive dominates the legislative agenda. There is no meaningful constituency development link. Without defined constituencies, there is no clear mechanism for MPs to advocate for and be held accountable for development in specific areas.

The 1997 Constitution provided for a mixed system, with communal seats reserved for Itaukei, Indo-Fijian, and other communities, and open seats. While the communal element was contentious, the open seats and the alternative vote, AV system, had strengths. Candidates had defined constituencies and were directly accountable to voters in those areas.

The AV system encouraged moderation and cross-community appeals, as candidates needed references from voters outside their own ethnic group to win. There was a clearer link between representation and local development priorities. The Fiji Labour Party does not advocate a return to the full communal system of the 1997 Constitution.

However, we believe that elements of constituency-based representation adapted to a non-communal, inclusive framework would significantly improve accountability and the quality of parliamentary democracy in Fiji. Proposed Reforms – Constituency-Based Voting with a Strengthened Parliamentary Scrutiny. Fiji Labour Party proposes the following reforms to the electoral system. Introduce a mixed member proportional MMP electoral system or a similar mixed hybrid motor that combines constituency based representation with overall proportionality. A substantial portion of parliamentary seats example, 50 – 70% should be elected from defined and geographic constituencies using a preferential voting method such as the alternate vote or single transferal vote in single-member constituencies where voters rank candidates by preference.

The remaining seats should be allocated through national or regional party lists to ensure the overall composition of Parliament is proportional to the total votes received by each party or group of independents, compensating for any disproportionality arising from constituency results. Select committees should have enhanced powers to summon witnesses, require the production of documents, and scrutinize government policy and expenditure. Standing orders should be refined to prevent the abuse of fast-track procedures and to guarantee adequate time for debate and committee consideration of all significant legislation.

This is to strengthen parliamentary committees and scrutiny powers. Improve the quality of representation. Higher thresholds for election in terms of personal votes of support and stronger disqualification provisions for candidates with serious criminal convictions or findings of corrupt conduct would raise the standards of those entering Parliament.

Enhance public participation and petition mechanisms. Parliament should have formal mechanisms to receive and consider public petitions on matters of national importance and committees should be empowered to conduct inquiries on issues of public concern. We raise here also disqualification provisions in respect of the nomination of candidates in the 2013 Constitution.

We propose that the disqualification of persons from being nominated as candidates for general election as provided for in sections 56 of sections 2 and 5 of the Constitution be removed. We submit that a person who has served his or her sentence or who is not serving a term of imprisonment when nominated should not be prevented from exercising his or her democratic right to contest parliamentary elections. The restrictions placed on officials and employees of trade unions and trade union federations under section 57 of sections 3F and G from participating in political activity by being classified as holders of public office should be revoked.

Trade unions or trade union federations are not public bodies or institutions. There is therefore no basis for their exclusion from participation. This provision was inserted by the writers of the 2013 Constitution and the Bainimarama administration who saw trade unions as political competitors.

Similar restrictions placed on the federation of employees under section 57 of sections 3 and 8 must also be revoked. We made six recommendations with regard to this particular section of the submission. We believe that the current electoral system has delivered a form of proportionality but at the cost of local accountability and effective parliamentary scrutiny.

The Fiji Labour Party believes that a reformed system combining constituency representation with national proportionality, stronger committees and better safeguards will produce a parliament that is more responsive to the people, more effective in holding the executive to account and better able to deliver genuine development and good governance to all Fijians. We move to section 5 of the submission which is strengthening democratic oversight of independent institutions and on public borrowing. Enhancing accountability in appointments and fiscal responsibility.

A robust democracy requires strong independent institutions that are insulated from undue political influence alongside effective parliamentary oversight of the government's fiscal decisions. The Fiji Labour Party submits that the current constitutional arrangements concentrate excessive power in the executive, particularly the Prime Minister, in both appointments of key office holders and in the management of public debt. Reforms are needed to restore greater parliamentary involvement and transparency.

Under the 2013 Constitution, the Prime Minister exercises significant influence over appointments to critical independent bodies through the Constitutional Officers Commission and direct recommendations to the President. The COC, which advises on appointments to institutions such as the Police Correction Service, RFMF, Electoral Commission, Auditor General and others, has a competition that gives the executive substantial control. This structure risks criticizing institutions that are meant to operate independently and impartially.

International democratic practice in parliamentary systems emphasizes mechanisms that balance expertise with accountability. While the executive often plays a role in nominations, independent commissions or parliamentary committees provide scrutiny to ensure merit, integrity and freedom from active political affiliation. No person holding current political office or recent partisan affiliation should serve on bodies responsible for overseeing independent institutions.

We propose that appointments to independent commissions and key constitutional officers should be subject to scrutiny by a parliamentary select committee. Even with a government majority on such a committee, the process introduces transparency, cross-party input and public confidence. Following committee considerations, the President should exercise the appointment authority directly, rather than acting solely on the recommendation of the Prime Minister.

We draw attention to the fact that Fiji's public debt has risen significantly in recent years, reaching levels that place considerable pressure on public finances and future generations. Under current arrangements, the government can enter into borrowing arrangements with domestic and international institutions and subsequently report to Parliament. While the overall financial requirement is reflected in the budget, individual major borrowing decisions often lack proper detailed parliamentary scrutiny.

International best practice in democratic governance is reflected in guidelines from organizations such as the World Bank, IMF, Westminster Foundation for Democracy and the Commonwealth strongly support meaningful parliamentary involvement in debt management. Key principles include annual parliamentary approval of the government's overall borrowing strategy and debt ceiling as part of the budget process, specific parliamentary approval or ratification for major individual loans or loan guarantees or contingent liabilities above a defined threshold, regular detailed reporting to Parliament on debt stock, new borrowings, debt servicing and risks, clear legal frameworks that define borrowing authority and require legislative oversight for significant fiscal commitments. Many democracies set benchmarks, for example, requiring parliamentary approval for external borrowing, loans above a certain monetary threshold or new guarantees.

This ensures that elected representatives who are accountable to the people scrutinize decisions that have long-term implications for the nation's finances and the well-being of citizens. In Fiji, establishing a constitutional or legislative requirement for prior parliamentary approval of borrowing above a specific threshold or for major external loans would strengthen fiscal discipline, transparency and accountability. It would prevent the accumulation of debt without adequate democratic oversight and help protect citizens from the consequences of unsustainable borrowing.

We then make recommendations with regard to this particular aspect of the submission. I move to section six, which is confronting race-based politics and securing indigenous rights within a united nation. For too long, politicians in Fiji have exploited race and ethnicity to divide the nation in advanced narrow political agendas.

The coups of 1987 and 2000 were direct manifestations of this destructive approach. Race-based politics has set Fiji back by decades, diminished investor confidence, accelerated brain drain and caused immense suffering to ordinary citizens of all communities. The Fiji Labour Party has been a direct victim of this politics of division.

It is time for an honest national conversation. The facts are clear. Indigenous Itaukei Fijians through their chiefs and landowning units own 90% of all land in this country.

Their land has never been taken by Indians or any other group. Their land remains safe. Their indigenous rights are protected.

Future generations must accept this reality rather than allow politicians to manufacture fear and division. Race has been weaponized by politicians for electoral gain and to justify unconstitutional elections. The coups of 1987 and 2000 were disguised as protecting indigenous rights, yet delivered neither prosperity nor security to ordinary Itaukei.

Fijians instead entrenched poverty, weakened institutions and created an environment of fear and uncertainty that continues to affect the country even today. The military has been drawn into politics on multiple occasions, often at the behest of politicians and state actors pursuing sectional interests. This has damaged the professionalism of the country's security forces and undermined democratic norms.

The Fiji Labour Party has consistently opposed the use of race as a political tool because it harms all Fijians and prevents the country from moving forward as one nation. Itaukei Fijians are traditional owners of the land. This right of ownership has been recognized and protected under all four constitutions.

The Bill of Rights in the 2013 Constitution provides strong protection for all citizens, including specific recognition of indigenous rights. Fiji is also a signatory to relevant international instruments concerning indigenous peoples and human rights. The land is not under threat from Indians or other communities.

The land is managed by Taukei Land Trust Board. Many of the problems faced by indigenous landowners, low returns, lack of development and politicization stem from how the TLTB has operated and how politicians have used land issues to create divisions between communities rather than focusing on genuine economic empowerment of landowners. It must be stated clearly and without equivocation.

Indigenous land is safe, indigenous rights are safe. There is no factual basis for claims that Indians or other races have taken Itaukei land. Such narratives are politically manufactured and must be rejected.

Equal citizenship and equal opportunity. Fiji is a multiracial nation. All citizens, Itaukei, Indo-Fijian and others, have contributed to building this country.

Indians and other communities have dwelled in the sugar industry, in commerce, in professions, in every sector of the economy. They deserve equal citizenship and equal opportunity and equal dignity. Politicians must be prohibited from creating artificial divisions based on nationality, land, ethnicity or political gain.

The 2013 Constitution already establishes the principle of common and equal citizenship. This principle must be defended and strengthened, not undermined by those who seek to return to the politics of fear and exclusion. Continued race-based politicking is directly responsible for Fiji's ongoing challenges, accelerating brain drain, declining investment and weak institutions, and persistent poverty affecting all communities.

The country cannot afford another generation lost to division. The Fiji Labour Party calls for a definitive break from the politics of race. Indigenous Fijians must be assured, with facts not rhetoric, that their land and rights are secure.

At the same time, all other citizens must be assured of equal treatment and opportunity. True leadership requires telling the truth. Division benefits only those who exploit it.

National progress requires unity, equal citizenship and a shared commitment to building a prosperous Fiji for all. These are the recommendations with regard to this particular section of the submission. We go to protecting minority rights, advancing women representation.

The 2013 Constitution establishes a strong foundation for equality through its preamble on common and equal citizenry and the Comprehensive Bill of Rights, particularly Section 26, which guarantees equality before the law and prohibits unfair discrimination on grounds of race, ethnicity, gender and other characteristics. These provisions are commendable. However, the Fiji Labour Party submits that the constitutional promise of equality requires stronger implementation mechanisms to ensure that minorities and women enjoy genuine equal opportunity in practice, not merely in law.

Fiji's demographic reality is evolving. While Itaukei Fijians constitute the majority, approximately 62%, Indo-Fijians represent a significant minority, approximately 33%, with their share of the school-age population now around 20% due to emigration and demographic trends. Other communities, including Rotumans, Chinese, Fijians and Pacific Islanders, part Europeans form smaller but important minorities.

The Constitution rightly protects all citizens equally, but the actual institutional framework has not always delivered balanced representation. Concerns persist regarding under-representation of Indo-Fijians and other communities in key institutions, such as the Republic of Fiji Military Forces, the Fiji Police Force and the Civil Service. Historical threatens and recruitment practices have led to imbalances that do not reflect Fiji's national demographic competition.

This undermines public confidence in these institutions as truly national bodies serving all citizens equally. Furthermore, many minority communities and specific population groups in the outer islands, maritime provinces and rural areas face persistent disparities in access to services, infrastructure, economic opportunities and development investment. Isolation, high transport costs and limited government presence exacerbate these challenges, leading to marginalization that affects national cohesion.

Fiji Labour Party advocates for proactive merit-based measures to achieve equitable representation. This includes targeted outreach, transparent recruitment processes, diversity monitoring with public reporting and capacity building programs. Such measures should aim for institutions that reflect the face of the nation without compromising merit or introducing discrimination against any group.

Women representation Women constitute half of Fiji's population, yet remain significantly under-represented in political decision-making. Following the 22 general elections, women held only approximately 9-11% of seats in Parliament. A decline from previous high of around 19-20%.

This falls far short of global and regional aspirations for gender parity in leadership. We believe in equal opportunity for women and men. We support increasing women representation in Parliament and at constituency level through measures that remove structural, cultural and financial barriers, rather than through mechanisms that could be perceived as discriminatory.

This includes encouraging political parties to adopt internal targets and monitoring programs for women candidates, providing capacity building, leadership training and campaign support for aspiring women leaders, addressing cultural and societal norms that discourage women's political participation through public education and awareness, ensuring safe and respectful political environment free from harassment and violence against women in politics. We emphasize equal opportunity without discrimination. Special measures reserve seats, if considered, must be carefully designed, time-bound and implanted, implemented rather, in a manner that builds genuine capability, rather than creating perceptions of tokenism or reverse discrimination.

We want to make recommendations as is required. We believe that the Constitution, which truly delivers on its promise of equality, must ensure that every community, majority and minority alike, and every woman and man, see themselves reflected in the institutions that govern and protect them. This is not about division.

It is about building a stronger, more cohesive and more legitimate nation for all Fijians. Just two more sections. I won't be very long.

I hope I'm not boring you. Equal citizenship rights, inclusive electoral participation. Fiji Labour Party has consistently championed the principle of common and equal citizenry enshrined in the 2013 Constitution.

All Fijians, regardless of ethnicity, ancestry or place of birth, must enjoy equal rights, equal opportunities and equal protection under the law. This section addresses two critical areas where current laws and current legislative changes create unequal treatment. Citizenship rights for children born overseas and the ability of dual citizens to participate fully in public life by contesting elections.

Under the Citizenship Act of Fiji and its amendments, children born in Fiji generally acquire citizenship by birth. For children born overseas, citizenship is acquired by registration if at least one parent is a Fijian citizen. Recent legislative changes, including the Citizenship of Fiji Amendment Bill 2026, have introduced facilitative provisions that recognize links to landowning units, mataqali, for Itaukei children born overseas, making it easier for them to regularize or acquire Fijian citizenship through ancestral connections.

The Fiji Labour Party supports measures that strengthen the ties between the diaspora and Fiji. However, we submit that this facilitative provision must be extended equally to all communities Children of Indo-Fijian parents born in Fiji but living overseas, as well as children of other minority groups, Rotuman's, Chinese, Fijians and others, should have access to the same streamlined registration processes and recognition of family ancestral links. Citizenship rights must not be differentiated on ethnic grounds.

Equal citizen rights demand that the law treats all Fijian families the same, whether their children were born in Fiji or overseas. Any provision that makes it easier for one ethnic group of diaspora children to claim or regularize citizenship while imposing higher barriers on others violates the constitutional guarantee of common and equal citizenship. The Fiji Labour Party calls for immediate legislative amendments to ensure uniformity across all communities in this regard, allowing dual citizens to contest elections and reducing the residency requirements.

Section 56 of the 2013 Constitution currently provides that a person may be a candidate for election to Parliament only if they are a citizen of Fiji and do not hold citizenship of any other country. Additionally, candidates must be ordinarily resident in Fiji for at least two years immediately before nomination. Fiji Labour Party believes these restrictions are outdated and counterproductive in a globalized world.

Fiji has a large skilled diaspora. Many Fijians who migrated retain strong ties to the country, hold Fijian citizenship often alongside another nationality, and possess valuable expertise in fields such as medicine, engineering, finance, technology, education, and governance. Prohibiting dual citizens from contesting elections prevents these experienced professionals from returning to serve the nation in elected office.

Furthermore, the current two-year residency requirement creates an unnecessary barrier. Reducing this to one year would still ensure candidates have a meaningful connection to Fiji while allowing skilled returnees to contribute sooner. Many countries with large diasporas have successfully balanced residency requirements with the need to attract talent back into public life.

The Fiji Labour Party therefore calls for two specific reforms to the electoral law. One, remove the prohibition on dual citizens contending elections, allowing Fijian citizens who hold another nationality to stand for Parliament provided they meet all other eligibility criteria. And two, reduce the ordinary residency requirement from two years to one year, immediately preceding nomination to facilitate the return and participation of skilled diaspora members while maintaining a genuine connection to the country.

We then go on to make recommendations in respect to this matter. Section 9, which is Judicial Reforms and Oversight of Political Party Funding. Fiji Labour Party submits this section to highlight two critical areas requiring urgent constitutional and legislative attention.

One, the need for comprehensive judicial reforms to address chronic delays and ensure timely justice. And two, the imperative to place the regulation of political party funding under the independent oversight of the Electoral Commission with clear rules approved by Parliament. These issues directly affect public confidence in the rule of law and the integrity of Fiji's democratic institutions.

Judicial reforms. Fiji's judicial system faces a serious and well-documented crisis of delay. The Chief Justice Honorable Salesi Temo has publicly expressed concern over the significant backlog with cases dating back 10 to 20 years still pending.

Civil cases in particular have dragged on for many years, posing immense hardship to litigants, especially ordinary citizens who cannot afford prolonged legal battles. Criminal cases, including serious matters such as rape and sexual violence against children, have also suffered unacceptable delays. A stark and troubling example is the case highlighted by the Fiji Women's Rights Movement in May 2026 involving a young girl who waited six years for justice in a sexual violence matter only for the case to be withdrawn.

Children constitute the majority of rape victims in Fiji. Such prolonged delays not only deny justice to victims and survivors, but also erode public trust in the entire justice system. Justice delayed is justice denied.

It is not only a slogan, it is true. It is the lived reality for too many Fijians. Additionally, the high cost of litigation places justice beyond the reach of many ordinary citizens.

Legal fees can be prohibitive, and the perception that the system primarily benefits those who can afford expensive lawyers undermines the constitutional guarantee of equal protections under the law. New Zealand and Australia have implemented robust judicial case management systems that significantly reduce delays while maintaining fairness. Key features include active judicial case management, clear time standards, strict control of adjournments, electronic case management and e-filing, performance measurement and accountability, expanded use of mediation, and alternative dispute resolution.

These jurisdictions demonstrate that with strong judicial leadership, clear rules, technology, and accountability mechanisms, significant reductions in delays are achievable without compromising fairness or the rights of all. The Fiji Labour Party recommends a comprehensive judicial reform package including introduction of active judicial case management with binding time standards for different categories of cases, civil, criminal, family, etc. Mandatory publication of judgments within a defined time frame, within three months of final submission in most cases.

Strict limits on adjournments with judicial discretion to refuse unnecessary delays. Full rollout of electronic case management, e-filing, and digital court records. Extension of legal aid and pro-bono schemes to improve access for low-income litigants.

Enhanced judicial training in case management and the use of technology. A move to oversight of party funding by electoral commission. Transparent and accountable political party funding is essential for the integrity of democracy.

Under the current framework, there have been concerns about the allocation of public funds to political parties, reportedly around Fiji dollars 325,000 per year, without sufficient transparency, clear criteria, or robust parliamentary oversight. The Fijian Labour Party submits that the regulation of political party funding, including any state support for disclosure requirements, must be placed under the independent authority of the Electoral Commission with the overarching framework approved by Parliament. The Electoral Commission is the appropriate independent body to oversee party registration, funding, disclosure, campaign financing rules, and compliance, placing this responsibility clearly with the Commission, backed by legislation passed by Parliament which will enhance transparency, reduce the risk of political manipulation, and strengthen public confidence in the electoral process.

The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Fijian Independent Commission Against Corruption are critical institutions for upholding the rule of law and combating corruption. However, recent administrative issues, perceived politicization, and public statement by FICAC have raised serious concerns about institutional independence and public trust. The Fiji Love Society has called for a radical overhaul of the anti-corruption framework, including consideration of whether FICAC should retain its current prosecutorial role.

The Fiji Labour Party supports a review of these institutions to ensure they operate with genuine independence, professionalism, and accountability. Structural reforms may include clearer constitutional safeguards for the DPP's independence, review of FICAC's mandate and governance, and improved coordination between investigative and prosecutorial bodies. And we want to make a recommendation on this.

Finally, we urge the Commission to recommend bold practical reforms in these areas so that every Fijian, rich or poor, can have confidence that justice will be delivered fairly and without undue delay, and that political competition is conducted on a level playing field. Lastly, international instruments on human rights. Fiji has acceded to the following international conventions or covenants.

International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, International Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, International Convention Against Torture and Other Inhuman or Degrading Treatment and Punishment, International Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. The nation's constitution and its laws must be aligned in conformity to the provisions of these international instruments. That's our final submission.

We thank you for listening to us patiently. We are now ready for any questions that you may have. Thank you very much.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much, Mr. Chaudhry. Very comprehensive. We have listened, we have picked out the points that you were raising in your submissions.

One request. I note that you were reading from a written submission. May we request that it be provided with a copy of your written submission, if you don't mind.

Mr Chaudhary: Certainly, I have brought a hard copy which I will deliver to you. Before I leave, and then we will email the submission.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much. Thank you. Just a comment in relation to your first section, which relates to the establishment of the Constitutional Review Commission. We have heard you.

Apart from what we have heard, I would like to state that we have no comments in relation to that. We will leave it as it is. So, for the other matters that have been raised, I can ask the Commissioners, if they want to, to comment on the same or ask questions on the same, except for Section 1. Commissioners? Dr. Fatiaki?

Dr Fatiaki: Chair, through you. Mr. Chaudhary, I would like first to recognize and thank you, sir, for your service to this country and for your comprehensive, reasoned and compelling submission this morning. I can assure you that it will be considered carefully by myself and the other Commissioners in our deliberations that begin next week as we prepare our final report and amended or new Constitution for the country.

I only wish, and this is not necessarily a question. It's more a reflection. If you wish to answer it, then I'd be happy for you to.

It is one of those, what we call amongst the Commissioners, contentious issues. That is the second topic that you brought up. The common national identity.

Let me say from the outset that I think the idea of a common national identity is a laudable and commendable aspiration that I don't think anyone in Fiji would or should be opposed to. Having had now the benefit of four months of consultations and listening to people, there are three areas that I would like to, like I say, reflect upon. And if you want to see it as a question or you wish to contribute to it, by all means.

If not, it's just a reflection in respect to this issue, which I emphasize. I think nobody should be with an issue of our common national identity. And that is first, the term Fijian.

I think from 1970 onwards, for the past 43 years, the term Fijian has been used solely for the indigenous Fijian people of this country and is so stated in the 1970, 1990, and 1997 constitutions. I guess 2013 dispossessed them of that name and essentially extended its usage to all of us, the others, without their consent or their input. That is my first reflection that has been raised to us by people throughout this country.

The second issue related to this is the use of the word Itaukei. The question is, how did the 2013 constitution, or we, come to give the name Itaukei to the indigenous Fijian people of this country without again their consent or to seek input from them as to whether they would be happy to be called Itaukei. We've had people give us examples, and I don't speak that fluent Fijian, Itaukei Fijian, who say to us Itaukei means the owner, owner of.

So you could be Itaukei ni koli, Itaukei ni bulumakau. It could be just used in that generic sense and to them, to be actually just given that name without prior consultation as to would you like to be called that, is for me an issue that I reflect upon regularly when we discuss this issue of common identity. The third one is a smaller one.

You quoted section 5.1, which says, quote, all citizens of Fiji shall be known as Fijians, end quote. My legal friends tell me that implies a mandatory obligation or duty to utilize that name. We even had one of the submitters suggest to us that we impose a mandatory requirement with punitive measures if people did not use the name to call other people that.

It was brought to us in one of the consultations here before we went out. My concern or reflection or question is, as a proud Fiji citizen who would like to continue to be known as a Rotuman, how could an individual such as I be accommodated in this setting? And then my last comment would be, if all citizens of Fiji were known as Fiji citizens, is there a problem with that? Thank you.

Mr Chaudhary: I have seen this as a common national identity removed from ethnicity.

You live in Fiji, we live in Fiji, we need a national identity. And I see Fijian as the most appropriate national identity that really ties you to the country that you live in, that you love. If we look at the United States, they call their people, of course, if you are Chinese, you are a Chinese-American, or you are an Indian-American, or whatever.

So they deal with it in that fashion, if you are Chinese, if you are an Indian, some other race, and it's connected with your national identity. But, it's okay, of course, I do not know where it came from, but this was used. And I also know that, as children, we were always told that, in respect of the Fijian community, that they are the Taukei's, we used to call them Taukei's.

And I don't know where it came from, but Taukei's means owners. So they were regarded as owners of the land. They were the citizens who came here first.

They are the owners of the land. And this is how I've seen it. I don't see anything derogatory in that.

I think it honors you as the owners of the land. When we say toke, we mean the owners of the land. We don't mean you own a dog, or you own a cow, or you own something else.

So, yes. But, certainly I appreciate what you're saying, that our ethnicity is there. I'm known as an Indian, you're known as a Tuman, somebody is known as a part European.

I don't see a problem there. But this is seen as national identity. Where do you come from? You come from Fiji, so you're a Fijian.

It's a matter of national identity rather than, you know, ethnicity.

Mr. Valenitabua: Dr. Gounder.

Dr Gounder: Thank you, Mr. Chaudhary and members of the Fiji Labour Party.
I, in line with the other commissioners, I'd like to recognize your contribution to politics in the society of Fiji. I think you are one of the very few who has contested elections under all the four constitutions. I am not, I don't know anyone else who has contested elections under the four constitutions.

Under that many constitutions. So that provides the enduring legacy you have left on the political landscape. But also, the massive wisdom and experience you have in terms of the politics and the society of Fiji.

And with due respect, I want to ask you this question which I asked Mr. Narube as well, the leader of Unity Party. You know, Fiji first brought this constitution in 2014 election they received 60% of all the votes cast. And then they won it again in 2018 with 50% of the votes.

Does the election mandate provide any legitimacy to the constitution that they brought?

Mr. Chaudhary: This was dealt with by the Supreme Court in its opinion which was delivered last year in September and they said that this is the, the court accepted the fact that it is the legal constitution. It is the effective constitution of Fiji. And it gave reasons why it considered this to be the effective and legal constitution.

I think it was mainly because three elections were held under it that people have accepted this. And so that is the answer to your question, I think. That gives it legitimacy that people have accepted it.

They have had three elections under it. And therefore, it is the effective constitution. Now, of course, it made it easier for for this constitution to be amended in its opinion.

And this is what we are here about, I think, in terms of how to deal with this constitution, particularly those aspects which are not popular with the people.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Mr. Chaudhary. Ms. Nella Tikau.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Dr. Fatiaki, through you, Chair. Thank you, Mr. Chaudhary and members of the Labour Party. I echo my colleagues' gratitude, but also recognition of your demonstrated desire to be constructive in the recommendations that you have made.

Further to Dr. Fatiaki's question, we've also received submissions about having a forward-looking constitution. And I see this perhaps reflected in your submission relating to addressing race-based politics and the recognition of how this has set Fiji back by decades. I also recognize how you call for or acknowledge that there's, you know, this is a time for an honest national conversation and that the country cannot afford another generation lost to division.

We've heard recommendations or submissions, for example, about the need for perhaps a commission on national unity that might address the collective establishment of a shared identity, for instance, amongst many other things. I would just like to hear you expand on your recommendations relating to this, about learning the value of our ways, but also the error of our ways in terms of going forward and addressing what we've learned about race-based politics. Just welcoming your further elaboration on that. Thank you. I believe it was recommendation six.

Mr. Chaudhary: Recommendation we made, I would like to, what we're saying here is affirm unequivocally that it's okay, land ownership and indigenous rights are fully protected under the 2013 constitution and must so remain.

Strongly condemn the use of race-based politics by any political actor and recommend constitutional or legislative measures to discourage the exploitation of ethnicity for political gain. Reaffirm the principle of common and equal citizenry for all Fijians regardless of ethnicity and ensure that the Bill of Rights and equality provisions are not weakened. Recommend reforms to the DLTB to improve transparency, give more transparency to landowners and depoliticize land administrations so that if okay landowners receive genuine economic benefits from their land.

Call for national leadership across the communities to publicly reject divisive race-based narratives and commit to building a united prosperous Fiji based on equal opportunity for all citizens. Support civic education programs that clearly explain the protections for indigenous rights and land ownership alongside the principles of equal citizenship to reduce the space for political manipulation. Fiji's future depends on honesty about the past and courage to reject the politics of division.

The land is safe, the rights are protected. It is time to move forward together as one nation. Those are the recommendations.

Thank you. Does this answer your question?

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you Mr. Chaudhary.

Mr. Chaudhary: Yes. In fact as you said I fought elections under all the constitutions. You know in all these years what hurts me most is how much we have suffered as a result of politics of race. The two or three coups that have been executed in the name of protecting indigenous rights and all that.

You know we have lost two generations. People who have been affected. What we see today the drug crisis, HIV, NCDs, all this, this is all coming from that.

We go back to 1987 we see what Fiji was and then you come forward and see how we have regressed and where we are today. We are a nation submerged in debt that we can't manage to pay. We are, we have lost self-reliance.

We now depend on aid, loans, remittances and grants to run this country. That's not the Fiji we want. We can be, we are a very rich country in terms of resources and all that.

What we need is good governance. We need to come together. We need to work together to build this country.

And it's possible, it is very possible if we have the, we can set it right, we can get the trust of all the people that we all belong to Fiji which is our home and we must all work together. Only then we'll have prosperity instead of poverty and the future can be very bright if we get our own equation right in terms of governance. We can do it.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Chaudhary, ladies and gentlemen of the Fiji Labour Party, I'd just like to summarize and give you some comments in relation to what has been submitted to us today. I will start with the land policy, the TLTB and the other submissions that were made under that topic. We heard from the TLTB yesterday they are carrying out reforms in relation to what we now call the Itaukei Land.

So we will be addressing or we will be looking at your submissions in relation to the reforms which the TLTB stated to us in their submissions yesterday. As for the electoral reform, there's been call for simplifying our electoral system all over the country. The grassroots people find the current electoral system as very complicated and they have asked or recommended that we simplify the electoral system or the electoral system and change the system that we are using.

That will be considered by your commission. In relation to the return to communal voting, we take note of that. That is a suggestion which I believe you made to the commission this morning.

No? Oh, we refrain. Yeah, we refrain from returning to communal elections.

Mr. Chaudhary: Yes, we refrain.

Mr. Valenitabua: We refrain. Is that correct now? Thank you.

Thank you very much. So we have that, we will consider that. The race-based politics is well stated, Mr. Chaudhary, and exercise the powers of the executive.

We've heard submissions from the ministries themselves. They came here and said that we need to have a change in relation to the executive power, controlling the ministries. And also the ministers overriding the permanent secretaries.

That is another point that has been raised. And equal rights, yes, there have been submissions in relation to the equal rights for all Fijians, and judicial reform. We've heard from the judiciary in relation to reform that would be required there.

Those are the main points that I have picked up, and I just wanted to summarize to us this morning. We've had a lot of submissions going around the country. You would understand.

We are flooded with submissions, so we will be working on all of this. To bring our presentation this morning to a close, I thank you very much indeed, again, on behalf of the commissioners that are present here today. Thank you very much for the submissions, comprehensive, eye-opening in relation to some of the points that they were raised.

We will indeed consider all of them during our deliberations, which will start next week. Thank you very much, and I wish Fijian Labour Party well. Thank you.

Mr Chaudhary: Thank you very much, sir.

----------End of Session [7-7-2026] ----------

Fiji Labour Party

Constitutional Reform, Democratic Legitimacy, Equality, and National Unity

Submission
Constitution Review Commission
7 July 2026

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Section 1: Parliamentary Mandate and Democratic Legitimacy

Section 2: Common National Identity

Section 3: Land Policy, iTLTB Administration, and Agricultural Leases

Section 4: Electoral System Reform – Constituency-Based Accountability

Section 5: Strengthening Democratic Oversight of Independent Institutions and Public Borrowing

Section 6: Confronting Race-Based Politics and Securing Indigenous Rights within a United Nation

Section7: Protecting Minority Rights and Advancing Women's Equal Representation

Section 8: Equal Citizenship Rights and Inclusive Electoral Participation

Section 9: Judicial Reforms and Oversight of Political Parties Funding

Section 1

1.0 Parliamentary Mandate and Democratic Legitimacy

A Fundamental Deficiency in the Establishment and Operation of the Constitutional Review Commission

Fiji Labour Party acknowledges the importance of public consultation in any review of Fiji's supreme law and welcomes the opportunity for citizens to contribute their views. However, the Party submits with the utmost respect that the Constitutional Review Commission (CRC), as currently established and operating, lacks the necessary democratic legitimacy and parliamentary mandate required under the 2013 Constitution of the Republic of Fiji.

This deficiency is not merely technical. It touches the foundational principle that the Constitution, as the supreme law, derives its authority from the people through their elected representatives in Parliament. An executive-initiated review process, without prior parliamentary endorsement, risks undermining public confidence in the integrity and ownership of any eventual reforms.

1.1 The Constitutional Framework Requires Parliamentary Authority for Fundamental Change'

The 2013 Constitution establishes clear parameters for law-making and constitutional amendment:

Section 2(5) provides that the Constitution "cannot be abrogated or suspended by any person and may only be amended in accordance with the procedures prescribed in Chapter 11."

Section 46(1) vests the authority and power to make laws exclusively in Parliament, stating that "no person or body other than Parliament has authority to make any law in Fiji, except under authority conferred by this Constitution or by a written law."

Chapter 11 (Sections 159 and 160), as interpreted by the Supreme Court in its advisory opinion of 29 August 2025, requires any amendment to proceed by way of a Bill passed by Parliament (by a two-thirds majority of all members) followed by a referendum in which a majority of votes cast are in favour, before Presidential assent.

No provision in the 2013 Constitution authorises the President or Cabinet to establish an ad hoc review commission to examine or propose alterations to the Constitution outside the amendment procedures in Chapter 11.

While the President holds certain appointment powers, the initiation of a comprehensive review of the supreme law demands the direct involvement and sanction of Parliament as the representative body of the people.

1.2 The Current Process Lacks Parliamentary Mandate. The Commission was established by Presidential Warrant without prior parliamentary debate, legislation, or endorsement. This creates several fundamental problems:

There was no prior parliamentary debate or endorsement. The elected representatives of the people had no opportunity to define the terms of reference, scope, or methodology of the review.

The terms of reference were not set by Parliament. This creates a risk that the review may address issues or propose changes that have not been subjected to the scrutiny and democratic input of the legislature.

The process bypasses the constitutional amendment pathway. Any recommendations emerging from the Commission must ultimately return to Parliament for legislative action and then to the people via referendum. An executive-led review process that bypasses Parliament at the formative stage sits uneasily with the democratic principles the Supreme Court sought to reinforce.

1.3 Democratic Legitimacy Requires Parliamentary Ownership from the Outset
The Fiji Labour Party submits that any comprehensive review of the Constitution should, at minimum, be expressly sanctioned by the elected Parliament. The Commission's work, while valuable as a consultative exercise, cannot substitute for parliamentary ownership of the reform process. Parliament is the constitutional embodiment of the people's voice. Allowing the review to proceed without its formal involvement from the beginning risks perceptions that the process is executive-driven and that outcomes may be selectively advanced or filtered before reaching the legislature.

Recommendations

In light of the foregoing, the Fiji Labour Party respectfully recommends that the Constitutional Review Commission:

1. Explicitly record in its Final Report that its work constitutes a consultative and advisory exercise only. Because the Commission lacked prior parliamentary endorsement, its Final Report must be tabled in Parliament for debate and democratic scrutiny. Only upon parliamentary acceptance should any proposals proceed to the formal amendment process under Chapter 11 (Bill passed by Parliament followed by referendum, as interpreted by the Supreme Court on 29 August 2025).

2. Recommend to the President and the Government that, because the Commission was established without prior parliamentary endorsement or legislative framework, its Final Report be formally tabled in Parliament for comprehensive debate and consideration by the elected representatives of the people.

   Parliament should have the opportunity to scrutinise the findings and recommendations. Only if Parliament accepts or endorses the Report (or its key recommendations) should the Government then proceed to introduce formal Bills for constitutional amendments in accordance with the procedures in Chapter 11 of the 2013 Constitution (as interpreted by the Supreme Court), followed by a referendum.

3. Advice that any draft constitutional amendments emerging from the Commission's work (following parliamentary consideration and acceptance of the Report) be introduced into Parliament as formal Bills, allowing for full parliamentary debate, committee scrutiny, public submissions where appropriate, and compliance with the procedural requirements of Chapter 11, culminating in a national referendum.

4. Emphasise the importance of broad parliamentary consensus on the terms of reference and scope of constitutional reform, to ensure that the process enjoys cross-party ownership and commands the widest possible public legitimacy.

5. Support measures for comprehensive public civic education on the 2013 Constitution, the Supreme Court's advisory opinion, and the formal amendment process under Chapter 11, so that citizens can participate meaningfully in both the current consultations and any subsequent referendum.

The Fiji Labour Party submits these recommendations in a constructive spirit, with the firm belief that constitutional reform undertaken through proper parliamentary and democratic channels will produce outcomes that are more stable, legitimate, and reflective of the collective will of the Fijian people.

Section 2:

2.0 Common National Identity

A Call for Unity, Equality, and the Rejection of Ethnic Categorisation in National Identity

Fiji Labour Party firmly believes that the name "Fijian" must be the common and unifying identity for all citizens of this country, without exception. This principle is already enshrined in the 2013 Constitution, which states that all citizens of Fiji shall be known as Fijians and that all Fijians have equal status and identity. The Party submits that this constitutional promise must be defended and strengthened, not undermined by any attempt to reintroduce ethnic categorisation or to create different classes of citizens.

2.1 The Constitutional Foundation of Common and Equal Citizenry

Section 5 of the 2013 Constitution is clear and unambiguous:
All citizens of Fiji shall be known as Fijians.

Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, all Fijians have equal status and identity, which means that they are equally entitled to all the rights, privileges and benefits of citizenship; and subject to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship.

This provision moved Fiji away from the communal and ethnically divided framework of previous constitutions toward a civic, inclusive national identity. The Fiji Labour Party strongly supports this principle and warns against any regression that would once again divide citizens along ethnic lines.

2.2 The Demographic and Historical Reality

Indo-Fijians constitute approximately 33% of Fiji's population, with other communities (Rotumans, Chinese-Fijians, Part Europeans, and others) making up a further 4–5%. Together, these groups represent a significant and integral part of the Fijian nation. Indians have lived in Fiji for over 140 years. They arrived as indentured labourers and stayed to build this country alongside iTaukei Fijians. They have contributed to every sector of the economy — sugar, commerce, professions, education, health, and public service. Their blood, sweat, and tears are woven into the fabric of modern Fiji.

To suggest that Indo-Fijians or other non-iTaukei citizens should be given a different category or class of citizenship — whether in name, identity documents, or constitutional status — is both historically inaccurate and morally wrong. It would create second-class citizens in a country they have helped build for generations.

2.3 Rejecting Ethnic Categorisation in Identity and Politics

The Fiji Labour Party submits that identity and nationality must be kept out of divisive ethnic politics. The 2013 Constitution's framework of common and equal citizenry must be reflected not only in law but also in the democratic process and in the everyday practice of governance. Any attempt to reintroduce ethnic categories — whether in passports, birth certificates, electoral rolls, or public discourse — would be a regressive step that undermines national unity and contradicts the spirit of the Constitution.

The Party further submits that the name "Fijian" belongs to every citizen by right of birth, upbringing, contribution, and loyalty to this country. To suggest otherwise is to deny the lived reality of thousands of families who have called Fiji home for generations and who have no other homeland.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The Fiji Labour Party respectfully recommends that the Constitutional Review Commission:

6. Affirm and strengthen Section 5 of the 2013 Constitution by explicitly stating that the name "Fijian" is the common, equal, and indivisible identity of all citizens, and that no law, policy, or administrative practice may create different classes or categories of citizens based on ethnicity or ancestry.
7. Recommend the removal of any ethnic categorisation from official documents, forms, or processes that distinguish between citizens on the basis of race or ethnicity, ensuring that all Fijians are treated as equal citizens in every respect.
8. Call for civic education and public messaging that reinforces the principle of common and equal citizenry, so that all communities — especially younger generations — understand that being Fijian is a shared identity that transcends ethnic origin.
9. Reject any proposal that would create separate categories of citizenship or identity for different ethnic groups, whether in the Constitution, legislation, or administrative practice.
10. Emphasise that the contributions of all communities — iTaukei, Indo- Fijian, and others — to the building of modern Fiji must be recognised and respected, and that no community should be made to feel like a guest or outsider in their own country.

The Fiji Labour Party believes that a united Fiji is possible only when every citizen - regardless of ethnicity - feels equally valued, equally protected, and equally Fijian. The name "Fijian" is not a prize to be granted or withheld; it is the birthright of every person born in this country or who has made it their home through citizenship. Let us defend and strengthen this principle for the sake of our children and grandchildren.

Section 3:

3.0 Land Policy, iTLTB Administration, and Agricultural Leases

Addressing the Fundamental Crisis in Land Use, Lease Security, and Equitable Development

3.0 Stability

Land is the foundation of Fiji's economy, culture, and national security. The current framework governing native (iTaukei) land leases, administered by the iTaukei Land Trust Board (TLTB), presents one of the most pressing and unresolved challenges facing the nation. The system has not delivered consistent, fair, or productive outcomes for either the landowners or the long-term tenants.

The absence of a coherent, effective national land use policy has resulted in ad-hoc decision-making, uncertainty for farmers, underutilisation of productive land, and hardship for families who have invested generations of labour in the land. This situation requires urgent, principled reform.

3.1 Land Ownership in Fiji – The Scale of iTaukei Land

Recent data from the TLTB and government sources confirm the following breakdown of land tenure in Fiji:

iTaukei (Native) Land: Approximately 90% of Fiji's total landmass. This land is owned by iTaukei landowning units (mataqali and yavusa) and administered in trust by the TLTB under the iTaukei Land Trust Act.
Freehold Land: Approximately 6%.
State Land: Approximately 4%.

Given that nearly nine-tenths of the country is iTaukei land, the policies and practices of the TLTB have a decisive impact on national agricultural output, rural livelihoods, food security, and social stability.

3.2 The Absence of an Effective National Land Use Policy

Fiji has long lacked a comprehensive, integrated national land use policy and plan. Successive reviews and policy documents over decades have identified this gap as a major constraint on sustainable development. Decisions on whether land is leased for agriculture, reserved for landowners, or converted to higher-value residential or commercial uses are often made on a case-by-case basis without a clear strategic framework. This vacuum has contributed to conflicting priorities: the need to maintain productive agricultural land versus pressure for subdivision and commercial development, particularly near growing urban centres. The result is uncertainty, under-utilisation of land, and a failure to optimise land for the long-term national interest.

3.3 Lease Terms, Renewals, and the Hardship Faced by Tenants

Agricultural leases on iTaukei land are typically granted for periods of 30 years. While the TLTB reports relatively high renewal rates in aggregate (historically 77–85% for agricultural leases since 1997, and around 75% for recent expired cane leases) but this figure is disputed by cane farmers organisations. Individual cases continue to cause significant distress.

Many tenant families - particularly Indo-Fijian families with multi-generational ties to the land - have invested heavily in homes, infrastructure, and improvements over decades. When leases are not renewed, these families face not only loss of livelihood but also the emotional and financial trauma of displacement after years of building their lives on the land. Although the TLTB states that residential alternatives are offered and compensation under the Agricultural Landlord and Tenant Act (ALTA) may be available, the process often leaves families in precarious situations.

A 30-year term is insufficient for meaningful agricultural investment, especially in sugar cane and other perennial or capital-intensive crops. Secure, longer-term tenure is essential for farmers to plan, invest, and pass on viable operations to the next generation.

3.4 Rental Structures, Premiums, and Distribution to Landowners

Concerns have been raised regarding the rental and premium structures applied by the TLTB, including charges linked to the capital value of developments or improvements, and the overall level of returns flowing to individual landowners. When land is reserved and not leased, productive output often declines, and landowners receive minimal or no direct income. The TLTB, as trustee, manages funds and distributions, but many landowners report that the amounts they ultimately receive are very small after administrative costs and sharing among large mataqali members.

This situation can create friction between tenants and landowners and fuels perceptions that the current system does not optimally serve either party. An independent, transparent review of lease terms, rental methodologies, and distribution mechanisms would help build confidence and fairness.

3.5 Agricultural Land as a Pillar of National Security

The Fiji Labour Party submits that prime agricultural land should be prioritized for food production and agricultural use. Substantial and subsistence farming forms a critical component of Fiji's national security — ensuring food self-sufficiency, rural employment, and resilience against external shocks.

Converting productive agricultural leases into commercial, residential, or subdivided developments on a large scale risks undermining this foundation. While urban development is necessary, it should not come at the expense of the nation's long-term food security. A clear policy distinction between agricultural land (to be protected for farming) and land suitable for other uses would serve the national interest.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Fiji Labour Party respectfully recommends that the Constitutional Review Commission:

11. Recognize the critical importance of secure, long-term agricultural leases and recommend a minimum lease term of 50 years for bona fide agricultural purposes to encourage investment, productivity, and intergenerational farming.
12 Recommend the establishment of an independent Land Lease Review Committee or similar body, with representation from landowners, tenants, agricultural experts, and government, to conduct a comprehensive, transparent review of lease terms, rental structures, premiums, improvement charges, and distribution mechanisms to landowners.
13. Advocate for the development and adoption of a National Land Use Policy and Plan that clearly designates and protects prime agricultural land for food production while providing transparent criteria for other land uses, ensuring decisions serve the long-term national interest rather than short-term highest-and-best-use considerations alone.
14. Recommend measures to improve transparency and timeliness in TLTB lease renewal processes, including clearer guidelines, earlier notifications, and support mechanisms for both landowners and tenants to facilitate mutually beneficial outcomes.
15. Emphasize the national security dimension of agricultural land and recommend that productive agricultural leases be prioritized and protected from widespread conversion to non-agricultural commercial or residential subdivision, except where compelling national interest is demonstrated through a structured planning process.
16. Support initiatives that ensure fair returns to iTaukei landowners while providing security of tenure to productive tenants, recognizing that a well-functioning lease system benefits both parties and strengthens national cohesion and economic resilience.

Fiji Labour Party believes that land reform, conducted through inclusive dialogue and with the long-term interests of all Fijians at heart, can resolve longstanding tensions and unlock the productive potential of Fiji's most important resource for the benefit of current and future generations.

Section 4:

4.0 Electoral System Reform – constituency-based accountability

Restoring Local Accountability, Representation, and Parliamentary Scrutiny

Fiji Labour Party has long advocated for an electoral system that delivers genuine accountability between elected representatives and the communities they serve. The current open-list proportional representation system, while providing a form of national proportionality, has significant shortcomings in terms of local representation, constituency accountability, and the ability of Parliament to effectively scrutinise the executive. This section sets out the Party's proposals for reform, drawing on the strengths of the 1997 Constitution's electoral arrangements while adapting them to contemporary needs.

4.1 The Shortcomings of the Current Electoral System

Under the 2013 Constitution, Fiji uses a single national constituency with open-list proportional representation (using the D'Hondt method and a 5% threshold). While this system has certain merits - including simplicity and a degree of proportionality - it has produced several problems:

- Lack of local constituency accountability — Members of Parliament are elected from a national list. There is no direct link between an MP and a specific geographic constituency or community. Voters do not have a local representative they can approach with constituency issues, and MPs have no defined area for which they are responsible.
- Low barriers to entry and weak mandates — Candidates can be elected with very small numbers of personal votes (in some cases fewer than 500–1,000 votes). This undermines the legitimacy and authority of Parliament and allows individuals with limited community support to enter the legislature and even become ministers.
- Weak parliamentary scrutiny — The current Standing Orders, particularly provisions such as Order 51, allow bills to be fast-tracked with limited debate and committee scrutiny. Select committees have limited powers and resources, and the executive dominates the legislative agenda.
- No meaningful constituency development link - Without defined constituencies, there is no clear mechanism for MPs to advocate for and be held accountable for development in specific areas.

4.2 Lessons from the 1997 Electoral System

The 1997 Constitution provided for a mixed system with communal seats (reserved for iTaukei, Indo-Fijian, and other communities) and open seats.

While the communal element was contentious, the open seats and the Alternative Vote (AV) system had strengths:

- Candidates had defined constituencies and were directly accountable to voters in those areas.
- The AV system encouraged moderation and cross-community appeals, as candidates needed preferences from voters outside their own ethnic group to win.
- There was a clearer link between representation and local development priorities.

The Fiji Labour Party does not advocate a return to the full communal system of the 1997 Constitution. However, we believe that elements of constituency-based representation — adapted to a non-communal, inclusive framework — would significantly improve accountability and the quality of parliamentary democracy in Fiji.

4.3 Proposed Reforms: Constituency-Based Voting with Strengthened Parliamentary Scrutiny

The Fiji Labour Party proposes the following reforms to the electoral system:

- Introduce a mixed member proportional (MMP) electoral system (or a similar mixed/hybrid model) that combines constituency based representation with overall proportionality. A substantial proportion of parliamentary seats (eg 50-70% should be elected from defined geographic constituencies using a preferential voting method such as the Alternative Vote (AV) or Single Transferable Vote (STV) in single-member constituencies, where voters rank candidates by preference.
- The remaining seats should be allocated through national or regional party lists to ensure the overall composition of Parliament is proportional to the total votes received by each party or group of independents, compensating for any disproportionality arising from constituency results.
- Strengthen parliamentary committees and scrutiny powers — Select committees should have enhanced powers to summon witnesses, require the production of documents, and scrutinise government policy and expenditure. Standing Orders should be reformed to prevent the abuse of fast-track procedures and to guarantee adequate time for debate and committee consideration of all significant legislation.
- Improve the quality of representation — Higher thresholds for election (in terms of personal votes or support) and stronger disqualification provisions for candidates with serious criminal convictions or findings of corrupt conduct would raise the standard of those entering Parliament.

- Enhance public participation and petition mechanisms - Parliament should have formal mechanisms to receive and consider public petitions on matters of national importance, and committees should be empowered to conduct inquiries on issues of public concern.

- We raise here disqualification provisions in respect of the nomination of candidates in the 2013 Constitution. We propose that the disqualification of persons from being nominated as candidates for general election as provided for in s56-(2) (5) of the constitution be removed.

  We submit that a person who has served his/her sentence or who is not serving a term of imprisonment when nominated should not be prevented from exercising his/her democratic right.

  The restrictions placed on officials and employees of trade unions and trade union federations under s57-3(f)(g). from participating in political activity by being classified as holders of public office should be revoked. Trade unions or trade union federations are not public bodies or institutions. There is, therefore, no basis for their exclusion from participation.

  This provision was inserted by the writers of the 2013 Constitution (by the Bainimarama administration) who saw trade unions as political competitors. Similar restrictions placed on the Federation of Employers under s57-(3) (h) must also be revoked.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Fiji Labour Party respectfully recommends that the Constitutional Review Commission:

17. Introduce a mixed or constituency-based electoral system in which a substantial proportion of parliamentary seats are elected from defined geographic constituencies, while maintaining overall proportionality through national or regional list seats.

18. Reform Standing Orders to strengthen the powers of select committees, guarantee adequate time for debate and scrutiny of legislation, and prevent the abuse of fast-track procedures that bypass proper parliamentary process.

19. Raise the threshold for election and strengthen candidate disqualification provisions to ensure that only candidates with genuine community support and clean records can enter Parliament.

20. Establish formal public petition and inquiry mechanisms so that citizens can bring matters of national importance directly to Parliament for consideration.

21. Ensure that any new electoral system is designed to promote moderation, cross-community cooperation, and the election of candidates who command broad support rather than narrow sectional interests.

22. Provide for comprehensive public education on any proposed electoral reforms so that voters understand how the new system works and why it will improve accountability and representation.

The current electoral system has delivered a form of proportionality but at the cost of local accountability and effective parliamentary scrutiny. The Fiji Labour Party believes that a reformed system — combining constituency representation with national proportionality, stronger committees, and better safeguards — will produce a Parliament that is more responsive to the people, more effective in holding the executive to account, and better able to deliver genuine development and good governance for all Fijians.

Section 5:

5.0 Strengthening democratic oversight of independent institutions and public borrowing

Enhancing Accountability in Appointments and Fiscal Responsibility

A robust democracy requires strong, independent institutions that are insulated from undue political influence, alongside effective parliamentary oversight of the government's fiscal decisions. The Fiji Labour Party submits that the current constitutional arrangements concentrate excessive power in the executive, particularly the Prime Minister, in both the appointment of key office-holders and in the management of public debt. Reforms are needed to restore greater parliamentary involvement and transparency.

5.1 Democratic Appointment Processes for Independent Institutions

Under the 2013 Constitution, the Prime Minister exercises significant influence over appointments to critical independent bodies through the Constitutional Offices Commission (COC) and direct recommendations to the President. The COC, which advises on appointments to institutions such as the Police, Corrections Service, RFMF, Electoral Commission, Auditor-General, and others, has a composition that gives the executive substantial control. This structure risks politicising institutions that are meant to operate independently and impartially.

International democratic practice in parliamentary systems emphasises mechanisms that balance expertise with accountability. While the executive often plays a role in nominations, independent commissions or parliamentary committees provide scrutiny to ensure merit, integrity, and freedom from active political affiliation. No person holding current political office or recent partisan affiliation should serve on bodies responsible for overseeing independent institutions.

The Fiji Labour Party proposes that appointments to independent commissions and key constitutional offices should be subject to scrutiny by a Parliamentary Select Committee. Even with a government majority on such a committee, the process introduces transparency, cross-party input, and public confidence. Following committee consideration, the President should exercise the appointment authority directly, rather than acting solely on the recommendation of the Prime Minister.

5.2 Parliamentary Oversight of Public Borrowing

Fiji's public debt has risen significantly in recent years, reaching levels that place considerable pressure on public finances and future generations. Under current arrangements, the government can enter into borrowing arrangements with domestic and international institutions and subsequently report to Parliament.

While the overall financing requirement is reflected in the budget, individual major borrowing decisions often lack prior detailed parliamentary scrutiny.

International best practice in democratic governance, as reflected in guidelines from organisations such as the World Bank, IMF, Westminster Foundation for Democracy, and the Commonwealth, strongly supports meaningful parliamentary involvement in debt management. Key principles include:

- Annual parliamentary approval of the government's overall borrowing strategy and debt ceiling as part of the budget process.
- Specific parliamentary approval (or ratification) for major individual loans, guarantees, or contingent liabilities above a defined threshold.
- Regular, detailed reporting to Parliament on debt stock, new borrowings, debt servicing, and risks.
- Clear legal frameworks that define borrowing authority and require legislative oversight for significant fiscal commitments.

Many democracies set benchmarks — for example, requiring parliamentary approval for external borrowing, loans above a certain monetary threshold, or new guarantees. This ensures that elected representatives, who are accountable to the people, scrutinise decisions that have long-term implications for the nation's finances and the well-being of citizens.

In Fiji, establishing a constitutional or legislative requirement for prior parliamentary approval of borrowing above a specified threshold (or for major external loans) would strengthen fiscal discipline, transparency, and accountability. It would prevent the accumulation of debt without adequate democratic oversight and help protect citizens from the consequences of unsustainable borrowing.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The Fiji Labour Party respectfully recommends that the Constitutional Review Commission:

23. Reform appointment processes for independent institutions by requiring scrutiny and clearance by a Parliamentary Select Committee before appointments to bodies such as the Constitutional Offices Commission and key offices (judiciary, police, military, audit, elections, etc.). No individual holding current or recent political affiliation should be eligible for such positions.
24. Strengthen the role of the President as the direct appointing authority for independent offices and commissions, following parliamentary committee processes, rather than appointments being made primarily on the recommendation of the Prime Minister.

25. Introduce constitutional or legislative requirements for prior parliamentary approval of government borrowing above a defined threshold, major external loans, and significant guarantees or contingent liabilities.

26. Require the government to present an annual Debt Management Strategy to Parliament for approval or endorsement as part of the budget process, including clear limits and risk assessments.

27. Mandate regular, detailed reporting to Parliament on public debt, new borrowings, debt servicing costs, and associated risks, with opportunities for parliamentary debate and scrutiny.

28. Support the development of a modern Public Debt Management legal framework aligned with international best practices, ensuring transparency, accountability, and parliamentary oversight throughout the borrowing cycle.

These reforms would strengthen the independence of key institutions and ensure that decisions with profound long-term consequences for Fiji's finances are subject to proper democratic scrutiny by the people's elected representatives.

Section 6:

6.0 Confronting Race-based Politics and Securing Indigenous Rights within a United Nation

An Honest Assessment of Fiji's Political Failures and the Path to Genuine National Unity

For too long, politicians in Fiji have exploited race and ethnicity to divide the nation and advance narrow political agendas. The coups of 1987 and 2000 were direct manifestations of this destructive approach. Race-based politics has set Fiji back by decades, diminished investor confidence, accelerated brain drain, and caused immense suffering to ordinary citizens of all communities. The Fiji Labour Party has been a direct victim of this politics of division.

It is time for an honest national conversation. The facts are clear. Indigenous iTaukei Fijians, through their chiefs and landowning units, own 90% of all land in this country. Their land has never been taken by Indians or any other group. Their land remains safe. Their indigenous rights are protected. Future generations must accept this reality rather than allow politicians to manufacture fear and division.

6.1 The Legacy of Race-Based Politics

Race has been weaponised by politicians for electoral gain and to justify unconstitutional actions. The coups of 1987 and 2000 were disguised as protecting indigenous rights, yet delivered neither prosperity nor security to ordinary iTaukei Fijians. Instead, they entrenched poverty, weakened institutions, and created an environment of fear and uncertainty that continues to affect the country even today.

The military has been drawn into politics on multiple occasions, often at the behest of politicians and state actors pursuing sectional interests. This has damaged the professionalism of the security forces and undermined democratic norms. The Fiji Labour Party has consistently opposed the use of race as a political tool because it harms all Fijians and prevents the country from moving forward as one nation.

6.2 Indigenous Rights and Land Ownership – The Facts

iTaukei Fijians are the traditional owners of the land. This right of ownership has been recognised and protected under all four Constitutions.

The Bill of Rights in the 2013 Constitution provides strong protections for all citizens, including specific recognition of indigenous rights. Fiji is also a signatory to relevant international instruments concerning indigenous peoples and human rights.

The land is not under threat from Indians or other communities. The land is managed by the iTaukei Land Trust Board (TLTB). Many of the problems faced by indigenous landowners — low returns, lack of development, and politicisation — stem from how the TLTB has operated and how politicians have used land issues to create division between communities rather than focusing on genuine economic empowerment of landowners.

It must be stated clearly and without equivocation: Indigenous land is safe. Indigenous rights are safe. There is no factual basis for claims that Indians or other races have taken iTaukei land. Such narratives are politically manufactured and must be rejected.

6.3 Equal Citizenship and Equal Opportunity

Fiji is a multicultural nation. All citizens — iTaukei, Indo-Fijian, and others — have contributed to building this country. Indians and other communities have toiled in the sugar industry, commerce, professions, and every sector of the economy. They deserve equal citizenship, equal opportunity, and equal dignity.

Politicians must be prohibited from creating artificial divisions based on nationality, land, or ethnicity for political gain. The 2013 Constitution already establishes the principle of common and equal citizenry. This principle must be defended and strengthened, not undermined by those who seek to return to the politics of fear and exclusion.

Continued race-based politicking is directly responsible for Fiji's ongoing challenges: accelerating brain drain, declining investment, weak institutions, and persistent poverty affecting all communities. The country cannot afford another generation lost to division.

6.4 The Path Forward – Honesty and National Unity

The Fiji Labour Party calls for a definitive break from the politics of race. Indigenous Fijians must be assured — with facts, not rhetoric — that their land and rights are secure. At the same time, all other citizens must be assured of equal treatment and opportunity. True leadership requires telling the truth: division benefits only those who exploit it. National progress requires unity, equal citizenship, and a shared commitment to building a prosperous Fiji for all.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The Fiji Labour Party respectfully recommends that the Constitutional Review Commission:

29. Affirm unequivocally that iTaukei land ownership and indigenous rights are fully protected under the 2013 Constitution and must remain so.

30. Strongly condemn the use of race-based politics by any political actor and recommend constitutional or legislative measures to discourage the exploitation of ethnicity for political gain.

31. Reaffirm the principle of common and equal citizenry for all Fijians regardless of ethnicity, and ensure that the Bill of Rights and equality provisions are not weakened.

32. Recommend reforms to the TLTB to improve transparency, returns to landowners, and depoliticise land administration so that iTaukei landowners receive genuine economic benefit from their land.

33. Call for national leadership across all communities to publicly reject divisive race-based narratives and commit to building a united, prosperous Fiji based on equal opportunity for all citizens.

34. Support civic education programmes that clearly explain the protections for indigenous rights and land ownership alongside the principles of equal citizenship, to reduce the space for political manipulation.

Fiji's future depends on honesty about the past and courage to reject the politics of division. The land is safe. The rights are protected. It is time to move forward together as one nation.

Section 7:

7.0 Protecting Minority Rights
Advancing Women's Representation

Strengthening the Framework for Inclusive Equality and Equitable Development

The 2013 Constitution establishes a strong foundation for equality through its Preamble on common and equal citizenry and the comprehensive Bill of Rights, particularly Section 26, which guarantees equality before the law and prohibits unfair discrimination on grounds of race, ethnicity, gender, and other characteristics. These provisions are commendable. However, the Fiji Labour Party submits that the constitutional promise of equality requires stronger implementation mechanisms to ensure that minorities and women enjoy genuine equal opportunity in practice, not merely in law.

7.1 Minority Rights: Beyond Formal Equality to Substantive Inclusion

Fiji's demographic reality is evolving. While iTaukei Fijians constitute the majority (approximately 62%), Indo-Fijians represent a significant minority (approximately 33%), with their share of the school-age population now around 20% due to emigration and demographic trends. Other communities, including Rotumans, Chinese-Fijians, and Pacific Islanders, Part Europeans form smaller but important minorities. The Constitution rightly protects all citizens equally, but the actual institutional framework has not always delivered balanced representation.

Concerns persist regarding under-representation of Indo-Fijians and other minorities in key institutions such as the Republic of Fiji Military Forces (RFMF), the Fiji Police Force, and the civil service. Historical patterns and recruitment practices have led to imbalances that do not reflect Fiji's national demographic composition. This undermines public confidence in these institutions as truly national bodies serving all citizens equally.

Furthermore, many minority communities and specific population groups in the outer islands (maritime provinces) and rural areas face persistent disparities in access to services, infrastructure, economic opportunities, and development investment. Isolation, high transport costs, and limited government presence exacerbate these challenges, leading to marginalization that affects national cohesion.

Fiji Labour Party advocates for proactive, merit-based measures to achieve equitable representation. This includes targeted outreach, transparent recruitment processes, diversity monitoring with public reporting, and capacity-building programmes. Such measures should aim for institutions that reflect the face of the nation without compromising merit or introducing discrimination against any group.

7.2 Women's Representation: Equal Opportunity Without Discrimination

Women constitute half of Fiji's population yet remain significantly under-represented in political decision-making. Following the 2022 general election, women held only approximately 9–11% of seats in Parliament, a decline from previous highs of around 19–20%. This falls far short of global and regional aspirations for gender parity in leadership.

Fiji Labour Party firmly believes in equal opportunity for women and men. We support increasing women's representation in Parliament and at constituency level through measures that remove structural, cultural, and financial barriers rather than through mechanisms that could be perceived as discriminatory. This includes:

- Encouraging political parties to adopt internal targets and mentoring programmes for women candidates.
- Providing capacity-building, leadership training, and campaign support for aspiring women leaders.
- Addressing cultural and societal norms that discourage women's political participation through public education and awareness.
- Ensuring safe and respectful political environments free from harassment and violence against women in politics.

We emphasise equal opportunity without discrimination. Special measures (Reserved Seats), if considered, must be carefully designed, time-bound, and implemented in a manner that builds genuine capability rather than creating perceptions of tokenism or reverse discrimination.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Fiji Labour Party respectfully recommends that the Constitutional Review Commission:

35. Strengthen implementation mechanisms for Section 26 equality provisions through mandatory diversity monitoring and public reporting on ethnic and gender representation in the RFMF, Fiji Police Force, civil service, and other public institutions, with targets aligned to national demographics.
36. Recommend proactive, merit-based diversity measures including targeted recruitment outreach, cadetship programmes, and leadership development for under-represented minorities in security forces and senior civil service roles.
37. Constitutional or legislative emphasis on equitable development for outer islands and rural communities, including dedicated funding mechanisms, infrastructure priorities, and service delivery standards to address geographic marginalization affecting all communities in those areas.

38. Support measures to increase women's political participation through party-level commitments, capacity building, mentorship, and removal of structural barriers, while upholding the principle of equal opportunity without discrimination or tokenism.

39. Establish independent monitoring and reporting on progress toward equitable representation in public institutions and Parliament, with annual public reports to Parliament and the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission.

40. Promote national dialogue and civic education on the importance of inclusive institutions that reflect Fiji's diversity, fostering public understanding that equitable representation strengthens national unity and institutional legitimacy for all citizens.

Fiji Labour Party believes that a Constitution which truly delivers on its promise of equality must ensure that every community — majority and minority alike — and every woman and man sees themselves reflected in the institutions that govern and protect them. This is not about division; it is about building a stronger, more cohesive, and more legitimate nation for all Fijians.

Section 8:

8.0 Equal Citizenship Rights and Inclusive Electoral Participation

Ensuring Equal Treatment for All Fijians in Citizenship and the Right to Serve

Fiji Labour Party has consistently championed the principle of common and equal citizenry as enshrined in the 2013 Constitution. All Fijians — regardless of ethnicity, ancestry, or place of birth — must enjoy equal rights, equal opportunities, and equal protection under the law. This section addresses two critical areas where current laws and recent legislative changes create unequal treatment: citizenship rights for children born overseas and the ability of dual citizens to participate fully in public life by contesting elections.

8.1 Citizenship for Children Born Overseas – Equal Rights for All Communities

Under the Citizenship of Fiji Act and its amendments, children born in Fiji generally acquire citizenship by birth. For children born overseas, citizenship is acquired by registration if at least one parent is a Fijian citizen. Recent legislative changes, including the Citizenship of Fiji (Amendment) Bill 2026, have introduced facilitative provisions that recognise links to land-owning units (mataqali) for iTaukei children born overseas, making it easier for them to regularise or acquire Fijian citizenship through ancestral connections.

The Fiji Labour Party supports measures that strengthen ties between the diaspora and Fiji. However, we submit that these facilitative provisions must be extended equally to all communities. Children of Indo-Fijian parents born in Fiji but living overseas, as well as children of other minority groups (Rotumans, Chinese-Fijians, and others), should have access to the same streamlined registration processes and recognition of family/ancestral links. Citizenship rights must not be differentiated on ethnic grounds.

Equal citizen rights demand that the law treats all Fijian families the same, whether their children were born in Fiji or overseas. Any provision that makes it easier for one ethnic group's diaspora children to claim or regularise citizenship while imposing higher barriers on others violates the constitutional guarantee of common and equal citizenry. The Fiji Labour Party calls for immediate legislative amendment to ensure uniformity across all communities.

8.2 Allowing Dual Citizens to Contest Elections and Reducing the Residency Requirement

Section 56 of the 2013 Constitution currently provides that a person may be a candidate for election to Parliament only if they are a citizen of Fiji and do not hold citizenship of any other country. Additionally, candidates must be ordinarily resident in Fiji for at least two years immediately before nomination.

Fiji Labour Party believes these restrictions are outdated and counterproductive in a globalised world. Fiji has a large, skilled diaspora. Many Fijians who migrated retain strong ties to the country, hold Fijian citizenship (often alongside another nationality), and possess valuable expertise in fields such as medicine, engineering, finance, technology, education, and governance.

Prohibiting dual citizens from contesting elections prevents these experienced professionals from returning to serve the nation in elected office.

Furthermore, the current two-year residency requirement creates an unnecessary barrier. Reducing this to one year would still ensure candidates have a meaningful connection to Fiji while allowing skilled returnees to contribute sooner. Many countries with large diasporas have successfully balanced residency requirements with the need to attract talent back into public life.

Fiji Labour Party therefore calls for two specific reforms to the electoral law:

- Remove the prohibition on dual citizens contesting elections, allowing Fijian citizens who hold another nationality to stand for Parliament, provided they meet all other eligibility criteria.
- Reduce the ordinary residency requirement from two years to one year immediately preceding nomination, to facilitate the return and participation of skilled diaspora members while maintaining a genuine connection to the country.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Fiji Labour Party respectfully requests the Constitutional Review Commission to recommend that:

41. The Citizenship of Fiji Act be amended to ensure that facilitative provisions for registration and recognition of ancestral/family links for children born overseas apply equally to all communities — iTaukei, Indo-Fijian, Rotuman, Chinese, Part Europeans and other minority groups — without ethnic differentiation.
42. Constitutional and legislative prohibition on dual citizens contesting elections be removed, enabling Fijian citizens who hold another nationality to stand for Parliament and contribute their expertise to national development.
43. The ordinary residency requirement for parliamentary candidates be reduced from two years to one year immediately preceding nomination, to facilitate the electoral participation of skilled members of the Fijian diaspora.

44. All reforms uphold the principle of common and equal citizenry and do not create or perpetuate any form of ethnic or other discrimination in the acquisition or exercise of citizenship rights and political participation.

45. Public consultation and clear communication on these reforms be undertaken so that all Fijians — at home and in the diaspora — understand that citizenship rights and the opportunity to serve are equal for every community.

Fiji Labour Party believes that true equality means treating every Fijian family the same, whether their children were born in Fiji or overseas, and whether they hold one citizenship or two. It also means opening the door for talented Fijians who have gained experience abroad to return and serve their country in elected office. These reforms will strengthen our democracy, enrich our institutions, and reaffirm that all citizens are equal.

Section 9

9.0 Judicial Reforms and Oversight of Political Party Funding

Strengthening Timely Justice, Institutional Integrity, and Democratic Accountability

Fiji Labour Party submits this section to highlight two critical areas requiring urgent constitutional and legislative attention:

- the need for comprehensive judicial reforms to address chronic delays and ensure timely justice, and
- the imperative to place the regulation of political party funding under the independent oversight of the Electoral Commission with clear rules approved by Parliament.

These issues directly affect public confidence in the rule of law and the integrity of Fiji's democratic institutions.

9.1 Judicial Reforms: Ending Delays, Ensuring Timely Justice, and Improving Access for Ordinary Citizens

The Current Crisis of Delay

Fiji's judicial system faces a serious and well-documented crisis of delay. The Chief Justice, Hon. Salesi Temo, has publicly expressed concern over the significant backlog, with cases dating back 10 to 20 years still pending.

Civil cases, in particular, drag on for many years, causing immense hardship to litigants, especially ordinary citizens who cannot afford prolonged legal battles. Criminal cases, including serious matters such as rape and sexual violence against children, have also suffered unacceptable delays.

A stark and troubling example is the case highlighted by the Fiji Women's Rights Movement in May 2026 involving a young girl who waited six years for justice in a sexual violence matter, only for the case to be withdrawn.

Children constitute the majority of rape victims in Fiji. Such prolonged delays not only deny justice to victims and survivors but also erode public trust in the entire justice system. "Justice delayed is justice denied" is not merely a slogan — it is the lived reality for too many Fijians.

Additionally, the high cost of litigation places justice beyond the reach of many ordinary citizens. Legal fees can be prohibitive, and the perception that the system primarily benefits those who can afford expensive lawyers undermines the constitutional guarantee of equal protection under the law.

Lessons from New Zealand, Australia, and Other Commonwealth Jurisdictions

New Zealand and Australia have implemented robust judicial case management systems that significantly reduce delays while maintaining fairness. Key features include:

Active judicial case management - Judges take early and ongoing control of proceedings through docket systems and regular case management conferences, rather than allowing parties to drive the pace.

- Clear time standards - Courts set and publish time standards for different categories of cases (e.g., ordinary civil matters to be resolved within 12 months; judgments delivered within three months of final submissions in the Federal Court of Australia).
- Strict control of adjournments - Unnecessary adjournments are discouraged or disallowed except for compelling reasons.
- Electronic case management and e-filing - Modern technology streamlines processes, reduces paperwork, and improves transparency and monitoring.
- Performance measurement and accountability - Courts regularly publish statistics on case disposal times, backlog, and clearance rates.
- Expanded use of mediation and alternative dispute resolution - Many civil matters are resolved without full trial, freeing court resources for complex cases.

These jurisdictions demonstrate that with strong judicial leadership, clear rules, technology, and accountability mechanisms, significant reductions in delay are achievable without compromising fairness or the rights of parties.

Proposed Reforms for Fiji

The Fiji Labour Party recommends a comprehensive judicial reform package, including:

- Introduction of active judicial case management with binding time standards for different categories of cases (civil, criminal, family, etc.).
- Mandatory publication of judgments within defined timeframes (e.g., within three months of final submissions in most cases).
- Strict limits on adjournments, with judicial discretion to refuse unnecessary delays.
- Full rollout of electronic case management, e-filing, and digital court records.

  Strengthened legal aid and pro bono schemes to improve access for low-income litigants.
- Enhanced judicial training in case management and the use of technology.

9.2 Oversight of Political Party Funding by the Electoral Commission

Transparent and accountable political party funding is essential for the integrity of democracy. Under the current framework, there have been concerns about the allocation of public funds to political parties — reportedly around FJD 325,000 per year — without sufficient transparency, clear criteria, or robust parliamentary oversight. The Fiji Labour Party submits that the regulation of political party funding, including any state support or disclosure requirements, must be placed under the independent authority of the Electoral Commission, with the overarching framework approved by Parliament.

The Electoral Commission is the appropriate independent body to oversee party registration, funding disclosure, campaign finance rules, and compliance. Placing this responsibility clearly with the Commission, backed by legislation passed by Parliament, will enhance transparency, reduce the risk of political manipulation, and strengthen public confidence in the electoral process.

9.3 Strengthening the DPP and FICAC for Public Confidence

The Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) and the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption (FICAC) are critical institutions for upholding the rule of law and combating corruption. However, recent administrative issues, perceived politicisation, and public statements by FICAC have raised serious concerns about institutional independence and public trust. The Fiji Law Society has called for a radical overhaul of the anti-corruption framework, including consideration of whether FICAC should retain its current prosecutorial powers.

Fiji Labour Party supports a review of these institutions to ensure they operate with genuine independence, professionalism, and accountability. Structural reforms may include clearer constitutional safeguards for the DPP's independence, review of FICAC's mandate and governance, and improved coordination between investigative and prosecutorial bodies.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The Fiji Labour Party respectfully recommends that the Constitutional Review Commission:

1. Introduce constitutional or legislative provisions for active judicial case management with binding time standards for the disposal of civil and criminal cases and for the delivery of judgments.
2. Mandate the adoption of modern case management tools including electronic filing, digital case tracking, limits on adjournments, and regular publication of court performance statistics.
3. Place the regulation of political party funding and disclosure under the independent oversight of the Electoral Commission, with the detailed framework to be set out in legislation approved by Parliament.

4. Ensure transparency in any state funding to political parties through clear, published criteria and independent oversight by the Electoral Commission.
5. Review the structure, independence, and mandate of the DPP and FICAC to strengthen public confidence, ensure genuine institutional independence, and improve coordination in the fight against corruption.
6. Support increased resources and training for the Judiciary including additional judges, improved court infrastructure, legal aid expansion, and judicial education in modern case management techniques.

Timely justice is not a luxury — it is a fundamental right.
An independent, efficient judiciary and transparent political financing rules are cornerstones of democratic governance.

Fiji Labour Party urges the Commission to recommend bold, practical reforms in these areas so that every Fijian - rich or poor - can have confidence that justice will be delivered fairly and without undue delay, and that political competition is conducted on a level playing field.

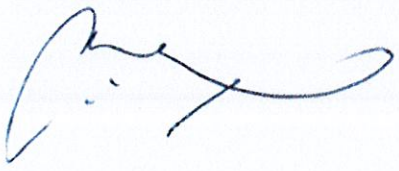
International Instruments on Human Rights

Fiji has acceded to the following international Conventions or Covenants:

- International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR)
- International Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD)
- International Convention on Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW)
- UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples
- International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of
- International Convention Against torture and other Inhuman or Degrading Treatment and Punishment (CAT)
- International Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disability (CRPD)

The nation's Constitution and its laws must be aligned in conformity to the provisions of these international instruments.

Submitted respectfully on behalf of the Fiji Labour Party,



Mahendra P. Chaudhry,
Leader/ Secretary-General

Professor Katerina Teaiwa and Others

Romitesh Kant

Virtual Consultation
Mr Romitesh Kant and Professor Katerina Teaiwa
Tuesday 7 July 2026
3-pm

Chair Mr Sevuloni: Are you able to hear me?

Thank you. Now, I think I'll call this consultation session to order. I understand you are the only one doing the submission now.
My last question was, at four p.m., you would be appearing with, or submitting with Professor Teaiwa, is that correct? That's correct.

Mr Kant: Professor Teaiwa will lead the submission for the Banaban community.

Mr. Valenitabua: Okay, so we shall proceed with you now. Did you send us a written submission?

Mr Kant: I'm going to do this after this consultation and email the written submission.

Mr. Valenitabua: Now, we will not, or I will not take any further time. I now hand over to you the session this afternoon, and you can address us now in respect of your submission.

Vinaka, we are listening.

Mr Kant: Hello, Dr. Commissions, Chair, and the Commissioners. Thank you for inviting me to this consultation.

Actually, I thought it was just a conversation, but then I realized after reading the email that I need to make a submission, so I had to spend the weekend preparing something. But I speak from several overlapping positions. Firstly, I am a Fiji-based, and a Fijian scholar who has researched constitution-making in Fiji.

Also, during the 2012 constitution-making process, me and my colleague from USP, Mr. Eroni, we followed the Constitution Commission, talked to the people in communities in rural and urban settings about their experiences of participating in constitution-making processes, and I did my master's thesis at the University of the South on Constitutional Design, where I did a comprehensive study comparing the politics of constitution-making in our four constitution-making processes. Secondly, I speak also as someone who has worked and engaged in civil society in the recent movements in Fiji, in the pro-democracy movement, in the human rights spaces as well. These reflections also, the reflections I've shared here today are also informed by my engagement with the activists and civil society spaces in Fiji.

It comes from watching people try to engage in the political processes, usually under very difficult conditions, and these are experiences that I've also lived in, and I've also engaged in observing how activists, women leaders, young people, community members, human rights defenders, and ordinary citizens often want to participate but do not always trust that the participation will matter in these processes. Thirdly, I also researched and finished my PhD at the Sri Lankan University that examined political parties' leadership and masculinities, how masculinities form this infrastructure behind that we cannot call resources, and how these political systems continue to grow, to provide undue advantage to men in politics, that despite all this rhetoric and progress we've made around women's political participation, there is something that is still invisible and hidden, so my PhD tried to examine how this idea of masculinity or how masculine masculinity works behind the scenes to reproduce male dominance.

So in this opening article, I will not be talking about the technical or legal aspects of drafting the constitution, but rather focus my presentation and my submission around legitimacy, ownership, power, and inclusion, things that I have engaged in studying but also engaged in through my activism, and I'll also try to shed some light on what the lessons Fiji's constitution history teaches us and what the commission might want to do to guide and test some of these lessons that we have learnt through our four constitutions and about five constitutional processes.

So, I'll begin with the first point. This point I'd like to use around elite settlements and imposed constitutions, but this process I see that is taking place now is largely from Fiji's constitutional past. It belongs to a long epitome of constitution-making in Fiji, and since independence, constitution-making in Fiji has oscillated between two broad tendencies, elite political settlements and imposed constitutions.

So, both our 1970 and 1997 constitutions were elite compromises between politicians, and the 1990 and 2013 constitutions were imposed constitutions. And I think public participation sits in between there where public participation was used as a tool to legitimize the process, but genuine public consultation was never intended to inform our constitution-making. It has been a history where political elites have co-opted the process, and they have taken over the process to draft constitutions that serve political interests.

So when we talk about legitimacy, when we talk about constitutional text, I think we need to go beyond the constitutional text in itself, that while the text is important and it's legally enforced, who does the constitution really belong to? And I think a lot of our constitutional legitimacy question points down to the issue of ownership. I think what we have in Fiji emphasizes a lot of importance on respecting constitutionalism and the rule of law, what is written in the constitution. We sometimes forget that the process of getting to the text isn't as important as the text itself.

And the recurring wound in Fiji's constitutional history has been that people are invited into the process, but political elites control the final settlement. And many times, those final settlements have been compromises between political elites to gain more political advantage from the process itself, which then impacts on legitimacy, or which then impacts on popular ownership of the constitutional text in itself. And this is how coups happen, and abrogation of constitutions happen, and new constitutional making processes happen all the time.

And this is where we are stuck in a cycle. So the question I have been obsessed for becoming another moment, where public participation is filtered, narrowed, or captured by political forces and political elites. The second interlinking point to this is that constitutional recommendations in participatory processes like the 1995 process and the 20th World People's Process, the Category Commission process, both point to the issue of constitutional coherence.

Both the Reeves Commission and the Ghai Commission produced very holistic proposals for Fiji, and the diagnosis and the prognosis that they presented was quite holistic. Their recommendations were not isolated, either distinct apart from each other. And they presented, and both the Reeves Commission and Ghai Commission alluded to this in their explanatory reports, that the proposals they are making for the constitution settlement are interlinked packages.

So electoral design in the Ghai process and in the Reeves Commission reports were connected to power sharing. Issues around culture, citizenship, ethnic relations, and reconciliations were part of one constitutional design. However, what happens with the Pakistan...Iraqi recommendations that work for them and discard recommendations that do not work for the authorities that no longer holds together, because these settlements or these recommendations were always presented as a holistic, one leads to another interlinked package.

So, this has happened in a minor form with the Reeves process, where elements of the Commission's recommendations were altered through political negotiation. It has happened more directly after the Ghai process where the whole process was ditched and the recommendations were ditched in favor of a constitution drafted to serve Bainimarama and Khaiyum, and reinforce their power that they have created since 2006. So, this is another major lesson for the Commission in itself, that it should make clear which of its recommendations are interlinked and explain very clearly when a recommendation works because it is tied to another.

That way, if the cabinet or parliamentary committee later decides to remove one part, the public can see what that does to the overall department. And this also leads to this idea of the referendum where people will be asked to vote. And I think people should be given the opportunity to know what the Commission's internal thinking was on choosing a particular institutional design or choosing a particular provision and why it works with other commissions the Commission has recommended...and other commissions as well.

So they are able to make an informed decision. It also leads to the issue of transparency in the whole process as well. I think there is essentially a level of it in processes, but they are not able to trace their participation to the outcomes that emanate from a particular process.

And I think it actually adds to the legitimacy of the Constitution Commission itself, that they have taken seriously people's interests in this process, and that people have taken time, again, to really think through what do they want in a constitutional settlement. The third thing

I would like to say is from my master's thesis, that constitution-making, especially in a divided society like Fiji, poses some very theoretical and philosophical questions, because it tries to grapple with some very contentious issues. And one thing that came out of my master's thesis is also that constitution design in divided societies like Fiji does not need to resolve or answer all the questions that the country is facing.

Sometimes it is important to leave some democratic spaces open for democratic deliberation to take place so that over time people are able to solve. And this brings to the point that constitutions are leading documents. So it should not be easily amendable, but it should not be also too difficult to handle.

And thinking that it will come, there should be some... deliberate spaces that the Constitution allows people to come and deliberate on contentious issues. It does have the other intention also to stop coups from happening, because as we know from Fiji's history, a small, disenchanted group can appropriate a particular process to carry out a coup, just like it happened in 2000, or 2006, or 1987. So these deliberative spaces allow for disagreements to happen in democratic ways.

I would frame the Constitution itself for this current constitution-making process should not be seen as a final settlement, but framed as a framework for ongoing democratic conversation to take place. This means creating institutions that allow for difficult questions to be revisited without resorting to coups or abrogations of constitutions. It means accepting that some questions around identity, around reconciliation, around power sharing, around representation, may need very structured deliberation over time, rather than a single final answer that the Constitution is expecting to solve.

The Constitution, and this is where I would guide the commission to look at the Ghal draft that is here to report, because the Ghai commission did recommend the National Legal Assembly as an assembly that brings together elected local and national elected representatives with civil society, with provincial and advisory bodies, with youth groups, people in maritime, at regular intervals to deliberate on where Fiji is, where the constitutional framework is. This is where elected representatives directly talk to people as well. And these spaces should be harnessed.

I think we need to look beyond the liberal constitutional model that institutions always answer the questions, very different questions. I think we should create these deliberative spaces that divert attention away from coups and abrogation's to more productive spaces where people can come, disagree, deliberate, and come to consensus. And I think this is where indigenous practices like Talanoa can be harnessed, processes like Talanoa can be harnessed in its potential to actually come to agreements and disagreements and foster consensus decision-making.

The other issue is the issue of national identity. And I know for me, the deliberations that have been happening in the constitution process that it is one of the most sensitive issues brought before the commission. And I've been thinking about this and just correct a factual thing here.

The 2013 constitution is the first constitution in Fiji to establish a common national identity. The Reeves report recommended Fiji Islander to be Fiji's national identity, but the 1997 constitution did not include a national, common national identity. It included all common citizenship, but did not include a common name for people of Fiji.

It recommended that should the parliamentarians and politicians be open to the idea of a common national identity, they could include Fiji Islander as a member of it. This is one of the more controversial points, and I think some very passionate submissions have been made towards this. I don't think, I do not think a common national identity should be amended, but Fiji should not return to a constitutional order that harbors ethnic segregation.

And I think that when the 2013 constitutional provisions tried to harden, and what we have seen is it was enforced in a militaristic authoritarian way without any deliberation, and it hardened a lot of passion and deep-seated ethnic insecurity, which is, as Fijians, we cannot talk about this, we cannot deliberate about this. But I also believe that we should not return to communal categories, because communal categories from pre-independence to independence until 2013 has also hardened and made us looking, made us into thinking always about our ethnic interests as opposed to national interests. One thing I would say is also that the 2013 Constitution in addressing the issue of common national identity also became blind to inequality.

It enforced ethnic blindness in a way that did not take into account inequality. Equal citizenship and a common national identity should not mean pretending that everyone is equal and has equal access to state services, to resources, and to power. In Fiji, people do not have equal access all the time.

So just by merely wishing a way to a common national identity that we are all equal does not make us all equal substantively. Different communities experience citizenship in very different ways. A poor rural woman might be formally an equal citizen, but still face unequal access to transportation, health services, land, income, education, decision-making.

The same can be applied to ... in parliaments. Whilst they were seen as equal citizens, the 5% threshold effectively disadvantaged them in political representation. The same for our Melanesian brothers and sisters, for queer communities, for persons with disabilities.

Formal equality does not imply substantive equality. Some people in Fiji also carry histories of being indigenous, connections to land and the vanua. Some carry histories of displacement, of relocation, of minority ethnic status.

Some carry burdens of indenture, labor, migration, and condition of belonging. And some face exclusion through gender, sexuality, class, geography, and region. So I think what the constitution needs to do is bring to life this idea of equal citizenship, that it means more than giving everyone the same constitutional label.

It has to recognize that people have different histories, they have different vulnerabilities, and their relationships through which people actually live the citizenship. How do we bring this to life? So a purely Fiji-blind approach to build unity by wishing away our social differences is not the solution to Fiji's building a cohesive national consciousness. Fiji's differences do not disappear because the constitution stops naming them.

A more durable approach to the constitution would be that protects common citizenship, but also recognizes real histories and equalities that shape people's daily lives. So this is where I think questions around affirmative action, that we special measures, and constitutionalizing that becomes important, because it is recognizing that just we are one, we are all equal, we all do not have the same opportunities to progress, that some might be left behind, and that the constitution does then bring into this ideas around affirmative action. And leaning from the affirmative action and equal citizenship is the idea around reconciliation, belonging, and I want to, as an observer of Fiji politics, and someone who's very interested in Fiji politics, despite not being there, I'm waiting to see how this commission's work connects with the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.

How this constitutional commission will address the issue of reconciliation in this country. So, like I mentioned earlier, constitution can declare common citizenship, but belonging has to be built socially, culturally, here still, historically, and relationally. I'd like to give an example that I think is worth raising the Rewa-Noco process, that involved the descendants of Girmitiya, that involved the vanua of Noco, that involved the confederacy of Burebasaga, and the..., who, that he based processes where people who were genuinely interested in resolving ethnic differences worked at that community level over years.

So, I think the process actually highlights the fact that reconciliation is extensive, and that constitutions, whilst it gives a framework for governing, for rights, cannot purely on its own build these processes that bring people together. And I don't think that the Reconciliation process is one-size-fits-all process, but it is one local process shaped by one Vanua, shaped by one history, and one set of relationships. But it raises very important constitutional questions around how does the constitution make space for people to talk about belonging in productive ways that respects indigenous customs, indigenous processes.

And it is not only a legal thing, but it is also very relational, where people are able to relate to each other in ways that a constitution sometimes cannot address because it becomes too legalistic. So I don't think the constitution should try to standardize the reconciliation process, but it should recognize that healing and teaching will not only happen through courts, commissions, or parliamentary reform, or constitutional reform, that it also involves communities, it involves Vanua, it involves faith groups, women's groups, youth spaces, civil society, and local practices of acknowledgement and preparing, that the constitution should open these spaces up as well, give it some constitutional backing. There are certain issues that require going beyond these formal spaces of courts and commissions and parliament.

One of the important recent work that I've done is around electoral design, gender blindness, and race blindness. The 2013 constitution was both race-blind, where it tried to wish away differences, but it was also trying to be gender-blind, assuming everyone, merely by being formal citizens, are equal, a single national constituency open list proportionate system, 5% threshold. They all look very neutral on paper, but I think they do not operate in a neutral society.

It gave unfair advantage to those with name recognition. So in the last elections, about 50% of the votes went to party leaders with name recognition. It gives recognition and rewards party machinery.

It gives recognition to people with money, access to money and financial resources. It gives people who have natural disability, who are also trying to ethnically modernize people, to establish people with established leadership networks. So the system, whilst looking at it from outside, seems equal only, it did produce very unequal outcomes.

So, I think the commission needs to think about what this means for future, around electoral fairness beyond the polling day, whether people can cast a vote, that the idea that fair action depends on the conditions before they actually do, whether parties can organize freely, whether media access is fair, whether public resources are misused, whether civil servants are protected from political pressure, whether government of the day operates on the same terms as everybody. The Ghai commission again, recommended transitional provisions, caretaker rules, which the government, the regime at that time did not like because it had forced them to become politically neutral as the election campaigning period started. The regime has started its election campaigning period, yet there are no caretaker rules that apply, that the government should not be able to use the powers of incumbency to get unfair advantage in the electoral process.

In my article with Dr. Karen Bacon on the 2022 elections, we tried to look at gender blindness and what do the electoral provisions mean in the context of gender blindness? And we found that despite some very progressive elements in the 2013 century constitution, the 2013 century constitution ultimately entrenched a status quo that remains militarized, that is still dominated by men and ethnic interests. So while the 2022 elections did produce a transition of power from. Fiji first to a coalition government, and it's first in our history, it also produced this transition in an environment where the number of women who were successful drastically dropped from 10 to five women. So, it is saying something about the gender nature of this transition, that women still do not have an equal playing field when it comes to accessing political power.

And this tells us that our system is deeply problematic, that women are told to compete equally in a system where conditions of competition are unequal... This is why gender equality show...in 2023, the parliament or Ministry of Finance started giving grants to political parties without even attaching gender outcomes to these grants. These grants are just given merely to political parties for being represented in parliament without enforcing.

And what we see is that it's still very hard for women to crack the high echelons of party leadership. And I think temporary special measures and enforced parties cannot be trusted to enforce equality when it comes to gender representation. The constitution should explicitly allow for temporary special measures.

Gender quotas, candidate nomination rules, party funding, incentives, campaign finance transparency should require parties to be integrity, democratic in gender terms as well. And I think throughout Fiji's history, political parties have said they want 80% women in party leadership, they want 80%, but the political will to do this has always lagged behind because political parties buy from political power and they will not do things that jeopardizes their access to power. So once formal equality will ask, does everyone has the same right? I think substantive equality will ask, can everyone actually use their rights equally? And the answer has been, in Fiji, No.

While the constitution does give formal equality to everyone, substantively there are some people who are on this left behind. And these are ethnic minorities, these are queer people, these are women, these are young people. So I think the constitution in itself needs to grapple with the idea of how do we substantively give equality to everyone whilst also talking about formal equality.

And I'm so glad that I'm making this submission as the Commander of the Republic of Fiji Forces has made their submission, which I welcome wholeheartedly that the immunity provisions need to go. But I think also, apart from the immunity provisions going, I think we need to grapple with the role of the military in itself in Fiji and Fijian politics and governance. And the coups in Fiji have produced a population and a culture where there's a weak public trust in institutions, there's weak democratic institutions.

There's been a manipulation of our politics and our constitutional frameworks that produces ethnic anxieties. Ethnicity and ethnic insecurities are always politically manipulated to serve political interests. And a failure, it has produced a failure of citizens to feel ownership over the constitutional democracy that all constitutions have tried to give us.

This is why the Ghai process tried to strengthen both sides of the equation. On one hand, it proposed institutions for wider public participation. On the other hand, it placed security forces clearly under civilian constitutional control.

And I think this commission needs to grapple with this idea of who is the military accountable to. So the Ghai commission, proposed Fijian National Assembly. It was a very interesting proposal.

It was designed to be an edible space for bringing together representatives of government, parliament, local governments, independent commissions, civil society, which civil society constitutionally mandated to be in the majority in this national assembly. Its purpose was not to replace parliament, but to create a common public space where state officials will report on their work, national policies could be discussed, and citizens and civil society could help hold government to account. So I'm not saying that Fijian needs to revive the national security, national security of the assembly, exactly as proposed in the 2012 process.

But there were some legitimate concerns around its size, about cost, about representation, about reputation, and about questions around whether this could also be a site where politicians and elites will capture the process. But I think we need to focus on the principle behind it and how important it remains. That Fijian needs to have a constitutional mechanism for structured public deliberation between elections.

That we should not just really go to people during elections to seek their input. Elections are not enough to induce any form of trust in or build trust in institutions, build trust in processes. And if we only expect citizens to participate every four years, democracy becomes very thin.

People's understanding of democracy then just becomes really coming, appearing, four years, every four years, to make a decision. I think in a divide of constitution, multiple constitutions, people need regular..., and to build democratic trust. My recommendation on a broad level, I do not have any answers to this, but on a broad level, I think my recommendation to the commission is to consider some form of permanent civic participation mechanism.

Going from, but not simply replicating the 2012 Yash Ghai's People's National Assembly, it could be a national civic assembly, it could be a people's constitutional forum, it could be a citizens accountability forum that takes place every three or two years. Its role should be deliberative, and accountability-focused, not legislative, because legislative would be the role of the parliament. It should include broad-based representation from civil society, from women's groups, persons with disabilities, faith communities, trade unions, private sector, rural and maritime communities, ethnic minorities like Banabans, Rotumans, our Melanesian brothers and sisters, and other minority communities.

I think it is, the larger point here is that we should move away from military guardianship to democratic guardianship, and this is our ongoing challenge. How do we transition from military to our guardian, to people being guardians of a constitutional democratic order, and I think a coup-resistant constitution will not only be built by human prohibition alone, it will be built by building democratic culture. Where citizens have real spaces to participate.

Security institutions are subordinated to civilian authority, and constitutional disagreements can be managed without resorting to coups and abrogation's. And I think the last point I would make is around section 131 (2) of the constitution, which gives RFMF external security and over-extended role in national building of Fijians. I think this guardianship role needs to be removed from the constitution.

I think multiple times the military has, in its own public description, alluded to the fact that the military has extended role, and has made references to section 131 (2) of the constitution. So whatever the strict legal scope of this section is, it has been used by the military and by politicians to try to... the military, because it opens up the states. And I think the Fijian government kind of hoped that the military, in December 2022, would exercise its role under this.

The military has also alluded to this a few times in the legal connections in 2022 and after elections as well. And I think we need to be very certain in our language when we come to the military, and it's true. I believe, I think the military needs to go.

In my personal opinion, as an institution, because a small state like Fiji does not need a military. Those resources, those money could be used elsewhere for public services, for education, for social security. The young people, the argument, the short straw argument that always gets made that this is a corruptive way in which young people get employed, I think we can do better than making these the short-sighted arguments, because our culture of militarism has been one of our greatest challenges to building a democratic society, to building trusted institutions.

But I think, again, the Yash Ghai process did allude to some, they did some thinking, and they did come up with some recommendations for removing the guardianship role, and giving stronger parliamentary oversight, not just executive oversight, but parliamentary oversight, that they created a National Security Council for their execution, which included not just the Minister for Defense, it also involved representations from the opposition. And this is the Ghai Commission in its own deliberations, in listening to people, in listening to experts, coming up with, trying to come up with a solution. I think this position is also tasked with a similar predicament, where after listening to people, after listening to experts, you will have to come up with some creative solutions.

I think sometimes it's good to look beyond the suite of options that we are offered in a typical liberal democracy, because I think Fiji's problems are problems that are unique, sometimes, to our old youth context. And I think the military submission, maybe in itself, by the Commander, actually does give some confidence for the commission to look creatively at how to, how could the commission come up with provisions that re-establishes constitutionally grounded approaches to national security, as an civilian oversight body, rather than a military-dominated institution. It should include, in my view, in broad principles, it should include government, opposition, parliamentary committees, sub-unit representation as well, with heads of security forces accountable to that significance.

Just one aspect I'd just like to also raise before I finish is the constitution of the federated state in, sorry, Micronesia, a basic state constitution that actually mandates every 10 years, people are asked, should there be a constitutional convention and if people vote in favor, then a constitution is reviewed. It's, what I'm saying is we do not need to copy the federated state of Micronesia, for example, but I think what we should do is keep the space open where people can petition the parliament and I think this is where the creativity for the coalition comes in and how do we open deliberative spaces that people can actually tell the elected representatives that this constitutional framework is not working for us and it could recommend to elected representatives that constitutional review mechanisms should be keeping.

So a constitution should not be made easy to change. I think it should not be made too rigid and it should not, cannot be changed and I think this deliberation idea is sort of in a way of co-proofing our politics and our constitutional work and it's bringing in an element where people actually will have trust. We will reveal trust that people have in institutions.

We will reveal trust that people will have in the constitution and it will build a culture of democracy and I think we need to look beyond the tools offered in a typical liberal constitutional order and be a bit creative in solving or how do we see resolving some of the intractable problems that has been in Fiji in our past few decades.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much, Mr Kant.

I will now ask the commissioners if they have any comments or any discussion they wanna reach with you in relation to your submissions this afternoon.

Ms. Nailatikau: Appreciate the submission and the thought that you put behind it. I'm sure you will find quite a lot of submissions that echo your perspective on ensuring that whatever solutions are found, they meet Fiji's very specific and unique context while at the same time, knowing that you can consider other contexts as well in informing that decision. I think in terms of, I think going from the very first submission that we heard, there were suggestions, for instance, on having potentially a standing commission where a constitution is able to continue to be reviewed.

And I think the added dimension that your submission makes today is also not necessarily strictly institutionalizing such a regular review process, but also opening up that institutionalization to civic participation as directly as possible. I think it's also beneficial to us to look at the work of earlier commissions while at the same time, acknowledging that time has moved on. I think the thought that I'm left with today is about the holisticness of recommendations and how recommendations for complex situations like the managing of a country's governance infrastructure and leaving room for growth should be considered holistically and not necessarily, I'm using an extreme word here, but not necessarily cherry-picked, for example, in the political settlement process.

Could you talk more, especially about how the commission might reflect that better in the report? You spoke about ensuring that maybe potential recommendations can be presented as a package, for instance, or in bringing recommendations to light for consideration, you can also mention the implications of that recommendation alongside others. And maybe you can draw from the political process that followed the Reeve and the Ghai Commission experiences. Thank you.

Mr. Kant: I think one of the most interesting aspects of this current constitution-making process is the idea of the report. And this is the first time Fiji or Fijians will be asked to comment or to vote on a constitutional package. And I think one thing that is also very confusing is how this referendum will happen.

Will people be presented section by section recommendations that this commission has made and then be asked to vote section by section, or will it be a part of a holistic referendum where only one question will be asked? And this is where I've been thinking what the commission could do, and this could be beyond the scope of the terms of reference of the constitution, is respecting that people took time to come before you and took time and courage to present to you what their fears and their hopes of Fiji is. And this is where I think the commission could actually build some transparency mechanism in your own declarations, where you could present something like a public response matrix. This is what people said, this is what we are recommending, and then allow civil society then to feel what the politicians are trying to pick up.

So while the Yash Ghai Constitution Commission presented an explanatory report, it was not as comprehensive as the recent one, which was quite thick. It was very comprehensive. It talked about some people said this, other people said this.

In our deliberation, in our international comparison, this is what the commission found, and this is what we are recommending. I think for the referendum to be effective and meaningful, people need that kind of civic education, a document they could refer to, where they could see what people were saying, what you as a commission is basically, and what have the politicians done in the constitution. So I think something like a public response matrix where the commission starts working on completing something about what they've learned from people, their hopes, their fears, their proposals, what they are recommending, how they are interlinked with each other, protects the commission as well from your reputation as well, because there are reputational risks always attached to these kind of processes.

What the commission accepted, what it rejected, how it modified certain parts of the submission that were good, other parts were problematic, what questions did the commission differ, that the commission felt it was not the right time to come to a solution. These are questions we want to be dealt with in the truth and reconciliation commission. So I think it's important, because one thing I've seen with this current government is that there's been a lot of public participation, a lot of consultation, from 16 years of no consultation to four years of over consultation.

Yet people are still not told how their input actually makes it into law or policy. I mean, one example I've used is, so much money was used with Justice Daniel Fatiaki, the Electoral Reform Commission. Yet the people still don't know what the electoral reform commission are, because it's not public.

Yet another commission like yours has been appointed now to deliberate the same questions that people had done one year earlier. And it creates money, because people just see this as rubber stamping. So I think the commission needs to bring back this respect, that we need to respect people, we need to respect their time.

And we need to actually say that we sometimes become complicit in these consultation processes, because consultation is the lowest form of participation. I mean, let's be honest about this, because consultation requires an acknowledging power, an acknowledging privilege. And in this process, the power resides with our politicians in parliament.

The power resides with the government executive, because they will decide what eventually goes in the constitution. So consultation can be used as a mechanism just to legislate a process without giving due consideration. And this is where democratic deficits, this is where trust in party institutions are low, is because it becomes a rubber-stamping exercise all the time.

So I think the commission needs to think beyond this draft recommendations you made. How do you instil the trust then in the people? How do you bring people along with you after your work has ended? To make sure that they continue working on these recommendations and it can be stabilised. The spirit in which all five of you have given your time and your energy, the spirit in which you have committed to this call of the nation is carried on by the people as well, by civil society, by individuals, by academics.

And I think this is where the protection of you, the commission, but also respecting the people. The commission needs to go beyond the scope of its own reference. I think it is brought against us around the referendum that we're taking place.

There's a lot of confusion in itself. I was talking to you earlier about this as well. It should be amended before the elections.

If it happens, then the Prime Minister keeps giving weak signals as well. And it does not induce any confidence in this process because what it does is it delegitimize people's participation in this process as well. And

I think we need to be doing things that induces people's public trust, in you, but also in the recommendations you're making.

And how do we ensure that these recommendations fill that out with the referendum and your response?

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Mr. Kant, this is Sevuloni, the Chairperson. Thank you very much for your submissions this afternoon.

And thank you for the suggestions that you have just given to us in relation to the way forward, if I have to put it that way, in relation to the recommendations and the reports. Now, I'd just like to give you a rundown on the constitution review process which the commission had carried out. The commission, before we visited the people of Fiji, around Fiji, a team was going ahead in advance.

A team of volunteers, a number of lawyers, and they were explaining to the people what the commission was going to do when the commission came around. They called themselves the PACE team, which was a civic education group. Now, they were there as, you might say, an advance party, advising people of what the commission was going to do.

Now, following them was the commission. We visited the whole of Fiji, and then we took submissions from the people, as you know, and we are still taking submissions now, as of this afternoon with you. Now, our term of reference, if you have read it, states that we have our timeline to end on the 31st of August, 2026.

That is when we are to hand over to the President a report, our recommendations, and a draft constitution. Now, that is what we are working towards right now. I understand where you are coming from in relation to telling the people what has been included in our recommendations and in our report to His Excellency.

First thing first, our report and our recommendations and the draft constitution will be confidential. We will not be allowed to release it. And that is according to our term of reference.

It only goes to His Excellency. Then whatever he does with it, that's his. Now, what I can tell you now is this, that there is plan to take the draft constitution around the country and explain to the people what it contains before the referendum.

If there is any comfort to you in relation to the process after the 31st of August, I can tell you that that is the plan which is now on the line. To satisfy what your suggestion is, there will be another team which will take around the country the draft constitution and explain to the people what it contains and so forth before the referendum. So since you have raised it, we have not given this information to anyone, but since you have raised it, that is what is on line now, right now.

So we have always told submitters who have asked us what will happen after. That's all political. Well, all we are aiming for is satisfying our task, our obligation to complete the constitution, give it or hand it in to His Excellency.

And from there, His Excellency will deal with it. Give them to the government, that is all political. They will go through parliament and so forth and so forth, including that team that would have to go around before the referendum.

So we are not looking beyond the 31st of August. We answered Professor Wadan Narsey yesterday. He asked the same question, but I just told him, whatever happens after the 31st of August is not for us to say.

It's not included in our term of reference. But thank you for your suggestion. I have given you a hint on what might happen by the politicians, not us.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you and warm greetings. Professor Teiwa and Dr. Dziedzic, forgive me. I hope I'm pronouncing your name correctly.

Thank you. Thank you for your time this afternoon. I'm Mere Nailatikau, a fellow commissioner alongside my colleagues here this afternoon.

We have the great pleasure of listening to Romitesh Kant give us his advice and his recommendations in the hour prior. And I'll just quickly introduce my colleagues who are seated here with me this afternoon. To the far right, where you see my arm pointed, we have Dr. Neelesh Gounder.

I'm sure no stranger to a few of you. We also have next to him, Mr. Ami Kohli, who's just had to excuse himself very briefly. To my direct right, sitting next to me is Mr. Sevuloni Valenitabua, who is the Chair for our Commission.

And to my left here is Mr. Conway Beg. We are four of the six sitting commissioners here with you this afternoon. Very grateful for your time.

And I believe we have printouts sent to us. Oh, forgive me. Has audio returned? Is that better? Okay, all right.

I believe we might have accidentally muted the mic here. But without delaying things any further, we understand that you would be familiar with the general outline of this process, of this constitutional review. You did us the honor of sending through a written submission and we'd like to give you this hour to deliver your submission.

We'll be listening and we hope that there'll be time later for any comments or questions to make this more of a conversation after your submission. Thank you. Please proceed.

Go ahead.

Professor Teiwa : Can you hear me okay? Okay, wonderful.

Thank you so much for your time. We know it's very valuable. We know you've been really busy doing all kinds of really critical work throughout this process.

So we appreciate this time to be able to share with you a bit of the lens of the global and national peoples in Canberra, the capital of Australia. We may still have Professor Rebecca Monson join us if that's all right. She may be slightly late as there is a contingent from Fiji right now at the ANU.

So I understand Romitesh and Rebecca have been hosting them. So this is the team that worked very collaboratively to write our submission on rights and recognition of the Banaban people and indigenous minority. So I'm going to give you some background on myself, on my work and my connections to Rabi and the Banaban people, and then a brief summary of our submission.

And then as you say, looking forward to having a discussion, answering any questions you might have, which hopefully any of the four of us should be able to answer. Let's see how it goes. So please also just let me know, wave your hands or whatever you need to do if my audio isn't going very well.

So I was born in Savusavu and raised there in Levuka as well as in Lautoka and Suva. I'm a graduate of Yat Sen and St. Joseph School. I did my later degrees in the US and Australia and I'm now a professor of Pacific Studies at the Australian National University.

I've been at ANU as an academic since 2007 and before that was an international PhD student here in Anthropology and History from 1999. And in 2002, my background is that as a PhD major and minor, and I'm just recognizing that Professor Rebecca Monson has also just trained our pool. So Rebecca is in the School of Law, Romitesh and I are in the College of Asia.

And so on behalf of the College of Asia, I'm a Professor of Pacific with ANU and also the University of Melbourne and there's a lot of really amazing work in this space. So our submission is very much based on work that I've been doing for many years. And so I wanted to outline that briefly so that that gives some context and then highlight the three major recommendations for our submission and then hopefully we can have a talanoa, which is when I began a master's in Pacific Island Studies at the University of Hawaii, focused on Banaban history at the intersection of British colonial and my.....and Tuvalu.

My research was still what was published officially in the archives of the British phosphate commissioners of the National Archives of Australia.

At the time of my, to the time I was doing this research, my father, John Tabakitua Tewa, had just been elected chairman of the Rabi Council for three years. And this was right after a period of turmoil in the Rabi Council. And on Rabi, more generally, where there had been a lot of unrest and riots and a hand around the administrator who was a staff to oversee the island and the people.

So my father was elected from our village, which is Tabiang from Rabi. We are also connected to Tabwewa village. But he was elected, elected councillor from Tabiang and then elected from that council to become chairman.

My father had a long history of civil service in Fiji, being a Permanent Secretary for agriculture, fisheries, and farm, forestry, rural development, urban development, coconut industry authority. So many decades of civil service. He was quite politically neutral and a trusted member of both of the Rabi and Board of Fiji on Fiji government scholarship and the first to graduate.

His time as chairman was a stable period on Rabi...(*connectivity issues)

Forgive me, Professor Tawewa, I hope you can hear me. Perhaps due to some of the connectivity challenges that we're having, is it all right if I could ask you to turn off your camera, Professor? Would it be all right if we could ask you to turn off your camera, Professor? We're just having a bit of, some challenges with the network and you're breaking up. Just wanting to hear you more clearly, please.

Thank you. Please proceed.

Professor Teiwa: Is that, is that much? Yes, thank you. It's no problem at all. So I was just wondering, because of Father's role, as the chairman of the Rabi Council of Leaders, and how his background, as chairman of the Rabi Council, have also deeply informed the kinds of issues that we raised in this summit.

So I had a very unique perspective because my father was in that role of chairman, and particularly after a very unstable, unstable peak. The things both Eric, Lucia, and I studied and wrote about this team's submission, and I just want to also mention that we have ongoing work on Rabi through the Fiery Canoe Foundation, which supports the safeguarding of Banaban cultural heritage and many other aspects. And in a way, that work fills in some of the gaps that haven't been addressed on Rabi for, for link to Rabi.

And as many of you may have known, the Banabans on Rabi recently celebrated 80 years of displacement from their home island to Fiji. So December 2025 was a big anniversary for them, and we were present there for that celebration. Just the final personal context that I think is relevant is, my father came to Rabi in 1947 as a six-year-old because his family was already here.

So his great-grandfather is one of the original Banabans, which is one of the 703 Banabans brought to Rabi in 1945, along with my grandfather, and this was the group that established the first settlements on Rabi. And so my father, John Tebakito Atewa, was always very clear about the various challenges and difficulties constantly faced by Rabi islanders since he landed in 1947 all the way to the current period. My observations traveling back and forth to Rabi have also been similar.

So I have been going back and forth to our home in Tabiang for decades now and kind of observing the different dimensions of social, economic, political, and cultural life, but particularly the challenges that people on Rabi face. So, for example, there is no central electricity or energy supply on the island. Every village or household has to figure out their own energy.

There is a central water supply, but it's very intermittent. Many young people do not complete high school. There's a lot of physical, mental, social challenges, a lot of domestic violence, and other intergenerational traumas faced by people on the island.

And a lot of the instability at the family level and village level is also reflected at the various levels of governance, particularly the Rabi island level. So one of the important contexts for this submission is that all of these issues are structurally connected. What happens at the family level on Rabi all the way to the challenges with the governance at the island level and the problem of representation or the lack of representation for Banabans at a national level, but in our very, very unique case, two national levels, not just Fiji, but Kiribati as well.

So recognizing these various levels of challenges and the research that I have been doing for many, many years, I started working closely with Professor Rebecca Monson. We travelled to Rabi and we had many talks with people on the island in 2025. And we also began working with Ana and Romitesh last year to, or maybe it was actually the year before, to start to think through some of these issues and how they can be addressed at the level of governance and regulation and law and those other important contexts.

So we had three proposals or three recommendations in our submission.

And the first one was really straightforward. There really desperately needs to be an elected Rabi Council of Leaders.

And this Rabi Council needs to be properly representative of the people. This means in terms of leadership and merit, age, elder status, so elders are always very, very important in the Rabi community, but the big missing piece is gender. So, my work recognized and clearly revealed that women had political authority, agency, and participation prior to the mining, during the mining, and this was very consistently whittled away by the Phosphate Mining Enterprise and the British Colonial Administration.

And sometimes our own men as well, who saw this opportunity to interact with the colonial government and saw that women was cast aside by that. So women have lost political participation and authority over time because of mining, because of displacement, because of many, many, many factors, but it is not our culture. In our culture, women have rights.

Even children have rights. They all have land rights. So that is very clear in the archives, but also in our oral traditions, where women had a very special place.

So participation on the Rabi Council is very important, but first of all, you have to have a council in the first place, and that council has to be stable. We have not had any Council now for many years.

This has caused a lot of confusion and uncertainty for Banabans especially in terms of understanding who has the authority, how does this authority work, and how can this authority be exercised? A lot of things have been done without proper consultation with the Banaban people. More often, if there's consultation, it's one-sided or very shallow consultation. So it's not enacting proper Banaban governance, not in a cultural fashion, and not in a democratic fashion.

The Fiji government promised support for the reestablishment of the Rabi Council, one that would meet national standards and expectations, and this has still not happened. In the meantime, all kinds of big decisions about Banabans' economic issues particularly have been made, and there's been no accountability. So really, really important that there is support for the reestablishment of the Rabi Council, and that that is a democratically elected body.

Interestingly, Banabans are culturally and historically quite a democratic people by today's standards. So Banaban culture is not a highly...(*cutoff) So there is an inherent democracy in the way culturally things ought to be conducted for Banaban benefits. So that's our first recommendation, the first one.

So that's our first recommendation, the Rabi Council. The second one involves ensuring protection of Banaban land and its self-government, that's so important, by ensuring that the Banaban Lands Act and the Banaban Settlement Act, which are two very important acts that help establish and support Banabans in Fiji, it's important that these are protected from any easy amendment in the Fiji Parliament. So, our recommendation today, they change today politics so that they can't just be flipped here and there, depending on the government of the day.

Further to that, Banabans should also have a say in their own self-governance and these lands' issues, and things should be discussed by them first, before anyone decides to amend or change any of these lands or settlement acts. So we recommend that these two acts should be entrenched as they were before, and any changes must be submitted to a dialogue and referendum of those eligible to elect the Rabi Council, and then passed by a majority of Parliament. So two steps to this, and Banabans are always consulted and involved in a dialogue around their own self-governance, their own land issues, and their own needs.

So that's what that second recommendation is about.
Can I just ask Anna or Romitesh or Rebecca anything to add to that second one? Okay. I'll go on.

All right. So the final issue involves minority rights in Fiji. So that's our third recommendation.

So we gave some background in our submission on how Banabans are a very unique displaced community. They're an indigenously displaced community. They're a little bit different from other forms of displacement that have historically happened in the Pacific, and that's because they were a culture and a community moved wholesale, wholesale, a whole entire group lifted up from one country and moved to another, and they did so without their own choice, without their own self-determination in that process.

So that makes them a little bit different from example from the Kioans on Kioa who had a lot of agency and choice in their decision to move from Tuvalu to Kioa. So Banabans are a forced displacement, and they were forced by geopolitical and economic forces involving many big countries, Australia, New Zealand, Great Britain, Japan. All of these countries had something to do with why they were forced to move from their home island.

So in many ways, the discussion around World War II is a big discussion that one might want to have with Japan one day because of how Banaban was turned into a war camp. But anyway, that's a different discussion. So once they were moved in 1945, they started to set up this different mechanisms and systems for their own survival and self-governance and opportunity in Fiji, but, and they tried to advocate, they put their rights back on their home island, they made petitions to the United Nations, they took Great Britain to the high court, and they also suffered waves of corruption, financial mismanagement, and whittling away of community trust funds that they had had to support development for the people as a whole.

So they've been through a lot of financial, economic, social, political upheavals. So today in Fiji, Banabans are quite a socially and economically disadvantaged community. They have much less school and scholarship opportunity because there are no real employment opportunities around the really basic infrastructure, social and health services, and a whole range of other, you know, support structure.

What could happen to other displaced communities in the Pacific if governments do not think through the needs and issues required for good health, well-being, opportunity, support, peace, all of those things that communities across Fiji need? So, Dante, about how a voice for Banabans in government would be a good way of addressing this gap, because their status is quite unique, they deserve a voice in government like other citizens of Fiji. So we recommended reserving a seat for a representative of the Banaban people, and this would ensure Banabans select their own representative, and that their voices could be an independent... (*cutoff) which exists across Fiji and beyond in places like Australia, New Zealand, and elsewhere. So, that was our third recommendation, about reserving a seat for Banabans in the Fiji Parliament.

So, in summary, our submission recommended focus into constitutional reforms to support the rights and well-being of the Banaban people, in recognition of their unique position as a cross-border, displaced, (*cutoff)... So, we should put this down in that section.

It's been, no, recommendation. Sorry, hopefully you could hear me, down in the background. Is anyone speaking? No.

Ms. Nailatikau: Oh, okay. Hopefully that's better, I've unmuted our system. Thank you.

Thank you. I am accompanied here this afternoon by three commission members who have the privilege of visiting Rabi themselves. And so, with deep and sincere gratitude for your submission, Professor Teaiwa and colleagues, I'll give this moment to my fellow commissioners for any comments or queries they'd like to make.

And please feel free to switch on your videos if you would like. Thank you. Thank you, Professor Teaiwa and Dr. Ana, Dr. Rebecca and Dr. Romitesh.

Dr. Gounder: It's good to see you again, Professor Teaiwa and Romitesh. The last time we met, we had come at ANU with a good big group of Fiji scholars. Thank you.

I, as Mere has mentioned, I had the privilege of visiting Rabi Island as part of the consultations for the Constitution Review Commission. And before that, my engagement with the Rabi Island was through the National Development Plan. I was with Fiji government for two years and one of my teams visited Rabi Island to collect issues related to national planning and development.

And that's when I first realized the challenges faced by the people of Banabans to the people on the island, Rabi. And after, when we were on the island, some of our photos were put on Facebook. And I was contacted by two of my students who are Banabans, in my class at the moment.

One of them is a lawyer and the other is an economist. And when I visited Rabi, after that, I told some of my friends that, you know, my own problems went away after I saw the plight of the request and the level of development on Rabi Island. So in the National Development Plan, the government is making an effort to ensure that, that the planning and support for planning is inclusive, and that includes Banabans as well.

And since then, I've been having a talk with some of my students who are from Rabi, but they live in Suva now. And there's a very strong Banaban community in Suva as well. Actually, one of my plumbers is a Banaban as well.

He's one of the top plumbers as well in Suva. So after that, I went to read the Reeves Commission report, because when the Reeves Commission visited Rabi, they received the same submissions that we received from the island. And I'm sure you've read the report of the Reeves Commission.

They made some strong submissions. And I'm speaking genuinely, someone who's genuinely interested in helping in the shortfall economic development of the Banaban people on Rabi Island. You know, one of the things that, since then I've been thinking about it and the submissions we received, and also the submission that you presented this afternoon, you talk about the, you know, some of the issues that may, in my belief, can be a hindrance to the socio economic development in the way Fiji government sees Rabi Island in the inclusive agenda, is issues such as two jurisdictions, self-governance.

These are some issues, I think, which will play a role. For example, when we got off the boat, the first thing I noticed is a police station, but there's no Fiji police force board there. It says local police.

And when I, so I went straight into the police station to ask, what happened to your board? And they said, oh, this is local police, and not Fiji police. And that hit me really hard as to what's going on here. And I think, you know, these are some of the issues that may contribute to the overall drags.

Because after spending two years in Ministry of Finance and the way budget and resource allocation is done, I, you know, someone who generally wants to help the socio-economic development, I think these are some of the issues that might itself be contributing to the challenges. So apart from the Constitutional Review Commission, and we are going to seriously consider submissions you have made today, and to see what options are available.

But in the broader sphere of things, and as academics, I think we'll have to really look at issues much more broadly in the way things are perceived from the government side, in terms of resource allocation and in budgetary reallocations, for example.

So that's a comment I have, and I'm happy to hear. I may be totally wrong on this issue, but as an economist, and the way things work, and that's, I'm speaking from the reality on the ground in terms of how things happen. And if you look at the integration of other communities in Fiji, for example, poverty does not have an ethnic face.

Some of these challenges does not have an ethnic face, or communal face. For example, if you build a seal around in the interior of Nadroga, all the communities will benefit, not one community. So the way we look at development now is from a more broader lens, rather than in a specific set of lens.

So those are my few comments, but I'm happy to hear your take. And I believe that, I don't know how to put it, but let me say something that I've been thinking. Perhaps the settlement debt itself may be a drag in terms of why Fiji sees the Banaban people when it comes to inclusive planning, inclusive development, and so on.

Because what the challenges I saw on Rabi Island is really, really concerning. We heard from the elders, we heard from the youth, we heard from the, there was a human rights council, or human rights body on the island. There is a guy by the name of Ray.

He also made a connection to ANU as well. And yeah, so something I just wanted to lay it out to you, some of my thoughts. Thank you.

I'll give it back to the Chair.

Mr. Valenitabua: Professor Teaiwa, I was, or I went to Rabi with Dr. Gounder. We had a consultation there together with Mr. Conway, sitting on my left. Now, we heard submissions from Rabi.

And some were very concerning. Now, I was wondering there and then, and pardon me that we have not read into the Banaban Settlement Act, and the two acts which you have, the Banaban Lands Act and the Banaban Settlement Act, in order to see the legal implications of those two acts, because we've just been going around on consultations. But just reading through your submissions, this afternoon, I then realized the difficulty or the causes of the difficulties which your people in Rabi are facing.

The causes I talk about. Pointed out to me was that Rabi has or is living under two jurisdictions, Kiribati and Fiji. Now, we heard there on the island that there are some Rabian children who don't have birth certificates, Fijian birth certificates, that is, because they were born in Kiribati.

When they came over here, they were not given any birth certificates because they're not Fiji citizens. So another thing which we heard that these children could not go to school because they didn't have the birth certificates. And another thing we heard was that when the government of Fiji gave education grants to schools, these children were not given grants.

They were excluded. I'm telling you what we were told on Rabi Island. So I was thinking, what is the problem here? Now, thanks for your submission this afternoon.

Now I realize where the problem is because Rabi seems to be governed under two jurisdictions, which is Kiribati and Fiji. There is a matter which we will have to consider now. You are correct, 1987, Rabians were Fijians.

And then 1990 and 1997, they were 'others'. And then 2013, no mention of Banabans except in section 29, I believe, or section 28 of the constitution where the Banabans are mentioned. I have to confirm that.

So, right, section 25. In your position, in your position, how can we resolve this so that we can include Banabans, let's say in the preamble of the constitution in a way where this dual governance, if I may call it that, is not a hindrance to it. Because if you have two seats, reserve seats in Kiribati, that is a hindrance to being included as Fiji citizens.

And if you want seats in parliament here in Fiji, no, you won't be able to have that, speaking directly and honestly with you. What is your view in relation to that? Would it not be better if you surrendered Kiribati and then just joined Fiji, come under the Fiji jurisdiction? Remember, Fiji is a sovereign state. And I believe Kiribati is also a sovereign state.

So if you are opting for two sovereign states, you've got to give one up. Well, what do you think? What is your thoughts on that?

Prof. Teaiwa: I have many thoughts. Would you like me to address both comments now? Yes, please.

Thank you so much. Thank you.Vinaka, thank you so much.

I really appreciate you addressing this problem directly. And I also appreciate the concerns around social and particularly economic issues, especially with respect to national planning and being included in these budgets. And the perpetual question for Rabi, how come there's no development on this island.

Like, honestly, you can't switch on electricity and ever have electricity on Rabi. It's just not happening since 1945. So you have hit the nail on the head in terms of a conundrum.

Yes. And this conundrum is created by the British who, blessedly on their part, are no longer the boss. So this is like a colonial hangover.

This is a colonial hangover involving Britain, Australia, and New Zealand displacing, displacing its responsibility to Fiji and Kiribus. They are the ones responsible for what happened to the land of Banaban. So if we think as indigenous people, nobody's going to give up their island.

Nobody's gonna give up their ancestral lands. This is a conundrum for Tuvalu at the moment. They know that the ocean might rise and they're going to be moved, but no way are they giving up that land even when it's sunk under the ocean.

So what's happened to Banabans is they are forced out of their land because it's a huge, valuable, global resource. And they are moved to Fiji, to be the problem with Fiji. So then there's this problem of how Banabans fit.

In the imagination of Fiji, how they fit in the imagination of Fiji with social, economic, legal, and all the other supports. And there is an unwillingness on the level of Banabans to give up their rights to their ancestral island in Kiribus because of that great value for your ancestral lands. Body of the land, body of the people.

Like Vanua in Fiji, for Banabans it's Teapa. And Teapa is the people. Teapa is the people.

And even though they have this island of Rabi was purchased for them and they have all these rights on Rabi and they belong to Rabi, especially the young people, especially generations who have been born on Rabi, they pretty much feel like from Fiji. They feel like they are Fiji Islanders, they are from Fiji, they are from Rabi. But we live in an indigenous world in the Pacific and these values of not just our ancestors but ourselves are still very, very strong.

So Banabans are caught between the two jurisdictions. Jurisdictions that did not exist before. They are relatively young compared to Banabans existing for thousands of years, living off their ancestral land.

So they don't get forgotten even in 80 years. 80 years since they've been in Fiji for Banabans that's like a short time compared to the years where they lived on as sovereign people, self-determined people on their own island. So I think it's because they were forced rather than making their own decisions like the Tuvaluans, the Tuvaluans of Kioa, that's a considered ... for themselves.

For Banabans it's a force, force like kind of situation. That's why they live between these two worlds and my colleague, Neelesh Gounder, you have hit the nail on the head around how this manifests at the level of national development planning. Nothing changes and nothing gets better for Banabans on Rabi because it's like living in limbo.

It's like existing in limbo. You know, when you talk about which police force, there's actually two police forces on Rabi. There's a local police force and there is a Fiji police force but I think there might be like one Fiji police officer, maybe two and then there's the local police.

So it gets kind of confusing. It gets confusing because how Banabans fit in the national imagination of Fiji is limbo and that is why we made these recommendations but particularly the third recommendation and you referred to the preamble, the preamble which would be good and necessary to signal that there is this community and they are not quite like the other communities and it's not Fiji's fault. It's not Banabans' fault.

Fiji is not responsible for what happened before 1945 and 1945 because everyone lived under a British colonial administration that just took whatever it liked and forced people around. They moved Gilbertese to the Solomon Islands. They moved people all over the place and they thought, you know, they had superpowers or something but we're living with a legacy.

We're living with the legacy of those decisions that were not made by our people or by people in Fiji. The Gilbertese did have something to do with it so there are economic and political issues back in Kiribus that would prevent Banabans from wanting to leave Kiribati. Banabans are a minority in Kiribati which don't always agree with the Gilbertese government.

Fiji is the safest, best, loving, inclusive place for Banabans even though there's no development. So when you visited Rabi, I kept thinking about if you went through Karoko, right, if you went through Karoko to get to Rami, that's a lovely landing.

Why is there no port? Why is there no, there's no like jetty? Why is there nothing there to like officially recognize the beautiful people of Karoko who have been hosting Banabans traveling between Rabi and Vanualevu since 1945 and nobody built a jetty. You still get there and you're lost in emotion when you get to Karoko and everyone has to be really nice and helpful and one speedboat might come. I mean, there's nothing organized properly since 1945.

Banabans are still living in limbo. So this constitutional consultation and our submission, we hope is a real opportunity to kind of fix these existential problems like children are suffering, families are suffering, kids don't go to school, kids don't finish school because of the limbo. It's a real limbo.

And it's to Banabans and the response of children. Happens to them and it's still happening to them. That's what we need to work on.

That's the thing that requires good considered solutions. I don't know quite how to fix the link between governance and national planning except to say, I'm gonna put it back on Banabans leaders and say, they should have been better activists. All their people will fix some of these issues.

And over time, that just consistently doesn't happen. So we're trying to find mechanisms to deal with some of these issues that are quite unfair for families on the ground of humanity especially. I come from a family about 50 first cousins.

My father's the eldest of 10. I have lots of cousins who don't go to school. Each family selects one, two, three, you will not go into school and the other ones, we're gonna find you to go to school.

So families are forced to make those choices. They can't support all the kids to go to school. I have over 100 close relatives on Rabi and it's very, very uneven in terms of just basic.

There's no toilets, that's the other big issue that many women on Rabi are constantly discussing. Toilets, just a basic toilet for families. It doesn't exist.

It's a privilege to have a toilet. Flushing toilet with toilet paper is a massive, massive, massive privilege on Rambi. So we're really stuck with these Mult stellar problems, some of which can be fixed through governance, legal regulation and some that can't because they really involve the need for creative imagination on how we can have others properly embraced in Fiji as a genuine member.

And they're both acts that need to come to the table on this. Even the relationship between Banaban and ITaukei in the northern part of Fiji and what that means. You know, Rabi was incumbent ...

There are people on Taveuni and other places that still remember their ancestors from Rabi. So it's quite a critical issue this lingo we address. But I really appreciate that feedback and those experiences that you had visiting Rabi and, you know, your concern and compassion and fear for the Rabi population.

The ones in Suva and elsewhere are slightly better off, but there are many Banaban communities living in overcrowded housing and settlements, informal settlements around Suva. Many, many, I have been to many homes where there are Banabans living in tents outside their one bedroom with their relatives.

Professor, professor, professor.

Mr. Valenitabua: May we hear from Dr. Gounder? We are running out of time, but this is something important. Could we hear from Dr. Gounder?

Thank you. Thank you, Chair.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Professor Katrina for the passionate response. And I understand where you're coming from. You know, after visiting Rabi, I now am liaising with a few of my students who are from Rabi Island to see how we can support.

I'll give you a few more examples. You also mentioned access to land and sea. The issue is that Rabi Island is a freehold and they don't have access to the Qoliqoli.

It belongs to the Tui Cakau. So these are some things that they will have to come to terms with. And they will have to be very clear about where they stand in terms of access to Fijian citizenship, etc

That's something I think for the people of Rabi to decide. But we as, you know, the outsiders can help in debate and discussion. But I think it's very important for them to understand the integration and participation in economic development would also be an integration to the broader citizenship as well.

And to look at themselves from the lens of being part of Fiji rather than a dual governance system. Because when I look at technically from the, you know, the way government operates, we may not like the idea that this is, that's how things happen. But that's how things are working at the moment.

And as I, you know, you highlighted some of the housing issues and challenges. There are many other ethnic communities who face the same kind of challenges. But that does not mean that we should not have specific programs for Rabi Island.

But it's to think about how we can bring the Rabi Islands of the Banaban people into the broader citizenry, so to say, which will treat them as Fijians. And they're not being looked at as within the lens of Banaban Settlements Act. You know, I think that's where, I think the very moment you put them under Banaban Settlement Acts, it gives a different perspective.

And that's probably my argument that, you know, creates this kind of a drag for, and I'll be very honest, because, you know, as academics, I know you understand. For example, now I think back and what if I was living under some kind of an Indian Settlements Act? It should have been a very different story perhaps. So just when I look back at some of these things and how we can fix those injustices, how we can fix those wrongs that has happened.

Now we, this is 2026. Something that happened in 1940 by the British, by the Japanese, by the Australians, as you mentioned. And now we are, you know, how the Fiji government can take care of this beyond the constitutional provisions, whatever it may be.

Thank you. I'll just give it back to the Chair now, but I'll send an email to you and Romitesh and we can keep the discussion going. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Professor Teaiwa, it's Shabloni again. Thank you so much. Thank you, really appreciate it.

This is Sevuloni, again. Living under the two jurisdictions, I think there is a problem here. The main problem, the primary problem that has to be resolved.

Now, when on Rabi Island, I told them about dual citizenship, particularly for those who were born in Kiribati. We were told that some were born on Rabi Island and then they went to Kiribati. They got passport there.

And then when they came back, they tried to get a Fiji citizenship, they couldn't. So I told them there's one way of getting around that, that is to apply for dual citizenship. However, some might have tried, and they said, that costs $3,000.

I said, I know, because I've done application for dual citizenship. So there are two things here, the individual Rabian Islander and Rabi as an island. Rambi is freehold.

It is within the waters of the Tui Cakau. It is within the waters of Fiji, which is a sovereign state. So we have to get Rabi somehow be included as a Fijian Island.

And I don't know whether Rabi is a Fijian Island right now or not. I feel for what you are saying. Now I get things clearly when we were being told in submissions in Rabi about their problem.

Now, it's either, I'm going to say this directly to you, it's either you be a citizen of Fiji or you be a citizen of Kiribati. These, like I said, are two sovereign states. You've got to decide which sovereign state you want to be counted on.

You've got two seats in Kiribati. I don't think the Fiji government will give you two seats in Fiji. And since we are talking about the constitution, in order to put law about Kiribati or Banabans in the constitution, you have to be Fiji citizens.

I mean, that is generally speaking, there might be other things that can be done. Thank you very much for bringing this up. It's something that we will be thinking about.

We also know that Rabi is now sort of governed from the Prime Minister's office here in Fiji. The files about Rabi are at the Prime Minister's office. We were told that, and we might have to follow that up also, what is happening.

And read the Banabans Settlement Act and the Banabans Lands Act to see what it says about that island from which you dearly love, I'm sure. So that is my comment this afternoon. It was good visiting Rambi.

First time I was there. And now hearing from you and hearing from those who are on the island, I now fully understand what the real problem is. Thank you very much.

Now, do we have anything else to say? The commissioners have nothing else to say. We've... Mr. Conway wants to say something.

Prof. Teaiwa: Oh, Conway! I didn't realize it was Conway Beg.

This is my friend and Blanche's brother. How are you? Oh, Blanche's brother, it's so nice to see you.

Mr .Conway: Thank you, Professor, for those kind words.

Look, I had also the honor and privilege of visiting Rabi with our Chairman and Professor Gounder. One thing that stuck out in your submission, which, I mean, I guess it's a follow-on to what the Chairman said about the difficulty in Rabi itself, in its governance. And I suspect when the Rabi Council was dissolved in 2013, right, for obvious reasons, you had a 13-year lapse of being controlled by the Prime Minister's office or state.

So basically, it was just left untouched for a while or in disarray, I guess. I just, yeah, I picked that up in your, and then I thank you for the two recommendations that you're making under your submission. So yeah, I fully understand the issues, as the Chair has quite rightly said, there's the two jurisdictions is becoming prominent, but I feel that there's a lot of discussion that we would have to have, and obviously a constitutional discussion and looking at the various, the two acts that come into play.

But yes, I hear you, and obviously, we will give a bit more thought to that. And thank you for your presentation. I much appreciate it.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Professor, I have to- Thank you so much. This is Chairman here.

We have to bring this session to a close. I thank all the other participants this afternoon who are with you in Australia. We just need to attend to another meeting.

So thank you very much. Please come to the other side. Thank you.

Prof Teaiwa: Thank you so much for your time. Thank you so much for your time. We really, really appreciate it.

And we really appreciate all your feedback. So lovely to see you all. I know you have a very hard job ahead of you, and we just really appreciate the kind of incredible work that you're doing.

And thank you so much to our team as well, who are here. We have so much to talk about afterwards.

Ms. Nailatikau: Vinaka Professor, much appreciation to you and your colleagues.

Thank you.

----------End of Session [7-7-2026]----------

1960

WRITTEN SUBMISSION TO THE FIJI CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMISSION

SUBMITTED BY:

ROMITESH KANT, THE AUSTRALIAN NATIONAL UNIVERSITY, CANBERRA, AUSTRALIA.

DATE OF ORAL SUBMISSION: 7 JULY 2026

DATE OF WRITTEN SUBMISSION: 8 JULY 2026

SUBMITTED TO:

THE CHAIR AND COMMISSIONERS

FIJI CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMISSION

CONTACT:
ROMITESH.KANT@ANU.EDU.AU ; ROMIT.FJ@GMAIL.COM

Vinaka vakalevu, Chair and Commissioners.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear before the Fiji Constitution Review Commission and to make an oral submission on 7 July 2026. I now submit these written notes to accompany and expand on the points I raised during that consultation.

I understand this review not simply as a technical exercise in constitutional amendment, but as a wider national conversation about legitimacy, ownership, power and inclusion. It is also an opportunity to reflect on what Fiji can learn from its earlier constitution-making processes, especially the 2012 process, and from the political and democratic context in which this review is taking place.

I make this submission from several overlapping positions.

First, I write as a Fiji scholar who has researched constitution-making[1], public participation[2], electoral systems[3] and constitutional design[4] in divided societies. My earlier work examined the 2012 constitution-making process and asked whether public participation was meaningful or whether people were invited into a process that was later taken away from them.

Second, I write as someone who has worked for more than a decade in Fiji's democracy, youth, human rights, constitutional and civil society spaces. These reflections come from more than research. They come from watching people try to engage political processes under difficult conditions: activists, women leaders, young people, community members, party workers, human rights defenders and ordinary citizens who often want to participate but do not always trust that their participation will matter.

Third, my recent PhD research examined political parties, leadership and masculinities in Fiji[5]. That research explored how authority is produced within parties, how leadership is recognised, and why women and other marginalised voices are so often included symbolically while kept structurally peripheral.

---

[1]; Kant, Romitesh. The Road Map to Democracy and Fiji's 2012 Constitution-Making Process. Working/Technical Paper, 2014; Romitesh Kant, "Fiji Constitution Monitoring Report: September 2013–2014," in Fiji in Transition: Towards a Sustainable Constitutional Democracy, ed. Citizens' Constitutional Forum (Suva: Citizens' Constitutional Forum, 2014), 105–146,

[2] Kant, Romitesh, and Eroni Rakuita. Public Participation & Constitution-Making in Fiji: A Critique of the 2012 Constitution-Making Process. Working/Technical Paper, 2014

[3] Kant, R., & Baker, K. (2025). A Fiji (parliament) for all Fijians? The impact of gender-blind and race-blind electoral provisions in a divided society. Democratization, 1-22.

[4] Romitesh Kant. "Casting a Blind-Eye: Is Fiji's 2013 'Ethnically-Blind' Constitution a Path to Democratic Stability?" Journal of South Pacific Law [Suva, Fiji], vol. 19, June 2017, pp. 3–36; Kant, R. (2019). Ethnic blindness in ethnically divided society: Implications for ethnic relations in Fiji. The Palgrave Handbook of Ethnicity, 109-129; Kant, Romitesh. "Constitutional Re-Design for Democratic Stability in a Divided Society: A Fiji Case Study." MA thesis, University of the South Pacific, 2018, https://librarycat.usp.ac.fj/client/en_GB/search/asset/5251/0; Regan, A. J., Kirkby, C., & Kant, R. (2024). 'Between Two Worlds': The Origins, Operation, and Future of the 2013 Fiji Constitution. The Journal of Pacific History, 59(2), 165-185.

[5] Kant, R. (2026). POLITICS AND IT's MAL [E] CONTENTS: Masculine Architectures of Power in Fiji's Political Parties(Doctoral dissertation, The Australian National University (Australia)); Kant, R. (2025). The contours of masculinity: leadership, ethnicity, and gendered power in Fiji's 2022 elections. The Round Table, 114(5), 608-630.

My submission is therefore less concerned with technical legal drafting than with legitimacy, ownership, power and inclusion: what Fiji's constitutional history teaches us, and what this Commission may need to guard against.

> Fiji's constitutional problem is not only what is written in the Constitution. It is how constitutions are made, who owns them, who is allowed to shape them, and whether people can see themselves in the final settlement.

LESSON 1:

FIJI'S CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY: ELITE SETTLEMENTS AND IMPOSED CONSTITUTIONS

The first point I want to make is that this process should not be read as a clean break from Fiji's constitutional past. It belongs to a longer pattern.

Since independence, Fiji's constitution-making history has moved between two broad tendencies: elite political settlements and imposed constitutions.

The 1970 Constitution was an elite political settlement. It was negotiated at independence by political elites, colonial officials and representatives of the main communities, seeking to reconcile Indigenous Fijian concerns about political security with Indo-Fijian demands for equality and representation. It was not a deeply participatory people's constitution.

The 1990 Constitution was imposed after the 1987 coups. It entrenched Indigenous Fijian political dominance and tried to settle the political crisis through exclusion and ethnic hierarchy. It also required its own review within seven years, under section 77, which is the only reason the Reeves process happened at all.

The 1997 Constitution was more consultative and more inclusive than the 1990 Constitution. The Reeves Commission process mattered, and it involved serious reflection on Fiji's future. But the final Constitution was still shaped through elite political bargaining. It was an elite political settlement, even a more progressive and negotiated one.

The 2013 Constitution was imposed after a participatory process had first been promised, and this is the most important lesson for the present review. The 2012 Ghai Commission ran a process with widespread participation. But the draft that came out of that process was never adopted. The regime released and promulgated its own Constitution instead.

So when we talk about legitimacy, we cannot only ask whether a constitutional text is legally in force. We have to ask whether people feel the Constitution belongs to them.

For me, this is the recurring wound in Fiji's constitutional history: people are invited into the process, but political elites retain control over the final settlement.

> How does this Commission protect the review process from becoming another moment where public participation is filtered, narrowed or captured by political elites?

LESSON 2:

THE DANGER OF CHERRY-PICKING CONSTITUTIONAL RECOMMENDATIONS

The second point is about constitutional coherence.

Both the Reeves Commission and the Ghai Commission produced holistic proposals. Their recommendations were not isolated items sitting apart from each other. They were interlinked packages.

Electoral design was connected to power-sharing. National identity was connected to representation. Rights were connected to institutions. Military accountability was connected to democratic transition. Land, culture, citizenship, ethnic relations and reconciliation were all part of one constitutional design.

The danger comes when political actors treat these recommendations like a buffet: taking what is politically useful, leaving what is inconvenient, and ending up with a settlement that no longer holds together.

That happened, in a milder form, after the Reeves process, where elements of the Commission's recommendations were altered through political negotiation. It happened far more dramatically after the Ghai process, in which the Commission's draft was entirely displaced.

This is a major lesson for the present Commission. It should make clear which of its recommendations are interlinked and explain when a recommendation only works because it is tied to another one. That way, if Cabinet or Parliament later removes one part, the public can see what that does to the overall design.

I would urge the Commission to consider a public response matrix or an explanatory document that shows what people submitted, what themes emerged, what the Commission accepted, what it rejected, what it modified, what it deferred, and why.

This may sound procedural, but it is really about trust. The public should be able to distinguish between what the Commission recommends and what political actors later decide to do with those recommendations. Without that distinction, participation can once again become symbolic.

> Consultation is not enough. Fiji needs traceability. People need to see and understand how their voices travel through the process.

LESSON 3:

CONSTITUTION-MAKING IN A DIVIDED SOCIETY: DO NOT TRY TO SETTLE EVERYTHING FOREVER

My third point concerns Fiji as a divided society.

Fiji's constitutional history has always been shaped by the difficulty of living with deep difference: race, ethnicity, land, chiefly authority, religion, gender, class, rural location, military power and political history all matter.

In my earlier work on constitutional redesign in divided societies, I looked at Fiji alongside other divided societies and asked how constitutional design might support democratic stability. The key finding was that constitutions in divided societies should not try to permanently settle every foundational disagreement. They should create legitimate, peaceful ways to continue deliberating.

This matters because Fiji has often tried to use its constitution to close debate. The 1990 Constitution sought to close debate by establishing Indigenous political dominance. The 2013 Constitution sought to close debate through formal equality, centralised authority, and a very difficult amendment process.

Both approaches are problematic.

A constitution in a divided society should protect stability, but not by silencing disagreement. It should protect stability by providing people with trusted institutions through which disagreement can be expressed, negotiated, and revisited.

I would frame the Constitution not as a final settlement, but as a framework for an ongoing democratic conversation. This means creating institutions that allow difficult questions to be revisited without requiring coups, crises or abrogations. It means accepting that some questions around identity, land, reconciliation, representation and power-sharing may need structured deliberation over time, rather than a single final answer.

The Constitution should include mechanisms for future review, civic education, inclusive participation and public accountability. It should not be made so rigid that people feel trapped by it. But it also should not be so flexible that political elites can rewrite it for short-term advantage.

Fiji does not need to look only abroad for a model. As I noted earlier, the 1990 Constitution already required a review within seven years, and that requirement is the reason the 1997 Constitution exists at all. The 2013 Constitution dropped it, and the omission has since done real work: in 2017, when Bainimarama was asked in Parliament whether the Constitution could be reviewed, he said it could not, since unlike its predecessor this Constitution contained no review provision, only amendment provisions requiring a three-quarters majority that has never been realistically reachable. That answer only worked because the mechanism had been removed.

A useful comparative model for what a restored version could look like is the Federated States of Micronesia. Its Constitution does not require automatic constitutional change, but it does require that, at least every ten years, voters are asked whether there should be a Constitutional Convention to revise or amend the Constitution. Fiji could consider a similar mechanism. The point is not constant constitutional change. The point is that constitutional review should become a peaceful, scheduled and democratic practice, rather than something that only happens after coups, crises or political rupture.

LESSON 4:

NATIONAL IDENTITY AND INCLUSION

The fourth issue is national identity. It is one of the most sensitive questions before this Commission, and it needs to be handled carefully and accurately.

The 2013 Constitution was the first Constitution to formally establish "Fijian" as the common constitutional identity for all citizens. It is incorrect to say that the 1997 Constitution did this. It did not. The Reeves Commission recognised the need for a common name and recommended that citizens should have the right to use "Fiji Islander" if they wished, while preserving "Fijian" as the English term commonly used for the indigenous people of Viti. The 1997 Constitution adopted the language of common citizenship and multicultural belonging, but it did not constitutionally establish a common name for all citizens. It also retained communal electoral rolls.

The formal constitutional step of naming all citizens "Fijians" was taken for the first time in 2013.

I do not think common national identity should be abandoned. Fiji should not return to a constitutional order that hardens ethnic separation or makes political belonging depend on communal categories. That would be dangerous and backwards-looking.

But common identity must not become blindness to inequality. Equal citizenship should not mean pretending that everyone enters public life with equal power. In Fiji, people do not enter politics with equal access to party structures, land, chiefly networks, religious authority, campaign finance, media visibility, education, security institutions or public legitimacy.

Different communities experience citizenship in different ways. A poor rural woman may be formally equal as a citizen, but still face unequal access to transport, health services, land, income, safety, education and decision-making. Indigenous Fijians, Rotumans, Banabans and Rabi Islanders, descendants of blackbirded peoples, including Kai Melanesian communities, Indo-Fijians, queer communities, persons with disabilities, and rural and maritime communities, all belong to Fiji, but their histories and experiences of belonging are not the same.

Some carry histories of first peoples' authority, land and vanua; some carry histories of displacement, relocation and minority status; some carry histories of indenture, blackbirding, labour, migration and conditional belonging; and some face exclusion through gender, sexuality, disability, class, geography or religion.

Equal citizenship has to mean more than giving everyone the same constitutional label. It has to recognise the different histories, vulnerabilities and relationships through which people actually live citizenship.

The constitutional question is not only whether all citizens are called Fijian. It is whether all citizens can actually exercise belonging, voice and power. That is the difference between formal equality and substantive inclusion.

A purely ethnically blind approach can try to build unity by wishing away social difference. But Fiji's differences do not disappear because the Constitution stops naming them. A more durable approach protects common citizenship while recognising the real histories and inequalities that shape people's lives.

Keep a common national identity and the idea that all citizens are Fijians. But don't let it become a way of hiding inequality*

LESSON 5:

RECONCILIATION, BELONGING AND THE REWA/NOCO PROCESS

This leads to the question of reconciliation.

National identity cannot be produced by law alone. A constitution can declare common citizenship, but belonging also has to be built socially, culturally, historically and relationally. That is why community-based reconciliation processes matter.

One example worth raising is the Rewa/Noco process involving descendants of Girmitiyas. On 5 May 2017, Ro Teimumu Kepa, paramount chief of the Burebasaga confederacy, together with Tui Noco Ratu Isoa Damudamu and other chiefs of Rewa, declared that descendants of indentured labourers belonged to the Vanua of Noco and Rewa, and would be known through the iTaukei identity, or i cavuti, of Luvedra na Ratu, meaning the children of the Ratu.

I would not present this as a national solution. It is one local process, shaped by one vanua, one history and one set of relationships. But it raises an important constitutional question: how does the Constitution make space for belonging that is not only legal, but relational?

The Constitution should not try to standardise reconciliation processes. But it can recognise that healing in Fiji will not happen only through courts, commissions or parliamentary reform. It will also happen through communities, vanua, faith groups, women's groups, youth spaces, civil society and local practices of acknowledgement and repair.

This is especially important now that Fiji has a formal Truth and Reconciliation Commission process. The constitutional review and the truth and reconciliation process should not be conducted as if they were unrelated. Both are dealing with the same underlying question: how does Fiji live with the legacies of coups, exclusion, violence, displacement, mistrust and unequal belonging?

This is particularly important for Indo-Fijians. Many are formally citizens, but their belonging has often been politically conditional. They have been told, in different ways across Fiji's history, that they are here but not fully of here. A serious constitutional review has to grapple with that, not by returning to ethnic compartmentalisation, but by building a stronger, more honest account of shared belonging.

> National belonging has to be built, not only declared.*

LESSON 6: ELECTORAL DESIGN, GENDER-BLINDNESS AND RACE-BLINDNESS

The next issue is electoral design.

I want to be clear that I am not arguing for a return to communal voting. Fiji has good reason to preserve common citizenship and a common electoral roll. But the current electoral system also has serious problems.

A single national constituency, open-list proportional representation and a five percent threshold may look neutral on paper. They do not operate in a neutral society. They reward name recognition, party machinery, money, national visibility, ethnic bloc mobilisation and established leadership networks. The system can be formally equal while producing unequal outcomes.

This also means that Fiji needs to think about electoral fairness beyond polling day. Whether people can cast a vote is only part of it. Fair elections depend on the conditions before the election too: whether parties can organise freely, whether media access is fair, whether public resources are misused, whether civil servants are protected from political pressure, and whether the government of the day competes on the same terms as everyone else.

The Constitution should therefore provide clear rules for caretaker government during election periods. Incumbent governments should not be able to use state resources, public appointments, public funds, state media, public events or last-minute legal changes to tilt the electoral field in their favour. Fiji needs safeguards for fair transitions of power as well as fair voting.

In my article with Kerryn Baker on the 2022 elections, we asked what gender-blind and race-blind electoral provisions actually mean in a gendered and racialised society. We found that despite some progressive elements, the 2013 Constitution ultimately entrenched a status quo that remains militarised and dominated by male and ethnic Fijian interests. The 2022 election produced a peaceful transition of power, but the number of women in Parliament fell from ten out of 51 seats (19.6 per cent) to six out of 55 (10.9 per cent), later reduced to five (9.1 per cent) after a resignation.

That is not a small detail. It tells us something about the system.

Women are told to compete equally in a system where the conditions of competition are already unequal. This is why gender equality cannot be left to party goodwill. Parties will say they support women, but their internal structures, candidate selection processes, campaign financing, leadership cultures and informal networks often reproduce male dominance.

The Constitution should therefore explicitly allow temporary special measures: gender quotas, candidate nomination rules, party funding incentives, campaign finance transparency, and requirements for internal party democracy. These are not exceptions to equality. They are what makes equality real rather than only formal.

The same applies more broadly to other underrepresented groups: persons with disabilities, young people, LGBTQI+ communities, rural communities, minority groups, Banabans, Rotumans and others whose political voice can be formally recognised but practically marginalised.

Formal equality asks, "Does everyone have the same right?"

Substantive equality asks, "Can everyone actually use that right?"

Fiji needs the second question.

LESSON 7:

POLITICAL PARTIES, MASCULINITIES AND THE GENDERED ARCHITECTURE OF POWER

This is where my more recent research may be useful to the Commission.

Most constitutional conversations focus on institutions like Parliament, Cabinet, the courts, the military and independent commissions. Those institutions matter. But political parties are just as important. Parties are the gatekeepers of representation. They decide who gets selected, who gets resourced, who is visible, who speaks, who is protected and who is pushed aside.

My PhD research examined FijiFirst, SODELPA, PAP, and NFP. These parties differ in ideology, ethnicity, history and style, but they all reproduce masculinised ideas of leadership.

Masculinity here is not a personal trait. It operates as political infrastructure, embedded in institutions, rituals, hierarchies and everyday practice. It shapes who is recognised as a leader and whose authority is assumed rather than earned. That has constitutional relevance.

If political authority continues to be imagined through masculine scripts of command, discipline, seniority, protection, chiefly authority, military authority, technocratic control or moral respectability, then women and non-conforming leaders are always entering politics on unequal terms. They may be included, but not centred. They may be praised, but not empowered. They may be placed on campaign posters, but not in decision-making rooms.

This is why I would urge the Commission not to treat gender as a women's issue. It is part of how power works in Fiji. A constitution serious about democracy has to ask how leadership is produced, not only how votes are counted. That means looking at political party regulation, internal democracy, leadership selection, campaign finance, political violence, online abuse, and the everyday barriers that keep women and marginalised groups from becoming serious political actors.

The Constitution should not assume parties will democratise themselves. Experience tells us they often will not.

> Gender is not a side issue. It is part of how power works in Fiji.

LESSON 8:

PUBLIC PARTICIPATION, NATIONAL SECURITY AND DEMOCRATIC GUARDIANSHIP

One area where I think the Commission should return to the 2012 Explanatory Report is the connection it made between public participation and national security.

The 2012 draft did not treat coups as only a military problem. It recognised that coups are enabled by wider political conditions: weak public trust, weak democratic institutions, elite manipulation, ethnic anxiety, and the failure of citizens to feel ownership over constitutional democracy. That is why the 2012 draft tried to strengthen both sides of the equation. On one hand, it proposed institutions for wider public participation. On the other, it placed the security forces under clearer civilian constitutional control.

The National People's Assembly was one of the most interesting proposals in the 2012 draft. It was designed as an annual space bringing together representatives of government, Parliament, local government, independent commissions and civil society, with civil society in the majority. Its purpose was not to replace Parliament, but to create a common public space where state officials would report on their work, national policies could be discussed, and citizens and civil society could help hold government accountable.

I am not saying Fiji needs to revive the National People's Assembly exactly as proposed in 2012. There may be concerns about size, cost, representation, duplication, or whether such a body could itself be captured by elites. But the principle behind it remains important.

Fiji needs a constitutional mechanism for structured public deliberation between elections. Elections alone are not enough. If citizens only participate every four years, democracy becomes thin. In a divided society with a history of coups and constitutional rupture, people need regular, peaceful and legitimate spaces to deliberate on national issues, hold institutions accountable and build democratic trust.

My recommendation is that the Commission consider a permanent civic participation mechanism, drawing from but not simply replicating the 2012 National People's Assembly. It could be called a National Civic Assembly, a People's Constitutional Forum, or a Citizens' Accountability Forum. Its role should be deliberative and accountability-focused, not legislative. It should include civil society, women's groups, youth, persons with disabilities, faith communities, trade unions, the private sector, rural and maritime communities, Rotumans, Banabans and other minority communities.

The larger point is this: Fiji should move from military guardianship to democratic guardianship. A coup-resistant Constitution will not be built by legal prohibition alone. It will be built on a democratic culture in which citizens have real spaces to participate, security institutions are clearly subordinated to civilian authority, and constitutional disagreement can be managed without rupture.

LESSON 9:

THE MILITARY AND CONSTITUTIONAL GUARDIANSHIP

The next issue is the military.

Section 131(2) of the 2013 Constitution gives the Republic of Fiji Military Forces responsibility for the security, defence and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians. The phrase "well-being of Fiji and all Fijians" is the problem. It is too broad, and it gives the military a constitutional guardianship role over the nation.

This is not just an academic reading of ambiguous words. The RFMF's own public description of its role states plainly that it "shall remain as the custodian of Fiji's constitution." Whatever the strict legal scope of section 131(2) may be, that is how the institution itself currently understands its place in the constitutional order.

In Fiji's history, claims to protect national security, national interest, Indigenous rights, stability, democracy or good governance have repeatedly been used to justify military intervention in civilian politics. A democratic constitution should not position the military as the interpreter of national well-being. That role belongs to the people, through elected civilian institutions. The military should defend the constitutional order. It should not sit above it.

One of the important features of the 2012 Ghai draft was its attempt to remove the military's guardian role and subject it to stronger parliamentary oversight. Those proposals went beyond technical drafting. They were part of a broader effort to break the constitutional cycle of coups and military rule.

The 2012 draft also pointed toward a different model of national security. It treated national security not as military guardianship over society, but as security under civilian constitutional authority. The security forces were to be subject to law, ministerial direction, parliamentary oversight and constitutional legality. This is the direction Fiji should return to.

The Commission should consider re-establishing a constitutionally grounded National Security Council, but as a civilian oversight body rather than a military-dominated institution. It should include representation from the government, the opposition, and parliamentary committees, with the heads of the security forces accountable to that civilian framework. Any domestic deployment of the military should require clear legal thresholds, written authorisation, parliamentary oversight and judicial review.

I would recommend that section 131(2) be amended to remove the broad "well-being" language and to state clearly that the RFMF is subject to elected civilian authority, parliamentary oversight and constitutional legality. This is not about weakening national security. It is about strengthening constitutional democracy.

LESSON 10: IMMUNITY, STABILITY AND TRUTH

The question of immunity is difficult, but it cannot be avoided.

Fiji has often treated immunity as the price of stability. We need to ask what kind of stability it produces. Stability built on silence is fragile. Stability built on impunity is fragile. Stability built on fear is fragile.

The Constitution should not permanently constitutionalise impunity. At the same time, I recognise that Fiji's political history is complicated and that legal accountability, political stability and social reconciliation do not always move in tandem.

That is why the Commission should think carefully about the relationship between immunity, truth-telling, reconciliation and institutional reform. The constitutional review should not duplicate the work of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, but it should ask what constitutional changes are needed so Fiji does not keep returning to the same cycle: coup, immunity, transition, Constitution, crisis, review.

The goal should not be revenge, but rather democratic repair.

> Stability built on silence is fragile. Stability built on trust is stronger.

WHAT SHOULD BE MAINTAINED, AMENDED, REMOVED AND ADDED

Since the Commission has asked what should be maintained, amended, removed or added, I will frame my answer this way: Fiji should keep the parts of the 2013 Constitution that protect common identity, rights and democratic aspiration, but reform the parts that centralise power, protect military or executive authority, and treat formal equality as though it has already solved real inequality.

This should not be approached as a simple list of clauses. Constitutional provisions work together, and if one part changes without regard to the overall architecture, the whole settlement weakens. My recommendations are about the text and about the design.

MAINTAIN

- Common and equal citizenship should stay. The idea that all citizens are Fijian should not be abandoned, and Fiji should not return to a constitutional order that hardens ethnic separation or makes belonging depend on communal categories. But common citizenship needs strengthening, so it does not become a way of hiding real inequality.

- The Bill of Rights deserves the same treatment: kept and strengthened. This includes protection from discrimination; freedom of expression, association, assembly and political participation; access to justice; the rights of children; the rights of persons with disabilities; socio-economic rights; environmental rights; and protection of language, culture and identity. These rights provide an important foundation for democratic life.

- iTaukei, Rotuman and Banaban land, resources, culture and institutions need strong, continued protection. But protection of land and culture is not a political voice, and it should not be treated as a substitute for one. The Fiji Rotuman Association has already put a specific proposal to this Commission: reserved parliamentary seats, a treaty of self-governance between the Rotuma Island Council and the State, and provisions on birthright, diaspora inclusion and citizenship restoration. I would support taking that proposal seriously. Banaba raises a related but distinct question: a community relocated to Rabi in 1942 from an island now within Kiribati's borders has a different relationship to land and displacement than an indigenous population on its own island, and that difference deserves its own answer rather than a single shared clause for both communities.

- A secular state should also remain part of the settlement: not as hostility to religion, but as equal protection for all faith communities and for those who belong to none. This matters in a society where religion carries real political weight.

- The national security framework should also be amended. Fiji should consider a civilian-led National Security Council with parliamentary and opposition representation. The military, police and corrections services should be clearly subject to law, ministerial direction, parliamentary oversight and judicial review, especially where domestic deployment or emergency powers are involved.

- Constitutional change should continue to require public consent. A constitution should not be easy for a government of the day to change for political convenience. But that consent has to be meaningful and workable: entrenchment should protect the people, not trap them. A permanent civic participation mechanism should also be considered, drawing from but not simply replicating the 2012 National People's Assembly. Its role should be to facilitate structured public deliberation between elections, receive reports from key institutions, and enable civil society and communities to hold the state accountable without supplanting Parliament.

- Fiji could also consider a regular constitutional review question, modelled on the Federated States of Micronesia, in which voters are periodically asked whether there should be a Constitutional Convention. This would not require automatic constitutional change. It would simply create a peaceful, scheduled and democratic opportunity to ask whether reform is needed.

- Independent institutions, including independent electoral, accountability, human rights, judicial and integrity bodies, should remain part of the architecture. Their current appointment and accountability arrangements need serious review, though, so independence is protected in practice and not only declared on paper. Section 45 already gives the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission a mandate to monitor and report on human rights, for instance, but a mandate nobody is required to act on is easy to leave unused. A mandate needs a consequence attached to it, or it stays theoretical.

AMEND

- Section 131(2) on the military should be amended first. The phrase "security, defence and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians" is too broad, and it gives the military a constitutional guardianship role over the nation. The RFMF's role should be limited to defence and national security under elected civilian authority, parliamentary oversight and the rule of law: it should defend the constitutional order, not interpret the nation's political well-being.

- Parliament's own oversight tools need to bind whoever is in government, not just whoever is in opposition. Committees, the power to call for evidence, and the office of Leader of the Opposition already exist on paper, but the Business Committee process has let successive governments screen out opposition questions and motions before they reach the floor, and the current coalition suspended its own Leader of the Opposition from Parliament for three years in 2023. Whichever party benefits from that control today, the next one will use it against whoever is in opposition tomorrow. Opposition representation on key committees, a guaranteed share of parliamentary time, and a right to call evidence that the Business Committee cannot simply decline to schedule would fix this.

- Electoral design needs review. Again, I am not arguing for a return to communal voting; Fiji should keep common citizenship and a common electoral roll. But the current single national constituency, open-list system and five percent threshold reward name recognition, party machinery, campaign money, national visibility and established leadership networks, in ways that make it hard for women, younger candidates, persons with disabilities, rural leaders, minority voices and locally grounded community leaders to compete on equal terms. The Commission should consider whether Fiji needs a more balanced design: some form of mixed system, clearer geographic accountability, a lower threshold, or other mechanisms that preserve proportionality while making representatives more accountable to communities.

- Political parties need a proper legal framework. They are not simply private organisations; they are constitutional gatekeepers, deciding who gets selected, who gets funded, who is visible and who is treated as a serious leader. The Constitution or supporting law should require genuine internal party democracy, transparent candidate selection, gender and diversity commitments, and fairer rules around financing.

- Campaign finance is one of the weakest links in the current system. It needs clearer rules on donations, spending, disclosure, third-party campaigning, use of state resources, media access and online political advertising. Without transparency here, formal electoral equality means very little.

- Media freedom needs a harder look too. Section 17's free expression guarantee is still subject to an unusually wide set of limitation grounds, and section 150's requirement that Parliament eventually legislate for access to information dropped the 1997 Constitution's requirement that it do so within a reasonable time. Neither has an equivalent for the online environment, where most political information now travels.

- Caretaker government rules should be added or strengthened. The Constitution should include safeguards for fair transitions of power, not just fair voting. Incumbent governments should not be able to use state resources, public appointments, public funds, state media, public events or last-minute legal or administrative decisions to advantage themselves during election periods. Fair elections depend on the whole pre-election environment, not only on polling day.

- Appointment processes for independent institutions need to change too, including the Constitutional Offices Commission and the bodies responsible for elections, accountability, human rights, anti-corruption, the public service and the judiciary. These should be more transparent, less executive-dominated, and subject to clear criteria, public scrutiny and parliamentary oversight.

- The amendment procedure itself needs revisiting, so the Constitution stays protected without becoming practically impossible to change. Fiji needs a serious, deliberative, people-centred process for amendment, not one so rigid that reform becomes almost unreachable.

- Provisions on emergency powers, rights limitations and public order should be tightened, so rights cannot be restricted too easily in the name of stability, security or national interest. Any limitation on rights should be necessary, proportionate, reviewable and subject to judicial oversight.

- Local government, decentralisation and community participation deserve more attention than the current text gives them. Fiji is not only Suva. Rural communities, maritime communities, informal settlements, provincial spaces, municipalities and outer islands need real pathways into national decision-making.

- Finally, the treatment of reconciliation should be expanded. The constitutional review should not sit apart from Fiji's wider truth and reconciliation process; the Constitution should make space for national and community-based reconciliation without turning local practices into state-managed symbolism.

REMOVE OR FUNDAMENTALLY REVISE

- Any provision giving the military a broad guardianship role over Fiji's political life should go. Military authority should not sit above civilian democracy.

- Provisions that constitutionalise impunity without any pathway to truth, accountability, reconciliation and democratic repair should be removed or substantially revised. Stability cannot depend forever on silence. Where immunity provisions cannot be fully removed immediately, they should at least be tied to a robust truth-and-reconciliation framework.

- So should any provision that places particular decisions, decrees or past actions beyond meaningful democratic or judicial review. A democratic constitution should not permanently shield executive or military power from accountability.

- Institutional arrangements that let the executive dominate supposedly independent offices need revising as well. Independence cannot depend on the goodwill of the government of the day; it has to be built into appointment, removal, funding and reporting processes.

- And more broadly, Fiji should move away from any design that treats formal sameness as sufficient. Race-blind and gender-blind provisions can look neutral while reproducing inequality if they ignore the social and political conditions in which people actually participate. What needs removing is not common citizenship, but the assumption that common citizenship alone creates equal power.

ADD

- A stronger substantive equality clause belongs in the Constitution: one where equality means not only equal treatment before the law, but the state's ability to take active steps against historical, structural and institutional disadvantage.

- Temporary special measures deserve explicit protection: gender quotas, candidate nomination requirements, party funding incentives, disability inclusion measures and similar mechanisms. As I said earlier, these are not exceptions to equality; they are how equality becomes real rather than only formal.

- Access to constitutional justice should be strengthened. Rights are only meaningful if people can enforce them. Individuals, communities, civil society organisations and public interest groups should have standing to bring constitutional claims where rights are violated, or where affected communities cannot easily litigate on their own behalf. This is especially important for people and communities who may not have the resources, safety or political power to take cases to court by themselves. Constitutional rights should not exist only for those who can afford lawyers.

- Violence against women in politics, online abuse, intimidation, harassment, hate speech and gendered disinformation all need explicit constitutional protection. Political participation means little if people are bullied, threatened or shamed out of public life.

- Civic education needs clearer constitutional backing. Consultation during constitutional moments is not enough; people need ongoing access to civic education in English, iTaukei, Fiji Hindi, and Rotuman, and in accessible formats for persons with disabilities. Constitutional literacy is part of democracy, not an afterthought.

- Future constitutional and electoral reform needs binding requirements for public participation: publication of draft texts, accessible summaries, public hearings, targeted consultation with marginalised groups, and enough time for people to respond meaningfully.

- For this review specifically, strong transparency protections should be built into the process: publication of the Commission's full report, publication of the draft Bill, a summary of submissions received, an explanation of how submissions shaped recommendations, and a public record of any later changes made by Cabinet or Parliament.

- A formal mechanism for future constitutional review would help Fiji avoid waiting for the next crisis before revisiting unresolved questions. A scheduled review, every ten or fifteen years, could allow peaceful constitutional reflection without coups, abrogations or political rupture.

- Reconciliation and belonging deserve clearer recognition too: space for truth-telling, community-based reconciliation, cultural recognition and local processes of repair, including processes such as the Rewa/Noco recognition of Girmitiya descendants as Luvedra na Ratu. This should not become a national template. It shows that belonging is relational as well as legal.

- Fiji's diversity within common citizenship needs the same explicit recognition: iTaukei, Indo-Fijian, Rotuman, Banaban and other communities, alongside women, youth, persons with disabilities, LGBTQI+ communities, rural and maritime communities, and others historically pushed to the margins of political life.

- Climate justice, ocean protection and intergenerational responsibility deserve a firmer constitutional footing. For Fiji, climate is a constitutional issue as much as an environmental one: it touches land, displacement, food security, water, housing, culture, sovereignty and the rights of future generations.
- And finally, ethical public leadership needs firmer safeguards: integrity rules, conflict-of-interest obligations, anti-corruption protections, transparency in public appointments, and real consequences for abuse of office.

So, in short, my position is this:

- maintain the rights-protecting and inclusionary promises of the 2013 Constitution;
- amend the structures that centralise power and reproduce exclusion;
- remove or fundamentally revise the protections built around military, executive or authoritarian power; and
- add the safeguards that make common citizenship, substantive equality and democratic accountability real rather than declared.

CLOSING REMARKS

A constitution should not simply organise government. It should organise trust. It should tell citizens who holds power, how that power will be limited, how it will be shared, and how it can be questioned and made accountable.

The 2013 Constitution contains important rights language, and that should not be dismissed. But rights language is not enough if the institutions around it continue to reproduce militarised authority, executive dominance, gendered exclusion and unequal access to representation.

The task before this Commission, as I see it, is to help move Fiji from formal equality to substantive democratic inclusion. That means maintaining common citizenship while recognising real inequality. It means protecting rights while reforming the institutions that make those rights hard to exercise. It means replacing military guardianship with civilian constitutionalism. It means treating gender, race, class, disability, sexuality, age and geography not as side issues, but as constitutional questions. And it means showing the people of Fiji, concretely, how their views shaped the constitutional future they ended up with.

Fiji does not need a Constitution that merely declares unity. It needs a constitutional order that builds trust, shares power, protects civilian democracy and makes equal citizenship real.

Vinaka vakalevu.

Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants (FICA)

1984

Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants
Date: 7/7/26

Mr. Valenitabua: The Constitution review commission this morning. The commission this morning is, uh, represented by the commissioners. Miss Nailatikau, right on my far right, next to her is Mr. Conway Beg. I am Sevuloni, the chairperson. On my immediate left, is Mr. Kohli, I'm a colleague, lawyer of Labasa, and on the far left is Dr. Gounder. I'm sure you do know, Mr. Conway very well. We have a commissioner sitting this morning. Uh, we have a short hour to deal with, uh, your consultation, so I will not.talk too much in relation to introductions. Except to say that we are here to listen to you. Give us your submissions. If you could be brief or summarize, and we will listen to you. That is what we are here for today.to listen.to your submissions. Now, without further ado, I now head you over the mic on the floor to start with your submission this morning. Thank you.

Rajit. Maharaj: Thank you, uh, chair, and, the CRC members. Uh, on behalf of the FICA Council and the President, uh, my name is Rajit Maharaj. And with me, I have the President, Mr. Ravinesh Singh. The submission that we have documented, it is by the members' contribution, and we had a consultation by Mr. John Apted, who has taken us through the 2013 Constitution. We have a request process through which we have prepared this submission. Just on the background of what the institution is, we are just after the independence 1972, these Fiji Institute accountants. Institute of Tadal Contents under the act of 2021. Our role includes good governance, accountability, transparency, ethical leadership, and sound public financial management. And this is where we are here today to present to the CRC commission our submission. I'll not take much, but I'll go through the executive summary.

The Constitution is the supreme law of Fiji, and provides foundation upon which democratic governance, the rule of law, public administration, economic development, and the protection of fundamental rights, and freedom are built. As Fiji continue to revolve, evolve socially, economically, and institutionally, the current prostitution review presents an important opportunity to ensure that the Constitution not only responds to present their challenges, but also provide the strong and enduring framework for future generation. The FICA, as the statutory body, representing the accountancy profession in Fiji, has a low-standing commitment to promoting good governance, accountability, transparencies, sound public financial management, and sustainable economic development. These principles are fundamental, not only to the accounting profession, but also to the effective governance of a modern democratic nation. It is, therefore, appropriate that FICA contributes constructively to the Constitutional Review Commission's consultation process by identifying areas where the constitutional framework may be further strengthened in the public interest.

The submission presents a balanced package of constitutional reforms intended to strengthen Fiji's governance framework, enhance his additional effectiveness, reinforce public confidence in national institutions, support sustainable economic growth, and promote long term national resilience. Their recommendations have been developed following a comprehensive review of the Constitution of 2013, consideration of the CRC's terms of reference, and the consultation objective, comparative constitutional practices from a range of democratic jurisdictions, and internationally recognized principle of good governance, accountability, and the rule of law. You may see there are 2 broad categories. We have marked in section A in section B, and I think section B is where we are proposing for additional provisions that the Constitutional review Commission should consider, and we have mentioned in the respective jurisdictions. So the 1st category proposes, targeted amendments to existing constitutional provisions, we have considers the current framework could be strengthened to improve governance, accountability, and institutional effectiveness. These include recommendation relating to citizenship, electoral arrangements.

Mr Valenitabua Pardon me Mr Maharaj Yeah. Could you refer us to the pages you were reading from?

Rajit. Maharaj: I'm on page number six, as you go on it?

Mr. Valenitabua Okay. I'm on page number six

Rajit. Maharaj: Sorry, chair. Thank you. The public service commission, the electoral commission, cabinet appointment, the 5 kick, legal aid, public finance, the auditor general, natural resource governance, environmental stewardship, the code of conduct, and the constitutional amendment process. The 2nd category proposes the introduction of new constitutional principles that are not presently recognized within the 2018 constitution, but which reflect contemporary constitutional thinking and the evolving needs of Fiji.

These include the introductions of constitutional duties of citizens, directive principle of state policy, intergenerational equity, long-term national development training, physical responsibility principles, digital governance, climate resilience, national integrity, constitutional appointments, and stronger public participation in major national decisions. Recognizing that sustainable national building extends beyond public institutions alone, this commission also recommends constitutional recognition of the important contribution made by families, caregivers, volunteers, and other older patients. These recommendation acknowledged that unpaid care war, family responsibilities, volunteerism, and community service contribute significantly to Fiji's social cohesion, economic productivity, and national well-being. The submission, therefore, proposes that the Constitution provide greater recognition to the role played by families as foundation of society, and encourage policies that support Caregivers, protect older persons, strength and responsible, parenting, and promote civic participation.

Underlying all the recommendations contained in this submission, is a common objective to ensure that Fiji's constitution remains a living framework capable of responding to changing national circumstances while preserving democratic values, constitutional stability, and the rule of the law. The recommendations seek to strengthen public institution, improve accountability, encourage responsible citizenship, promote sustainable economic development, and ensure that the interest of future generations are considered in today's constitutional and public policy decision. Thus, we recognizes that constitutional reform requires careful consideration, broad consultation, and national consensus. Accordingly, this paper is presented as a constructive contribution to the CRC's review, process, and is intended to assist informed decision on how Fiji's constitutional framework can continue to evolve, in good support, governance, economic resilience, social cohesion, and long-term national prosperity. While the document has got one tier two, which talks about the proposed changes and the new provisions. We have also some priority constitutional reforms, which are highlighted there and which pick are things if considered. By the CRC, they strengthen governance and institutional integrity, promote merit-based public administration, review Fiji's electron system, strengthen economic governance and physical responsibility, and enhance the national integrity and anti-corruption framework. Promote responsible citizenship, and civic responsibility, embed long-term national development, and intergenerational equity. These are further defined in section 7. Part seven, uh, under part seven. So um, I think much has been covered in the executive summary. So I'll allow the Chair and the members of the Constitutional Review Commission. If they can go over to the document, if you have any queries, we are here to answer. And I ask my president to contribute from here.

Mr. Valenitabua: Interesting. We will hear you until the end of your submission, and then we will discuss.

Ravinesh. Singh: Thank you, sir. Um, I just, uh, wanted to highlight a few things that he's already mentioned. Um, um, Jen, the members of Costume Review Commission, we're not going to clue for the opportunity, uh, to present fecal submission, FICAs not here to advance a political position. Our submission is intended as a constructive contribution to strengthening Fiji's constitutional framework for the long term. So, our constitutional, what we, at FICA, we think our constitution should not merely govern the Fiji of today. It should help shape the Fiji future generations will inherit.

So, I've got 4 key messages that I wanted to, apart from the executive summary, that if shared is message number one, strong institutions, build public confidence, and these are all detailed in our submission, suffices that constitutional reform should strengthen democratic governance, institutional independence, accountability, and integrity across public institutions, the institutions highlighted include the public service commission, FICAC, Auditor General, electoral commission, and the constitutional code of conduct as part of the governance and institutional integrity reform agenda. I think strong institutions are not a political preference. They are the foundation of public confidence, and economic stability and the rule of law. Institutional independence should be strengthened where appropriate, Oversight bodies should be accountable, transparent, and properly empowered. Public confidence depends on institutions that operate beyond political cycles. Because position is aligned with its mandate to promote accountability, transparency, public sector, financial management, and institutional confidence. I think this will bring a stronger foundation for the Fiji that we want to see in future.

My 2nd message is merit by public administration matters. So the submission argues that appointments, promotions, and leadership positions in the public service and constitutional institutions should be based on merit, competence, integrity, and demonstrated capability. It also recommends strengthening the constitutional role of the public service commission to enhance professionalism, institutional continuity, and public confidence in government administration. A professional merit-based public service is one of the most important investments a country can make in a stable governance. Merit based recruitment and promotion reduce politicization, public service capability affects delivery of national priorities, institutional continuity matters, regardless of changes in government. This is directly linked to figures governance and accountability mandate.

The third message is, physical responsibility should be constitutional principle, because strong technical contribution is in physical governance. Submission states that responsible management of public finances is essential to public confidence and protecting future generations. It recommends constitutional principles around prudent borrowing, sustainable debt, transparency and expenditure, balanced budget, subject to emergencies, and intergenerational Fiscal responsibility. The third message, Fiscal responsibility is not just an annually budget issue. It is a constitutional stewardship issue. Public debt decisions made today affects future taxpayers. Strong physical principles support investor confidence, and economic resilience.

Transparency in public expenditure strengthens accountability. Long-time infrastructure and public development planning should not be limited by short electoral cycles. The 4th and final message that's in the submission is the future generation should be explicitly recognized. A central team of the submission is intergenerational equity. The document states that the decisions made today on public finances, infrastructure, education, national resources, and environmental stewardship will shape opportunities available to future generations. It recommends that Constitution express expressly recognize stewardship of national assets and long-term national development planning. The constitutional question we should ask is, will this decision leave each stronger for the next generation? Constitutional reform should anticipate future challenges, not merely respond to the current ones.

Long term planning should cover public finances, infrastructure, environment, and national development. Fiji needs institutions capable of continuity, resilience, and evidence based decision making. Intergenerational equity is the submissions unifying principle. FICA respectfully submits the constitutional reform, should be carefully, careful, consultative and guided by national consensus. Our recommendations are not intended to replace the foundations of the Constitution, but to strengthen them. We ask the commission to consider whether FICA can more really support 3 enduring outcomes, strong institutions, strong economic governance, and stronger stewardship for future generations. Ultimately, the measure of reform should be simple. Will it strengthen Fiji for present and future generations? Thank You.

Ranjit Maharaj: If I may start on page number 21, and through which we have constructive discussion.

Mr. Valenitabua: Please proceed.

Ranjit Maharaj: Question 1, values of the state, constitutional values. The recommended amendment is to include additional constitutional values, recognizing the meritocracy, innovation, national activity, physical responsibility, are in the 21st century chair. We need to know how the demographics... of technology and digital market is changing. There should be some provisions for innovative measures, for creative measures.

That is what we are talking about in section 1. Section 5, citizenship. By the review, the constitutional framework governing citizenship by nationalization to ensure that in addition to local residents and good character, applicants demonstrate a genuine commitment to Fiji through meaningful and positive contribution to the nation's economic, social, professional or civic development. We have now, the world is moving and nobody is sticking to their own country. Due to the liberty, everybody is moving from one country to another country. We have got skilled workers migrating out of Fiji and we have immigrants coming in. We have to be mindful in terms of just giving a 10 year period of being in Fiji, should not govern somebody to be a citizen of a country. There should be a criteria set in terms of what are the language barriers.

They should fulfill, they should meet what contribution they will put towards the country if they are given the citizenship. The electoral eligibility, the candidates seeking to election ensure that they support democratic participation while maintaining appropriate standards for public opinion. A set of criteria should be there in terms of minimum MQR in terms of a candidate to run for election. Electoral system. The current electoral system is determining whether it continues to provide the most appropriate balance between fairness, accountability and effective democratic representative. I think this must have been held by the National Review Commission in terms of one open constituency.

While we had the constituency elections, we believe it should be on the merit base, not on ethnicity divisions. There should not be one open constituency. It should be by the demographics, where the fair representatives are made through the demographic, and it also fails in the 5% threshold for political party, which is also equivalent to an independent candidate. So, an independent candidate to go to the threshold of 5% will be a challenging one. So, even the Constitution Review Commission can consider on that. The theme of the parliament, currently 4-year theme, we believe in terms of the cost, the size of the population of this country. A five-year term of a parliament for government should be considered. I will not touch on the electoral commission, but we have already highlighted the line on that. Section 91 and 96, the cabinet, there should be a limited cap for the cabinet size. And also, on very exceptional cases, there should be a provision if there is a person or the minister is limited, not within the Government, the government side should be from outside but through the deep process.

Currently we have the provision for the OTT, Attorney General, but there should be provisions for at least if there is no one capable for one ministry, for instance, Ministry of Health. The government side do not have anybody who is a practitioner and we make somebody to be a minister of any other field. So, there should be a problem here to strengthen its governance, accountability and public confidence. Consider establishing FICAC as an independent investigative agency within the Fiji police force, just like how CID is.

We have been in the recent numbers, current consultation processes and workshops during the public service site, 42,000. So we should streamline on having FICAC, and also the prosecution should be under the Office the Public Director of Public Prosecutions. Legally. Retain the constitutional right to legal assistance while undertaking a comprehensive review of the legal aid framework to ensure the efficient, equitable and sustainable use of public resources. Our objective is not to diminish or to eliminate legal aid, but the constitution may consider whether legal aid services are best delivered through a dedicated statutory authority. or through an accredited panel of private legal practitioners reimbursed by the state as prescribed rates. Currently, this practice is there with Ministry of Health, where the GPs, the patients can go to any general practitioner where the state has prescribed them, accredited them, and then the replacement can go by the state. We are measuring the cost and the taxpayer's funds.to two different entities, but both fighting for, I am not sure, the criminal or the other side. We have DPP and we have got legal aid, and both are been paid by the taxpayers. So, the CRC should consider on this.

The Public Service Commission expands constitutional responsibilities of the PS to oversee merit-based recruitment, promotions, examination, discipline and ethical standards across the public. The Auditor General section requires timely parliamentary consideration of audit reports together with mandatory government responses to significant findings. As the speaker president has highlighted on public finance, we strongly believe that there should be balanced budget, physical sustainability, prudent debt management and long-term infrastructure investment.

Natural resources royalties replace fixed royalty concept with constitutional principle promoting equitable, transparent and sustainable benefit sharing based on economic retains. as we have the climate change and climate act, strength and constitutional protection for biodiversity, climate resilience and sustainable development for present and future generations. Code of conduct, strength and integrity obligations to asset detection, conflict of interest, provisions and host public employment restrictions. Here the ethics and the independence and good governance should be the key priorities. So, these are some of the things that the institute thinks as part of current constitution. Section B, proposed new constitutional principles for Fiji's future.

I take you to page number 27. So, fundamental duties of citizens. The current constitution provides extensive rights, but does not prescribe civic responsibilities. Introduce a chapter outlining the responsibilities of every citizen to uphold the constitution, obey the laws of Fiji, protect public property, preserve the environment, respect the rights of others, promote racial harmony, respect indigenous cultures, participate in democratic processes, and contribute positively to national democracy. The reference has been made to Article 51 A of India's constitution.

Directive principles of state policy, now constitutional frame of guiding long term public policy objectives. CRC can consider to introduce constitutional principles requiring government to promote employment, education, agriculture, full security, innovation, digital transformation, rural development, public health, housing, climate resilience and sustainable economic growth. Future generations and intergenerational equity. Sustainability is recognized generally, but there is no constitutional obligation to consider future generations. Require the state to manage public finances, natural resources, environmental assets, and strategic infrastructure in trust of present and future generations and responsible stewardship of national assets, as alluded by the President.

National Development Commission We know that there is a national development plan, but there should be, but there is no constitutional requirement for a long-term national planning. So, established an independent constitutional commission responsible for preparing and periodically reviewing a role in NDP within 20-year national plan, and should not be just for the current government, should be, the NDP should be for any government to come in. National integrity framework. Integrity provisions exist in separate institutions but are not integrated. Introduce a constitutional framework covering ethics, conflict of interest, whistle blower protection, document integrity, lobbying, transparency and public sector accountability. Rational, public confidence in government institutions and promote ethical leadership. As I mentioned in terms of the technology shift, digital governance and data protection. The constitution does not address digital governance. One major factor currently if everybody can see is our Facebook, social media.

Anybody can post anything and anybody can comment on any particular post. While we have got online safety, but I think if it is part of the constitution, then becomes the supreme law. The rationale on this is future proves the constitution against technological developments. We do not know, our next generation can see robots walking in Fiji. Climate change and rational resilience, environmental rights exist, but climate resilience is not specifically recognized. Reflect Fiji's vulnerability as a small island developing state. I think we have talked about and I think this should be part of the constitution.

National productivity, innovation in skills development. Education is recognized, but national productivity is not. And I think we should promote as part of the institution. We have our own membership base and we do our professional development CPD. hours and CPE hours to our members, but there should be some provision to promote quality education, technical educational training, TVET and STEM, and they are jurisdictions in the Asian countries, which have constitutional appointments permission, appointment powers are dispersed among institutions. So, enhance institutional independence. and public confidence. Establish an independent constitutional appointment commission responsible for recommending appointments to key constitutional offices by competence and competence integrity. Introduce constitutional principle recognizing the state's responsibility to plan, develop and maintain strategic public infrastructure that promotes national development and economic prosperity.

Where nationally significant projects require the acquisition of land or the relocation of affected communities, the constitution should require transparent decision making, meaningful consultation, independent assessment, fair and timely compensation, protection of cultural heritage and the environment, appropriate resettlement arrangements and compliance with due process under the law. The other topics are on the social care, recognition of unpaid care, work and family responsibility, rights and dignity of older persons, protection of families, community service and voluntarism. This may be touch-based and considered by the CRC. Through economic value, Dr. Neelesh Gounder would know better in terms of no finance, has been involved in there, but there is economic value which are been measured only by the economists and cannot be measured because there is no value tied towards them. So, these are some of the provisions that we have and as I highlighted during our introduction, the priority areas, which has been listed on page 81, priority constitutional reforms. I think I have taken through the entire document in summary. If the CRC has got any questions for what we are proposing, we are happy to take it, questions.

Mr. Valenitabua: We will have discussions now then we will see what happens after. Mr Kohli.

Mr Kohli: I have two questions for you Mr. Maharaj. First of all you are proposing a five year parliamentary term. New Zealand has three years, Fiji has four years at the moment. We are proposing five years. If we are stuck with a bad government that means basically we are stuck with them for five years. Whereas if you've got a good government for four years or three years, they can always come back. So what's your views on that? Do you still feel that five-year term should be there? Because there is something that has to go in the constitution.

Ranjit. Maharaj: Thank you for your question. It's a good question. When we were putting this together, we knew that there will be a little bit of question on this. We are not proposing. We are only suggesting that the Constitutional Review Commission should assess and see whether five-year parliamentary term is feasible. Obviously, making sure that we are maintaining a good governance. So, we are not proposing. We are saying we should consider. So, that will help with the economy as Fiji reduce the overall expenditures incurred while having frequent elections. So that was our suggestion only. But obviously that has to be carefully reviewed by the Constitutional Review Commission. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Dr Gounder.

Mr. Gounder: Thank you, Chairman. Thank you, Mr. Maharaj and Mr. Singh, for your submission this morning on behalf of the Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants. It's a very comprehensive submission, and we have also discussed...the argument or the rationale behind your submission. You have made 13 very broad recommendations, but some very specific recommendations as well. Section 5 of the Fiscal Management Act.

So we will see how we can strike a balance between what should go in the constitution and what should ideally remain in an act. But your fundamental arguments have been noted in the area of fiscal governance. You also talked about accountability, fiscal discipline, as well as budgeting systems. So they all are taken on board. You have also talked about the issue regarding natural resources and environmental issues. And you have also submitted regarding the National Development Plan. And I think that's something that we'll be looking at since we have received... the Ministry of Strategic Planning as well regarding the national development planning processes and the implementation of national development plan and also your argument that when governments change, then national development plans, if they are still effective, must continue until the life of the plan comes to an end, then the government can develop a new plan.

Your argument is that hen government change, plans remain still active. So we take those points on board. Just one last point. Valuing community services and volunteerism. That's a very interesting submission. That's a very important one as well. This is something that is usually overlooked. The example that I usually give is the education sector. 99% of schools are run and owned by religious bodies and rural communities and villages. And they are based on charity and volunteerism. So you make a good point about recognition of charity, volunteerism, community service and civic development, etc. So that's all I have. Just some reflections and points that you have highlighted. No question in particular. But I want to thank you for your submission this morning.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you Mr. Maharaj and Mr .Singh just a brief reflection followed by two questions. I really appreciate the member-centered approach that you took and the efforts that you made to inform yourselves and the targeted proposal amendments as well as principles. And I see that you've also included other jurisdictions and other references that we can benefit from. I also wanted to draw attention to what you were hearing from members, particularly relating to what Dr. Gounder was saying around a National Development Commission, which from what I understand in your submission is about decoupling political cycles from national development cycles, which should ideally be independent and much longer term than a government term, for example. So we'd really like to hear more of your thinking towards that, how such a commission might be able to operate. And secondly, really... to digital governance, digital protection.

As we see, many countries across the world are racing to keep up with the progress of technology relating to protection, but also artificial intelligence. I'd be interested to hear how that's playing out in the experiences of your members. So just would invite you to expand on the National Development Commission thinking, since it's a new type of setup which you are proposing, or perhaps an adaptive setup, as well as data governance and more technology forward looking related proposals.

Ranjit Sing: I'll take the intergenerational and he'll take the one. I think, so, when we said intergenerational equity, what we're trying to talk about is... Trying to prepare our country for future. So if I look at the countries like Singapore, they started from somewhere, but they are preparing for probably the next 20 years. And I think when we are drafting our constitution, what we are saying is we should be preparing for the future. Like for us accountants, we are at the moment preparing for future with AI coming in.

How will that shape the accounting profession? How will that, how does, how do we as an accountant are relevant in the profession? So this is the transition that's happening in the profession and I think similarly with the Constitution and with the country, I think we should look at how the world is changing, how the world is evolving, and how can our Constitution be forward-looking. And changing this change and making sure that we are taking... account of all these changes that's coming in technological changes the mobility labor mobility so when originally the constitution was done nobody thought about the labor mobility nobody thought about that we'll have so many immigrants uh working in Fiji but right now it's happening so I think these are some of the things that the constitution review commission can look at and make it a future proof so i think one of the things that constitution reform should and is the future challenges and not merely respond to the current ones. We have huge challenges today, but there will be future challenges. How can we change our constitution to future prove that? I think long-term planning should cover public finances, infrastructure. So we are developing infrastructures, but we are not developing it for the next 10, 20 years. We're not thinking that far. I think the constitution should be... that forward-looking and preparing the structure for the next 50 years, next 100 years.

Again, taking into consideration how the world is evolving. And there are a lot of developed countries that we can take the learnings from. Best practices we can bring in Fiji and in the current constitution and implement them. We can start learning from some of the failures from those developed countries. There are a lot of learnings that we can take and implement. it here. Environmentally, how are we looking forward? How are we contributing to the sustainable development? Again, Fiji's institutions are capable of continuity, resilience, and evidence-based decision-making. So we need a lot of evidence. We have a lot of evidence, and we should be using that to make our decisions, not get too emotionally caught up when we're making decisions.

So I think those are...COVID, for example, has taught us to be resilient. I mean, we are relying solely on tourism industry. Hitters, in a very good shape, but we came out of that. We are resilient, but I think the Constitution should look at how we can be resilient if anything as such comes in the future.

Ranjit Maharaj: Thank you. Ms. Nailatikau In terms of the digital, I think two things we should consider. I just realized I did not put or the institute did not put anything in terms of the natural intelligence. While the artificial intelligence is taking shape, we should also consider the natural intelligence. We should not undermine that natural intelligence. A day if the technology is down, 50% of workforce will not be able to work. In terms of digital, what we had in mind is the data protection, your individual's identity theft, Cyber securities, everything currently will be moved towards a hub, and we have got the CFO of Telecom Fiji here, and they are walking towards so much, so many projects currently happening in Fiji. While we have got RBF of doing our national ID, a lot of things are happening. So there should be something that is under the Constitution, that every citizenship is every citizen. That's your right, but at the same time, it is a responsible citizen. You should take this. You should not refrain from not taking any of the developments that the government or anybody in power comes and says this is beneficial, but there is nothing under the Constitution says.

The Constitution doesn't allow me to be having this national identity card. So if it is under the Constitution, that's why I said there is a provision there to have civic pride. In that civic pride, we, as citizen, should uphold the Constitution, the law of law, and what has been governed to us. So, in terms of the digital governance and data protection, if, for instance, we have a national ID, or anything in that matter, I repeat again, not everybody will be saying yes to it. So if it is under the Constitution, people will say yes, I'm being governed by the Constitution, the Constitution is telling you to do this. So people will comply based on what's in the Constitution. The freedom is there, but the constitution is telling you to take these. So that's the consensus we had in terms of, otherwise, people will refrain from not taking, you know, the data protection, whatever the digital transformation that we are wanting to change. Some may object to this.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: We'll have, uh, maybe one or two more question before I have to close, because we have one hour.

Mr. Kohli: Yeah, thank you chair. Mr. Maharaj, you are particularly concerned about your last issue I've raised. You have said that if you have something in the Constitution, which is the supreme role, then people be obligated to follow it, like you're talking about identity card. But then again, when video consultations, whole idea of having a constitution is something that is acceptable by people, not something that is imposed upon them. So how do you reconcile that? Here, we are writing a conversation, acceptable to everybody, and in consultation with everybody, which is for betterment for everybody.

Ranjit. Maharaj: Uh, thank you, Mr. Kohli, Thank you Mr. Chair. Um, very bullet point, and, uh, thanks for rising there. This should be articulated in a manner that it coincide between the supreme law and to the freedom of a person. I'm not saying you impose it onto the citizens, but there should be a provision as a civic pride. It can be mandatory. Maybe the word could be may, not must. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: One, uh, last. Question... Mr. Maharaj and Mr. Singh. At page 24 of your submission. You have address Section 118? and 13 to 15. Which deals with legal aid. I am a practicing lawyer. Mr. Kohli is a practicing lawyer. There is the legal aid commission. They give free services to the people of this country. From what I read of your submission, you are recommending, or suggesting that the... legal aid services, be... reduced... If that is a proper word, you might want to correct me. And that is, for the purpose, to save administration costs, and also, of course, do the taxpayers. You can correct me. That legal aid commission was established because people could not afford lawyers.

They just found paying for Louis, you know, too expensive. They were unable to. They are also not only covering the criminal matters, legal aid commission is also covering civil matters, including probate, applications for letters of administration, and so forth. Now, if you're going to reduce the services or remove the services of legal aid, then how would you just explain to us how would the costs be covered? Because then the private lawyers will have to deal with them. Or maybe one other institution. I don't know. Could you enlighten us on that, please?

Ranjit Maharaj: Thank you, thank you, chair. Um, I have mentioned not, as you said, the correct word, uh, if you see my submission, in atelic, open, enclosed, invaded commerce, the second sentence, the Constitutional Review Commission, may wish to consider where, whether legal aid services are best delivered through a dedicated statutory authority, and then, or, through an afflicted panel of private legal practitioners, reimbursed by the state. as prescribed. Rates at a prescribed rate. On top, we have also mentioned, for a mechanism, to have cost recovery. We know, um, the legal aid service is providing good services to those who are not able to afford, but I think, uh, the Institute had a consensus in terms of how the cost can be recovered. So it's not that we are saying there should not be no legal aid commission, but perhaps while these reviews happening, maybe you review whether the statue authority is required, needs to be lower, or through an accredit panel of private legal practitioners.

Ravinesh Singh: Sorry, through you Chair, can I just add. I think what we are also saying is we're not saying that we should, um, uh, retail, uh, the legal assistance to the people should be retained, but the issue here is how to deliver that right efficiently, equitably and sustainably. So, I think that's something the review commission might consider reviewing, doing a comprehensive review of the whole legal aid system. So that's been provided.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you for clarifying that. You've got the media around you. So that was why I asked the question so that you can clarify the metal. Thank you, right? So that we can get you correctly. Thank you, Dr. Gounder.

Mr. Gounder: Thank you, Mr Chair. I had not touched on the issue. I wanted my lawyer colleagues to bring it first, but now I can talk about the administrative side that you mentioned. You compared the possibility of outsourcing it to private practitioners and you use the example of the free medicine scheme. And uh, Just for the record, the free medicine scheme has not been working well.

A lot of bureaucracies and challenges in terms when government starts to outsource. Some outsourcing has worked very well. Others haven't. So one of the challenges I see with this is the cost issue. The billing from the private practitioners might actually lead to the, to a blowout in cost, because from the national development perspective, we did review the work of the legal aid commission. We did look at the funding for legal aid commission, et cetera.

So this has been looked at, but will consider your suggestion to see what can be done is more often more of an issue in terms of the operational side of things. Fundamentally, the issue is access to justice argument. But your Funding argument is more of an operational argument, but it's taken on board. We will see later all those issues that don't fall within our constitutional mandate after we decide whether it falls or not. We can always refer to government agencies to for concentrations. So I thought of just laying it out there.

Mr. Beg: Through you, Chair, sorry, just the last question. I make it quick. Thank you, Mr. Maharaj, and Mr. Singh, uh, very enlightening, uh, aspects. Just very quickly on Section B. Um, you recommended some principles for the, towards the Constitution. I take note of a section that you mentioned on climate change and resilience. It gives us an eye opener to certain sections of the Constitution that mentions this, so that something we will need to look at. Uh, the general principles behind it, but also your, your next point on the productivity, and then a comment around TVET. Um, is interesting. These are general sort of principles for consideration for the commission. And I thank you for that. But some of that, I would think, would exist in law and policy and regulation, so the commission will have to juggle and see which one fits in the Constitution, and where we have to balance it between law and Constitution. But I recommend you for your recommendations, and thank you for that.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Mahajan, Mr. Singh, we had one hour for this session. Thank you very much for your attendance this morning. Much appreciated. Thank you for... for setting out the provisions in the Constitution. on which you have given us some insight, some suggestions. We will surely look at your suspicions, and what in our deliberations try to see, if they fit into the constitutional reform, that we are undertaking. Thank You very much Ravinesh Singh: Before we close, can I just say, that figure submission to the Constitutional Review Commission is a constructive governance focused contribution. As Fiji's professional accountancy body, our interest is in a strong institution, accountability, public, financial management, fiscal responsibility, and long-term national development. We are not advocating political change for its own sake. We are asking how future constitutional framework can better support public confidence, responsible governance, and future generations. Thank you.

----------End of Session [07-July-2026]----------

2003

FIJI INSTITUTE OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS
NA DINA GA

Building a Constitution for Tomorrow

"A Constitution should not merely govern the Fiji of today; it should shape the Fiji that future generations will inherit."

A Submission by the Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants to the Constitutional Review Commission

7 July 2026

FOREWORD

The Constitution is the foundation upon which a nation builds its democratic institutions, governs its public affairs and safeguards the rights, freedoms and aspirations of its people. It is not simply a legal instrument; it is a statement of national values and a framework through which successive generations inherit and shape the future of their country.

The Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants (FICA) welcomes the opportunity provided by the Constitutional Review Commission to participate in this important national exercise. As the statutory professional body responsible for regulating and advancing the accountancy profession in Fiji, FICA has a longstanding commitment to promoting good governance, accountability, transparency, ethical leadership and sound public financial management. These principles are fundamental not only to the accounting profession but also to the effective governance and sustainable development of our nation.

The recommendations contained within this submission have been prepared following careful consideration of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013), international governance practices and the broader aspirations for Fiji's future. They are intended to provide constructive observations from a governance, institutional and public interest perspective.

Rather than seeking fundamental constitutional change, this submission focuses on opportunities to strengthen existing constitutional provisions while proposing new constitutional principles that recognise emerging national priorities, including responsible citizenship, long-term national planning, institutional resilience, intergenerational equity and sustainable economic development.

FICA believes that constitutional reform should be guided not only by present-day challenges but also by the legacy we wish to leave for future generations. Strong constitutional institutions, responsible governance and public confidence remain essential foundations upon which a prosperous, inclusive and resilient Fiji can continue to flourish.

We respectfully commend this submission to the Constitutional Review Commission as a constructive contribution to the national dialogue and thank the Commission for providing all Fijians with the opportunity to participate in shaping the constitutional future of our nation.

Vinaka and God Bless Fiji.

.....

Ravinesh Singh, CA
President
Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants

ABOUT FICA

The Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants (FICA) is the statutory professional body established under the Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants Act to regulate, develop and promote the accountancy profession in Fiji.

The Institute serves the public interest by promoting high standards of professional competence, ethics, governance and accountability across both the public and private sectors. Through its regulatory responsibilities, professional education programmes, advocacy initiatives and engagement with national and international stakeholders, FICA contributes to strengthening financial reporting, public confidence and institutional integrity throughout Fiji.

FICA is an active member of the International Federation of Accountants (IFAC), the Confederation of Asian and Pacific Accountants (CAPA), the Asian-Oceania Standard-Setters Group (AOSSG) and maintains collaborative relationships with Professional Accounting Organisations (PAOs) throughout the Pacific region and internationally.

Beyond regulating the profession, FICA actively contributes to national development through initiatives that promote:

- good governance and ethical leadership;
- accountability and transparency;
- public sector financial management;
- sustainability and environmental reporting;
- education and professional development;
- financial literacy;
- economic resilience; and
- strengthening public confidence in institutions.

Accordingly, the Institute considers that constitutional reform is a matter of significant public interest. A strong constitutional framework underpins effective governance, responsible public administration, investor confidence, economic growth and the rule of law principles that are closely aligned with FICA's statutory mandate and its commitment to serving the people of Fiji.

The recommendations contained within this submission are therefore presented from the perspective of strengthening governance, enhancing institutional effectiveness, promoting sustainable economic development and safeguarding the long-term interests of present and future generations.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

Acknowledgement

The Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants acknowledges the Constitutional Review Commission for undertaking this important national review and for providing institutions, organisations and citizens with the opportunity to contribute to Fiji's constitutional future through an open and consultative process.

The Institute also acknowledges the contributions of members who participated in the constitutional awareness session facilitated by Mr Jon Apted, together with the members of the FICA Council whose observations and guidance assisted in refining the recommendations contained in this submission.

In preparing this document, reference has been made to the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013), previous constitutional developments in Fiji, comparative constitutional practices from selected international jurisdictions and recognised principles of good governance, public administration and institutional accountability.

This submission is respectfully presented in the spirit of constructive dialogue and in support of the Constitutional Review Commission's objective of developing a constitutional framework that reflects the aspirations of the people of Fiji while strengthening governance and national development for generations to come.

DISCLAIMER

This submission has been prepared by the Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants as a contribution to the Constitutional Review Commission's public consultation process.

The recommendations contained in this document represent the views of the Institute as approved by the FICA Council for the purposes of this submission. They are intended to contribute constructively to national discussion and should not be interpreted as legal advice or as commentary on any particular political party, government or individual.

The recommendations have been developed following consideration of constitutional governance principles, comparative constitutional practices and matters considered relevant to strengthening Fiji's governance framework, democratic institutions, sustainable economic development and public confidence.

In preparing this submission, the Secretariat utilised contemporary research and drafting tools, including artificial intelligence (AI)-assisted technology, to support comparative research, document structuring and editorial refinement. All recommendations, analysis and conclusions were reviewed, evaluated and approved through FICA's governance processes before inclusion in this submission.

Table of Contents

FOREWORD 2

ABOUT FICA 3

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT 4

DISCLAIMER 4

Executive Summary 6

1. Introduction 8

2. Constitutional Vision for Fiji's Future 10

3. Guiding Principles 13

4. Summary of Recommendations 16

5. Section A – Proposed Amendments to Existing Constitutional Provisions 20

6. Section B – Proposed New Constitutional Principles for Fiji's Future 26

7. Priority Constitutional Reforms 31

7. A Legacy for Future Generations 32

8. Final Reflection 34

Executive Summary

The Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic of Fiji and provides the foundation upon which democratic governance, the rule of law, public administration, economic development and the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms are built. As Fiji continues to evolve socially, economically and institutionally, the current constitutional review presents an important opportunity to ensure that the Constitution not only responds to present-day challenges but also provides a strong and enduring framework for future generations.

The Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants (FICA), as the statutory professional body representing the accountancy profession in Fiji, has a longstanding commitment to promoting good governance, accountability, transparency, sound public financial management and sustainable economic development. These principles are fundamental not only to the accounting profession but also to the effective governance of a modern democratic nation. It is therefore appropriate that FICA contributes constructively to the Constitutional Review Commission's consultation process by identifying areas where the constitutional framework may be further strengthened in the public interest.

This submission presents a balanced package of constitutional reforms intended to strengthen Fiji's governance framework, enhance institutional effectiveness, reinforce public confidence in national institutions, support sustainable economic growth and promote long-term national resilience. The recommendations have been developed following a comprehensive review of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013), consideration of the Constitutional Review Commission's Terms of Reference and consultation objectives, comparative constitutional practices from a range of democratic jurisdictions, and internationally recognised principles of good governance, accountability and the rule of law.

The recommendations are grouped into two broad categories.

The first category proposes targeted amendments to existing constitutional provisions where FICA considers the current framework could be strengthened to improve governance, accountability and institutional effectiveness. These include recommendations relating to citizenship, electoral arrangements, the Public Service Commission, the Electoral Commission, Cabinet appointments, the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption (FICAC), Legal Aid, public finance, the Auditor-General, natural resource governance, environmental stewardship, the Code of Conduct and the constitutional amendment process.

The second category proposes the introduction of new constitutional principles that are not presently recognised within the 2013 Constitution, but which reflect contemporary constitutional thinking and the evolving needs of Fiji. These include the introduction of constitutional duties of citizens, directive principles of state policy, intergenerational equity, long-term national development planning, fiscal responsibility principles, digital governance, climate resilience, national integrity, constitutional appointments, and stronger public participation in major national decisions.

Recognising that sustainable nation-building extends beyond public institutions alone, this submission also recommends constitutional recognition of the important contribution made by families, caregivers, volunteers and older persons. These recommendations acknowledge that unpaid care work, family responsibilities, volunteerism and community service contribute significantly to Fiji's social cohesion, economic productivity and national wellbeing. The submission therefore proposes that the Constitution provide greater recognition to the role played by families as the foundation of society and encourage policies that support caregivers, protect older persons, strengthen responsible parenting and promote civic participation.

Underlying all of the recommendations contained in this submission is a common objective: to ensure that Fiji's Constitution remains a living framework capable of responding to changing national circumstances while preserving democratic values, constitutional stability and the rule of law. The recommendations seek to strengthen public institutions, improve accountability, encourage responsible citizenship, promote sustainable economic development and ensure that the interests of future generations are considered in today's constitutional and public policy decisions.

FICA recognises that constitutional reform requires careful consideration, broad consultation and national consensus. Accordingly, this paper is presented as a constructive contribution to the Constitutional Review Commission's review process and is intended to assist informed discussion on how Fiji's constitutional framework can continue to evolve in support of good governance, economic resilience, social cohesion and long-term national prosperity.

Priority Constitutional Reforms

While all recommendations contained in this submission are considered important, FICA recognises that constitutional reform is a significant undertaking and may be implemented progressively over time. Accordingly, the Institute considers the following reforms to be of the highest priority in strengthening Fiji's governance framework, democratic institutions, economic resilience and long-term national development:

- Strengthen Governance and Institutional Integrity
- Promote Merit-Based Public Administration
- Review Fiji's Electoral System
- Strengthen Economic Governance and Fiscal Responsibility
- Enhance the National Integrity and Anti-Corruption Framework
- Promote Responsible Citizenship and Civic Responsibility
- Embed Long-Term National Development and Intergenerational Equity

These priority reforms are intended to provide a strong constitutional foundation that supports democratic governance, public confidence, sustainable economic development and a prosperous, resilient and united Fiji for generations to come.

1. Introduction

Background

The Constitutional Review Commission has been established to undertake a comprehensive review of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013) and to consult widely with the people of Fiji on whether the current constitutional framework continues to meet the nation's present and future needs. This review presents an important opportunity for institutions, organisations and citizens to contribute constructive recommendations that support Fiji's continued democratic, social and economic development.

As the statutory body established under the Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants Act to regulate and promote the accountancy profession in Fiji, FICA recognises the close relationship between constitutional governance and economic prosperity. Strong constitutional institutions promote confidence in government, strengthen the rule of law, improve public financial management, encourage domestic and foreign investment, and contribute to sustainable national development.

Accordingly, FICA considers it appropriate to participate in the constitutional review process by providing observations and recommendations that primarily relate to governance, accountability, institutional effectiveness, fiscal responsibility and long-term national development. While the Constitution necessarily encompasses a broad range of political, legal and social issues, this submission focuses on those areas where the Institute's experience in governance, public administration, financial accountability and institutional integrity can contribute meaningfully to the national discussion.

Purpose of this Submission

The Fiji Institute of Chartered Accountants (FICA), as the national professional accountancy body established under the FICA Act, is committed to promoting good governance, accountability, transparency, sound public financial management and sustainable economic development in the public interest.

This submission has been prepared to contribute constructively to the Constitutional Review Commission's review of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013). It sets out FICA's recommendations on constitutional reforms that, in the Institute's view, would strengthen Fiji's governance framework, enhance institutional effectiveness, reinforce the rule of law, support responsible public administration and promote long-term economic resilience and national development.

In developing this submission, consideration has been given to the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013), comparative constitutional practices adopted in jurisdictions including India, Singapore, Australia, New Zealand, Norway, Germany, Canada and Wales, together with internationally recognised principles of good governance, institutional independence, public sector accountability, fiscal sustainability and sustainable development.

While comparative constitutional examples provide useful guidance, the recommendations contained in this submission have been developed with due regard to Fiji's unique constitutional history, democratic traditions, cultural diversity, national values and development priorities. The recommendations are intended to support a modern constitutional framework that promotes national unity, democratic accountability, economic prosperity and the wellbeing of both present and future generations.

Approach Adopted

This submission has been developed around a forward-looking vision that seeks not only to address current governance challenges but also to establish constitutional principles capable of supporting Fiji's long-term prosperity and resilience.

The recommendations are therefore presented under two distinct categories.

Section A identifies provisions within the current Constitution that FICA considers could be strengthened or modernised to improve governance, accountability, transparency, institutional effectiveness and economic resilience.

Section B proposes new constitutional principles that are not presently contained within the 2013 Constitution but which, in FICA's view, would provide additional guidance for future governments and strengthen Fiji's constitutional framework for generations to come.

Collectively, the recommendations are guided by one overarching principle: that Fiji's Constitution should not merely respond to the needs of today, but should also provide a durable framework that protects the interests, opportunities and wellbeing of future generations.

2. Constitutional Vision for Fiji's Future

A constitution is more than a legal document. It is a statement of a nation's values, aspirations and collective vision for the future. It establishes the principles by which a country is governed, defines the relationship between the State and its people, safeguards democratic institutions, and provides the framework within which future generations will live, work and prosper.

The Constitutional Review Commission presents Fiji with a unique opportunity not simply to review existing constitutional provisions, but to consider whether the Constitution remains sufficiently equipped to respond to the opportunities and challenges of the next fifty years. Constitutional reform should therefore extend beyond addressing immediate issues and instead provide a durable framework capable of supporting long-term national development, good governance, economic resilience and social wellbeing.

FICA believes that Fiji's future prosperity will depend not only upon economic growth, but also upon the strength of its public institutions, the confidence of its citizens, the integrity of its governance systems, the responsible management of public resources and the nation's ability to adapt to changing global, technological, environmental and demographic conditions.

The Constitution should therefore provide a clear national direction that encourages governments, regardless of political affiliation, to pursue policies that strengthen institutions, promote responsible public administration, protect constitutional democracy, encourage private sector confidence and invest in the long-term wellbeing of the people of Fiji.

From FICA's perspective, constitutional reform should support the development of a nation that is:

- governed by transparent, accountable and independent public institutions;
- economically resilient, competitive and attractive for responsible investment;
- fiscally responsible and committed to prudent management of public resources;
- committed to merit, professionalism and excellence across the public sector;
