- respectful of the rule of law, constitutional supremacy and judicial independence;
- environmentally responsible and committed to safeguarding natural resources for future generations;
- inclusive and united, recognising Fiji's cultural diversity while strengthening national identity;
- innovative, technologically prepared and responsive to future economic opportunities; and
- committed to improving the quality of life, wellbeing and opportunities available to every citizen.

The Constitution should not merely establish institutions of government; it should also promote a culture of responsible governance. Constitutional provisions should encourage ethical leadership, integrity in public office, transparency in decision-making, evidence-based policy development and accountability for the exercise of public power. Strong constitutional institutions are fundamental to maintaining public confidence, attracting investment and supporting sustainable economic growth.

Equally important is the recognition that national development is not solely measured through economic indicators. A prosperous nation is also characterised by strong families, resilient communities, active citizenship and social cohesion. Many individuals contribute significantly to Fiji's development outside the formal workforce through caregiving, raising children, supporting elderly family members, volunteering within communities and preserving cultural traditions. These contributions are essential to national wellbeing and deserve greater constitutional recognition as part of a modern understanding of sustainable development.

As Fiji continues to experience demographic changes, technological advancement, climate-related challenges and increasing global economic integration, the Constitution should remain sufficiently adaptable to respond to emerging issues while preserving certainty, stability and the rule of law. Constitutional reform should therefore anticipate future challenges rather than merely respond to those of the present.

A central theme of this submission is the principle of intergenerational equity. Decisions made today regarding governance, public finances, infrastructure, education, natural resources and environmental stewardship will shape the opportunities available to future generations. The Constitution should therefore encourage governments to adopt a long-term perspective when exercising public authority and managing national assets, recognising that each generation has a responsibility to leave Fiji stronger than it inherited it.

Accordingly, FICA considers that constitutional reform should seek to achieve three overarching national outcomes.

(a) Stronger Institutions

Independent, transparent and accountable institutions that uphold the Constitution, administer the law fairly and maintain public confidence.

(b) Stronger Economy

A constitutional framework that promotes investment, innovation, fiscal responsibility, productivity, sound public financial management and sustainable economic growth.

(c) Stronger Society

A nation founded upon responsible citizenship, strong families, community participation, equal opportunity, respect for diversity and shared responsibility for the wellbeing of present and future generations.

Ultimately, the Constitution should not be viewed solely as a framework for governing today's Fiji. It should serve as a national covenant that guides the country's development over generations, providing stability while remaining capable of adapting to changing circumstances. Constitutional reform should therefore seek to leave a lasting legacy by strengthening the institutions, values and principles that will shape Fiji's future long after the present generation has passed.

It is in this spirit that FICA respectfully presents the recommendations contained in this submission for consideration by the Constitutional Review Commission. Collectively, they are intended to support the development of a Constitution that promotes good governance, responsible leadership, sustainable economic development and national resilience, while ensuring that Fiji remains a prosperous, inclusive and confident nation for present and future generations.

3. Guiding Principles

The recommendations contained in this submission are founded upon a number of overarching constitutional, governance and public interest principles that, in FICA's view, should guide any future constitutional reforms. Collectively, these principles seek to strengthen Fiji's democratic institutions, enhance public confidence in governance, promote sustainable economic development and ensure that the Constitution remains capable of serving not only the needs of the present generation, but also those of future generations.

The recommendations do not seek to fundamentally alter the democratic foundations of the Constitution. Rather, they seek to strengthen the existing constitutional framework by promoting good governance, institutional resilience, responsible public administration and long-term national prosperity.

Accordingly, FICA considers that the following principles should underpin any future constitutional reforms.

3.1 Constitutional Supremacy and the Rule of Law

The Constitution should continue to remain the supreme law of Fiji and provide a stable legal framework that guarantees equality before the law, protects the separation of powers and upholds the independence of the judiciary and other constitutional institutions.

Public confidence in government is strengthened when all persons and institutions, irrespective of office or status, remain accountable under the Constitution and the law. Constitutional reform should therefore reinforce the principles of legality, due process, transparency and equal application of the law while ensuring that independent oversight institutions possess the authority and autonomy necessary to discharge their constitutional responsibilities effectively.

3.2 Good Governance, Accountability and Institutional Integrity

Good governance is fundamental to public confidence, economic prosperity and democratic stability.

The Constitution should continue to promote transparent, accountable and ethical government through strong institutions, effective parliamentary oversight and independent constitutional offices. Institutions responsible for safeguarding democracy, combating corruption, managing public finances and protecting constitutional rights should be independent, adequately resourced and accountable for the proper exercise of their functions.

Constitutional reforms should strengthen institutional integrity, minimise political interference, promote ethical leadership and reinforce public trust in national institutions.

3.3 Meritocracy and Professional Public Administration

An effective public service is one of the cornerstones of national development.

Appointments, promotions and leadership positions throughout the public service and constitutional institutions should be based upon merit, competence, integrity and demonstrated capability. Constitutional recognition of merit-based public administration would contribute towards a professional, impartial and high-performing civil service capable of delivering efficient public services regardless of changes in political leadership.

Strengthening the constitutional role of the Public Service Commission would further enhance professionalism, institutional continuity and public confidence in Government administration.

3.4 Sustainable Economic Development and National Competitiveness

The Constitution should provide an enabling framework that encourages sustainable economic growth, entrepreneurship, investment, innovation and productivity while ensuring that economic development benefits all citizens.

Constitutional governance should support prudent economic management, encourage private sector confidence, facilitate responsible investment and promote the development of a highly skilled workforce capable of responding to changing global economic conditions.

Long-term national prosperity depends not only upon political stability but also upon constitutional arrangements that encourage productivity, competitiveness and responsible economic stewardship.

3.5 Fiscal Responsibility and Sound Public Financial Management

Responsible management of public finances is essential to maintaining public confidence and protecting future generations.

The Constitution should encourage prudent borrowing, sustainable debt management, transparency in public expenditure and value-for-money investment in national development. Fiscal responsibility should not merely be regarded as a matter of government policy but as an enduring constitutional principle that guides successive governments in managing public resources responsibly.

Embedding principles of fiscal sustainability within the Constitution would contribute to long-term economic resilience while safeguarding the nation's financial position for future generations.

3.6 Intergenerational Equity and Future Generations

One of the defining responsibilities of any Constitution is to safeguard not only the interests of today's citizens but also those who will inherit the nation tomorrow.

Government decisions relating to public finances, natural resources, infrastructure, environmental protection and national development should recognise their long-term consequences for future generations.

FICA considers that the Constitution should expressly recognise the principle of intergenerational equity by encouraging responsible stewardship of the nation's resources, prudent financial management and sustainable development so that future generations inherit a nation that is environmentally, socially and economically stronger than that of today.

3.7 Responsible Citizenship and Civic Responsibility

Constitutional rights are fundamental to every democratic society. However, rights are most effective when accompanied by corresponding responsibilities.

FICA considers that the Constitution should encourage responsible citizenship by recognising the duties of every citizen to respect the Constitution, obey the laws of Fiji, respect the rights and freedoms of others, protect public property, preserve the environment, promote national unity and contribute positively to the nation's economic and social development.

Strengthening civic responsibility would reinforce national cohesion, encourage active participation in democratic processes and foster greater respect for the rule of law.

3.8 Families, Communities and Social Wellbeing

Strong families and resilient communities form the foundation of every successful nation.

The Constitution should recognise the significant contribution made by families, caregivers, volunteers and community organisations in supporting social cohesion, child development, healthy ageing and community resilience.

Recognition of unpaid care work, responsible parenting, community service and volunteerism would acknowledge important contributions to national development that are often overlooked despite their substantial social and economic value.

Constitutional recognition of these contributions would promote a more inclusive understanding of national development and reinforce Fiji's long-standing traditions of communal support and shared responsibility.

3.9 National Unity, Equality and Social Cohesion

Fiji's diversity is one of its greatest strengths.

The Constitution should continue to promote equality, inclusiveness, mutual respect and national unity while recognising and preserving Fiji's unique cultural heritage and the distinct identities of its various communities.

Constitutional reforms should strengthen opportunities for all citizens to participate in national development based upon merit, capability and equal opportunity while fostering mutual respect and shared nationhood.

3.10 A Constitution for the Next Generation

Constitutions should not simply respond to the challenges of the present; they should anticipate the opportunities and challenges of the future.

Accordingly, FICA considers that constitutional reform should be guided by a long-term vision that promotes institutional resilience, economic sustainability, responsible governance and national development over generations rather than electoral cycles.

The recommendations contained in this submission have therefore been developed with the objective of contributing towards a constitutional framework that remains relevant, adaptable and capable of supporting Fiji's continued prosperity, democratic stability and social wellbeing throughout the twenty-first century and beyond.

4. Summary of Recommendations

The Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013) has provided the foundation for democratic governance, the protection of rights and freedoms, and the operation of public institutions over the past decade. As Fiji continues to evolve socially, economically and institutionally, FICA considers that constitutional reform presents an important opportunity to strengthen those foundations while preparing the nation for the opportunities and challenges of future generations.

The recommendations contained in this submission are intended to support the development of a modern constitutional framework that promotes good governance, strengthens public institutions, encourages sustainable economic development, reinforces responsible citizenship and ensures that Fiji remains resilient, competitive and united for generations to come.

The recommendations have been categorised into two broad parts:

- Section A proposes amendments to existing provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013); and
- Section B proposes new constitutional principles that are not presently recognised within the Constitution but which, in FICA's view, would further strengthen Fiji's constitutional framework and contribute to long-term nation-building.

For ease of reference, the recommendations are organised into the following Areas of Reform.

Area of Reform 1
Governance, Accountability and Institutional Integrity
Effective constitutional governance depends upon independent institutions, ethical leadership, transparency and accountability.

The recommendations under this Area of Reform seek to strengthen constitutional institutions responsible for safeguarding democracy, maintaining public confidence and ensuring the responsible exercise of public authority. Particular emphasis is placed on enhancing institutional independence, promoting merit-based public administration, strengthening integrity mechanisms and reinforcing parliamentary oversight.

Key recommendations include:

- strengthening the constitutional values of the State;
- strengthening the Public Service Commission;
- reviewing the constitutional framework governing FICAC;
- strengthening the Auditor-General;

- enhancing the constitutional Code of Conduct;
- strengthening the Electoral Commission; and
- establishing stronger constitutional governance and accountability mechanisms.

Area of Reform 2
Economic Development, Fiscal Sustainability and National Prosperity
A modern Constitution should not only establish democratic institutions but also provide an enabling framework that supports sustainable economic growth, responsible public financial management and long-term national prosperity.

The recommendations under this Area of Reform seek to promote fiscal discipline, encourage investment, strengthen productivity, improve resource governance and support long-term economic resilience while safeguarding the interests of future generations.

Key recommendations include:

- strengthening constitutional public finance principles;
- introducing constitutional fiscal responsibility principles;
- promoting equitable and transparent natural resource governance;
- recognising strategic national infrastructure;
- promoting productivity, innovation and skills development;
- encouraging long-term national development planning; and
- strengthening environmental sustainability.

Area of Reform 3
Democracy, Constitutional Governance and Public Administration
Strong democratic institutions require constitutional arrangements that promote effective representation, public confidence and responsive government.

The recommendations under this Area of Reform seek to improve democratic representation, strengthen constitutional governance and ensure that public administration continues to operate in the public interest.

Key recommendations include:

- reviewing citizenship and naturalisation provisions;
- reviewing electoral representation;
- strengthening democratic accountability;
- reviewing Cabinet arrangements;
- reviewing constitutional amendment procedures; and
- strengthening constitutional oversight institutions.

Area of Reform 4
Families, Responsible Citizenship and Social Wellbeing
Nation-building extends beyond public institutions.

Strong families, responsible citizens, caregivers, volunteers and communities contribute significantly to Fiji's economic, social and cultural wellbeing. These contributions deserve greater constitutional recognition as part of a modern understanding of sustainable national development.

The recommendations under this Area of Reform seek to encourage responsible citizenship while recognising the important contribution of families and communities in supporting social cohesion and national resilience.

Key recommendations include:

- introducing Fundamental Duties of Citizens;
- recognising unpaid care work and family responsibilities;
- recognising the family as the foundation of society;
- protecting the dignity and wellbeing of older persons;
- recognising volunteerism and community service; and
- encouraging active citizenship and civic responsibility.

Area of Reform 5
Future Generations, Sustainability and National Resilience
The Constitution should encourage governments to make decisions that extend beyond immediate priorities and contribute to the long-term wellbeing of the nation.

This Area of Reform reflects one of the central themes of this submission that constitutional reform should leave a lasting legacy by strengthening Fiji for future generations.

The recommendations seek to encourage responsible stewardship of public finances, natural resources, infrastructure and the environment while preparing Fiji to respond effectively to future social, technological, environmental and economic challenges.

Key recommendations include:

- introducing the constitutional principle of intergenerational equity;
- recognising stewardship of national assets for future generations;
- introducing Directive Principles of State Policy;
- strengthening climate resilience;
- promoting digital governance and technological preparedness;
- encouraging long-term infrastructure planning; and
- strengthening national resilience through sustainable constitutional governance.

Overall Outcome Sought

Collectively, the recommendations contained in this submission seek to support the development of a constitutional framework that:

- strengthens democratic governance and institutional independence;
- promotes transparency, accountability and integrity across public institutions;
- encourages responsible public financial management and sustainable economic growth;
- supports innovation, productivity and national competitiveness;
- strengthens responsible citizenship, families and community wellbeing;
- protects Fiji's natural resources and environment;
- promotes long-term planning and sustainable national development; and
- safeguards the interests, opportunities and wellbeing of future generations.

FICA respectfully considers that constitutional reform should not be viewed solely as an exercise in amending legal provisions. Rather, it presents a unique opportunity to reaffirm Fiji's national values, strengthen democratic institutions, encourage responsible governance and establish a constitutional framework capable of supporting a prosperous, resilient and united Fiji for generations to come.

5. Section A – Proposed Amendments to Existing Constitutional Provisions

5.1 Introduction

FICA recognises that the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji (2013) provides the legal and institutional framework upon which Fiji's democracy, governance systems and public administration are founded. The Constitution has played an important role in protecting fundamental rights, defining the powers of the State and establishing independent constitutional institutions.

However, constitutional reform should not be viewed as an exercise in replacing existing constitutional arrangements. Rather, it provides an opportunity to periodically review whether current constitutional provisions continue to reflect the aspirations of the people of Fiji, support effective governance and respond to the changing economic, social and institutional needs of the nation.

FICA therefore considers that the existing constitutional framework should be strengthened where appropriate to improve institutional effectiveness, reinforce public confidence, encourage responsible governance and better prepare Fiji for future challenges.

The recommendations contained in this section are therefore intended to strengthen existing constitutional provisions while preserving the fundamental principles of constitutional democracy, the rule of law and the protection of fundamental rights.

Collectively, the proposed amendments seek to:

- strengthen democratic governance and constitutional institutions;
- improve accountability, transparency and integrity across the public sector;
- promote merit-based public administration;
- strengthen responsible public financial management;
- improve democratic representation and public confidence;
- encourage sustainable economic development;
- strengthen environmental stewardship; and
- ensure that constitutional governance continues to safeguard the interests of present and future generations.
- This section covers Area of Reforms 1, 2 and 3.

Current Constitutional Provision	Subject Matter	Recommended Amendment	Rationale
Preamble	Future Generations	Expand the Preamble to expressly recognise intergenerational responsibility and stewardship of Fiji's natural resources and public assets for present and future generations.	Embeds long-term thinking into constitutional governance and establishes a guiding principle for future legislation and public policy.
Section 1 – Values of the State	Constitutional Values	Include additional constitutional values recognising meritocracy, innovation, national productivity, fiscal responsibility, resilience and intergenerational equity.	Modernises the constitutional values framework and better reflects contemporary governance and development priorities.
Section 5 – Citizenship	Citizenship	Review the constitutional framework governing citizenship by naturalisation to ensure that, in addition to lawful residence and good character, applicants demonstrate a genuine commitment to Fiji through meaningful integration and positive contributions to the nation's economic, social, professional or civic development. Consideration may also be given to an appropriate understanding of Fiji's Constitution, national values and the responsibilities of citizenship, together with reasonable proficiency in an official language. Furthermore, consideration should be given to requiring a minimum period of citizenship before a naturalised citizen becomes eligible to contest parliamentary elections, in place of permanent restrictions, thereby balancing democratic participation with an appropriate period of national integration and civic commitment.	Citizenship is one of the highest privileges a nation can confer and should reflect more than the fulfilment of residency requirements. Strengthening the naturalisation framework would promote meaningful integration, reinforce national identity, encourage long-term commitment to Fiji's development, and ensure that citizenship is granted to individuals who have demonstrated a genuine contribution to the country's future prosperity and wellbeing.
Section 23 – Political Rights	Electoral Eligibility	Review eligibility requirements for candidates seeking election to ensure they support democratic participation while maintaining appropriate standards for public office.	Strengthens confidence in elected representatives while preserving democratic rights.

Sections 53–56	Electoral System	Review Fiji's current electoral system to determine whether it continues to provide the most appropriate balance between fairness, accountability and effective democratic representation. As part of that review, the Constitutional Review Commission should consider alternative electoral models, including a constituency-based electoral system or a mixed-member electoral system combining constituency representation with proportional representation. The objective should be to strengthen the connection between Members of Parliament and the communities they serve while preserving fair and inclusive national representation. Should constituency representation be adopted, constituency boundaries should be determined using objective criteria such as population, geography and communities of shared interest, rather than ethnicity, thereby promoting equality, national unity and fair representation for all citizens. The review should also consider whether the electoral framework encourages the election of representatives based on their integrity, capability, commitment to public service and the confidence of the communities they represent, rather than ethnic affiliation or other divisive considerations. Consideration should also be given to whether the current electoral framework provides equitable opportunities for both political party candidates and independent candidates to secure parliamentary representation based on the support they receive from the electorate.	A periodic review of the electoral system is consistent with good democratic governance and helps ensure that it continues to meet Fiji's evolving needs. An electoral framework that strengthens accountability between elected representatives and their communities, enables voters to clearly identify their representatives, promotes equality of opportunity for candidates, and encourages the election of representatives based on integrity, capability and public confidence rather than ethnic affiliation will strengthen democratic governance, national unity and public trust in Parliament.

Section 58	Term of Parliament	Review the current four-year parliamentary term to determine whether extending the maximum term to five years would better promote policy continuity, long-term national planning and effective implementation of government programmes, while preserving democratic accountability through regular elections.	A five-year parliamentary term is adopted in a number of parliamentary democracies and may provide greater continuity for long-term policy implementation, national development planning and major infrastructure projects, while reducing the frequency and cost of general elections. Any extension should, however, maintain an appropriate balance between effective governance and regular democratic accountability
Sections 75–76	Electoral Commission	Strengthen appointment processes and institutional independence of the Electoral Commission.	Reinforces public confidence in electoral administration and democratic processes.
Sections 91–96	Cabinet	Provide for a constitutionally prescribed maximum number of Cabinet Ministers, reflecting the portfolios necessary for the effective administration of Government. In exceptional circumstances, permit the appointment of a limited number of suitably qualified persons from outside Parliament as Ministers where specialised expertise is required and no suitably qualified Member of Parliament is available, subject to parliamentary approval, accountability and any other safeguards prescribed by law.	Promotes an efficient and cost-effective Cabinet structure while ensuring that Government has access to specialised expertise where required. The proposal strengthens good governance by balancing democratic accountability with the flexibility to appoint highly qualified professionals to key ministerial portfolios in exceptional circumstances.
Sections 115 & 121	FICAC	Review the constitutional framework governing the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption to strengthen its governance, accountability and public confidence. Consider establishing FICAC as an independent investigative agency within the Fiji Police Force framework, while assigning the responsibility for all prosecutions to the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions. The appointment, reporting and oversight arrangements should also be reviewed to reinforce transparency, accountability and operational effectiveness.	Clarifies the separation between investigative and prosecutorial functions, aligns with established criminal justice principles, strengthens institutional accountability and enhances public confidence in the integrity and independence of anti-corruption investigations and prosecutions.

Sections 118 & 13–15	Legal Aid	Retain the constitutional right to legal assistance while undertaking a comprehensive review of the Legal Aid framework to ensure the efficient, equitable and sustainable use of public resources. Consider alternative service delivery models, including the greater utilisation of private legal practitioners under a State-funded legal aid scheme, strengthened means-testing, mandatory client contributions based on financial capacity, and cost recovery mechanisms where appropriate. "The objective of this recommendation is not to diminish the constitutional right to legal representation, but to ensure that public funds are utilised efficiently. The Constitutional Review Commission may wish to consider whether legal aid services are best delivered through a dedicated statutory authority or through an accredited panel of private legal practitioners reimbursed by the State at prescribed rates. Such a model could reduce administrative overheads, expand access to legal representation across Fiji, and encourage greater accountability and cost-effectiveness, while maintaining appropriate safeguards for persons who genuinely cannot afford legal representation."	Preserves access to justice while promoting fiscal responsibility, value for money and efficient use of taxpayer-funded resources. A diversified service delivery model may reduce administrative overheads, improve access to legal representation throughout Fiji, support the private legal profession, and ensure that public funding is directed to those with genuine financial need while requiring beneficiaries to contribute where reasonably able.
Sections 125–127	Public Service Commission	Expand constitutional responsibilities of the PSC to oversee merit-based recruitment, promotions, examinations, discipline and ethical standards across the public service.	Strengthens professionalism, integrity and capability throughout the civil service.
Sections 151–152	Auditor-General	Require timely parliamentary consideration of audit reports together with mandatory government responses to significant findings.	Improves accountability, transparency and implementation of audit recommendations.

Sections 139–148	Public Finance	Introduce constitutional principles supporting balanced budgets, fiscal sustainability, prudent debt management and long-term infrastructure investment.	Encourages responsible financial management and safeguards fiscal stability for future generations.
Section 30	Natural Resource Royalties	Replace fixed royalty concepts with constitutional principles promoting equitable, transparent and sustainable benefit-sharing based on economic returns.	Provides greater flexibility while ensuring fair distribution of national resource wealth.
Section 40	Environment	Strengthen constitutional protection for biodiversity, climate resilience and sustainable development for present and future generations.	Aligns Fiji's Constitution with evolving international environmental governance standards.
Section 149	Code of Conduct	Strengthen integrity obligations through enhanced asset declarations, conflict-of-interest provisions and post-public employment restrictions.	Promotes ethical governance and strengthens public trust in public office holders.
Chapter 11	Constitutional Amendment Process	Review amendment procedures to ensure constitutional reform remains achievable while maintaining appropriate safeguards against arbitrary change.	Provides constitutional stability while allowing future reforms to respond to changing national needs.

6. Section B – Proposed New Constitutional Principles for Fiji's Future

6.1 Introduction

While the recommendations contained in Section A seek to strengthen existing constitutional provisions, FICA considers that the Constitutional Review Commission also presents a unique opportunity to consider whether the Constitution should recognise new constitutional principles that reflect the evolving needs and aspirations of Fiji.

Since the adoption of the 2013 Constitution, Fiji has continued to experience significant social, economic, environmental and technological change. Increasing global interconnectedness, climate change, demographic shifts, rapid technological advancement, changing workforce expectations and evolving governance standards present new challenges that were not contemplated to the same extent when the current Constitution was enacted.

Accordingly, FICA considers that constitutional reform should not be limited to reviewing existing provisions alone. It should also provide an opportunity to introduce constitutional principles that strengthen the nation's long-term resilience, promote sustainable development and establish a clear constitutional vision capable of guiding future governments and future generations.

The recommendations contained in this section are therefore intended to complement, rather than replace, the existing constitutional framework. They seek to establish enduring constitutional principles that encourage responsible governance, strengthen national development, recognise important contributions to society that are presently under-recognised, and ensure that Fiji remains well positioned to respond to future opportunities and challenges.

Collectively, these recommendations seek to:

- encourage long-term national planning;
- strengthen responsible citizenship;
- promote sustainable economic development;
- recognise the contribution of families and communities;
- strengthen ethical governance;
- prepare Fiji for technological and demographic change;
- reinforce stewardship of natural resources; and
- embed the principle that constitutional governance should always consider the interests of future generations.
- This section covers Area of Reforms 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5.

Proposed Constitutional Principle	Current Position	Recommendation	Rationale	Comparative Jurisdictions
Fundamental Duties of Citizens	The Constitution provides extensive rights but does not prescribe civic responsibilities.	Introduce a chapter outlining the responsibilities of every citizen to uphold the Constitution, obey the laws of Fiji, protect public property, preserve the environment, respect the rights of others, promote racial harmony, respect indigenous cultures, participate in democratic processes, and contribute positively to national development.	A Constitution should balance rights with responsibilities. Encouraging responsible citizenship strengthens national unity, social cohesion and respect for the rule of law.	India (Article 51A)
Directive Principles of State Policy	No constitutional framework guiding long-term public policy objectives.	Introduce constitutional principles requiring Governments to promote employment, education, agriculture, food security, innovation, digital transformation, rural development, public health, housing, climate resilience and sustainable economic growth.	Provides long-term national policy direction while allowing future Governments flexibility in implementation.	India, Ireland, Nepal
Future Generations and Intergenerational Equity	Sustainability is recognised generally but there is no constitutional obligation to consider future generations.	Require the State to manage public finances, natural resources, environmental assets and strategic infrastructure in trust for present and future generations.	Encourages long-term decision-making and responsible stewardship of national assets.	Norway, Wales
National Development Commission	No constitutional requirement for long-term national planning.	Establish an independent constitutional commission responsible for preparing and periodically reviewing a rolling National Development Plan with a 20-year planning horizon.	Promotes policy continuity, infrastructure planning and national development beyond electoral cycles.	Singapore

National Integrity Framework	Integrity provisions exist in separate institutions but are not integrated.	Introduce a constitutional framework covering ethics, conflicts of interest, whistleblower protection, procurement integrity, lobbying transparency and public sector accountability.	Strengthens public confidence in government institutions and promotes ethical leadership.	OECD and Commonwealth practice
Digital Governance & Data Protection	The Constitution does not address digital governance.	Recognise principles relating to personal data protection, cybersecurity, digital government, artificial intelligence and responsible use of emerging technologies.	Future-proofs the Constitution against technological developments.	Estonia, Singapore
Climate Change and National Resilience	Environmental rights exist but climate resilience is not specifically recognised.	Require the State to prepare for climate change, strengthen disaster resilience, protect coastal communities and promote renewable energy.	Reflects Fiji's vulnerability as a Small Island Developing State.	Various modern environmental constitutions
National Productivity, Innovation and Skills Development	Education is recognised but national productivity is not.	Require the State to promote quality education, technical and vocational education and training (TVET), science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM) education, entrepreneurship, research, innovation and lifelong learning to enhance national productivity, competitiveness and sustainable economic development.	Strengthens Fiji's human capital by encouraging the development of a highly skilled and innovative workforce capable of responding to technological advancement, economic diversification and future labour market demands.	Singapore, South Korea
Constitutional Appointments Commission	Appointment powers are dispersed among institutions.	Establish an independent Constitutional Appointments Commission responsible for recommending appointments to key constitutional offices based on merit, competence and integrity.	Enhances institutional independence and public confidence.	Commonwealth best practice

Fiscal Responsibility Principles	Public finance provisions exist but there are no overarching fiscal principles.	Introduce constitutional principles promoting prudent borrowing, sustainable debt, balanced budgets (subject to emergencies), transparency and intergenerational fiscal responsibility.	Protects future generations from unsustainable public debt and strengthens fiscal discipline.	Germany, New Zealand
Strategic National Infrastructure and Public Interest Development	The Constitution protects property rights and environmental interests but does not establish guiding constitutional principles for the planning and implementation of nationally significant public infrastructure or the relocation of affected communities where necessary.	Introduce constitutional principles recognising the State's responsibility to plan, develop and maintain strategic public infrastructure that promotes national development and economic prosperity. Where nationally significant projects require the acquisition of land or the relocation of affected communities, the Constitution should require transparent decision-making, meaningful consultation, independent assessment, fair and timely compensation, protection of cultural heritage and the environment, appropriate resettlement arrangements, and compliance with due process under the law.	Supports sustainable economic growth through the timely delivery of nationally significant infrastructure while safeguarding the rights, livelihoods, cultural heritage and wellbeing of affected communities. Establishes a balanced constitutional framework that promotes development in the public interest while ensuring transparency, fairness, accountability and environmental stewardship.
Recognition of Unpaid Care Work and Family Responsibilities	The Constitution recognises rights relating to work, education, health and social security but does not expressly recognise the economic and social contribution of unpaid care work.	Recognise the social and economic value of unpaid care work, family responsibilities and community service. Require the State to endeavour to develop policies that support caregivers, strengthen families and promote the wellbeing of children, older persons and vulnerable members of society.	Acknowledges an often-overlooked contribution to national wellbeing and economic productivity while supporting inclusive social policy. The provision should be gender-neutral and recognise all caregivers.	Ireland; South Africa; Colombia Mexico; CEDAW
Rights and Dignity of Older Persons	No specific constitutional recognition of the rights	Recognise that older persons have the right to live in dignity, security and respect, and require the State to take reasonable measures to protect them from neglect,	Responds to Fiji's ageing population and promotes healthy	South Africa; Brazil; Bolivia and wellbeing of older persons.	abuse and exploitation while promoting their participation in family, community and national life.	ageing, social inclusion and protection of vulnerable persons.

Protection of Families	Although individual rights are protected, there is no overarching constitutional recognition of the family as the fundamental unit of society.	Recognise the family as the fundamental unit of society and encourage policies that strengthen families, responsible parenting, child development, caregiving responsibilities and the dignity of all family members.	Supports social cohesion, child wellbeing and stronger communities while complementing the proposed Fundamental Duties of Citizens.	Commonwealth constitutional practice
Community Service and Volunteerism	Volunteerism and civic participation are not expressly recognised.	Recognise volunteerism, community service and civic participation as important contributors to national development and social cohesion, reflecting Fiji's traditions of solesolevaki and community support.	Encourages active citizenship, strengthens community resilience and recognises voluntary contributions that underpin national development.	International good governance practice

7. Priority Constitutional Reforms

While all recommendations contained in this submission are considered important, FICA recognises that constitutional reform is a significant undertaking and may be implemented progressively over time. Accordingly, the Institute considers that the following reforms represent the highest priorities for strengthening Fiji's governance framework, democratic institutions, economic resilience and long-term national development.

These priority reforms are intended to provide a strong constitutional foundation that supports responsible governance, public confidence and sustainable prosperity for present and future generations.

Priority Area	Recommendation	Strategic Importance
1. Strengthening Governance and Institutional Integrity	Strengthen the constitutional independence, accountability and effectiveness of key institutions including the Public Service Commission, FICAC, the Auditor-General, the Electoral Commission and the constitutional Code of Conduct.	Strong institutions are the cornerstone of democratic governance, public confidence and the rule of law. Independent and accountable institutions provide continuity, integrity and stability regardless of changes in government.
2. Merit-Based Public Administration	Strengthen the constitutional role of the Public Service Commission to oversee merit-based recruitment, competitive examinations, promotions, leadership development and professional standards across the public service.	A capable and politically impartial public service improves service delivery, strengthens institutional continuity and supports effective implementation of government policy.
3. Democratic Representation and Electoral Reform	Review the current electoral system to determine whether a mixed-member electoral model combining constituency representation with proportional representation would improve democratic accountability, accessibility and representation while preserving equality and national unity.	Democratic systems should provide fair representation while ensuring elected representatives remain closely connected to the communities they serve.
4. Sustainable Economic Governance and Fiscal Responsibility	Introduce constitutional principles promoting prudent public financial management, sustainable debt, fiscal responsibility, long-term national planning and transparent management of public resources.	Sound economic governance strengthens investor confidence, supports sustainable development and protects future generations from unsustainable financial obligations.
5. National Integrity and Anti-Corruption Framework	Review the constitutional framework governing FICAC and introduce a broader National Integrity Framework that promotes ethical leadership, transparency,	Integrity in public administration is fundamental to maintaining public confidence, attracting investment and accountability and effective anti-corruption measures across the public sector.	ensuring accountability in the exercise of public power.

6. Responsible Citizenship and Civic Responsibility	Introduce constitutional recognition of the duties of citizens to uphold the Constitution, obey the law, respect the rights of others, protect public property, preserve the environment and contribute positively to national development.	Strong democracies depend not only on constitutional rights but also on responsible citizenship, civic participation and respect for the rule of law.
7. Long-Term National Development and Future Generations	Introduce constitutional principles recognising intergenerational equity, stewardship of national assets and the establishment of a long-term National Development Commission to support strategic planning beyond electoral cycles.	Governments should be encouraged to consider the long-term consequences of decisions affecting public finances, infrastructure, natural resources and national development to ensure that future generations inherit a stronger and more resilient Fiji.

8. A Legacy for Future Generations

The Constitution of the Republic of Fiji is more than the supreme law of the nation. It is the enduring framework that defines the relationship between the State and its people, establishes the principles upon which democratic governance is exercised and provides the foundation upon which future generations will continue to build their lives.

Constitutional reform should therefore be viewed not merely as an opportunity to review existing legal provisions, but as a once-in-a-generation opportunity to reaffirm Fiji's national values, strengthen public institutions and establish a constitutional framework capable of guiding the nation through future economic, social, technological and environmental change.

Throughout this submission, FICA has sought to present recommendations that extend beyond individual constitutional amendments. Collectively, the recommendations seek to promote a constitutional framework that encourages responsible governance, strengthens democratic institutions, supports sustainable economic development, reinforces public confidence and recognises the shared responsibility of all citizens in contributing to national development.

The recommendations also recognise that successful nation-building depends upon more than government institutions alone. Families, caregivers, volunteers, community organisations, businesses and civil society all contribute significantly to Fiji's prosperity and resilience. A modern Constitution should therefore acknowledge these contributions while encouraging governments to develop policies that strengthen families, support vulnerable members of society and promote responsible citizenship.

Equally important is the recognition that constitutional governance must increasingly adopt a long-term perspective. Decisions relating to public finances, natural resource management, infrastructure, education, climate resilience and institutional development have consequences that extend well beyond the present generation. FICA therefore believes that the Constitution should encourage governments to exercise stewardship over the nation's resources and institutions in a manner that protects the interests of those who will inherit Fiji in the decades to come.

The recommendations contained in this submission are guided by five overarching Areas of Reform:

- strengthening governance, accountability and institutional integrity;
- promoting sustainable economic development and fiscal responsibility;
- reinforcing democratic governance and effective public administration;
- recognising the importance of responsible citizenship, families and community wellbeing; and
- embedding the principles of sustainability, resilience and intergenerational equity within Fiji's constitutional framework.

Collectively, these recommendations are intended to support the development of a Constitution that not only protects rights and establishes institutions but also provides a clear national direction that encourages integrity, innovation, resilience, opportunity and long-term prosperity.

FICA acknowledges that constitutional reform is ultimately a matter for the people of Fiji. The Institute does not suggest that constitutional change should be pursued for its own sake. Rather, any amendment should be carefully considered, widely consulted upon and assessed against one fundamental question:

Will this strengthen Fiji for present and future generations?

Where the answer is yes, constitutional reform presents an opportunity to leave a lasting legacy for the nation.

Looking Beyond the Present

Every generation inherits a nation shaped by the decisions of those who came before it.

Likewise, every generation bears a responsibility to ensure that the institutions, laws and governance frameworks it leaves behind provide greater opportunity, stronger public confidence and improved quality of life for those who follow.

Constitutional reform should therefore not be measured solely by the number of provisions amended, but by the strength of the institutions created, the confidence inspired in the people, the resilience of the economy and the opportunities made available to future generations.

In this regard, FICA respectfully submits that the Constitutional Review Commission has a unique opportunity to develop a constitutional framework that continues to protect democratic governance while preparing Fiji to meet the challenges and opportunities of the twenty-first century and beyond.

8. Final Reflection

The recommendations contained in this submission have been developed with one enduring objective:

To contribute towards a Constitution that is principled enough to preserve the values that define Fiji today, yet progressive enough to prepare Fiji for the opportunities and challenges of tomorrow.

FICA believes that constitutional reform should leave a legacy by strengthening public institutions, promoting responsible governance, encouraging sustainable economic development and recognising the shared responsibility of all citizens in building a prosperous, inclusive and resilient nation.

Ultimately, a Constitution should not merely govern the Fiji of today it should shape the Fiji that future generations will inherit.

Professor Steven Ratuva
Date: 8-7-2026

Mr. Ratuva: Good morning. Hello. Yeah, I can hear you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Are you able to hear me? I call the Zoom meeting or Zoom consultation to order now. You can see us through that screen that you might have in front of you. I am here in the center as chairperson. And on my left, the immediate left, is Mr. Conway, Conway Beg. And on the far end is Dr. John Fatiaki. To my right is Mr. Ami Kohli, a lawyer in Labasa. And on the far right is Dr. Neelesh Gounder. And I'm, as you know, Mr. Sevuloni Valenitabua. These are the commissioners which are here this morning.

And thank you very much for accepting this Zoom meeting or Zoom consultation. I'm sure you know what our task is, as has been given to us by His Excellency the President. We are to review the 2013 Constitution. And we are hearing submissions from our people, and from some overseas. We've had a number of Zoom meetings. The latest was yesterday afternoon.

Now, this morning, we have you. And we are pleased to have you online right now to give us some views, some of your suggestions, some of your recommendations in relation to what we may add to the 2013 amended Constitution. That does not exclude us from removing some of the provisions. And you might want to give us recommendations on which provisions we may remove. So, without further ado, I will now hand over to you so that you can address us this morning. We have an hour. And please, carry on. We give you the mic now. You can proceed.

Mr. Ratuva: Welcome. Greetings from cold New Zealand. I know it's nice and warm in Suva. This opportunity is great to meet some old friends. And we haven't seen each other for a long time. And I hope that our discussion today will be fruitful. I hope the system is good enough. There is an interruption in the network or whatever we call it in the system.

Mr. Valenitabua: So... Mr. Ratuva, could you... Let's try this. Could you switch off your video, please? Might assist with the audio. Oh, OK. Can you hear us? Can you hear us? Hello? Yeah, can you hear us?

Mr. Ratuva: Yes, I can hear you.

Mr. Valenitabua: All right, please proceed. I can hear you. We can hear you, too. Please proceed. OK, good.

Mr. Ratuva: So, in that case, I'll... I'll... I'll speak something which... And, of course, for constitutional making, there are a number of things we basically focus on. That is, how do we make the future better? And how do we make sure that the governance... Can you hear me?

Mr .Valenitabua We have just come online. We did hear your introductions and all that.

Mr. Ratuva: Could you please start again, if you may? OK, let me try another system here.

Mr. Valenitabua: We are hearing you clearly.

Mr. Ratuva: OK. So, can I... So, I start again?

Mr. Valenitabua: Yes, please.

Mr. Ratuva: OK. Yeah, thank you so much for this opportunity, and thank you so much for the chance to share with you some of the thoughts which I have in terms of the constitutional process moving forward.

My presentation will be basically in two parts. One is the bigger picture of the constitution-making, and perhaps some of it I can provide you with to guide you, some of the things that you're probably doing, putting together the final draft. And I know it's not an easy task. I know that you've been working very, very hard. Thank you so much for the great work you've been doing. You've been excellent.

And, of course, the country relies on you. In terms of moving things forward. The second part will be basically looking at taking on some of these more specific aspects of past constitutions, the current constitutions, and what we probably might need to look at in the future in terms of the new constitution, because the world is changing.

Our society is changing. There have been layers and layers of issues, as we know, as we speak, in the judiciary, in the political arena, in the civil service. Every time you read the papers, there are all kinds of issues.

So how do we address some of those issues moving forward? And, of course, we have a history of political instability, of course, in the past. And how do we look at the past and look at the present and look at the future in terms of what we're going to do? Now, I don't have any written presentation. It's all just a verbal one, because I have no time to write, because I'm writing so many things at the moment.

So, it's going to be specifically you recording it or just writing things down. So, it's certainly something which it's up to you how you deal with it. Now, so first of all, particularly in the context of modern constitution-making, it's always useful to use multiple lenses.

I've been watching and listening to some of the presentations that have gone through. Of course, we expect people to come with their personal, their community-based, their culture-based, their professional-based views and how they want to see themselves in the constitution, whether it's to do with land, whether it's to do with security, and so forth. Now, that is fine.

But I suppose from the point of view of the commission, it's important to see the process using multiple lenses. And we'll go through very, very quickly some of those lenses with which you can use or we can use to identify certain things which really are crucial in terms of constitution-making, particularly in modern-day constitution-making. Different countries have come up with different ways of framing new constitutions. And I'm sure you must have thought up new ways of doing that as well. Now, it's like wearing glasses. Every time when you wear red glasses, the world looks red.

When you wear dark glasses, the world looks dark. When you wear blue glasses, the world looks blue. So, it's like... So that's where those lenses which people use, they only see things in terms of where they are.

So, I suppose from the bigger picture, those multiple lenses are important across the board. Now, so there are about 15 lens components. The check-and-balance setup, there's the different organs of the state, the district, state, and civil service provide that stability.

And what kind of stability? I'll talk about some of those in detail later. And so, the governance lens is very, very significant here, especially looking at the problems in Fiji at the moment. There's a lot of issues in relation to governance.

There's a lot of issues all across the board. And then when you see layers and layers of things playing out, the second one is the security lenses. Is the constitution sufficient in terms of the security footprints to make sure that we have a more stable future? Because we've had an insecure past since 87, and then we had a series of coups.

And we continue in a presentation which I gave in Fiji, I talked about, was it October last year, when I organized the UNDP. Some of you may have been there at the GPH. I talked about the long tail in terms of impact, in terms of the psychological impact, the trauma, in terms of the institutional impact on the judiciary, on the political system that's still with us.

So now it's like the river. When all this debris comes down the river, and then they get caught up at some point, and then they pile up. So, we are in the process of piling up at the moment.

So, the issue of security lenses is very important to make sure that we don't go through some of the security issues. And there are different ways in which you do the constitutional check and balances for long-term security of the country. The third lens is the ethics and integrity lens.

This is very, very significant, because the constitution should not only be looking at institutions, and not only be looking at processes, also behavior. The ethics and integrity lens is something which, again, unfolding in front of us, happening in Fiji, and of course over the years. And how do you make sure that people are accountable? How do you make sure that politicians behave in a particular way? How do you make sure that the executives behave in particular ways? So, some of these things need to be in the constitutional process, so that ultimately that will be, if you like, the point at which people blink to for redress.

And the fourth lens is the social justice lens. This is very significant. I think in the 1997 constitution, they had that as well, social justice.

The issues of gender equality, for instance, the children and the vulnerable, and their rights, how do you address some of those? I'll come to social justice later when I begin to look at some of the more specific examples. For instance, I'll come to that later. So social justice, depending on the constitution, make sure that people are protected.

It's a protective mechanism to make sure they're not vulnerable to political predators, to corporate predators, to exploitation of cheap labor, exploitation of human trafficking and all those things which are happening. So, it's important to protect the lives of citizens. And then the fifth is the well-being lens, to do with health, to do with some constitutions actually have happiness as part of their, some have what they have means to happiness, to make sure that the citizens enjoy the well-being which they need to.

And, of course, in Fiji we have the issue of drug, of crime, which undermine the well-being of people. And this is where the constitution, and I'll put together a framework which I sent to the UNDP, also the police in relation to how to address the drug issue. There's a team who put together experts.

These are Fiji experts overseas and also locally. At the moment, the process is basically one-dimensional to do with law enforcement, when in fact it's much more complex. So, the constitutional mechanisms, the framework, is very important long-term in terms of well-being for the youth, for the health, because they're all interconnected in various ways.

The sixth lens is the equality and equity lens. Again, some of the constitution, the 1997 constitution in particular, tried to address that, but not so well. The 2013 constitution had a different way of looking at that.

In fact, it took it away. Because that's very, very significant here, because many, particularly new constitutions in the world, they make sure that they have footprints of addressing inequality, of equity, in different ways. Because that's significant in certain ways.

One is a way of addressing conflict, because inequality, there's a lot of research to show that inequality actually contributes to conflict, contributes to destabilization. And I think it's very, very important that if you look at the coups in the past, some of the issues which came up was to do with inequality in terms of business, in terms of wealth, and so forth. And you've seen that playing out in different countries in the world with a lot of tensions.

In fact, civil wars in Washington, all those have to do with access to resources, to do with opportunities. And they play out in political ways, because socioeconomic inequality, for instance, can easily be translated into political grievances, and that will explode at some point. And we've seen bits of that in the past.

So, it's important for the Constitution to see where it can address some of those. Now, the other one which is closely connected to that is diversity and inclusion lenses. So, we have to make sure that inclusion, particularly in relation to the sustainable development goals of the United Nations, which Fiji has signed up to, that they leave no one behind.

It's still there, and the politicians have been using it. But in a very highly politicized way, and I'll talk about it in more detail later, there are minorities in Fiji who have always been outside the Constitution group or commission. They might not like the small islanders that you have, the civil islanders that you have, all those little groups, small, sorry, minorities.

Often, the focus is on the individuals in the Philippines. So how do we include? What are the inclusion processes? And also inclusion in terms of gender, and also inclusion in terms of those who are most vulnerable. It's very, very important for the Constitution to have some of those.

Now, the eighth one is the identity lenses. Now, this is a controversial bit because all constitutions have been trying to grapple with that in different ways. Like in New Zealand, for instance, when they do the – I was part of the national statistical process of definition of different ethnic groups.

It's not easy to do that because you have what sociologists call in-group definition and what they're all exposed to, out-group definition, in-group definition, how the group itself defines itself. And out-group definition is how others define you. So, there's always sometimes there's congruence between them.

Sometimes there's conflict between them. And we see that playing out in 15 different ways. I'll talk about that later because I notice that a lot of submissions have to do with that, the identity issue. It's really important. At the same time, identity can be unified. At the same time, it can be destabilizing.

At the same time, it can be disuniting, fracturing, particularly when – especially when the space within which we're trying to get them together is not conducive to unity. We'll talk about that later in some detail. So at some point, the constitution must have identity lenses, making sure that people are comfortable with the idea of who they are and how – because that is not just a label.

I think the constitutions in the past have used very, very artificial labels. The 1990 constitution, the 1970 constitution, for instance, which is Indian, Fijian, and others, they put it in a box and collect it in New Zealand, Pacific Islanders. They put everybody in a box and say Pacific Islanders or Pacifica.

And then we say, no, no, no, no. We have distinctive identities. We are not just – the other – the ninth lens is the human rights lens.

Is there – are there human rights footprints to protect people's rights? That's fundamental to any constitution in the world anyway, the old constitutions and the new constitutions. But then the question is how do you define human rights in the context of Fiji? That's been very, very contested. On one hand are those who argue that human rights is an individual right.

And there are others who say that human rights is linked to a whole lot of things like gender rights, linked to communal rights. There's always this tension, particularly between – in the minds of legal scholars and sociologists and political scientists, there's a relationship between individual and communal identity and rights. So how do you ensure that these different kinds of rights do not step on each other's toes and therefore cause a bit of commotion? Well, the tenth lens has to do with prosperity, the prosperity lens.

Some constitutions now, today they focus on things like development. They focus on things like growth. But growth is being defined as inclusive growth rather than just growth, so that this way inequality and equality and equity comes in, and how you make sure that growth is something which benefits the whole country rather than just certain individuals.

And then that's where the issue of land comes in as well, because land is very, very significant. I noticed that a number of submissions have to do with land. Now, in the case of Fiji, there have been – I'll look at that in more detail later when we come to looking at some of those specific aspects, because I think it's very significant to understand not only where people are coming from but also how we make sure that the issue of prosperity, often prosperity means that some people get richer than others, and that can be a cause of conflict as well, and how do you make sure that prosperity becomes not just a constitutional concept but also applied in a way which is inclusive, which is – which generates a range of benefits, which is for the country altogether.

Now, the left one is the national unity lens. Again, that's where a lot of constitutions try to do that, and a lot of constitutions fail as well. They have provisions for national unity, but sometimes when you try to put together mechanisms for national unity, they can actually lead to the opposite.

It depends very much on the circumstances. Constitutions themselves are supposed to lead to national unity, but sometimes the way people use it and they interpret that can actually lead to the opposite. So that's an area which we have to be careful of, and certainly the footprints of national unity.

In different way, it's not just a statement, but has to be embedded not just in some of the normative narratives and what we call rhetoric, but also embedded in the structures which we build in the constitutional process. The other lens which has been absent from previous constitutions, which some constitutions in the world actually in recent years have tried to use, is the conflict resolution lens, because politics is politics. Society, at some point, the conditions to do with development, or the circumstances leading to conflict, and how do you address some of these conflicts? Our constitutions, 2013, even the 2019 constitutions, they don't have those.

So there has to be explicit conflict resolution measures within the constitution in terms of conflict within, between, let's say, the judiciary and the executive, for instance, or between parliament and the military, for instance. These things have happened in the past, and we didn't know what to do. So the constitutional measures to ensure that we address some of these in a very conscious way, because we've been through it since 1987.

There are conflicts everywhere within the state system. And now we try to do conflict resolution outside the constitutional process through the goodwill of people, when in fact there shouldn't be any constitutional measures that we can use as well. Now, the other lens which is also missing, which a lot of new constitutions are using now, is to do with sustainability, because that's a very significant now, because the UN Sustainability Project Sustainable Development Goals, all countries in the world are supposed to sign up to it, and yet Fiji is not doing very well.

The Pacific is not doing very well. And the world, of course, is sort of because of the conflict, because of the poverty, because of all this. So, some European, especially as a result of climate change, Fiji is very much in the Pacific.

So as a result of the growing fear of the impact of climate change, the sustainability aspect of some constitutions are very specific about what you want to do. And that is very important now, especially when, remember that the International Court of Justice that made a ruling that states are going to be responsible for the kinds of activities they do, which cause damage to the environment. And, of course, that started off with some war students from Vanuatu, but then went up to the United Nations and passed that, and then went up to ICJ.

So, Fiji was signatory to that. So, some new constitutions, particularly the Constitution of Wales, are trying to get that into their constitutions as well, just to make sure that Fiji is a big one. You know, every time there's a big category 5 cyclone, category 4 cyclone, category 3 cyclone, we're in a big mess.

Our economy is in a mess. And then we spend so much resources trying to address it. So it's so important, so significant, that we need to have a constitutional framework to do with sustainability to address some of these issues, because it impacts stability, it impacts on poverty, it impacts on people's well-being.

So it's important we have that as well. Now, the other lens is to do with intergenerational lens, looking at the future. A lot of the constitutions that we've had is basically just looking at the now.

What do we do now? And I think it's important for us to look at how to transform, and therefore it is assumed that if we keep the stability now, the future will take care of itself. That's not often the case. In fact, for instance, the last constitution, which had a very rigid amendment, a clause, assumes that a particular document is going to be there forever, and then give us a lot of problems, a lot of headaches.

What do we do? We can't follow the prescribed process of amendment. There's some way to court to do it, and then to parliament, and so forth. So that's one of the dilemmas, as you know.

So, we have to have a futuristic view. What will it be like in the future? How transformative is this constitution? And how do we adapt to the changes? The world is changing very, very fast, faster than we think. By the time we finish writing a constitution and addressing some problems, the world has moved on, and then we keep trying to catch up.

So some of the work that I do with a number of international organizations basically has to do with catching up with SDG now. We'll talk about that later. And, of course, the last lenses that the constitution should have is the accountability and responsibility lenses.

Now, that's very, very important because it's a science to adapt to all these changing circumstances. So I'm trying to look at my watch. I don't want to be speaking forever.

Academics tend to go on, going blah, blah, blah, endlessly. Now, those are the 15 lenses that I think would be good, particularly when you finish your draft, and use those lenses to see where they are. And, of course, as you're doing this, as people bring in their consultation, you may add other lenses as well, just to cross-check, just to make sure that you're on a number of things.

One is based on the broader interest of the nation. People will come in, basically a reference, and if there's a national interest, a community interest, but I think it's important for the commission to look at the bigger national interest. Now, let me look at some of the detail.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Ratuva, It's about 11.39 now. Are we okay with time? We are to finish before 11, please. Before 12.

Mr. Ratuva: Sorry, I can't hear you.

Mr. Valenitabua: We are to finish before 12. We are on 11.39. Can we finish before 12? We are to finish before 12?

Mr. Ratuva: Okay, sure. Maybe we can finish, maybe try to finish, maybe, say, 11.45? Yeah, 11.45, if you have any questions. Yes.

Mr. Valenitabua: We could have some questions from you.

Mr. Ratuva: Let me quickly go through the last bits. Now, those are the broad lenses. We can choose on some issues, which I think, you know, out of those lenses, it's not in any order whatsoever.

It's quite random, and how we might be able to address some of those. The first one is sustainable development, because although there's something to go in the development plans, but increasingly a lot of countries in the world are looking at that as being significant in the Constitution, again, because of climate change, because of the way in which the global economy has impacted on their lives and the way in which inequality has emerged in their countries and how they want to make sure that it's part of the Constitution framework so that people can, you know, have some constitutional regress in terms of sustainable development as well. Now, as part of the Sustainable Development Goals Review Team, which was appointed by the Secretary General of the United Nations, they call it the International Group of Scientists, and then SDG comes with that in 2013, and we're looking at what's beyond that, what is there, and we're putting together the Global Sustainable Development Report for next year.

Now, there are a number of things. One is I look after the section on inequality, and one of the things that's coming out is that how can countries actually constitutionalize some of those aspects of sustainable development to make sure that they're on track in achieving what they want, what needs to be achieved, because it's sustainable development, and so we loosely framed many countries in the world, in fact, in the Pacific, we're doing very, very badly, because it's not just the UN box. It's really to address some of the fundamental issues of inequality, which is prevalent in our country.

And, of course, climate change is a big issue, and how do we make sure that we, as part of the Sustainable Development Framework, the constitutional framework, address some of those issues. Now, the other issue is I mentioned about conflict resolution. At the moment, we have a Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which is doing its work.

Now, so we have to wait until such a time when we have to have external intervention into that, where, in fact, it would have been great if we had something in the constitution. In fact, I put together the concept note for the TRC Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which we're using now, and still doing some work for that as well, writing something up on kind of long-term security in Fiji. So, now, I think one of the problems is that because we haven't been able to contain conflict constitutionally, we're allowed to bring in sustainability in the long run.

Now, the other issue I was going to talk about is I talked about the ethics and integrity lenses. How do you address issues of corruption, for instance? How do you address issues of misconduct, for instance? How do you address issues of favoritism? Again, it's a play now in front of us in different ways. Again, this is where the integrity system comes in, and how do you ensure that systems of integrity are embedded in the constitution to make sure? To make sure? Yeah, I can't hear the whispering.

Because it has more implications in terms of human behavior because of constitutions. Not only for the purpose of institutional engineering, it's also for the purpose of behavioral engineering. In other words, how do you change people's behavior as well? Because there is a theory in sociological structuration where the institution and the human agency interact.

Certainly, the constitution is where they still need to interact. If you just focus on institutions, you can have a nice, clean institution. But if you don't address issues of people's behavior, of how people respond to certain circumstances in relation to their roles in the institution, then they're going to have issues.

And, of course, those issues, we've seen them playing out over the years. So, the other one is, again, to do with democratic governance. Let's just do the electoral system.

The electoral system that we have, the PR system, its history was quite traumatic because it was assumed that if you have a proportional representation when the system was first moved in Europe in the early 1900s, it was assumed that it was going to create balance. There are different variants of the PR system, different parts of the world have used. In Germany, in fact, most European countries use it.

In New Zealand, here, you have two types. Again, one is the PR system, and the other one is the first-past-the-post. That's why they call it the mixed representation system.

Ours is actually on the extreme side because there's only one constituency, and that's part of the problem because it allows for what they refer to as a coattail effect where political stars are able to attract attention and get the votes, and then people who don't get votes get elected as well. It creates an anomaly. Secondly, the representation, because it's national, politicians themselves don't know what to do and who are they accountable to, so that's why we need constituencies.

The number of constituencies depends very much on the circumstances. Of course, you can have a PR system with multiple constituencies. Another thing is because the representation of women has been very low.

I think this is also another thing with SDGs, looking at representation of women across not only politics, but also in the corporate sector. Some constitutions have that as well. This is something we can look at up to a point.

Some women argue that it's very patronizing, but given the extremities of the situation, I think it's important to start off somewhere. The other one to do with security, the security lenses, is immunity. I think the immunity has given the military a lot of embodiments to be doing what they're doing.

They've been doing it in terms of staging coups. The new constitution really should be upright and say no more immunity. It has to be associated with the legal sanction or punishment for treason.

It has to be upfront because we had too many coups. It has to be upfront, it has to be there, because that is one way of making sure that the coup cycle and the long tail of the coup at some point stops. It's quite heartening to note that the commander-in-chief himself has come out and mentioned that, which is good.

It's something which has been in people's minds, but they can't say it because there's fear in case, they might make the military angry. The other one is social justice. I talked about the social justice lenses.

Social justice has to be there fundamentally because it's one way of addressing inequality in society. But it has to be done in such a way so that it's not hijacked by political players. The social justice provision of the 1997 constitution was there.

As a result of that, they put together the affirmative action plan, the 50-50 affirmative action plan. I was actually asked to do that, to put together the affirmative action plan, the 50-50 affirmative action plan.

Mr. Valenitabua: Professor Ratuva, could you please wrap up, please? The commissioners need to ask you a number of questions.

Mr. Ratuva: Oh yeah, sure. Thank you. I have a problem with repeating.

Yeah, the social justice identity, it was meant by identity as well, because I think it's very, very important in terms of where we're moving. And I'll probably just stop there so that we have more time for discussion, because we have, let's say, ten minutes. So, I'll be very happy to respond to any questions that you have.

Mr. Beg: Thank you very much, Mr. Ratuva. Just on the point on the, you know, you mentioned the word climate change and the use of it and how it's embraced by the UN with its SDG 17 goals and so on. Small island states, and my gripe with this is that small island states should not be forced to carry out the financial and administrative burden of this global climate policy.

And, you know, our major industrial infrastructure and how we deal with it. I'm curious, like, you know, this is written entrenched in our constitution. Your views are expressed that you sit on the committee.

I'm just wondering how much of a weight will this, and your recommendations that you're saying, but I see it as a bit of a burden. I'd just like you to just comment a bit more about that. Thank you.

Mr. Ratuva: Well, that's a very good question. Yeah, yeah. So there's a very good point that you raised in relation to, because the big powers, they're the ones who pay the price, and we are the ones who suffer the consequences in terms of sea level rise and other impacts of climate change.

And I mentioned about the ICJ that puts back the pressure and the responsibility and accountability on the big polluters. So what we can do is maybe use the constitution as a way of putting pressure, like New Zealand and Australia. Australia is a big polluter, New Zealand as well.

They're trying to do their own thing. China, United States, Europe, and so forth. At the moment, we don't have, well, the ICJ is there for ourselves to have a commitment to that sort of thing.

So, it's to do with how we think properly about how we can safeguard ourselves in relation to, because of course nowadays, I just wrote a book on global climate security where the big corporations are actually paying for scientists to re-interpret data so that they look good, and so forth. There're so many things around us that we're probably not aware of. So, the question is, how do we safeguard ourselves more in terms of, I know we have policies to deal with climate change.

It doesn't have to say climate change. It just, some constitutions, they use the term environment. Climate change is too specific.

Mr. Beg Some would use the word sustainable development. So how about the word, so Professor Ratuvao, what about environmental degradation? Is that a word that we could use?

Mr. Ratuva: Yeah, totally. Environmental degradation is also linked to environmental rights, human rights, because human rights is very linked to environmental degradation.

Remember the issue about Vuda? Now that's a classical example of the way in which people were running around. There was no constitutional provision to say, ha-ha, how do we address this? So, it was just out of people's willpower and connection, and of course it went through the process of government process. And then, so no one had, the coder from the constitution said, ha-ha, the only, somebody did, but only in terms of rights, our right to, but if there's something more specific, because there are going to be in the future, those who want to have similar kinds of approaches, and so we have a constitutional platform to stand on.

Thank you very much, sir. Appreciate that. Dr. Ratuva,

Mr. Kohli: I think you were about to speak about identity, and we cut short there.

I shall be grateful if you can address on that, the identity aspect.

Mr. Ratuva: It's a really good question. People either avoid that, or they use it in a way which suits themselves.

I want to see the number of contacts. Because, so there are two ways in which we define identity. One is internal identification of the group itself.

The other is somebody defining you. So the word iTaukei is a word which the iTaukei used to define themselves. It's been there.

When we talk to each other, okay, the iTaukei is full of mana. It's full of the connection with the land. Now the word Fijian doesn't do that.

Well, Fijian is very much an introduced term. Let me tell you the history. Historically, Fiji was called Viti, and all around the Pacific they say Fiti in Samoan, the Fiti, the Maori, the Tahitians, the whole ancient stories of migration.

Fiti is a land in the east of Biti. Now the Tongans, because their language is different, they refer to us as Fiji. And when Captain Cook came to Tonga in the 1770s, he saw some Fijians, because the Fijians were hired by Tongan chiefs as mercenaries to go and fight the wars.

The Tongans were fighting the Germans before it was unified under King George. So, Captain Cook asked, where are these people from? Oh, Fiji, Fiji. And in the minds of the Englishmen, Fiji was Fiji.

So he wrote down his diary, F-E-E-J-E-E. So we became Fiji for a long time, and then became F-I-J-I later on when the wrecking started. And then we said, oh, it's too long, let's make it shorter.

And of course, the colonialists came and said, that's a good idea. And then that's how, so it's very short. It's very much an introduced European frame.

That's what a lot of us iTaukei don't realize. So, if we really want to have connections with our land, with our culture, with our history, then iTaukei is a term that you must use. And of course, let's allow the other ethnic groups to define themselves.

What is best for them? It's important for them to define themselves. Like the Indo-Fijians, there were Rotuman's, the Solomon Islanders, they call themselves the Solmonian people. Some of the terms, labels can be degrading.

Labels can also be empowering. So let them use terms which are empowering for them, rather than to degrade each other. So there has to be, there's a big sociological debate about how we frame people.

When we were doing the discussion here in relation to ethnic categories in New Zealand, we ended up with almost more than 20, 30, because people want to be identified in multiple terms. One, two, three, four, five, and so forth. And so, in terms of identity, because once you constitutionalize a particular name, because of political pressure, or because of a particular communal interest, if it's coming from the community, by itself, that's fine.

But those communities must realize, not only the history of those terms, but the consequences of those terms in the long term. So those identities can be unified, like I mentioned earlier, at the same time. If you're not careful, it can be fragmented as well.

That's what we've seen in different parts of the world, in Washington, in the Solomon Islands, and it's playing out in various parts of Europe, and of course in the United States, and so forth. In New Zealand, too, we have that. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Professor Ratuva, Hello? Are you still online?

Mr. Ratuva: Oh, sorry, I'm frozen then. Okay. I was frozen for some time.

Mr. Valenitabua: Okay. It is now 12, right? It is now 12 noon. We have another submitter coming up.

If I may finish this off now. Okay. Do you have any comment to finalize things?

Mr. Ratuva: Not so much at this point.

I think the point I was trying to make before on social justice, I think before we finish, was to do with out of the social justice provision of the 1997 constitution, we had affirmative action. I was asked to put together affirmative action plan 50-50, but then it failed because politicians use it for their political purposes, and some people end up in jail, as you may have known. So social justice will never work if it becomes politicized, if we leave it in the hands of politicians and parliamentarians.

So, it should be embedded in communities, in institutions which are trustworthy, rather than in the hands of those who will use it for political purposes.

Mr. Valenitabua: All right. Okay.

So, are you hearing me? Yes, yes. All right. I'd like to bring this to an end now.

I have to thank you very much indeed for your contribution to this process we are undertaking here in Suva. Thank you very much for your submissions. Thank you very much for your thoughts.

Thank you for your time too. I believe you are busy with other writings and other papers to be written, and the commissioners here, I speak on behalf of the commissioners, we thank you very much indeed. Vinaka.

THE GAP BETWEEN GLOBAL THINKING AND LOCAL LIVING: DILEMMAS OF CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM IN NAURU

STEVEN RATUVA
University of Auckland

In a watershed event on 27 February 2010, the Nauru voters overwhelmingly rejected a major constitutional reform initiative in a referendum which was meant to reform and stabilise a lethargic and corruption-ridden political system and rejuvenate a languid economy in the wake of the collapse of phosphate production, the mainstay of the economy. The failure of the referendum temporarily stalled but did not permanently end the reform process. Nevertheless, the political and psychological impact on the Nauru community of 10,000 people was deep and the implications are just beginning to sink in. The constitutional reform was instigated in 2004 by a group of young reform-minded politicians who were determined to exorcise Nauru, once the richest country in the world per capita, of poor political governance and economic mismanagement. This was the very first United Nations Development Program (UNDP) sponsored constitutional reform in the Pacific region, as well as the very first constitutional reform to be carried out in the Pacific through a referendum.

While there was consensus that reform was needed urgently, there were differences as to what was to be changed and how changes could be made. This article argues that these differences need to be understood in the context of the fundamental differences between two major development discourses: on one hand, the global discourse represented by UNDP and its "international best practice" aphorism; on the other hand, the local Nauru community and its ways of knowing, shaped by years of colonial control and cultural degradation.

In the era of contemporary globalisation, the interplay between the local and global often assumes syncretic and multiple forms such as homogenisation, hybridisation, accommodation and contradiction (Dore 1985, Hall 1997, Hannerz 1990, Huntington 1993, Mathews 2000, Scholte 2000, Tomlinson 1999). The incorporation of Nauru into the world system was through three phases of colonialism—German, Japanese and Australian—which were profoundly disruptive and transformative. The Nauru colonial experience was traumatising and etched a deeply embedded sense of alienation, anguish and cynicism, and a deep distrust of outsiders. It is precisely in the context of these conditions that we need to understand the contemporary Nauru sense of place as they engage with outside global forces.

Based on the author's fieldwork in Nauru in December 2010, this article examines the process of constitutional reform in Nauru with emphasis on the gap between the global discourse of "international best practice," espoused by the UNDP to guide and justify the constitutional reform process (UNDP 2006) and the Nauru cultural ways of knowing. More specifically it focuses on how these relationships were played out either in manifest or latent ways and how they impacted on the results of a referendum. In the next section, I explore some issues relating to the Nauruan sense of the local and the nurturing of resilience and resistance in the face of globalisation. This is followed by a discussion of the global notions in the form of the UNDP policy discourse and its hegemonic tendencies. How the two distinct cultural forces interacted with and shaped each other is explored in the following section on constitutional reform. Finally there will be discussion of some local-global dilemmas resulting from the six reform steps that led directly or indirectly to the failure of the referendum and thwarted hopes for a more sustainable and better future for this smallest republic in the world.

UNDERSTANDING THE NAURUAN SENSE OF LOCAL AND PLACE

To fully appreciate the Nauruan sense of place we need to situate it in the broader framework of their colonial and post-colonial experience.

Nauru, an isolated single island of 10,000 people, went through years of external control first by the Germans from 1888 to the end of the First World War when it became a League of Nations Mandate jointly administered by Britain, Australia and New Zealand after Germany's defeat (Tabucanon and Opeskin 2011). Nauru was occupied by the Japanese during the Second World War after which it became a United Nations Trust Territory as a Class C Mandate under the joint responsibility of Britain, Australia and New Zealand with Australia as the main administering power. Nauru became independent on 31 January 1968 (Viviani 1970).

Colonial domination took its toll on the previously isolated and culturally distinct population (Tabucanon and Opeskin 2011). For instance, after the First World War about 20 percent of the island's population succumbed to the influenza epidemic (Davidson 1968: 145). In 1942 the Japanese deported more than half of the population to Truk in the Federated State of Micronesia where they had set up their military base (Hughes 2004: 3). Only 40 percent of the 1200 deportees survived the ordeal of slave labour, disease and starvation. Among the survivors was Hammer De Roburt, who became the first president of Nauru upon independence.

These experiences were traumatising and left deep scars on the collective consciousness of Nauru's people. However, the end of the war did not end their sense of exploitation either as they realised that they were not getting a fair return in terms of royalties for the phosphate mined from their land. Although the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand as administering authorities were obligated under the trusteeship agreement to safeguard the interests of the Nauru population and "promote their economic, social, educational and cultural advancement", the level of royalties per ton was low in relation to the sale price and, worse still, Nauru phosphate was significantly under-priced relative to the world market price (Hughes 2004). In 1960 the royalties received by Nauru was only 2.8 percent of the value of the annual phosphate produced, evidence that Nauru was subsidising New Zealand and Australian farming (Weeramantry 1992). In the 1950s, in recognition of this anomaly, the people of Nauru made their dissatisfaction clear to the United Nations triennial visiting missions as well as by petitioning the Trusteeship Council to express their rejection of the idea of being paid on the basis of needs rather than rights. In other words, they demanded that they had the right to be paid the market price rather than being paid in accordance with what the administering authorities determined they needed. In 1964, after negotiations, the royalties increased to 7.6 per cent of the value of the phosphate. However, further attempts to increase the royalties and control interest in the ownership of the company were resolutely rejected (Weeramantry 1992). It was not until Independence in 1968 that Nauru was able to exert control over its resources and a combination of sustained production and high world prices for phosphate generated hitherto unknown wealth for Nauru (Tabucanon and Opeskin 2011). For instance, between 1968 and 2001 it was estimated that earnings through export totalled around AUD$3.6 billion which amounted to $50,000 per capita, making Nauru second only to Saudi Arabia as the richest country in the world (Hughes 2004). However, much of this wealth disappeared as phosphate reserves dwindled and acute mismanagement and corruption wiped out financial reserves (Connell 2006, Toatu 2004). This was unexpected and traumatising for many of Nauru's people who had no idea what the causes of their impoverishment were (Quanchi 2007).

Another matter that tested the Nauruan sense of resilience was the resettlement proposals in the 1950s and 1960s. Among the options suggested were Laucala Island in Fiji, Woodlark Island in Papua New Guinea, and the Australian islands of Fraser, Prince of Wales, and Curtis. One of the reasons why the resettlement proposals were rejected was because the Nauru people feared that relocation would lead to the disintegration of their close knit community and loss of their culture already damaged by the terrible excesses of colonial rule (Tabucanon and Opeskin 2011). Despite the gravity of their situation the Nauru people could not imagine being physically and culturally uprooted from their ancestral land.

The collective experience of depopulation from epidemics, of deportation and dislocation caused by the war, of resource exploitation by foreigners, and of the sudden disappearance of their wealth produced a sense of anxiety among the Nauruan people and strengthened their resolve to ensure the survival of their community and collective identity in the midst of adversity (Hughes 2004, Quanchi 2007, Tabucanon and Opeskin 2011). A new surge in local resilience and suspicion of many things foreign has developed as they redefine their place and their local identity in the contemporary world.

Instead of permanently fracturing the Nauruan notion of place, colonial experience had actually reconfigured it, made it more resilient and durable as a means of self-preservation. In this regard Huffer and Rakuita (2008) have made the point that while colonialism may have transformed basic institutions in the Pacific, it had failed to neutralise certain inherent values and symbolisms which connected people to their cosmology. An example was the durability of the notion of "place". They argued that "the legacies of colonialism and neo-colonialism" had "largely been unsuccessful at replacing place-based with space-based thinking" (Huffer and Rakuita 2008: 7). To Huffer and Rakuita, place-based thinking refers to identification with a familiar local land area with a defined boundary and associated cultural values, sense of ownership and identity. Words (often cognate forms) used in Pacific communities to denote 'place' are: Fijian vanua, Aotearoa whenua, Tongan fonua, Samoan fanua, Maohi Nui/Tahitian fenua, West Kwara'ae (Malaita) fanoa, and Kiribati te aba. In contrast, space-based thinking refers to the notion of an "empty" world without any defined boundary and distinctive cultural characteristics, and thus subject to external occupation and commodification. Huffer and Rakuita (2008) claimed that this notion of a boundless and "ownerless" universal space provided one of the moral justifications for colonial annexation.

The strong sense of Nauru's ethno-nationalism, built around their sense of place, is interpreted in different ways by others. Some foreigners working in Nauru with whom I spoke interpreted Nauruan community pride and independence, in their words, as "arrogance" and "unfriendly". Nauruan's sense of loyalty is first and foremost to their matrilineal-based kin groups. Kinship defines socio-cultural relations and there are 12 named clans: Eamwit, Eamwidumwit, Deboe, Eoaru, Emea, Eano, Emangum, Ranibok, Eamwidara, Iruwa, Irutsi (extinct) and Iwi (extinct). Apart from the clan boundaries, there are administrative divisions consisting of 14 districts divided into eight parliamentary constituencies which are used as cultural markers of sorts.

Despite the tragedies of their past history, the Nauru people continued to sustain a community that was firmly rooted in the land and kinship while adopting new strategies as they engaged selectively and cautiously with outside cultures. The land provides physical nourishment, cultural identity and sense of socio-spiritual validation to being Nauruan.[1] The desecration of this sacred link through phosphate mining undermined their sense of identity, which in turn aroused deep anguish that progressively worsened over time.[2]

Political Instability

The instability of the political system had arisen from factional political interests which used the no-confidence provision in the Constitution without restraint to change the president and government. During the 42 years since Independence in 1968 there have been 36 changes in government, on average a new government after every 1.16 years. Since 1977 there have been 30 motions of "no confidence" and 13 of these had passed. Perhaps the most changes were in 1997 when Nauru had four different presidents within four months. There was a brief period of political stability following the election of a reformist politician as President on 23 October 2004 through a snap election with the support of 15 parliamentarians out of 18. That government was uniquely able to serve the full three-year term. The President and his group of reformists were re-elected in August 2007 but fractures within the group led to a successful vote of no-confidence in December 2007 which saw Marcus Stephen's ascent to power. Not long after there was a series of destabilising events including an unsuccessful motion of no confidence against the government and the resignation of the Speaker.

This was followed by a stalemate when three parliamentarians declined nominations for the position of Speaker. Things got worse when nine government parliamentarians were suspended by the new Speaker for un-parliamentary behaviour while he was delivering a statement on a Supreme Court decision. In the absence of the nine parliamentarians, controversial amendments to the Citizenship Act were made and the Chief Justice, a Fijian, later declared the amendments invalid. Consequently, without any other way out of the impasse, the President declared a state of emergency and dissolved parliament and called for a snap election eight months later on 26 April 2008.

Marcus Stephen was returned as President but two electoral petitions were filed in court questioning the validity of the election which were dismissed. Parliament was dissolved again on 20 March 2010 as a result of attempts to remove the government and the election, due to be held in 2011, was brought forward by a year. Again the opposition tried twice to oust the government: the first attempt on 17 February 2010 failed and, before the second one was considered by Parliament, the president advised the Speaker to dissolve Parliament on 13 March 2010. This led to the election in April 2010 which saw the re-election of Marcus Stephen, a former Commonwealth Games weightlifting gold medallist.

These frequent political changes impacted on the people's sense of community and undermined their trust in the formal political process. A politician told me how much he had noticed the increase in people's cynicism about politics over the years. This instability at the national level may have strengthened people's identification with their local community and sense of independence and resilience.

The historical experience of Nauru, compounded by the continuing political instability and economic crisis, has profoundly influenced local sentiments. The voters' resentment and antagonism were apparent in the results of the reform referendum. Any attempt to touch on sensitive issues such as land reform was bound to strike raw nerves and evoke strong emotions.[3] The reform process failed to take into account these social realities by not actively promoting local ownership of it in a sustained way. Instead it was largely driven by the objectives and approaches emanating from the Fiji-based UNDP.

THE UNDP AND THE GLOBAL DISCOURSE

On the other side of the divide is the United Nations which sees its role in constitution-making as a critical component of its work on the rule of law, the focus being on both the "process" and "substance" which purported to promote "national ownership and support for inclusive, participatory and transparent processes" (UNDP 2006). These principles are deemed to be universally applicable in any political or cultural context anywhere in the word. It is assumed that normative values, such as transparency, inclusivity and universal participation are trans-cultural in appeal and application.

While the UN has overseen a number of constitution-making projects, Nauru was the very first Pacific state where the UN was involved in constitutional reform and was seen as providing a test case for constitutional reform in a small island state. UNDP's role in overseeing the reform gave it significant power and control, working in close collaboration with the Nauruan Parliament represented by the Constitution Reform Committee (CRC) of ten parliamentarians, to co-ordinate and administer the review process. UNDP provided the consultant who conceptualised the process as well as technical and managerial support. Liaising with the CRC, UNDP supervised the use of US$300,000 provided by the United Nations Democracy Fund (UNDF), which provided the major source of funding (UNDP 2011).

Ideologically, UNDP often uses its global status and image of impartiality as a way of generating universal consent and global legitimacy for its projects (Bernabeu 2007). The UNDP's proclaimed impartial status means that it is in a position to deploy a "one size fits all" reform template that does not recognise cultural and political diversities in any country in the world, despite varying conditions.[4]

From the UNDP perspective, the solutions to these Pacific problems require an equally universally applicable template:

> [T]he cooperation of the executive, judiciary, legislature, effective legal systems, law enforcement and civil society to underpin sustainable development, economic growth, environmental and social stability and security and human rights for all across the Pacific... and integrated decision making across all sectors at both regional and national levels.[5]

Of interest here is the absence of local culture and communities, which are often placed outside the rubric of the local state system and civil state organisations — CSOs. The focus is on institutional processes and formal procedures rather than people in their social and cultural place.

The UNDP's notion of "global democratic best practice",[6] consistently used as a moral justifier and political legitimiser, refers to universal ethical values such as human rights, gender equality, inclusiveness and people participation (UNDP 2010). How these apply to the local context or how the local community might interpret and react to them in Nauru were not part of the project prescription and were regarded as the contribution of the local project partners. At the conceptual level, the Nauru reform was to be "inclusive, open and [reflective of] global democratic best practice in constitutional review processes" designed to achieve the goal of "a stable, trustworthy, fiscally responsible government with transparent, accountable parliamentarians, cabinet and public service" (UNDP 2006: 1).

These goals were part of the social engineering process to reform the formal state and government structure. Again there was little if any explicit provision for improving community livelihood, an issue raised with me by a number of people in Nauru. The UNDP did not provide any reform template that was specifically in response to the particular historical realities of Nauru or geared towards the local Nauru reality of the present. A basic assumption was that the Nauru people like anyone else needed to adapt and conform to the universal UNDP reform principles, rather than the other way around or even a hybrid approach sensitively synthesising important aspects of both.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

The Nauru constitution had only been amended once since Independence on 31 January 1968. This was on 17 May 1968. In 1971, Hammer DeRoburt, the first President, proposed changes to the constitution but nothing eventuated. In 1985 another notice of motion for a constitutional review was given but then withdrawn (McDowell 1986). Yet on 14 October of the same year a similar motion was passed by Parliament, calling for the establishment of a constitutional convention but again this did not go far. Meanwhile a number of cases were heard by the Supreme Court of Nauru (SCN) regarding constitutional challenges and interpretations.

Not until 2004 was there a major initiative to amend the constitution. This constitutional reform was to be part of a broader political and economic 25-year strategic plan in the form of the National Sustainable Development Strategy (NSDS) aimed at building "a sustainable quality of life for all Nauruans" and achieving "a stable, trustworthy, fiscally responsible government with transparent and accountable parliamentarians, cabinet and public service" (Government of Nauru 2005). Constitutional reform was seen as the major mechanism to achieve these optimistic ideals.

Earlier, in 2004, the Pacific Islands Forum Secretariat (PIFS) had carried out a Legislative Needs Assessment (LNA) and somewhat later UNDP, with funding from the UNDF, facilitated the constitutional review process aimed at improving capacity building of governance institutions including Parliament. The project was concluded in March 2010. The actual reform process started in July 2006 and involved six steps as shown in Table 1.

STEPS 1 AND 2: Manufacturing Consent through Public "Awareness" and "Consultation"

Based on Gramsci's theory of hegemony, the phrase "manufacturing consent" used by Herman and Chomsky (1994) specifically focuses on how dominant views and ideologies are propagated, most visibly by the media to shape public opinion. However, the Herman and Chomsky thesis assumed that both the media and the society it operated in (i.e., the United States) were culturally compatible. This was not so in the case of Nauru where a Western-style media was used in a largely post-colonial cultural context.

The two initial phases of the reform, "awareness" (Step 1) from July to August 2006 and "consultation" (Step 2) from October to November 2006, were meant to increase the Nauru people's understanding of their Constitution and of the need for constitutional review.

The first phase mainly employed the media and the second was based on community visits. The relevance of the notion of manufacturing consent in this case is more to do with the deliberate deployment of different tactics to shape public opinion in a small island community where modern communicative logistics and strategies were not well suited to the local people's sense of information validation. This was essentially a one way process because the government controlled all the media, including the radio station, newspaper and television, and naturally it was in a hegemonic position to unilaterally determine the contents and method of delivery. There were no alternative

Sources: Nauru 2006, UNDP 2011.

Step	Activities	Time frame
Step 1	Public awareness: A campaign to raise public awareness of the review and of the constitution and possible amendments, which involved nation-wide media campaign, posters and distribution of pamphlets.	July-Aug 2006
Step 2	Public consultation: A series of 40 public consultation meetings throughout Nauru, and the receipt of 40 written submissions from the public. About 700 people altogether were consulted.	Oct-Nov 2006
Step 3	Independent Review Commission: A three-person Constitutional Review Commission set up to put together the views expressed by the public through the consultation process and make recommendations for amendment to the Constitution.	Dec 2006-Feb 2007
Step 4	Constitutional Convention: A Constitutional Convention, held over a period of six weeks, debated the recommendations of the Commission. The Convention members were both elected and appointed and prepared two draft bills reflecting the motions passed by the Convention.	April-May 2007
Step 5	Parliament:Consideration of the bills by Parliament, beginning with five weeks of detailed consideration in the Select Committee on Constitutional Amendment Bills in early 2009, and then three weeks detailed debate in the Committee of the Whole in June and August 2009. Parliament passed the two constitutional amendment bills on 21 August 2009	June 2007-Aug 2009
Step 6	Referendum: A referendum on certain proposed constitutional amendments that required approval by referendum was held on 27 February 2010. It did not succeed.	Feb 2010

sources of information except information supplied at the community level by civil society organisations. The director of the media services, an Australian, primarily used mainstream public relations methods, such as daily news, government statements and interviews with members of the CRC, and directly urged the people to vote for the referendum. An opportunity for people ring up and make their views heard was provided through talk-back shows. The broadcasts were in both English and Nauruan. More or less the same format was used by the local television station. One of the major drawbacks was that both local radio and TV had limited coverage on the island because of the damage caused to the transmission tower by a forest fire a few days before (Le Roy 2006). In any case, many households did not have television and radio sets and there was no established culture of using these modern technologies for communication. People still relied on daily and informal word of mouth for information. What people heard over the radio or saw on TV would be relayed around the island by word of mouth.

Because of the lack of a standard written Nauruan, all the written materials were in English. Three billboards were put up and a total of 5219 leaflets were produced and distributed. The Australian Government did its part by funding the printing and distribution of 1000 copies of the Constitution, and the head of the Australian mission made public statements urging the Nauruans to endorse the constitutional amendments.

Altogether nine local staff and two Australian consultants (a legal expert and a public relations expert) carried out the awareness programme. It was not easy to find the right people, who would ideally "have good communication skills, computer literacy, good organisational skills, ability to comprehend and explain complex material, ability to take initiative and to work well in a team, ability to work hard and meet deadlines, and proficiency in Nauruan and English [were] the criteria used to select the local team" (Le Roy 2006: 10). Nevertheless, a team was put together. One of the criticisms was that these people did not have any proper training and, because they were necessarily mostly young people, older people in the community did not take them very seriously.[7] This was not surprising in a culture where increasing age is intrinsically linked with increased knowledge, authority and status.

Favouring the use of the English language over the local Nauruan language exacerbated what Brown (2004: 200) has referred to as the "epistemological gap" or divide "between two ways of reasoning". There were different modes of interpreting media representations. The state had faith in its technical ability to deliver messages but people responded in diverse ways, often with a mixture of suspicion, complacency and mild endorsement. The use of the media blitz was something new and provoked a sense of aggression and distance. Some people complained of the psychological intimidation they felt.

However, within the broader framework of the transmission-reception relationship, the major challenge was how the information reached the population at large and how the texts were processed, interpreted and understood by the public in the context of what Hall (1980) categorised as "dominant," "negotiated" or "oppositional" modes of reception. In other words, was the awareness programme seen as part of the government's hegemonic stance in controlling information and using it as a means of domination, or were people given a chance to arrive at a negotiated meaning, or did the programme create opposition as people became conscious of their own ideological domination and subaltern position in the process?

From discussions with people, I gathered that the impact was not as directly positive as the state intended and later claimed. In a community with strong communal and kinship bonds and where social communication was part of kinship networks, the validity of information was judged not by the presentation of the contents but by the reliability and legitimacy of the messenger. The messenger can become more important than the message itself. Messengers are not only bearers of information but more than that they help consolidate relationships and give the message more authority and legitimacy. In Nauruan cosmology, the contents of the message cannot be isolated and transmitted independently of the messenger but rather the two are inseparably part of a communicative process.

The extent of the gap was widened by the continuing distrust of the government because of long experience of its failed investments, corruption, continuing power struggles, instability and poor governance. The reform came to be seen by some as a conspiratorial government imposition resulting in apathy and withdrawal of active participation.

While the first step was largely media driven, the second step (public consultation) was focused on community engagement. The consultation team, consisting of seven Nauruans (some of whom were involved in the first step) and the two Australian consultants, carried out the public consultations which involved community meetings where the team was to explain to the public the contents of the Nauru Constitution and impress upon them the need for constitutional reform. For many Nauruans, the exercise was very useful because for the first time they were exposed to the knowledge that they actually had a constitution, as well as the role of the constitution and how it impacted on their daily lives. This was empowering knowledge for a society where there was a significant gap between the state institutions and the community, and where serious civic education had not really taken place. Altogether 700 people attended 40 consultations with attendance ranging from five to 40 people per consultation over a six-week period from August to November 2006 (Balm and Le Roy 2006).

Just as in the first phase, there were once again communication problems between the public consultation team and the community. The consultation format called for small group discussions under the direction of local facilitators conducted in the Nauruan language. The consolidated views were translated into English and then discussed in the major plenary session conducted in English. The use of the English language to satisfy the two foreign consultants posed two problems: the clarity in communicating local knowledge and the intention of local ownership of the change process. Furthermore, the classroom-like pedagogy deployed did not take into consideration the socio-cultural paradigm for communicative engagement in the local communities. For instance, as in Step 1, the notion of the messenger being a validating agent of the message was overlooked. Most of the consultation team members were relatively young civil servants and members of civil society organisations. This did not go down well with community elders who felt that those involved in such important work, if it were to be fully accepted, should be of reasonable maturity. Being advised by young people to believe in and do something foreign to them was not considered culturally appropriate. The common response was silence at the meetings and later expressions of dissatisfaction through informal gossip. Another technique was to pretend to go along with the wishes of the consultation team by nodding and affirming loudly while inwardly harbouring opposition. The few who spoke English responded argumentatively on behalf of the "silent majority". An evaluation of the process by an independent consultant suggested the use of a more culturally friendly pedagogical approach such as Participatory Learning Appraisal (PLA) in such a situation (UNDP 2011).

While in theory the intent and application of the term "consultation" was laudable, the reality turned out to be a hegemonic encounter where the consultation team determined the contents and approach. The term consultation itself came to connote imposed ideas, principles and values which had to be discussed with the local community to gauge their responses, whether positive or negative as a way of legitimation. There was an unequal power relationship where the state decided and defined the agenda even before consultation. There was no dialogue and participatory engagement to empower the community and provide a base for local ownership of the process.

None of the local members of the team was a qualified translator or legal expert who could competently explain technical matters in Nauruan. They were mostly high school and primary school leavers who had been working as civil servants or members of civil society organisations. Their tasks called for a combination of legal, constitutional, political, linguistic, educational and cultural expertise for which they had limited qualifications. They were to translate the constitutional provisions from English to Nauruan (despite the absence of any written material in the Nauruan language), explain to people the meaning of the provisions and the reasons for the amendments, and discuss with them the political implications of them all. The role of the two Australian consultants was to intervene when the local team members could not respond satisfactorily to questions. Some team members told me that they were fully aware of their own deficiencies but there was no other choice since they were the best the country could produce and they felt that it was their patriotic duty to carry out their responsibilities. The members of the community also were cognisant of these deficiencies and the superficiality of the process. A community leader joked that it was like "the blind leading the blind" and "fools teaching fools".

The chances of information being successfully imparted by those not proficient in the subject, using a language in which both the local consultation team and the local community were not competent, was highly questionable. This was a crucial phase in the reform program because it was intended to transmit information as well as transform political consciousness. Its failure to inform and transform helped to create more doubts within an already suspicious community.

Another important issue was the question of representativeness of the views captured in the consultations. Often only certain educated and informed individuals contributed to the discussions on behalf of others. In Nauruan culture, elders are considered the guardians of sacred knowledge and wisdom and their voices are representative of the collective will. Because most did not understand English and even the interpreted legal concepts and arguments, they were marginalised outside the communicative circle, thus severely compromising their influence within the community.

It was clear that the consultation team was driven by the desire to fulfil the requirements of the reform plan as expected by the project objective within the specified time and budget. Whether the community absorbed and understood the contents and implications of the contents became a mere secondary consideration. There were no monitoring or feedback mechanisms to determine the effectiveness of the community consultation. It was assumed that Steps 1 and 2 were very successful because of few verbalised criticisms. In the Nauru culture, rejection is not readily verbalised but could be projected through silence and allusive expressions.

STEPS 3 AND 4: Legitimising Mechanisms: The Constitutional Review Commission and the Constitutional Convention

To implement Step 3 three prominent people were appointed as members of the Constitutional Review Commission (henceforth Commission). They were Ruby Thoma (the Commission chair), a prominent woman politician and community leader; Leo Keke, a local lawyer; and Dr Guy Powles, a New Zealand constitutional expert. The Commission collected and analysed the reports from the 40 public consultations, 40 written submissions and other materials they had gathered, and synthesised them into a report with a series of recommendations (Nauru CRC 2007). The Commission was the intellectual powerhouse of the reform process because it was responsible for collecting, processing, categorising and documenting a massive amount of information which was eventually translated into recommendations for constitutions reform.

While the Commission consisted of well qualified individuals with deep commitment to Nauru's interests, the notion of having an elite body which provided the intellectual direction of the reform discourse for the entire community raised questions of legitimacy and ownership. This procedure was made necessary by accepting that it was pragmatically and logistically prudent to use a small professional group to put all the views together. A vital question here is: given the concerns about how the consultations were conducted and the representativeness of the views generated from the community, how much of the contents of the Commission's work could be said to be truly reflective of the collective community will?

As had been planned from the outset, the Commission never interacted directly with the community. It collected information from the public through the consultation team. The use of the third party, while logistically convenient, simply reinforced the social distance between the Commission and the community.

The Commission's report was the basis for discussions and recommendations of the Constitutional Convention (henceforth Convention), which was Step 4 of the process. The Convention was composed of 36 members: 9 were members of the Constitutional Review Commission, 18 were elected by the various districts and 9 were appointed by various civil society organisations. The civil society representatives consisted of two each from the Nauru Youth Council, from the Nauru Women's Council and from those who had been members of the first and only convention in 1968, and one each from the Catholic Church, the Congregational Church and the Nauru Disabled Association (Nauru CRC 2007). The UNDP paid all the expenses, including allowances for the participants. The landowners associations, private sector and some vocal civil society organisations were not represented. When I asked why these organisations were not represented, I was told by the UNDP consultant that everyone involved in the convention "was a landowner", the private sector was "too small" and the vocal civil society organisations were "too disruptive". The reality, however, was that the landowners association and the "disruptive" organisations had enough political clout to influence the ordinary people to vote "No" during the referendum. While the process attempted to be inclusive, it was not inclusive enough to co-opt the dissenting elements.

Debate became very intense during the Convention and things began to unravel. About 20 of the recommendations made by the Commission were rejected. Some of these related to the issue of land acquisition by the state, election of the President and other issues relating to political governance. However, later, to everyone's surprise, the Parliamentary Committee on Constitutional Reform decided to go along with the Commission's recommendations that had been rejected by the Convention, which was a truly representative body. The Government and UNDP were taken by surprise by the results of the Convention. The message was very clear at this point—the people were beginning to raise their voices and reject some of the important amendment proposals which they believed undermined their interests.

STEP 5: Reform and Political Brinksmanship

After the Convention completed its task in May 2007, the recommended amendments were submitted to Parliament in June. This was Step 5 and no doubt the most problematic part of the reform because it coincided with the sudden change of government resulting from a vote of no confidence. All along, the reform process was perceived and treated as non-partisan but all this changed when a new government came into power and as a consequence the political dynamics suddenly changed into one of intense partisanship. A constitutional requirement was that Parliament had to hold a debate on the amendments for a minimum of 90 days before they were passed. But before August 2007, when the 90 days lapsed, an election was called and consequently Parliament could not deliberate or vote on the amendment bills.

The election resulted in the return of the incumbent government; however, in December of the same year, a motion of no confidence was passed on the government and in April 2008 the President declared a state of emergency. These political developments delayed the passing of the amendment bills and eventually the two constitutional amendment bills were reintroduced to Parliament in November 2008. The first bill dealt with constitutional amendments which could be carried out through a parliamentary vote, while the second bill dealt with amendments which would later be subjected to a voter referendum (UNDP 2011).

Parliament needed time to carefully look at a number of resolutions of the Convention which were "legally unfeasible and internally inconsistent" and which needed legal fine-tuning and amendment before passing (UNDP 2010). This was significant because, increasingly, the role of Parliament rather than of the Convention, which had been a more representative body, became paramount.

Once the political situation stabilised, Parliament proceeded with consideration of the motions. In December 2008 the second reading of the Constitution Amendment Bills took place. At the same time, Parliament resolved to establish a Select Committee on Constitutional Amendment Bills to consider in detail and make recommendations for amendment to the two bills to amend the constitution that were (re-)introduced to Parliament in November 2008. This Select Committee met for a total of five weeks in January, February and March 2009. All these meetings were accompanied by media interviews to keep the public informed of what was happening in the spirit of openness. The meetings were conducted in the Parliamentary Chamber while the gallery was open to the public. All meetings were broadcast live on the radio to generate public interest in the proceedings. The Committee produced its report and recommendations on 10 March 2009.

Despite the political turmoil, parliamentarians were able to maintain a sense of solidarity and co-operation since most were determined to see through the reforms which promised to bring about political stability and greater economic development. The parliamentary debates were open to the media for the first time to project images of transparency and also to mobilise support for the referendum. Parliament eventually passed the bills unanimously and the way was finally clear for the Referendum.

STEP 6: The Paradox of Democratic Optimism—The Referendum

In December 2009 the question for the Referendum was prepared and a Referendum public awareness programme started in February 2010. The Referendum was held in February 2010. The observer team of 14 expatriates based in Nauru were invited by the government to observe the Referendum noted that "the vote was conducted in a professional, fair, free and open environment" (Final Referendum Observers Report 2010: 6).

There were altogether 34 proposals for change in a single constitutional amendment package to be decided with the single referendum question: "Do you approve of the proposed law entitled the Constitution of Nauru (Referendum Amendment) Bill 2009?" The amendments included extending the list of rights to include protection of rights to privacy and personal autonomy, rights to information, health services, education, environmental protection and employment, and women's rights, children's rights and rights of persons with disabilities ([Referendum] Amendments Bill 2009).

Another significant proposal for amendment was the method of electing the President. The original Constitution provided for a President, as both Head of State and Head of Government, to be elected by Parliament. This has been a major cause of instability as groups of parliamentarians could mobilise and use their simple majority in the 18 member parliament to oust the President and his government. The amendment provided that Parliament would select two or three suitable candidates and the people would directly choose the President through a national election.

A new proposal was the establishment of a Council of State, consisting of the most senior public officers in Nauru, such as "the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court or, if the Chief Justice is not a Nauruan, a Nauruan person nominated by the Chief Justice), the Speaker of Parliament (who would not be a member of Parliament as a result of other changes to the Constitution made by Parliament), the Chief Secretary or, if the Chief Secretary is not a Nauruan, a Nauruan person nominated by the Chief Secretary" (Nauru 2009b: 15). The idea was that, in the event of a political crisis, the Council of State would be called upon to perform the functions of a caretaker government until a new President was elected. This was meant to be a politically stabilising mechanism.

Perhaps the most controversial amendment proposal dealt with the acquisition of property by the Government under "just terms". The Constitution already had provision for such an acquisition but did not clearly spell out what "just terms" meant in relation to compensation. The proposed amendment required the Government and relevant landowners to engage in negotiated agreement and if this failed then the Supreme Court would be called to intervene and make a final judgement based on the current use of the property, the importance of the public purpose for which the property was being acquired and any hardship to the owners.

Other amendments dealt with clarifying the roles of the President and Cabinet, and explicitly stated that all public officers who receive money by or on behalf of Nauru must pay the money into the Treasury Fund.

Of the 4389 voters who cast their vote, 1450 voters (33.04%) voted "Yes", and 2939 (66.96%) voted "No" . The voter turnout was 78 percent of the 5238 registered voters. The results of the referendum by districts are shown in Table 2.

The vote against the referendum was overwhelming in all the districts, except in Yaren, Nauru's "capital" where the Parliament, government offices and airport are located. Many civil servants, based in Yaren, voted for the reform. Overall, the results reflected the failure of the five phases of the reform to generate and consolidate the support of the Nauru citizens. The 67 percent "No" vote was surprising especially after Parliament had passed the amendment bills unanimously and it was assumed that people would simply replicate that spirit of consensus. The Nauru Government through the acting President referred to the results of the referendum as "disappointing but not entirely unexpected", while UNDP ironically referred to the reform as a "success" (UNDP 2010). This use of the Orwellian language to dispel disappointment and embarrassment had an important ideological and political role to maintain the state's sense of legitimacy in the face of what could be construed as a vote of no-confidence in state leadership by voters. On the other hand, critics of the state saw it as a "victory" by the silent majority. So what exactly went wrong? I examine this next.

MAJOR NEGATING FACTORS AGAINST THE REFERENDUM

The Land Curse

Although the amendment provided more legal clarity and gave more power to landowners if the state wanted to acquire their land for public purposes, many landowners held the deep conviction that land issues should not be tinkered with at all. The issue of land has been extremely sensitive for the people of Nauru given the history of alienating and exploitative land policies starting with the Germans (1888-1914) and later the Australian-led Administration (1919-1968). There were large-scale changes to the indigenous land tenure system and rights which were both patrilineal and matrilineal under the chief's authority. Land was readily exchanged and the boundaries extended to the reef and rights to coconut trees and other plants were as important as rights to land itself (MacSporran 1995). The German attitude towards indigenous land could be summed up thus:

> ... it was taken for granted at the time, that the annexation of a territory by Germany as a colony did have no effect on the private rights of the indigenous people, that the rights were protected; they were not wiped out by the annexation but they would survive. (Transcript of Commission of Inquiry Proceedings, quoted in MacSporran 1995: 7)

While this was a general German imperial policy, a special dispensation was later given to Jaluit Gesellschaft, a German mining company, through a major concession in 1906. The Mining Ordinance of 1906 introduced changes that undermined the rights of Nauruan landowners and among them was the provision that phosphate was regarded as a "free" mineral that upon extraction became the property of the miner. However, there were other provisions of the mining law, as well as Article 249 of the Civil Code, which provided for restoration of damaged land and compensation to make this possible (MacSporran 1995). These compensatory provisions were hardly adhered to.

Upon the takeover of Nauru administration by Australia in 1919, a number of changes took place that further alienated Nauruans' control over their land. For instance on 25 June 1920 the British Phosphate Commission (BPC) was given a mining concession and in the process gained virtual control and a monopoly over mining on the island. A series of mining laws were passed for the purpose of regulating use of land (such as the 1921 and 1927 Mining Ordinances) but these were carried out without consultation with landowners (Hughes 2004). In 1928, a Nauru Land Committee, consisting of some local chiefs, was formed to represent local landowners in all land dealings to ensure a more systematic process of negotiation under these new laws. This Committee was given legislative backing in 1956 (Nauru Lands Committee Ordinance 1956). The aim of the ordinance was to allow the identification and codification of landownership, but it was never carried out. Later attempts to codify landownership met resistance because it did not coincide with the more flexible indigenous system. Determination of ownership of land for leasing purposes by the BPC led to numerous claims and counter-claims that provoked conflict.

Upon independence, the right to mine was transferred to the Government of Nauru and the Nauru Phosphate Corporation (Hughes 2004). The later land law was based on the 1976 Land Act which continued the previous system except when the minister might endorse a lease if three-quarters of the joint owners of a property agreed to lease land for public purposes thus overriding the views of the minority (MacSporran 1995).

In all past land deals, landowners were mere passive participants and were denied a voice in many strategic decisions. In fact there was a strong view among many colonial and mining officials that the interior of the island where mining started was not owned at all and so Nauruans did not need to be consulted. After the total destruction of their land through mining and the subsequent collapse of the Nauruan economy, people began to develop a deep-seated distrust of their Government which they felt had failed them. Land was seen as more a source of anguish than of prosperity and any attempt by the government, or anyone else for that matter, to do anything that would impact on it, became extremely sensitive and could invoke resistance. This was precisely what happened during the Referendum.

The proposed amendment to the provision on land acquisition contained technicalities which created confusion. In relation to acquisition of land by the state, Article 8 (1) of the Constitution states that "No person shall be deprived compulsorily of his property except in accordance with law for a public purpose and on just terms" (Constitution of the Republic of Nauru 1968). The "just terms" were not specified so the amendment attempted to propose conditions such as: (i) the current use of the property, (ii) the history of the acquisition and use of the property, (iii) the importance of the public purpose for which the property is being acquired, (iv) the interests of those affected by the acquisition, and (v) any hardship to the owners (Constitution of Nauru (Referendum) Amendments Bill 2009b).

It was optimistically assumed that the amendment gave the landowners a lot of power and also would dispel any ambiguity and confusion over what "just terms" meant. However, the reaction from voters was different. One of the opposing opinions was that by listing the five conditions, the amendment ironically limited the options of the Supreme Court, which was to make the final decision, compared to the ambiguous but more open provisions of the Constitution. Perhaps the most significant factor was the fear, albeit unfounded, that the Government would try and use Article 8 to take away land. This fear was effectively spread around the island through community communicative networks.

The land issue became politicised and opinion makers within the community used the opportunity to mobilise anti-referendum campaigns. The Government responded by attempting to allay people's fears through extensive use of the media. The competition between the media and the informal discursive engagements within the community to win the public relations continued for weeks up to the referendum itself. The government media had to go into overdrive to compete with the wave of fear and dissent provoked by the land amendment proposal.

Election of the President

The second contentious issue was the election of the President, in particular whether the President, who was both Head of Government and Head of State, was to be elected by Parliament or directly by the people. As a unicameral parliamentary system under the Constitution, the President was elected by the 18 members of Parliament representing eight multi-member constituencies. Since there were no political parties, the President appointed any four or five parliamentarians as Ministers which then made up the Cabinet. The President and Cabinet held executive power and those not part of this ruling circle regarded themselves as the "opposition".[8]

The referendum bill recommended that Part 111 of the Constitution be amended to ensure that the President would be elected directly by the voters as in Kiribati. However, to control the number of candidates, the amendment also suggested that candidates for the presidency were to be nominated "from among members of Parliament, not fewer than two nor more than three candidates for election as President, and no other person may be a candidate" (Nauru Constitutional Amendment (Referendum) Bill 2009b: 11).

Opposition to this recommendation was based on the argument that the reform was not democratic enough because, while it suggested that presidents were to be elected directly by the people outside the confinement of Parliament, who could stand was restricted by a decision left once again to Parliament. Many regarded this contradictory to the principles of democracy and very patronising of the Nauru people.

Lack of Confidence in the State and Politics

Related to the above, was the deeply embedded lack of trust in the state system and political leadership which over the years had bred complacency and cynicism. While partially owing to the continuing instability in governance as discussed above, these attitudes reflected the continuing economic disaster, which were blamed squarely—rightly or wrongly—on political elites. Over the years, problems of poverty and socio-economic marginalisation, poor housing, limited fresh water and fresh food increased markedly, thus putting significant pressure on the already diminished island resources and capacity of an unstable government.[9] This was a far cry from the times of bounty when phosphate trade was at its peak and the citizens enjoyed a first-world lifestyle of high consumption and luxury. By the 1990s Nauru's assets were almost depleted as a result of "corruption, poor investment decisions, overspending and lack of planning" and the government was operating on a deficit budget, forcing it to tap into its reserves (Government of Nauru 2010: 2). Excessive borrowing resulted, so that by 2010 about 70 percent of the budgetary allocation was sourced through foreign aid. By the 2009-2010 budget year, Nauru had a total debt of US$869 million, roughly 20 times the budget (UNDP 2011).

The situation was further worsened by problems of governance and accountability. For instance, between 1998 and 2004 there was no government audited public account submitted to Parliament (Nauru Constitutional Review Commission 2007). In the case of several government statutory corporations, there had been no audited accounts since 1991-92 (Nauru Constitutional Review Commission 2007). The list of fiscal and ethical problems was staggering and included failure of collective responsibility by former cabinets and former governments to account for the use of public funds to the people of Nauru through Parliament, absence of statutory penal provisions to prevent such failures, breakdown of the computer system from 2001, absence of qualified accountants and loss of records. As if by political design, the Director of Audit had no access to Parliament records and expenditure.

The constitutional reform was expected to strengthen political, administrative and financial governance to reverse the instability, corruption, poor management and unscrupulous business practices of the previous years which led to Nauru's economic downfall. However, not many people were convinced that this optimism was workable because of the fixed perception that political leaders were unchangeable given Nauru's past history. Nauru people held their leaders responsible and their views were explicitly expressed during the consultations where some independent civil society organisations and community leaders openly challenged the reform and cast further doubt and distrust in the minds of other citizens.

Marginalising Community Dissent

A critical factor was the inability of the UNDP, Government and Constitutional Review Committee to include and co-opt dissenting voices in the community. Instead dissenting voices were ignored and marginalised as minor irritants which had no clout and thus no significant influence. They totally misread the situation. These dissenting voices represented a sizeable silent majority and took advantage of the kinship and community-based networks to extend their influence. The UNDP, Government and CRC used sophisticated media and public relations methods to mobilise public opinion as well as undermine dissenters. Instead of listening to and dialoguing with dissenters and tactically co-opting them gradually and progressively into the pro-reform bloc, they were basically treated with disdain. This merely strengthened the resolve of the dissenters to derail the process as the political campaigns became very personal and directed at times. Derogatory remarks often targeted Australians who some Nauru people believed had hijacked the reform process. This belief was justified by the involvement of Australian consultants, the public speech by the Australian Ambassador during the campaign urging people to vote "Yes", heavy involvement of an Australian in the media campaign as Director of Information and Australia's direct contribution in printing the Nauru constitution for distribution. All these activities provided ammunition for the dissenters who strategically whipped up people's feelings of ethno-nationalism and made the divide even wider.

Technical Blunder

The major technical blunder was bundling all the 34 amendments into the single "Yes" or "No" question: "Do you approve of the proposed law entitled the Constitution of Nauru (Referendum Amendment) Bill 2009?" In other words, it was impossible for the individual voters to choose what specific amendments they wanted to vote for. There was no provision for voters to vote on individual amendments so it was a case of either agreeing or disagreeing with the whole package. If person disagreed with two or three amendments out of 34, the only available option was to simply vote "No" for everything. For instance, while there was general endorsement of the human rights provisions, there was disagreement with the land acquisition issue.

This sparked off further debate about why the amendments were drafted this way. The UNDP consultant and later parliamentary counsel argued that the Constitution stated that the amendments had to be in the form of single bills. The consultant advised that all the amendments should be in a single bill instead of having a series of single bills (Le Roy 2008). The argument was that a series of single amendment bills would be confusing to the voters (CRC Minutes of meeting 2009). The critics thought otherwise, arguing that given the dire need for reform, minor technicalities, which might potentially derail the process, could have been easily ignored to ensure that the bigger goals were achieved. A CSO activist claimed that putting together the amendments in a bundle was reflective of the "paternalistic and neo-colonial thinking" of the UNDP and the CRC in assuming that Nauru people were "too dumb" to distinguish between the different amendments and would simply endorse the whole package. Accepting there was truth in this view, the fact that the "No" vote prevailed showed that Nauruan voters were informed and critical enough to articulate their views even in a dissenting way.

It took the costly path of going through the Referendum for the UNDP and CRC to realise their shortcomings and as a result they have decided to carry out a national survey to find out how people voted and their reasons for voting to help them design a new approach in the next referendum (CRC Draft Survey questions 2010). After the failure and embarrassment those concerned realised that the best way forward was to reconsider their approach and this time around to seriously consider the importance of local thinking and sentiments, something they had ignored earlier. In addition, they would try and break down the amendments into separate bills representing separate issues rather than bundling them all together. At the same time the CRC is continuing with certain amendments which could be carried out by the Parliament itself without another referendum (Constitution of Nauru Parliamentary Amendments Act 2009a). Perhaps one of the most positive aspect of the referendum was that it enabled the state and UNDP to begin to recognise the importance of engaging with local ways of knowing in the political reform process.

The Nauru Referendum provides a lesson for other constitutional review processes in the Pacific—that is, the need to strike a balance between the global and the local. It is imperative to note that approaches to reform should not be based on the notion that the global and local are essentially dichotomous and that the former is naturally superior to the latter. On the contrary, both are evolving societal constructs that are amenable to accommodation as well as contradiction. While certain international best practices such as equality, inclusivity, human rights and people participation have universal appeal, they are, at the same time, culture bound in their definitions and application. The inability to recognise and appreciate others' ways of knowing can create a situation of disjuncture and tension.

The UNDP-sponsored reform process held the erroneous assumption that as a small homogenous community, it would be easy to achieve a broad consensus among the people of Nauru. However, this assumption was misplaced because it failed to take into serious and practical consideration their traumatising historical experience and how this had been a major factor in shaping their apathy and suspicion of outsiders and political authority.

Furthermore, it must be noted that the reform was focused on reconfiguring the state's political and economic capacity and little attention was paid to improving the livelihood of the ordinary people. The inability to make the connections between high level institutional reforms and people's local concerns added to the people's sense of distance and disengagement. The gap between the formal sphere consisting of the state, consultants and UNDP on one hand and the local community and its ways of knowing on the other appeared intractable, and attempts to bridge the divide using conventional means of public relations and consultation failed to achieve the desired results. The UNDP measured the success of the different steps in terms of formally constructed and systematically codified activities using different sets of documents and not how effective the activities were in changing people's thinking and behaviour. This reliance on pre-formulated planning and monitoring systems used by UNDP did little to unearth and address the deeper sentiments and concerns of the community.

Alternatively, a more participatory and innovative approach could have been deployed to ensure greater community ownership and address the issue of historical trauma, alienation and division as a preparatory approach for the reform. For instance, the reform could have been preceded by an extended conversation between Nauru and other Pacific states as a way of sharing mutual reform experiences. Also important was the need for a national dialogue initiative based on the indigenous peace-building processes as a way of ameliorating vertical and horizontal differences which might create obstacles for reform (Boege and Brown 2009). The translation of the constitution into Nauruan and the use of the Nauruan language in all phases of the reform were vital to raise the level of consciousness and empowerment. Unfortunately they did not happen. Using a mixture of culturally familiar and appropriate introduced tools are of paramount importance in developing societies.

The Nauruan constitutional reform provided important lessons that need to be heeded. First is the importance of recognising the strengths and limits of both the global and local approaches and their capacity to co-exist and even synthesise creatively. Both have transformational potential that can be nurtured for reform purposes. Second, because of their hegemonic position, global discourses are not necessarily superior; "superiority" needs to be measured against appropriateness to local realities. Global ideas and practices are not necessarily universally applicable and acceptable as they need to be subjected to local cultural interpretations. Third, the defeat of the reform through the referendum (despite Parliament passing the reform bill through consensus) showed that parliaments and the state systems do not necessarily represent the democratic aspirations of the community as conventional wisdom dictates. Fourth, for acceptance of political reform, there should be local ownership of the reform process through use of local languages, communication channels and socio-cultural networks. Fifth, understanding history, not only official history but also the living experiences of colonised people and their collective suffering and trauma must be a factor in analysing their contemporary cultural notions and collective political responses. Modern day Nauru is the embodiment of such a historical dilemma.

NOTES

1. My discussions with representatives of the landowners association showed that dispute over land affected community stability and peace in a significant way. This was exacerbated by the distribution of mining royalties. Normally, matrilineal family heads were regarded as "landowners".
2. Many Nauruans I talked to still showed deep-seated anger about their history. Some would prefer not to discuss past issues when discussing current issues today.
3. Much of this information was shared by people in focus group discussions.
4. The Pacific states are quite diverse in political and economic characteristics and these variables do not capture the specificities. See http://www.undppc.org.fj/pages.cfm/our-work/democratic-governance/ for source of quotation.
5. These are a standard list of participants in reforms which are universally used by international agencies, civil society organisations and even states. For quotation, see UNDP http://www.undppc.org.fj/pages.cfm/our-work/democratic-governance/.
6. Sometimes the term "international best practice" is used.
7. These were based on interviews with some voters and members of the civil society organisations.
8. Parliament has a three-year term and there is universal suffrage with voting age at 20. The districts were administered by the NLGC until 1992 when they were abolished and today individual districts have their own community committees consisting of elected representatives. These committees carry out community projects and at times act as representative entities, although they are not legally constituted and regulated by law.
9. Based on the 2006 census, the unemployment rate was 34 percent and the Gross National Income (GNI) was minus 3.2 million. See Nauru Government (2010).

ABSTRACT

The dilemma posed by the gap between global thinking and local living is examined in relation to the constitutional reform process in Nauru. My article looks at the role of UNDP as a global player and how, in partnership with the local political elites, designed and administered a reform process which was defeated by the voters during the referendum in February 2010. The case illustrates the consequences of attempting to apply global principles and methods of reform in an isolated community whose traumatic colonial history created deep anguish and suspicion of outsiders, and provides some lessons for constitutional reform in the Pacific states.

Keywords: global discourse, local culture, constitutional reform, referendum, Nauru

Bula vinaka Leighton,

While awaiting our consultation next week, I want to send you an article I wrote in 2010, while I was still in Auckland, regarding the constitutional review process in Nauru and why it was rejected in a referendum in 2010. It was the very first constitutional referendum in the Pacific and it failed. I was asked by UNDP (which facilitated the constitutional reform) to go to Nauru to review the process and find out exactly what went wrong with the review process. There are some lessons here which our Constitutional Review Commission might want to learn from, especially since we are going to have our very first constitutional referendum ever.

Social Democratic Liberal Party (SODELPA)

SODELPA
Date: 8-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: The consultation session this afternoon is now called to order. I welcome the Minister of Education, Member of Parliament, Mr. Aseri Radrodro, and I believe the leader of SODELPA, and I welcome you gentlemen and lady, members of the SODELPA political party. It is indeed a pleasure receiving you here this afternoon. I know that you had asked for a slot for next week. We are really tied up, and that was why I made a suggestion yesterday to your General Secretary that you can appear before us today, give us a brief summary of your submission, and then send us the submissions later on, your completed submissions. However, I'm happy to see that together with you, you have also brought your written submissions. So, some quick work must have been done last night in order to complete your submissions, and I thank you for that. The Commissioner sitting here this afternoon, I will ask them to introduce themselves.
And before I move on with the introductions and the opening, we will start from my right, and the introductions will follow.

Dr. Fatiaki: Through you, Chair, and welcome Honourable Minister and members of the SODELPA. My name is John Charles Fatiaki. I'm a medical practitioner in Suva. I come from the village of Motusa on Rotuma, and I'm a former senator and medical doctor. Bula Vinaka, Minister and SODELPA Party members.

Ms. Nailatikau: I'm Merewalesi Nailatikau. My background is in public diplomacy and policy. Bula Vinaka, Honourable Minister and leader of the Social Democratic Liberal Party.

Mr. Beg: Welcome. Thank you for coming. My name is Conway Baig. I'm an architect by profession, and I'm happy to be here and listen to you. Thank you. Good afternoon, Minister and members.

Mr. Kohli: My name is Ami Koli. I'm a lawyer from Mombasa. Mula vinaka, Honourable Minister and leader of Sodelpa Party and colleagues from Sodelpa.

Dr. Gounder: Good to have you today. My name is Niles Gounder. I'm an academic at USP. Today, I'm sitting here as one of the commissioners of the CRC, and we look forward to your submission this afternoon.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, Commissioners. I am Sevuloni Valenitabua, and the chairperson of the Constitutional Review Commission. I'm a lawyer by profession. Vinaka, Honorable Minister and members of SODELPA Party, the commission, the CRC, was appointed, as you would know, by His Excellency, the President of the country. We were appointed to review the 2013 Constitution, and reviewing means, as is defined in the Constitution, it can mean repeal, it can mean amending, it can mean other things, changes and things like that. So, that is our objective. Part of the term of reference required us to go around the country and collect submissions and views from our people as to what they think should be included in the amended 2013 Constitution. We have been around the country, Lau Group, Vanua Levu, Viti Levu, and the islands, and we are now in the last week of consultations at Level 9.

We were in, I think, Matuku or Moala when the Minister was there to open some classrooms, and he interrupted our program that day, but no qualms about that.

Anyway, we are here to listen to your submissions. We are strapped for time, so I believe that your presenter will summarize to us what's in your written submission. Without much ado, or without further ado, I will now give the mic and the floor to you, so that you can present us with your submissions.

Mr. Radrodro: Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chair, the CRC and members of the CRC. I would like to take this time to thank you for accommodating us.
We should have been scheduled for an earlier time, and thank you for giving us this time. We would prefer a much later time, but like you said, we had to do with the time given to us to make the presentation today. So, before I will be making the presentation, and maybe the members can also introduce themselves, starting from my right, who will be assisting in the submission that is made today.

Mr. Dagoa: My name is Jone Dagoa, former geologist, I previously worked in the mines division in the Mineral Resources Department in the development sector, and I hail from Nasiriji, Tavua.

Mr. Takayawa: My name is Viliame Takayawa, I am the aspiring candidate for the 2026 elections, and I hope you will vote for us.

Ms. Raduva: My name is Mary Raduva, I am a youth candidate for this year's general elections.

Mr. Tiko: My name is Varinava Tiko, I am a candidate for SODELPA, and I am not a backbencher.

Mr. Rasova: My name is Simione Rasova, I am from Nabouwalu, Kadavu, and I am the General Secretary for the SODELPA.

Mr. Radrodro: Thank you Mr. Chair, and I am Aseri Radrodro, the current Minister for Education and also the party leader for SODELPA. I would like to start our presentation, if you allow us, given that we are pressed for time, we will just go through the main topics that we would like to highlight, and our members can also pitch in should they wish to, given the time constraints. So, we will start, Mr. Chair, as the party for SODELPA respectfully submits that Fiji now has a historic opportunity to settle the constitutional questions that have divided the country for more than a generation, and the review of the 2013 constitution must not be treated as a narrow legal exercise.

It must be a national act of healing, reconstruction, and democratic renewal, and a durable constitution must be owned by the people, reflects the lived realities of Fiji's communities, protect equal citizenship, restore confidence in indigenous institutions, remove the culture of coup immunity, strengthen the rule of law, and create institutions that no government can easily capture.

This submission draws on the present constitution, the Constitution Review Commission process in 1997, Constitution in 2012, Yash Ghai draft, the SDL party's 2012 submissions, the Citizens Constitution Forum comparative analysis, the Great Council of Chiefs Review Report 2023, the Matanitu iTaukei Review 2024, relevant Fiji laws and international human rights principles, as it further updates the submission that was made in 2012 to Yash Ghai, and recommendations in a manner that is democratic, inclusive, modern, culturally respectful, and forward-looking. So, the central recommendations of these submissions, number one, SODELPA wishes to reinstate Fiji Islander as a common civic national identity for every Fijian in Fiji, while reserving the term Fijian for indigenous Fijians as first nations of Fiji, and as registered in the Vola ni Kawa Bula.

This must be done in a way that guarantees equal citizenship and equal human dignity for all citizens and recognizes the rightful place of the Rotuman's, of Indo-Fijians, of Banabans, descendants of Solomon and Vanuatu people, Europeans, Chinese, and all other communities who have made Fiji their home. Secondly, SODELPA wishes to recommend removal of entrance immunity for coup makers for those involved in unconstitutional overthrow of elected governments, and the Constitution should prohibit future immunity for treasons, coups, torture, serious human rights abuse, serious corruption, and unlawful seizure of power. The role of RFMF must be reinvigorated, enhanced, and financially supported to secure its role in nation building, strategic defense, youth development, security, border protection, strategic development, crisis response, and regional security.

Number four, reinforce a national truth reconciliation and constitutional accountability commission to address national issues of importance, including the coups and the victims, support restorative justice, document institutional failures, recommend reparations, and recommend conditional amnesty only where truth, accountability, and victim participation are satisfied.

Number five, constitutionally recognize the Bose Levu Vakaturaga, the great council of chiefs as an independent, non-partisan of improperly funded institutions of the Vanua, responsible for Itaukei culture, language, traditional knowledge, customary leadership, community cohesion, reconciliation, and advice on matters affecting the Vanua. The great council of chiefs and its role must be constitutionally recognized as a GCC for all Fiji Islanders, have advisory role in national security as a member of the national security council, resource management, climate discourse, and retain an advisory role on all issues pertaining to indigenous issues as prescribed in the 1875 Bose Levu Vakaturaga meeting in Draiba.

The constitution should guarantee equal citizenship, a strong bill of rights, and progressive social justice rights covering education, health, housing, water, food, work, social security, disability inclusion, women's rights, children's rights, youth participation, labor rights, digital rights, and environmental rights. Position the RFMF under clear civil democratic control and remove any constitutional guardian or oversight role and reorient security resources towards external defense, maritime security, peacekeeping, disaster response, and national resilience. Create a representative and accountable parliament, ideally through a personalized national open list system, and consider a House of Review or Senate to ensure provincial maritime, Rotuman, Banaban women's, youth, disability, customary, and civil society voices are heard.

And SODELPA proposes that the commission under a personalized national open list system as a Fiji-Taylor electoral option. It retains the democratic strength of a ballot and proportional party outcomes while adding a clear human and provincial connection between voters and candidates. Strengthen independent institutions including judiciary, electoral commission, Auditor General, Human Rights Commission, Public Service Commission, Ombudsman or Ethics and Integrity Commission, and an anti-corruption framework free from political control.

Protect Itaukei, Rotuman, Kioa, and Banaban land, Qoliqoli, culture, language, sacred sites, customary law, and benefits sharing rights while ensuring that the customary mechanisms operate consistently with human rights, natural justice, and access to courts. Protect local investments, business interests, SMEs of small micro-enterprises, and encourage aggressive investment to further and sustain the sustainable national development agenda. Adopt a balanced amendment procedure reflecting the Supreme Court's 2025 advisory guidance that constitutional change should be possible through a strong parliamentary majority and a referendum, while requiring enhanced consultation for protected rights, land, indigenous institutions, the Bill of Rights, and the judiciary.

Mr. Chair, the guiding principles of this submission is simple. Fiji's future cannot be built by erasing history, rewarding unlawful power or centralizing authority. It must be built by recognizing every community, protecting the nation's indigenous foundations, respecting equal citizenship, ending immunity for coups, and making the constitution a living covenant of peace.

As part one of the submission, Mr. Chair, SODELPA welcomes the establishment of the Constitution Review Commission and the nationwide public awareness and civic education. The current process recognizes that the constitution must be understood by the people before the people can meaningfully contribute to its review. And the Prime Minister's ministerial statement describes the review as a chance for ordinary people from every community and all walks of life to have a say in the review of the Supreme Law and notes that the commission is tasked with listening to views, receiving written submission, and preparing a report with a draft constitution bill.

SODELPA therefore approaches this process in good faith. And the party submits that a legitimate constitution must be more than a legal text. It must be a national settlement.

It must be an answer. It must answer the unresolved questions that have repeatedly destabilized Fiji. The status of the indigenous Fijians, the meaning of equal citizenry or citizenship, the role of the vanua, the place of the Great Council of Chiefs, the protection of the land and resources, the civilian control of the military, the removal of the community, and the creation of independent institutions that can survive changes of government.

The current civic education process, including the base sessions facilitated by the Office of the Auditor General with other state institutions reflect the principles that public participation must be informed and accessible. The submission, Mr. Chair, asks that the commission to go further and ensure that the voices of villages, settlements, province, maritime islands, Rotuma, Rabi, Kioa, voices of women, voices of youth, persons with disability, faith communities, workers, businesses, farmers, landowners, tenants, industrial citizens are all captured before a final draft is prepared.

The sources and methodologies are highlighted in there, in the Section 2. And the principles of a legitimate constitution, as I've already mentioned, proposal against the following principles, legitimacy, continuity and correction, equal citizenship, indigenous recognition, rule of law, anti-co-constitutionalism, institutional independence, social justice, participation, and the future generations.

On Part 2 of our submission, Mr. Speaker, on national identity, unity and preamble, the reinstating Fiji Islander as a common national identity. The question of national identity is not a symbolic side issue. It is a constitutional question that affects belonging, historical memory, citizenship, reconciliation, and emotional legitimacy of the state.

And SODELPA submits that Fiji must build one civic family without erasing the historic name of the indigenous people. The 2013 constitution declares that all citizens are Fijian, united by a common and equal citizenship. While SODELPA acknowledges the value of common and equal citizenship, it submits that the naming formula has remained deeply contested because it was imposed without sufficient consultation and without the concurrence of indigenous Fijians.

The SDL party, in its 2012 submission, was clear the word Fijian should be used for indigenous Fijians only, while Fiji Islander should remain the common name for all Fiji citizens. Therefore, Mr. Chair and members of the commission, SODELPA proposes the following constitutional settlement. All citizens of Fiji are Fijians and enjoy equal citizenship, equal dignity, equal protection of the law, and equal rights and responsibilities.

And the term Fijian refers to the indigenous Fijian people of Fiji, the First Nations of Fiji, and is registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula. The recognition does not diminish the citizenship or dignity of any citizen or community. It affirms both equal civic belongings and the distinct historical identity of the indigenous people.

This approach is not exclusionary. It is a respectful data recognition, dual recognition model. It allows every citizen to share one civic identity as Fiji Islanders while restoring the historical rooted identity of indigenous Fijians.

It also avoids the false choice between equal citizenship and indigenous recognition. And Fiji can, can, and must have both. There is a table, Mr. Chair, that gives specific justification to the Fiji Islander and the Fijian names.

A preamble that tells the truth and heals the nation. And the constitution should begin with a preamble that is historically honest, spiritually respectful, inclusive, and aspirational. And so Delco proposes a preamble that combines the historical honesty of the 1997 constitution, the progressive values of the Yash Ghai draft, with the identity formulation of the submission that was made by the party, SDL, in 2012, which states that we, the people of Fiji Island, seeking the blessings of God and mindful of the spiritual heritage of these islands, recognizing the first settlement, spiritual connection, culture, land, and traditional institutions of the indigenous Fijians and the Rotuman people, acknowledging the descendants of indentured laborers, descendants of Solomon and Vanuatu people, Banabans, Tuvalu, Europeans, Chinese, and all other settlers and migrants who have made Fiji their home, affirming that all citizens are Fiji Islanders, equal in dignity and rights, respecting the identity of the Fijian people as indigenous Fijians, determined to heal the divisions of the past and the coup culture, protect our land and ocean, and build a just, democratic, multicultural, and sustainable nation, give ourselves this constitution.

Mr. Chair, languages, faith, and spiritual heritage of Fiji, in our earlier submission, 2012, proposed strong recognition of the Fijian language, the continued use of English and Hindustani, the recognition of Fiji's Christian heritage, and SODELPA submits that this point should be modernized in a way that both honors tradition and protects equal freedom of conscience. The constitution should recognize English, Fijian, or Vosa Vaka Viti, Fiji Hindustani, Chinese, Mandarin, and Cantonese, and determine as language of national importance. English should remain a working language of the state.

The Fijian language should be recognized as the language of indigenous Fijians and strengthened in education and parliament, courts, and public services. Fiji Hindustani should be recognized as a living language of a major community. Rotuma should be recognized and protected as a language of Rotuma.

Public bodies should progressively provide services in these languages and where appropriate, in other accessible forms. On faith, Mr. Chair, members of the commission, SODELPA proposed that the constitution recognizes the historic and continuing role of Christianity in Fiji, especially in the life of the indigenous Fijian community, while also recognizing the contribution of Hinduism, Sikhism, other Christian denominations, other faith, and those of no religious belief. And the state should guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, and belief for all.

And the constitution should not be used to discriminate against any citizen on the basis of faith. On equal citizenry and modern compact, SODELPA proposes a modern compact that is justiciable where appropriate, interpretive where appropriate, and clear enough to guide all public institutions. The modern compact should affirm, as listed in bullet points there, that all Fiji Islanders are equal citizens and no citizen is a guest in the country of their birth or lawful citizenship.

The indigenous people have a distinct identity, land base, culture, language, and traditional institutions that must be constitutionally protected. The Rotuman people have distinct land, culture, language, and institutional rights that must be protected. Banaban identity, the special position of Rabi, and the rights of the Banaban community require constitutional recognition and protection.

All communities, including Indo-Fijians, Solomons, Vanuatu, Tuvalu, Europeans, Chinese, and new citizens have made important contributions to Fiji, and it must be respected. Social justice and equity measures should address disadvantages where it exists, including in rural maritime, indigenous settlement, women, youth, disability, and low-income communities. The state must actively promote national unity through fair development.

Civic education language, language respect, sports, culture, volunteer services, and equitable access to public services. Part three of our submission, Mr. Chair, is regarding indigenous rights, land, customs, and the great council of chiefs. SODELPA submits that the constitution must protect indigenous rights in a manner consistent with equal citizenship and international standards.

UNDRIP recognizes indigenous people's rights to self-determination, institutions, cultural land, resources, consultation, and free, fair, and informed consent. In a submission in 2012, similar emphasis was on land security, mahogany minerals, customary law, and indigenous institutions. We affirm that the constitution should protect, number one, Itaukei land from permanent alienation, arbitrary acquisition, or executive manipulation, Rotuma land, culture, and institution, Banaban interest, identity, and the special position of the Rabi community, the customary fishing rights, qoliqoli, and marine resource interest, the sacred sites, burial grounds, regional pathways, cultural landscape, and cultural intellectual property, traditional knowledge, language, genealogy, oral history, cultural expression, motives, designs, music, chants, and ecological knowledge, community benefit sharing from tourism, mineral, forest, water, biodiversity, carbon markets, blue economy, initiatives, and conservative finance.

Free and prior and informed consent for major projects affecting land, qoliqoli, sacred sites, and community resources, and access to independent courts of tribunal for lands, resources, and customary disputes. We propose as SODELPA party a constitutional duty to consult affected landowners, resource owners, provincial councils, tequila councils, village institutions, and relevant customary authorities before any law or policy, or lease, project, or concession material which affects lands, qoliqoli, customary rights, or sacred sites. Consultation must be early, meaningful, accessible, culturally appropriate, and documented, and consent should be required to, for higher impact projects and any projects affecting sacred or essential, or existing land resources.

Mr. Chair, I would like to take us to number 10. So dear SODELPA, strongly submits that the Bose Levu Vakaturaga, the Greek Council of Chiefs, must be constitutionally recognized as an independent, non-partitioned, and properly resourced institution. In our 2012 submission, as SDL, the BLV be established under the constitution that Parliament pass a BLV Act setting out its role, its functions, its powers, funding, accountability, and reform responsibilities.

In the 2012 guide draft, it recognizes the Bose Levu Vakaturaga as custodians of iTaukei culture and traditions, and as a non-partitioned organ of civil society that could promote wider understanding of iTaukei culture consistently with Fiji's multicultural character. The review report also emphasized that the GCC can contribute to sustainable development, cultural preservation, community engagement, conflict resolution, peace, justice, and strong institutions. The party SODELPA proposes the following constitutional formula.

There shall be a Bose Levu Vakaturaga, the Great Council of Chiefs, as an independent and non-partitioned constitutional institution of all Fijian communities. The Bose Levu Vakaturaga shall be custodian of Fijian culture, language, customary leadership, traditional knowledge, chiefly system, indigenous heritage, reconciliation, and the well-being of all Fijian communities. It shall perform its functions consistently with democracy, human rights, gender, dignity, the rule of law, the rights of indigenous people, and the multicultural character of Fiji.

The GCC should not be reduced to ceremony. It should have practical constitutional functions, which are included in the bullet points that I have given before you. The independence and funding and accountability of the GCC should not be dependent on the political goodwill of the government of the day.

The constitution should provide for a standing annual appropriation, an independent secretariat, audited accounts, annual reporting to Parliament, and provincial councils' transparent appointment process, code of conduct, and protection from arbitrary abolition or suspension. Parliament should enact the Great Council of Chiefs Act within 12 months of the new constitution's commencement. A modern re-armed GCC model should deliver proposals that the GCC should be modernized through three complementary arms.

The Council of Chiefs, the Derivative Cultural and Advisory Boarding, the Itaukei Cultural Research and Development Trust, a funding and research arm for language, culture, leadership, education, entrepreneurship, traditional knowledge, and intergenerational transmission. This funding arm should be an amalgam of all iTaukei institutions, including ITLTB, Fijian Holding, TTFB, and all other potential funding sources, including government. And the third one is the Vanua Social Concern and Community Resilience Arm, a non-profit arm supporting village, development, poverty reduction, climate resilience, disaster preparedness, youth services, women's leadership, disability inclusion, and conflict resolution.

Mr. Chair, I'll put number four on democracy, anti-coup, safeguards, and institutional reform. Removing immunity and ending the coup culture. SSODELPA submits that the entrenched immunity provisions in Chapter 10 of the 2013 Constitution are incompatible with constitutional democracy.

The 2013 Constitution constitutes immunity under the 1990 Constitution, which continues immunity under the limitation of liability for prescribed political events. Decree 2010 grants further absolute and unconditional immunity to wider categories of public actors for direct and indirect participation in government from 5 December 2006. The SDL party warned in 2012 that unilateral immunity would desecrate the sanctity of the constitutional documents and perpetuate a cycle of coup, an immunity coup, and immunity.

SODELPA now submits that no new constitution will be morally or democratically legitimate if it leaves this structure untouched. Our recommendation is to repeal the entrenched immunity provisions and all clauses purporting to make them unamendable. Declare that no future constitution law, decree, or executive arm may grant immunity for treason, unconstitutional seizure of power, torture, extrajudicial killing, enforced disappearance, sexual violence, serious corruption, or gross human rights violation.

Provide that any attempt to establish government other than under the constitution is unlawful, void, and incapable of validation except through a lawful democratic transition approved by the people. Disqualify principal co-leaders and principal beneficiaries from public office, military command, police command, constitutional office, and ministerial office subject to due process. Require all members of the disciplined forces, public officers, ministers, members of parliaments, and judges to swear an oath rejecting unconstitutional seizure of power. And create civic education in the RFMF, police, corrections, schools, public services, and communities on constitutional democracy and civilian authority. The amnesty to the reconciliation is not a blanket immunity, and SODELPA supports a national reconciliation, but reconciliation cannot be built on silence. The submissions of the party in 2012 distinguish amnesty from immunity and propose a special commission to examine the cause, document participation, and make recommendations for amnesty.

And SODELPA proposes a modern victim-centered national truth, reconciliation, and constitutional accountability commission. The commission should carry out those responsibilities as in the bullet points. Civilian control and reform of the RFMF.

SODELPA, Mr. Speaker, Sir, Mr. Chair, Sir, recommends to define the roles of RFMF external defense, maritime security, peacekeeping, disaster support and assistance to civil authorities under law. Remove any broad constitutional phrase that could be interpreted as a political guardian role. Require the RFMF to be politically neutral and subordinate to the elected civilian government and the constitution.

Create a civilian-led national security council accountable to parliament. Require parliamentary approval for the defense budget, major procurement, and security policy. Require the General to audit defense expenditure subject to narrow and reviewable national security reduction and rebalance military expenditure toward maritime surveillance, border protection, engineering, disaster response, climate relocation support, regional peacekeeping professionalism, and contributing to mandatory national service for school leavers and dropouts.

On the parliamentary electoral reforms and a House of Review, Fiji needs an electoral system that produces fair representation, stable government, and a real connection between the voters and representatives. The 2013 Single National Constituency weakens local accountability and makes it difficult for citizens in provinces, maritime islands, and local communities to know who directly represents them.

And SODELPA proposed a system that preserves proportional fairness while restoring constituency representation.

The submissions by the party in 2012 supported a bicameral system, bicameral parliament, the removal of compulsory voting, and the movement toward one person, one vote, one vote through a mixed-member proportional approach. SODELPA proposed that the Commission consider a mixed breed of personalized national open list system as a Fiji-tailored electoral option. It retains the democratic strength of a national proportional system, one person, one vote, one value, a single national ballot, and proportional party outcomes.

While adding a clearer human and provincial connections between voters and candidates. The purpose is not to return Fiji to communal roles or rigid provincial seats. The purpose is to give every voter a simple way to support either a trusted provincial voice or a nationally-advised leader, while ensuring that each vote still contributes fairly to the party's national vote. The proposal, the details of the proposed personalized national system are there in 14.1, Mr. Chair and the members. And if you need any clarification, we will be able to address and provide information after the presentation. The international validation and Fiji's opportunity to innovate. The exact Fiji model proposed here would be new, but its components are not experimental. International comparative practice recognizes least proportional representation, open list personalized candidate choice.

Fiji's present constitutional model is already a national open list proportional representation system.
And Fiji's electoral profile records that members of parliament are elected by a multi-member open list proportional representation system. SODELPA therefore submits that Fiji can be both cautious and creative. The personalized national open list system is not radical because it preserves a single national ballot, equal voting value, and proportional party outcomes.

The recommended constitutional legislative safeguards, the constitution should state the core principles only. Parliament is elected through a system of proportional representation based on one person, one vote, one value. With voter choice among candidates and with mechanisms for both national and provincial accountability. The model should be explained through voter education in English, iTaukei, Fiji Hindi, Rotuma, and accessible formats, including work examples for rural, urban, and maritime voters. After two general elections, an independent review should assess whether the system has improved local accountability, women's participation, youth representation, provincial vote, voter understanding, and proportional fairness. The proposed position, SODELPA recommends that the commission include the personalized national open list system as a serious electoral reform option for public consultation.

It should be presented not as a rigid final formula, but as a principled Fiji design model capable of reconciling national proportional fairness with provincial accountability and voter confidence. The House of Review or Senate, SODELPA proposes serious consideration of a second chamber. A House of Review or Senate that is not a rival government, but a constitutional safeguard for deliberation, regional voice, indigenous consultation, and quality lawmaking.

It may include representation from provinces, from Rotuma, from Rabi, Kioa, and municipalities, women, youth, persons with disabilities, labor, business, faith, communities, civil society, and the vanua. The GCC and provincial council should have a defined role in nominating or selecting a limited number of members whose role is to review and advise, but not to exercise partisan control over government. The House of Review or Senate should have delaying and consultative powers, enhanced powers over protected matters, and a duty to review legislation for consistency with the Bill of Rights, land protection, indigenous rights, public finance, responsibility, and constitutional values.

Executive governments, governments and limits of concentrated power, the Constitution should provide that cabinet is collectively accountable to Parliament. The Prime Minister appoints ministers, but appointments to independent officers must not be controlled by the Prime Minister or the Attorney General. The Attorney General should be the government's principal legal advisor, but should not dominate judicial, prosecutorial, electoral, disciplinary, anti-corruption, legal profession, or accountability appointments.

The President should be a unifying, nonpartisan head of state, appointed by a broad parliamentary consensus, with a fallback mechanism that requires cross-party participation. Major constitutional appointments should require open advertisement, merit assessment, independent recommendation, and parliamentary confirmation. Cabinet size should be limited by law to reduce patronage and cost.

Ministers should be subject to enforceable conflict of interest, asset declaration, procurement, gifts, travel, and post office employment rules. On the judiciary and rule of law, judicial independence is the spine of constitutional democracy. The Constitution guarantees the independence of all courts, protects judicial tenure and remuneration, prohibits executive interference, and allows courts to enforce the Constitution against all branches of government.

The Judicial Service Commission should be independent of executive dominance and should include the Chief Justice, senior judicial representatives, representatives of the legal profession, persons of high integrity appointed by a transparent process, and limited non-voting administrative support. Attorney General should not control judicial appointments or the disciplinary process. SODELPA made the recommendations to restore full court jurisdiction to interpret and enforce all parts of the Constitution, including transition and immunity questions, appoint judges through merit-based, transparent process, protect tenure, remunerations, and security of officers.

Create transparent judicial complaints, procedures that cannot be used for political retaliation, and protect the independence of the Directors of Public Prosecution, guarantee legal aid and access to courts, including for rural and maritime communities, recognize customary disputes, resolution, but preserve access to the courts. On the independent Constitutional Offices and Integrity Institutions, I ask Mr. Karavaki to take over from this presentation.

Mr. Karavaki : Fiji Independent Offices must be independent in substance and not only in name. The 2013 Constitution creates a Constitutional Office Commission chaired by the Prime Minister and including the Attorney General, which raises concerns about executive dominance over key appointments. SODELPA proposes a rebalance COC. A COC should include the President on Nominee, Leader of the Opposition Chief Justice on Nominee, a representative of the Fiji Law Society, a representative nominated by the GCC Provincial Institution for Indigenous Institutional Matters, and independent members selected through a transparent parliamentary process.

The Prime Minister and Attorney General should not together control the majority as we have experienced in the 2018 Constitution. The Constitution should strengthen Electoral Commission and Supervisory Elections, the Auditor General, and all those that are listed on the bullet points. They are all Constitutional Offices.

The Public Service and State Services. SODELPA proposes a public service that is professional, nonpartisan, decentralized, and people-centered. Public officers must serve the Constitution and the public, not the party in government.

The Public Service Commission should protect merit appointments, fair, disciplined, equal opportunity, gender-balanced disability, inclusion, linguistic capacity, and regional representation. The Constitution should support decentralization of services to divisions, provinces, towns, something that is being partially done at the moment, but we believe that it should be a very extensive process. The rights, social justice, and inclusive development.

A strong and enforceable Bill of Rights. We see all the Bill of Rights that are listed on the bullet points. Unfortunately, we see that the Bill of Rights are all unenforceable to the major extent of it.

Because in every Bill of Rights, you see the exceptions underneath. That only if the government has the funding, then those Bill of Rights can be exercised. Otherwise, they are there by words for selling to international communities, but they are unenforceable locally.

Something we feel that it should be changed, as we will be later on advocating in one of these particular rights to demonstrate our commitment to the enforcement of those rights for the better living of our citizens in this country. Women, equality, and leadership. SDL 2012 submission recognized CEDAW, the Beijing platform, commitments, women empowerment, women in decision-making, women, and the law.

Employment, livelihoods, elimination of violence, and women's health. It supports an immediate target of 30% women in Parliament and parity in the long term. We hope that we can demonstrate this as an example in the coming elections.

CEDAW proposes to modernize this recommendation by recognizing that temporary special measures are not contrary to merit. They are tools to remove barriers of equal opportunity. The constitution should require state and political parties to promote women's equal participation in Parliament.

Cabinet, public boards, the public service, provisional institutions, municipal councils, statutory authorities, and the private sector. Specific constitutional legislative measures should include gender balance. Party listing using a cyber alternative placement system where party lists are used.

Public funding incentives for parties that meet women's representative targets and all those bullet points. The youth empowerment, SDL in its 2012 submission proposes constitutional provision for youth representation in Parliament. You will see that on the right of our party leader we have a youth aspiring candidate for the coming general elections.

A young woman who is interested and we hope that we can demonstrate exactly what we are talking about over here in our proposal. Also disability, we have the president of the disability association who is also an aspiring candidate for the coming election. That's what we also want to promote and we hope that this commission can take serious recognition of that in our submission.

Pension entitlement and protection for accrued rights. SDL in 2012 submission proposed that pension entitlement is a right. SODELPA supports the constitutional protections.
This is our elders who have worked tirelessly in the past and giving us a very bright opportunity as we look to the future. The social justice equity and shared prosperity. SODELPA proposes social justice chapter that requires the state to take targeted evidence-based measures to secure equality of opportunity.

This should include programs for indigenous Fijians, Rotuman's, Banabans, Indo-Fijians and other communities where disadvantage is shown and for women, youth, persons with disability, elder persons, rural and maritime communities, informal settlements, workers, farmers, students and low income families. Social justice measures should be transparent, time bound or appropriately reviewed by parliament based on need and historical disadvantage and designed to promote dignity, capability and national unity rather than dependency or division. The decentralization public finance environment and future generation.

SODELPA submits that democracy must be visible in the daily lives of people. It must reach villages, settlements, maritime islands, towns, provinces and out islands. The constitution should require regular local government elections, strengthened provisional councils, meaningful village planning and fair fiscal transfers of local and provincial institutions.

Something that SODELPA believes, the decentralization so that our people in the rural areas, in villages, in settlements, they feel that we are traveling together as a people, as a nation. The public finance revenue expenditure, the constitution should make public finance transparent, responsible and people centered public funds must be used for public benefit, major borrowing, guarantees, public private partnership, natural resources, concession and state asset disposal should be transparent and subject to parliamentary scrutiny. SODELPA proposes those, under those bullet points, the climate, environment, oceans and future generation.

The 2012 guide draft included an entire chapter on natural heritage, including the natural environment, land rights, land use, fishing grounds, natural resources, consultations and land laws. The CCAF analysis noted that the more detailed environment and resource provisions of the 2012 draft were largely omitted from the 2018 government draft. SODELPA proposes restoring and strengthening these provisions.
It should protect the rights of future generations. It should require fair benefits, sharing for common markets, rural economy projects, mineral extraction, tourism, conservation, finance and other resource uses. It should protect communities facing climate displacement through consultation, land security, cultural continuity, relocation support and legal recognitions of climate affected rights.

Constitutional amendment and transition, 2018 constitution originally required very high thresholds for amendment and transition immunity provisions. The Supreme Court 2035 advisory opinion is summarized by international idea and Fiji news reporting opening pathway by confirming that amendments can proceed with a two-thirds parliamentary majority and a majority in a referendum while keeping the people referendum rule. SODELPA proposes a balanced amendment formula which is listed under those bullet points.

Law inconsistent with constitutional democracy should be amended or repealed within a defined period. The term Fijian refers to the indigenous Fijian people of Fiji, the first nation of Fiji as defined under the voluntary formula. No law, policy or public act may use this recognition to deny or diminish the equal citizenship rights or dignity of any citizens or community.

The clause 2, the recognitions of communities. The Republic recognizes the indigenous Fijian people, the Rotuman people, the Banaban community, descendants of indigenous laborers, Pacific Islanders, Solomon, Vanuatu, Europeans, Chinese and all other communities who have made Fiji their home. The Republic shall protect the language, culture, heritage and dignity of every community and shall promote unity through justice, respect and equal citizenship.

Clause 3, the anti-coup provision. Any attempt to establish, support, recognize or maintain a government other than in accordance with its constitution is unlawful and void. No person may claim public authority arising from a coup, treason, insurrection, military intervention or unconstitutional seizure of power.

No immunity shall be granted for such conduct. Clause 4, the truth, reconciliation and accountability. Parliament shall establish a National Truth, Reconciliation and Constitutional Accountability Commission to inquire into unconstitutional seizures of power, coups, attempted coups and related abuses.

Here, victims receive disclosures, recommend reparations, institutional reform and civic education, and recommend conditional amnesties only in accordance with the constitution and the rights of victims. Clause 5, The Bose Levu Vakaturaga. There shall be a Bose Levu Vakaturaga, the Great Council of Chiefs, as an independent, non-partisan constitutional institution of the vanua.

Its functions, composition, funding, reporting and obligations, code of conduct and secretariat shall be prescribed by law, consistently with its role as custodians of Fijian culture, language, traditional knowledge, customary leadership, reconciliation and the well-being of the vanua. Clause 6 is about the land of qoliqoli and customary rights. We say this, the ownership and beneficial interests and customary rights of indigenous Fijians, Rotuman's and Banabans in land of qoliqoli, sacred sites, cultural heritage, traditional knowledge and natural resources shall be protected.

No law or administrative act may arbitrarily alienate, diminish or extinguish those rights. The State shall ensure meaningful consultation and, where required by law, free, prior and informed consent. Clause 7, the Civil and Control of Discipline Force, this is our proposition.

The Republic of Fiji Military Forces, Fiji Police Force and the Fiji Correction Services shall be politically neutral, professional and subordinate to the Constitution and the elected civilian authority. The military shall have no role in determining the legitimacy of an elected government, parliament or court. Clause 8, the Rights of Limitations.
A right of freedom may be limited only by law and only to the extent that the limitation is reasonable, necessary and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society, based on human dignity, equality, freedom, democracy and the rule of law. Clause 9 is about public participation and this is our proposition. The public bodies shall facilitate meaningful public participation in law making, policy making, building and decision-affecting communities.

Participation must be timely, informed, accessible, culturally appropriate and inclusive of women, youth, persons with disabilities, rural and maritime communities, linguistic communities and affected customary authorities. So the clause 10, the amendments, it says this, this Constitution may be amended only by the procedures set out in this chapter. No amendment may grant or entrench immunity for unconstitutional seizure of power, treason, coup, torture, serious human rights, abuse or serious corruption.

Protected methods require enhanced consultation with affected communities and approved by referendum.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Karavaki, it's now after 3pm, our time was to have finished at 3. If you look to your left, we have the next group outside who are here to also make submissions to us. May I ask that you wrap up now so that we can bring this consultation to a close, please.

Mr. Karavaki : Thank you, Mr. Chair. Can we just highlight just a few points? I think we should stop reading. Can we just highlight a few issues? Everything that we are reading is here for your deliberations. Just highlight a few points before we conclude, sir.

Mr. Valenitabua : Yes, just please be aware that we have the Ministry of Lands officers waiting outside. Thank you.

Mr. Radrodro : I just want to refer you to the clarification and deliberation in terms of RFMF role in the National Service Programme that we had alluded to earlier. The evolving dynamics that is in page 36, these are some supporting documentations, additional proposal and policy that the Commission can take into consideration.

For the role of the Fiji military forces to provide clarity in terms of youth development and the proposal for the National Service Pathway for youths aged 17 and 18. We are proposing that the Constitution would highlight this for youths aged 17 and 18 to enroll in the National Service Programme under the RFMF to ensure that it addresses youth unemployment and skills gap. It addresses strengthening discipline and responsibility for civic values.

It addresses building national unity and social cohesion. It addresses enhancing national security and disaster preparedness and supporting youth development and reducing social risks and creating pathways for leadership and national contribution. This is a best practice and international precedent that has been practiced globally as you can see in page 39.

It has been practiced in some of the countries overseas, in Singapore, in South Korea, Norway and Denmark and likewise in New Zealand. It also aligns with the Fiji national needs in terms of addressing high youth population, rising social challenges, increasing climate disaster and the need for stronger values and ensuring fairness and inclusivity by making a National Service Programme under the RFMF. So those are the supporting documentation to our presentation and in conclusion, Mr. Chair, we respectfully submit that Fiji requires a constitution that is both principled and practical.

A Constitution that every Fiji Islander can call their own. A Constitution that restores the name and dignity of indigenous Fijians. A Constitution that protects the Vanua, Rotuman, Banaban identity and all communities. A Constitution that removes immunity for coups. A Constitution that strengthens the Great Council of Chiefs as an independent, non-partisan and modern institution. A Constitution that protects equal citizenry and human rights and a constitution that finally closes the door on unconstitutional seizure of power.

For Fiji, for the vanua, for every Fiji Islander and for the generation yet to come. SODELPA as a party urges the Constitution Review Commission to recommend a democratic, inclusive, accountable and culturally grounded Constitution, constitutional settlement worthy of our nation's future. Mr. Chair and members of the Commission. Thank You!!

Mr. Karavaki: We are just winding up. I would like just to highlight on page 10, we are going back just at the top of the, it says that Tauke land should not be permanently lineated arbitrary acquisition or executive manipulations. This refers to Section 27 and 28 of the Constitution.

And our position, we are saying this, the present process when the iTaukei land or even Freehold is acquired, compulsory acquired, the whole classification of the land changed to become state land. We are saying that through that process, a lot of land that was in the Tauke, they are now Freehold. Through that process, because it was acquired first for public purpose.

When the public purpose reasons has already ended, those lands were not returned. We are not saying, like other submitters had said to be returned, we are saying just don't change the land classification. When you acquire the land, you do not change the classification from native to state. Leave it as native. Because if you change it without even the knowledge of the landowners, it's just like you stealing an object. And we are saying that is an evil element that is in our laws. And we would like that to be corrected. Do not steal. Do not change the land classification.

Leave it as native. If the government has to lease, it has to lease it. And it will not highlight any risk at all to have that land to be in a properly being changed classification to become Freehold now.

Mr. Valenitabua: We want that to be very clear. We'll take note of that, Mr. Karavaki. Thank you very much. Thank you very much, Honorable Minister for Education and Leader of Party. Like I said, we had one hour. If we had met earlier, we were allocating one and a half hours for each submitter. However, we are time strapped now. We've got the Minister of Lands and his offices waiting outside. So, I have to bring this to an end. We will come back to you during our deliberations if we need any further clarifications.

We usually ask questions at the end of sessions. Unfortunately, we cannot do that now.

Executive Summary

SODELPA respectfully submits that Fiji now has a historic opportunity to settle the constitutional questions that have divided the country for more than a generation. The review of the 2013 Constitution must not be treated as a narrow legal exercise. It must be a national act of healing, reconstruction and democratic renewal. A durable Constitution must be owned by the people, reflect the lived realities of Fiji's communities, protect equal citizenship, restore confidence in indigenous institutions, remove the culture of coup immunity, strengthen the rule of law, and create institutions that no government can easily capture.

This submission draws on the present Constitution Review Commission process, the 1997 Constitution, the 2012 Yash Ghai Draft, the SDL Party's 2012 submission, the Citizens' Constitutional Forum comparative analysis, the Great Council of Chiefs Review Report 2023, Matanitu iTaukei Review, 2024, relevant Fiji laws, and international human rights principles. It further updates the 2012 SDL recommendations in a manner that is democratic, inclusive, modern, culturally respectful and forward-looking.

The central recommendations are as follows:

- Reinstate "Fiji Islander" as the common civic national identity for every citizen of Fiji, while reserving the term "Fijian" for indigenous Fijians as First Nations of Fiji and as registered in the Vola ni Kawa Bula (VKB). This must be done in a way that guarantees equal citizenship and equal human dignity for all citizens and recognises the rightful place of Rotumans, Indo-Fijians, Banabans, descendants of Solomon and Vanuatu peoples, Europeans, Chinese and all other communities who have made Fiji their home.
- Remove entrenched immunity for coup makers and those involved in unconstitutional overthrow of elected governments. The Constitution should prohibit future immunity for treason, coups, torture, serious human rights abuse, serious corruption and unlawful seizure of power.
- The role of the RFMF must be reinvigorated, enhanced and financially supported to secure its role in nation building, strategic defence, youth development, security, border protection, strategic development, crisis response and regional security.
- Reinforce a National Truth, Reconciliation and Constitutional Accountability Commission to address national issues of importance, including the coups and their victims, support restorative justice, document institutional failures, recommend reparations and recommend conditional amnesty only where truth, accountability and victim participation are satisfied.
- Constitutionally recognise the Bose Levu Vakaturaga, the Great Council of Chiefs, as an independent, non-partisan and properly funded institution of the vanua, responsible for iTaukei culture, language, traditional knowledge, customary leadership, community cohesion, reconciliation and advice on matters affecting the vanua.
- The GCC and its role must be constitutionally recognised as a GCC for all Fiji Islanders, have advisory roles in national security as a member of the National Security Council, resource management, climate discourse and retain an advisory role on all issues pertaining to indigenous issues as prescribed in the 1875 Bose Vakaturaga meeting in Draiba, Ovalau.

- Guarantee equal citizenship, a strong Bill of Rights, and progressive social justice rights covering education, health, housing, water, food, work, social security, disability inclusion, women's rights, children's rights, youth participation, labour rights, digital rights and environmental rights.
- Position the RFMF under clear civilian democratic control, remove any constitutional guardian or oversight role, and reorient security resources toward external defence, maritime security, peacekeeping, disaster response and national resilience.
- Create a representative and accountable Parliament, ideally through a Personalised National Open List System, and consider a House of Review or Senate to ensure provincial, maritime, Rotuman, Banaban, women's, youth, disability, customary and civil society voices are heard.
- SODELPA proposes that the Commission consider a Personalised National Open List System as a Fiji-tailored electoral option. It retains the democratic strengths of a national proportional system with one person, one vote, one value, a single national ballot and proportional party outcomes, while adding a clearer human and provincial connection between voters and candidates.
- Strengthen independent institutions, including the judiciary, Electoral Commission, Auditor-General, Human Rights Commission, Public Service Commission, Ombudsman or Ethics and Integrity Commission, and an anti-corruption framework free from political control.
- Protect iTaukei, Rotuman, Kioa and Banaban land, qoliqoli, culture, language, sacred sites, customary law and benefit-sharing rights, while ensuring that customary mechanisms operate consistently with human rights, natural justice and access to courts.
- Protect local investments, business interests, SMES and encourage aggressive investments to further the sustainable national development agenda.
- Adopt a balanced amendment procedure reflecting the Supreme Court's 2025 advisory guidance that constitutional change should be possible through a strong parliamentary majority and a referendum, while requiring enhanced consultation for protected rights, land, indigenous institutions, the Bill of Rights and the judiciary.

The guiding principle of this submission is simple: Fiji's future cannot be built by erasing history, rewarding unlawful power, or centralising authority. It must be built by recognising every community, protecting the nation's indigenous foundation, respecting equal citizenship, ending immunity for coups, and making the Constitution a living covenant of peace.

Part I - Constitutional Context and Method

1. The national moment

SODELPA welcomes the establishment of the Constitution Review Commission and the nationwide public awareness and civic education process. The current process recognises that the Constitution must be understood by the people before the people can meaningfully contribute to its review. The Prime Minister's ministerial statement describes the review as a chance for ordinary people, from every community and all walks of life, to have a say in the review of the supreme law, and notes that the Commission is tasked with listening to views, receiving written submissions and preparing a report with a draft Constitution Bill. [R1]

SODELPA therefore approaches this process in good faith. The Party submits that a legitimate Constitution must be more than a legal text. It must be a national settlement. It must answer the unresolved questions that have repeatedly destabilised Fiji: the status of indigenous Fijians, the meaning of equal citizenship, the role of the vanua, the place of the Great Council of Chiefs, the protection of land and resources, the civilian control of the military, the removal of coup immunity, and the creation of independent institutions that can survive changes of government.

The current civic education process, including PACE sessions facilitated by the Office of the Attorney-General with other state institutions, reflects the principle that public participation must be informed and accessible. [R2] This submission asks the Commission to go further and ensure that the voices of villages, settlements, provinces, maritime islands, Rotuma, Rabi, Kioa, women, youth, persons with disabilities, faith communities, workers, businesses, farmers, landowners, tenants and diaspora citizens are all captured before a final draft is prepared.

2. Sources and methodology

This submission is founded on five layers of analysis. First, it incorporates and modernises the SDL Party's 2012 submission to the Constitution Commission. That document raised questions of identity, the role of the BLV, constitutional recognition of indigenous institutions, removal of unilateral immunity, reform of the RFMF, social justice, women's participation, youth participation, customary law, pension rights, electoral reform and the protection of land and resources. [R4]

Second, it uses the 2012 Yash Ghai Draft as a significant democratic reference point. The Ghai Draft was produced after a broad consultation process and contained strong provisions on natural heritage, land and resources, socio-economic rights, public participation, civil society, leadership, ethics, the BLV, women, persons with disabilities and the environment. [R5]

Third, it uses the 1997 Constitution as an important reference point because it recognised Fiji's multicultural society, common citizenship, the Compact, social justice, land protection, the BLV, the Senate, independent institutions and a rights framework. [R11]

Fourth, it analyses the weaknesses of the 2013 Constitution. The 2013 Constitution recognises some important rights, including socio-economic and environmental rights, but it also entrenches immunity, centralises power, weakens institutional independence, omits the GCC from the constitutional architecture, and originally made amendment virtually impossible. [R7] [R8] [R9] [R10]

Fifth, it draws from international human rights standards, especially the rights of indigenous peoples, participation in public affairs, women's political participation, disability inclusion, economic and social rights, and equality before the law. [R14] [R15] [R16] [R17] [R18] [R19]

3. Principles for a legitimate Constitution

SODELPA proposes that the Commission assess every constitutional proposal against the following principles:

- Legitimacy: the Constitution must derive authority from genuine public consultation and informed consent.
- Continuity and correction: the Constitution should retain what is sound in the 1997, 2012 and 2013 texts, but correct what is unjust, imposed, undemocratic or unworkable.
- Equal citizenship: every citizen must have equal dignity, equal rights and equal protection of the law.
- Indigenous recognition: equal citizenship must not erase the status, identity, land, culture, language and institutions of indigenous Fijians, Rotumans and Banabans.
- Rule of law: no person, institution, office holder or armed force is above the Constitution.
- Anti-coup constitutionalism: the Constitution must make unconstitutional seizure of power impossible to legitimise and unattractive to attempt.
- Institutional independence: courts, commissions and accountability bodies must not be controlled by the executive.
- Social justice: rights must be meaningful in villages, settlements, schools, hospitals, workplaces, markets, maritime islands and farms, not only in courts.
- Participation: the people must have a permanent constitutional right to participate in public decision-making.
- Future generations: the Constitution must protect land, oceans, culture, language, climate security and public resources for children yet unborn.

Part II - National Identity, Unity and the Preamble

4. Reinstating Fiji Islander as the common national identity

The question of national identity is not a symbolic side issue. It is a constitutional question that affects belonging, historical memory, citizenship, reconciliation and the emotional legitimacy of the State. SODELPA submits that Fiji must build one civic family without erasing the historic name of the indigenous people.

The 2013 Constitution declares that all citizens are Fijians united by common and equal citizenry. [R10] SODELPA acknowledges the value of common and equal citizenship, but submits that the naming formula has remained deeply contested because it was imposed without sufficient consultation and without the concurrence of indigenous Fijians. The SDL Party's 2012 submission was clear: the word "Fijian" should be used for indigenous Fijians only, while "Fiji Islander" should remain the common name for all Fiji citizens. [R4]

SODELPA therefore proposes the following constitutional settlement:

All citizens of Fiji are Fijians and enjoy equal citizenship, equal dignity, equal protection of the law, and equal rights and responsibilities. The term Fijian refers to the indigenous Fijian people of Fiji, the First Nations of Fiji, and is registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula. This recognition does not diminish the citizenship or dignity of any citizen or community. It affirms both equal civic belonging and the distinct historical identity of the indigenous people.

This approach is not exclusionary. It is a respectful dual-recognition model. It allows every citizen to share one civic identity as Fiji Islanders, while restoring the historically rooted identity of indigenous Fijians. It also avoids the false choice between equal citizenship and indigenous recognition. Fiji can and must have both.

SDL 2012 recommendation integrated	Proposed constitutional response
"Fiji Islander" as common name for all citizens	Adopted as the common civic identity in the proposed preamble, citizenship clause, passports and national civic language.
"Fijian" reserved for indigenous Fijians as First Nations of Fiji and registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula	Adopted as a protected historical and cultural identity, while ensuring equal citizenship for all Fiji Islanders.
Resolution through consultation and consensus	Constitutional text should be preceded by public dialogue, including with indigenous institutions and all communities.
Do not use identity as a tool of division	The new wording must be accompanied by civic education that teaches our history, equal citizenship, mutual respect and shared responsibility.

5. A preamble that tells the truth and heals the nation

The Constitution should begin with a preamble that is historically honest, spiritually respectful, inclusive and aspirational. The 1997 Constitution recognised the settlement of the islands by the ancestors of the indigenous Fijian and Rotuman peoples; the arrival of later communities; the enduring influence of Christianity and the contributions of other faiths; the multicultural character of society; common citizenship; social justice; human rights; and the rule of law. [R7] [R11]

The 2012 Ghai Draft used progressive language of healing, trust, tolerance, inclusiveness, compassion, human dignity, equality, democracy, social justice, human rights, rule of law and stewardship of nature. [R5] [R7]

SODELPA proposes a preamble that combines the historical honesty of 1997, the progressive values of the Ghai Draft, and the identity formulation of the SDL 2012 submission.

We, the people of the Fiji Islands, seeking the blessing of God and mindful of the spiritual heritage of these islands; recognising the first settlement, spiritual connection, culture, land and traditional institutions of the indigenous Fijian and Rotuman peoples; acknowledging the descendants of indentured labourers, descendants of Solomon and Vanuatu peoples, Banabans, Tuvalu, Europeans, Chinese and all other settlers and migrants who have made Fiji their home; affirming that all citizens are Fiji Islanders equal in dignity and rights; respecting the identity of the Fijian people as indigenous Fijians; determined to heal the divisions of the past, end the coup culture, protect our land and ocean, and build a just, democratic, multicultural and sustainable nation; give ourselves this Constitution.

6. Languages, faith and the spiritual heritage of Fiji

The SDL 2012 submission proposed strong recognition of the Fijian language, the continued use of English and Hindustani, and recognition of Fiji's Christian heritage. [R4] SODELPA submits that these points should be modernised in a way that both honours tradition and protects equal freedom of conscience.

The Constitution should recognise English, Fijian (Vosa Vakaviti), Fiji Hindustani, Chinese (Mandarin and Cantonese), and Rotuman as languages of national importance. English should remain a working language of the State. The Fijian language should be recognised as the language of indigenous Fijians and strengthened in education, Parliament, courts and public service. Fiji Hindustani should be recognised as a living language of a major community. Rotuman should be recognised and protected as a language of Rotuma. Public bodies should progressively provide services in these languages and, where appropriate, in other accessible formats.

On faith, SODELPA proposes that the Constitution recognise the historic and continuing role of Christianity in Fiji, especially in the life of the indigenous Fijian community, while also recognising the contribution of Hinduism, Islam, Sikhism, other Christian denominations, other faiths and those of no religious belief. The State should guarantee freedom of religion, conscience and belief for all. The Constitution should not be used to discriminate against any citizen on the basis of faith.

7. Equal citizenship and the modern Compact

The 1997 Compact attempted to reconcile collective recognition with individual rights. It acknowledged the rights and interests of all communities, the protection of Fijian and Rotuman land, equity and social justice programmes, and the need for all communities to benefit from national progress. [R11]

SODELPA proposes a modern Compact that is justiciable where appropriate, interpretive where appropriate, and clear enough to guide all public institutions.

The modern Compact should affirm:

- All Fiji Islanders are equal citizens and no citizen is a guest in the country of their birth or lawful citizenship.
- The indigenous Fijian people have a distinct identity, land base, culture, language and traditional institutions that must be constitutionally protected.
- The Rotuman people have distinct land, culture, language and institutional rights that must be protected.
- Banaban identity, the special position of Rabi, and the rights of the Banaban community require constitutional recognition and protection.
- All communities, including Indo-Fijians, Solomon, Vanuatu, Tuvalu Europeans, Chinese and newer citizens, have made important contributions to Fiji and must be respected.
- Social justice and equity measures should address disadvantage wherever it exists, including in rural, maritime, indigenous, settlement, women, youth, disability and low-income communities.
- The State must actively promote national unity through fair development, civic education, language respect, sports, culture, volunteer service, and equitable access to public services.

Part III - Indigenous Rights, Land, Custom and the Great Council of Chiefs

8. Indigenous rights, land, qoliqoli and natural resources

SODELPA submits that the Constitution must protect indigenous rights in a manner consistent with equal citizenship and international standards. UNDRIP recognises indigenous peoples' rights to self-determination, institutions, culture, lands, resources, consultation and free, prior and informed consent. [R14] The SDL 2012 submission similarly emphasised land security, qoliqoli, mahogany, minerals, customary law and indigenous institutions. [R4]

The Constitution should protect:

- iTaukei land from permanent alienation, arbitrary acquisition or executive manipulation.
- Rotuman land, culture and institutions.
- Banaban interests, identity and the special position of the Rabi community.
- Customary fishing rights, qoliqoli and marine resource interests.
- Sacred sites, burial grounds, traditional pathways, cultural landscapes and cultural intellectual property.
- Traditional knowledge, language, genealogy, oral history, cultural expressions, motifs, designs, music, chants and ecological knowledge.
- Community benefit-sharing from tourism, minerals, forests, water, biodiversity, carbon markets, blue economy initiatives and conservation finance.
- Free, prior and informed consent for major projects affecting land, qoliqoli, sacred sites and community resources.
- Access to independent courts or tribunals for land, resource and customary disputes.

SODELPA proposes a constitutional duty to consult affected landowners, resource owners, provincial councils, tikina councils, village institutions and relevant customary authorities before any law, policy, lease, project or concession materially affects land, qoliqoli, customary rights or sacred sites. Consultation must be early, meaningful, accessible, culturally appropriate and documented. Consent should be required for high-impact projects and any project affecting sacred or existential resources.

9. Customary law and traditional dispute resolution

The SDL 2012 submission proposed that Parliament make legislation for the operation of customary law and for dispute resolution through traditional Fijian processes. [R4] SODELPA reaffirms this but proposes a rights-consistent framework. Customary law should be recognised as part of Fiji's legal heritage and as a practical tool for mediation, reconciliation, land-related conflict resolution and community cohesion.

However, customary processes must operate consistently with the Bill of Rights, natural justice, the dignity of women and children, disability inclusion, protection from violence, equality before the law, and the right of access to courts. Customary law should not be used to shield criminal conduct, gender-based violence, child abuse, corruption or arbitrary deprivation of rights.

The Constitution should require Parliament to enact a Customary Law and Traditional Dispute Resolution Act. That Act should define the status of customary law, the matters in which it may be applied, safeguards for vulnerable persons, the relationship between customary processes and courts, rules for recording outcomes, and appeal or review mechanisms.

10. Constitutional independence of the Great Council of Chiefs SODELPA strongly submits that the Bose Levu Vakaturaga, the Great Council of Chiefs, must be constitutionally recognised as an independent, non-partisan and properly resourced institution. SDL proposed in 2012 that the BLV be established under the Constitution and that Parliament pass a BLV Act setting out its role, functions, powers, funding, accountability and reform responsibilities. [R4]

The 2012 Ghai Draft recognised the BLV as custodian of iTaukei culture and traditions and as a non-partisan organ of civil society that could promote wider understanding of iTaukei culture consistently with Fiji's multicultural character. [R5] [R7] The 2023 GCC Review Report also emphasised that the GCC can contribute to sustainable development, cultural preservation, community engagement, conflict resolution, peace, justice and strong institutions. [R13]

SODELPA proposes the following constitutional formula:

> There shall be a Bose Levu Vakaturaga, the Great Council of Chiefs, as an independent and non-partisan constitutional institution of all Fiji Islanders. The Bose Levu Vakaturaga shall be custodian of Fijian culture, language, customary leadership, traditional knowledge, chiefly systems, indigenous heritage, reconciliation, and the wellbeing of all Fiji Islanders. It shall perform its functions consistently with democracy, human rights, gender dignity, the rule of law, the rights of indigenous peoples, and the multicultural character of Fiji.

The GCC should not be reduced to ceremony. It should have practical constitutional functions, including:

- Advising Parliament and Cabinet on laws and policies affecting Fijian culture, land, qoliqoli, language, natural resources, customary leadership, provincial governance and the vanua.
- Promoting Fijian language, traditional knowledge, cultural education, genealogy, chiefly protocols, oral history, cultural arts, architecture, music, ceremonies and indigenous research.
- Support discourse on national security, resource utilisation, and climate change, human well-being and sustainable development.
- Supporting reconciliation and conflict resolution within and between communities.
- Supporting provincial, tikina, village, yavusa, mataqali and tokatoka governance reform.
- Advising on indigenous economic development, community enterprises, climate adaptation, village planning and sustainable resource management.
- Promoting women's dignity, youth leadership, disability inclusion and intergenerational responsibility within the vanua.
- Having standing to seek an advisory opinion from the Supreme Court on constitutional questions affecting indigenous rights, land, qoliqoli, custom or the GCC.
- Providing a formal channel of consultation between the State and the vanua.

10.1 Independence, funding and accountability

The GCC should not be dependent on the political goodwill of the government of the day. The Constitution should provide for a standing annual appropriation, an independent secretariat, audited accounts, annual reporting to Parliament and provincial councils, transparent appointment processes, a code of conduct, and protection from arbitrary abolition or suspension. Parliament should enact a Great Council of Chiefs Act within 12 months of the new Constitution's commencement.

10.2 A modern three-arm GCC model

SODELPA proposes that the GCC be modernised through three complementary arms:

- The Council of Chiefs: the deliberative, cultural and advisory body.
- The iTaukei Cultural, Research and Development Trust: a funding and research arm for language, culture, leadership, education, entrepreneurship, traditional knowledge and intergenerational transmission. This funding arm should be an amalgam of all iTaukei institutions, including TLTB, Fijian Holdings, TTFB, and all other potential funding sources, including government.
- The Vanua Social Concern and Community Resilience Arm: a non-profit arm supporting village development, poverty reduction, climate resilience, disaster preparedness, youth service, women's leadership, disability inclusion and conflict resolution.

This model retains the dignity of the GCC while making it relevant to a modern democratic Fiji.

Part IV - Democracy, Anti-Coup Safeguards and Institutional Reform

11. Removing immunity and ending the coup culture

SODELPA submits that the entrenched immunity provisions in Chapter 10 of the 2013 Constitution are incompatible with constitutional democracy. The 2013 Constitution continues immunity under the 1990 Constitution, continues immunity under the Limitation of Liability for Prescribed Political Events Decree 2010, grants further absolute and unconditional immunity to wide categories of public actors for direct or indirect participation in government from 5 December 2006 to the first sitting of Parliament after the 2013 Constitution, bars review of immunity, removes court jurisdiction and bars compensation. [R10]

The SDL Party warned in 2012 that unilateral immunity would desecrate the sanctity of constitutional documents and perpetuate a cycle of "coup - immunity - coup - immunity". [R4] SODELPA now submits that no new Constitution will be morally or democratically legitimate if it leaves this structure untouched.

SODELPA recommends:

- Repeal the entrenched immunity provisions and all clauses purporting to make them unamendable.
- Declare that no future Constitution, law, decree or executive act may grant immunity for treason, unconstitutional seizure of power, coups, torture, extrajudicial killing, enforced disappearance, sexual violence, serious corruption or gross human rights violations.
- Provide that any attempt to establish government other than under the Constitution is unlawful, void and incapable of validation except through a lawful democratic transition approved by the people.
- Disqualify principal coup leaders and principal beneficiaries from public office, military command, police command, constitutional office and ministerial office, subject to due process.
- Require all members of the disciplined forces, public officers, Ministers, MPs and judges to swear an oath rejecting unconstitutional seizure of power.
- Create civic education in the RFMF, Police, Corrections, schools, public service and communities on constitutional democracy and civilian authority.

12. Amnesty, truth and reconciliation - not blanket immunity

SODELPA supports national reconciliation, but reconciliation cannot be built on silence. The SDL 2012 submission distinguished amnesty from immunity and proposed a special commission to examine the coups, document participation and make recommendations for amnesty. [R4] SODELPA proposes a modern, victim-centred National Truth, Reconciliation and Constitutional Accountability Commission.

The Commission should:

- Hear victims of coups and other significant national events, human rights abuse, unlawful detention, displacement, loss of property, lost livelihoods and institutional discrimination.
- Receive voluntary disclosures from perpetrators and institutional actors.
- Document the causes, financing, planning, execution and consequences of coups and attempted coups.

- Recommend reparations, memorialisation, official apologies, institutional reform and civic education.
- Recommend conditional amnesty only for eligible offences after full disclosure and victim participation.
- Exclude serious crimes, serious corruption, personal enrichment, torture, killings, sexual violence and other gross violations from amnesty.
- Recommend disqualification from office where necessary to protect democratic institutions.

This approach gives Fiji a path to healing without rewarding unlawful power. It allows truth, apology, forgiveness and accountability to stand together.

13. Civilian control and reform of the RFMF

The SDL 2012 submission recognised the RFMF's international peacekeeping reputation but also noted that the coups of 1987, 2000 and 2006 required clear constitutional limits on military intervention in politics. It proposed that the Commander be appointed under the Fiji Military Forces Act with the advice to the Constitutional Office Commission (COC), to determine the size of the military and the qualifications for the Commander. [R4]

The 2013 Constitution states that the RFMF has responsibility to ensure the security, defence and wellbeing of Fiji and all Fijians. [R10] SODELPA submits that this wording is too broad and risks constitutionalizing a political guardian role. The military must defend the Constitution; it must not interpret itself as a supervisor of elected civilian government.

SODELPA recommends:

- Define the RFMF's role as external defence, maritime security, peacekeeping, disaster support and assistance to civil authorities under law.
- Remove any broad constitutional phrase that could be interpreted as a political guardian role.
- Require the RFMF to be politically neutral and subordinate to the elected civilian government and the Constitution.
- Create a civilian-led National Security Council accountable to Parliament.
- Require parliamentary approval of the defence budget, major procurement and security policy.
- Require the Auditor-General to audit defense expenditure, subject to narrow and reviewable national security redactions.
- Rebalance military expenditure toward maritime surveillance, border protection, engineering, disaster response, climate relocation support and regional peacekeeping professionalism and contributing to mandatory national service for school leavers and dropouts.

14. Parliament, electoral reform and a House of Review

Fiji needs an electoral system that produces fair representation, stable government and a real connection between voters and representatives. The 2013 single-national constituency weakens local accountability and makes it difficult for citizens in provinces, maritime islands, and local communities to know who directly represents them. SODELPA proposes a mixed system that preserves proportional fairness while restoring constituency representation.

The SDL 2012 submission supported a bicameral Parliament, the removal of compulsory voting, and a movement toward one person, one vote, one value through a mixed-member proportional approach. [R4]

14.1 Personalised National Open List System: a Fiji-tailored option for voter choice, provincial connection and national stability

SODELPA proposes that the Commission consider a Personalised National Open List System as a Fiji-tailored electoral option. It retains the democratic strengths of a national proportional system - one person, one vote, one value, a single national ballot and proportional party outcomes - while adding a clearer human and provincial connection between voters and candidates. The purpose is not to return Fiji to communal rolls or rigid provincial seats. The purpose is to give every voter a simple way to support either a trusted provincial voice or a national-at-large leader, while ensuring that each vote still contributes fairly to the party's national vote total.

This proposal addresses a common concern raised by citizens under the present national open-list model: voters may support a party nationally but feel disconnected from the candidates who enter Parliament. In rural, maritime, and provincial Fiji, people often want to know who will listen to their village, district, tikina, province, island, or urban settlement. At the same time, Fiji must avoid returning to electoral arrangements that divide citizens by ethnicity or create unequal votes. The Personalised National Open List System is therefore designed as a civic, non-communal and nationally proportional model. A provincial identifier is a statement of community accountability, not a separate electorate and not an ethnic category.

Under the model, Fiji would retain a single national ballot paper. Each candidate would appear under his or her party and would choose, before nomination closes, to run either as a Provincial Candidate or as a National At-Large Candidate. A Provincial Candidate may display one approved provincial flag or identifier, such as Naitasiri, Ba, Lau, Rewa, Cakaudrove, Kadavu or another recognised province. This tells voters: "I am placing myself before the country as a candidate with a special accountability to this province." A National At-Large Candidate would appear without a provincial flag and would tell voters: "I am seeking support across Fiji as a national candidate."

Every voter would still make one single mark. Whether the voter chooses a Provincial Candidate or a National At-Large Candidate, the vote has exactly the same value. It is counted in two linked ways: first, for the candidate's personal total; and second, for the party's national total. In this way, the voter never wastes their voice. A voter in Serea, for example, may choose a Naitasiri-flagged candidate to strengthen a local provincial voice; or, if local politics has become divisive, that voter may choose a national candidate whom they trust. In both cases, the vote still strengthens the preferred party and contributes to the national proportional result.

Seats would first be allocated to parties according to their national vote share. For example, in a 55-member Parliament, a party that wins 20 percent of the valid national vote would be entitled to approximately 11 seats, subject to the final seat allocation formula and threshold adopted by law. Those party seats would then be filled through two internal tracks. Track One would recognise provincial strength by considering candidates who performed strongly within their declared province. Track Two would provide a national top-up safeguard by filling the remaining seats from the highest vote-getters nationwide, including National At-Large Candidates and strong Provincial Candidates who did not enter through Track One. The detailed formula should be set out in legislation, published before polling day, independently administered, and tested through public simulations before adoption.

The model therefore balances three needs that Fiji must hold together. First, it protects national proportionality so that Parliament reflects the total will of the people. Second, it restores a meaningful provincial link so that candidates have a visible place of accountability. Third, it protects strong national candidates from being destroyed by temporary village-level smear campaigns, factional provincial politics or localised swings that do not reflect their broader public support.

This proposal also gives parties a healthier incentive structure. Parties would be encouraged to build credible provincial leadership teams, develop women and youth leaders in the provinces, and select national candidates who can speak to all Fiji Islanders. It would reward candidates who do real grassroots work while still preserving space for national policy leaders, technocrats, women leaders, youth leaders, persons with disabilities, diaspora voices, and experienced public servants who may not fit neatly into any one local political base.

Plain-language summary of the proposed model

Feature	How it works
Ballot paper	One national ballot paper is retained. Voters do not receive separate provincial or communal ballots.
Candidate choice	Each candidate may run as a Provincial Candidate with one approved provincial identifier, or as a National At-Large Candidate.
One vote	The voter makes one single mark. The vote has equal value wherever it is cast and whichever candidate type is chosen.
Two linked counts	The vote counts toward the candidate's personal total and the party's national total.
Party seat entitlement	Each party's total seats are determined by its national vote share, preserving proportional fairness.
Track One: provincial strength	Within each party's seat entitlement, candidates with strong support in their declared province are considered first under a transparent formula.
Track Two: national top-up	Remaining seats are filled by the next strongest candidates nationally, protecting national leaders and high-performing candidates.
Safeguard	Provincial identifiers do not restrict voter choice, create ethnic rolls, or make votes unequal. Any voter may vote for any candidate on the national ballot.

International validation and Fiji's opportunity to innovate

The exact Fiji model proposed here would be new, but its components are not experimental. International comparative practice already recognises List Proportional Representation, open lists, personalised candidate choice, regional or subnational list design, and compensatory top-up mechanisms. International IDEA explains that electoral systems shape representation, campaign behaviour, party incentives and government formation, and that design choices can help encourage accommodation in divided societies. It also defines List PR as a system in which parties receive seats in proportion to their vote share, with open lists allowing voters to influence which candidates are elected. [R23] [R24] list proportional representation system, with one vote of equal value and a single national electoral roll. [R25] The Personalised National Open List System therefore does not discard the national logic of Fiji's current model. It refines that logic by adding provincial candidate identifiers and a transparent two-track method for filling party seats.

Fiji's present constitutional model is already a national open-list proportional representation system. ACE's Fiji electoral profile records that members of Parliament are elected by a multi-member open-

The model also draws from compensatory systems such as Mixed Member Proportional voting. International IDEA describes MMP as a linked system in which the list component compensates for disproportionality and seeks overall proportionality. [R26] New Zealand's Electoral Commission explains that, under MMP, voters choose both a party and a local candidate, with the party vote largely determining each party's total seats. [R27] Germany's personalised proportional system similarly combines a personal vote with proportional representation. [R28] Lesotho adopted MMP in response to severe disproportionality following earlier constituency results, demonstrating how compensatory design can be used to restore confidence in representation. [R29]

Mauritius offers a distinct lesson through its Best Loser mechanism: electoral systems can include corrective safeguards to ensure that important voices are not excluded after the ordinary count. [R30] Fiji should not copy the communal or ethnic classification features of the Mauritian model. However, the broader safeguard principle is useful: where the ordinary contest produces an unfair or politically damaging exclusion of credible voices, carefully designed top-up mechanisms can strengthen national confidence.

SODELPA therefore submits that Fiji can be both cautious and creative. The Personalised National Open List System is not radical because it preserves a single national ballot, equal voting value, and proportional party outcomes. It is not a return to communal voting, as all voters remain on a single national roll and may vote for any candidate. It is not an untested leap because its building blocks exist in democratic practice. Its innovation lies in combining these mechanisms in a simple Fiji-tailored way: one ballot, one vote, two candidate pathways, provincial visibility, national proportionality and a top-up safeguard.

Recommended constitutional and legislative safeguards

The Constitution should state the core principle only: Parliament is elected through a system of proportional representation based on one person, one vote, one value, with voter choice among candidates and with mechanisms for both national and provincial accountability.

The detailed formula should be placed in ordinary electoral law after public consultation, technical modelling and independent advice from the Electoral Commission, constitutional experts and civic education bodies. Provincial identifiers must be civic and geographical only. They must not recreate communal rolls, ethnic seats or unequal voting weight.

Every voter must be free to vote for any candidate on the national ballot, whether provincial or national at large. Candidate nomination rules should require a genuine connection to the declared province, such as birth, residence, chiefly or customary connection, family link, long-term service, landowning connection, or other transparent criteria prescribed by law.

Parties should be required to publish provincial and national-at-large candidate lists before polling day and to comply with gender, youth, disability and regional inclusion standards. The seat allocation formula, thresholds, recount rules and tie-breaking rules must be simple, published in advance, independently administered and capable of public verification.

The model should be explained through voter education in English, iTaukei, Fiji Hindi, Rotuman and accessible formats, including worked examples for rural, urban and maritime voters. After two general elections, an independent review should assess whether the system has improved local accountability, women's participation, youth representation, provincial voice, voter understanding and proportional fairness.

Proposed position. SODELPA recommends that the Commission include the Personalised National Open List System as a serious electoral reform option for public consultation. It should be presented not as a rigid final formula, but as a principled Fiji-designed model capable of reconciling national proportional fairness with provincial accountability and voter confidence.

14.2 House of Review or Senate

SODELPA proposes serious consideration of a second chamber - a House of Review or Senate - that is not a rival government but a constitutional safeguard for deliberation, regional voice, indigenous consultation and quality law-making. It may include representation from provinces, Rotuma, Rabi, Kioa, municipalities, women, youth, persons with disabilities, labour, business, faith communities, civil society and the vanua. The GCC and provincial councils should have a defined role in nominating or selecting a limited number of members whose role is to review and advise, not to exercise partisan control over government.

The House of Review should have delaying and consultative powers, enhanced powers over protected matters, and a duty to review legislation for consistency with the Bill of Rights, land protections, indigenous rights, public finance responsibility and constitutional values.

15. Executive government and limits on concentrated power

A key lesson from Fiji's constitutional history is that excessive concentration of power invites abuse. The CCF analysis of the 2013 Government Draft warned of an extreme concentration of authority in the offices of the Prime Minister and the Attorney-General, particularly in appointments to the judiciary, commissions, and senior state services. [R8] SODELPA proposes clear limits on executive power.

The Constitution should provide that:

- Cabinet is collectively accountable to Parliament.
- The Prime Minister appoints Ministers, but appointments to independent offices must not be controlled by the Prime Minister or Attorney-General.
- The Attorney-General should be the Government's principal legal adviser but should not dominate judicial, prosecutorial, electoral, disciplinary, anti-corruption, legal profession or accountability appointments.
- The President should be a unifying, non-partisan Head of State appointed by broad parliamentary consensus, with a fallback mechanism that requires cross-party participation.
- Major constitutional appointments should require open advertisement, merit assessment, independent recommendation and parliamentary confirmation.
- Cabinet size should be limited by law to reduce patronage and cost.
- Ministers must be subject to enforceable conflict-of-interest, asset declaration, procurement, gift, travel and post-office employment rules.

16. Judiciary and rule of law

Judicial independence is the spine of constitutional democracy. SODELPA proposes that the Constitution guarantee the independence of all courts, protect judicial tenure and remuneration, prohibit executive interference, and allow the courts to enforce the Constitution against all branches of government.

The Judicial Services Commission should be independent of executive dominance and should include the Chief Justice, senior judicial representatives, representatives of the legal profession, persons of high integrity appointed by a transparent process, and limited non-voting administrative support. The Attorney-General should not control judicial appointments or disciplinary processes.

SODELPA recommends:

- Restore full court jurisdiction to interpret and enforce all parts of the Constitution, including transition and immunity questions.
- Appoint judges through merit-based, transparent processes.
- Protect tenure, remuneration and security of office.
- Create transparent judicial complaints procedures that cannot be used for political retaliation.
- Protect the independence of the Director of Public Prosecutions.
- Guarantee legal aid and access to courts, including for rural and maritime communities.
- Recognise customary dispute resolution but preserve access to the courts.

17. Independent constitutional offices and integrity institutions

Fiji's independent offices must be independent in substance, not only in name. The 2013 Constitution creates a Constitutional Offices Commission chaired by the Prime Minister and including the Attorney-General, which raises concerns about executive dominance over key appointments. [R10] SODELPA proposes a rebalanced COC.

The COC should include the President or nominee, Leader of the Opposition, Chief Justice or nominee, a representative of the Fiji Law Society, a representative nominated by the GCC/provincial institutions for indigenous institutional matters, and independent members selected through a transparent parliamentary process. The Prime Minister and Attorney-General should not together control the majority.

The Constitution should strengthen:

- Electoral Commission and Supervisor of Elections.
- Auditor-General.
- Ombudsman or Ethics and Integrity Commission.
- Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission.
- Public Service Commission.
- Police and Corrections oversight bodies.
- Anti-corruption commission with safeguards against political misuse.
- Information Commissioner for access to information and data privacy.
- Public Accounts Committee chaired by the Opposition.

18. Public service and state services

SODELPA proposes a public service that is professional, non-partisan, decentralised and people-centred. Public officers must serve the Constitution and the public, not the party in government. The Public Service Commission should protect merit appointments, fair discipline, equal opportunity, gender balance, disability inclusion, linguistic capacity and regional representation.

The Constitution should support decentralisation of services to divisions, provinces, towns, maritime islands and online platforms. Citizens should not need to travel to Suva for services that can be delivered locally or digitally. Integrated government service centres should be constitutionally encouraged and operationally required by law.

Part V - Rights, Social Justice and Inclusive Development

19. A strong and enforceable Bill of Rights

SODELPA supports a strong Bill of Rights covering civil, political, social, economic, cultural, environmental and digital rights. The 2012 Ghai Draft contained a broad rights framework, including rights to equality, privacy, expression, association, assembly, information, education, economic participation, adequate standard of living, employment relations, environmental rights, administrative justice, access to courts, women, persons with disabilities, elderly persons and cultural communities. [R5] The 2013 Constitution also recognises several socio-economic rights, but many rights are subject to broad limitation clauses. [R10]

The Constitution should guarantee:

- Right to life, liberty, dignity and security of the person.
- Freedom from torture, cruel treatment, forced labour and trafficking.
- Freedom of expression, media, academic research and artistic creativity.
- Freedom of religion, conscience, association, assembly and petition.
- Political rights and free, fair, regular elections.
- Equality and freedom from discrimination.
- Rights of women and girls, including freedom from violence and equal participation.
- Rights of children and the best interests of the child.
- Rights of persons with disabilities, including accessibility and political participation.
- Rights of elderly persons.
- Labour rights, trade union rights, collective bargaining, safe work and just wages.
- Rights to education, health, sanitation, food, water, transport and social security.
- Rights to housing, safe refuge and protection.
- Cultural, religious and linguistic community rights.
- Environmental and climate rights.
- Digital rights, privacy, data protection and cybersecurity dignity.
- Administrative justice and access to courts.

Any limitation of rights must be lawful, reasonable, necessary and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. Emergency limitations must be strictly necessary, time-bound, consistent with international law, subject to Parliament, and reviewable by the courts.

20. Women's equality and leadership

The SDL 2012 submission recognised CEDAW, the Beijing Platform commitments, women's empowerment, women in decision-making, women and the law, employment, livelihoods, elimination of violence and women's health. It supported an immediate target of 30 percent women in Parliament and parity in the long term, while emphasising ability. [R4]

SODELPA proposes to modernise this recommendation by recognising that temporary special measures are not contrary to merit; they are tools to remove barriers to equal opportunity. The Constitution should require the State and political parties to promote women's equal participation in Parliament, Cabinet, public boards, the public service, provincial institutions, municipal councils, statutory authorities and the private sector.

Specific constitutional and legislative measures should include:

- Gender-balanced party lists using a zipper or alternating placement system where party lists are used.
- Public funding incentives for parties that meet women's representation targets.

- Protection from political violence, online abuse, harassment and intimidation.
- Equal pay for work of equal value.
- Maternal health, parental leave and workplace dignity.
- Support for women in rural, maritime, informal and market sectors.
- Recognition of women's roles in the vanua, faith communities, business, education, health, care work and national leadership.

21. Youth empowerment and political participation

The SDL 2012 submission proposed constitutional provisions for youth representation in Parliament and recognised the multi-faceted nature of youth issues. [R4] SODELPA supports youth representation, youth service and youth participation in law-making, climate action, innovation, culture, sports and entrepreneurship.

The Constitution should require Parliament to establish mechanisms for youth representation, including a National Youth Council, youth seats or list incentives, youth advisory committees to Parliament, and a voluntary national service programme focused on skills, climate resilience, cultural learning, disaster response, agriculture, maritime safety, digital skills and community service.

22. Disability inclusion

The Constitution should implement the CRPD principle that persons with disabilities have political rights and the opportunity to enjoy them on an equal basis with others. [R18] This includes accessible voting, accessible public information, sign language access, reasonable accommodation, inclusive education, accessible buildings, disability representation in public bodies, and disability-inclusive disaster response.

23. Pension entitlement and protection of accrued rights

The SDL 2012 submission proposed that pension entitlement is a right. [R4] SODELPA supports constitutional protection for accrued pension and retirement rights. Public officers and retirees should not have vested entitlements arbitrarily reduced by retrospective law or executive decree. Reform may occur only under law, after consultation, with fairness, non-discrimination and protection of vulnerable retirees.

24. Social justice, equity and shared prosperity

SODELPA proposes a social justice chapter that requires the State to take targeted, evidence-based measures to secure equality of opportunity. This should include programmes for indigenous Fijians, Rotumans, Banabans, Indo-Fijians and other communities where disadvantage is shown, and for women, youth, persons with disabilities, elderly persons, rural and maritime communities, informal settlements, workers, farmers, students and low-income families.

Social justice measures should be transparent, time-bound where appropriate, reviewed by Parliament, based on need and historical disadvantage, and designed to promote dignity, capability and national unity rather than dependency or division.

Part VI - Decentralisation, Public Finance, Environment and Future Generations

25. Decentralisation, provinces and local government

SODELPA submits that democracy must be visible in the daily lives of people. It must reach villages, settlements, maritime islands, towns, provinces and outer islands. The Constitution should require regular local government elections, strengthened provincial councils, meaningful tikina and village planning, and fair fiscal transfers to local and provincial institutions.

The Constitution should:

- Guarantee elected municipal councils and regular local government elections.
- Strengthen provincial councils while ensuring transparency, gender participation and youth representation.
- Recognise Rotuma's special administrative and cultural position.
- Create service standards for rural and maritime communities.
- Require decentralised government service centres and digital access to public services.
- Support participatory budgeting at local level.
- Protect informal settlement communities from arbitrary eviction and create pathways to secure tenure.
- Promote local economic development in agriculture, fisheries, tourism, culture, small business, creative industries and climate adaptation.

26. Public finance, revenue and expenditure

The Constitution should make public finance transparent, responsible and people-centred. Public funds must be used for public benefit. Major borrowing, guarantees, public-private partnerships, natural resource concessions and state asset disposals should be transparent and subject to parliamentary scrutiny.

SODELPA proposes:

- Independent Auditor-General with secure tenure and adequate budget.
- Public Accounts Committee chaired by the Opposition.
- Open budget requirements and citizen budget summaries.
- Parliamentary approval for major loans, guarantees and strategic asset disposals.
- Transparent procurement with beneficial ownership disclosure.
- Annual public debt and contingent liability reporting.
- Protection of pensions and standing appropriations lawfully owed.
- Transparent reporting of defence, disaster and climate expenditure.

27. Climate, environment, oceans and future generations

The 2012 Ghai Draft included an entire chapter on natural heritage, including the natural environment, land rights, land use, fishing grounds, natural resources, consultation and land laws. [R5] The CCF analysis noted that the more detailed environmental and resource provisions of the 2012 Draft were largely omitted from the 2013 Government Draft. [R8] SODELPA proposes restoring and strengthening these provisions.

The Constitution should guarantee a right to a clean, healthy and sustainable environment, recognise climate change as a constitutional challenge, protect oceans, reefs, mangroves, forests, rivers, biodiversity and traditional ecological knowledge, and impose duties on the State to protect the rights of future generations.

It should require fair benefit-sharing for carbon markets, blue economy projects, mineral extraction, tourism, conservation finance and other resource uses. It should protect communities facing climate displacement through consultation, land security, cultural continuity, relocation support and legal recognition of climate-affected rights.

28. Constitutional amendment and transition

The 2013 Constitution originally required very high thresholds for amendment and entrenched immunity provisions. [R10] The Supreme Court's 2025 advisory opinion, as summarised by International IDEA and Fiji news reporting, opened a pathway by confirming that amendment can proceed with a two-thirds parliamentary majority and a majority in a referendum, while keeping the people's referendum role. [R20]

SODELPA proposes a balanced amendment formula:

- Ordinary amendments require two-thirds of Parliament and a referendum approved by a majority of valid votes cast.
- Protected matters require two-thirds of Parliament, a referendum, and enhanced public consultation. Protected matters include the Bill of Rights, land, qoliqoli, indigenous rights, Rotuma, Banaban rights, the GCC, judicial independence, electoral democracy, amendment procedures and anti-coup provisions.
- No immunity clause may be entrenched or placed beyond amendment.
- Any amendment must have a minimum public education period, publication in English, Fijian, Fiji Hindi and Rotuman where relevant, and accessible formats for persons with disabilities.
- The courts must retain jurisdiction to determine whether amendment procedures have been followed.

Transition should also include a statutory review of all decrees, promulgations and transitional laws that continue to affect rights, institutions, land, public finance, media, unions, NGOs, elections and public service governance. Laws inconsistent with constitutional democracy should be amended or repealed within a defined period.

Part VII - Model Constitutional Clauses

The following model clauses are offered for consideration. They are policy drafting examples and should be refined by constitutional counsel.

Clause 1 - National identity and citizenship

All citizens of Fiji are Fiji Islanders and are equal in dignity, citizenship, rights and responsibilities. The term Fijian refers to the indigenous Fijian people of Fiji, the first nations of Fiji as defined under the VKB. No law, policy or public act may use this recognition to deny or diminish the equal citizenship, rights or dignity of any citizen or community.

Clause 2 - Recognition of communities

The Republic recognises the indigenous Fijian people, the Rotuman people, the Banaban community, descendants of indentured labourers, Pacific Islanders, Solomon, Vanuatu, Europeans, Chinese, and all other communities who have made Fiji their home. The Republic shall protect the language, culture, heritage and dignity of every community, and shall promote unity through justice, respect and equal citizenship.

Clause 3 - Anti-coup provision

Any attempt to establish, support, recognise or maintain a government other than in accordance with this Constitution is unlawful and void. No person may claim public authority arising from a coup, treason, insurrection, military intervention or unconstitutional seizure of power. No immunity shall be granted for such conduct.

Clause 4 - Truth, reconciliation and accountability

Parliament shall establish a National Truth, Reconciliation and Constitutional Accountability Commission to inquire into unconstitutional seizures of power, coups, attempted coups and related abuses; hear victims; receive disclosures; recommend reparations, institutional reform and civic education; and recommend conditional amnesty only in accordance with this Constitution and the rights of victims.

Clause 5 - Bose Levu Vakaturaga

There shall be a Bose Levu Vakaturaga, the Great Council of Chiefs, as an independent, non-partisan constitutional institution of the vanua. Its functions, composition, funding, reporting obligations, code of conduct and secretariat shall be prescribed by law consistently with its role as custodian of Fijian culture, language, traditional knowledge, customary leadership, reconciliation and the wellbeing of the vanua.

Clause 6 - Land, qoliqoli and customary rights

The ownership, beneficial interests and customary rights of indigenous Fijians, Rotumans and Banabans in land, qoliqoli, sacred sites, cultural heritage, traditional knowledge and natural resources shall be protected. No law or administrative act may arbitrarily alienate, diminish or extinguish those rights. The State shall ensure meaningful consultation and, where required by law, free, prior and informed consent.

Clause 7 - Civilian control of disciplined forces

The Republic of Fiji Military Forces, Fiji Police Force and Fiji Corrections Service shall be politically neutral, professional and subordinate to the Constitution and the elected civilian authority. The military shall have no role in determining the legitimacy of an elected government, Parliament or court.

Clause 8 - Rights limitation

A right or freedom may be limited only by law, and only to the extent that the limitation is reasonable, necessary and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society based on human dignity, equality, freedom, democracy and the rule of law.

Clause 9 - Public participation

Public bodies shall facilitate meaningful public participation in law-making, policy-making, budgeting and decisions affecting communities. Participation must be timely, informed, accessible, culturally appropriate and inclusive of women, youth, persons with disabilities, rural and maritime communities, linguistic communities and affected customary authorities.

Clause 10 - Amendment

This Constitution may be amended only by the procedure set out in this Chapter. No amendment may grant or entrench immunity for unconstitutional seizure of power, treason, coups, torture, serious human rights abuse or serious corruption. Protected matters require enhanced consultation with affected communities and approval by referendum.

Part VIII - Implementation Roadmap

Phase	Proposed constitutional response
Immediate - before final draft	CRC conducts targeted consultations with vanua institutions, Rotuma, Rabi, Kioa, Indo-Fijian organisations, faith communities, women, youth, disability organisations, unions, business, farmers, maritime communities, civil society and diaspora citizens.
0-3 months after adoption	Constitutional education campaign in English, Fijian, Fiji Hindi, Rotuman and accessible formats. Establish transition committees for GCC, electoral reform, independent appointments and decree review.
3-6 months after adoption	Enact laws on GCC, Truth and Reconciliation, Constitutional Offices Commission, Code of Conduct, Access to Information, Political Finance and Customary Dispute Resolution.
6-12 months after adoption	Reconstitute independent commissions; appoint key offices through transparent procedures; commence national civic education in schools and disciplined forces.
12-24 months after adoption	Implement electoral boundary review and prepare for first elections under new system; establish House of Review if adopted; implement decentralisation and local government election timetables.
24-36 months after adoption	Review public finance, defence posture, public service decentralisation, land/resource consultation laws, and climate/future generations obligations.

Part IX Additional Information: Policy Proposals and Public Submissions

This Part is to be read together with Parts I to VIII above as a consolidated record of additional policy proposals, public consultation themes, and individual submissions that reinforce and extend SODELPA's constitutional position. This section also serves as a reference section providing raw and unfiltered submissions to provide additional context to support points raised in previous sections.

The material below has been retained in substance and placed within this document so that the Commission receives one submission. Where a proposal repeats or expands an earlier recommendation, it should be understood as strengthening that earlier recommendation rather than replacing it.

The Social Democratic Liberal Party (SODELPA) submits this document in recognition of a defining moment in Fiji's constitutional journey.

Across the country – from village greens to urban settlements, from provincial councils to youth groups – one message has emerged with unmistakable clarity: Fijians want a Constitution that feels closer to them, protects their dignity, strengthens their opportunities, and reflects the realities of a rapidly changing nation.

The 2013 Constitution, while providing a foundational legal framework, has not kept pace with Fiji's evolving social, economic, technological, and security landscape.

Public consultations have revealed deep concerns about representation, affordability, cultural identity, youth development, digital safety, and national stability.

People want a Parliament that is accessible, a fair housing system, a digital environment that protects children, an economy that empowers local families while welcoming investment, and national institutions – including the RFMF and the Great Council of Chiefs – that are clearly defined, modern, and accountable.

SODELPA believes that constitutional reform must not be driven by political convenience or partisan interest, but by the lived experiences of ordinary Fijians. Our submission is grounded in four guiding principles:

1. Restoring meaningful representation so that every voter feels connected to their leaders and every province sees its voice reflected in Parliament.
2. Protecting human dignity and social justice, especially in areas such as housing, digital safety, and economic empowerment.
3. Strengthening national unity and cultural identity, ensuring that traditional institutions like the Great Council of Chiefs are modernised, independent, and positioned as stabilising guardians of national cohesion.
4. Preparing Fiji for the future, through clearer mandates for the RFMF, structured national service for youth, climate resilience, and balanced economic partnerships.

This submission does not seek to return Fiji to the past. It seeks to equip Fiji for the next 50 years – with constitutional mechanisms that are practical, enforceable, culturally grounded, and resilient in the face of global uncertainty.

Our proposals – from electoral reform to national service, from housing affordability to digital child protection, from indigenous economic empowerment to investor confidence – are designed to strengthen the Constitution's ability to serve all Fijians: iTaukei, Indo-Fijian, Rotuman, minority communities, youth, elders, rural families, and urban workers alike.

SODELPA's vision is simple: A Constitution that protects the vulnerable, empowers the capable, honours tradition, embraces modernity, and unites Fiji as one nation.

We present this submission with respect, humility, and unwavering commitment to Fiji's democratic future. We trust that the Commission will consider these proposals not as partisan recommendations, but as reflections of the hopes and concerns voiced by the people themselves.

01. THE VOTING SYSTEM

Finding that exact balance – where voters are given a meaningful choice between supporting local provincial leaders or voting for national figures anywhere in the country – is the ultimate holy grail of electoral design.

"The Best of Both Worlds"

The ongoing public consultations have made one thing overwhelmingly clear: the people of Fiji feel completely disconnected from their Members of Parliament. They want a visible, accountable representative tied to their province, their Vanua, and their local community.

However, simply retreating to old-school, pure constituency boundaries introduces a dangerous vulnerability.

In our modern digital landscape, hyper-localized campaigns, digital hit-squads, and sudden regional political waves can completely dismantle an exceptional candidate's local standing overnight.

A pure constituency system risks robbing our national parliament of some of its finest legal, economic, and educational minds simply because they fell victim to a localized smear campaign or a regional block-vote.

We propose a refined Personalized National Open-List System.

This model preserves the robust structural shield of the single national constituency—ensuring that a candidate's national appeal, merit, and scattered votes across Fiji are fully protected. Yet, by allowing candidates to carry a 'Provincial Designation Flag' directly on the ballot, it gives the public the direct connection to their geographic roots they are crying out for. It is a system that pairs local heart with national stability."

To bridge this gap cleanly, SODELPA can propose a highly personalized version of a mixed system called the "Best Loser" Open-List System (or a Personalized National Open List).

The Solution: A Single National Ballot with "Provincial Flags"

Instead of forcing voters to use two separate votes or changing the ballot paper completely, Fiji can keep one single national constituency ballot paper, but allow candidates to choose how they run.

1. How the Ballot Works for the Voter:

The voter walks into the booth with one ballot paper. They have absolute choice:

- Choice A (Local Focus): If a voter in Serea wants to support a local champion who knows Naitasiri's roads, schools, and land issues, they vote for a candidate explicitly flagged on the ballot as representing Naitasiri.
- Choice B (National Focus): If that same voter decides, "I don't care about the local candidates; I want to vote for an elite legal expert, an economic strategist, or a national leader who is running at-large from Suva or the Western division," they can cast their vote directly for that national candidate.

Every single vote cast—whether for a local provincial candidate or a national candidate—counts directly toward SODELPA's total national party percentage.

2. How the Seats are Awarded (The Safeguard)

Let's say Parliament has 55 seats, and SODELPA wins 20% of the total vote across Fiji, giving the party 11 seats in Parliament.

To fill those 11 seats, the system looks at the individual votes your candidates received using a dual-track formula:

- Track 1 (The Provincial Allocation): The system first awards seats to the SODELPA candidates who won the highest percentage of votes in their designated provinces (e.g., the strongest performers in Ba, Lau, or Tailevu).

- Track 2 (The National Top-Up Safeguard): The remaining seats are filled by the next highest vote-getters on the SODELPA list, regardless of geography.

3. Why this saves Fiji's best candidates from "Vanua Politics":

Imagine a highly competent SODELPA candidate runs under the "Cakaudrove provincial flag." A massive political wave hits Loa and the surrounding villages, and 75% of the province votes NFP. The SODELPA candidate loses the local Cakaudrove race.

Under an old-school constituency system, that candidate is dead out of luck.

But under this balanced system, Track 2 kicks in. Because that candidate is well-known nationally, they still manage to pull thousands of "national choice" votes from supporters in Suva, Lautoka, and Labasa who admired their background. Those scattered national votes keep their individual total high enough to beat out others on the party list. They are safely "topped up" into Parliament.

4. Recommendation: Implementation of a Personalized National Open-List System with Regional/Provincial Options

The Principle: To preserve the democratic advantages of the single national constituency (which protects national-caliber candidates from hyper-localized smear campaigns and political block-voting), while restoring direct accessibility to voters wishing to elect geographic representatives.

The Mechanism:

1. Fiji shall maintain a single national constituency for the calculation of proportional party seats in Parliament.
2. Political parties shall be permitted to designate specific candidates on their open list to represent designated geographic or provincial boundaries (e.g., the 14 Provinces), while leaving other candidates un-designated as National At-Large candidates.
3. Voters shall retain the absolute right to vote for either a geographically designated candidate or a national at-large candidate on the same ballot.
4. Seats won by a political party shall be filled progressively, balancing the highest-performing geographic candidates with the highest-performing national candidates based on total individual votes received.

The Winning Narrative for FIJI:

This proposal gives the public exactly what they are asking for in the consultations (a link back to their provinces) but leaves the democratic power completely in the hands of the voter. It ensures that a party of principle like SODELPA can cultivate grassroots provincial leaders without ever risking the political survival of its core national assets.

To give you a clear, practical picture, we have designed a "Two-Track, One-Vote" Ballot Paper.

This completely avoids the confusing "Sudoku style" numbers-only sheet from the 2013 system (which made it incredibly easy to execute dirty tricks and confuse elder or rural voters). Instead, it shows Party Names, Party Symbols, Candidate Names, and their Provincial Flags.

The beauty of this design is that the voter still only makes ONE single mark.

How the Scenarios Play Out for the Serea Voter (Naitasiri)

How this protects SODELPA from dirty village-level campaigns:

- Scenario 1: The Voter wants to back the Local Leader. A voter in Serea chooses to mark [✓] next to #202 (Adi Iva Loki) because they want an expert directly carrying Naitasiri's specific voice on land use into Parliament.
    - Result: This vote adds +1 to Adi Iva's personal tally AND +1 to SODELPA's total national pool.
- Scenario 2: The Village faces a massive NFP Wave / Fake Account Attack. Let's say a localized online smear campaign completely floods Tamavua, lying about the SODELPA local candidate. Terrified of the local drama, a voter decides they cannot vote for the local candidate, but they still love SODELPA's national vision.
    - They look at the ballot and see #201 (Radrodro, Aseri) is running as a National At-Large candidate. They confidently mark [✓] next to #201.
    - The Magic Safeguard: Even though the local candidate was unfairly damaged in that village, SODELPA still secures the vote. The voter didn't flee to another party; they simply shifted their support to a trusted national figure.

Why this is a Winner:

It is incredibly simple to read, keeps the democratic "One Person, One Vote, One Value" intact, and gives political parties complete flexibility to protect their top brains while growing their rural grassroots base!

SODELPA POSITION ON ELECTORAL SYSTEM

Because Fiji is already in an election year, any major structural changes to the electoral system would not be practical or fair to voters, candidates, or election administrators at this stage.

For this reason, the proposed Personalized National Open-List System is being presented as a future reform option for national discussion, not for immediate implementation.

To ensure fairness, transparency, and stability for all participants in the upcoming election, SODELPA supports continuing with the current electoral system for this cycle while inviting the public to explore and debate long-term improvements for Fiji's democracy.

02. "HOUSING AS A HUMAN RIGHT-NOT A SPECULATIVE COMMODITY"

Section 35 of our current Constitution promises the right to adequate housing, but to an ordinary family living along the Suva-Nausori corridor, that promise is completely hollow. A right is not real if it is entirely unaffordable.

Our current system treats housing purely as an unregulated commercial market. The result? Real estate speculation has driven rents and house prices to astronomical heights, forcing our workers into expanding informal settlements while foreign speculators freeze locals out of homeownership.

SODELPA argues that shelter is a fundamental pillar of human dignity and social justice. We are recommending that the word 'Affordable' be constitutionally bound to the right to housing. This will legally empower Parliament to step in, regulate predatory rent spikes, and actively partner with traditional iTaukei landowners. By guaranteeing long-term returns to the Vanua while providing subsidized, secure, low-interest housing lots for our young families, we turn the right to housing from a passive legal phrase into a lived, everyday reality for all Fijians."

The 2013 Constitution technically contains the right to housing under Section 35, which states:

"The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the right of every person to accessible and adequate housing and sanitation."

The problem is the phrase "progressive realisation... within available resources." This acts as a standard legal loophole. It allows the state to say, "We want to provide affordable housing, but we don't have the money right now, so we aren't violating your rights." Meanwhile, the unregulated real estate market continues to price everyday families completely out of the market.

To address this from a genuine social justice and human rights standpoint, SODELPA is proposing transforming Section 35 into an actionable, state-enforced protection mechanism.

1. Concrete Constitutional Recommendations

SODELPA is submitting two amendments to the Bill of Rights to give Section 35 real legal teeth.

Amendment A: Redefining "Adequate" to Include "Affordable"

Right now, the law focuses heavily on structural "adequacy" and sanitation, but ignores the price tag. SODELPA is strongly recommending adding affordability and market regulation to the constitutional mandate.

- The Proposed Text (Amending Section 35):

> "Every person has the right to accessible, adequate, and financially affordable housing. The State shall actively intervene through progressive legislative measures, targeted subsidies, and market regulatory frameworks to prevent anti-competitive real estate speculation and ensure that rental and property acquisition costs remain proportional to national minimum and median household incomes."

Amendment B: Constitutionalizing the Partnership with Landowners (Mataqali)

Fiji's unique advantage is that 87% of land is customary. Prime Minister Sitiveni Rabuka and the Ministry of Housing have emphasized that fixing affordable housing relies completely on partnering with traditional landowners. SODELPA proposes to elevate this to a constitutional principle to benefit both tenants and the Vanua.

- The Proposed Text:

> "The State shall establish a permanent, constitutionally protected Customary Land Housing Trust Framework in partnership with the iTaukei Land Trust Board (TLTB). This framework will guarantee that traditional landowning units who voluntarily designate land for social and affordable housing developments receive guaranteed, long-term sovereign returns, while protecting tenants with long-term, secure, and affordable leases."

Proposed Landowner Benefits Under a Customary Land Housing Trust Framework

(Suggested cost structures and long-term returns)

Below is a simple, public-friendly outline of how landowners could financially benefit when they voluntarily designate customary land for affordable housing.

1. Guaranteed Annual Sovereign Returns

Landowners could receive fixed annual payments protected by constitutional law. These payments would be stable, predictable, and long-term.

Possible cost ranges:

- $1,500 – $3,000 per acre per year for designated housing land
- $5,000 – $10,000 per hectare per year
- Payments guaranteed for 30–99 years, depending on lease structure

Why this matters:

Landowners get steady income every year, regardless of market changes.

2. Long-Term Lease Revenue (TLTB-Managed)

TLTB could manage leases and ensure landowners receive fair rental returns.

Possible structures:

- Fixed lease payments (e.g., $500–$1,200 per lot per year)

- Indexed leases that increase slightly every 3–5 years
- Community dividend payments shared across the mataqali

Why this matter:

Income grows over time and is protected from sudden political changes.

3. Infrastructure Co-Investment Benefits

When land is designated for housing, the government and developers often invest in:

- Roads
- Water systems
- Sewerage
- Electricity
- Footpaths
- Drainage

Estimated value:

- $50,000 – $150,000 per hectare in infrastructure upgrades
- These improvements permanently raise the value of the surrounding customary land

Why this matter:

Landowners benefit even on land not used for housing.

4. Equity Participation in Housing Projects

Landowners could receive shares in the housing development.

Possible models:

- 5–15% equity stake in the project
- Annual dividends from rental income
- Profit-sharing when units are sold

Why this matter:

Landowners become co-owners, not just lease providers.

5. Employment and Contracting Opportunities

Housing projects create jobs and contracts.

Possible benefits:

- Priority hiring for mataqali members
- Contracts for:
    - Land clearing
    - Security
    - Maintenance
    - Landscaping

- Transport
- Construction support

Estimated value:

- $200,000 – $500,000 in local contracting opportunities per project

Why this matter:

Income flows directly into the community.

6. Community Facilities Built on Customary Land

Developers often build community assets such as:

- Playgrounds
- Community halls
- Bus shelters
- Footpaths
- Small parks
- Market stalls

Estimated value:

- $20,000 – $80,000 in community facilities per development

Why this matter:

The mataqali gains long-term social infrastructure.

7. Protection of Undesignated Land

Only the land voluntarily designated is used. All other customary land remains fully protected.

Benefits:

- No compulsory acquisition
- No permanent alienation
- No loss of ownership
- Landowners retain full cultural and traditional authority

In Simple Terms Under this framework, landowners receive:

- Guaranteed annual income
- Long-term lease payments
- Infrastructure upgrades
- Equity shares
- Employment opportunities
- Community facilities
- Full protection of remaining land

This turns housing development into a true partnership between the State, TLTB, and the Vanua.

03. THE GREAT COUNCIL OF CHIEFS- BOSE LEVU VAKATURAGA

The dilemma regarding the Great Council of Chiefs (Bose Levu Vakaturaga – GCC) hits at the very core of Fiji's constitutional debate: how to bridge the gap between deeply respected traditional authority and a modern, fast-changing democratic framework.

As an advisory body, the GCC risks being perceived as a symbolic relic. However, pushing too far toward direct executive or legislative power risks clashing with democratic principles of universal suffrage and secular governance. Elevating the GCC into an independent, viable, and modernization-ready institution requires balancing cultural custody with institutional functionality.

1. Establishing Independence and Viability

For the GCC to be a "viable entity" in changing times, it must shift from merely receiving state funding to achieving institutional and financial autonomy. This shields it from being used as a political football by alternating governments.

- Financial Self-Sustainability: SODELPA is recommending for the GCC to have its own independent asset-management arm (akin to indigenous trusts globally, like New Zealand's iwi corporate structures or local investment frameworks). By backing village and provincial development funds—much like the long-term community resilience models currently advocated by GCC Chair Ratu Viliame Seruvakula—the GCC positions itself as an economic anchor, independent of the national budget.

2. The Electoral College for the Head of State

Prior to 2013, the GCC functioned as the electoral college to appoint the President and Vice President.

- Depoliticizing the Presidency: SODELPA is proposing returning the power of appointing the President to the GCC.
- The Unifying Anchor: This ensures the Head of State remains entirely independent of parliamentary party majorities. In critical national scenarios or constitutional crises, a GCC-appointed President serves as a neutral, traditional referee, holding the state together free from partisan bias.

3. Statutory Integration in Crisis and Climate Resilience

Instead of broad, ambiguous powers, SODELPA is recommending that the GCC to have explicit statutory roles embedded in specific modern legislation:

- Climate & Relocation Frameworks: Given that climate change disproportionately forces the relocation of traditional iTaukei villages and threatens customary land tenure, the GCC could be legally designated as a mandatory joint-authority alongside the Ministry of Environment and Ministry of iTaukei Affairs.
- National Security Advisory Status: The GCC could be granted a permanent, statutory seat on the National Security Council. This solidifies their role during "critical national scenarios" by giving them a legal right to advise on national stability, emergency responses, and social cohesion.

The Delicate Balance: The challenge for FIJI lies in framing these proposals so they unite the country rather than fracture it. To earn widespread national legitimacy in a multicultural Fiji, the GCC must be positioned not as an exclusive political authority, but as a stabilizing, non-partisan guardian of national identity, human security, and cultural resilience.

0.4 CHILD DIGITAL PROTECTION (BANNING HARMFUL SITES)

Protecting Children Under 17 from Online Harm & Pornography

To legally enforce a ban on pornographic sites for children under 17, SODELPA is proposing an addition to Section 41 (Right to Education) or Section 11 (Rights of Children) in the Bill of Rights.

Because the internet is fluid, the Constitution must mandate the mechanism of protection, which can then be enforced by the Online Safety Commission (OSC) and internet service providers (ISPs).

Proposed Constitutional Amendment: The Child Digital Safety Mandate

Add a new subsection to Section 11 (Rights of Children):

"Every child under the age of 17 has the right to be protected from digital exploitation, online harassment, cyber-bullying, and exposure to commercially distributed pornographic or sexually explicit material. The State shall mandate internet service providers and regulatory authorities to implement robust, age-verified firewalls and automated blocking mechanisms to restrict access to such harmful materials on all public, private, and school digital networks accessed by minors."

How to enforce this legislatively (The Strategy):

- Mandatory ISP-Level Filtering: Under this constitutional mandate, SODELPA is recommending amendments to the Online Safety Act 2018 requiring Vodafone and Digicel to activate default, network-level blocks on known explicit domains for mobile packages or internet connections registered to minors/schools.
- Age Verification Laws: Require local digital services in Fiji to implement secure age-gating before access is granted to mature platforms.

0.5 INVESTMENT PROMOTION & PROTECTION

Balancing the protection of local micro, small, and medium enterprises (MSMEs) with the aggressive recruitment of foreign direct investment (FDI) is the defining economic puzzle for developing nations.

If Fiji protects locals too aggressively via isolationist policies, international capital flees. If Fiji opens the floodgates entirely, massive multinational corporations risk wiping out local family-owned and iTaukei cooperative businesses.

SODELPA, is proposing an "Economic Partnership Model." Instead of treating foreign investors and local resource owners as adversaries, the Constitution and supporting laws can be amended to make them institutional partners.

1. Targeted Constitutional Amendments for the Submission

The 2013 Constitution is largely silent on explicit structural protections for local economic empowerment. SODELPA is proposing two amendments to Chapter 2 (Bill of Rights) to create an institutional baseline for trade and investment.

Amendment A: Elevating Indigenous and Local Enterprise Protection

Currently, Chapter 2 protects general property and economic rights, but does not provide a mandate to uplift historically marginalized or local commerce.

- The Proposed Text:

"The State shall recognize and promote the progressive development of domestic and indigenous commerce, micro-enterprises, and resource-owner cooperatives, and may enact targeted legislative and affirmative action frameworks to reserve specific micro-economic sectors exclusively for domestic citizens."

The above provision gives parliament the permanent constitutional authority to shield everyday local markets (like retail, taxi services, handicrafts, and small-scale agriculture) from being overtaken by massive foreign capital, while explicitly legalizing affirmative economic programs.

Amendment B: Constitutionalizing Investor Safeguards Against Arbitrary Policy Swings

International investors are terrified of "sovereign risk"—the fear that a new government will suddenly change the laws, seize property, or block them from taking their profits home. To attract high-value investors, Fiji must offer ironclad stability.

- The Proposed Text (Amending Section 27 - Property Rights):

"Every registered investor, domestic or international, shall be secure in their capital investments. The State guarantees freedom from arbitrary expropriation and ensures the unhindered, lawful repatriation of investment returns and usable currencies, subject only to non-discriminatory taxation and national security laws enacted by Parliament."

The above amendments ensure basic investor guarantees instead of any standard legislation (which can be changed by a simple majority in Parliament) and cement them in the Constitution. It sends a massive signal to global markets that Fiji is a safe, predictable place to do business.

To bring these constitutional principles to life, SODELPA is advocating the updating of the Investment Act 2021(specifically regarding its Reserved and Restricted Activities Regulations).

- Rather than outright blocking foreign investors from lucrative sectors, SODELPA is proposing a "Tiered Entry & Joint-Venture Partnership" system.

PROPOSED STRATEGIC JOINT-VENTURE INVESTMENT FRAMEWORK

(Aligning Local Protection with Investor Confidence)

INVESTMENT TIER	CAPITAL THRESHOLD	LOCAL PROTECTION & PARTNERSHIP MECHANISM
TIER 1: RESERVED LIST RETAIL; AGRI; SMALL SERVICES	UNDER $500,000 FJD	❖ 100% RESERVEDFOR FIJI CITIZENS ❖ FOREIGN INVESTMENTS ARE COMPLETELY RESTRICTED TO SHIELD LOCAL FAMILY RUN MARKETS, TAXIS & SMALL-SCALE HANDICRAFTS
TIER 2: RESTRICTED LIST (TOURISM; LOGGING; RESOURCE EXTRACT)	$500,000 TO $5,000,000 FJD	❖ MANDATORY LOCAL EQUITY; (MINIMUM 30%) ❖ FOREIGN CAPITAL MUST LEGALLY PARTNER WITH DOMESTIC BUSINESSES; MATAQALI LANDOWNING UNITS; OR LOCAL PROVINCIAL COOPERATIVES TO OPERATE
TIER 3: OPEN STRATEGIC LIST (TECH, GREEN ETC)	OVER $5,000,000 FJD	❖ 100% OPEN TO FOREIGN CAPITAL ❖ FULL NATIONAL TREATMENT; FAST TRACK REGULATORY HANDLING; & TAX HOLIDAYS. AS THESE HIGH TECH SECTORS BRING NEW INDUSTRIES WITHOUT DISPLACING LOCALS

SODELPA believes that a thriving economy requires two lungs to breathe: a protected local MSME sector and a highly confident international investor community.

Our submission does away with the outdated idea that we must choose between the two. By amending the Constitution, we accomplish two urgent goals simultaneously:

1. We draw a legal boundary around our local marketplaces, ensuring that small-scale tourism, retail, and traditional trades remain firmly in the hands of our people and provincial cooperatives.
2. We offer global investors the highest form of legal security—constitutional protection against arbitrary policy shifts and a clear, transparent framework for their returns.

When an international investor knows their capital is secure, and when our local resource owners are legally built into those projects as equity partners rather than passive bystanders, everyone wins. This is how we build an economy that is fiercely protective of its people, yet proudly open for business.

0.6 THE ROLE AND MANDATE OF THE REPUBLIC OF FIJI MILITARY FORCES

SODELPA affirms the importance of the RFMF as a national institution entrusted with safeguarding Fiji's sovereignty, territorial integrity, and national security.

In light of evolving regional dynamics, youth development needs, and Fiji's long-term stability, SODELPA proposes a strengthened, clearly articulated, and future-focused constitutional mandate for the RFMF.

Rationale for Constitutional Reform

SODELPA's proposals are guided by the following principles:

- National Security Preparedness: Fiji's strategic environment requires a modern, capable, and community-integrated defence force.
- Youth Development: Structured national service can build discipline, patriotism, skills, and resilience among young people.
- Clarity of Mandate: The Constitution should explicitly outline all roles of the RFMF to avoid ambiguity and strengthen accountability.
- Nation-Building: The RFMF can play a constructive role in civic development, disaster response, infrastructure support, and community resilience.

3. Proposed Constitutional Amendments

A. Expanded and Explicit Constitutional Mandate for the RFMF

SODELPA proposes that the Constitution explicitly outline all core and auxiliary roles of the RFMF, including:

1. Defence and National Security: Protection of Fiji's sovereignty, territorial integrity, and national interests.
2. Disaster Response and Humanitarian Assistance: Formal recognition of the RFMF's role in natural disaster response, humanitarian relief, and national emergencies.
3. National Infrastructure Support: Engagement in engineering, rural development, and national infrastructure projects where specialised capacity is required.
4. Youth Development and National Service: A constitutionally recognised role in administering national service programs for young people.

5. Peacekeeping and International Cooperation: Continued participation in UN peacekeeping missions and regional security partnerships.
6. Support to Civil Authorities: Clearly defined circumstances under which the RFMF may assist civilian authorities, ensuring alignment with democratic principles and rule of law.

SODELPA recommends that these roles be explicitly listed in the Constitution to ensure clarity, transparency, and alignment with Fiji's long-term national interests.

B. Introduction of Mandatory National Service for Students

SODELPA proposes the establishment of a 6–8 month National Service Program, administered by the RFMF, to be undertaken by all students upon completion of Year 12 or Year 13.

Key Features:

- Mandatory participation for all students completing secondary education.
- Training to include civic education, leadership, discipline, national identity, disaster-response skills, and basic military orientation.
- Integration of vocational skills, community service, and national development projects.
- Certification upon completion to support future employment or tertiary education pathways.

This program aims to strengthen patriotism, unity, resilience, and civic responsibility among Fiji's youth.

C. Optional National Service Pathway for Youths Aged 17–18

For youths who are not in formal schooling, SODELPA proposes an optional national service pathway:

- Youths aged 17 or 18 may voluntarily enrol in the National Service Program.
- This ensures inclusivity for out-of-school youth, early school leavers, and those seeking structured development opportunities.

Policy Arguments Supporting National Service for Young People

1. Strengthening Discipline, Responsibility, and Civic Values

A structured National Service programme provides young people with an environment that reinforces discipline, accountability, and respect for national values. Research from countries with similar programmes (e.g., Singapore, South Korea, and Israel) shows that:

- Routine, structure, and clear expectations help young people develop self-discipline.
- Team-based activities build responsibility, cooperation, and respect for authority.
- Civic education modules strengthen understanding of rights, responsibilities, and national identity.

For Fiji, where concerns about youth discipline and social behaviour are frequently raised by communities, National Service offers a non-punitive, developmental pathway to build stronger character and civic responsibility.

2. Addressing Youth Unemployment and Skills Gaps

National Service can help young people transition into adulthood by providing:

- Vocational skills training (e.g., carpentry, mechanics, ICT, agriculture).

- Disaster-response and emergency skills, which are highly relevant in Fiji's climate-vulnerable environment.
- Leadership and teamwork experience valued by employers.
- Certification that supports employment or further education.

This helps reduce youth unemployment and equips young people with practical skills that benefit both the individual and the nation.

3. Building National Unity and Social Cohesion

Fiji's multicultural society benefits from programmes that bring young people together across ethnic, religious, and socio-economic backgrounds. National Service:

- Creates shared experiences that strengthen unity.
- Promotes mutual understanding among youths from different communities.
- Reinforces a common national identity and sense of belonging.

This contributes to long-term social stability and reduces divisions that may arise from unequal opportunities or community fragmentation.

4. Enhancing National Security and Disaster Preparedness

Fiji faces increasing climate-related disasters, including cyclones, floods, and landslides. National Service can:

- Train young people in first aid, emergency response, evacuation procedures, and community resilience.
- Build a reserve pool of trained individuals who can support national disaster operations.
- Strengthen Fiji's overall preparedness and reduce reliance on limited emergency personnel.

This is not militarisation – it is civil defence capacity-building, which many countries adopt to protect communities.

5. Supporting Youth Development and Reducing Social Risks

National Service provides a structured environment that can help reduce:

- Youth involvement in crime
- Substance abuse
- Anti-social behaviour
- School dropouts
- Lack of direction or purpose

By offering mentorship, guidance, and positive role models, National Service becomes a preventative social-development tool, not a punitive measure.

6. Creating Pathways for Leadership and National Contribution

Young people who complete National Service often emerge as:

- More confident
- More disciplined

- More community-oriented
- Better prepared for leadership roles

This strengthens Fiji's future leadership pipeline across government, civil society, and the private sector.

7. International Precedent and Best Practice

Many countries use National Service to build discipline, unity, and resilience, including:

- Singapore – National Service is credited with strengthening discipline and national cohesion.
- South Korea – Mandatory service builds national readiness and civic responsibility.
- Norway & Denmark – Voluntary service builds social cohesion and national identity.
- New Zealand (historical) – National Service supported youth development and defence readiness.

These examples demonstrate that National Service is a globally recognised tool for youth development and nation-building.

8. Alignment with Fiji's National Needs

Fiji's unique context makes National Service particularly relevant:

- High youth population
- Rising social challenges
- Increasing climate disasters
- Need for stronger civic values
- Need for skilled manpower in rural development
- Desire for national unity and stability

National Service directly addresses these needs in a structured, equitable, and future-focused manner.

9. Ensuring Fairness and Inclusivity

By making National Service:

- Mandatory for Year 12/13 graduates, and
- Voluntary for out-of-school youths aged 17–18, the programme ensures fairness, avoids discrimination, and provides opportunities for all young people regardless of educational background.

10. Supporting a Modern, Community-Integrated RFMF

National Service strengthens the RFMF's role in:

- Youth development
- Disaster response
- Community service
- National infrastructure support
- Peacekeeping readiness

This aligns the RFMF with modern defence forces worldwide that play hands-on, community-focused roles beyond traditional military functions.

CLOSING COMMENTS

The Social Democratic Liberal Party (SODELPA) submits these proposals with deep respect for the constitutional process and with full recognition of the responsibility entrusted to the Constitution Review Commission. Throughout the nationwide consultations, the people of Fiji have spoken with clarity, urgency, and hope. They want a Constitution that protects their families, strengthens their communities, honours their traditions, and prepares their children for a rapidly changing world.

Our recommendations — from electoral reform to national service, from housing affordability to digital child protection, from indigenous economic empowerment to investor confidence, and from the modernisation of the RFMF to the revitalisation of the Great Council of Chiefs — are not isolated policy ideas.

They form a coherent national vision: a Fiji that is more secure, more inclusive, more resilient, and more united.

SODELPA believes that constitutional reform must be guided by the lived realities of ordinary Fijians, not by political expediency. The Constitution must be a shield for the vulnerable, a platform for opportunity, and a compass for national unity. It must reflect who we are as a people — our Vanua, our multicultural identity, our democratic aspirations, and our shared future.

We therefore urge the Commission to consider these proposals as constructive pathways toward a stronger Fiji: a Fiji where every voter feels represented, every child feels protected, every family can afford a home, every youth has a pathway to discipline and purpose, every landowner is empowered, every investor is secure, and every national institution is clearly defined and accountable.

SODELPA stands ready to support the Commission's work, participate in further dialogue, and contribute to a constitutional framework that will serve Fiji for generations to come. With humility and conviction, we offer this submission in the spirit of national unity, democratic progress, and unwavering commitment to the people of Fiji.

Submission of Ms. Raduva

CLIMATE CHANGE, ENVIRONMENTAL SUSTAINABILITY AND RELOCATION STRATEGY.

SODELPA recognizes that climate change is an existential threat to both humans and our environment.

SODELPA is committed to ensure that there are accountable and transparent climate policies put in place to prevent climate refugeesim, pollution, land degradation, ocean acidification and extinction of biodiversity and wildlife in Fiji.

BACKGROUND

SODELPA advocates for climate action in Fiji by prioritizing grassroot empowerment, appreciating and acknowledging traditional knowledge, protecting indigenous land rights and the equitable sharing of climate funding. As a key partner in Fiji's coalition government, the party emphasizes practical, community-led resilience that ensures the safety of all Fijians.

SODELPA's vision in tackling the climate crisis is to strengthen existing (and to explore) collaborations within the Blue Pacific to strongly advocate for a net-zero global emissions by 2050, seek collaborations with NGO's and local activists in tackling environmental issues in Fiji to ensure a clean, safe and sustainable future for our future generations and to work closely with the NDMO and essential government departments in addressing disaster risk management and to establish proper evacuation centers that are cyclone resistant for stronger shelters and is safe and accessible for ALL FIJIANS.

SODELPA strongly believes in protecting Fiji's key infrastructure and assets from rising sea waters, Category 5 natural disasters and an aggressive global climate change crisis. Since COVID 19, Fiji is heavily reliant on our tourism and civil aviation industry. A brief geographical look at the location of Fiji's two international airports [Nadi International Airport and Nausori International Airport, Suva] and 13 domestic airports [Labasa, Savusavu, Taveuni, Rotuma, Lakeba, Cicia, Ono I Lau, Moala, Vanua Balavu, Koro, Gau, Levuka and Kadavu] puts SODELPA's commitment to advocate for a resilient climate management strategic plan as a priority.

VISION

A Fiji where our people and the environment simultaneously thrives is a prosperous Fiji for ALL.

1. LOCAL INCLUSIVITY

Ensure frontline, indigenous and marginalized communities are provided a safe space to direct their concerns in the design and execution of national climate policies and negotiations.

Work together with expert local environmentalists, community and traditional leaders in navigating through climate negotiations and strategies.

Implement policies that will protect indigenous land and marine protected areas from all kinds of pollution and harmful hazards.

2. ECOSYSTEMS AND CIRCULAR ECONOMY

Revive Fiji's commitment in the "30 million trees in 15years" that was launched in 2019 to combat climate change and restore biodiversity and wildlife in Fiji.

Implement strict circular-economy regulations, that includes ban on single-use plastics, balloons and harmful industrial chemicals.

3. GREEN ECONOMY AND "JUST TRANSITION".

Allocate funding and provide specialized green-collar job opportunities in Fiji to boost environmental stewardship and sustainability.

Prioritizing grants and not loans and to ensure that these funds are solely for the purpose of rebuilding and restructuring vulnerable communities that are heavily impacted by climate change.

Revise the Fiji Litter Act 2008 and include balloon releasing as a form of littering, strictly impose environmental fines that will lower the rate of plastic pollution and other items.

Strategically manage key national infrastructure and assets within the aviation and tourism industry.

4. COMMUNITY-LED RELOCATION AND CLIMATE RESILIENCE

Ensure that the participation of all Fijians in every community are present and acknowledged in any development planning.

Decree that all relocation centers are built with renewable energy, secure water supplies, sustainable waste management and is disability friendly.

Provide post-cyclone grants and counselling programs for individuals and families in adapting to their new environment.

SODELPA recognizes that the climate crisis will no doubt affect the livelihoods of all Fijians. The party's vision, mission and leadership in combating the impacts of the climate crisis is through honest and strong willpower to protect all Fijians.

Submission of Mr. Joni Dagoya

Constitutional Review Commission

Constitutional Foundations

- 1997 Constitution (Repealed): Protected communal ownership of land/resources, emphasizing iTaukei rights.
- 2013 Constitution (Current): Declares all natural resources as belonging to the State, while land ownership remains with iTaukei via the Mataqali system.
- Challenge: Resource owners feel excluded, receiving only lease payments while the State controls exploitation.

Proposed Constitutional Amendments

1. Resource Equity Clause
    - Mandate that all resource projects (oil, gold, forestry, water, energy) allocate 15–25% equity shares to land/resource owners.
    - Restores the spirit of the 1997 protections while aligning with the 2013 framework.
2. Government Facilitation Fund
    - Government provides seed capital for Mataqali and village trusts to buy into projects.
    - Example: Mahogany integration model, where landowners receive royalties + dividends.
3. Community Development Trusts
    - Shares pooled into village/district trusts to fund education, healthcare, and infrastructure.
    - Prevents fragmentation of benefits across individuals.
4. Transparent Trustee Oversight (TLTB Role)
    - Trustees manage equity shares on behalf of Mataqali, ensuring accountability.

Oil & Gold Resource Integration

Oil Forecast (2026–2030)

- Low Extraction (20m barrels/year): USD 6.2b (FJD 13.8b) → Debt halved, low taxes, balanced growth.
- High Extraction (100m barrels/year): USD 31.2b (FJD 69.5b) → Debt eliminated, tax substitution, massive infrastructure, sovereign wealth fund.

Gold Forecast (2026–2030)

- Low Extraction (100k oz/year): USD 940m (FJD 2.1b) → Debt relief, lower VAT, rural services.
- High Extraction (500k oz/year): USD 4.7b (FJD 10.5b) → Tax substitution, nationwide infrastructure, job creation.

Legal Pathways

- Constitutional Amendment: Insert "Resource Benefit-Sharing" provision.

- Statutory Reform: Enact a Resource Equity Participation Act mandating landowner shareholding in all projects.
- Sovereign Wealth Fund: Oil and gold revenues saved for future generations, modeled after Norway.

Benefits

- Restores dignity and ownership rights for land/resource owners.
- Creates sustainable income streams beyond leases.
- Reduces disputes and threats of shutdowns.
- Funds nationwide infrastructure, healthcare, and education.
- Aligns Fiji with global best practices in resource governance.

Circulation Summary

This draft proposes a hybrid constitutional model:

- Protects iTaukei communal rights.
- Ensures equity participation in oil, gold, and forestry projects.
- Uses low taxation funded by resource revenues to reduce Fiji's high cost of living.
- Establishes community trusts and sovereign wealth funds for long-term stability.

Constitutional Integration Framework

1. Resource Ownership & Equity

- Resource Equity Clause: Amend the 2013 Constitution to guarantee 15–25% equity shares for iTaukei land/resource owners in all major projects (forestry, mining, oil, gold, water, energy).
- TLTB Trusteeship: The iTaukei Land Trust Board manages equity shares transparently on behalf of Mataqali, ensuring accountability and preventing elite capture.
- Community Trusts: Shares pooled into village/district trusts to fund education, healthcare, and infrastructure, ensuring benefits reach grassroots communities.

"Resource development projects shall allocate equity shares to land/resource owners, restoring the dignity and rights enshrined in the 1997 Constitution."

2. Economic Resource Models

- Oil Extraction Forecasts:
  - Low extraction: Steady growth, debt halved, reduced VAT/income tax, balanced economy.
  - High extraction: Debt eliminated, massive infrastructure, sovereign wealth fund, but requires safeguards against the resource curse.
- Gold Extraction Forecasts:
  - Low extraction: Supports rural electrification, healthcare, and lower taxes.

- High extraction: Nearly GDP-equivalent revenue, tax substitution, nationwide infrastructure, job creation.

Integration Principle: Oil and gold revenues must substitute taxation, directly lowering household costs while funding development. This aligns with SODELPA's mission to ease the cost of living for ordinary Fijians.

3. Governance & Legal Pathways

- Constitutional Amendment: Insert a "Resource Benefit-Sharing" provision mandating equity participation and revenue distribution.
- Statutory Reform: Enact a Resource Equity Participation Act to operationalize shareholding, royalties, and community trusts.
- Sovereign Wealth Fund: Establish a Fiji Resource Fund (modeled on Norway) to stabilize against commodity price volatility and secure future generations.

4. Social & Cultural Alignment

- Restoring iTaukei Dignity: Recognizes communal ownership while integrating modern equity structures.
- Inclusive Development: Ensures rural villages, not just elites, benefit from resource wealth.
- Balanced Growth: Oil and gold revenues fund diversification – tourism, agriculture, fisheries, and renewable energy – preventing dependency.

🌴 Benefits for Fiji

- Restores indigenous rights and dignity.
- Reduces cost of living via tax substitution.
- Eliminates or reduces national debt.
- Funds massive infrastructure and social services.
- Prevents disputes over resource exploitation.
- Aligns Fiji with global best practices in community-inclusive governance.

✨ In essence: A new constitution under SODELPA's vision would blend the 1997 protections with the 2013 framework, ensuring that iTaukei landowners are not just lease recipients but shareholders in Fiji's resource wealth. Oil and gold revenues would replace taxation, directly lowering household costs while building a debt-free, infrastructure-rich, and inclusive Fiji.

Submission of Mr. Takayawa.

SDL 2012 Position	SODELPA 2026/2027 Recommended Position
Christian State / State Religion	Referendum. Protect Fiji's Christian heritage, while guaranteeing freedom of religion for all.
Common name: "Fiji Islander" for all citizens; "Fijian" for indigenous people	Referendum. This is now a national identity issue and must be decided by the people.
Dual citizenship not allowed	Review and modernise. Referendum only if placed in the Constitution; otherwise ordinary legislation can decide.
Delete "sexual orientation" protection	Do not frame as removal of rights. Referendum only on definition of marriage/family if necessary, while maintaining equal dignity under law. Ireland used a referendum for marriage equality.
Electoral system: communal/open mix and MMP	Referendum. New Zealand changed to MMP after public inquiry and referendums.
Senate and two-house Parliament	Referendum. This affects national structure and representation.
Bose Levu Vakaturaga / GCC constitutional role	Retain as core SODELPA position, but modernise its role as advisory, cultural, and guardian institution—not a competing government.
Indigenous land, qoliqoli, customary law	Strengthen. Vanuatu constitutionally protects custom land ownership, showing this is not unusual in the Pacific.
Amnesty not immunity	Retain, but align with Truth and Reconciliation principles and victim compensation.
Amendment of Constitution	Strengthen by requiring referendum for entrenched national issues.

Submission of Mr. Tiko

SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC LIBERAL PARTY (SODELPA)

Soqosoqo Duavata ni Lewenivanua

Party Headquarters, Suva, Fiji

SUBMISSION TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW COMMISSION

Introduction

SODELPA welcomes the establishment of the Constitutional Review Commission and thanks the Commissioners for the opportunity to make this submission. As a party whose foundation and continuing mandate rest on the protection and advancement of the Vanua, Lotu, and Matanitu, and on the wellbeing of the lewenivanua as a whole, SODELPA regards this review as a historic opportunity to correct the democratic shortcomings of the 2013 Constitution identified by the Supreme Court, and to produce a supreme law that genuinely reflects the will, values, and lived realities of all communities in Fiji.

This submission draws on SODELPA's manifesto commitments and long-standing policy positions. It is organised around eight areas where the Party considers constitutional reform most urgent.

1. Recognition of iTaukei as Indigenous First Nations People of Fiji

The Constitution should expressly recognise iTaukei people as the indigenous, First Nations People of Fiji, in accordance with the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP), to which Fiji is a signatory. This recognition affirms the unique and inalienable relationship of iTaukei people to their Vanua — land, sea, and cultural heritage — as the original inhabitants of these islands, predating all subsequent settlement. Such recognition is not a claim to ethnic supremacy or a diminishment of the citizenship and rights of other communities who have made Fiji their home, including Fiji's Indo-Fijian, Rotuman, and other communities, whose contributions to the nation are equally valued and protected under this Constitution. Rather, it is a foundational acknowledgment consistent with international indigenous rights norms, and one that underpins the specific protections already extended to iTaukei land (under the iTaukei Land Trust Act), customary fishing grounds (Qoliqoli), and traditional governance structures (the Bose Levu Vakaturaga), ensuring these protections rest on a clear and legally coherent constitutional foundation rather than on scattered statutory recognition alone.

2. Constitutional Recognition of the Bose Levu Vakaturaga (Great Council of Chiefs)

SODELPA has long campaigned for the restoration of the Bose Levu Vakaturaga (BLV) to its rightful place in national life and welcomed its reinstatement in 2023 as an advisory body. The party submits that the Commission should now consider entrenching the BLV's status, composition, and advisory functions directly in the Constitution, rather than leaving it dependent on ordinary legislation or executive discretion. This would ensure that no future government can unilaterally disband or diminish the Council, as occurred in 2012.

SODELPA recommends that the Commission examine, in consultation with the BLV itself, appropriate constitutional mechanisms for the Council to formally advise on matters of iTaukei custom, land, and identity.

As a start, SODELPA recommends that the BLV must, before consideration by Parliament, consider and approve all laws, touching on the rights and interests of iTaukei people in relation to:

(i) iTaukei land;

(ii) the extraction of minerals under any iTaukei land;

(iii) any state land under section 28(2) of the Constitution;

(iv) any state foreshore land which the Minister of Lands has power to approve a lease for, under section 21 of the State Lands Act.

3. Protection of iTaukei Land and Resource Rights

Consistent with its manifesto commitments, SODELPA submits that the Constitution should contain stronger, more explicit guarantees for the inalienability of native land administered under the iTaukei Land Trust Act, and should entrench protections against future legislative amendments of the kind SODELPA opposed in the previous Parliament, which the party viewed as weakening landowner consent and control over their land.

- Constitutional entrenchment of the requirement for free, prior, informed landowner consent (FPIC) prior to any leasing, use, or disposal of native land or resources.
- Constitutional recognition of customary fishing rights (qoliqoli) and a clear legal framework for their recognition and compensation where those rights are affected by development. The compensation framework must acknowledge economic, ecological and cultural value to iTaukei people.
- A constitutional requirement that any future amendment to native land legislation receive a special parliamentary majority, to protect iTaukei landowners from ordinary legislative change. This requirement should complement the role of the BLV recommended above.

4. The Character of the State and Freedom of Religion

SODELPA has consistently affirmed that Christian principles and values are foundational to the great majority of communities in Fiji, while also affirming respect for the freedom of worship of all faiths present in the country, including the Hindu, Muslim, and other communities that form part of the national fabric. The party submits that the Commission should consider a preambular or substantive constitutional acknowledgement of Fiji's Christian heritage and the contribution of faith communities to national life, alongside an unqualified guarantee of freedom of religion and belief for all citizens, so that recognition of the majority's heritage does not come at the expense of the rights of religious minorities.

5. Electoral Representation

SODELPA submits that the Commission should review the current electoral system with a view to strengthening the link between elected members and the communities and provinces they represent. The party's experience contesting elections under the existing open-list proportional system, and its experience as a small party achieving disproportionate influence relative to its vote share in 2022, illustrate broader concerns about representativeness and accountability that the Commission should examine closely. SODELPA recommends a return to some element of constituency- or province-based representation to better serve smaller and outer-island communities.

SODELPA submits that the Constitution should guarantee a minimum quota of 30 percent for either sex at both candidacy and elected level. SODELPA regards this measure as necessary and proportionate steps to correct the long-standing under-representation of women in Fiji's Parliament, and submits that a minimum quota is preferable to aspirational language, which experience has shown does not reliably translate into elected representation.

6. Executive Term Limits and the Presidency

Limiting the Tenure of the Prime Minister

SODELPA submits that the Constitution should impose a limit of three terms on any individual holding the office of Prime Minister, whether those terms are served consecutively or otherwise. The party considers that Fiji's history of prolonged, unbroken incumbency has weakened institutional accountability and contributed to the concentration of executive power criticised by the Supreme Court in its observations on the 2013 Constitution. A firm, self-executing term limit removes this risk regardless of which party or leader is in office, and SODELPA submits that this reform should apply irrespective of the party's own electoral fortunes.

Equitable Representation at Presidential Level

SODELPA further submits that the Constitution should require that no more than two consecutive Presidents shall be of the same sex. The party considers that the Presidency, as Fiji's ceremonial head of state and a unifying constitutional office, is well suited to entrench this principle of gender balance at the highest level of the State, and that doing so would complement the party's proposed 30 percent quota for either sex in Parliament by ensuring that equitable representation is visible and guaranteed in the nation's highest office.

7. Clear Demarcation of Ministerial and Permanent Secretary Roles

SODELPA recommends an amendment to section 127(3) which currently morphs the role of a Minister and that of a Permanent Secretary. The Constitution should expressly delineate the separation of political and administrative authority within government ministries. The Minister, as the political head of a ministry, shall be responsible for setting policy direction, representing the ministry in Cabinet and Parliament, and bearing political and public accountability for the ministry's performance. The Permanent Secretary, as the administrative head, shall be responsible for the day-to-day management and operations of the ministry, the implementation of government policy, financial and human resource administration, and the provision of frank, impartial professional advice to the Minister.

The Permanent Secretary shall be a career public servant appointed and removed through an independent public service process free from ministerial or political direction, to preserve the political neutrality and institutional continuity of the civil service across changes in government. A Minister shall not direct a Permanent Secretary or ministry staff in matters of individual personnel decisions, procurement, or operational administration falling within the Permanent Secretary's statutory responsibility, save through formal policy directive issued in writing and subject to record. This demarcation is intended to prevent the politicisation of the civil service, protect public servants from undue political interference, and ensure that ministerial accountability to Parliament is matched by a professional, merit-based administration capable of serving successive governments with equal competence and loyalty to the State.

8. Accountability and Good Governance

SODELPA submits that the Commission should use this review to strengthen the independence and accountability of key oversight institutions, narrow blanket immunity provisions inherited from previous Constitutions so that they do not shield serious offences from future scrutiny and ensure that any anti-corruption body operates independently of executive direction. SODELPA supports, in principle, submissions from the Fiji Law Society and others calling for clearer separation between investigative and prosecutorial functions in corruption matters.

Conclusion

SODELPA reiterates its appreciation for the Commission's work and its commitment to engaging constructively and in good faith throughout the consultation process. The party looks forward to participating in further public hearings and stakeholder engagements, and stands ready to provide additional detail on any of the matters raised in this submission upon request.

Submission of Mr. Josh Gaunavinaka

Policy Submission: Review of Section 23 (Political Rights) – Limiting the Number of Political Parties.

Background

Section 23 of the 2013 Constitution guarantees citizens the right to freedom of political association, including the formation of political parties. While this provision upholds democratic freedoms, the absence of limits on party formation has led to the proliferation of numerous small parties. This fragmentation weakens political stability, complicates coalition-building, and undermines effective governance.

Issue

Fiji's political landscape has seen the emergence of multiple parties with limited membership and narrow agendas.

Excessive party formation dilutes voter choices, creates unstable coalitions, and hinders long-term policy continuity.

The Constitution currently provides no mechanism to regulate or limit the number of parties contesting elections, resulting in inefficiency and instability in governance.

Recommendation

It is proposed that Section 23 of the Constitution be amended to introduce a limitation on the number of political parties eligible for registration and participation in national elections.

Suggested Amendment Wording: "While citizens retain the fundamental right to freedom of association and political participation, the registration of political parties shall be limited to a maximum of five (5). The Electoral Commission shall establish transparent criteria for party registration, ensuring that only parties with broad national representation, demonstrated organizational capacity, and commitment to democratic governance are eligible to contest elections."

Expected Impact

Political Stability: Consolidation of parties will reduce fragmentation and strengthen governance.

Accountability: Larger, well-structured parties will be more accountable to voters and more capable of delivering coherent policies.

Efficiency: Streamlined party registration will simplify electoral processes and reduce administrative burdens.

Youth Engagement: Stronger parties with broader platforms will provide clearer pathways for youth participation and representation.

Conclusion

Reviewing Section 23 to limit the number of political parties is a necessary step toward strengthening Fiji's democratic institutions. By balancing the right to political association with the need for stability, this amendment will foster effective governance, enhance accountability, and ensure that citizens – especially youths – are represented within robust and sustainable political structures.

Submission of Mr. Drole

INTRODUCTION

1. The Constitutional Rights of:
   - The Arrested and detained persons; and
   - The Accused persons.

2. The rights of the persons during the investigation process and the rights of the person during the prosecutorial process need review in order such rights are not only exist as constitutional texts but ensuring that they serve their intended constitutional threshold.

3. The criminal investigation process is like an "investigation pathway" consisting of three distinct but interconnected stages:
   - the suspicion and arrest stage - starting point;
   - the caution interview stage - middle point; and
   - the charging stage - end point.

4. That if the Criminal Investigation Process is flawed then the cautioned interview statement is involuntarily given thus it would be inadmissible as evidence.

SUBMISSION

5. Section 13 of the Constituion

Rights of arrested and detained persons

13. – (1) Every person who is arrested or detained has the right –

(a) to be informed promptly, in a language that he or she understands, of –

(i) the reason for the arrest or detention and the nature of any charge that may be brought against that person;

(ii) the reason for the arrest or detention and the nature of any charge that may be brought against that person; the right to remain silent; and

(iii) the consequences of not remain silent

6. We submit that the constitutional threshold with respect to arrest must be clearly stated in the Constitution, if not then the prosecutorial process is already contaminated when the arresting threshold is not fulfilled at the time of the arrest. The current practice is where the police will only say to the suspect "can we go to the police station" or in the taukei language *"rawa ni tou gole mada kina police station" without promptly informing him/her the reason of his/her arrest.

(b) to remain silent;

(c) to communicate with a legal practitioner of his or her choice in private in the place where he or she is detained, to be informed of that right promptly and, if he or she does not have sufficient means to engage a legal practitioner and the interests of justice so require, to be given the services of a legal practitioner under a scheme for legal aid by the Legal Aid Commission;

7. We submit that the constitutional threshold with respect to the "right to communicate with a legal practice" must be clearly stated in the constitution. That in the absence of such threshold the police always had an unjust easy journey to exploit the vulnerability of the detained person. The accused must get the proper legal advice that is necessary before he walks into the interview room and be subjected under a cautioned interview, or otherwise it just a legal ambush thus right to communicate with a legal practitioner is improperly exercised and adversely denied.

(d) not to be compelled to make any confession or admission that could be used in evidence against that person;

(e) to be held separately from persons who are serving a sentence, and in the case of a child, to be kept separate from adults unless that is not in the best interests of the child;

(f) to be brought before a court as soon as reasonably possible, but in any case not later than 48 hours after the time of arrest, or if that is not reasonably possible, as soon as possible thereafter;

8. We submit that the constitutional 48 hours threshold, is been breached and abused by the police all the time and it appears they have been relying on the exception attached to it where it say "...or if that is not reasonably possible, as soon as possible thereafter". We submit that the exception should only apply to small outer islands in maritime region and not to the main islands such as Viti Levu , Vanua Levu, Kadavu and Taveuni.

(g) at the first court appearance, to be charged or informed of the reasons for the detention to continue, or to be released;

(h) to be released on reasonable terms and conditions, pending a charge or trial, unless the interests of justice otherwise require;

(i) to challenge the lawfulness of the detention in person before a court and, if the detention is unlawful, to be released;

(j) conditions of detention that are consistent with human dignity, including at least the opportunity to exercise regularly and the provision, at State expense, of adequate accommodation, nutrition, and medical treatment; and

(k) to communicate with, and be visited by, –

(i) his or her spouse, partner or next-of-kin; and

(ii) a religious counsellor or a social worker.

(2) Whenever this section requires information to be given to a person, that information must be given simply and clearly in a language that the person understands.

(3) A person who is deprived of liberty by being detained, held in custody or imprisoned under any law retains all the rights and freedoms set out in this Chapter, except to the extent that any particular right or freedom is incompatible with the fact of being so deprived of liberty.

THE INVESTIGATION PATHWAY AND THE CONTINUING FAIRNESS AND OBLIGATIONS

9. We submit that in the current practice of the investigative process is been viewed and practised in segments and not holistically.

10. We submit that the criminal investigation process as an "investigation pathway" consists of three distinct but interconnected stages:

- the suspicion and arrest stage;
- the caution interview stage; and
- the charging stage.

11. We submit that constitutional safeguards, particularly the right to silence and the right to legal representation, operate continuously throughout all stages of the investigation pathway.

12. Accordingly, we submit the admissibility inquiry cannot be artificially confined to the caution interview alone. Any substantial unfairness occurring at the point of arrest, detention, interview, or charging may contaminate the entire process and render the resulting confession inadmissible.

13. We submit that the Prosecution focused narrowly on voluntariness of confession while failing to adequately address the broader question of procedural fairness throughout the entire and complete investigative process.

BREACH OF THE ACCUSED'S CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO LEGAL COUNSEL

14. Section 13(1)(c) of the Constitution guarantees a detained person the right to communicate with and be visited by a legal practitioner without delay.

15. We submit that this constitutional protection requires more than the mere recitation of rights through formal cautioning.

16. When evidence reveals a material inconsistency regarding whether the Accused actually communicated with legal counsel during detention or had communicated with a legal counsel but the required legal advice was not afforded to the detained person. Such contradiction raises serious doubt regarding whether the constitutional right is genuinely facilitated in practice.

17. We submit a detained person, particularly one facing serious allegations, may be vulnerable, intimidated, confused, or unaware of the practical significance of legal representation. In such circumstances, fairness requires police to actively facilitate the opportunity for legal consultation before interrogation proceeds.

18. We submit that the failure to ensure effective access to counsel before the caution interview contributed materially to the overall unfairness of the investigative process.

19. Section 14 of the Constitution:

Rights of accused persons

14. – (1) A person shall not be tried for –

(a) any act or omission that was not an offence under either domestic or international law at the time it was committed or omitted; or

(b) an offence in respect of an act or omission for which that person has previously been either acquitted or convicted.

(2) Every person charged with an offence has the right –

(a) to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law;

(b) to be informed in legible writing, in a language that he or she understands, of the nature of and reasons for the charge;

(c) to be given adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence, including if he or she so requests, a right of access to witness statements;

(d) to defend himself or herself in person or to be represented at his or her own expense by a legal practitioner of his or her own choice, and to be informed promptly of this right or, if he or she does not have sufficient means to engage a legal practitioner and the interests of justice so require, to be given the services of a legal practitioner under a scheme for legal aid by the Legal Aid Commission, and to be informed promptly of this right;

(e) to be informed in advance of the evidence on which the prosecution intends to rely, and to have reasonable access to that evidence;

(f) to a public trial before a court of law, unless the interests of justice otherwise require;

(g)to have the trial begin and conclude without unreasonable delay;

(h) to be present when being tried, unless –

(i) the court is satisfied that the person has been served with a summons or similar process requiring his or her attendance at the trial, and has chosen not to attend;

(ii) the conduct of the person is such that the continuation of the proceedings in his or her presence is impracticable and the court has ordered him or her to be removed and the trial to proceed in his or her absence;

(i) to be tried in a language that the person understands or, if that is not practicable, to have the proceedings interpreted in such a language at State expense;

(j) to remain silent, not to testify during the proceedings, and not to be compelled to give self-incriminating evidence, and not to have adverse inference drawn from the exercise of any of these right;

(k) not to have unlawfully obtained evidence adduced against him or her unless the interests of justice require it to be admitted;

(l) to call witnesses and present evidence, and to challenge evidence presented against him or her;

(m) to a copy of the record of proceedings within a reasonable period of time and on payment of a reasonably prescribed fee;

(n) to the benefit of the least severe of the prescribed punishments if the prescribed punishment for the offence has been changed between the time the offence was committed and the time of sentencing; and

(o) of appeal to, or review by, a higher court.

(3) Whenever this section requires information to be given to a person, that information must be given as simply and clearly as practicable, in a language that the person understands.

(4) A law is not inconsistent with subsection (1)(b) to the extent that it –

(a) authorises a court to try a member of a disciplined force for a criminal offence despite his or her trial and conviction or acquittal under a disciplinary law; and

(b) requires the court, in passing sentence, to take into account any punishment awarded against the member under the disciplinary law.

FAILURE TO PROPERLY EXPLAIN THE CONSEQUENCES OF CHARGING

20. We submit that while the charging process is in progress, the Accused must be advised of the legal consequences arising at the transition point whereas the detained person with change status that is from a detained person to an accused person.

21. We submit that Constitutional Rights do not operate mechanically. They exist to ensure informed participation within the criminal process. A suspect cannot meaningfully exercise rights without understanding the legal implications of the procedures being undertaken.

Closing Submission

SODELPA respectfully submits that Fiji requires a Constitution that is both principled and practical: a Constitution that every Fiji Islander can call their own; a Constitution that restores the name and dignity of indigenous Fijians; a Constitution that protects the vanua, Rotuma, Banaban identity and all communities; a Constitution that removes immunity for coups; a Constitution that strengthens the Great Council of Chiefs as an independent, non-partisan and modern institution; a Constitution that protects equal citizenship and human rights; and a Constitution that finally closes the door on unconstitutional seizure of power.

For Fiji, for the vanua, for every Fiji Islander, and for the generations yet to come, SODELPA urges the Constitution Review Commission to recommend a democratic, inclusive, accountable and culturally grounded constitutional settlement worthy of our nation's future.

Ministry of Lands and Mineral Resources (MLMR)

Ministry of Lands
Date:8-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: The Honourable Minister for Lands and Officers from the Ministry of Lands and Mineral Resources will now call this consultation session to order. I thank you very much for your attendance this afternoon, Honourable Minister and your officers. I do apologies for having to let you stand outside while SODELPA was finishing off. We went over time a little bit. We are allocated one hour. My apology for the short order allocation. now that we are at the last week of consultations, we have just been inundated with requests for submissions of submitters to come in and appear before us. However, the Ministry of Lands had given us, or requested us for the allocation well before and that is why we are here this afternoon.

The Commission, Constitution Review Commission is to review the 2013 Constitution. Our task includes, as directed in our term of reference from His Excellency the President, it includes hearing submissions from figures and that I mean generally speaking. The submissions have been received from various levels in society, from the very grassroots to the ministries and today we have two ministers who have appeared before us. The first one is the Minister of Education and the second one is the Minister of Lands who is sitting with us. Now for introduction, on my left is Dr Niles Gounder, an economist, lecturer at USP and has been used a lot by the government for various daily duties.

Next to him here on my left is Mr Ami Kohli, a lawyer of Labasa. I am the chairperson, Sevuloni Valenitabua, a practicing lawyer and on my right is Mr Conway Bag, an architect well known to you, to you I believe and also on the other end is Merewalesi Nailatikau. We have a commissioner sitting this afternoon and we are here to listen to submissions from the Ministry of Lands and Natural Resources. Without further ado, I now hand over the floor and the mic to you Honourable Minister or to the presenter to make your submissions. Thank you.

Mr. Vosarogo : Mr Chairperson. On behalf of the Ministry of Lands and Natural Resources and the senior staff, we would like to thank you and your commission for the invitation and also for an opportunity to come and discuss matters of not just national importance but also of constitutional importance. Today we have, we must say that we followed your journey from day one and we have also followed through some of the issues that we feel we are going to be required to contribute to in this very important National Dialogue. No need for apology Mr Chairperson. We would wait until our turn because we know that this is a very important task that you have. You have a ton of reference that you must meet and even stricter timelines to meet and I on behalf of the Ministry of Lands and Natural Resources would like to thank you for the tireless effort that you have put into this very important national work in the past few months.

At the outset Mr Chairperson and members of the Commission, I would like to acknowledge the hard work that has been undertaken by the Commission to this date. Constitution as we all know is not just any piece of law. It is the supreme law of our country and so we feel very respected to be asked to come and contribute to this process with you today. The Ministry of Lands and Mineral Resources welcome this opportunity to contribute here today in this National Dialogue. As you would understand Mr Chair, Ministry plays a very critical role in the sustainable management, administration and development of Fiji's land, Fiji's minerals, its groundwater and above us our geospatial resources. Through these responsibilities we at the Ministry we interact daily with issues that are directly linked to constitutional principles relating to land ownership, resource management, environmental stewardship, economic development, minerals ownership and the equitable distribution of benefits to all Fijians.

May I just highlight Mr Chairperson, there are three ongoing legislative review processes that we are undertaking at the Ministry to this date. The Mining Act of 1965 is I would submit highly relevant to the review of the 2013 constitutions because these statutes give practical effect to the constitutional provisions relating to land ownership, resource governance, property rights, environmental protection and sustainable development.

Firstly, Mr Chairman Sir, the State Lands Act governs the administration, allocation and management of state-owned lands. It reviews present presents an opportunity to ensure that legislative provisions are fully aligned with constitutional principles of transparency, accountability, equitable access and public benefit. Given the increasing demand for land to support housing, support infrastructure, investment and climate resilience initiatives, the review that we have undertaken is essential in ensuring that state land management continues to serve both national development priorities and the interest of present and future generations. Secondly, the Land Use Act plays an important role in facilitating productive use of land while balancing the rights of landowners with broader socio-economic development objectives or under our national development plan.

The review of this legislation provides an opportunity to assess whether existing frameworks adequately support agricultural development, investment, food security and sustainable land management while safeguarding constitutional protection relating to ownership, access, fair treatment of landowners and of our natural resources. Thirdly Mr Chairman Sir, the Mining Act has been in existence for over many decades now. It has come a time where it requires modernization to address contemporary challenges and opportunities within the extractive industry.

The review is particularly significant in the context of constitutional principles relating to natural resource management, environmental sustainability, social justice and equitable distribution of benefits. A modern legislative framework can strengthen regulatory oversight, enhance community participation, improves environmental safeguards, provide greater certainty for investment and ensure that mineral resource development contributes meaningfully to national development. Collectively, the review of these three key principles or pieces of legislation presents an opportunity to ensure coherence between constitutional provisions and the laws governing Fiji's land and mineral resources.

It allows for the strengthening enhancement of stakeholder participation, promotion of sustainable resource management practices that supports long-term national development. The Ministry therefore views the constitutional review and the ongoing legislative review as complementary processes that should inform and reinforce one another to achieve a modern, effective and resilient legal framework for Fiji's land and mineral resource sector. As such, the Ministry's submission is guided by several key considerations.

These include strengthening the protection of land rights, promoting transparent and accountable governance of natural resources, ensuring equitable access to economic opportunities arising from resource development, enhancing environmental safeguards and supporting sustainable development outcomes that benefits all of Fiji. Our submission is also informed by practical experiences gained through the Ministry's operational responsibilities, stakeholder consultation, policy implementation and emerging challenges associated with climate change, resource development, urban expansion and increased demand on land and on our natural resources. The Ministry of Land and Mineral Resources submits that consideration should be given to the formal recognition of state land as an integral component of Fiji's land tenure system within the constitution.

While the constitution provides extensive recognition and protection of iTaukei land ownership and acknowledges freehold land rights, state land remains a significant category of land that supports national development, provides public infrastructure, social services, environmental conservation and economic investment. The Ministry further submits that constitutional recognition would not diminish the protections afforded to iTaukei land owners or of those freeholders. Rather, it would acknowledge the reality of Fiji's land tenure system by expressly recognizing the important role that state lands play in advancing national development objectives and safeguarding our public interest.

Accordingly, the Ministry recommends that the constitution be amended to also expressly recognize state lands as a distinct and essential component of Fiji's land tenure system to be administered and managed by the state for the benefit of all the people of Fiji in accordance with the law. The Ministry of Lands and Marine Resources submits that the constitution should provide stronger recognition of the state's responsibility to progressively address the challenges associated with informal settlements while balancing the rights, dignity and welfare of affected communities. The growth of informal settlements, Mr Chairman Sir, has become a significant national issue and they're driven by urbanization, internal migration, population growth, economic challenges and limited access to affordable housing and service land.

These settlements often lack secure tenure, adequate infrastructure, basic services and resilience to natural disasters and climate-related risks. Given the increasing prevalence of informal settlements across Fiji, there is a need for a constitutional framework that supports coordinated and sustainable solutions. Such recognition would provide guidance for legislative framework, provide guidance for policymaking and development programs aimed at improving living conditions and promoting orderly urban development.

The ministry further notes that a significant proportion of informal settlements throughout Fiji are located on state lands. This, Mr Chairman, underscores the importance of effective state land management policies that supports regularization, affordable residential leasing programs, planned resettlement where necessary and the provision of essential services and infrastructure. Accordingly, the ministry recommends that the constitution recognize the state's role in facilitating access to adequate housing and promoting sustainable settlement development while enabling legislative and policy measures to address informal settlements in a manner that is equitable, practical and consistent with national development objectives.

Mr Chairman, Ministry of Lands and Mineral Resources submit that consideration should be given. I come to minerals in these few paragraphs. The Ministry of Lands and Mineral Resources submit that consideration should be given to broadening the constitutional and legislative definition of minerals to also include mineral water, spring water and groundwater extracted for commercial purposes.

The existing legal framework governing mineral resources has traditionally focused on solid minerals and extractive resources such as river sands and gravels. However, the growing commercial exploitation of groundwater, particularly for bottled water production and other commercial enterprises, highlights the need for a modern approach to resource governance. Groundwater and natural spring water are valuable natural resources that contribute significantly to Fiji's economy, employment, exports and national development.

Their extraction and commercial utilization generate substantial economic benefits and, like other natural resources, require effective regulations to ensure sustainability, accountability and equitable benefits for the people of Fiji. The Ministry recognizes the distinction between groundwater extraction for domestic, agricultural, community and public purposes and groundwater extraction undertaken for commercial gain. Accordingly, any expanded definition should be limited to groundwater, mineral water and spring water that are extracted, processed, packaged, sold or otherwise utilized for commercial gain.

The Ministry therefore recommends that the Constitution provides a basis for legislation to recognize mineral water, spring water and groundwater extracted for commercial purpose as a strategic natural resource subject to state regulations and sustainable management according to law. I come now, Mr. Chairman Sir, to perhaps the most prolific point that needs to be discussed, which is ownership of minerals. Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to outline some of the philosophical foundations upon which globally minerals are said or determined to be owned by the state for and on behalf of everybody.

In the end, Mr. Chairman, I will provide a caveat and before I provide that caveat, I will go to the Bill of Rights and explain why in these discussions the state cannot have, the state cannot have and should not have a say when it comes to provisions of the Bill of Rights. But allow me, Mr. Chairman, just to outline the principles that I said before were considered historically to how the state owns or is said to own minerals and not those on whose land those minerals are found. First, Mr. Chairman, we must look at the prevailing argument in this.

The 2013 Constitution of course recognizes, perhaps for the first time, that there is a distinct and separate right of the state to own all minerals wherever they're found. But there is a provision for the fair and equitable distribution of proceeds. Where does that come from? The prevailing argument is this, Mr. Chairman.

These minerals do not belong to the individual who happen to hold surface title. They belong to the state. And before we dismiss this as a status orthodoxy, let us examine the deep rationale and profoundly compelling architecture behind this global principle.

First, Mr. Chairman, we must look to history and the foundation of law. For centuries, Mr. Chair, two doctrines have shaped our world. First, the regalian doctrine tells us that the sovereign, the state, holds the ultimate title to all sub-earth wealth.

It recognizes a crucial distinction. Ownership of the soil is not ownership of the eternal depth beneath it. This, Mr. Chair, you would know as a lawyer, goes back to Roman and civil law.

But even more profound and more powerful is the public trust doctrine. This doctrine states that the state is not the owner of these resources in the way a private citizen owns a car or a house. No, the state is a custodian, a trustee.

It holds these resources not for its own enrichment, but for the benefit of all. In other countries of the world, in South Africa, in Canada, it means all citizens. Closer to home, in Papua New Guinea and in the Solomon Islands, it means to all of their citizens.

Critically, for all of their future generation. This, Mr. Chairman, is the foundational social contract. Secondly, and perhaps more critically, we must consider the public interest and allow me to be clear.

The private landowner is driven by a singular legitimate but narrow motive, maximizing personal profit. This is the engine of markets, but it is a dangerously short-sighted engine when applied to a finite natural wealth. A private owner will extract quickly, efficiently, and for immediate gain.

The state, however, is charged with a longer horizon. It is the custodian and a guardian of the common good. The state ensures that the benefit of a nation's inheritance are distributed broadly across the population, rather than accruing exclusively to the fortunate few who happen to live above a particular poor body.

Thirdly, let us turn to the hard economics, because values are nothing if they are not backed up by viable fiscal frameworks. State ownership, Mr. Chair, is not an ideological luxury. It is an economic imperative.

When the state holds the title, it can capture the economic rent, the windfall profits, through royalty, taxes, and equity participation. This revenue becomes the lifeblood of public services, our schools, our hospital, our infrastructure, and defines a functioning society. Furthermore, think about the balance sheet of the nation.

If the state owns its minerals wealth, that wealth can be counted as a national asset. It reflects in the nation's account. It accounts, it allows the government to borrow against future revenue to finance development today.

But perhaps the most elegant economic argument lies in addressing market failures. Private landowners have no incentives, none to account for the externalities of extraction, the environmental degradation, the water contamination, societal displacements. These are costs borne by the many, while the profit are captured by the few.

State stewardship allows what we might call the full social accounting, ensuring that the price of extraction truly reflects its cost to society. And paradoxically, a clear centralized state framework does not deter investment, it attracts it. Large-scale global capital requires certainty, consistency, and a single legal counterparty, not a patchwork of a thousand private deals.

Fourth, and increasingly urgent, is the matter of strategic sovereignty. We are in a race, Mr. Chairman, for critical minerals. This is not merely about economics.

It's about national security, defense, and energy transition. State must secure its own supply and must secure its own supply chains. By retaining ownership, state retains a stake in strategic project, ensuring that national interests are protected even when foreign expertise and capital are welcomed.

This is a fundamental expression of political sovereignty. To assert ownership over the subsurface is to assert control over the nation's destiny. Fifth, we must not forget the moral social imperative.

In many nations, the historical concentration of mineral wealth was a tool of dispossession and colonial exploitation. In South Africa, the shift to state custodian was a deliberate righteous, albeit righteous act, to overturn apartheid era laws that locked wealth minerals in the hands of a small white minority. It is a tool for redress, for black economic empowerment, and for creating equitable access to the mining industry. Private ownership without regulation, Mr. Chair, can lead to the dispossession of indigenous communities and the prioritization of extraction over human dignity. And finally, we must acknowledge the pragmatic administrative reality. Centralized regulation is simply more efficient.

A mineral reserve cannot last a single human lifetime, outlast a single company's shareholding, outlast the short-term mining license. The state provides a long-term planning horizon required to match the lifespan of the resource itself. I see it etched into the common law principle.

Whoever owns the soil owns everything up to the heavens and down to the dead. It is a powerful ancient doctrine. It is a cornerstone of private property rights in certain legal traditions.

But I put it to you this evening, Mr. Chair, members of the committee, the commission, that principle may offer limited benefit and varying standards of resource management. It is the doctrine of the feudal lord, not the doctrine of the modern inclusive and sustainable nation state. The shift to state ownership in countries closer to home, PNG, the Solomon Islands, and us, is a deliberate, perhaps a conscious policy choice by our forefathers.

It is an overriding of an old private right, not to stifle enterprise, but elevate the broader public good, to ensure that assets of the nation serve the nation today and for generations yet to come. So when we ask who owns the mineral well, the answer, Mr. Chairman and members of the commission, is not just a matter of law, it is a matter of national identity. It is a reflection of who we are and whom we serve.

And at government, we are called to serve all citizens of Fiji, who rely on government for health care, roads, and social wages. I ensured, Mr. Speaker, that I would speak to the notion of the state's ownership of minerals under the surface of our land, because as I had imagined, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Chairman, having followed your roadmap in various locations where you have heard public consultations, the cry for landowning units to own minerals have been overwhelming. And we are not in opposition to that.

Today, we've come to explain the philosophical foundation of why in most countries, perhaps in the Commonwealth, it is said or espoused under law and even in our constitution to belong to the state. But I did mention to you, Mr. Chairman, that I shared those views with a caveat. And the caveat is this, Mr. Chairman.

As a lawyer, you and I know that the Bill of Rights do not belong to the state. The Bill of Rights belong to the people. And I wanted to clarify this because what I have said is a matter that is contained under the Bill of Rights.

So, whilst most members of the community that you have heard have called for the ownership of minerals to be retained by landowning units, the state has offered the alternative view of why minerals are said to belong to the states in most, if not all, of the mining countries and in the Commonwealth. And I said to you, Mr. Chairman, that the caveat in my proposition is that whilst we're addressing you today, and we are addressing you on a matter that is contained in the Bill of Rights, the Bill of Rights is something that belongs not to the state. It belongs to the people.

And so, I wanted to clarify that position, Mr. Chairman, in order to invite a deeper reflection on the very nature of the document that you, Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, you are now charged with reviewing. I want to challenge us to consider the fundamental question today. What is a constitution? Can I take you back, Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission? I may be running out of time.

You can stop me anytime you want. In 2017, the confirmation hearing of Justice Neil Gorsuch of the United States Supreme Court, and during his confirmation hearing, he referred to the United States Constitution as a negative document. His words, Mr. Chairman, was not casual.

They were a distillation of a profound philosophy about the relationship between the citizen and the state. And I submit to you today that this philosophy holds very vital lesson in our own constitutional making project today. What did he say, Mr. Chairman? Justice Gorsuch said, and I quote, the constitution is a negative document.

And the theory behind it, in short order, was to divide power to better protect liberty. That was the theory. If you put all powers into one set of hands, you are going to get tyranny.

And our founders, the American founding fathers, had too much evidence of that in their own time. Mr. Chair, we've had a few constitutions, and I'm sure our story, although not as long as the American story, has the same handworks found all over it. Justice Gorsuch went on to explain that the constitution divides the federal government into three branches to safeguard liberty, and that state retains power not delegated to the federal government.

But these structures, safeguards, he noted, were not thought enough, which is why the founders decided we are going to add a bill of rights, enumerating 10 specific protections, including freedom of speech, life, religion, and the right to bear arm. When Justice Gorsuch called the constitution a negative document, Mr. Chair, he's articulating a specific philosophy about its purpose and about its function. And allow me, Mr. Chair, just to break that down, because it would make meaning of my earlier utterances.

First, Mr. Chair, it restricts government and it does not grant government rights. The core idea, as Senator Ben Sasse articulated before Gorsuch echoed it, is that the constitution is not the government giving people freedoms. It is people giving government a limited set of enumerated powers.

And under this view, Mr. Chair, rights are pre-existing. They belong to the people by nature. They are not gifts from government.
The constitution does not create or bestow liberties. It simply recognizes them and restricts the government from infringing upon them. Thinking about the profound implication of that, Mr. Chair, if rights are inherent, then the burden lies with the government to then justify how it interferes with it.
The default position, of course, is liberty. The exception is state power.
Second, Mr. Chair, it is about negative liberties.

In political philosophies, you would understand, Mr. Chair, a negative right is a right to be free from government interference. Freedom of speech, freedom of religion, the right to own property, the right to bear arms in the American. These are rights of non-interference.

This contrasts sharply with the positive rights, which would require governments to provide something, requires government to provide health care, education, housing, and welfare. By calling the constitution a negative document, Justice Gorsuch aligns with the view that primary function is to protect citizens from government's overreach, not to empower government to deliver benefits. This is not a denial of the importance of social goods, but it is a statement about the proper role of a constitution.

The constitution is the fence around power, not the blueprint of a state's agenda. Justice Gorsuch emphasized that the founders were very suspicious and very jealous of their liberties. They had experienced tyranny in their lifetime.

They knew in their bones what happens when power is concentrated in the hands of a few. And so they designed a system where power is divided and checked horizontally and across all branches of government, vertically between nations and provinces. They build a machine of many moving parts precisely because they trusted no single concentration of authority.

Fourth, Mr. Chair, and this view carries a profound implication of how judges, and I've come to that in a minute, and indeed all public officials, including us, should interpret the constitution. Because we should stand in alliance with the role of the judiciary to interpret and not make laws. Now I say this, Mr. Chairman, because in my early submissions, as I had indicated, providing the alter argument to the ownership issue of minerals.

And as I said in your road trip around the country, and we have witnessed many calls around ownership issues, not only of this land, but also about minerals. We've established before you this afternoon why philosophically everywhere else around the world it is labeled and considered to be an asset and a belonging of the state. And I preface that, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Chairman, by saying that whilst we have addressed, we, as a part of government, a ministry of the state, whilst we have addressed you on things that have come out as topical during your discussions, the state, in my view, has no right to say anything about the Bill of Rights.

Because the Bill of Rights, as I said, a constitution is involved in a negative document, or is a negative document, which means that the people who own the rights tell the government this is the extent to which you can limit or lawfully infringe on those rights. The rights belong to the people, and that's why you are consulting with us and with the rest of the population of Fiji in ensuring that we bring about a constitution that will best reflect not only just the realities of today, but also reflect the voices that have come out from your public consultations. We are prepared to answer questions, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Chairman, this afternoon. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much indeed, Honorable Minister for Lands and Middle Resources. Very clear and comprehensive submission it was this afternoon. I believe that you have your hard copy there. We would really appreciate it if we can be provided with a hard copy or with a soft copy to be sent to us, so that we can have them printed and be used for our deliberations starting next week. Mr. Chairman, sir, we will oblige. We will send a soft copy across to your commission. Thank you. The email address can be given by one of the girls to which the submission could be sent. We have heard you, Honorable Minister. As you rightly stated, we have gone around the country. We have heard submissions from the grassroots people. We have heard submissions from middle class, if I may say. We have heard submissions from everybody at all levels of society.

The issue in relation to the ownership of minerals was one of the subjects of consultations and submissions which were recurring all over our Fiji. Suggestions have been put to us in relation to the ownership of minerals under Section 30 of the Constitution, as you would know. Suggestions have been made that all ownership of all minerals found on Itaukei lands, for example, have to be returned to the landowners. That is the suggestions and recommendations that have been recurring all over the country.

Now, that is the stance taken by our people. Now, this afternoon, we have heard submissions from you in relation to the philosophical aspect of that issue, the issue of ownership of mineral resources. It has given us another aspect of the ownership of minerals, particularly on how it has been suggested to us that the state has these minerals as a custodian. Rather than give them to the landowners, the minerals might be abused and then taken out of control. Now, I hope that there is a correct interpretation of what you have been telling us. If you want to correct me, better correct me now.

Mr. Vosarogo: Thank you, Chair. I open by saying that I would identify the philosophical principle of why the state owns minerals, not just in Fiji, Solomon Islands, and Papua New Guinea, closer to home, and most, if not all, of the mining countries in the Commonwealth. So, I've clarified why there is a foundational philosophy to that law. I then go on by clarifying that we are dealing with Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights belongs to the people. It will not be in line for the state to be making that right the state's right. The Bill of Rights is supposed to belong to the people first off. It is the government that can limit, or the people will then, in that same document, the Constitution, provide for lawful inroads, interventions, on how those rights could be limited in certain circumstances. But the Bill of Rights is not a space for the state. The Bill of Rights is the space for those who own those rights.

Mr. Valenitabua: Well, thank you for that clarification. Now, with what we have heard this afternoon, it's going to be, we will be sitting down for deliberations, and then we will be considering that versus what the people want in relation to ownership of minerals. It goes for that we've been received; we have received submissions in relation to the ownership of as you rightly said, that is from the sky down to the center of the earth. That is what we should own as landowners. However, we have heard you, vulnerable minister, and I am sure we are going to be balancing these two who will affect us during our deliberations.

What I would say, when I would send through Mr. Chair my, the soft copy of the submissions, you find the added parts about the administration, the regulations of, because you have just highlighted about foreshore, we will also provide that to you. And I guess the bottom line of all of this is that the state administers what the people want the state to administer. That's the long and short of it.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Usually, the commissioners might want to ask questions. Commissioners? Mr. Kohli.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you, honorable minister. I hear you very clearly where you're coming from, and that is in line with other countries as well. Because when developers want to develop, they invest a lot of money. They want clarity. They want to deal with the entity rather than group of people who may disagree, particularly so in Fiji. Now, if I hear you correctly, I think what you're trying to say is that Bill of Rights actually is limiting your powers. If you look at it here, it, the state that, land that is taken by the state, for example, for certain purposes, have to be returned again. And we are hearing from the people that the land that is taken from the iTaukei people should be, if it's not required by government, should be returned to them as iTaukei land. That's the one thing we're hearing.

Mr. Vosarogo: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Through you, I think the submissions that you're hearing are referring to historical wrongs, historical injustices, where lands that were taken or asked for, for public purposes, have been retained by the state, or its usage have been changed by the state over the, over its lifetime. And so they're not, they're not too sure if the existing usage was what was, it was originally given for. In many of our, not in many, sorry, Mr. Chair. In some of our research, we have discovered that some state lands that were initially acquired for public purposes, no longer are being used for that original purpose. We've identified them and we've returned them.

This question is again as to the ownership of minerals by the state, as against what you've been hearing from the people. I do not know whether this is a solution or not, but we have been mandated here to look at the equitable share. So how that formula operates at the moment, I think is 5% or 80% or something.

Yes. So the, the formula, Mr. Chairman, through you, the formula is with precious minerals, with precious metals, minerals, gold and silver. We have two gold producing mines in Fiji, Vatukoula and Tuvatu.

Before they send the bar of gold across overseas, they get certification from MRD and they also get a certification from RBF that states the price of gold on the day. And so the 5% of royalty is calculated on the FOB, on the current FOB before the gold gets shipped. It's 5% at the moment.

And that's something that in our Mining Act review, we are also, we're also hearing views about whether it's 5% or it should go up. In the course of the next two weeks, our commissioners who are conducting, and this is the last week as well of public consultation on the Mining Review, Mining Act review, they're going to be traveling across to Australia and on to PNG. When they come back, they'll have a comparative analysis of the industry as it is in Australia right now and in Papua New Guinea, where there's a lot of mining activities that's going on.

And then hopefully they will, you know, we're going to have a proposal or a bill that's going to go to Parliament encompassing all of these new things that we would want to have in the Mining Act. So whilst you are doing your review, Mr Chairman, so the Mining Act is also being reviewed right now. And we're also hearing the same submission that you've heard from the landowners.

We would want the ownership to be returned. And so we're hearing that and I'm sure it's going to be captured as well in the new Mining Act.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you, Honourable Minister.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Chair. Thank you, Honourable Minister for your very well thought and clearly laid out submission this afternoon. Given the submissions we have received, your submission will play a key role in the discussion that we are going to have in terms of how to deal with the demand from the landowners. And I must say, after listening to the submissions from the people in the communities, in the villages, I went back to look at the Reefs Commission report. And they received very similar submissions during their time as well. But if you go further back, you see similar submissions received all over the country. But for some reason, those who are in charge of drafting the regulations did not see fit to make any further changes, which I believe is the foundation of your argument as well. And, you know, the economics of it, when you see the resource sharing and protection of resource as well as resource management fits in very well with the argument that you have made today. So, I want to thank you for a very honest submission, and it will be very useful in our deliberations.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you very much. Thank you very much. Thank you, Honourable Minister and colleagues. Just to add on to my fellow Commissioner's comments and a question potentially, I appreciate your laying out the philosophical underpinnings. Speaking in defense of philosophy, they do have real life implications, as you've stated, in terms of public infrastructure, service delivery, and also a predictable environment for investment to thrive. We've certainly heard submissions in that vein as well about the importance of predictability and standardization for enabling growth. I also wanted to ask something related to the equitable share, the matter of equitable share. People had a wide spectrum of submissions, as you would have heard, around this notion of absolute ownership or sovereignty in relation to ownership. But there was also an undertow or request for advisory support for some form of regulation in terms of enabling this permanent alienation, or as you say, as we are seeing globally, you know, threats to strategic sovereignty, for instance. So, I'd just be interested to hear from you any matters relating to the aspect of equity in terms of share, but also these matters of forward-looking concerns around strategic sovereignty.

Mr. Vosarogo : Thank you very much for the question, Mr Chairman, through you. In the Minerals Bill review that we are currently conducting, we certainly have heard more than the issue of ownership. We've heard from landowners about being part of the business, being part of the operation. And so certainly there's going to be, I certainly hope that we will develop regulations that would ensure that they're not just said to be landowners or said to be mineral owners, but they're also going to be active participants, most hopefully as equity partners in any business that comes to do mining in their area.

The problem, as I see, Mr Chairman, is not so much. I think that, to be honest, the ownership is like the back wall. It's the equity participation and equity benefit that is the main source of cry. They see that quite possibly a lot of minerals are being extracted, but not a lot of outlay that has come out from it for community benefit. That is something that we're very conscious about in our review of the Minerals Law, and we're most certainly hopeful that this is going, once we address this, we are going to address the common cry that also includes ownership from those who know that they have minerals in their space. They have minerals underneath their feet, but they are not willing to come and engage with the companies simply because they feel that this is one business that we're going to be a part of, and after a while we're going to be left out.

So the main line of defense there is we want ownership to be in our hands so that it secures us when we go forward with any form of negotiation. Government, of course, has the central role of administrating the law, making sure that there are regulations. You tick the boxes before you are issued with, say, a special prospectus license. That's government's job. Right now, my staff at the Ministry of MRD are doing that. We're losing a lot of expertise in MRD, Mr Chair. In fact, there are some senior positions that are not even filled to this date because there are better offers from companies here and from companies in Australia and in Papua New Guinea. So despite that, I still feel that we're able to meet the challenges that are up ahead of us. The 1965 laws have served its usefulness. I think we are into a period now where we need to review it so that we can create the equity that landowners will be happy to participate in fully.

Mr. Valenitabua: Honorable Minister and the staff members of the Ministry of Lands and Mineral Resources, I have to bring this consultation session to an end because we've got officers from the Ministry of the Civil Service waiting for their consultation this afternoon. I thank you very much indeed for the submissions that we have heard. We will surely use it during our deliberations, which will start next week.

----------End of Session [8-7-2026]----------

National Youth Council of Fiji (NYCF)

National Youth Council of Fiji
Date:8-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: Okay, ladies and gentlemen, I will now call this consultation session to order. I understand you are from the National Youth Council of Fiji. We welcome you to the commission this morning.

We have allocated you time from 9 a.m. to 10 a.m. as a one-hour slot. And I believe that you know why you are here. You are here for submissions to the commission in relation to what the National Youth Council of Fiji recommends to be included in the amended constitution which we are working on.

We were appointed to review the 2013 constitution. And we have been tasked to collect submissions, get your views, get recommendations from our people in Fiji in relation to what should be in the constitution. Now that is the short introduction I will make this morning, except to say that on my right is Mr. Conway Beg, the commissioner and architect by profession.

I am the chairperson, Sevuloni Valenitabua, a practicing lawyer. On my left here is Mr. Ami Kohli, a practicing lawyer of Labasa. And on the far left is Dr. Neelesh Gounder, a lecturer and academic at USP who is also an economist.

So we are sitting here this morning to listen to your submissions. I now pass the mic to you and the floor, you may proceed, considering that we have one hour. Thank you.

Ms. Eliano: Thank you and a very good morning to you all. My name is Mere Eliano, the general secretary for the National Youth Council of Fiji. The National Youth Council of Fiji respectfully submits these recommendations to the Constitutional Review Commission for consideration in the review of the 2013 constitution of the Republic of Fiji.

The National Youth Council of Fiji is made up of two affiliate bodies, which are the Provincial Youth Forum of Fiji, which looks after and works with the youth in the rural areas in the 15 provinces of Fiji, including Rotuma. The Youth Assemblies of Fiji, which looks after and works with youth from the urban, semi-urban and peri-urban areas of Fiji, focusing on thematic areas and working with other organizations, youth groups, uniform groups, faith-based organizations, amongst others. Each affiliate body makes up of 50% of the council and combined, make the National Youth Council, which is the highest youth consultative youth body in Fiji for the government.

This submission is made from the perspective of Fiji's young people, who are not only citizens of today, but also the generation that will inherit the long-term consequences of constitutional decisions made now. A constitution must not only organize government, it must protect rights, preserve identity, strengthen democracy, uphold accountability and secure the future of the nation. The National Youth Council of Fiji therefore submits that constitutional reform must place young people, indigenous identity, democratic participation, environmental justice, public accountability and intergenerational responsibility at the center of Fiji's constitutional future.

Mr. Maharaj: Thank you, Madam General Secretary. To the Honorable Commissioners, good morning once again. It is an honor to be back here again.

We have met and when I made submissions on behalf of Fiji Council of Social Services. So, on my right, we have the General Secretary of the National Youth Council, Ms. Maria. To my immediate left is Mr. Severo and after him is Mr. Semesa.

He looks after the Provincial Youth Forum Constitution Review. And to my far left is the Vice President of Youth Assemblies of Fiji, as mentioned in the introduction, and I am Vipin Maharaj, the Chair of the Governance Committee of the National Youth Council of Fiji and the President of the Youth Assemblies of Fiji. We will take our submissions as by chapter and it will be a bit here and there.

However, different speakers have different allocations on what they will be speaking on, beginning with the Madam General Secretary.

Mr. Valenitabua: If I may say, Mr. Maharaj, could you just summarize the points and then summarize?

Mr. Maharaj: Yes.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you.

Ms. Eliano: Chapter 1 of the Constitution should expressly recognize that constitutional reform affects not only current citizens but also children, young people and future generations. The Constitution is not a short-term political document. It is the highest law of the nation and must guide Fiji for many years to come.

This recommendation is straightforward. Young people are not passive beneficiaries of government decisions. They are constitutional stakeholders.

They will live the longest with the consequences of today's decisions. A constitution that does not expressly speak to future generations risks being too narrowly focused on present political arrangements. For this reason, the value in Chapter 1 should include intergenerational responsibility.

This means that the state must make decisions today with proper regard to the rights, welfare and future security of those who will live with the consequences tomorrow. Young people must not be treated only as future voters or future leaders. They are citizens now.

They are affected by decisions on education, land, climate change, employment, governance, technology, health, culture and national development. The Constitution should therefore clearly recognize that the interests of children, youth and future generations must be considered in national decision-making. A recommendation in Chapter 1 should be amended to include a constitutional principle requiring the state to protect the interests of children, young people and future generations in all major public decisions.

Mr. Severo: On Section 4.31.4, Civic Education, Health and Political Participation Training, Section 4.31.4 should be strengthened to allow the state to require educational institutions to teach subjects relating to health and well-being, civic education, political participation, leadership, constitutional literacy and issues of national interest. A council is concerned that some of the children progress through the education system without adequate foundational literacy and numeracy. When a student teaches high levels of schooling without being able to read, write or count at an age-appropriate level, that is not simply an individual failure, it is a system failure.

The Constitution should support early identification of learning needs, remedial support, inclusive education and flexible pathways that prioritize mastery of basic skills. A democratic society cannot function properly if citizens do not understand their rights, responsibilities, institutions and laws. Many young people leave school without proper understanding of Parliament, elections, the Constitution, local government, public finance, climate responsibility, national unity or peaceful civic participation.

Civic education must therefore be treated as a national priority. Young people should be taught how democracy works, how to participate respectfully, how to advocate for their communities and how to hold the leaders accountable without violence, hatred or division. Health and well-being should also be recognized because young people face increasing challenges relating to mental health, substance abuse, lifestyle disease and reproductive health, cyber safety and social pressures.

Proposed amendments, amendment section 31-4 may be amended to provide that the state may directly, may direct any educational institution to teach subjects relating to health and well-being, civic education, constitutional literacy, political participation, leadership training, national development and issues of national interest and every educational institution must comply with such direction. On section 40, environmental health, environmental rights, climate justice and interrogational equity, section 40 of the Constitution recognize environment's right, environmental right. The National Youth Council of Fiji recommends that this provision be expanded to expressly include climate justice and intergenerational equity.

Young people will live with a long-term consequences of climate change, sea level rise, coastal erosion, poor waste management, unsustainable development, pollution and environmental destruction. For many communities in Fiji, climate change is not a future risk, it is already affecting homes, food security, water sources, livelihoods, culture and relocation decisions. Environmental protection must not only be about land and resource today, it must also be about survival, dignity and security of future generation.

Young people should therefore have a constitutional right to participate in climate and environmental decision making. A recommendation for section 40 should be amended to include the right of present and future generations to a clean, healthy and sustainable environment, a duty on the state to act on climate change, the right of young people to participate in climate related decision making, a requirement that development decision consider long-term environmental consequences.

On section 4, rights of children and discipline, section 41 sorry, section 41 protects the rights of children including protection from abuse, neglect, harmful cultural practices, violence, inhumane treatment and exploitative labor.

The submission raises concern that discipline among children has declined, this has resulted in delinquency and other forms of unacceptable behavior and that parents and teachers feel restricted in correcting children. If proposed that the constitution clarify the difference between abuse and lawful discipline, the issue must be approached carefully, the constitution must protect the children from abuse, violence and degrading treatment. At the same time, families and school require proper disciplinary frameworks that guide children correct harmful behavior and support moral development.

A recommendation for section 41 that it should be reviewed to clarify that child protection laws should not prevent reasonable, lawful and proportionate discipline, provided such discipline does not amount to abuse, injury, cruelty, humiliation and inhumane treatment. Any discipline framework must be strictly regulated, child sensitive and consistent with the best interests and dignity of the child, acknowledging that Fiji had a penal code which was later repealed within the repeal penal code, there was threshold set to 12 strikes for corporal punishment, this framework could be used to avoid any corporal punishment mechanism for reaching out to the outright physical abuse.

Constitutional recognition on the great council of chiefs, a great council of chiefs or the Boselevu Vakaturaga should be constitutionally recognized as a principal traditional advisory institution to the Itaukei people.

The GCC has historically served as highest traditional institution representing indigenous leadership, while Fiji is a democratic state, there remains value in recognizing a national traditional institution that can advise on matters affecting indigenous culture, customary practices, traditional leadership, heritage preservation, reconciliation and national unity. The GCC should not replace parliament or elect government, however it can play an important advisory role on matters affecting indigenous communities and the Vanua. Our recommendation for the constitution, the constitution should recognize the Bose Vakaturaga, the principal traditional advisory institution for the Itaukei people, empowered to provide advice on the indigenous customs, traditions, culture, leadership, heritage and reconciliation. The submission further recommends that the GCC be given the constitutional role of appointing and nominating the president of Fiji, reflecting its position as a pinnacle traditional body compromising Fiji's chieftains and restoring an important historical practices.

Mr. Semesa: Looking at section 28 regarding land, fishing grounds and minerals, section 28 currently recognizes that the ownership of Itaukei land remains with the customary owners and that Itaukei land cannot be permanently alienated except in accordance with the constitution, however this protection is incomplete if customary owners are recognized as owners in principle but do not have meaningful control over land, fishing grounds and resources connected to their traditional identity and survival. The submission raises concerns that authority of Itaukei land is largely exercised through statutory bodies such as the Itaukei land trust board and the Itaukei land trust act, which first is controlled over the land through the board.

It also raises concern that traditional fishing grounds are often treated as areas of access rather than full ownership and that minerals are vested entirely upon the state rather than the customary land owners. For indigenous communities, land is not merely an economic asset, it is connected to identity, ancestry, chiefly systems, food security, culture, spirituality and future generations. The same applies to traditional fishing grounds including river and coastal resources.

The recommendation section 28 should be amended to recognize not only ownership but also meaningful control for customary owners of Itaukei land, traditional fishing grounds and associated national resources. The proposed amendment looking at section 28 and ownership and control of all Itaukei land traditional fishing grounds including sea and river fishing grounds and associated customary resources shall remain with the customary owners of that land and that fishing grounds. Such land, fishing ground and resources shall not be permanently alienated by sale, grant, transfer or exchange except to state accordance with section 27 and only with the free, prior and informed consent of the customary owners.

This recommendation would require related amendments to land, fisheries and minerals legislation so that constitutional protection is reflected in ordinary law. Looking at recognition of cultural governance structures, the constitution should expressly recognize indigenous cultural governance structures including the Tokatoka, Mataqali, Yavusa, Vanua and if applicable Matanitu. The Vanua represents far more than land ownership.

It embodies traditional leadership, kinship systems, cultural identity, social responsibility, community governance, stewardship of natural resources and the transfer of knowledge, customs and values across generations. These traditional structures continue to play an important role in maintaining social order, resolving disputes, preserving culture, supporting community development and protecting natural resources. Their recognition would not undermine the democratic state, rather it would acknowledge Fiji's indigenous social foundation and ensure that traditional institutions are respected within the constitutional order.

The recommendation a new constitutional provision should recognize the Tokatoka, Mataqali, Yavusa, Vanua and Matanitu if applicable as integral components of indigenous social organization and customary governance. Moving on to youth culture and political parties, political parties should be required to include youth representation within their structures. Young people should not only be engaged as campaign workers during election, they should be involved in policy development, manifesto, drafting, candidate selection, internal party leadership and national political decision making.

In 2022, only a very small number of members of parliament was sworn in under the age of 35. This demonstrates that youth participation cannot be left to chance. The recommendation looking at section 53 dealing with political parties should be amended to require every registered political party to maintain at least 30 percent of youth representation within its membership, leadership structures or candidate development process.

The youth quota would encourage political parties to build young leaders early and ensure that youth voices are heard inside party decision-making structures. If the commission does not support reserved seats or dedicated seats, the council recommends alternative constitutional mechanisms such as mandatory youth representation in parliament committees, a standing youth advisory mechanism to parliament or youth representation requirements in electoral laws. Moving on to youth participation in state services and public bodies, young people should be also represented in public bodies, advisory structures and national committees.

Youth participation should not depend on goodwill alone, it should be built into governance. Young people should have representation in national development boards, municipal consultations, climate bodies, education committees, employment policy forums and other public decision-making spaces. The recommendations chapter six should recognize qualified youth participation in public bodies and require the state to ensure youth representation in advisory and decision-making structures.

Moving on to the constitutional recognition of provincial councils, provincial councils should be recognized in the constitution of Fiji as important institutions linking communities, traditional leadership and government. Provincial councils provide a platform for community consultations, development planning, cultural preservation, education initiatives, disaster preparedness, social cohesion and communication between government and indigenous communities. Their role is especially important in rural and maritime areas where communities may not always have direct access to central government decision-making.

Constitutional recognition would strengthen their legitimacy and ensure that provincial voices are properly considered in national development. The recommendation, the constitution should recognize provincial councils as representative institutions of indigenous people at the provincial level, the responsibility to promote social, cultural and developmental advancement within the provinces. The Itaukei affairs framework should also be constitutionally recognized so that indigenous governance is protected at the highest legal level.

Mr. Severo: On protection of indigenous language, culture, heritage and additional knowledge, the constitution should contain a specific right protecting indigenous language, cultural heritage, traditional knowledge and cultural expressions. This should include protection for massive motifs, traditional tattoo patterns, clan and tribal symbols, traditional songs and chants, traditional dances, indigenous artwork, ceremonial regalia and traditional medicinal knowledge. These cultural expressions are not merely designs or performance, they carry history, identity, spirituality and collective ownership.

They belong to communities, clans, yavusa, mataqali and provinces. They should not be copied, commercialized or registered by outside parties without consent. Our recommendation is a new constitutional right should provide that the state shall recognize, protect, preserve and promote the identity, language, customs, traditional knowledge, cultural expression and intellectual property of indigenous Itaukei people as the first peoples and traditional custodians of Fiji.

The constitution should also require that traditional cultural expression and indigenous knowledge shall remain the collective property of the community which they belong and shall not be reproduced, commercialized, registered or exploited without free, prior and informed consent. Where traditional knowledge or design are used commercially, there should be proper consent, royalties and penalties for misuse. On chapter three, stronger public participation before laws are passed.

Parliament should be constitutionally required to conduct meaningful public consultation before major laws are passed, especially with the youths of the country. Youth participation must not be symbolic, it must allow affected communities, young people, civil societies, rural communities, faith-based organization, persons with disabilities, women, workers and marginalized groups to be properly heard. The constitution should require youth impact assessment for major bills.

Lawmakers should consider how proposed law affects children, youth, education, employment, climate, mental health, technology, civic space and future generations. A recommendation on chapter three should be amended to require meaningful public consultation and youth impact assessment before the passage of major legislation.

Mr. Fonorito: Kamna Meuri, Joseph Unarito from the National Youth Council.

On item number 13, dedicated youth seats in parliament. The constitution guarantees civic participation, political participation and equality, including protection from discrimination on the ground of age. Despite this, young people remain significantly underrepresented in parliament and national decision-making.

Young people are often used during campaign as volunteers, mobilizers and supporters, yet they are rarely given a real seat at the dedicated decision-making table. This creates a gap between political participation and political representation. The National Youth Council of Fiji submits that youth representation should be constitutionally guaranteed, not left to political goodwill.

The National Youth Council of Fiji's recommendation is that at least four dedicated youth seats should be created in parliament through the National Youth Council of Fiji, with two seats allocated through the youth assemblies of Fiji and two seats allocated through the provincial youth forums of Fiji. This would ensure that young people have a direct voice in the highest halls of national law-making and governance. It would also support inclusive decision-making, reduced age-based exclusion and aligns Fiji's constitutional framework with the principle of democratic participation and equality.

Item 14, Section 52, Qualification and Competency of Members of Parliament. The submission recommends that the Member of Parliament should possess a minimum level of education and relevant experience. Parliament is the highest law-making body in the country.

Members of Parliament are responsible for passing laws, scrutinising budget, debating national policies and representing the people. It is therefore important that those elected to Parliament have the capacity to understand complex public issues. The submission further recommends that the Minister should have relevant experience or competency in the area they are appointed to lead.

For instance, a Minister responsible for education should have a leadership, administrative or professional experience relevant to the education, training, youth development or public policy. The National Youth Council of Fiji's recommendation to Section 52 that it should be reviewed to concede a minimum qualification, training or competency requirement for Members of Parliament and a stronger suitable criteria for Ministerial appointment. MPs or Members of Parliament should have at least diploma and relevant experience in the related field.

We acknowledge this may unintentionally exclude capable rural leaders, customary leaders, workers and community advocates who have practical knowledge but limited formal education. However, Fiji is rapidly moving towards the future with concepts such as AI, which requires our leader to be able to adapt to the changing society and have a minimum qualification to uphold integrity of Parliament.

Ms. Eliano: The proposed amendment to Section 147, funding of the Secretariat of the National Youth Council of Fiji.

The National Youth Council of Fiji respectfully recommends that Section 147 be amended to explicitly provide for government funding for the NYCF Secretariat as part of the offices and personnel supported through the national budget. The NYCF is the highest consultative body of the government on youth matters and serves as the nationally recognized representative platform for young people across Fiji. To effectively fulfill this statutory mandate, the Council requires a professionally staffed and adequately resourced Secretariat.

Historically, the NYCF Secretariat was housed within the Ministry of Youth and Sports with Secretariat staff funded through the government budget. This arrangement ensured continuity of operations and enabled the Council to effectively engage with young people, provide policy advice and coordinate national youth initiatives. Following the relocation of the NYCF from the Ministry under the previous administration, this funding arrangement ceased.

Since then, the NYCF has operated with a very limited budget, which has proven insufficient to sustain even basic operational requirements. The reduction in the current financial years allocation has placed further strain on the Council's ability to deliver its statutory functions. The existing budget is nowhere near sufficient to employ the Secretariat staff required to support the Council's work.

The continued reliance on volunteers and unpaid young people to undertake essential functions is neither sustainable nor equitable. Young people who dedicate their time, expertise and leadership to advancing the interests of Fiji's youth deserve fair remuneration for their work. It is unreasonable rather to expect them to continue subsidizing the Council's operations from their own personal resources.

Accordingly, the NYCF recommends that Section 147 be amended to require the government to fund the NYCF Secretariat through their national budget. This would restore the previous funding arrangement, strengthen the institutional capacity of the Council and ensure that the government's principal consultative body on youth affairs is able to effectively fulfill its mandate in the interests of all young people in Fiji. This version is framed in a way that is suitable for a constitutional or legislative submission while clearly explaining the reasonable for proposed amendment.

Mr. Maharaj: Thank you Honourable Chairman and commissioners. My submission go on to talking about first of all on the reform of FICAC's Prosecutorial powers, my submission or the National Youth Council submission further elaborates that FICAC should not be having prosecutorial powers and it should be removed and it should act only as an investigative agency. Considering the immense budget that is allocated to FICAC, we believe that it is nowhere near performing the roles that it is supposed to be doing and the amount of prosecutions that should have taken place is not actually happening.

As such, we recommend that Section 115 be amended to remove FICAC's prosecutorial powers and limit its role to investigation, referral and anti-corruption enforcement support. Prosecutorial decisions should be transferred to the state-mandated prosecutors which is the Director of Public Prosecutions Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions. Further to the National Youth Council submission is the safeguards on emergency powers.

Emergency powers enshrined in the Constitution must be subject to strong constitutional safeguards. During states of emergency, the state may need special powers to protect public safety and we recognize that, however, those powers must not be used unnecessarily to restrict democratic rights or silence criticism or suppress peaceful assembly and weaken media freedom. Even during an emergency, any limitation on rights must be lawful, necessary, proportionate and subject to oversight.

We recommend that Chapter 9 should be amended to strengthen safeguards so that emergency powers cannot be abused. Freedom of expression, media freedom, peaceful assembly, right to health, right to food and security should not be restricted in a state of emergency. On to Chapter 10, the removal of the immunity provisions.

We recognize that there is a growing call for the removal of the immunity provision and the National Youth Council also recommends the removal of the immunity provisions enshrined within the Constitution. A modern constitutional democracy must balance stability with accountability and victims should not be permanently denied the right to be heard. Immunity provisions weaken public confidence in justice and prevent national healing.

True reconciliation requires truth, accountability and institutional trust and young people need to trust the justice system that even though those who have committed coups in the country, they also can be brought to justice. So a constitution should not permanently close the door on justice. So we recommend that Chapter 10 should be amended to remove immunity provisions and in its entirety and allow accountability through lawful, fair and independent processes.

Further to Chapter 11, the reform of the constitutional amendment process. The current amendment process should be reviewed. A constitution should not be easy to change recklessly.

However, stability is important, right? It should not become impossible to amend as is the current amendment clauses within the constitution. If the people demand democratic reform, the constitution must provide a realistic and lawful pathway for that amendment. So the amendment process should protect the constitution from political abuse while still allowing democratic improvement.

We recommend to create a balanced amendment process that protects constitutional stability while allowing genuine reform through public participation, parliamentary approval and democratic endorsement. This submission is further strengthened by the Supreme Court decision that was made very recently which read down the constitution allowing for more than 50 percent of referendum and we submit that that be written and enshrined in the constitution. And these submissions from the National Youth Council have come to an end and these are the submissions that we are making on from both affiliate bodies of the National Youth Council, the Provincial Youth Forum and the Youth Assemblies of Fiji coming together in front of you and collectively submitting these recommendations for the committees and for the commission's deliberations. Thank you sir.

Mr Valenitabua: Thank you very much Mr. Maharaj. Thank you ladies and gentlemen.

We have read your, we have heard your submissions, sorry. We've heard your submissions. 39 points have been raised and do you have any written copy, any hard copy which we can use or can we send soft copies?

Mr .Maharaj: We can send you a soft copy as we have been using soft copies, we are trying to move away from paper so.

Mr. Valenitabua: Saving the environment. Okay, just put your submissions together or is it in one document?

Mr .Maharaj: It's in one document.

Mr .Valenitabua: So send it to the commissioners or mine.

Send them to my private email. We'll give you my private email after this so that we can use them during our deliberations. Important points coming from the, from an important sector of our community from the youths looking to the future.

Thank you. Now I have time for the commissioners to pass comments or ask you questions for clarifications. I'll call on Dr. Gounder.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you Chair. Good morning members of the National Youth Council Forum. Thank you very much for your attendance this morning and for your submission.

We were really looking forward to the submission from the youth representatives because this constitution, if amended and adapted, will be for the future and the youth will be the custodian of this constitution in the future or the next generation will be the custodian of this constitution. So we value your submission this morning very much. I just have a few questions for clarification.

Shall I take that when you define youth, you are taking the UN definition of 16 to 24, are you expanding it to 35?

Mr. Maharaj: We are keeping the youth definition that is enshrined in the National Youth Policy of Fiji which is 15 to 35.

Dr. Gounder: 15 to 35, okay. Thank you.

That's clear. Second, did you make a budget submission this year for the national budget? You did get some money from the..

Mr. Maharaj: Yes, we did make a budget submission. However, for the past two, three years we've been repeatedly getting around 16,000 in the budget submission which we believe is nowhere near close to the expenses of the council.

And this year, in this year's budget, that 16,000 has been cut to 12 or 13,000.

Dr. Gounder: What did you ask for?

Mr. Maharaj: We did ask for, to my understanding, it was that the director and the secretary had asked for funding to have an office space within the Ministry of Youth and Sports as it was previously.

Dr .Gounder: Do you have an amount on top of your head now?

Mr .Maharaj: No, I do not at the moment.

Dr. Gounder: Okay. But because you are talking about amending section 147, so that's why my question is related to that particular point, just to understand the challenge that you are facing and whether that particular challenge could be addressed through budgetary processes, it could also be addressed through national development plan implementation strategies, which I'm very, very, very much aware of. So, I'm just trying to understand the angle you're coming from.

So, you don't have any idea how much did you ask for, but...

Mr. Maharaj: No, not at the moment, but if I remember in the last time that we had reached with the secretary, it was somewhere around the three-figure number, around 150,000, but we only received 16,000.

Dr .Gounder: But this budget has been reduced to 12,000?

Mr .Maharaj: Yeah, 12 or 13,000.

Dr. Gounder1: Okay.

Thank you. So, thank you for that. Can I, while we take all your points on board, can I also recommend that you liaise with Ministry of Youth and Sports, because the national development plan has some strategies in place to ensure funding for your organization.

So, if you pursue that strategy, it might be a worthwhile strategy as well in the meantime. But we take your point, but I'm happy to help you and your team afterwards. You can take my contact and I can help you in that regard. You have also talked about civic education, which we have received from other submitters as well.

So, that's all for today. Thank you.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you.

Very interesting submission from your group. Very impressed. A few things I would like to address.

One of the gentlemen sitting on your left-hand side, I didn't get your name. Yes.

Mr. Severo: Sorry, my name is Severo Biukula.

I am a public relations officer for Provincial Youth Forum Fiji. Thank you. I'm a member of NYC, National Youth Council.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you. I think one of the things you touched on, and I think it's very relevant, is constitutional education. You see, this is the supreme law of Fiji.

It impacts on everyone's life in one way or the other. And you'd be surprised from our consultations we have read how little people know about this, how little they know about it. You go down China, read book.

Go to US, Fourth Amendment, Fifth Amendment, First Amendment, by heart, my right. Now, if police comes to you and says, I want you to come to the police station, most of us just go away as if it's going for a holiday. You don't have to go.

So, your rights are here if only reason. I think it should be taught in all schools as a compulsory subject or as a subject that you can choose. But it's a very, very important point you brought, and I take heed of that.

The other thing is that some of the frustrations you have vented to us today should really be in the local, in the legislation. For example, your Fijian Affairs Act, that had the village courts, that had the established GCC, and then it was taken away. It's 2023, it's established again.

So, a lot of these can come under Fiji Affairs Act, which is now Itoke Affairs Act. It doesn't have to go in constitution. I know where you're coming from.

You're trying to erase this because I think those people should hear you out. Now, my last question to you is, did you make a representation to the education bill that was consultation? You did? I see one gentleman shaking head there. You did? Yeah, thank you, because some of those things could be addressed there.

Like, one of the things that you talked about was punishment. Punishment, which is in line with the proportionate to the discipline offence, but on the same token, not to be inflicting harm. So, they used to have a procedure before.

You exhaust all that, then you come to corporal punishment. It used to be in the prison too, but it's no longer there. So, there is something that should be addressed to them.

We can't put all this in the constitution, you know what I'm saying? So, thank you very much for your very helpful submission. Thank you. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, Mr. Conway.

Mr. Beg: Through you, Chair. Thank you.

I'll just make it very quick. Thank you very much. It's good to understand the minds of the youth in your presentation.

I mean, I support my colleagues down the road. I think your comment about youth participation in empowerment, in making, being involved in the matters of the state, in trying to be seen in parliament, I think those are very, very good suggestions that we, as commissioners, will take on. But thank you very much.

I appreciate that.

Mr. Valenitabua: Yeah, thank you very much for the submissions that you have made. I'll just go over three points.

The GCC, your submissions in relation to the GCC, very future-looking submission. We were thinking that, or we have heard people say that the GCC is our cake. Now, with our youths coming in and saying that we should recognize the GCC in the constitution, very bold and very important, I should say, submission.

There have been widespread recommendations that we have the GCC be recognized or be in the constitution itself, so that it can be the advisory and the paramount forum to which Itaukeis can look to. But believe you me, most of the other races look to the GCC too. And you, as young people, and I'm sure you represent a diverse racial portion of the population of the country, you are also speaking on behalf of the other races in relation to the recognition of the GCC.

Very, very well put to us this morning. Appointment of the president, that has also been submitted to us. Did you say that the GCC was to appoint the president of the country? All right.

That is in addition to the submissions we have heard from around the country. Section 28, ownership of Itaukei land, ownership of qoliqoli and the mineral resources. We've heard submissions in relation to that.

Very forward thinking also. Like I said, I'm sure you are speaking on behalf of the youths of the diverse communities that we have here in Fiji. And we are glad to hear that.

And lastly, the protection of language, culture, heritage, and all of that. We have been, in our term of reference, tasked to include customary laws in the constitution. So your submission this morning in relation to the protection of language, culture, heritage, and the other things that you mentioned would all come under customary laws.

We have explained in the first island we visited in the local group, what was it? Fulaga. Fulaga. We have explained in Fulaga and also in Kabara, because they do a lot of handicraft, that their handicrafts, which you have also mentioned today, would be protected under customary laws.

So that is where all your submissions, that is where your submission in relation to the protection of language, culture, heritage, handicrafts, and so forth, will fall under the customary laws. So thank you very much for your forward-looking submissions this morning. You are looking at your future, you're looking at the future generation of this country, and how those, well, these things can be developed to help the country during the time when you become adults and you run this country.

All right? Thank you very much. Is there any other comment? No. Well, members of the Youth Council of Fiji, National Youth Council of Fiji, do you have anything else you want to add?

Mr. Maharaj: No, Mr. Chairman, just to thank the Commission for allowing us the time to be present.

I have made submissions on behalf of FCOs before, but the National Youth Council had not. And being the chair of its governance committee, we thank you and the good work that you are doing. Yes, we understand the importance of forward thinking and a forward-looking constitution.

And we represent a diverse group of people, including those who are along the racial lines as well. And we believe that the inclusion of GCC is very important, because even those of diverse race are also part of and governed by the GCC as well. So, we believe that we, you know, young people need to start having a forward-looking perspective to things, instead of thinking that what has happened before, look forward.

So, thank you for allowing us the time. Naka.

Mr Valenitabua: Thank you very much.

We have a photo session. Usually, we usually have a photo session. Yes, Mr. Maharaj would know.

Thank you. You just come and stand behind us, please. You are still young and light, so you can come from there.

----------End of Session [8-7-2026] ----------

Itaukei Private Sector Executives (IPSE)

iTaukei Private Sector Executives
Date: 9-7-2026

Chair Mr Sevuloni: Thank you. I now call this consultation session to order. For your information gentlemen, this is a closed session.

We don't have any media reporters here. The lady who is with us this morning is our own Comms officer, so don't worry about the media. First of all, I welcome you all.

I was asked whether we could accommodate you yesterday. Fortunately, someone had dropped off from our schedule, so we were able to fit you in for 10 a.m. this morning. We welcome you to the CRC, or the Constitution Review Commission, and I note that Mr. Nabalarua, Mr. Dakuidreketi, and Mr. Waqabaca, you are here this morning.

Now, the Commission, as you know, is tasked with reviewing the 2013 Constitution. We have heard submissions from various ministries, from various associations, NGOs, even from schools, where students gave us their views in relation to what they think should be included in the review of the 2013 Constitution. Now, this morning, you will see five commissioners sitting before you.

They were initially seven. Now, this morning, we have five. A quick introduction.

On the right is Dr. John Fatiaki. I'm sure you all know him. And Mr. Conway Beg, I am Sevuloni Valenitabua, Mr Ami Kohli, and Dr Neelesh Gounder

I will not go through the process of introducing every minute thing. I believe that you know what you are here for, and what we are doing, and because of the time constraints that we have, I will now ask you to please make your submissions. I now hand over the mic and the floor to you, gentlemen.

Mr Nabalarua: Thank you, Chair and Commissioners of CRC, for giving us this rare opportunity to come and present to you this morning. I think the first thing is we would like to introduce ourselves. We are basically representing a group of Itaukei private sector executives.

We are putting together the submission that's before you. My name is Rokoseru Nabalarua. I am currently a group chief executive of Lyndhurst Group of Companies, employing about 1,000 people in Fiji, and also the Chairman of Fijian Holdings and EFL, and also in the board of BSP Bank.

I now hand over to our colleagues to introduce themselves before we go through what's before you.

Mr Dakuidreketi: Good morning, gentlemen. My name is Kenny Dakuidreketi.

I am just a property consultant. I do quite a lot of work with practically just about the big corporations here as a private consultant.

Mr Waqabaca: Good morning, Chair and Commissioners.

My name is Filimonu Waqabaca. I am currently the CEO of Fiji Development Bank, and also chairman of Investment Fiji. Thank you.

Mr Nabalarua: Again, as I've mentioned, we are representing a group of executives that are serving in the country in different capacities. They are the CEOs or chairmen of different private sector organizations. Unfortunately, because of their own commitment, they are not able to be with us today to come and present to you.

We, a group of Itaukei private sector executives, respectfully submit the two attached proposals for consideration by the Constitutional Review Commission. Both proposals arise from a shared experience of building and investing in Fiji, and from our conviction that a modern constitution must give this country the institutional architecture it needs to grow with discipline, transparency, and confidence beyond political cycles. The two submissions are complementary.

Together, they address two most persistent weaknesses in Fiji's development machinery. The absence of an independent, evidence-based framework for deciding which major infrastructure to build is on attachment one, and the absence of legislated guardrails around how much the state should borrow of what quality, and that's on attachment two. On attachment one, or submission one, an independent infrastructure council, a constitutionally recognized statute-backed body modelled on Australia's infrastructure Australia, that would produce and independently maintain a prioritized national infrastructure pipeline staffed by professionals appointed on merit, insulated from political interference, and reviewed every five years.

Submission two, constitutional and legislated physical rules, a growth-orientated framework, constitutional anchoring of one, a growth in debt quality principles, two, a maximum budget deficit ceiling, and three, a minimum capital expenditure floor, operationalized from a physical responsibility act and monitored by an independent physical authority. We wish to make one point clear at the outset. These are not proposals against borrowing or against ambition.

As business leaders, we borrow every day to build businesses, employ Fijians, and grow the economy. What we ask of the state is what we ask ourselves, that borrowing be disciplined, quality, targeted, and productive purposes, and honest about the returns it must generate. The proposal seeks to give Fiji the institutions and rules under which borrowing to build the nation's future is welcome and protected, and borrowing that merely funds today's recurring expenditure is disciplined and disclosed.

We are grateful for the Commissioner's work, for the opportunity to contribute. We are grateful to appear before you today to present this submission and to work with any official in refining and drafting of the proposal. We wish the Commission every success in the important task ahead and look forward to the report to the President by the 31st of August.

And we will attach the two submissions, and I guess in the interest of time, there's quite a bit of detail. We will be happy to answer any questions, and also if you decide that we work with any group to be able to refine what we are proposing, we'll be very happy to do so. Thank you.

Chair Mr Sevuloni: Thank you very much, Mr Nabalarua, for that oral submission.

Mr Nabalarua: And our apologies for one of the attachments that's a bit fine-printed. Printing it this morning, I realized that it was, but we can enlarge them. I'll let Dr Gounder, an economist, to start with the comments

Dr Gounder: Thank you, Mr Nambularu, and good morning, gentlemen. I think we know, all of us know each other well, and I recognize the expertise sitting right in front of us in the background.

Therefore, I respect the submission and the focus of the submission. In my view, all of this makes perfect sense, given the infrastructure challenges we are facing at the moment and the financing for infrastructure challenges that we are facing. I have previously also recommended to the government the Infrastructure Council, which is what you are proposing here as well, an independent Infrastructure Council which exists in Australia as well.

In line, I think I've also proposed an independent productivity commission as well, which will go hand-in-hand with this. So I think this is an important suggestion, given the challenge we are facing. The second point on the debt one is also an excellent submission this afternoon.

This is something that has been missing so far in the submissions, and I think this specific submission will be important to our discussions going forward. If there is anything we need to include in the constitution, we will see. Even if we cannot include anything directly in the constitution, we would be happy to pass some of the recommendations to the appropriate ministries and agencies, because there is only so much we can do in the constitution to deal with these challenges.

But we have received some aspects of broad submission around putting a debt cap or something around that. We need to sit and discuss as a commission first before we make any conclusion. We have not made any conclusion as of now, but both the strong points are well received, and I understand where the submissions are coming from.

So thank you very much for the submissions. Thank you, Chair.

Mr Kohli

Thank you very much indeed for your presentation. I must admit that some of the things have gone over my head. I will be very honest with you, it is not my area of expertise.

I am learning from Dr Gounder about this. But I do agree on a broad spectrum view that borrowing etc. should be monitored in such a way.

I think that is what you are trying to say, but how to legislate it in the constitution itself is something we have to look at. Because this is a very serious thing that you are raising. A lot of people are not aware of this.

The ratio of borrowing to GDP, how it relates and all that, we hear about it. What I can say is thank you very much indeed, and I will be guided by Dr Gounder.

Dr Fatiaki: Gentlemen, thank you for the submission, a novel one.

I must confess we have not received anything along these lines. But I think fundamentally it addresses issues that concern all of us in respect of how this country spends its money and whether there can be constitutional provisions for mechanisms to ensure being the supreme law that there are guidelines. And I am trying to, like Dr Gounder suggested, operationalize in my mind how you would put that into the constitution.

Obviously we have constitutional officers' commissions that appoint particular entities, and likewise for the public service. I presume this would be in the, I haven't had the chance to read the Australian equivalent, but I presume this would be basically a body that would be obviously staffed by individuals from the private sector, presumably, as well as maybe from government, that removes some of the decision-making in terms of assessing programs, particularly infrastructure programs where you're expending large amounts of the public purse at a small-scale level. I can tell you dealing with island development, the amount of failed infrastructure projects, and people just walk away from it as if, oh, it was one million, it doesn't mean anything.

And I think, well, who's going to be responsible for this? But it comes from government, and that happens on a regular basis. I mean, I'm reflecting in the context of my role as advisor to the Council of Rotuma, you know, if we had 15, 500,000-plus projects in Rotuma in the last 10 years, six of them are sitting as scrap, literally. You know, oftentimes the intention was good, the outlay of infrastructure was there, but obviously not thought through.

And my concern is there's no accountability for it. We just basically write it off, you know, 1.2 here, 500,000 there, 580,000 there, and you see them scattered around. That is of concern on an ongoing basis.

I didn't expect the proposal vote to come to the Constitutional Review Commission. But, you know, having said that, this is important enough for us to spend a lot of time figuring it out, you know. Yes, we're here to amend and review, but part of the amendment process means we can add.

So we can add things that are not in this current Constitution, and we just need, over the next two months, as we mull the submissions, to just maybe get advice as to how we might be able to incorporate something like this as a mechanism that will oversee, I won't say oversee the finance department, but essentially work hand in hand, would be the right word, with independent oversight that reigns in those situations where we don't want to follow, I don't want to use the word African third world countries, but we don't want to be in a situation of a debt trap where we find ourselves, we hand over to another few generations, you know, a debt that they can't manage. So I appreciate this. This is a novel submission.

We've not received anything like this. It requires you to think about it, but just off the bat, you know, I'm not an expert in this particular field, unless you're a great fan of that, but having said that, I can see the role it could play. I think it's an important one.

I hear all the time, read articles about the FNPF fund, for instance, and how that disappears, and, you know, the concerns about how indebted, for instance, the FNPF is getting in terms of the pensioners' money. But then at a government level, we need that, and I compliment you gentlemen and the iTaukei business people who put this together, because this is timely, and I have no doubt my colleague will be able to figure out ways that we might be able to address this at a constitutional level. Thank you.

Mr Beg: Through you, Chair, thank you very much for the very short but sharp and to the heart kind of presentation. I mean, I must admit it's a subject area beyond my comprehension, but, you know, in my tools that I deal with in development, I suppose the question that I probably would ask is, you know, public borrowing is a legitimate tool for our existence, you know, and maybe our fellow commissioner down there can probably correct me on this, but in your suggestion, you're recommending a Fiscal Responsibility Act, you know, and an Infrastructure Council Act. So, again, this is an operational versus constitutional.

I'm trying to get my mind around it, and, you know, you've left us with some indebt, if you like, but, yeah, I do take the commissioner's views as well as borrowing and debt and that ratio of that, but as a person that's involved in infrastructure work in development, I can see some of the live experiences, and maybe perhaps could I ask the question if you could share any live experiences or something that you may want to share that can help me comprehend my understanding. Is that okay for you, Chair?

Mr Nabalarua: Thank you, Mr. Conway, Mr. Chairman. We will be very happy to work with whoever to look at, because we've already had a look at how the Australian set up, and even the Singapore in a very similar way, and we'll be very happy to look at their constitution and see how what we are proposing is ingrained into their constitution.

Being the supreme law of the land, and the importance of the two subjects that we are covering, if you look at those countries on how they develop their infrastructure and keeping, you know, their debt level at a point, and how they push through with developing the economy to grow, and I guess I'll give it to our colleagues, probably our former Secretary of Finance, to be able to elaborate more.

Mr Waqabaca: Thank you, Chairman, through you, and thank you, Commissioner, for that question. I suppose the starting point here would be some of the elements that are captured in the constitution are not being able to be enforced or implemented on the ground.

So therefore we need legislation to back it up so that it has teeth and will have traction, and that is why we are suggesting those two legislations to back up the two areas that are being submitted to the Commissioner, and we've identified in the attachments the countries that have these in their constitution, and also the legislation that is designed to ensure that these are being enforced, because the benefits that accrues to the people are bound to be realised if there is supporting legislation. And we could mention it in the constitution, but if there is no enforcing agency, it will not deliver the results we want. And as Dr Neelesh rightfully mentioned, these subjects have been discussed before, and I think maybe this is the right time to bring it and reflect it in our constitution, just to enforce discipline and continuity.

What we see, governments come, governments go, they bring their own infrastructure plans, and when someone comes in they change that plan even though it may be a good one, but it's the people who are paying for those infrastructures. So what we're asking for here is to ensure continuity, everyone agrees to an infrastructure development plan for the country, and whichever government comes into place must ensure that there is continuity, they continue with that. And we're also raising the issue about debt, we are saying here that we should not be afraid of debt.

I'm sure most of us borrow to buy a house, to run a business, as long as that debt is directed towards productive outcomes, and in this case capital, we are suggesting more capital budget rather than operating a ratio, we're saying a floor, maybe a 70-30 balance rather than a 90 operating 10 infrastructure. So this is just to guide whichever government comes into place, ensure one, continuity, proper management of funds, and maybe see growth be the outcome. Because when growth happens, our debt, whatever level it is, it is just a ratio.

When growth happens, the ratio just falls. So it's either we cut debt, but if we cut debt, development may not happen. So why don't we go for growth? So any debt we borrow, direct it to growing sectors, growing industries, and then when growth comes about, debt will automatically fall.

Mr Nabalarua: Yeah, Mr. Chair, and probably if I can just add to that, I think the biggest benefit too of having this in the independence in multiple years, it will enable private sector to participate in this development. And one of the issues that a lot of private sector finds in trying to develop infrastructures in countries like Fiji is the lack of very clear roadmap and a system that's set up that's very independent and very robust.

And what you can see that, for example, in terms of building major roads infrastructure or power infrastructure, this type of setup will enable private sector overseas to come and invest in Fiji. Because they will just come and pick up the plans, or even businesses to set up anywhere in time, they will look at these plans and say, okay, we better start developing in this place, because this infrastructure will come there by this time. So it gives very clear uncertainty to private sector.

Mr Dakuidreketi: Yeah, gentlemen, if I just may add a little bit to that. Not only private sectors, but it's also the development partners. If they see a credible body populated by credible individuals who are known in the industry or known regionally, we're not suggesting here that this commission of members of this body will be just locals.

We can draw expertise from offshore given the experiences they have had, particularly engineering. We will be pretty short on the availability onshore, so we can actually go wider, the diaspora, bring them in. The point that is emphasized here is that this has to be captured in the constitution.

It's understood that there will be an act that follows, that there will be an enabling act. If you don't have it in the constitution, anybody can change that act later, we don't want that, we'll throw it away, and you know how politicized our systems are and have been. And that is one of the things we are trying to avoid here, by capturing it in the constitution and having an enabling act underneath that, that actually gives emphasis to what we are trying to propose here.

Infrastructure is a big set pacer for the economy, and if we have an architecture that everyone can follow, so if a government comes, changes next year, we'll set it down and everybody knows where it is, and to Mr Nabalarua's point, people looking from outside trying to invest, they see where we are wanting to go. It's easier for them to figure out how they will enter, and where do they enter, at which point do they come in. And as I said, again, the development partners, World Bank, EU, and all those institutions will seek credibility in a system that we are all following that is apolitical.

Thank you.

Mr Beg: Thank you very much for that explanation. I suspect that what you're saying, you're quite right in that you're wanting to consider the constitutional framework that empowers the legislation.

Thank you, I appreciate it.

Dr Gounder: Thank you, Mr. Kenny, for that last point. I think that really hits the point.

Although we have a national infrastructure plan, which currently sits with the Ministry of Infrastructure, and my point about this initially was that the politicization of the infrastructure plans, I think your last point is really important, that we can move it away from the political processes, and an independent council could look after, could be the custodian of the infrastructure plan. I think that will sit well, better than the current system we have. We have also received a very strong submission from the Ministry of Strategic Planning regarding the continuity of policies and plans, so governments may change, as Mr. Waqabaca has highlighted.

So we can, that sits very well with the proposal that you have made today. I think that's something we can look at. I just have one more question, and I think this is also for the information of the Commission as well.

We have received a number of submissions regarding this debt issue, and I don't have to remind the Commission the expertise of Mr. Waqabaca, for example. He has spent almost his entire life in finance, etc., and I've always learned from Mr. Waqabaca. So if you look at the Financial Management Act, Section 59 to 64, for example, which I'm sure you're very familiar with, it talks about the debt management operations, etc., all of those things, and the frameworks.

So just to get some idea from an expert like you, do you think it's worthwhile to put the 70-30 requirement in the Act, or can we do it in the Constitution, which would be a better option? Given your experience as the Permanent Secretary and the Reserve Bank, you think?

Mr Waqabaca: Thank you, Dr Gounder. From my personal feeling, it would be better we reflect it on the Constitution. As you would have noted from our submissions there are also escape clauses here what causes to deviate from those plans like economic slowdown, natural disaster, external shocks. Those would be reasonable reasons to change the course of action. But at least if we start with a firm number of 70-30, which we have done before, as you may have known, we reduced it from 90-10 to 70-30, and there was more focus on capital projects. So since we have done it before, that can be the basis for us to set our target and reflect it in the Constitution.

But with those escape clauses clearly highlighted, that may cause deviations.

Dr Gounder: Thank you. That's very useful, I think.

Mr Beg: Thank you. I just have one more. If this Council is formed, how much protection would it have from being politicised? Because, I guess, the influence.

Mr Dakuidreketi: Well, I think our submission is suggesting that the Commission is formed. There's a membership there.
There shall be an independent body to be known as the Fiji Infrastructure Council, which shall provide independent evidence-based advice on the nation's infrastructure needs and priorities, publish a national infrastructure priority list informed by a national infrastructure audit, conducted at least every five years, and whose members shall be appointed on the basis of merit, professional expertise and integrity, through a publicly advertised process with bipartisan parliamentary endorsement.

That's the idea. It's composition, reinforcement, funding by direct appropriation or whatever, independence and a five-yearly independent review of its mandate shall be prescribed by an expert parliament. Thank you.

Mr Beg: I mean, all the submissions are great. I was just trying to look at the word political capture. No influence is totally independent in that sense.

Mr Dakuidreketi: So, that's why I'm saying, if those members of that committee is agreed to by a bipartisan committee of parliament that's established for five years, so they basically, it's a body appointed by...

Mr Beg: I guess there's existing legislation and so on, but it allows the group no hindrance, you know, so we're not ...in that sense.

Mr Dakuidreketi: So, your World Bank will deal with that body, you know, and they will be talking about it. So, finance executes it, municipal infrastructure executes it, but there is actually a body that guards these things and makes sure that this is implemented according to their plans.

Mr Waqabaca: Chair, I think another guard would be the members of the public, because once we set this infrastructure plan and everyone is made aware of, and if there is a government that comes into place and tries to distort this plan, they will have to answer to the people, because the people would have seen the benefits through the years. So, I guess that will be another guard against any political influence and interference.

Dr Gounder: So, about the people as well, having the right people.

I think if you have the right people, they will themselves guard against any political, because they want to do a good job. They want to do something out there. My experience has been that, you know, if you have strong people as members, they will ensure that they remain focused on the job.

Mr Beg: I appreciate that. Thank you very much. Very compelling presentation.

Chair Mr Sevuloni: Thank you. Mr. Nabalarua Mr. Dakuidreketi, and Mr. Waqabaca, thank you very much for your submissions. You will note that we have an expert here also, in Dr. Neelesh Gounder.

We've got businessmen who are running their own businesses. So, your submission this morning will be well discussed by the Commission. Like Mr. Kohli, we are lawyers.

We usually take instructions only. So, we will be guided by Dr. Neelesh Gounder and my other two colleagues. It's a new, it's a novel submission, a new introduction to the provisions of the Constitution.

So, we will really look at it, because it deals with the economy, I think. With those few words, I thank you very much. This morning, we will surely, we will surely deliberate on this.

Mr Nabalarua: Vinaka again, Mr. Chairman and Commissioners, thank you very much for this very rare opportunity for us to be able to participate in this submission. We would like to also assure you, should you need some assistance, we will put together the resource that we have to help you out, in terms of framing whatever that you need, and will be available.

Chair Mr Sevuloni: Thank you. We will surely come back to you for advice. By the way, Mr Waqabaca, are you with FDB now? You're just across the road, eh? You will see us.

A SUBMISSION FROM ITAUKEI PRIVATE SECTOR EXECUTIVES

ADDRESSED TO The Chair and Commissioners
Fiji Constitution Review Commission
Suva, Fiji

9 July 2026

SUBMISSIONS TO THE CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMISSION — TWO PROPOSALS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

Chair and Honourable Commissioners,

We, a group of iTaukei private sector executives, respectfully submit the two attached proposals for the consideration of the Constitution Review Commission. Both proposals arise from our shared experience of building and investing in Fiji, and from our conviction that a modern Constitution must give this country the institutional architecture it needs to grow with discipline, transparency and confidence — beyond the political cycle.

The two submissions are complementary. Together they address the two most persistent weaknesses in Fiji's development machinery — the absence of an independent, evidence-based framework for deciding which major infrastructure to build (Submission 1), and the absence of legislated guardrails around how much the State should borrow and of what quality (Submission 2).

- Submission 1 — An Independent Fiji Infrastructure Council. A constitutionally recognised, statute-backed body (modelled on Australia's Infrastructure Australia) that would produce and independently maintain a prioritised National Infrastructure Pipeline, staffed by professionals appointed on merit, insulated from political interference, and reviewed every five years.
- Submission 2 — Constitutional and Legislated Fiscal Rules: A Growth-Oriented Framework. Constitutional anchoring of (i) a growth & debt-quality principle, (ii) a maximum budget deficit ceiling, and (iii) a minimum capital expenditure floor, operationalised through a Fiji Fiscal Responsibility Act and monitored by an independent fiscal authority.

We wish to make one point clear at the outset. These are not proposals against borrowing or against ambition. As business leaders we borrow every day to build businesses, employ Fijians, and grow the economy. What we ask of the State is what we ask of ourselves: that borrowing be disciplined in quantity, targeted at productive purposes, and honest about the returns it must generate. The proposals seek to give Fiji the institutions and rules under which borrowing to build the nation's future is welcomed and protected — and borrowing that merely funds today's recurrent expenditure is disciplined and disclosed.

We are grateful for the Commission's work and for the opportunity to contribute. We are grateful to appear before you today to present this submission and to work with any officials in refining the drafting of the proposals. We wish the Commission every success in its important task, and look forward to the report to the President by 31 August 2026.

Yours faithfully,

On Behalf of Selected iTaukei Private Sector Executives

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Establishing an Independent Fiji Infrastructure Council

A Submission to the Fiji Constitution Review Commission

Submitted by: Ekitikiti Tavke Private Sector Enterprises | Date: 8 May 2026 | Category: Institutional Reform

1. THE PROPOSAL

Establish an independent Fiji Infrastructure Council (FIC), recognised in the Constitution and enacted under its own Act of Parliament, to conduct evidence-based assessment of national infrastructure needs and publish a rolling, prioritised National Infrastructure Pipeline — independently reviewed every five years and staffed by professionals appointed on merit. The model is drawn from Infrastructure Australia, established under the Infrastructure Australia Act 2008.

2. THE PROBLEM

- No continuity. Each new government produces a new National Development Plan; multi-year projects stall, are re-scoped, or are dropped.
- Low lender confidence. ADB, World Bank and other development partners lack visibility of a stable, government-endorsed national pipeline.
- No basis for private-sector planning. Investors, contractors and PPP proponents cannot plan around shifting political priorities.
- Politicised, non-expert project selection. Decisions are driven by the political cycle rather than economic, engineering and climate-resilience merit.

3. KEY DESIGN FEATURES

Feature	Design
Legal status	Independent statutory body; constitutionally recognised
Core function	National infrastructure audit + prioritised national pipeline
Evidence base	Cost–benefit and climate-resilience driven; data-led assessment
Governance	Commissioners appointed on merit via public advertisement
Funding	Ring-fenced from two sources: direct appropriation from the Consolidated Fund and development-partner grants (ADB, World Bank, DFAT, MFAT, JICA, EU) under transparent arrangements
Review	Independent review every 5 years, tabled in Parliament
Outputs	Annual Priority List + 5-yearly National Infrastructure Audit

4. INDEPENDENCE & MERIT-BASED APPOINTMENTS

- Multi-disciplinary panel (5–7 Commissioners): engineering, infrastructure economics, finance, climate resilience, public administration, private-sector delivery.
- Publicly advertised, merit-based recruitment assessed by an independent selection panel — retired Judge (Chair), Auditor-General, Fiji Institution of Engineers, private-sector chamber, academia / civil society.
- Bipartisan endorsement by a parliamentary committee (Government and Opposition) before formal appointment by the President.
- Five-year staggered terms; one permitted reappointment.
- Removal only by Parliament on the recommendation of an independent tribunal, on specified grounds — mirroring the protections afforded to judges.
- Conflict-of-interest rules and a post-employment cooling-off period for former Commissioners.
- Ministerial direction limited to general matters only; any direction must be in writing and tabled in Parliament.

5. OPERATIONAL STRUCTURE — HOW THE COUNCIL RUNS

The Commissioners are the accountable authority; the day-to-day work is done by a small professional secretariat led by a Chief Executive Officer. This mirrors Infrastructure Australia, which runs ~30–40 staff across five functional teams under a CEO appointed by (and answerable to) the Commissioners.

TIER 1 — COMMISSIONERS (5–7)
Set direction, sign off Priority List, accountable to Parliament. Chief Commissioner full-time; others part-time.

TIER 2 — CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER
Appointed by the Commissioners (not the Minister) on a 5-year performance contract. Runs the office; reports to Commissioners.

Tier 3 — Professional Secretariat Team	Staff	Disciplines & role
Project Assessment & Advisory	6–8	Infrastructure economists, civil / transport engineers, cost–benefit specialists — appraise proposals against a published Assessment Framework.
Planning, Research & Climate	4–6	Sector planners, climate-resilience analysts, GIS analysts — deliver the 5-yearly National Infrastructure Audit and sector deep-dives.
Data, Digital & Publications	2–3	Data scientists, developers, communications — maintain the pipeline data platform and publish outputs.
Corporate Services	3–4	Finance, HR, procurement, legal, board secretariat — keep the agency compliant and well-run.

Advisory Panel: ~10–12 industry, academic and diaspora experts (Fiji Institution of Engineers, USP, private-sector chambers, Pacific diaspora, ADB / World Bank alumni). Staffing & funding: open merit recruitment (local + Pacific diaspora + international); secondments from ADB, World Bank, Infrastructure Australia and NZ Infrastructure Commission; competitive ring-fenced pay bands funded from a combination of direct appropriation and donor grants. Development partners actively welcome funding independent bodies like this — it is recognised as a good-governance feature and makes their own appraisal work easier and faster.

6. WHY CONSTITUTIONAL ANCHORING

- Continuity — no incoming government can dissolve the Council or shelve the pipeline.
- Credibility — lenders and investors gain confidence in a durable, protected pipeline.
- Insulation — appointments, funding and outputs are protected from political interference.

7. BENEFITS BY STAKEHOLDER

Stakeholder	Benefit

Government	Credible costed pipeline aligned to medium-term budget; stable forward work programme
Parliament	Independent annual priority report strengthens oversight of capital expenditure
Development partners (ADB, World Bank, EU, JICA, etc.)	Single transparent pipeline; faster disbursement; reduced duplication; a good-governance body worth co-funding through grants
Private sector	Plan investments, bids and PPPs years in advance from a published list; lower risk premiums
Citizens	Merit-based prioritisation; scarce funds directed to highest social, economic and climate-resilience return

8. SUGGESTED CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION

DRAFTING OUTLINE

"There shall be an independent body to be known as the Fiji Infrastructure Council, which shall provide independent, evidence-based advice on the nation's infrastructure needs and priorities, publish a National Infrastructure Priority List informed by a National Infrastructure Audit conducted at least every five years, and whose members shall be appointed on the basis of merit, professional expertise and integrity through a publicly advertised process, with bipartisan parliamentary endorsement. Its composition, ring-fenced funding (by direct appropriation and development-partner grants), independence, and a five-yearly independent review of its mandate shall be prescribed by an Act of Parliament."

9. RECOMMENDATION

TO THE COMMISSION

The Commission is respectfully urged to recommend the constitutional establishment of the Fiji Infrastructure Council — a durable, professional, evidence-based institution to safeguard Fiji's infrastructure future across political cycles, continuity for government, confidence for lenders, clarity for investors, and value for every Fijian.

FISCAL RULES · EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Submission to the Fiji Constitution Review Commission

Constitutional and Legislated Fiscal Rules — A Growth-Oriented Framework

Submitted by: Selected iTaukei Private Sector Executives · Date: 8 July 2026 · Category: Public Finance & Fiscal Governance Reform

1. The Core Proposition

CORE PROPOSITION This is not an anti-debt submission. It is a pro-growth, pro-investment framework. We propose that Fiji's new Constitution anchor three integrated pillars: (i) a growth & debt-quality principle, (ii) a maximum budget deficit ceiling, and (iii) a minimum capital expenditure floor — all operationalised through a Fiji Fiscal Responsibility Act and monitored by an independent fiscal authority.

2. The Problem

- The 2026–27 Budget records a deficit of –7.0% of GDP ($1,045.5m) — more than the abandoned medium-term target of 4.8%.
- Debt projected to reach 84.8% of GDP by July 2027, rising to 88.3% by FY2028–29.
- Debt servicing (~FJD 600m/yr) already consumes ~70% of the entire capital budget.
- Fiji's OPEX:CAPEX mix stands at approximately 82:18 against the Government's own 70:30 target — recurrent spending is crowding out productive investment.

Source: Ministry of Finance, 2026–2027 Budget Supplement.

3. Debt Is a Tool, Not a Sin

WHY THIS FRAMEWORK IS PRO-GROWTH Debt-to-GDP is a ratio: growing the economy reduces it just as effectively as cutting the numerator. What matters most is the Blanchard condition — that the growth rate of the economy (g) exceeds the real interest rate on debt (r). Fiji is currently failing on both sides of this equation: growth is 1.5%, borrowing costs consume the capex budget, and debt is funding recurrent expenditure. Our proposals fix both sides — the deficit ceiling protects r, and the capex floor protects g.

The framework we advance is grounded in well-established international precedents — the EU's Maastricht deficit rule, India's FRBM Act, Brazil's Lei de Responsabilidade Fiscal, Switzerland's constitutional debt brake, and Kenya's constitutional 30% capex principle. Each demonstrates that durable, credible fiscal rules are achievable across jurisdictions of vastly different sizes and stages of development. Constitutional anchoring, operationalised through legislation and monitored independently, is the mechanism by which small open economies have converted policy intent into a credible commitment — the very foundation on which sovereign risk premiums fall, private capital is crowded in, and intergenerational equity is protected.

4. The Three Pillars

Pillar	What it does	Precedent
Growth & Debt-Quality Principle	Borrow to invest, not to consume; keep $r < g$	Blanchard (2019); UK / Germany "golden rule"
Deficit Ceiling (~3.0–4% of GDP)	Discipline in normal times; escape clauses for genuine crises	EU Maastricht 3%, India FRBM, Brazil LRF, Swiss debt brake
Capex Floor (~30% of expenditure)	Ring-fences productive investment against recurrent pressures	Kenya Article 201 / PFM Act; Golden Rule

5. Escape Clauses

The framework explicitly provides rather than removes crisis flexibility. Escape clauses may be activated only for declared natural disasters, public health emergencies, severe economic downturns or major external shocks — with parliamentary approval, published return-to-target plans, and independent monitoring. This mirrors the architecture used by Panama and Paraguay and recommended by the IMF as best practice.

6. Independent Fiscal Council

- Verifies annual compliance with both rules.
- Assesses the validity of any escape-clause invocation and its return-to-target plan.
- Reports tabled in Parliament; appointed on strong independence standards, or empowered from within the Office of the Auditor-General.

7. The Position of the Signatories

SIGNATORIES' POSITION As business leaders we are unafraid of debt. We take on debt every day to build businesses, employ Fijians and grow the economy. What we ask of the State is what every well-run business demands of itself: borrowing that is disciplined in quantity, targeted at productive purposes, and honest about the returns it must generate.

8. Suggested Constitutional Anchor

INDICATIVE DRAFTING
Public borrowing is a legitimate instrument of national development. Parliament shall enact a Fiscal Responsibility Act prescribing (a) a maximum annual fiscal deficit as % of GDP; (b) a minimum share of total expenditure on capital and development, over a rolling multi-year period; (c) a medium-term debt anchor; (d) the manner of compliance reporting and independent verification. Escape clauses apply only for declared disasters, emergencies, downturns or shocks.

CLOSING RECOMMENDATION We respectfully urge the Commission to recommend the constitutional anchoring of the three-pillar framework. Anchored in this way, borrowing to build Fiji's future becomes a mark of ambition, not a cause for alarm.

Yavusa, Naseuvou, Nasaqalau Village, Lakeba, Lau

Yavusa Nasaqalau,Lakeba
Date: 9-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: I note that you are appearing with the members from the village of Nasaqalau in Lakeba, Lau together with the members of the mataqali, heads of mataqali I believe are also here. Thank you. Thank you. We welcome you. Welcome to the Constitution Review Commission. The Constitution Review Commission is given the job of reviewing the 2013 Constitution. When I say review, it means that we can change the laws inside the Constitution. It does not mean that we bring in a new one. We are not removing the 2013 Constitution and then drawing up or writing up a new one. No, that is not what we are doing. What we are doing is we change the laws inside here. Some will be taken out, some will be added again, new ones, and we can also change the wordings or the words inside the Constitution so that it means something else.

I'm sure you understand that. So that is what our job is. There are five of us commissioners here this afternoon. If I can introduce them, on the left is Dr. Nilesh Gounder. With a doctor in front of his name, it does not mean that he is a medical doctor. He is a PhD holder, Doctor ni vuku. Next to him here is Mr. Ami Kohli, a lawyer from Labasa. I am also a lawyer. And on my right here is Mr. Conway Bag, an architect. And on the other side is Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau. These are your five commissioners this morning. This afternoon, I'm sure. We are here to listen to the submissions that you have prepared. We have been given the written submissions and I believe that Mr. Tuiloma would address us in the summary of what this submission is. So, we are here to listen. We now give you the mic and the floor. Please tell us what you want to tell us.

Mr. Tuiloma : Very good afternoon to you, Mr. Chairman and honorable members of the commission. We know that you have had a long day, but somehow you still have reservations of energy to listen to us. And we thank you for that. I would just like to introduce the members of the Yavusa of Naseuvou from Nasaqalau very briefly.

Beside me on the right is the Turaga na Tui Nasaqalau, Roko Tomasi Tikomaimalea and with him are the mataqali, some of the mataqali leaders or chiefs, as well as some of the members of the Nasaqalau families who are able to be with us this afternoon. I won't be able to mention their names because of your time.

I know you are stressed with time as well. You need some rest at this stage. Actually, what we have tried to elaborate in our submission. The first point that we would like to request the commission, if we could be excused, if we are trying to tell you something which you already heard over days. I would just like to say that we would like to join those that have already stated that we earlier submitted to the CRC to hold the upcoming general election under a new constitution and not under the 2013 constitution.

And with that comes the request that we would, the Yavusa of Nasaqalau, would like to see that the election that has to be conducted must be done through representative, that they know, rather than the system that we are now under. And to facilitate that request, the Yavusa is requesting if there could be a transition period created within the law for an interim government made up of present MPs run and concerned into a new constitutional system for at least 18 months. Before a general election is called.

We know the only outstanding matter there would be a referendum as well as the passing of bills to ensure that the constitution, when promulgated, will be in effect. Apart from that, the Yavusa would also like to see that the rights and freedoms under the constitution must all be revised and appropriately placed and worded properly as we will refer to them in our later submission. And also the voting age or majority age to be put back to 21 instead of years. The Yavusa also prefer a bicameral legislature and not a unicameral.

And if you could adopt the usual 1970, 1990 and 1997 system on that. In addition, the Yavusa would like to introduce a new clause into the constitution especially with members of the parliament. The people at all times, it's the power of recall.

If they do petition parliament with one-fifth of the population, if they do petition parliament and the parliament will have to ensure that the members is recalled and another election be held. The public feels that they need to have their members replaced. So the power still remains with them.

And in that way perhaps our legislatures will have to work pretty hard in order to maintain their seats because they are being watched from outside as well. The rights of indigenous Fijians to self-determination must also be a stand-alone right under the Bill of Rights in the constitution. Under the citizenship provisions, Fijian children born outside Fiji who are registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula must have the right to enter and leave Fiji.

And we have also made the suggestions as to the word Fijian should only be reserved for the Fijian race. Only iTaukei reference to Fijians are to be reverted to Fijian. All iTaukei reference to Fijians under the constitution must be reverted back to Fijian.

And we have also come up with the meaning of the word Rotuman and Fijian and Indo-Fijian. Those are the names that should be adopted in the constitution itself. And we will try to put the definition of those names in there.

And I know we would like to take more time. You will definitely have time to read them through. But a person shall be regarded as a Fijian if and shall not be regarded unless his father and any of his earlier male progenitors in the male line is or was the child of parents, both of whom are or were indigenous inhabitants of Fiji.

These are the definitions under the 1970 as well as the later constitution, the 1990 as well as the 1997 constitution. It revolves around that, along those lines as well. A person shall be regarded as a Rotuman.

I would like to dwell into that because I don't know much about the Rotuman culture. Perhaps they look at the definition that we've tried to put up and for them to, whether they agree or not with that. And so is the Indo-Fijians as well.

Section 96 of the current constitution, if that could remain as is, it talks about the qualifications of the position of Attorney General. It's quite a high bar and for those that have to be appointed to that position have to hold very much to those requirements. And also the other experience that we've had that we would like to submit to the commission, if the Solicitor General can also, when there is a vacancy over time, if the Solicitor General can also be eligible to be the person to act on that position.

Next is the Deed of Session, which recognizes that Fijian land, seas and resources belongs to Fijians and Rotuman's, but some persons of which have either been alienated, retained or inappropriately sold and for their rightful ownership and valuation determinations, a Deed of Session tribunal must be formed to decide on the validity, value and other matters regarding such claims, including validation of claims to title land, marine and fisheries ownership claims under the Native Land and Fisheries Commission by Fijians. Next is the GCC must be the body to appoint the President. Apart from that, we would like to request through you to the relevant departments that must ensure that the amendment to the current mineral royalty distribution policy, where only 5% of the returns are given as royalty to government, and 80-90% of that 5% is given to landowners.

The government retains the rest of that 5%, the mineral leaseholders retain 95% of the return. That review is long overdue and through you we would like to state if that message could also be channeled across to the appropriate department. If the current state service or the public service system under Chapter 6 could be repealed and be replaced with the 1970, 1990 and 1997 systems of apolitical public service systems.

The chapter on executive, if that could be repealed and the current be repealed and revert to the 1970, 1990 and 1997 constitutional framework. Amendments to the constitution under Chapter 11, if the constitution could be reviewed every 7 years and any amendments to the constitution must await that period. After public consultation, the amendment process should follow a simple majority for provisions that have little impact on Fijian lands, resources and their customs and traditions. We have also come up with a preamble. We feel that this preamble is much more, if the current preamble be replaced with this one. We feel that the constitution is for the people and the people should be highlighted at all times from the beginning till the end.

We feel that they would like to move with rather than for them to be highlighted at all times. And for that purpose, the preamble that the Yavusa is requesting could be considered. We the people of the Republic of Fiji acknowledge the blessings of our God to the people, their land, seas and airways.

Acknowledge that our lands, its vast ocean resources have been a cherished ancestral home for generations of the Fijian people. Recognizing the enduring connection between the Fijian people and this land, we celebrate and share their values of respect and referential fear of God, honoring elders, ancestors and chiefs, nurturing a strong sense of community and fostering a harmonious relationship with our natural world, ownership of land, sea and resources including genetic resources and traditional knowledge, traditional cultural expressions to their unique culture, customs, tradition, language and intellectual property. Acknowledge that the deed of cession recognizes that Fijian lands, seas and resources belong to the Fijians or Rotuman's, but some portions of which had either been alienated, retained or inappropriately sold.

And for appropriate ownership and valuation determination, a deed of cession tribunal shall be formed to decide on the validity, value and other matters of such claims, including validations of claims to titles and land and fishery ownerships under the Native Land and Fisheries Commission by Fijians. We further acknowledge the unique history and heritage of Rotuma, a people with their own distinct culture and traditions, recognizing that Rotuma entered into a separate deed of cession. We affirm Rotuma's distinct identity and rights, emphasizing the need to ongoing dialogue to clarify and strengthen Rotuma's relationship with Fiji.

We affirm the importance of preserving Rotuman culture while embracing our shared identity as Fijians and Rotuman's, ensuring that their voice and perspectives are integral to the future of our nation. Recognizing that Fiji has become a vibrant tapestry woven from diverse backgrounds and experiences, we celebrate the contributions of all who have made this land their home. We commit ourselves to building a nation where the rights and dignity of every individual are held, respecting the foundational role of Fijian traditions and customs while embracing the diversity that defines Fiji today.

We aspire to a future built on mutual respect, understanding and shared prosperity, ensuring that our nation continues to evolve in a way that honors the past while embracing the opportunities of tomorrow. Recognizing that the descendants of those who chose to make their homes in these islands form our multiracial and multicultural society, affirming the contributions of all communities to the well-being of our society and the rich variety of their faiths, traditions, languages and cultures. Committing ourselves anew to living in harmony and unity, promoting the integration of all races and the economic and social advancement of all communities, respecting their rights, interests and strengthening our institutions of government.

Reaffirming our recognition of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all races and groups, safeguarded by adherence to the rule of law and our respect for human dignity and the importance of the family. With God as our witness, give ourselves this constitution. Chapter 1, we want to submit if the current chapter 1 could be repealed and the current provision as it repeats what's stated in all other provisions about democracy and its values.

Equal citizenry is a philosophical concept that should never be forced as it attempts to eliminate especially the Fijian race, ethnicity and their values. It had to be replaced with Section 1, the state, and we submit if the Republic of Fiji with bracket Viti or Viji is a sovereign democratic state. The reason why we have tried to put Viti or Viji as brackets, we feel that we should not only be proud of the English name that we have.

We should also be proud of the real Fijian words that actually go behind that English translation of Fiji, which is Viti or Viji. Section 2, and for that section the constitution is the Supreme Law of Fiji and if any other law is inconsistent with the constitution, that other law shall to the extent of the inconsistency be void. Section 3, it's a suggestion that we are making especially that goes along with our proposal for a new section 3 and for the current section 3 to be shifted to section 4 of the constitution. And the new section 3 is for the election notwithstanding the provision of section 58 and 59 of the 218 constitution which is the reach and the election proclamation by the president. The referendum and same provisions of the act 2026 which is still, it's something that we just tried to put there for the purpose of continuity in the proposal that we are making. The reach of the first general election of members of the House of Representatives shall be issued within the period of 18 months from the date of coming into force of this constitution.

This is a direct leaf out from the 1990 constitution during the transition of the military coup to the constitution. The law that were actually used under the military coup system into the new constitution. Section 4 interpretation, change the wordings of section 3 interpretation provision the current section 4 be deleted which is the secular state.

As we have already stated in the preamble of the suggested constitution that we have outlined, the state should be left at that rather than for the constitution to stipulate that it's a secular state. It was a state that was founded under the values of Christianity and should remain as such and we are also making that suggestion as we move along to the relevant provisions. The interpretation sections, section 3 or the section 4 of the constitution, we have already outlined that and we would like to highlight the B2, the development in the promotion of particular human rights that is balanced with the Fijian traditional society.

This is a point which the USA would like to always highlight that the human rights provisions that are now being ratified by the nation that has to be balanced with the Fijian traditional society values as well. And especially the last point, the government shall codify the traditional and cultural laws of the Fijian people to be part of the laws of Fiji to the extent of its consistency with the constitution and other laws. And any inconsistency of traditional customary law to this constitution or other laws is void to the extent of its inconsistency.

And we are referring to the section 5.3 which is below. In section 5.3 the USA is stating that if in the interpretation of provision of this constitution there is an apparent difference between the meaning of the English version of the provision and its meaning in Fijian, Rotuman or Hindu studies. The English version prevails, provided contextualization must be exhausted and conceded in their vernaculars, where result would be better achieved in the vernacular context than the vernacular context should supersede.

In the interpretation we have outlined those provisions. In the language we are saying that the English, Fijian, Rotuman and Hindu study languages have equal status in the state. This constitution is to be adopted in English but translated in Fijian, Rotuman and Hindu study versions are to be made available.

As I have already stated earlier in the interpretation, every person who transacts business with the department and offices of the state, a local authority, has the right to do so in English, Fijian, Rotuman and Hindu study either directly or through a competent interpreter. The Bose Levu Vakaturaga, section 6, Bose Levu Vakaturaga established under Fijian Affairs Act continues in existence and its membership functions, operations and procedures are prescribed under that Act. Bose Levu Vakaturaga, as in addition to the functions set out in the Fijian Affairs Act, the functions conferred upon it under this constitution, which is to actually appoint the President.

There is a chapter 2 that the USA would like to also make submission on for compact. It's very much the repetition of the compact that's already there but we have realigned it more to represent what we are saying and to be aligned more with the rights that we are also highlighting. The people of the Republic of Fiji recognize that within the framework of this constitution and the other laws of the state, the conduct of government must be based on the following principles.

The right of all individual communities and groups are fully respected. The ownership of Fijian and Rotuman land, seas and space, including their genetic resources, traditional knowledge, traditional cultural expressions and intellectual property, according to Fijian and Rotuman traditional customs and laws. The ownership of freehold land and the rights of landlords and tenants under leases of agricultural land are preserved to the extent of their consistency with this constitution.

Fiji is a country founded on Christian values and principles, recognized that all persons are free to exercise their right to practice their beliefs, religion and to retain their language, culture and traditions. The rights of the Fijian and Rotuman people include their right to their self-determination that also include governance through their separate administrative systems and the right to be consulted to give their prior informed consent to their ownership under Section B which we have already outlined. As citizens, the members of all communities enjoy equal rights including the right to make their permanent homes in the Fiji Islands.

Citizens can vote and be a candidate in free and fair elections of members of the House of Representatives held by secret ballots and on the basis of equal suffrage. The formation of a government that has the support of a majority in the House of Representatives depends on the number of seats received by a political party or coalition government from among competing parties, depending on their willingness to come together to form or support a government. A two party election would be our desire provided our people agree.

All communities in Fiji shall have programmes for equitable sharing of economic and communal power to ensure that all communities fully benefit from the nation's economic progress. The application of Compacts, the principles referred to in Section 7 are not justiciable except to the extent they are made subject to other provisions of this constitution or of a law made under this constitution. In the interpretation of this constitution or law made under this constitution, consideration must be given to these principles when relevant.

Citizenship, which is Chapter 3, the retention of existing citizenship under Section 9 of this constitution, the coming into effect of this constitution does not affect the citizenship of a person who was a citizen immediately before it came into effect. A way in which citizenship is acquired is either through birth, registration or naturalization and Parliament must make laws for the acquisition of those citizenships under those modes. Citizenship by birth, every child born in Fiji, this follows the same provisions that we now have, it's only that there is an addition on B, neither parent is a citizen born in Fiji.

Provide a child born outside of Fiji to a father registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula shall be a citizen of Fiji by birth. Section 11, infant found abandoned in Fiji. Section 12, citizenship by registration, a child born outside of Fiji after the commencement of this constitution may become a citizen by registration if at the date of the child's birth either or both parents were citizens born in Fiji, provided a child born outside of Fiji to a father registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula shall be a citizen by birth, either parents were born in Fiji.

The reason why there is a suggestion on that is because especially at this time there is a lot of abuse by those that are obtaining citizenships through registrations or naturalizations that we are not aware of. They come from systems which are very highly developed and they can easily pass through our system of citizenship if we are not careful and the reason why we are inputting that is to put at least some sort of stagger to the transition that they would like to achieve with their citizenship of people that they would like to introduce into the country. A foreign child born in Fiji by a parent who was a citizen may become a citizen by registration provided all legal requirements for citizenship are satisfied.

A child who was under the age of 21 but more than 16 years when either parent become a citizen may become a citizen by registration provided they satisfy all legal requirements for citizenship and there are no conditions imposed on their parents or child. Four, it follows the same, five, the requirements for naturalization where they have to be continuously present for the five years of the ten years that they are in the country in order for them to be eligible and there must be no break. And that's what sub section five is trying to say.

And the citizenship of those that a citizen of another country may be granted if under those three conditions the person was formerly a citizen of the state and he or she renounces the other citizenship provided the application has satisfied all the legal requirements imposed by law. That's the additional provision that we have tried to insert. An application for citizenship by registration made by an adult who is or has been married to a citizen born in Fiji may be granted if the applicant is lawfully present in Fiji for a total of five continuous years over ten years immediately before the application.

That's the only change that we would like to impose on the citizenship by registration. Citizenship by naturalization, sub section one, sub section two, we have only suggested after having been lawfully and faithfully, the insertion of the word other two, and faithfully present in Fiji for a total of five continuous years. I know that the standard for that will have to be put up by the immigration department but we would like to ensure that we have the right people with us to be part of our society.

People who are patriotic and faithfully present with us. Loss of citizenship, we are not suggesting any change. On the rights to enter and reside in Fiji, we are requesting if a new sub section D, a child born outside of Fiji who is registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula or to a father registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula must have the rights to enter and reside in Fiji.

The powers of parliament concerning citizenship, the Yavusa is of the view that this section should be deleted. Deprivation of citizenship, there is no change. Prevention of statelessness, we would like to see anything on that. On the Bill of Rights, Chapter 4 Bill of Rights, sub section 2 to 4 must be deleted because it repeats all the discovered others. Subsection 1 and rephrase subsection 5 and 8 as follows. This is for the application.

The rights and freedoms set out in this chapter apply according to their tenor and are subject only to limitations under the laws of general application committed by this chapter and to such derogations as are authorized under relevant chapter in the constitution. In considering a particular legislation, the court must interpret this chapter regarding human rights contextually having regard to the content and consequences of legislation including its impact upon individuals, groups or communities, especially the traditional Fijian and Rotuman community. And that's the point we would like to highlight under the application sections and that's what we are also repeating all along.

For example in subsection 7. We feel that those are matters that need to be considered especially while trying to accede to or ratify human rights or other treaties and agreements. As far as right to personal liberty, we have only made those suggestions by making some deletions in the context that especially in F, 20F and also 23A. In any event, we feel that the seven days in which a person that has been detained, for them to be given some sort of, to give the families the ground for detention is a bit too long. We feel that 48 hours would be the appropriate time for that. Freedom from slavery, forced labour and human trafficking. We just like to add at sub section 2, especially with those children in boarding schools. They may be falling foul in the constitution if they are not able to be pushed to do some warning words and that be an exception to the forced labour and human treatment. If there is an argument on that, that could be an exception too. Freedom from cruel and degrading treatment and medical experimentation.

We feel that medical experimentation should be added and that should be also added to the sub section 3. Every person has the right to freedom from scientific or medical experimentation or treatment or procedures. And we feel that the deletion of those words without an order of the court, it must be without his or her informed consent rather than the order of the court. There can be times which the court can be, but we feel that that is not for us here in Fiji.

And if the child is not, or if the patient is not able to give informed consent without the informed consent of the parent or lawful guardian. 23. Freedom from unreasonable search and seizure.

If the word possession could be added, unreasonable search of his or her person, property or possession. We feel that the word possession is missing because it is not treated under the property and person. Rights of arrested and detained persons.

We know that the Director of Public Prosecutions have already come in to speak on that. We would like to just join the Director of Public Prosecutions on this submission along those lines. Employment relations or freedom of assembly.

We are not suggesting any changes in there. Freedom of association. Employment relations.

Freedom of movement and residence. Freedom of religion, conscience and belief. Subsection 5. There must be an exception provided that all foreign financial contributions to any school must be approved by government. The reason why we are making this suggestion is the freedom of religion, conscience and belief. There are certain schools that can be funded from outside. We are not being vigilant in ensuring that those funders are not going to harm our society through some sort of push from their side.

For us, for children to learn things that may be harmful to the peace and tranquility of our nation. Subsection 7. A2. Promote peace tolerance to the extent that if necessary, the rights and freedoms set out in this section may be made subject to such limitations prescribed by law. To protect the rights and freedoms of other persons. And promote peace tolerance, national values and public safety, public order, public morality and public health. We feel that those are some of the points that needs to be also included.

Promote peace tolerance, national values and public safety and including others that have already been listed. Political rights. Subsection 3. Every citizen has reached the age of must be 21 years and they can follow through with all those requirements.
21 years instead of 18 years. We feel that 18 years children are still very much at school. And for them to be populated with politics at a very young age is not something that parents would like their children to be placed under.

Right to privacy. Subsection 2. We feel that a law should not limit or may override the limitation of the rights set out in subsection 1. Access to information. Subsection B. Institution or body. Information held by another person, institution or body. Every person has the right to access those information's. Because the information's are not only held by persons. They are mostly held by institutions or body. And we are well aware of that as well. Right to equality and freedom from discrimination. We feel that this provision should be left as is. Freedom from compulsory or arbitrary acquisition of property. Every person has the right not to be deprived of his or her property by the state other than in accordance with the written law referred to in subsection 2. And no law may permit arbitrary acquisition or expropriation of any interest in any property.

And property or interest in property in this section also include intellectual property rights, traditional knowledge and traditional cultural expressions and genetic resources. We feel that those are matters that need to be also included as part of our properties. I know that there are certain constitutions in the world that include those aspects of especially developed nations like US and some other big countries. The rights of ownership and protection of iTaukei, Rotuman, and Banaban lands and resources. We feel that this provision needs to be amended further. The ownership of all, instead of iTaukei, native land, minerals and other resources including genetic resources should remain with the customary owners of that land.

And native land shall not be permanently alienated whether by sale, grant, transfer or exchange except to the state for public purpose. It must be for public purpose. Native land under this section means lands, minerals and other resources including genetic resources.

Native land include the land and seas with all its resources including from the high water marks to the territorial sea. Now visiting with the government for public access purpose only and not for business or research purpose. When native land and fisheries owners will have to be first consulted for their prior informed consent especially if those areas are subjected to business or research purpose.

We also feel that under subsection 2 to delete under section 27, subsection 3 after the word state include further expand with the following words for public purpose. And further native land under this section means land, minerals and other resources including genetic resources. Native land include the land and seas with all its resources as we have already stated above including from the high water mark to the territorial sea.

Now visiting with the government for public access purpose only and not for business or research purpose. When native land and fisheries owners will have to be first consulted for their prior informed consent. Sorry for repeating the same thing over and over and we are stating the same thing also in subsection 5. Protection of ownership and interest in land where under this section we feel that this section should be deleted.

Rights of land owners to their fair share of royalties for extraction of mineral businesses or leases. Under subsection 1 fair share shall also include the percentage of business ownership or gross income after taxation from the businesses, lease and subleases. That's under subsection 1. Right to education, subsection 3. Conversational and contemporary Fijian, Rotuman and Indo-Fijian languages shall be taught as subject in all primary schools.

The word contemporary we submitted that should also be deleted. Conversational, the word there should be the original Fijian, Rotuman and Indo-Fijian languages shall be taught as subject in all primary schools rather than the contemporary ones. We should remain with the originals rather than the newly formed languages. Subsection 4 and 5 we submitted those be deleted. Right to economic participation, right to work and thus a minimum wage. Subsection 1, right to SDM, every person to work and to adjust a reasonable minimum wage.

Adjust a reasonable minimum wage. Subsection 2, in applying any right under this section, if the state or employer claims that it does not have the resources to implement the right, it is the responsibility of the state or employer to show that the resources are not available. Right to reasonable access to transportation, we have no suggestion on that. Right to housing and sanitation, also we have no suggestion. Right to adequate food and water, we have no suggestion on that as well. Right to social security schemes, that as well we don't have any.

Right to health, right towards the end of subsection 1 and to healthcare services including reproductive and mental health care. The word mental health be also included. Freedom from arbitrary evictions, we have nothing to say on that. Environmental rights, we also have nothing more to say on that. The rights of children, we feel and we submit that an F, subsection F be included. Accept where reasonable and acceptable measures are taken not to harm the child in any way or form, but to properly discipline the child at home or in school in case of inhuman treatment and punishment. We submit that these are the wordings that at least to the children still needs to be disciplined, but we must make sure that we put in measures to standardize what needs to be done, but not to hurt them at all in any way or form. Because the best interest of a child are the primary consideration in every matter concerning the child. The rights of persons with disabilities, we have nothing to say on that. Limitation of rights under the state of emergency, we are only making suggestions on A. Any law enacted promulgated A may limit the right or freedom set out in this chapter. Only to the extent that international law, the limitation is necessary and required for emergency and all those. And those are the only few things that we have suggestion on. Enforcement, we really have nothing to add in the enforcement. The Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission, the formation and the powers and duties, we feel that those are the roles that they should also play. Chapter 5, Parliament, we request for the adoption of the 1970, 1990 and the 1997 bicameral parliamentary model.

Chapter 6, Executive, request to grow more from the 1970, 1990 and 1997 model than the 2018. Judiciary, request to grow from those models except the 2013. Public Service Commission, request that the 1970, 1990 and 1997 public service system be adopted so that civil service system is apolitical and remains as such. Honourable Chairman, Honourable Members, with those words we now conclude our submission. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: We note the submissions in relation to various provisions of the current constitution, the 2013 constitution and the suggested amendments that are to be made to them and also the additions which you and your group from Yavusa, from Yavusa Naseuvou have presented to us this afternoon. I have no comments at this point in time unless the other commissioners have comments which they would like to make in relation to the submissions. You, Mr. Kohli.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you for your submission. I'll just take you through a few pages that are numbered. So I'll just raise some of my concerns for you to consider. Number one, citizenship by naturalization. If you look at here I've introduced the word lawfully and faithfully. How do you decide what is faithfully? Something you look at. I'm not saying you give me an answer now. But what do you mean by faithfully decide?

Mr. Tuiloma: Lawfully, yes, we know everybody can abide with the laws. Faithfully is when it comes to participation in social events or community events. It's something of patriotic in nature. And it's not just you are just here or you remain in your house just because you wouldn't like to be shown in the outside because you don't want to break any laws. You want to be only legally obedient all the time so that you don't break any.

But if a person goes out to the community and I think that's an added bonus that should be also considered by the immigration when they are assessing an applicant. Especially when they would like to be naturalized.

Mr. Kohli: Which is something you may consider, word faithfully. Number two, if you go to the next page, rights to enter and reside in Fiji. Former citizens, former wife or widow, foreign husband, child of a citizen who was born in Fiji, or child born outside of Fiji is registered in the Vola ni Kawa Bula or to a father registered in the Vola ni Kawa Bula. What about if you are a Rotuman? Where do they come under? Thank you.

Mr. Tuiloma: Thank you Commissioner Kohli. For Rotuman's, we've stated earlier on whatever applies to us also applies to the Rotuman's. The reason why we could not, because of the cultural, we really don't want to dwell into, but they should also be considered along the Fijian context. Because we are not very much aware of their cultural system. I think there is something good to think about here. I'm just, as I said to you, something that you might think about.

Mr. Kohli: Then I take you to page, page, oh sorry, sorry, sorry, sorry, sorry, sorry, sorry. Number 21. I'll take it to number 20. A person must not be deprived of personal liberty except with the consent of the person's parent or lawful guardian for the purpose of the person's education or welfare during any period ending not later than the date of his 21st birthday. You want to keep this 21? Thank you. Okay. Then I'll take you to number 21. 21. It says here, freedom from slavery, servitude, forced labor, and human trafficking.

Then it says D, morning works, afternoon and farm works required for boarding school students at secondary school to beautify schools. It's just the only purpose for beautifying schools, nothing else. Is it restrictive?

No, I'm just, I'm just, I'm sorry, I'm saying this may be not the real language, but you may want to think about it. I'm just taking you through. It's something that, you know, came up to our discussion because of, you know, these boarding schools. Parents, they are slowly coming up with those arguments.

Mr. Tuiloma: You know, they should not be, their child should not be forced to do this and that. No, that is okay. The question is only for beautifying schools you can do that.

Oh. I'm saying it should be more than that. Agriculture. It is, it's more for training purposes. So that, the beautify schools will have to be taken out. Yes. Then I take you to 24. I have noticed there, 24E, in case of juveniles to be held separately from persons who are saving, a sentence, in the case of a child to be kept separate from the adults unless that is not in the best interest of the child.

That protects the child, I totally agree. What about a person who has not been convicted? That takes away the adults. What about the adults who are taken to prison and they are presumed to be innocent? Will they stay with the convicted prisoners? At the moment, under the constitution, they are also kept separately, to my knowledge. They are not kept together with the convicted prisoners. So here, they have no right. Under the suggestion that we are doing? Now, what I'm saying is this. The way you've got here, only a child or juvenile will be kept separate from these saving prisoners. Before, there was a provision where people who were taken and put on remand were kept separate as well. They were not put together with the convicted prisoners. So why has adults been removed from there? Adults.

Mr. Tuiloma: That's for detention purposes.

Mr. Kohli: The constitution in 2013 had that. Anyway, we can have a look at that. See, I think there should be a provision for everybody, not only child. A person who is detained, that's not convicted. He's detained, so he should be kept separate from the saving prisoners.

Now, if I take you to... You see, if I take you to 38. If you look at 1, the ownership of all native land, minerals and other resources, it talks about it. Then it says here, the ownership of all... Number three, the ownership of all Rotuman land shall remain the customary owners of that land. And Rotuman land shall not be permanently alienated, whether by sale, transfer, exchange, except to the state for public purposes. Then you go back to native land under this section. Means, lands, minerals and other resources, including genetic resources.

Native land includes... Are you keeping the Rotuman land and native land the same, or are they different? The Rotuman land and native land are the same. The same, okay. Then last one.

The Rotuman land have got their own land rules as well. So it's very much the same. I think what you meant there was Rotuman land, not native land, because native land is up to them.

Mr. Tuiloma: We've shifted the requirements above to also cover that. But native land that we refer to...

Mr. Kohli: But if you go up to 4, it doesn't talk about native land. It talks about Rotuman land. You see what I'm trying to say? There you're not talking about Rotuman land, you're talking about native land.

Mr. Tuiloma: So just to make sure, I'm not quite sure what you're referring to. Then... But the gist of that Rotuman land is the components, the contents of those lands. We are not really referring to land. We are adding many means that are added to the land which are normally unspoken. And that is what we are trying to use.

Mr. Kohli: What I'm saying can cause a confusion if you refer to native land one place and then Rotuman land only. Either you add both of them together, anyway. Then under 40, conversational and original Fijian, Rotuman and Indo-Fijian languages. Now original Hindi language is not Indo-Fijian. It's separate. It's a spoken language.

I'll come to that later, I'll explain to you. And then you've got... I don't understand this. Paragraph 49.

Every child has a right to be registered, basic nutrition, family care, protected. Then it says, except where reasonable and acceptable measures are taken not to harm the child in any way or form, but to properly discipline a child at home and school in case of inhumane treatment and punishment. So you're allowing inhumane treatment and punishment? No, in case of inhumane treatment and punishment, we are trying to include an exception to that, provided those requirements are satisfied.

Can you read that again? Just have a look at it again. Maybe I'm not reading it correctly. I apologize. But have a look. Just read that again.

Forty... Forty-nine? Forty-nine. Fifty-three. Sorry, fifty-f. Sorry, thank you. Fifty-f. Fifty-f. Sorry, my apologies. Fifty-f. I think inhumane treatment should be taken away, and just the word punishment should be left there. Maybe you can look into that sometime, just to see whether I may be wrong. I'm not sure. That is all I have. Thank you very much indeed for your presentation.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Just take you back to a submission that was made by a student at General Ryan College, when we went there to head of consultations with students, year 13. And the submission was that these rights of children, they are in fact responsibilities of parents, the duty of care of parents, which in a way is correct.

It is the duty of the parent to register the child soon after birth, according to the birth dates and marriages, and basic nutrition, clothing. These are to be provided by the parents. Now, family care, protection and guidance, to be protected from abuse. How do you weigh those two, from duty of care of the child to right of the child?

Mr. Tuiloma : Thank you, Mr. Chairman. This is a very good question. Because right of the child comes to the CRC Convention, and that's where they were more or less picked up from and put it in. The duty of parents is something that we have forgotten to stipulate here also. The problem that we have, we are not localizing international duties and conventions. We are directly adopting them into our system, without localizing them.

And that's one of the requirements we would also like to highlight to be part of our submission. And that's where the problem comes in. You know, the conflicts that we have in our system, and our understanding of our parents' role is, you know, to do all those.

Whereas the child rights come with another angle, through the duties that they have. And all these laws will need to be domesticated. They need to come in alignment with our system. Without that, we'll always be going around in a circle, like what we are doing now. All these duties have not been domesticated. And something which I'm still asking our office to do, was to move into that. To ensure that we put in domestic laws, to ensure that we have a footing of all these duties in our laws here in Fiji. Because without that, direct application, there's a danger to that. Especially with the sovereignty of a nation.

We cannot allow international organizations to come in directly and question us on how we are. We should only be responsible to what we can cater for under our domestic laws. And that's the future we should always angle ourselves to that. With that question that you asked, Mr Chairman, it's a difficult question for me to answer. Because I don't really know how to manoeuvre the two laws to be consistent. On one hand, we have the duty of care of a parent, and on the other, the rights of a child.

Mr. Valenitabua : The rights of the child is under section 41 of the constitution. We were told that day, delete everything, section 41, take away the right of the child. And then bring this in as duty of care for the parents. Now that was a conclusion which was, I believe, reached because of the many problems that are being introduced by the rights of the child. It's being abused. You know, just reading this, this is coming from your submission.

We have heard from year 12 students that section 41 of the constitution in relation to the rights of the child should be deleted, removed completely. And we change this right here to be the duty of care. So it's something that we'll just have to think about.

Mr. Tuiloma: The reason why we have not suggested deletion is because we have to understand that this constitution had been around for some time. And there are mechanisms already in place. If we have to delete something, then there must be a foundation for them to land on. Because if we delete something without putting a footing in preparation for that system to land on, we'll end up in trouble also. Yes. These are all new rights.

The whole world is still searching. Some of them have not actually implemented them, the rights to health, environment. It comes up every year. But we have quickly adopted them into our constitution. And now when you look at the population, they are very much aware and they are now moving along with these rights. And if we have to take them out, we have to ensure that there's no left for our population to find some relief on. That is something that we...

Mr. Valenitabua: That is a problem that we have now. We have not domesticated most of these laws, right? Yeah, okay.

Mr. Kohli : Freedom, 22. Freedom from cruel and degrading treatment and medical experimentation. I have seen in subsection 3, every person has a right to freedom from scientific or medical experimentation or treatment or procedures. You have taken out without the order of the court by putting down without his or her informed consent. If he or she is incapable of giving informed consent without the informed consent of parent or local guardian. I've come across cases where they don't have parents, they don't have guardians. And they are roaming around the street with the drug related and we have to go to court to get an order of the court for him to be sent to St. Joseph's Mission. Where will they fit in? You know, if you take the order of the court, where would they fit in? Welfare officer struggles with this, they come to court for orders. Sometimes we struggle with our client's relative, they are not guardian, they are not parent, they don't want to know them. But they want help. So I think you should insert that order of the court as well.

Mr. Tuiloma : The context in which we were looking at it is more from the aspect where the system or the government goes to court to make, if there is no law in place, and policy, they go to court just to ensure that they make children abide with, or the population abide. It's something which, if we look at this COVID system that came into, something of that nature actually happened in a lot of countries as well.

Where the court became part and parcel of the government, issuing out orders, and that's how the system operates. That was the context in which we were looking at this year. So your argument is a very good argument, the way we are looking at it from our side is good, but domestication is something that's still missing.

So that we consider all these views, and ensure that this law, when we are putting it in place, we put message along those lines that we prevent the system from being abused, whether it's from our side or from...

Mr. Kohli : Some people didn't want to take injections, and they are forced upon by the government. I don't see where you are coming from, but I think you should address also this. Please, I request you not to have a look at it.

Ms. Nailatikau : Thank you. Thank you very much Mr. Tuiloma, and your esteemed fellow delegates today for your submission. I take it that my colleague who has a special interest in the Bill of Rights would have conveyed some of his responses in relation to the very valid concern that you are raising around the importance of the family.

And I noticed that you included that in your preamble text. And some of the submissions that we've been receiving from faith-based organizations, including a young pastor who works with disadvantaged youth, spoke about the great volume of young people who fall by the wayside of the law, having come from incomplete family units. Who do not have the benefit of having a stable, supportive, resourced family life. And I believe, as is already contained in the Constitution, there are elements there that talk about a child's right to protection and care by their parents, whether or not their parents have been or are married. And I think that covers the element, or at least speaks to the element of the duty of care that I believe you are all very supportive of, and that Chair has also mentioned. So I think, I commend that aspect in terms of the recognition of the family.

And a lot of the submissions we've received also speak about the recognition of the family as a fundamental unit of well-being in a nation, in a society. With that, in addition to that, I also touch on your aspect about citizenship, pathways to citizenship, and ways in which we can maintain links, but also exercise caution in the submissions that you have provided. My question is in relation to loss of citizenship, and I was wondering, it's a two-pronged question, forgive me.

Firstly, in relation to the loss of citizenship, I was wondering what your views may be in relation to dual citizenship. As we've seen, you know, a tremendous amount of both Indigenous and non-Indigenous people of Fiji have gone abroad, still have very strong links, as we all know, to the country. So, I was wondering what your views would be on dual citizenship.

And secondly, in relation to some of the wording I was seeing in terms of having Fijian parentage, the parentage seems to be skewed towards paternal, towards the paternal side. As someone with maternal links to your province, I still very much consider myself connected there as well. I just wanted to ask what your views are, and particularly with, I know that Fiji has a very dear and treasured system that we call the vaso system, or the maternal link system.

I would just be interested to hear your thoughts along that line. It would be remiss of me not to raise it, so I thought to raise it to you.

Mr. Tuiloma: I'll address the paternal, why we have made those suggestions. I think these are very live questions that have been discussed right up to the GCC level. But as is, as of today, everything is still very much paternal, the linkage, and that was why we have made those suggestions. We are very much aware of the other side as well. But I think the customs, our customs and traditions tends to be skewed more towards that. Even, I thought we would have very much relaxed on certain aspects, but I still see it's still very much skewed towards the paternal. And until that time comes, we can make submissions that cover those points as well.

And the other question is, loss of citizenship, of dual citizenship. Dual citizenship is a very, it's a very good topic to discuss, both at national level as well. I for one feel that, the question that I always raise is, are we ready for dual citizenship? Especially with the numbers, I was very conscious of the numbers that we have. Because the more we open up our system, there is a danger of us being subdued by others who are much stronger financially. As well as through whatever means that they have to attain both citizenships. And I think it has come to a time where I think dual citizenship, we are now getting ready for that. And I think the system now has approved it. And now the, a lot of us are now holding dual citizenships. Unfortunately, I'm not one of those. I'm not one of those. But I think it's something that, especially the, from the financial, social side of context. Of having such a system in place, and the contribution that it can advance the nation.

And from our perspective, even the traditional cultural system, how much affected are we to having the system open up through that means. At the moment I have not, it's something which I know my family is exposed to it. And a lot of my family here are already in it. But we appreciate those that have advanced to that level. But perhaps we should make sure that we study the system very well on how, on those impacts. In order for us to make a substantive claim to whatever position that we are holding. At present I cannot really say whether I belong to this side or this side. I have no knowledge of the stats that are there. On those discussions and those issues as well. Thank you very much. Thank you.

Mr. Conway: Sorry Chair, through you. Thank you very much Mr. Tuiloma. And the villagers of Nasaqalau. I just, my commissioners have spoken a lot. I just have one point. You know, you mentioned the point about transitional government in your presentation. I guess our terms of reference are very limited to what we can do. I'm sure the Chair will probably elaborate a little bit more on that. But yeah, I think that's not for us. I guess Parliament will need to convene and consider these. You're not the first one to bring this forward. This has been brought to us by numerous places throughout Fiji. So, the point is taken. I just wanted to stress that point. But thank you very much. I think some of the points around the Bill of Rights. You know, balancing it. And I think the points are well taken and considered. Especially the rights around forced labour. Like in the core of my days at boarding school. But it was all for a good cause. Thank you very much.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Tuiloma. Vei kemudou na Turaga na marama ni Naseuvou. We thank you very much indeed for the submission that has been presented to us this morning. Particularly on the concentration to the various sections.

And the Bill of Rights. This is our expert in the Bill of Rights. And the Bill of Rights which we have been directed to. And the amendments which can possibly be made. So that is the end of our consultation. We will consider what has been presented to us during our deliberations. Thank you Very much.

----------End of Session [9-7-2026]----------

CONSTITUTIONAL SUBMISSION BY THE VILLAGE OF NASAQALAU, LAKEBA, LAU

TURAGA BALE NA TUI NASAQALAU

Mataqali Dreketi, Mataqali Loma, Mataqali Nakabuta, Mataqali Nautuqumu

Wiliwili ni Lewe Ni Yavusa era duavata ena vakatutu oqo -

We want to state a few requests to the Chair and members of the CRC for kind considerations, before we make our submission proper. Generally our submission will cover the following:

1. We join all those that have earlier submitted beore the CRC; 'to hold the upcoming general election under the new constitution, and not under the 2013 constitution.'
2. To facilitate that, a transition period be created within the law, for an interim government made up of the present MPs run and transcend into the new constitutional system for 18 months, before a general election is called. The only outstanding matter left under the 2013 constitution that need to be satisfied is a referendum to be held on the 27th January, 2027, on the question whether our people would like a general election held under the old 2013 Constitution, or under the New Constitution.
3. Rights and Freedoms under the constitution must all be revised and appropriately placed and worded properly....as we will refer to later, in our submission.
4. Put the voting age or majority age back to 21 years and not 18 years – don't populate them with things that will denigrade their personal, or traditional and cultural values.
5. Fiji should have a bicameral legislature and not unicameral as is today – adopt the 1970 constitutional model concerning the bicameral Parliament or Legislature.
6. Section xxxxxxx. Recall of members of Parliament
   Any member of the Parliament may be removed from office by recall. A recall is initiated by a petition which shall identify the official sought to be recalled by name and seat, state the grounds for the recall, and be signed by at least twenty-five percent of the persons qualified to vote for the seat occupied by the member. A special recall election shall be held not later than sixty calendar days after the filing of the recall petition. A member of Parliament shall be removed from office with the approval of a majority of the persons voting in the election. A recall petition may not be filed against a member more than once per term or during the first year of a term in office.
7. The right of the indigenous fijians to self determination must also be a standalone right under the constitution.
8. Fijian children born outside Fiji who are registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula must have the right to enter and leave Fiji.
9. The word Fijian should only be reserved for the Fijian race. All iTaukei reference to Fijians are to be reverted to Fijian. [All races should be proud of their race, as that is who they were born and came into the world with].

10. Section xxxxxxx Meaning of "Fijian," Rotuman and "Indo-Fijian".
    For the purposes of this Constitution –
    (a) a person shall be regarded as a Fijian if, and shall not be so regarded unless, his father or any of his earlier male progenitors in the male line is or was the child of parents both of whom are or were indigenous inhabitants of Fiji; and
    (b) a person shall be regarded as a Rotuman if, and shall not be so regarded unless, his father or mother or any of his earlier female and male progenitors in the female and male line is or was the child of parents both of whom are or were indigenous inhabitants of Rotuma; and
    (b) a person shall be regarded as an Indo Fijian if, and shall not be so regarded unless, his father or any of his earlier male progenitors in the male line is or was the child of parents both of whom are or were indigenous inhabitants of the sub-continent of India and came to Fiji through the Girimytians; Provided that, where the identity of the father of any person cannot be ascertained, the male progenitors of that person may instead be traced through that person's mother.

11. The Deed of Cession recognises that Fijian lands, seas and resources belongs to the Fijians, or Rotumans, but some portions of which had either been alienated, retained or inappropriately sold, and for their rightful ownership and valuations determinations, a Deed of Session Tribunal MUST be formed to decide on the validity, value and other matters regarding such claims, including validations of title, land, marine and fisheries claims under the Native Land and Fisheries Commission, by Fijians.
12. The GCC to be the body to appoint the President.
13. The amendment to the current mineral royalty distribution policy where only five percent of the returns are given as royalty to the government, and 80-90% of that 5% is given to landowners, the government retains the rest of that 5% - the mineral leaseholders retain 95% of the return, is long overdue.
14. Repeal the current and reverse Public Service System or civil service systems back to it's a-political or political free status similar to the 1970, 1990 and 1997 Constitutions.
15. The Executive - repeal the current and revert to the 1970, 1990, and the 1997 constitutional framework.
16. Amendments to the Const under CAP 11 - Constitution must be reviewed every 7 years, and any amendments to the constitution must await that period. After public consultation, the amendment process should follow simple majority for provisions that have little impact on Fijian lands and resources and their customs and traditions.

AN ACT

TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION OF THE SOVEREIGN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF FIJI

ENACTED by the Parliament of Fiji -

"WE, THE PEOPLE OF THE REPUBLIC OF FIJI,

ACKNOWLEDGE THE BLESSINGS OF OUR GOD, TO THE PEOPLE, THEIR LAND, SEAS, AND AIRWAYS.

ACKNOWLEDGE that our lands with its vast ocean and resources have been a cherished ancestral home for generations of the Fijian people. Recognizing the enduring connection between the Fijian people and this land, we celebrate and share their values of respect and reverential fear of God, honoring elders, ancestors and chiefs, nurturing a strong sense of community, and fostering a harmonious relationship with our natural world, ownership of land, sea and resources, including genetic resources and traditional knowledge, traditional cultural expressions to their unique culture, customs, traditions, language, and intellectual property.

ACKNOWLEDGE, that the Deed of Cession recognises that Fijian lands, seas and resources belongs to the Fijians, or Rotumans, but some portions of which had either been alienated, retained or inappropriately sold, and for appropriate ownership and valuations determinations, a Deed of Session Tribunal shall be formed to decide on the validity, value and other matters of such claims, including validations of claims under the Native Land and Fisheries Commission by Fijians.

We further acknowledge the unique history and heritage of Rotuma, a people with their own distinct culture and traditions. Recognizing that Rotuma entered into a separate Deed of Cession, we affirm Rotuma's distinct identity and rights, emphasizing the need for ongoing dialogue to clarify and strengthen Rotuma's relationship with Fiji. We affirm the importance of preserving Rotuman culture while embracing our shared identity as Fijians and Rotumans, ensuring that their voice and perspectives are integral to the future of our nation.

Recognizing that Fiji has become a vibrant tapestry woven from diverse backgrounds and experiences, we celebrate the contributions of all who have made this land their home. We commit ourselves to building a nation where the rights and dignity of every individual are upheld, respecting the foundational role of Fijian traditions and customs while embracing the diversity that defines Fiji today. We aspire to a future built on mutual respect, understanding, and shared prosperity, ensuring that our nation continues to evolve in a way that honors the past while embracing the opportunities of tomorrow.

RECOGNISING that the descendants of all those who chose to make their homes in these islands form our multiracial and multicultural society:

AFFIRMING the contributions of all communities to the well-being of our society, and the rich variety of their faiths, traditions, languages and cultures:

COMMITTING ourselves anew to living in harmony and unity, promoting the intergration of all races and the economic and social advancement of all communities, respecting their rights and interests and strengthening our institutions of government:

REAFFIRMING our recognition of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all races and groups, safeguarded by adherence to the rule of law, and our respect for human dignity and the importance of the Family,

WITH GOD AS OUR WITNESS, GIVE OURSELVES THIS CONSTITUTION."

CHAPTER 1 STATE AND THE CONSTITUTION

SECTION 1 – REPEAL, the current provision as it repeats what stated in all other provisions about democracy and its values. Equal citizenry is a philosophical concept that should never be forced as it attempts to eliminate the Fijian race/ethnicity and their values.

Replace it with: SECTION 1 - THE STATE

1. The Republic of Fiji (Viti or Viji) is a sovereign democratic State.

SECTION 2 – CONSTITUTION IS THE SUPREME LAW OF THE STATE

2. Constitution is the supreme law of Fiji and if any other law is inconsistent with this Constitution, that other law shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be void.

SECTION 3 - ELECTION – AND MOVE THE CURRENT SECTION 3 (PRINCIPLES OF CONSTITUTION INTERPRETATION) TO BE SECTION 4

3. Notwithstanding the provision of Sections 58 and 59 of the 2013 Constitution, the Referendum and Saved Provisions Act, 2026, writs for the first general election of members of the House of Representatives shall be issued within the period of eighteen months from the date of coming into force of this Constitution.

SECTION 4 - INTERPRETATION OF THE CONSTITUTION – Change the wordings of the current s3 Interpretation provision – The current s4 be deleted - 'secular state'

4.In the interpretation of a provision of this Constitution -

(a) a construction that would promote the purpose or object underlying the provision, taking into account the spirit of this Constitution as a whole, is to be preferred to a construction that would not promote that purpose or object; and

(b) regard must be had to the context in which this Constitution was drafted and to the intention that constitutional interpretation take into account social and cultural developments and impacts, especially:

(i) developments in the understanding of the content of particular human rights and its impact on peace and tranquility in Fijian society; and

(ii) developments in the promotion of particular human rights that is balanced with the Fijian traditional society.

(c) The government shall codify the traditional and cultural laws of the Fijian people to be part of the laws of Fiji, to the extent of its consistencies with this constitution and other laws, and any inconsistency of traditional customary law to this consitution or other laws is void to the extent of its inconsistency, provided s5(3) have been exhausted.

SECTION 5 – LANGUAGES

5.-(1) The English, Fijian, Rotuman and Hindustani languages have equal status in the State.

(2) This Constitution is to be adopted in English but translations in Fijian, Rotuman and Hindustani are to be available.

(3) If, in the interpretation of a provision of this Constitution, there is an apparent difference between the meaning of the English version of the provision and its meaning in Fijian, Rotuman or Hindustani, the English version prevails, provided contextualisations must be exhausted and considered in their verneculars. Where result would be better achieved in the vernecular context, than the vernecular context supercede.

(4) Every person who transacts business with:

(a) a department;

(b) an office in a state service; or

(c) a local authority; has the right to do so in English, Fijian, Rotuman or Hindustani, either directly or through a competent interpreter.

SECTION 6 – BOSE LEVU VAKATURAGA (GREAT COUNCIL OF CHIEFS)

6. (1) The Bose Levu Vakaturaga established under the Fijian Affairs Act continues in existence and its membership, functions, operations and procedures are as prescribed under that Act.

(2) The Bose Levu Vakaturaga has, in addition to the functions set out in the Fijian Affairs Act, the functions conferred on it under this Constitution.

CHAPTER 2 COMPACT

Section 7. The people of the Republic of Fiji recognise that, within the framework of this Constitution and the other laws of the State, the conduct of government must be based on the following principles:

(a) the rights of all individuals, communities and groups are fully respected;

(b) the ownership of Fijian and Rotuman land, seas and space, including their genetic resources, traditional knowledge and traditional cultural expressions and intellectual property according to Fijian and Rotuman traditional customs and laws, the ownership of freehold land, and the rights of landlords and tenants under leases of agricultural land are preserved to the extent of their consistency with this constitution;

(c) Fiji a country founded on Christian values and principles recognise that all persons are free to exercise their right to practise their beliefs or religion and to retain their language, culture and traditions;

(d) the rights of the Fijian and Rotuman people include their right to their self determination, that also include governance through their separate administrative systems, and the right to be consulted to give their prior informed consent to their ownership under subsection (b);

(e) as citizens, the members of all communities enjoy equal rights, including the right to make their permanent homes in the Fiji Islands;

(f) the rights of a citizen include the right to form and join political parties; that is preferrably two, to take part in political campaigns, and to vote and to be a candidate in free and fair elections of members of the House of Representatives held by secret ballot and ultimately on the basis of equal suffrage;

(g) the formation of a government that has the support of a majority in the House of Representatives depends on the number of majority number of seats received by a political party, or a coalition government from among competing parties, depending on their willingness to come together to form or support a government;

(h) a two party election would be our desire, provided our people agree;

(h) in the formation of a government, and in that government's conduct of the affairs of the nation through the promotion of legislation or the implementation of administrative policies, full account is taken of the interests of all communities, and no laws shall be passed or be substantially amended through consequential bills to an annual budget bill;

(i) to the extent that the when multicultural parties are leading government, and interests of different communities are seen to conflict, all the interested parties negotiate in good faith and in the best interest of the people they represent, in an endeavour to reach agreement;

(j) in those negotiations, the paramountcy of Fijian or Rotuman interests as a protective principle continues to apply, so as to ensure that the interests of the Fijian and Rotuman communities are not subordinated to the interests of other minority communities;

(k) affirmative action and social justice programs to secure effective equality of access to opportunities, amenities or services for the Fijian and Rotuman people, as well as for other communities, for women as well as men, and for all disadvantaged citizens or groups, are based on an allocation of resources broadly acceptable to all communities;

(l) all communities in Fiji shall have programs for equitable sharing of economic and commercial power to ensure that all communities fully benefit from the nation's economic progress.

Application of Compact

8.- (1) The principles referred to in section 7 are non-justiciable, except to the extent that they are made the subject of other provisions of this Constitution or of a law made under this Constitution.

(2) In the interpretation of this Constitution or a law made under this constitution consideration must be given to these principles, when relevant.

CHAPTER 3 CITIZENSHIP

Retention of existing citizenship

9. Subject to this Constitution, the coming into effect of this Constitution does not affect the citizenship of a person who was a citizen immediately before it came into effect.

Way in which citizenship may be acquired

10. (1) Citizenship may be acquired by: (a) birth; (b) registration; or (c) naturalisation.

(2) Parliament may make law providing conditions for the acquisition of citizenship.

Citizenship by birth

10. Every child born in Fiji on or after the date of commencement of this Constitution becomes a citizen at the date of birth unless, at the date of birth:

(a) a parent of the child has the diplomatic immunity accorded to envoys of foreign sovereign powers accredited to Fiji;

(b) neither parent is a citizen born in Fiji; and

(c) provided, a child born outside of Fiji to a father registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula, shall be a citizen of Fiji by birth.

Infant found abandoned in Fiji

11. An infant found abandoned in Fiji is deemed to have been born in Fiji, in the absence of proof.

Citizenship by registration

12. (1) A child born outside Fiji on or after the date of commencement of this Constitution may become a citizen by registration if, at the date of the child's birth, either or both parents were citizens born in Fiji, provided, a child born outside of Fiji to a father registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula, shall be a citizen of Fiji by birth.

(2) A foreign child adopted by a citizen born in Fiji by a parent who was a citizen and born in Fiji, when the child was under the age of ~~18~~ 16 may become a citizen by registration, provided all legal requirements for citizenship are satisfied.

(3) A child who was under the age of 21, but, more than 16 years, when either parent became a citizen may become a citizen by registration, provided they satisfy all other legal requirements for citizenship, and there are no conditions imposed on either parent or child.

(4) An application for registration under subsection (1), (2) or (3) maybe made at any time during the child's lifetime and, if he or she is under the age of 21 at the date of the application, may be made on his or her behalf by a parent or guardian.

(5) An application for registration under subsection (1), (2) or (3) made by the child concerned after he or she has reached the age of 21 must not be granted unless he or she has been lawfully and continously present in Fiji for a total of 5 of the 10 years immediately before the application.

(6) An application for citizenship by registration made by an adult who is a citizen of another country ~~must~~ may be granted if:

(a) the person was formerly a citizen of the State; and

(b) he or she renounces the other citizenship;

(c) provided the application has satisfied all the legal requirements imposed by law.

(7) An application for citizenship by registration made by an adult who is or has been married to a citizen ~~must~~ born in Fiji may be granted if the applicant:

(a) has been lawfully present in Fiji for a total of 5 continuous years of the 10 years immediately before the application; and

(b) complies with such other conditions as the Parliament prescribes.

(8) If, in accordance with this Constitution, a person is required to renounce the citizenship of another country in order to become a citizen of the State but the law of that other country effectively prevents renunciation of that citizenship, the person is deemed to have renounced that citizenship if he or she declares, in a form prescribed by the Parliament, an intention not to exercise the entitlements of that citizenship.

Citizenship by naturalisation

13. (1) A person may become a citizen by naturalisation (Constitution (Amendment) Act 1997).

(2) A condition of naturalisation is that the person has been lawfully and faithfully present in Fiji for a total of 5 continuous years of the 10 years immediately before the application for naturalisation is made.

Loss of citizenship

14. (1) Subject to this section, a person forfeits citizenship if he or she voluntarily acquires the citizenship or nationality of another country.

(2) A citizen of the State who, while a minor, acquires the citizenship of another country forfeits his or her citizenship of the State at the age of 22 unless, after reaching the age of 21 and before reaching the age of 22, he or she renounces the other citizenship.

(3) An adult who involuntarily acquires the citizenship of another country does not forfeit his or her citizenship of the State unless he or she fails to renounce the other citizenship within 12 months of:

(a) becoming aware of it; or

(b) being required by the Minister to renounce it; whichever first occurs.

Renunciation of citizenship

15. A person may renounce his or her citizenship only if he or she:

(a) has reached the age of 21; and

(b) has been since birth a citizen of another country or has acquired the citizenship of another country by registration or naturalisation.

Rights to enter and reside in Fiji

16. The following persons may enter and reside in Fiji so long as they comply with conditions prescribed by the Parliament governing entry and residence:

(a) former citizens;

(b) a foreign wife or widow or foreign husband or widower of a citizen born in Fiji;

(c) a child of a citizen who was born in Fiji; or

(d) a child born outside of Fiji who is registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula or to a father registered under the Vola ni Kawa Bula.

~~Powers of Parliament concerning citizenship~~

~~17. Subject to subsections 9(2) and 12(6), the Parliament may make laws:~~

~~(a) prescribing conditions upon which a person may become a citizen that are in addition to the conditions set out in this Constitution; and Constitution (Amendment) Act 1997, and 2013 Constitution~~

~~(b) relating to the making of applications for citizenship by registration or naturalisation.~~

~~Laws relating to calculation of periods in Fiji~~

~~18. For the purpose of calculating under this Constitution periods of lawful presence in Fiji, the Parliament may make laws specifying certain periods that are not to be taken into account.~~

Deprivation of citizenship

17. (1) Parliament may make laws depriving a person of citizenship in the following circumstances only:

(a) if citizenship was obtained by fraud, misrepresentation or the concealment of a material fact;

(b) if the person, in accordance with subsection ....., declared an intention not to exercise the entitlements of citizenship of another country but has, since making that declaration, exercised such an entitlement.

(2) A law made under subsection (1) must provide for the according of procedural fairness to the person concerned.

~~Prevention of statelessness~~

~~20. Despite anything i Constitution of 1990: (a) a person born in Fiji in the period that began on 28 September 1987 and ended on 24 July 1990 is taken to have become a citizen on the date of birth; (b) a person born outside Fiji in the period that began on 28 September 1987 and ended on 6 October 1987 is taken to have become a citizen on the date of birth if his or her father was a citizen on that date and was not himself born outside Fiji; and (c) a person born in Fiji in the period that began on 25 July 1990 and ended on the date of commencement of this Constitution is taken to have become a citizen on the date of birth if he or she would otherwise be stateless.~~

CHAPTER 4 BILL OF RIGHTS

Application

18. (1) This Chapter binds:

(a) the legislative, executive and judicial branches of government at all central, divisional and local; and

(b) all persons performing the functions of any public office.

Subsections 2 – 4 must be deleted – repeat all that is covered at subsection (1). Rephrase subsections 5 – 8 as follows:

(2) The rights and freedoms set out in this Chapter apply according to their tenor and are subject only to the limitations under laws of general application permitted by this Chapter and to such derogations as are authorised under Chapter XXXXXXX – (state of emergency)

(3) Laws made and administrative and judicial actions taken after the commencement of this Constitution are subject to the provisions of this Chapter.

(4) In considering the application of this Chapter to particular legislation, a court must interpret this Chapter contextually, having regard to the content and consequences of the legislation, including its impact upon individuals, groups or communities, especially the traditional Fijian and Rotuman community.

(5) This Chapter applies to all laws in force at the commencement of this Constitution.

(6) To the extent that it is capable of doing so, this Chapter extends to things done or actions taken outside Fiji.

(7) In considering the application of this Chapter to any particular law and policies, courts must interpret this Chapter contextually, having regard to the content and consequences of the law or policy, including its impact upon individuals or groups of individuals, their peace and tranquility, including traditional Fijian villages and communities and their unique cultural set-ups.

Section 7 – Interpretation – Deleted – all covered under application above

Right to life

19. Every person has the right to life, and a person must not be arbitrarily deprived of life.

Right to personal liberty – elaborate and favour keeping but with amendments as suggested

20. A person must not be deprived of personal liberty except –

a. for the purpose of executing the sentence or order of a court, whether handed down or made in Fiji or elsewhere, in respect of an offence of which the person had been convicted;

b. for the purpose of executing an order of a court or tribunal;

c. for the purpose of executing an order of a court made to secure the fulfilment of an obligation imposed on the person by law;

d. for the purpose of bringing the person before a court in execution of an order of a court;

e. if the person is reasonably suspected of having committed an offence;

f. with the consent of the person's parent or lawful guardian or ~~upon an order made by a court~~, for the purpose of the person's education or welfare during any period ending not later than the date of his or her 21st birthday;

g. for the purpose of preventing the spread of an infectious or contagious disease;

h. for the purpose of the person's care or treatment or for the protection of the community if he or she is, or is reasonably suspected to be, of unsound mind, addicted to drugs or alcohol, or a vagrant; or

i. for the purpose of restricting and preventing the unlawful entry of the person into Fiji or of effecting the expulsion or deportation, extradition or other lawful removal of the person from Fiji.

2. Subsection (1)(c) does not permit a court to make an order depriving a person of personal liberty on the ground of failure to pay maintenance or a debt, fine or tax, unless the court considers that the person has wilfully refused to pay despite having the means to do so.

3. If a person is detained pursuant to a measure authorised under a state of emergency-

a. the person must, as soon as is reasonably practicable and in any event within ~~7 days~~ 48 hours after the start of the detention, be given a statement in writing, in a language that the person understands, specifying the grounds of the detention;

b. the person must be given the opportunity to communicate with, and to be visited by

i. his or her spouse, partner or next-of-kin;

ii. a legal practitioner;

iii. a religious counsellor or a social worker; and

iv. a medical practitioner;

c. the person must be given reasonable facilities to consult with a legal practitioner of his or her choice;

d. the detention must, within one month and thereafter at intervals of not more than one month, be reviewed by a court; and

e. at any review by a court, the person may appear in person or be represented by a legal practitioner.

4. At any review of the detention under subsection (3), the court may make such orders as to the continued detention of the person.

21. Freedom from slavery, servitude, forced labour and human trafficking

1. A person must not be held in slavery or servitude, or subjected to forced labour or human trafficking.

2. In this section, "forced labour" does not include-

a. labour required in consequence of a sentence or order of a court;

b. labour reasonably required of a person serving a term of imprisonment, whether or not required for the hygiene or maintenance of the prison; or

c. labour required of a member of a disciplined force as part of his or her duties; or

d. mornings works, afternoon and farm works required for boarding school students at secondary schools to beautify schools.

22. Freedom from cruel and degrading treatment and medical experimentation

1. Every person has the right to freedom from torture of any kind, whether physical, mental or emotional, and from cruel, inhumane, degrading or disproportionately severe treatment or punishment.

2. Every person has the right to security of the person, which includes the right to be free from any form of violence from any source, at home, school, work or in any other place.

3. Every person has the right to freedom from scientific or medical experimentation or treatment or procedures ~~without an order of the court or~~ without his or her informed consent, or if he or she is incapable of giving informed consent, without the informed consent of parent or a lawful guardian.

23. Freedom from unreasonable search and seizure

1. Every person has the right to be secure against unreasonable search of his or her person, property or possession and against unreasonable seizure of his or her property or possession.

2. Search or seizure is not permissible otherwise than under the authority of the law.

24. Rights of arrested and detained persons

1. Every person who is arrested or detained has the right

a. to be informed promptly, in a language that he or she understands, of-

i. the reason for the arrest or detention and the nature of any charge that may be brought against that person;

ii. the right to remain silent; and

iii. the consequences of not remaining silent;

b. to remain silent;

c. to communicate with a legal practitioner of his or her choice in private in the place where he or she is detained, to be informed of that right promptly and, if he or she does not have sufficient means to engage a legal practitioner and the interests of justice so require, to be given the services of a legal practitioner under a scheme for legal aid by the Legal Aid Commission;

d. not to be compelled to make any confession or admission that could be used in evidence against that person;

e. in case of juveniles, to be held separately from persons who are serving a sentence, and in the case of a child, to be kept separate from adults unless that is not in the best interests of the child;

f. to be brought before a court as soon as reasonably possible, but in any case not later than 48 hours after the time of arrest, or if that is not reasonably possible, as soon as possible thereafter;

g. at the first court appearance, to be charged or informed of the reasons for the detention to continue, or to be released;

h. to be released on reasonable terms and conditions, pending a charge or trial, unless the interests of justice otherwise require;

i. to challenge the lawfulness of the detention in person before a court and, if the detention is unlawful, to be released;

j. to conditions of detention that are consistent with human dignity, including at least the opportunity to exercise regularly and the provision, at State expense, of adequate accommodation, nutrition, and medical treatment; and

i. his or her spouse, partner or next-of-kin; and

ii. a religious counsellor or a social worker.

2. Whenever this section requires information to be given to a person, that information must be given simply and clearly in a language that the person understands.

3. A person who is deprived of liberty by being detained, held in custody or imprisoned under any law retains all the rights and freedoms set out in this Chapter, except to the extent that any particular right or freedom is incompatible with the fact of being so deprived of liberty.

25. Rights of accused persons

1. A person shall not be tried for -

a. any act or omission that was not an offence under either domestic or international law at the time it was committed or omitted; or

b. an offence in respect of an act or omission for which that person has previously been either acquitted or convicted.

2. Every person charged with an offence has the righta. to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law;

b. to be informed in legible writing, in a language that he or she understands, of the nature of and reasons for the charge;

c. to be given adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence, including if he or she so requests, a right of access to witness statements;

d. to defend himself or herself in person or to be represented at his or her own expense by a legal practitioner of his or her own choice, and to be informed promptly of this right or, if he or she does not have sufficient means to engage a legal practitioner and the interests of justice so require, to be given the services of a legal practitioner under a scheme for legal aid by the Legal Aid Commission, and to be informed promptly of this right;

e. to be informed in advance of the evidence on which the prosecution intends to rely, and to have reasonable access to that evidence;

f. to a public trial before a court of law, unless the interests of justice otherwise require;

g. to have the trial begin and conclude without unreasonable delay;

h. to be present when being tried, unless

i. the court is satisfied that the person has been served with a summons or similar process requiring his or her attendance at the trial, and has chosen not to attend; or

ii. the conduct of the person is such that the continuation of the proceedings in his or her presence is impracticable and the court has ordered him or her to be removed and the trial to proceed in his or her absence;

i. to be tried in a language that the person understands or, if that is not practicable, to have the proceedings interpreted in such a language at State expense;

j. to remain silent, not to testify during the proceedings, and not to be compelled to give self-incriminating evidence, and not to have adverse inference drawn from the exercise of any of these rights;

k. not to have unlawfully obtained evidence adduced against him or her unless the interests of justice require it to be admitted;

l. to call witnesses and present evidence, and to challenge evidence presented against him or her;

m. to a copy of the record of proceedings within a reasonable period of time and on payment of a reasonably prescribed fee;

n. to the benefit of the least severe of the prescribed punishments if the prescribed punishment for the offence has been changed between the time the offence was committed and the time of sentencing; and

o. of appeal to, or review by, a higher court.

3. Whenever this section requires information to be given to a person, that information must be given as simply and clearly as practicable, in a language that the person understands.

4. A law is not inconsistent with subsection (1)(b) to the extent that ita. authorises a court to try a member of a disciplined force for a criminal offence despite his or her trial and conviction or acquittal under a disciplinary law; and b. requires the court, in passing sentence, to take into account any punishment awarded against the member under the disciplinary law.

26. Access to courts or tribunals

1. Every person charged with an offence has the right to a fair trial before a court of law.

2. Every party to a civil dispute has the right to have the matter determined by a court of law or if appropriate, by an independent and impartial tribunal.

3. Every person charged with an offence and every party to a civil dispute has the right to have the case determined within a reasonable time.

4. The hearings of courts (other than military courts) and tribunals established by law must be open to the public unless the interests of justice require otherwise.

5. Subsection (4) does not prevent-

a. the making of laws relating to the trials of children, or to the determination of family or domestic disputes, in a closed court; or

b. the exclusion by a court or tribunal from particular proceedings (except the announcement of the decision of the court or tribunal) of a person other than parties and their legal representatives if a law empowers it to do so in the interests of justice, public morality, the welfare of children, personal privacy, national security, public safety or public order.

6. Every person charged with an offence, every party to civil proceedings, and every witness in criminal or civil proceedings has the right to give evidence and to be questioned in a language that he or she understands.

7. Every person charged with an offence and every party to civil proceedings has the right to follow the proceedings in a language that he or she understands.

8. To give effect to the rights referred to in subsections (6) and (7), the court or tribunal concerned must, when the interests of justice so require, provide, without cost to the person concerned, the services of an interpreter or of a person competent sign language.

9. If a child is called as a witness in criminal proceedings, arrangements for the taking of the child's evidence must have due regard to the child's age.

10. The State, through law and other measures, must provide legal aid through the Legal Aid Commission to those who cannot afford to pursue justice on the strength of their own resources, if injustice would otherwise result.

11. If any fee is required to access a court or tribunal, it must be reasonable and must not impede access to justice.

12. In any proceedings, evidence obtained in a manner that infringes any right in this Chapter, or any other law, must be excluded unless the interests of justice require it to be admitted.

~~16. Executive and administrative justice~~

~~1. Subject to the provisions of this Constitution and such other limitations as may be prescribed by law-~~

~~a. every person has the right to executive or administrative action that is lawful, rational, proportionate, procedurally fair, and reasonably prompt;~~

~~b. every person who has been adversely affected by any executive or administrative action has the right to be given written reasons for the action; and~~

~~c. any executive or administrative action may be reviewed by a court, or if appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal, in accordance with law.~~

~~2. The rights mentioned in subsection (1) shall not be exercised against any company registered under a law governing companies.~~

~~3. This section shall not have retrospective effect, and shall only apply to executive and administrative actions taken after the first sitting of the first Parliament elected under this Constitution.~~

27. Freedom of speech, expression and publication

1. Every person has the right to freedom of speech, expression, thought, opinion and publication, which includes

c. advocacy of hatred that

i. is based on any prohibited ground of discrimination listed or prescribed under section 26; and

ii. constitutes incitement to cause harm.

3. To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights and freedoms mentioned in subsection (1) in the interests of a. national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections;

b. the protection or maintenance of the reputation, privacy, dignity, rights or freedoms of other persons, including-

i. the right to be free from hate speech, whether directed against individuals or groups; and

ii. the rights of persons injured by inaccurate or offensive media reports to have a correction published on reasonable conditions established by law;

c. preventing the disclosure, as appropriate, of information received in confidence;

d. preventing attacks on the dignity of individuals, groups of individuals or respected offices or institutions in a manner likely to promote ill will between ethnic or religious groups or the oppression of, or discrimination against, any person or group of persons;

e. maintaining the authority and independence of the courts;

f. imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices;

g. regulating the technical administration of telecommunications; or

h. making provisions for the enforcement of media standards and providing for the regulation, registration and conduct of media organisations.

4. In this section, "hate speech" means an expression in whatever form that encourages, or has the effect of encouraging discrimination on a ground listed or prescribed under section 26.

28. Freedom of assembly

1. Every person has the right, peaceably and unarmed, to assemble, demonstrate, picket and to present petitions.

2. To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right mentioned in subsection (1)-

a. in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections;

b. for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others; or

c. for the purpose of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices.

29. Freedom of association

1. Every person has the right to freedom of association.

2. A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the right mentioned in subsection (1)-

a. in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections;

b. for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others;

c. for the purpose of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices;

d. for the purpose of regulating trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of employers;
e. for the purposes of regulating collective bargaining processes, providing mechanisms for the resolution of employment disputes and grievances, and regulating strikes and lockouts; or

f. for the purpose of regulating essential services and industries, in the overall interests of the Fijian economy and the citizens of Fiji.

30. Employment relations

1. Every person has the right to fair employment practices, including humane treatment and proper working conditions.

2. Every worker has the right to association and form or join a trade union, and participate in its activities and programmes.

3. Every employer has the right to form or join an employer's' organisation, and to participate in its activities and programmes.

4. Trade unions and employers have the right to bargain collectively.

5. A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights mentioned in this section

a. in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections;

b. for the purposes of protecting the rights and freedoms of others;

c. for the purposes of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices;

d. for the purposes of regulating trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of trade unions, or any federation, congress, council or affiliation of employers;
e. for the purposes of regulating collective bargaining processes, providing mechanisms for the resolution of employment disputes and grievances, and regulating strikes and lockouts; or

f. for the purposes of regulating essential services and industries, in the overall interests of the Fijian economy and the citizens of Fiji.

31. Freedom of movement and residence

1. Every person has the right to freedom of movement.

2. Every citizen has the right to apply for and be issued a passport or similar travel document, in accordance with any condition prescribed by written law.

3. Every citizen, and every other person lawfully in Fiji, has the right to move freely throughout Fiji and the right to leave Fiji.

4. Every citizen, and every other person who has a right to reside in Fiji, has the right to reside in any part of Fiji.

5. Every person who is not a citizen but is lawfully in Fiji has the right not to be expelled from Fiji except pursuant to an order of a court or a decision of the Minister responsible for immigration on a ground prescribed by law.

6. A law, or anything done under the authority of a law, is not inconsistent with the rights granted by this section to the extent that the law

a. provides for the detention of the person or enables a restraint to be placed on the person's movements, whether

i. for the purpose of ensuring his or her appearance before a court for trial or other proceedings;

ii. in consequence of his or her conviction for an offence; or

iii. for the purpose of protecting another person from apprehended violence;

b. provides for a person who is a non-citizen to be detained or restrained as a consequence of his or her arrival in Fiji without the prescribed entry documentation;

c. provides for the extradition, on the order of the High Court, of a person from Fiji;

d. provides for the removal from Fiji, on the order of the High Court, of any child who had previously been unlawfully removed from another country, for the purpose of restoring the child to the lawful custody of his or her parent or lawful guardian;

e. provides for the removal from Fiji of a person who is not a citizen for the purpose of enabling the person to serve a sentence of imprisonment in the country of the person's citizenship in relation to a criminal offence of which he or she has been convicted in Fiji; or

f. regulates, controls or prohibits the entry of persons on to land or property owned or occupied by others.

7. To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights mentioned in this section -

a. in the interests of national security, public safety, public order, public morality, public health or the orderly conduct of elections;

b. for the purpose of protecting the rights and freedoms of others;

c. for the purpose of protecting the ecology of any area;

d. for the purpose of imposing a restriction on the person that is reasonably required to secure the fulfilment of an obligation imposed on the person by law; or

e. for the purpose of imposing reasonable restrictions on the holders of public offices as part of the terms and conditions of their employment.

8. Section 9(3) and (4) apply to a person whose right to freedom of movement is restricted pursuant to a measure authorised under a state of emergency in the same way as they apply to a person detained pursuant to such a measure.

32. Freedom of religion, conscience and belief

1. Every person has the right to freedom of religion, conscience and belief.

2. Every person has the right, either individually or in community with others, in private or in public, to manifest and practise their religion or belief in worship, observance, practice or teaching.

3. Every person has the right not to be compelled to

a. act in any manner that is contrary to the person's religion or belief; or

b. take an oath, or take an oath in a manner, that-

i. is contrary to the person's religion or belief; or

ii. requires the person to express a belief that the person does not hold.

4. Every religious community or denomination, and every cultural or social community, has the right to establish, maintain and manage places of education whether or not it receives financial assistance from the State, provided that the educational institution maintains ~~any~~ standards prescribed by law.

5. In exercising its rights under subsection (4), a religious community or denomination has the right to provide religious instruction as part of any education that it provides, whether or not it receives financial assistance from the State for the provision of that education. Provided, that all foreign financial contributions to any school must be first approved by government.

6. Except with his or her consent or, in the case of a child, the consent of a parent or lawful guardian, a person attending a place of education is not required to receive religious instruction or to take part in or attend a religious ceremony or observance if the instruction, ceremony or observance relates to a religion that is not his or her own or if he or she does not hold any religious belief.

7. To the extent that it is necessary, the rights and freedoms set out in this section may be made subject to such limitations prescribed by law-

a. to protect

i. the rights and freedoms of other persons; ~~or~~ and

ii. and promote peace, tolerance, national values and public safety, public order, public morality or public health; or

b. to prevent public nuisance.

33. Political rights

1. Every citizen has the freedom to make political choices, and the right to-

a. form or join a political party;

b. participate in the activities of, or recruit members for, a political party; and

c. campaign for a political party, candidate or cause.

2. Every citizen has the right to free, fair and regular elections for any elective institution or office established under this Constitution.

3. Every citizen who has reached the age of ~~18~~ 21 years has the right

a. to be registered as a voter;

b. to vote by secret ballot in any election or referendum under this Constitution;

c. to be a candidate for public office, or office within a political party of which the citizen is a member, subject to satisfying any qualifications for such an office; and

d. if elected, to hold office.

4. A law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights mentioned in this section

a. for the purpose of regulating the registration of voters, and prescribing persons who do not have or have ceased to have the right to be registered as a voter;

b. for the purpose of regulating the registration of political parties and prescribing persons who do not have the rights prescribed under subsection (1) and subsection (3)(c) and (d);

c. for the purpose of regulating persons who are not eligible to contest for a place in Parliament or in a public office, or an office within a political party; or

d. for the purpose of imposing restrictions on the holders of public offices (as defined in any such law) from the rights set out in this section.

34. Right to privacy

1. Every person has the right to personal privacy, which includes the right to

a. confidentiality of their personal information;

b. confidentiality of their communications; and

c. respect for their private and family life.

2. To the extent that it is necessary, a law may not limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in subsection (1).

35. Access to information

1. Every person has the right of access to

a. information held by any public office; and

b. information held by another person, institution or body and required for the exercise or protection of any legal right.

2. Every person has the right to the correction or deletion of false or misleading information that affects that person.

3. To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in subsection (1), and may regulate the procedure under which information held by a public office may be made available.

36. Right to equality and freedom from discrimination

1. Every person is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection, treatment and benefit of the law.

2. Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms recognised in this Chapter or any other written law.

3. A person must not be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly on the grounds of his or her-

a. actual or supposed personal characteristics or circumstances, including race, culture, ethnic or social origin, colour, place of origin, sex, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression, birth, primary language, economic or social or health status, disability, age, religion, conscience, marital status or pregnancy; or

b. opinions or beliefs, except to the extent that those opinions or beliefs involve harm to others or the diminution of the rights or freedoms of others, or on any other ground prohibited by this Constitution.

4. A law or an administrative action taken under a law may not directly or indirectly impose a limitation or restriction on any person on a prohibited ground.

5. Every person has the right of access, membership or admission, without discrimination on a prohibited ground, to shops, hotels, lodging-houses, public restaurants, places of public entertainment, clubs, education institutions, public transportation services, taxis and public places.

6. The proprietor of a place or service referred to in subsection (5) must facilitate reasonable access for persons with disabilities to the extent prescribed by law.

7. Treating one person differently from another on any of the grounds prescribed under subsection (3) is discrimination, unless it can be established that the difference in treatment is not unfair in the circumstances.

8. A law, or an administrative action taken under a law, is not inconsistent with the rights mentioned in this section on the ground that it

a. appropriates revenues or other moneys for particular purposes;

b. imposes a retirement age on a person;

c. imposes a restriction on persons employed or engaged in a State service, or confers on them a privilege or advantage not imposed or conferred on other persons;

d. imposes restrictions on persons who are not citizens, or confers on them a privilege or advantage, not imposed or conferred on citizens;

e. makes provision with respect to adoption, marriage, devolution of property on death, and pension; f. excludes persons from holding certain public offices; or

g. to the extent necessary and without infringing the rights or freedoms set out in any other section of this Chapter, gives effect to the communal ownership of iTaukei, Rotuman and Banaban lands and access to marine resources, or the bestowing of iTaukei, Rotuman and Banaban chiefly title or rank.

37. Freedom from compulsory or arbitrary acquisition of property

1. Every person has the right not to be deprived of his/her property by the State other than in accordance with a written law referred to in subsection (2), and no law may permit arbitrary acquisition or expropriation of any interest in any property. Property or interest in property in this section also include intellectual property rights, traditional knowledge and traditional cultural expressions and genetic resources.

2. A written law may authorise compulsory acquisition of property

a. when necessary for a public purpose; and

b. on the basis that the owner will be promptly paid the agreed compensation for the property, or failing agreement, just and equitable compensation as determined by a court or tribunal, after considering all relevant factors, including

i. the public purpose for which the property is being acquired;

ii. the history of its acquisition by the owner;

iii. the market value of the property;

iv. the interests of any person affected by the acquisition; and

v. any hardship to the owner.

3. Nothing contained in, or done under the authority of, a law is inconsistent with this section to the extent that the law makes provision for the acquisition of property by way of -

a. taxation;

b. sequestration of bankrupt estates;

c. confiscation of the proceeds of crime;

d. penalty for breach of the law;

e. satisfaction of a mortgage, charge or lien; or

f. execution of a judgment of a court or tribunal.

38. Rights of ownership and protection of iTaukei, Rotuman and Banaban lands and resources

1. The ownership of all ~~iTaukei~~ native land, minerals and other resources, including genetic resources shall remain with the customary owners of that land and ~~iTaukei~~ native land shall not be permanently alienated, whether by sale, grant, transfer or exchange, except to the State ~~in accordance with section 27~~ for public purpose. Native land under this section means, lands, minerals and other resources, including genetic resources. Native land include the land and seas with all its resources, including from the high water mark to the territorial sea now vesting with government for public access purpose only, and not for business or research purpose, when native land and fisheries owners will have to be first consulted for their prior informed consent.

2. Any iTaukei land acquired by the State for a public purpose after the commencement of this Constitution ~~under section 27~~ or under any written law shall revert to the customary owners if the land is no longer required by the State.

3. The ownership of all Rotuman land shall remain with the customary owners of that land and Rotuman land shall not be permanently alienated, whether by sale, grant, transfer or exchange, except to the State ~~in accordance with section 27~~ for public purpose. Native land under this section means, lands, minerals and other resources, including genetic resources. Native land include the land and seas with all its resources, including from the high water mark to the territorial sea now vesting with government for public access purpose only and not for business or research purpose, when native land and fisheries owners will have to be first consulted for their prior informed consent.

4. Any Rotuman land acquired by the State for a public purpose after the commencement of this Constitution ~~under section 27~~ or under any written law shall revert to the customary owners if the land is no longer required by the State.

5. The ownership of all Banaban land shall remain with the customary owners of that land and Banaban land shall not be permanently alienated, whether by sale, grant, transfer or exchange, except to the State ~~in accordance with section 27~~ for public purpose. Native land under this section means, lands, minerals and other resources, including genetic resources. Native land include the land and seas with all its resources from the high water mark to the territorial sea now vesting with government for public access purpose and not for any business or research purpose, which native land and fisheries owners will have to be first consulted for their prior informed consent.

6. Any Banaban land acquired by the State for a public purpose after the commencement of this Constitution under section 27 or under any written law shall revert to the customary owners if the land is no longer required by the State.

~~39. Protection of ownership and interests in land~~

~~1. All ownership of land, and all rights and interests in land leases and land tenancies that existed immediately before the commencement of this Constitution shall continue to exist under this Constitution.~~

~~2. No law shall be made to diminish or adversely affect the rights and interests in land leases and land tenancies, whether existing immediately before the commencement of this Constitution or made or issued after the commencement of this Constitution.~~

~~3. All land lessees and land tenants have the right not to have their land leases or land tenancies terminated other than in accordance with their land leases or land tenancies.~~

~~4. Parliament and Cabinet, through legislative and other measures, must ensure that all land leases and land tenancies provide a fair and equitable return to the landowners whilst protecting the rights of land lessees and land tenants, including security and protection of tenure of land leases and land tenancies and terms and conditions of land leases and land tenancies which must be just, fair and reasonable.~~

~~5. All land that existed as freehold land immediately before the commencement of this Constitution shall remain as freehold land even if it is sold or purchased, unless it is sold to the State or is acquired by the State for a public purpose under section 27.~~

~~6. For the purposes of this section-~~

~~• "land leases" or "land tenancies" includes sub-leases, sub-tenancies and tenancies-at-will, but shall not include leases, agreements or tenancies for any building, structure or dwelling, whether used for residential, commercial, industrial or for tourism purposes, and~~

~~shall not include any leases, agreements or tenancies for any fixture, equipment, plant or fittings on any land; and~~

~~• "land lessees" or "land tenants" includes sub-lessees, sub-tenants or tenants- at-will of land leases or land tenancies.~~

39. Right of landowners to fair share of royalties for extraction of minerals, businesses or leases

• Ownership of natural resources

1. All minerals in or under any land or water, are owned by the State, provided however, that the owners of any particular land (whether customary or freehold), or of any particular registered customary fishing rights shall be entitled to receive a fair share of royalties or other money paid to the State in respect of the grant by the State of rights to extract minerals from that land or the seabed in the area of those fishing rights. Fair share shall also include the percentage of business ownership or gross income after taxation from the businesses, lease and subleases.

2. A written law may determine the framework for calculating fair shares under subsection (1), taking into account all relevant factors, including the following a. any benefit that the owners received or may receive as a result of mineral exploration or exploitation;

b. the risk of environmental damage;

c. any legal obligation of the State to contribute to a fund to meet the cost of preventing, repairing or compensating for any environmental damage;

d. the cost to the State of administering exploration or exploitation rights; and

e. the appropriate contribution to the general revenue of the State to be made by any person granted exploration or exploitation rights.

40. Right to education

1. Every person has the right to-

• Access to higher education

a. early childhood education;

b. primary and secondary education; and

c. further education.

2. The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the right-

• Access to higher education

a. to free early childhood, primary, secondary and further education; and

• Free education

b. to education for persons who were unable to complete their primary and secondary education.

3. Conversational and contemporary ~~iTaukei~~ Fijian, Rotuman and Indo-Fijian ~~Hindi~~ languages shall be taught as ~~compulsory~~ subjects in all primary schools.

4. ~~The State may direct any educational institution to teach subjects pertaining to health, civic education and issues of national interest, and any educational institution must comply with any such directions made by the State.~~

~~5. In applying any right under this section, if the State claims that it does not have the resources to implement the right, it is the responsibility of the State to show that the resources are not available.~~

41. Right to economic participation

1. Every person has the right to full and free participation in the economic life of the State, which includes the right to choose their own work, trade, occupation, profession or other means of livelihood.

• Right to choose occupation

2. The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the rights recognised in subsection (1).

3. To the extent that it is necessary, a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in subsection (1).

42. Right to work and a just minimum wage

• Right to equal pay for work

• Right to reasonable standard of living

1. The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the right of every person to work and to a just and reasonable minimum wage.

2. In applying any right under this section, if the State or employer claims that it does not have the resources to implement the right, it is the responsibility of the State or employer to show that the resources are not available.

43. Right to reasonable access to transportation

1. The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the right of every person to have reasonable access to transportation.

2. In applying any right under this section, if the State claims that it does not have the resources to implement the right, it is the responsibility of the State to show that the resources are not available.

• Right to shelter 44. Right to housing and sanitation

1. The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the right of every person to accessible and adequate housing and sanitation.

2. In applying any right under this section, if the State claims that it does not have the resources to implement the right, it is the responsibility of the State to show that the resources are not available.

45. Right to adequate food and water

1. The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the right of every person to be free from hunger, to have adequate food of acceptable quality and to clean and safe water in adequate quantities.

2. In applying any right under this section, if the State claims that it does not have the resources to implement the right, it is the responsibility of the State to show that the resources are not available.

46. Right to social security schemes

1. The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the right of every person to social security schemes, whether private or public, for their support in times of need, including the right to such support from public resources if they are unable to support themselves and their dependents.

2. In applying any right under this section, if the State claims that it does not have the resources to implement the right, it is the responsibility of the State to show that the resources are not available.

• Right to health care

47. Right to health

1. The State must take reasonable measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of the right of every person to health, and to the conditions and facilities necessary to good health, and to health care services, including reproductive and mental health care.

2. A person must not be denied emergency medical treatment.

3. In applying any right under this section, if the State claims that it does not have the resources to implement the right, it is the responsibility of the State to show that the resources are not available.

48. Freedom from arbitrary evictions

1. Every person has the right to freedom from arbitrary evictions from his or her home or to have his or her home demolished, without an order of a court made after considering all the relevant circumstances.

2. No law may permit arbitrary evictions.

• Protection of environment

49. Environmental rights

1. Every person has the right to a clean and healthy environment, which includes the right to have the natural world protected for the benefit of present and future generations through legislative and other measures.

2. To the extent that it is necessary, a law or an administrative action taken under a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in this section. • Rights of children

50. Rights of children

1. Every child has the right to be provided and to receive parental, guardianship, custodial duties of care.

a. to be registered at or soon after birth, and to have a name and nationality;

b. to basic nutrition, clothing, shelter, sanitation and health care;

c. to family care, protection and guidance, which includes the equal responsibility of the child's parents to provide for the childi. whether or not the parents are, or have ever been, married to each other; and ii. whether or not the parents are living together, have lived together, or are separated;

d. to be protected from abuse, neglect, harmful beliefs and cultural practices, any form of violence, inhumane treatment and punishment, and hazardous or exploitative labour; and

• Limits on employment of children

e. not to be detained, except as a measure of last resort, and when detained, to be held-

• Privileges for juveniles in criminal process

i. only for such period of time as is necessary; and

ii. separate from adults, and in conditions that take account of the child's sex and age.

f. Except where reasonable and acceptable measures are taken not to harm the child in any way or form, but to properly discipline a child at home or in school, in case of inhumane treatment and punishment.

2. The best interests of a child are the primary consideration in every matter concerning the child.

• State support for the disabled

51. Rights of persons with disabilities

1. A person with any disability has the right

a. to reasonable access to all places, public transport and information;

b. to use sign language, Braille or other appropriate means of communication; and

c. to reasonable access to necessary materials, substances and devices relating to the person's disability.

2. A person with any disability has the right to reasonable adaptation of buildings, infrastructure, vehicles, working arrangements, rules, practices or procedures, to enable their full participation in society and the effective realisation of their rights.

3. To the extent that it is necessary, a law or an administrative action taken under a law may limit, or may authorise the limitation of, the rights set out in this section.

• Emergency provisions

52. Limitation of rights under states of emergency

1. Any law enacted or promulgated in consequence of a declaration of a state of emergency under this Constitution

a. may limit a right or freedom set out in this Chapter ~~(with the exception of the rights and freedoms set out in sections 8, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 22 and 26)~~ only to the extent that-

• International law

i. the limitation is strictly necessary and required by the emergency; and

ii. the law is consistent with Fiji's obligations under international law applicable to a state of emergency; and

b. takes effect only when it has been published in the Gazette.

2. A person detained under a law contemplated in subsection (1) retains all the rights recognised in this Chapter, subject only to the limitations referred to in subsection (1).

53. Enforcement

1. If a person considers that any of the provisions of this Chapter has been or is likely to be contravened in relation to him or her (or, in the case of a person who is detained, if another person considers that there has been, or is likely to be, a contravention in relation to the detained person), then that person (or the other person) may apply to the High Court for redress. • Protection from false imprisonment

2. The right to make application to the High Court under subsection (1) is without prejudice to any other action with respect to the matter that the person concerned may have.

3. The High Court has original jurisdictiona. to hear and determine applications under subsection (1); and b. to determine questions that are referred to it under subsection (5), and may make such orders and give such directions as it considers appropriate.

4. The High Court may exercise its discretion not to grant relief in relation to an application or referral made under this section if it considers that an adequate alternative remedy is available to the person concerned.

5. If in any proceedings in a subordinate court any question arises as to the contravention of any of the provisions of this Chapter, the member presiding in the proceedings may, and must if a party to the proceedings so requests, refer the question to the High Court unless, in the member's opinion (which is final and not subject to appeal), the raising of the question is frivolous or vexatious.

6. When the High Court gives its decision on a question referred to it under this section, the court in which the question arose must dispose of the case in accordance witha. the decision; or b. if the decision is the subject of appeal to the Court of Appeal or to the Supreme Court - the decision of the Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court, as the case may be.

7. The Attorney-General may, on behalf of the State, intervene in proceedings before the High Court that relate to a matter concerning a provision in this Chapter.

8. If the proceedings before the High Court relate to a matter concerning a provision of this Chapter, the High Court must not proceed to hear and determine the matter until it is satisfied that notice of the matter has been given to the Attorney-General and a reasonable time has elapsed since the giving of the notice for consideration by the Attorney-General of the question of intervention in the proceedings.

9. A notice under subsection (8) is not required to be given to the Attorney-General if the Attorney-General or the State is a party to the proceedings.

10. The Chief Justice may make rules for the purposes of this section with respect to the practice and procedure of the High Court (including rules with respect to the time within which applications are to be made to the High Court).

• Human rights commission

54. Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission

1. The Human Rights Commission established under the Human Rights Commission Decree 2009 continues in existence as the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission.

2. The Commission consists ofa. a chairperson, who must be a person who is or is qualified to be appointed as a judge; and b. 4 other members, appointed by the President on the advice of the Constitutional Offices Commission.

3. In advising the President as to the person to be appointed as chairperson or other members of the Commission, the Constitutional Offices Commission must have regard not only to their personal attributes but also to their knowledge or experience of the various aspects of matters likely to come before the Commission.

4. Subject to this Constitution, the Commission is responsible for

a. promoting the protection and observance of, and respect for, human rights in public and private institutions, and to develop a culture of human rights in Fiji;

b. the qualification requirements for appointment and the process to be followed for appointment, which must be an open, transparent and competitive selection process based on merit;

- Civil service recruitment

c. the salaries, benefits and allowances payable, in accordance with its budget as approved by Parliament; and

d. the total establishment or the total number of staff that are required to be appointed, in accordance with the budget as approved by Parliament.

Date: 9-7-2026

Sevuloni Valenitabua: ...and also, we might ask questions later on after you finish with your submissions. We have a lot of submissions; we have been around the country and we are just reaching out this week. Today is the second last day of submissions to be presented to us. Now with those few words, we only have one hour left, so I now open the floor to you. You may have the mic and give us your submissions. Thanks.

Nilesh Lal: Thank you very much Honourable Chair and members of the Commission. Very good afternoon. We appear before the Commission with a deep sense of responsibility, but also with serious reservations about the process through which this constitutional review is being conducted. We say at the outset that Fiji does need constitutional reform. The 2013 Constitution contains serious structural flaws which have contributed to the concentration of power and weakened independent institutions. But the legitimacy of constitutional reform does not come merely from the appointment of a Commission or from the holding of hearings.

It comes from a process that is transparent, participatory, deliberative and trusted by the people. On the test, the present process is deeply deficient. A constitution is not an ordinary law .It is the supreme legal and political compact or social contract that citizens have, ruled with the ruler. So it is a very important document. It defines the relationship between the citizens and the state.

It distributes public power, political power, protects rights and sets the rules by which political disagreement is managed. In divided societies like ours, the process by which a constitution is made is as important as the text itself. A flawed process can produce a constitution alright, but it will not produce constitutional legitimacy. Fiji knows this from painful experience. Since independence, Fiji has had four constitutions. And I think in this regard, we have become the laughingstock of the world.

And each of these constitutions have reflected the political conflicts and power struggles, power dynamics of their time. This recurring pattern has been, the recurring pattern that we've seen is that after every major power shift, the new regime that comes in, whether this has been through coups or elections, they've always treated constitutions as tools of political reset rather than as enduring frameworks for national stability. So people begin to see constitution as a panacea to Fiji's political and social problems.

It is not. You can have the best constitution in the world in terms of what's in the text, but if the culture underpinning the constitution is not conducive, then you are not going to be making, I mean, that is not going to lead to any positive outcomes. Now, this is why the present review process should have been designed with extraordinary care.

Instead, it is rushed, opaque, and insufficiently deliberative. A five-month process is simply not adequate for a proper and democratic national review of Fiji's supreme law. International comparative experience suggests that comprehensive constitutional reform requires careful sequencing, civic education, public consultation, transparent analysis, drafting, public feedback on draft proposals, and the final political settlement, whether it is through parliamentary approval or through a referendum.

The benchmark for comprehensive constitutional reform is around 18 to 24 months. South Africa's process took around two years, Tunisia's process was about two and a half years, and Kenya's was about 19 months. Fiji's own Reeves Commission process took approximately two years, while the Gai process, and at that time it was being criticized for being rushed, it took approximately one year, about 11 months to be exact.

Now, this commission is therefore presiding over what is the shortest major constitutional review in Fiji's history. This is definitely not a badge of efficiency, but it's a warning sign, and it should be of a lot of concern to anybody that is serious about democratic reform in this country. For any constitutional engineering process in an ethnically divided society, there are certain desired objectives that must be deliberated upon and finalized right at the outset.

Dialogue Fiji has not seen this CRC do that. The question therefore is, what is the objective of this constitutional review? What exactly does it seek to remedy? What is the problem that it tries to solve? If the objective is to merely cure the democratic deficit in the making of the 2013 constitution, then this process fails to achieve it. A rushed, opaque, and poorly documented review process cannot cure the democratic deficit of a constitution that itself was criticized for lacking popular approval.

It simply reproduces the same legitimacy problem in a different form. Constitutional engineering in ethnically divided societies aims to prevent conflict and secure democratic stability by structuring state institutions to accommodate, manage, or transcend ethnic differences. The ultimate goal is to foster political inclusion, ensure minority protection, and prevent the tyranny of the majority in deeply fragmented polities like ours.

There are a number of key objectives and strategies that are usually considered in such processes. First, power sharing or conventionalisms. This involves designing executive and state institutions in a way that includes representatives from all major ethnic groups.

This is often achieved through grand coalitions, proportional representation, mutual vetoes on vital cultural issues, and forms of segmented autonomy. Second, electoral engineering. This involves implementing voting systems such as list PR or list proportional representation that encourages politicians to appeal to voters outside their own ethnic group and increase the prospects of broader political inclusion.

A well-designed electoral system can incentivize moderation, inter-ethnic coalitions, and national political appeals. Third, decentralization of power. In Fiji's context, decentralization should not mean the creation of race-based or ethnically defined power structures.

That would risk entrenching the very divisions that constitutional reform should seek to manage and transcend. Instead, decentralization in the Fijian context should focus on strengthening elected local government, municipal councils, provincial-level democratic structures, and community-based decision-making. The objective should be to bring power closer to citizens, improve accountability and service delivery, deepen grassroots democracy, and ensure that communities have a meaningful say in decisions affecting their daily lives.

Fourth, minority rights and protections. This includes embedding an entrenched Bill of Rights, legal protections for minority communities, and institutions that can enforce these protections against the state and against majoritarian abuse. Fifth, cross-cutting cleavages.

Constitutional design can structure institutions in ways that blame strict ethnic identities by encouraging national parties, cross-regional alliances, and political competition around shared civic issues such as the economy, health, education, poverty, infrastructure, and public services, rather than ethnic identity alone. These tools are used to build unified nation-states in societies where ethnic division can otherwise become politically destabilizing and also devastating, I would say. But they require careful constitutional design.

They require public education, genuine deliberation, and clarity of purpose. In Fiji's case, the CRC has not clearly explained whether it is seeking to improve ethnic accommodation, strengthen national unity, reduce executive dominance, enhance institutional independence, reform the electoral system, or merely remedy the lack of legitimacy surrounding the making of the 2013 constitution. That absence of clarity is a serious weakness.

A constitutional review cannot be everything and nothing at the same time. Before asking people what they want changed, the process should have helped the country understand the constitutional problem it is trying to solve. We are aware of the argument that this is not a comprehensive review, but merely an amendment review.

That argument is not correct. If this was only an amendment review, the terms of reference would clearly identify the specific provisions of the 2013 constitution that were to be examined. And the commission would consult the public only on those identified provisions.

So, your terms of reference would say, okay, you need to go and consult the public on how section 99 of the constitution should be amended. That would be an amendment review. Instead, and then I suppose two months would be sufficient to review one particular provision and get sufficient public input.

Instead, the commission is inviting submissions on the constitution as a whole. That is in substance a comprehensive review. It should therefore meet the standards of a comprehensive process.

The Ghai Commission, despite operating under an unelected military-backed regime, set a much higher standard for transparency and participatory constitution making than what we are seeing now. Public hearings were conducted across the country in 2012, and more than 7,000 submissions were received, and all of these were published on a central website run by the commission. The Ghai process is widely acclaimed, not merely in Fiji, but also internationally, as an example of how constitution making consultations should be conducted.

Open, participatory, well-documented, accessible to citizens, and grounded in genuine public engagement. That history is precisely why this process should have gone further, not backwards. If the central criticism of the 2013 constitution is that it lacked popular legitimacy and disregarded the participatory Ghai process, then the corrective process cannot itself be opaque, rushed, and fully documented.

At minimum, this commission should have had a dedicated website from the beginning of the process. Every public submission, unless confidentiality was specifically requested for valid reasons, of course the reasons had to be validated by the commission, every submission should have been published. Hearings should have been live-streamed.

In 2026, this is much cheaper and easier to do than it was in 2012. Transcripts should have been made available. Citizens should have been able to go to one central public repository and see what individuals, organizations, political parties, traditional institutions, religious bodies, unions, business groups, women's groups, youth organizations, and minority communities were actually telling the commission.

Instead, what we are hearing is snippets of consultations that have been made through the media, and the media can also be selectively reporting. Public consultation requires notification, two-way exchange, and meaningful participation, not merely the formal receipt of views behind closed doors. The absence of a central public record weakens the entire exercise.

How will the public know whether the commission has fully assessed the submissions? How will citizens know which views were dominant, which were marginal, which were organized? And which represented genuine community sentiment? Has the commission released statistics on the number of submissions received? The categories of submitters?

The geographic spread of participation? The gender and age profile of participants? Or the issues most frequently raised? Without such information, the process cannot be properly evaluated. There is a claim made that this review is going to reflect what the people want. The people of Fiji are not a homogeneous entity.

Without a proper methodology, how can you systematically determine what the people want? The people are not a homogeneous group. So for these reasons, Dialogue Fiji was reluctant to participate in this process despite receiving two invitations. We did not wish to legitimize a process that we consider flawed.

However, we have ultimately decided to make this submission because Fiji's constitutional future is too important to abandon. We participated while placing on record our serious concerns that the process as presently designed is unlikely to cure the democratic deficit that has long surrounded the 2013 Constitution. Having said that, Dialogue Fiji does not support reckless constitutional change. The 2013 Constitution contains progressive features which should be retained. It abolished ethnic communal roles and reserved ethnic seats. Established a single national electoral role.

Adopted the principle of one person, one vote, one will, which is highly prized in the democratic world. And introduced an open, least proportional representation system, which happens to be the most popular electoral system in the entire world. Around 40% of countries globally have a form of least PR.

Of all the democratic states in the world, around 51%, if I'm not mistaken, have a form of proportional representation. Countries that are able to make political settlement on electoral system, they are shifting towards proportional representation from cruelty or majoritarian system. So it is one of the most progressive, yet one of the most misunderstood elements of the Constitution.

The 2013 Constitution also enhanced common and equal citizenry, declaring that all citizens of Fiji are Fijians. By nationality, of course, and that all citizens enjoy equal status under the Constitution. It established Fiji as a secular state, separated religion and state, abolished the unelected Senate, and placed legislative authority in a fully elected single House of Parliament.

These provisions are foundational features of a modern, multi-ethnic, liberal democracy. The principal weakness of the 2013 Constitution is not that it is too modern. The problem is that it combines progressive citizen equality with excessive executive power. It recognizes equal citizenship, but leaves independent institutions too vulnerable to political capture. It creates a comprehensive Bill of Rights, but allows rights to be limited through broad and open-ended clauses. It establishes Parliament, but allows legislation to be rushed through without adequate deliberation.

It provides for independent offices, but gives the executive too much influence over their appointment and removal. The central task of constitutional reform should therefore be clear. Retain the modern democratic foundations of the 2013 Constitution, while correcting the structural concentration of power. If there are recommendations to remove these modern democratic foundations of the 2013 Constitution, which by the way, are universal foundational principles, then we cannot call this a reform. We will probably have to call it a degrade or devising of the Constitution. Because reform, the definition of reform is making something better, not degrading it or making it worse.

The first major reform should be to redesign the Constitutional Offices Commission. Under the current structure, the COC is dominated by government-aligned members. The Prime Minister, the Attorney General and two Prime Minister nominees. The Leader of the Opposition and one Opposition nominee. This creates a 4 to 2 government-aligned majority, allowing the executive to shape the leadership of key worst-off institutions. That is a fundamental design flow.

Institutions such as the Electoral Commission, the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission, the Auditor General and other constitutional offices must not depend on a body structurally controlled by the government of the day. Dialogue Fiji proposes that the COC be reconstituted as a genuinely independent and balanced appointments body. It should include equal number of nominees from the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

But those nominees should not be current members of Parliament, political party office holders, recent candidates, failed candidates, ministerial advisors or persons who have held senior political office within the previous five years. In addition, the Fiji Law Society should nominate one member through an open process conducted by its council and one member should be nominated collectively by the vice-chancellors of Fiji's three universities. That nominee should be a senior academic of recognized standing in law, governance, public administration, political science, human rights, development studies or a related field and should not be a current member of Parliament, political party office holder, recent candidate, ministerial advisor or a person who has held senior political office within the last five years.

This would ensure that the COC benefits not only from legal expertise but also from independent academic knowledge of governance, institutions and democratic accountability. The chairperson of the COC should not be the Prime Minister. The chairperson should be an eminent, independent person, perhaps a retired judge or senior legal practitioner of high standing, appointed by consensus between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

If they cannot agree within 21 days, the Fiji Law Society should provide a short list of three eligible persons from which the President appoints the chair. That would move the COC away from executive control and towards constitutional guardianship. The Public Service Commission should also be constitutionally strengthened as the guardian of a professional, merit-based and politically neutral public service.

The Prime Minister's agreement should not be required for the appointment or removal of Permanent Secretaries. Permanent Secretaries must save the state, not the political executive of the day. Second, Fiji should retain the open list proportional representation system but reduce the electoral threshold from 5% to 2%.

The current electoral system has major democratic strengths. It eliminates ethnic roles, gives equal value to each vote and ensures that every voter participates in the same national electoral process. The single national constituency also discourages narrow regional or ethnic or communal appeals, rewards parties that campaign on issues of national interest rather than sectional interest, and completely removes the possibility of gerrymandering through the manipulation of constituency boundaries.

These are important gains which should not be reversed. However, the democratic value of proportional representation is weakened when the electoral threshold is set too high. The current 5% threshold, although it is not excessive by international standards, if you look at other jurisdictions, some of them have as high as 10% election threshold, although it is not excessive by international standards, but in the case of Fiji, I think there is evidence to suggest that it has proven to be excessive for a small, diverse and politically fragmented society.

It suppresses smaller parties, discourages new political movements and artificially concentrates representation in larger parties. A 2% threshold would preserve proportionality while preventing excessive fragmentation. It would also allow a genuine multi-party system to thrive.

That being said, with the next elections due in around 7 months time, it would not be prudent at all. In fact, it would be very irresponsible for this commission to suggest a change to the electoral system at this point or for the next elections. Instead, the commission could make suggestions that this would apply for the second election after the new constitution or the amended constitution comes into effect. It should not apply to the next constitution. The campaign period has also started, so the game has already begun. You cannot be changing rules midway.

That would be scandalous in fact. If you look at what the international principles are, the Venice Commission Principles on Good Practices in Electoral Matters, it is the go-to document and it says that no major changes to the electoral system or electoral rules even should be made within 12 months of an election. It is going to create a very uneven electoral playing field.

It is going to seriously disadvantage players, electoral players. Political parties should be constitutionally encouraged but not compared as a condition of contesting elections to ensure meaningful gender balance in their candidate list. The constitution should require any system of public funding.

We have been saying for quite some time that there should be public funding given to political parties. So, this system of public funding for political parties should determine on this criteria whereby they need to have gender equality within the party. And this should include incentives for parties. It should require parties to have at least 40% representation of either gender in their candidate list for them to be able to access this public funding. This would promote women's political participation without excluding parties from the democratic process. Placing this principle in the constitution would ensure that a future parliamentary majority cannot easily remove gender equality incentives through ordinary legislation.

Third, the size of cabinet should be constitutionally kept. Under Section 91, Subsection 1, the Prime Minister has sole authority to determine the size of cabinet. While the Ghai draft proposed a cabinet kept of 15 members.

Dialogue Fiji supports a constitutional kept of 15 ministers including the Prime Minister and Attorney General if the Attorney General is a cabinet minister. This would prevent executive blout and reduce the use of ministerial appointments as instruments of political re-order. The constitution should also require cabinet to reflect as far as practicable Fiji's gender, cultural, ethnic and regional diversity.

A government that represents a multi-ethnic country must be seen to draw leadership from the full breadth of the country. If the composition of parliament makes this impossible, the constitution should permit the Prime Minister to appoint up to 5 ministers from outside parliament. But only for the purpose of satisfying diversity, expertise or inclusion requirements.

Such ministers should be subject to parliamentary confirmation, should have the right to speak in parliament on matters within their portfolios. But they should not be given the privilege or the right to vote. They should also be bound by the same standards of accountability, assert declaration, conflict of interest rules and parliamentary questioning as elected ministers.

There should also be a constitutional term limit for the office of Prime Minister. No person should be permitted to serve as Prime Minister for more than two parliamentary terms, whether consecutive or non-consecutive. This would prevent excessive personalization of executive or political power, encourage leadership renewal and reduce the risk of one individual dominating the state over an extended period.

Fourth, the Bill of Rights should be retained but strengthened. The 2013 constitution has a comprehensive rights framework. But section 6, subsection 5 C allows rights to be limited by restrictions that are not expressly set out in the text, provided they are necessary and prescribed.

And this is why the rights that are contained in the current constitution are not really guaranteed as they can be limited by ordinary legislation. So this of course creates a very broad opening, too broad an opening for the state to limit rights. The constitution should codify instead a strict proportionality test.

Any limitation of a right must be reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society, based on human dignity, equality and freedom. The state must bear the burden of proof. It must show that the limitation pursues a legitimate objective.

Is rationally connected to that objective impairs the right as little as possible. So, the least required restriction. And that there are no less restrictive means available to achieve the same purpose.

The constitution should also recognize access to information as a directly enforceable constitutional right. Not merely as a right dependent on future legislation, as is the case now. Citizens cannot hold power to account if they cannot access information held by the state.

Fifth, judicial independence must be strengthened. Unlike under the 2013 constitution, the prime minister advises the president on the appointment of a chief justice and the president of the court of appeal after consulting only his attorney general. There is no requirement to consult the leader of the opposition.

This is in the record. The appointment of the chief justice should be made through an independent COC or a strengthened and independent judicial services commission. With public advertisement, transparent criteria, merit-based assessment and cross-party consultation.

The constitution should also close the dangerous loophole that currently exists relating to suspension of the chief justice. The 2013 constitution allows the prime minister to advise suspension pending a tribunal investigation, but does not specify a deadline for the tribunal to convene.

This creates the possibility of an indefinite suspension, which can operate as a removal in all but name.

The constitution should require that where the chief justice is suspended, the tribunal must be constituted and convened within seven days, and must complete its work within a prescribed period unless extended by the Supreme Court for exceptional reasons. Sixth, Fiji should retain a unicameral parliament. There is no democratic justification for restoring an unelected senate with low-making powers.

Law should be made by representatives directly elected by the people. In fact, this is a very important democratic principle that low-making should strictly remain the domain of elected representatives, not unelected entities. The 2013 constitution correctly abolished the unelected senate and established a fully elected single house of parliament.

If Fiji wishes to strengthen legislative scrutiny, the answer is not to create another chamber of unelected legislators. The answer is to strengthen parliamentary committees, improve public consultation on bills, resource the opposition, and create constitutional safeguards against arrest, low-making. The current four-year parliamentary term and election cycle should be retained.

A three-year term provides insufficient time for governments to develop and implement medium- to long-term policies, while a five-year term risks weakening democratic accountability by keeping voters too far away from the next opportunity to renew or withdraw their mandate. A four-year term strikes the appropriate balance between governmental stability and regular democratic accountability and remains the appropriate model for a parliamentary democracy such as Fiji. In fact, more and more democratic countries the world over that are exemplary liberal democracies are adopting four-year terms.

So that is what the shift is towards globally. The public accounts committee should be constitutionally recognized as a central instrument of parliamentary oversight and should be chaired by an opposition member of parliament, preferably the shadow minister for finance. Fiji's parliamentary practice traditionally provided for an opposition member of parliament to chair the public accounts committee, but this was altered in 2016 to allow a government-backed bencher to chair the committee.

That change weakened the oversight function of parliament. The PEC examines how public money is spent, and its work should therefore be led by a member who is institutionally independent of the executive. Comparative commonwealth practice strongly supports opposition leadership of the PEC.

Restoring this principle would strengthen scrutiny of public expenditure, reinforce executive accountability, reduce executive impunity, I would say, and align Fiji's parliament with good parliamentary practice. The speaker should also be constitutionally protected as an independent guardian of parliament, not as an extension of the government majority. The speaker should be elected by a supermajority of parliament, perhaps two-third supermajority, and should be required to act with strict neutrality.

Seventh, the constitution should impose strict safeguards on the expedited passage of legislation. The current framework allows ordinary parliamentary majorities to bypass normal deliberation. The Ghai draft required a much higher supermajority.

In fact, it required two-thirds of members of parliament to agree before deliberation could be bypassed, before provision like the Standing Order 51 could be invoked. Now, Dialogue Fiji proposes that any use of agent procedures, including procedures similar to Standing Order 51, should require two-thirds parliamentary majority, except narrowly defined emergencies such as natural disasters, war, public health emergencies, or agent fiscal measures certified by an independent authority. Even then, the use of expedited procedures should be time-limited, justified in writing, and subject to post-enactment committee review.

Democratic lawmaking requires that citizens who will ultimately be subject to the law must have a meaningful opportunity to understand and influence the law. So that is a fundamental requirement of democratic governance. People that would be subject to that law need to have a hand in formulating that law.

And it is mechanisms like Standing Order 51 which totally frustrates them. The constitution should create a citizen's petition mechanism adopted from the participatory spirit of the Ghai draft, which allowed constitutional amendments to be proposed by a petition signed by at least 1,000 citizens. And this should not just be restricted to constitutional amendments. It should be on any matter. So if 1,000 citizens sign a petition, report it to Parliament, the Parliament should become obliged to address that particular issue. And that is democracy at play.

Citizens should be able to petition Parliament to consider an issue of national importance or of importance to them locally, review an existing law, or initiate discussion on proposed legislation. Once a petition reaches a defined threshold, Parliament should be required to refer it to the relevant Standing Committee for public hearings in a report within a fixed period where it reaches a higher threshold. Parliament should be required to schedule a full debate.

This would not allow citizens to bypass Parliament or make laws directly, but it would ensure that Parliament cannot simply ignore issues that have significant public support or significant public interest. Finally, there are foundational values in the 2013 constitution which should be treated as sacrosanct or sacred. Fiji must remain a secular state.

In a multi-religious society, secularism is not hostility to religion. It is the only fair basis on which the state can treat all religions equally and protect freedom of conscience for every citizen. The constitution must also retain equal citizenry.

In fact, one of the foundational principles of democracy is equality. So if you don't have equality, you can't have democracy. There can be no return to constitutional arrangements that classify citizens into different political categories based on race or ethnicity.

The label Fijian is the common nationality of all citizens should be retained. Much of the debate around this issue confuses nationality with ethnicity. People just don't know the difference between nationality and ethnicity.

Ethnicity refers to ancestry, culture, language, customs and communal identity. Nationality refers to legal and political membership of the state. A person may be Itaukei by ethnicity and Fijian by nationality. A person may be Indo-Fijian by ethnicity and Fijian by nationality. These are not contradictory identities. They operate at different levels.

So there is a very fundamental difference between nationality and ethnicity that needs to be understood by people. Also, replacing Fijian with Fiji Islander would be a downgrade. The proud name of our country is Fiji. We are the Republic of Fiji. We are not the Republic of Fiji Islands. The name of the country is not Fiji Islands.

Fiji carries dignity and authority. It reflects maturity as an independent nation, a proud nation. Colonial era naming, which was where Fiji Islands came from, often emphasized geography because territories were viewed as possessions or collections of islands.

So Fiji is not Fiji Islands. It refers to a collection of islands. Independent states, by contrast, increasingly adopt names that reflect nationhood rather than geography. Citizens of France are French. Citizens of India are Indian regardless of ethnicity. Citizens of Australia are Australian.

And citizens of Fiji should be Fijian. The common national identity does not erase indigenous identity. The iTaukei people remain the indigenous people of Fiji with their distinct culture, language, institutions and land rights.

But the state must have one equal civic identity for all its citizens. In conclusion, Dialogue Fiji urges the commission to recognize that Fiji's problem is not simply the text of the constitution. It is the system of power around it.

The 2013 constitution contains progressive and modern features, but it also embeds structural vulnerabilities that enable excessive concentration of power. Reform should therefore be principled, should be careful and it should be democratic in nature. Otherwise, as I've said, it can't be reformed in a democratic nation.

It should not become another episode in Fiji's long history of constitutional change driven by those who happen to be in power at that time. If this review is to have legitimacy, the commission must immediately improve the process. Although I suppose that it's rather too late for that, but I had publicly expressed that these are shortcomings in the process, but unfortunately I didn't see any effort being made to address some of those concerns that were raised.

The commission should publish all submissions, release participation statistics, which it can still do, live stream future hearings if they do happen, issue thematic consultation papers, allow public comment on draft recommendations, and explain how competing views will be assessed. Without that transparency, the final report will struggle to command trust. Fiji does not need another constitution that one side celebrates and another side rejects, which will be the case if we do it through a process that is not truly participatory, that does not have the trust of everybody across the political divide, across the ethnic divide, which unfortunately has been the case until now.

We need a constitutional settlement that is modern, democratic, inclusive, rights protecting, and institutionally balanced. We need a constitution that limits power. Not one that merely transfers power from one political group to another. Above all, we need a constitution that belongs to the people of Fiji. Thank you very much. Thank you for your submission.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank You Dialogue Fiji. Normally, we give time to the commissioners to comment or ask questions in relation to submissions which are presented to us by submitters. So, I will now ask the commissioners if they have any comments in relation to your submissions or any questions. Commissioners? Commissioner Nailatikau

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Mr. Lal and colleagues of Dialogue Fiji. In the interest of time, I will do my best to keep things brief. Just a comment as well as a question. I would welcome your clarification and expansion on your thinking. I thank you for the entirety of your submission. I think it's important that cautionary voices and reservations be expressed transparently and directly, which is what you've done. The process is fundamental to the legitimacy of any outcome in a democratic society. And I see that as an expression of not only your care and concern, but your exercise of your right to express that to us.

You may be comforted to know that some of the items of action that you've mentioned in your closing around the publication of submissions and statistics is something that has been of great relevance to our discussions internally. And it's something that we have plans to progress in alignment with our gazetted terms of reference, as you would have seen. So I thank you for raising that.

And it's certainly something that not only will be considered, but that we intend to progress on. My question relates to your submission relating to the single constituency or the open voting electoral system as it is. We've heard many submissions expressing the importance of having some form of local accountability between elected representatives and their constituents, for example, whatever those geographical or location boundaries might be.

And we're also hearing from you, correct, feel free to correct me about the importance of maintaining an openness in terms of national accountability versus smaller, narrower groupings of accountability, if I've heard you correctly. I just welcome your expansion in terms of the thought process around that, because by and large, a lot of the submissions have expressed a need for some form of local accountability. So just welcome your thoughts on that.

Mr. Lal : Thank you. Yes. So when electoral system design is done, it is important to note that there are always tradeoffs.

No electoral system is perfect. So what is desirable for an ethnically divided society? So when you're doing electoral engineering, that becomes the key consideration. What do you want? Do you want to have a unified citizenry or do you want to have an electoral system that rewards those that have very narrow appeals? So for instance, under constituency by system, if somebody knows that, okay, this particular area is dominated by one particular ethnic group, and I think it is the worst kept secret that people of Fiji always vote on ethnic lines.

So all that a candidate needs to do in order to win in that particular constituency is to have a very narrow ethnic appeal. So when you have an electoral system that rewards that kind of politics, you can never bring about a shift from race-based politics, which has been plaguing this country from independence, towards an ideology-based politics. And that is a shift that we need to bring about.

So whilst people might say that, okay, one of the drawbacks, one of the tradeoffs of the current system is that it weakens that MP to voters link, because it does not have local MPs. You look at what are the gains that we get in terms of having a national constituency. The other major gain is gerrymandering, which is the manipulation of constitutional boundaries.

In a country where you have political capture of every institution, when you will have the incumbent party that would be appointing the constitutional services boundary, they will be drawing boundaries, constitutional boundaries. They can draw boundaries in such a way that will always benefit the incumbent party. In a society where you have people voting on ethnic lines, and you know how people are concentrated, how they have settled, you have an area that is perhaps dominated by iTaukei's or Indo-Fijians in another area, you draw boundaries in such a way that one group will always have advantages.

And so that's why gerrymandering is something that is always, the scope for that always needs to be minimized when you talk about electoral engineering. So there are so many advantages to having a single national constituency. The only drawback is that it weakens the MP to vote-tallying, and that is acceptable to some extent.

But the right remedy would be by establishing local structures, local government structures. So you have local government operating at that level, and then you have your parliament, which in fact has the major objective of making laws that apply to the nation, national policies, that is elected from a single national constituency. That would make sense. But it has to be complemented by local government structures, elected local governments. Not just for urban centers, municipal councils, but also for rural areas. I mean, if you look at how India has modernized their panchayat system, this is a very, very interesting case study.

In fact, I've written an article on that, how it can be used in Fiji as well. So the panchayat system is a traditional governance system, but they've modernized it. It is now democratic.

So the panchayat leaders are voted upon, and that system is working really well in India at the moment. So these are some of the reforms that should be considered. No, electoral engineering is one of the most technical areas of political science.

And when it comes to electoral system design, people need to understand and do a very systematic cost-benefit analysis of what are the pros and cons of that, of a particular element of an electoral system.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Mr. Lal. I'll give this time to my fellow commissioners.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Chair. Thank you, Mr. Lal and colleagues from Dialogue Fiji for your submission this afternoon. I just have three quick questions. For number 29, you talk about the 2% threshold reduction from current 5%. And I'm sure you do understand that's a 60% reduction. Okay. And then you talk about excessive fragmentation. Wouldn't the 2% actually lead to a fragmentation? I haven't talked about excessive fragmentation. Let me read it for you. Prevent excessive fragmentation. Let me read it to you.

Mr. Lal: Yes, it can create fragmentation. But in the case of Fiji, if you analyze the data from the last elections, you will see that it is not going to lead to a situation where it is going to create excessive fragmentation. The empirical data is very clear. It is definitely not going to lead to excessive fragmentation. But you are correct in pointing out that it will not necessarily prevent excessive fragmentation. But this proposal, as I mentioned, is very Fiji-specific. Thank you.

Dr. Gounder: You've answered that. Yeah. Okay. I can show you my data, which shows it will create fragmentation. Just for another day. The other point I want to get clarity on is you talk about larger parties and smaller parties. How are you defining large and small parties? Is there any definition you are using in this case to make your argument?

Mr. Lal: Well, in elections literature, it normally relates to the electoral share of parties. What if a party is not in parliament at the moment? How do you define whether the party outside parliament is a large or small party? Well, we know that from the electoral share. They might not be in parliament, but they will have a particular electoral share, which is the number of votes that they received in the last elections. What if it's a new party? Well, we won't be able to classify a new party until they are contested in an election. Yeah, but I haven't coined those phrases. They are extensively used in political science literature, and it is tied to the electoral share. That is the definition. Okay.

Dr. Gounder: Just one quick one. We take your point about the process. If we take everything that's in here, that you submitted today, would you be happy with the outcome, although you have disagreed with the process?

Mr. Lal: No.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Rao. Very good submission. We are looking into it. Not that we agree with everything, but it's a very good submission, put it this way. My issue is paragraph 19.

You say, at minimum, the commission should have a dedicated website from the beginning. Then you carry on. In the last sentence, you say, public consultation requires notification, two-way exchange, and meaningful participation, not merely the formal receipt of views behind closed doors. One of the reasons why I've been appointed is because 2013 led consultation. Now, with my limited participation, we have moved out all the villages, has been open to everybody. Now, apart from two closed-door consultations, even today people can walk in. Nobody stopped. And I've personally gone on the radio. In Labasa, for example, I had sent a Viber text to about 300 people, and two people turned up. How do we go about fixing that?

Mr. Lal : Closed doors can also be used in a figurative sense in that particular context, because none of these proceedings are, for instance, live-streamed. So it's not open to people. It's very, very cheap, very, very easy to organize live-streaming.

It could have been organized of all the proceedings that were conducted. That being said, I think it will be very difficult for anybody to justify this process, especially since you've said, and you continue to, people continue to apply very lofty standards when criticizing the 2013 constitution's perceived lack of legitimacy, owing to the lack of consultation that had happened. Although the architects of the constitution insisted there were some consultations done, which happened over a course of three, four months. And then it was preceded by the very comprehensive Ghai consultation. But no legitimate constitution-making process in the world has had two months of consultations. And it would be very hard to suggest or justify otherwise.

Mr. Kohli : As far as your time limit is concerned, just to follow up on that, you look at other countries' population, their demography, how much time they require. In Fiji, why do we judge by 12 months, 24 months, 18 months, if you are able to do so in three months? What is the magic about having three months or 18 months or two years? You're comparing with other countries that have larger population, bigger demographic areas?

Mr. Lal : Well, the commission hasn't released any statistics, so we cannot assess what proportion of the population have you been able to reach. We don't have those stats.

Those stats should have been there, so we can't really. But I'm pretty certain that you've reached, in these last two months, only a very tiny proportion of the country's entire population. The Reeves Commission took two years, set a very high benchmark, high commission similarly. And I also acknowledge that it is no fault of this good commission that you've been given such a tight deadline that you need to operate under. That is not your fault at all. But there are certain things which was within the ability of the constitution to improve in the process, such as the level of transparency, such as ensuring that you hold consultations at places, I mean the spread of it, the geographical locations and all of that.

Because I went through your venue list, and most of them were predominantly Ithaca areas, villages and so forth. And so those clearly were considerations that were not done. And I think it would be good if we are being honest about it and we accept some of these shortcomings. Because I tell you, it would be very hard to justify some of these shortcomings that are there.

Mr. Kohli : Thank you very much indeed for highlighting that. Subsequently, when we make our report, final report, we'll obviously have all those things in there. How many places we visited, the statistics will be there.

Mr. Lal : However, we've learned from the media that the chair has said that that report won't be public. That it would be entirely the prerogative of the president to make it public or otherwise. So it's another flaw in the process. The whole process should have been mandated by legislation. If you look at the powers of the president, he does not have real executive powers, only qualified powers. And so that's another aspect there.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Lal, we have heard you. We know that, I mean we can tell that you are not happy with the process by which this commission has undertaken its review. The review which was obligated was by His Excellency the President. We have the Commission of Inquiry Act. And also, we have the Terms of Reference which have been gazetted. And some directives also which have been gazetted in relation to how we operate. We have tried our best to comply with the provisions and the Terms of Reference and the gazetted directives. Now we understand, we hear you about your complaints. For a start, we have not written any report yet. We have not assessed any submission yet. We are still collecting submissions to say now that we have not been receiving or we have not been releasing the contents of submissions and so forth. We cannot do so because we have not collated them yet for your information. And on top of that, we have been directed that whatever evidence we collect, and that includes submissions, is not to be released unless His Excellency allows us to. That was what I meant when I said that.

We are working according to directions here. You may be saying that, you know, we are not releasing submissions. We have not told you the process and so forth. We are not taking things as we think we should take, you know, out of our own volition. What we are doing is we are following instructions, we are following Terms of Reference, we are following gazetted directives, which have been gazetted and you might be able to read that in the gazette. Now, having said that, we are happy that you are here today and that you have come in and made submissions. And we have heard you and it's now printed here, we are going to be looking at it. Thank you for your concern about the Constitution of this country. We have heard from the youths of the country, the National Youth Council, that we need to see that the Constitution is forward-looking.

Constitution for today and Constitution for tomorrow for our young ones. Now, in paragraph six of your submission, page two, the last two sentences, you state that the question, therefore, is this. What is the objective of this constitutional review? And the second question is, what exactly does it seek to remedy? I am happy that you have answered your own question. If you look at paragraph 23 of your submission, you have stated the principal weakness of the 2013 Constitution is that it is not too modern. The problem is that it combines progressive citizen equality with excessive executive power. Executive power, excessive.

It recognizes equal citizenship, but leaves independent institutions too vulnerable to political capture. It creates a comprehensive bill of rights, but allows rights to be limited through broad and open-ended clauses, claw back clauses, they call it. It establishes parliament, but allows legislation to be rushed through with inadequate deliberation.

It provides for independent offices, but gives the executive too much influence over the appointment and removal. Thank you for answering your own questions, the two questions that you raised in paragraph six. That was the reason why the review was necessary.

We have heard from government ministries, including the ministers. We have heard from NGOs, big associations, human rights movement, the human rights and anti-discrimination. They gave us a very comprehensive paper, pointing out the drawbacks, the deficiencies in this constitution which you so champion. So, thank you very much for your submissions. We will take it into consideration and we will rely on the other, I mean we will also consider the other submissions that have been given to us. So, thank you very much. And do you have something else to say?

Mr. Lal : Yes, thank you chair. I don't think it is correct to say, to impute that I champion any constitution. I think that was very inappropriate as well.

Mr. Valenitabua: I'm just reading from what you have written down and what you have presented to us. It's not mine, it's not the commissioner's, it's yours.

Mr. Lal: But it is very inappropriate to impute agendas to some meetings before this commission. I have done a very objective review of the constitution. So we have also listed the key structural flaws in this constitution. Now the question that I have posed on page 2 is in response, I mean that is a follow on from the question that I have raised earlier in the paragraph. Which is that when a constitutional engineering process is done, right at the outset the desired objectives are finalized.

That has not happened. So, my questions there do not pertain to whatever is there in a subsequent paragraph. But rather whether the desired objectives of this particular attempt at constitutional engineering have been set right from the outset. Which should become the starting point. And that's how constitution making happens. And it is quite fundamental, especially in divided societies. But thank you so much for providing us a chance to present. And we wish you and your commission the very best in your deliberations.

----------End of Session [9-7-2026]----------

Submission to the Constitution Review Commission

By Dialogue Fiji

9 July 2026

A. The Defective Review Process

1. Dialogue Fiji appears before this Commission with a deep sense of responsibility, but also with serious reservations about the process through which this constitutional review is being conducted. We say at the outset that Fiji does need constitutional reform. The 2013 Constitution contains serious structural flaws which have contributed to the concentration of power, and weakened independent institutions. But the legitimacy of constitutional reform does not come merely from the appointment of a Commission or the holding of hearings. It comes from a process that is transparent, participatory, deliberative, and trusted by the people.

2. On that test, the present process is deeply deficient.

3. A Constitution is not an ordinary law. It is the supreme legal and political compact of the nation. It defines the relationship between citizens and the State, distributes public power, protects rights, and sets the rules by which political disagreement is managed. In divided societies, the process by which a Constitution is made is as important as the text itself. A flawed process can produce a constitution, but it will not produce constitutional legitimacy. Fiji knows this from painful experience. Since independence, Fiji has had four constitutions, each reflecting the political conflicts and power struggles of its time. The recurring pattern has been that new regimes, whether after coups or elections, have treated constitutions as tools of political reset rather than as enduring frameworks for national stability.

4. That is why the present review process should have been designed with extraordinary care. Instead, it is rushed, opaque and insufficiently deliberative. A five-month process is simply not adequate for a proper and democratic national review of Fiji's supreme law. International comparative experience suggests that comprehensive constitutional reform requires careful sequencing, civic education, public consultation, transparent analysis, drafting, public feedback on draft proposals, and final political settlement. The benchmark for comprehensive constitutional reform is around 18 to 24 months. South Africa's process took about two years, Tunisia's about two and a half years, and Kenya's about 19 months. Fiji's own Reeves process took approximately two years, while the Ghai process took approximately one year.

5. This Commission is therefore presiding over what is the shortest major constitutional review in Fiji's history. That is not a badge of efficiency... but rather a warning sign.

B. Constitutional Engineering and the Need for Clear Objectives

6. For any constitutional engineering process in an ethnically divided society, there are certain desired objectives that must be deliberated upon and finalised right at the outset. Dialogue Fiji has not seen this CRC do that. The question, therefore, is this: what is the objective of this constitutional review? What exactly does it seek to remedy?

7. If the objective is merely to cure the democratic deficit in the making of the 2013 Constitution, then this process fails to achieve that. A rushed, opaque and poorly documented review process cannot cure the democratic deficit of a Constitution that itself was criticised for lacking popular approval. It simply reproduces the same legitimacy problem in a different form.

8. Constitutional engineering in ethnically divided societies aims to prevent conflict and secure democratic stability by structuring State institutions to accommodate, manage, or transcend ethnic differences. The ultimate goal is to foster political inclusion, ensure minority protection, and prevent the tyranny of the majority in deeply fragmented polities.

9. There are a number of key objectives and strategies that are usually considered in such processes.

10. First, power-sharing, or consociationalism. This involves designing executive and State institutions in a way that includes representatives from all major ethnic groups. This is often achieved through grand coalitions, proportional representation, mutual vetoes on vital cultural issues, and forms of segmented autonomy.

11. Second, electoral engineering. This involves implementing voting systems, such as list proportional representation, that encourage politicians to appeal to voters outside their own ethnic group and increase the prospects of broader political inclusion. A well-designed electoral system can incentivise moderation, inter-ethnic coalitions and national political appeals.

12. Third, decentralisation of power. In Fiji's context, decentralisation should not mean the creation of race-based or ethnically defined power structures. That would risk entrenching the very divisions that constitutional reform should seek to manage and transcend. Instead, decentralisation should focus on strengthening elected local government, municipal councils, provincial-level democratic structures, and community-based decision-making. The objective should be to bring power closer to citizens, improve accountability in service delivery, deepen grassroots democracy, and ensure that communities have a meaningful say in decisions affecting their daily lives.

13. Fourth, minority rights and protections. This includes embedding an entrenched Bill of Rights, legal protections for minority communities, and institutions that can enforce these protections against the State and against majoritarian abuse.

14. Fifth, cross-cutting cleavages. Constitutional design can structure institutions in ways that blur strict ethnic identities by encouraging national parties, cross-regional alliances and political competition around shared civic issues such as the economy, health, education, poverty, infrastructure and public services, rather than ethnic identity alone.

15. These tools are used to build unified nation-states in societies where ethnic division can otherwise become politically destabilising. But they require careful constitutional design. They require public education, genuine deliberation and clarity of purpose. In Fiji's case, the CRC has not clearly explained whether it is seeking to improve ethnic accommodation, strengthen national unity, reduce executive dominance, enhance institutional independence, reform the electoral system, or merely remedy the lack of legitimacy surrounding the making of the 2013 Constitution.

C. Transparency, Participation and the Nature of the Review

16. That absence of clarity is a serious weakness. A constitutional review cannot be everything and nothing at the same time. Before asking people what they want changed, the process should have helped the country understand the constitutional problem it is trying to solve.

17. We are aware of the argument that this is not a comprehensive review, but merely an amendment review. That argument is not correct. If this was only an amendment review, the terms of reference would clearly identify the specific provisions of the 2013 Constitution that were to be examined, and the Commission would consult the public only on those identified provisions. Instead, the Commission is inviting submissions on the Constitution as a whole. That is, in substance, a comprehensive review. It should therefore meet the standards of a comprehensive process.

18. The Ghai Commission, despite operating under an unelected military-backed regime, set a much higher standard for transparency and participatory constitution-making than what we are seeing now. Public hearings were conducted across the country in 2012, and more than 7000 submissions were received and all of these were published on a central website run by the commission. The Ghai process is widely acclaimed, not merely in Fiji but internationally, as an example of how constitution-making consultations should be conducted: open, participatory, well-documented, accessible to citizens, and grounded in genuine public engagement. That history is precisely why this process should have gone further, not backwards. If the central criticism of the 2013 Constitution is that it lacked popular legitimacy and disregarded the participatory Ghai process, then the corrective process cannot itself be opaque, rushed and poorly documented.

19. At minimum, this Commission should have had a dedicated website from the beginning of the process. Every public submission, unless confidentiality was specifically requested for valid reasons, should have been published. Hearings should have been livestreamed- in 2026 this is much more cheaper and easier to do than it was in 2012. Transcripts should have been made available. Citizens should have been able to go to one central public repository and see what individuals, organisations, political parties, traditional institutions, religious bodies, unions, business groups, women's groups, youth organisations and minority communities were actually telling the Commission. Public consultation requires notification, two-way exchange and meaningful participation, not merely the formal receipt of views behind closed doors.

20. The absence of a central public record weakens the entire exercise. How will the public know whether the Commission has fairly assessed the submissions? How will citizens know which views were dominant, which were marginal, which were organised, and which represented genuine community sentiment? Has the Commission released statistics on the number of submissions received, the categories of submitters, the geographic spread of participation, the gender and age profile of participants, or the issues most frequently raised? Without such information, the process cannot be properly evaluated.

21. For these reasons, Dialogue Fiji was reluctant to participate in this process, despite receiving two invitations. We did not wish to legitimise a process that we consider flawed. However, we have ultimately decided to make this submission because Fiji's constitutional future is too important to abandon. We participate while placing on record our serious concern that the process, as presently designed, is unlikely to cure the democratic deficit that has long surrounded the 2013 Constitution.

D. Features of the 2013 Constitution That Must Be Retained

22. Having said that, Dialogue Fiji does not support reckless constitutional change. The 2013 Constitution contains progressive features which should be retained. It abolished ethnic communal rolls and reserved ethnic seats, established a single national electoral roll, adopted the principle of one person, one vote, one value, and introduced an open-list proportional representation system. It also entrenched common and equal citizenry, declaring that all citizens of Fiji are Fijians and that all citizens enjoy equal status under the Constitution. It established Fiji as a secular State, separated religion and State, abolished the unelected Senate, and placed legislative authority in a fully elected single House of Parliament. These provisions are foundational features of a modern, multi-ethnic, liberal democracy.

23. The principal weakness of the 2013 Constitution is not that it is too modern. The problem is that it combines progressive citizen equality with excessive executive power. It recognises equal citizenship, but leaves independent institutions too vulnerable to political capture. It creates a comprehensive Bill of Rights, but allows rights to be limited through broad and open-ended clauses. It establishes Parliament, but allows legislation to be rushed through with inadequate deliberation. It provides for independent offices, but gives the executive too much influence over their appointment and removal.

E. Correcting the Concentration of Executive Power

24. The central task of constitutional reform should therefore be clear: retain the modern democratic foundations of the 2013 Constitution, while correcting the structural concentration of power.

25. The first major reform should be to redesign the Constitutional Offices Commission. Under the current structure, the COC is dominated by government-aligned members: the Prime Minister, the Attorney-General, two Prime Ministerial nominees, the Leader of the Opposition and one Opposition nominee. This creates a 4 to 2 government-aligned majority, allowing the executive to shape the leadership of key watchdog institutions. That is a fundamental design flaw. Institutions such as the Electoral Commission, the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission, the Auditor-General and other constitutional offices must not depend on a body structurally controlled by the government of the day.

26. Dialogue Fiji proposes that the COC be reconstituted as a genuinely independent and balanced appointments body. It should include equal numbers of nominees from the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, but those nominees should not be current Members of Parliament, political party office-holders, recent candidates, ministerial advisers, or persons who have held senior political office within the previous five years. In addition, the Fiji Law Society should nominate one member through an open process conducted by its Council, and one member should be nominated collectively by the Vice-Chancellors of Fiji's three universities. That nominee should be a senior academic of recognised standing in law, governance, public administration, political science, human rights, development studies or a related field, and should not be a current Member of Parliament, political party office-holder, recent candidate, ministerial adviser, or person who has held senior political office within the previous five years. This would ensure that the COC benefits not only from legal expertise, but also from independent academic knowledge of governance, institutions and democratic accountability.

27. The chairperson of the COC should not be the Prime Minister. The chairperson should be an eminent independent person, preferably a retired judge or senior legal practitioner of high standing, appointed by consensus between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. If they cannot agree within 21 days, the Fiji Law Society should provide a shortlist of three eligible persons, from which the President appoints the chair. This would move the COC away from executive control and towards constitutional guardianship.

28. The Public Service Commission should also be constitutionally strengthened as the guardian of a professional, merit-based and politically neutral public service. The Prime Minister's agreement should not be required for the appointment or removal of Permanent Secretaries. Permanent Secretaries must serve the State, not the political executive of the day.

29. Second, Fiji should retain the open-list proportional representation system, but reduce the electoral threshold from 5 per cent to 2 per cent. The current electoral system has major democratic strengths. It eliminates ethnic rolls, gives equal value to each vote, and ensures that every voter participates in the same national electoral process. The single national constituency also discourages narrow regional or communal appeals, rewards parties that campaign on issues of national interest rather than sectional interests, and completely removes the possibility of gerrymandering through the manipulation of constituency boundaries. These are important gains which should not be reversed. However, the democratic value of proportional representation is weakened when the electoral threshold is set too high. The current 5 per cent threshold is excessive for a small, diverse and politically fragmented society. It suppresses smaller parties, discourages new political movements, and artificially concentrates representation in larger parties. A 2 per cent threshold would preserve proportionality while preventing excessive fragmentation. It would also allow a genuine multiparty system to thrive.

30. Political parties should be constitutionally encouraged, but not compelled as a condition of contesting elections, to ensure meaningful gender balance in their candidate lists. The Constitution should require any system of public funding for political parties to include gender equality criteria, including incentives for parties that achieve at least 40 per cent representation of either gender in their candidate lists. This would promote women's political participation without excluding parties from the democratic process. Placing this principle in the Constitution would ensure that a future parliamentary majority cannot easily remove gender equality incentives through ordinary legislation.

31. Third, the size of Cabinet should be constitutionally capped. Under section 91(1), the Prime Minister has sole authority to determine the size of Cabinet, while the Ghai Draft proposed a Cabinet cap of 15 members. Dialogue Fiji supports a constitutional cap of 15 ministers, including the Prime Minister and Attorney-General if the Attorney-General is a Cabinet minister. This would prevent executive bloat and reduce the use of ministerial appointments as instruments of political reward.

32. The Constitution should also require Cabinet to reflect, as far as practicable, Fiji's gender, cultural, ethnic and regional diversity. A government that represents a multi-ethnic country must be seen to draw leadership from the full breadth of that country. If the composition of Parliament makes this impossible, the Constitution should permit the Prime Minister to appoint up to five ministers from outside Parliament, but only for the purpose of satisfying diversity, expertise or inclusion requirements. Such ministers should be subject to parliamentary confirmation, should have the right to speak in Parliament on matters within their portfolios, but should not vote. They should also be bound by the same standards of accountability, asset declaration, conflict of interest rules and parliamentary questioning as elected ministers.

33. There should also be a constitutional term limit for the office of Prime Minister. No person should be permitted to serve as Prime Minister for more than two parliamentary terms, whether consecutive or non-consecutive. This would prevent excessive personalisation of executive power, encourage leadership renewal, and reduce the risk of one individual dominating the State over an extended period.

F. Strengthening Rights, Judicial Independence, Accountability and Parliament

34. Fourth, the Bill of Rights should be retained but strengthened. The 2013 Constitution has a comprehensive rights framework, but section 6(5)(c) allows rights to be limited by restrictions that are not expressly set out in the text, provided they are necessary and prescribed by law. This creates a broad opening for the State to limit rights. The Constitution should instead codify a strict proportionality test. Any limitation of a right must be reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society, based on human dignity, equality and freedom. The State must bear the burden of proof. It must show that the limitation pursues a legitimate objective, is rationally connected to that objective, impairs the right as little as possible, and that there are no less restrictive means available to achieve the same purpose.

35. The Constitution should also recognise access to information as a directly enforceable constitutional right, not merely as a right dependent on future legislation. Citizens cannot hold power to account if they cannot access information held by the State.

36. Fifth, judicial independence must be strengthened. Under the 2013 Constitution, the Prime Minister advises the President on the appointment of the Chief Justice and the President of the Court of Appeal after consulting only the Attorney-General. There is no requirement to consult the Leader of the Opposition. This is inadequate. The appointment of the Chief Justice should be made through an independent COC or a strengthened Judicial Service Commission, with public advertisement, transparent criteria, merit-based assessment and cross-party consultation.

37. The Constitution should also close the dangerous loophole relating to suspension of the Chief Justice. The 2013 Constitution permits the Prime Minister to advise suspension pending a tribunal investigation, but does not specify a deadline for the tribunal to convene. This creates the possibility of an indefinite suspension, which can operate as removal in all but name. The Constitution should require that where the Chief Justice is suspended, the tribunal must be constituted and convened within seven days, and must complete its work within a prescribed period unless extended by the Supreme Court for exceptional reasons.

38. Sixth, Fiji should retain a unicameral Parliament. There is no democratic justification for restoring an unelected Senate with law-making powers. Laws should be made by representatives directly elected by the people. The 2013 Constitution correctly abolished the unelected Senate and established a fully elected single House of Parliament. If Fiji wishes to strengthen legislative scrutiny, the answer is not to create another chamber of unelected legislators. The answer is to strengthen parliamentary committees, improve public consultation on Bills, resource the Opposition, and create constitutional safeguards against rushed law-making.

39. The current four-year parliamentary term and election cycle should be retained. A three-year term provides insufficient time for governments to develop and implement medium to long-term policies, while a five-year term risks weakening democratic accountability by keeping voters too far away from the next opportunity to renew or withdraw their mandate. A four-year term strikes the appropriate balance between governmental stability and regular democratic accountability, and remains the appropriate model for a parliamentary democracy such as Fiji.

40. The Public Accounts Committee should be constitutionally recognised as a central instrument of parliamentary oversight and should be chaired by an Opposition Member of Parliament, preferably the Shadow Minister for Finance. Fiji's parliamentary practice traditionally provided for an Opposition MP to chair the PAC, but this was altered in 2016 to allow a Government backbencher to chair the Committee. That change weakened the oversight function of Parliament. The PAC examines how public money is spent, and its work should therefore be led by a member who is institutionally independent of the executive. Comparative Commonwealth practice strongly supports Opposition leadership of the PAC. Restoring this principle would strengthen scrutiny of public expenditure, reinforce executive accountability, and align Fiji's Parliament with good parliamentary practice.

41. The Speaker should also be constitutionally protected as an independent guardian of Parliament, not as an extension of the Government majority. The Speaker should be elected by a supermajority of Parliament and should be required to act with strict neutrality.

42. Seventh, the Constitution should impose strict safeguards on the expedited passage of legislation. The current framework allows ordinary parliamentary majorities to bypass normal deliberation. The Ghai Draft required a much higher supermajority before deliberation could be bypassed. Dialogue Fiji proposes that any use of urgent procedures, including procedures similar to Standing Order 51, should require a two-thirds parliamentary majority, except in narrowly defined emergencies such as natural disasters, war, public health emergencies or urgent fiscal measures certified by an independent authority. Even then, the use of expedited procedures should be time-limited, justified in writing, and subject to post-enactment committee review. Democratic law-making requires that citizens who will be subject to the law must have a meaningful opportunity to understand and influence that law.

43. The Constitution should create a citizens' petition mechanism, adapted from the participatory spirit of the Ghai Draft, which allowed constitutional amendments to be proposed by a petition signed by at least 1,000 citizens. Citizens should be able to petition Parliament to consider an issue of national importance, review an existing law, or initiate discussion on proposed legislation. Once a petition reaches a defined threshold, Parliament should be required to refer it to the relevant standing committee for public hearings and a report within a fixed period; where it reaches a higher threshold, Parliament should be required to schedule a full debate. This would not allow citizens to bypass Parliament or make laws directly, but it would ensure that Parliament cannot simply ignore issues that have significant public support.

G. Foundational Values That Must Remain Sacrosanct

44. Finally, there are foundational values in the 2013 Constitution which should be treated as sacrosanct. Fiji must remain a secular State. In a multi-religious society, secularism is not hostility to religion. It is the only fair basis on which the State can treat all religions equally and protect freedom of conscience for every citizen. The Constitution must also retain equal citizenry. There can be no return to constitutional arrangements that classify citizens into different political categories based on race or ethnicity.

45. The label "Fijian" as the common nationality of all citizens should be retained. Much of the debate around this issue confuses nationality with ethnicity. Ethnicity refers to ancestry, culture, language, customs and communal identity. Nationality refers to legal and political membership of the State. A person may be iTaukei by ethnicity and Fijian by nationality. A person may be Indo-Fijian by ethnicity and Fijian by nationality. These are not contradictory identities. They operate at different levels.

46. Replacing "Fijian" with "Fiji Islander" would be a downgrade. The proud name of our country is Fiji. We are not the Republic of the Fiji Islands. We are the Republic of Fiji. "Fiji" carries dignity and authority. It reflects maturity as an independent nation. Colonial-era naming often emphasised geography because territories were viewed as possessions or collections of islands. Independent states, by contrast, increasingly adopt names that reflect nationhood rather than geography. Citizens of France are French, citizens of India are Indian, citizens of Australia are Australian, and citizens of Fiji should be Fijian. That common national identity does not erase indigenous identity. The iTaukei people remain the indigenous people of Fiji, with their distinct culture, language, institutions and land rights. But the State must have one equal civic identity for all its citizens.

H. Conclusion

47. In conclusion, Dialogue Fiji urges the Commission to recognise that Fiji's problem is not simply the text of the Constitution. It is the system of power around it. The 2013 Constitution contains progressive and modern features, but it also embeds structural vulnerabilities that enable excessive concentration of power. Reform should therefore be careful, principled and democratic. It should not become another episode in Fiji's long history of constitutional change driven by those who temporarily hold power.

48. If this review is to have legitimacy, the Commission must immediately improve the process. It should publish all submissions, release participation statistics, livestream future hearings, issue thematic consultation papers, allow public comment on draft recommendations, and explain how competing views will be assessed. Without that transparency, the final report will struggle to command trust.

49. Fiji does not need another Constitution that one side celebrates and another side rejects. We need a constitutional settlement that is modern, democratic, inclusive, rights-protecting and institutionally balanced. We need a Constitution that limits power, not one that merely transfers power from one political group to another. Above all, we need a Constitution that belongs to the people of Fiji.

Fiji Disabled Person's Federation

Mr. Macanawai : In fact, the disability unit of the Ministry that supports the National Council for Persons with Disabilities of this opportunity, just yesterday, and then, so I'm actually the President of the Fijian Disabled People's Federation, and I also sit on the Council, but primarily having just learnt of this opportunity yesterday afternoon, and did not want to miss it, and I was expecting to also have representatives from the Council here, but it looks like they are not, so I guess it would be probably more appropriate representing the organizations of persons with disabilities in Fiji, as Fijian Disabled People's Federation is the umbrella body, and probably by, before representation as a member of the Council, probably can, also probably can be, but I did not have the assistance on their behalf. Thank you, sir.

Mr. Valenitabua: So, who are we? Is National Council for Persons with Disabilities, correct? The National Council for Persons with Disabilities is the statutory body that governs disability matters, organizations, and they informed us of this consultation, and so I came from home straight to here, I didn't come from the office, so I did ask the office if the Council is also here, or will also be coming, so I asked my wife if they are here but it looks like they are not. So I am, I am in terms of representation, it's probably fair to say it's just the Fiji Disabled People's Federation, which is a member of the National Council for Persons with Disabilities. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: That clarifies your position, and also the name which we will be referring to in our report, considering the submitters, or when we list the submitters who came before us. So we will be referring to the Fiji Disabled Persons Federation, and you are a member of the National Council for Persons with Disabilities. Is that correct? Thank you. Please proceed.

Mr. Macanawai : Thank you Chair. Let me just open up my document. Honourable Chair, Honourable Members of the Committee, I want to first humbly request that following this oral presentation, that if we can be given the opportunity to then submit our written submission by next Friday if that's not too late. As I said, we only found out about this opportunity yesterday afternoon, and we had a draft, I saw a draft this morning but I don't think it was in a ready state to be shared with this Honourable Commission, hence this request. That is right, Chair. I do also have the opportunity to thank this Commission for the letter that I saw that was sent to the National Council for Disabled Persons which I saw this morning, inviting the Council to provide some submission to this Commission, therefore acknowledging that and thanking for the opportunity.

I have personally been following submissions that have been made previously, and what I thought of doing when I found out yesterday afternoon of this opportunity and then talking to the Council Office this morning through that office, I took the opportunity to look at the current 2013 Constitution to see the current references that address issues pertaining to persons with disabilities. And I've noted there are about five references in the 2013 Constitution to disability, which I will be referring to some of them, and also then for the purpose of the work of this Honorable Commission is then maybe make some suggestions on how they can be improved or strengthened to better protect the rights and aspirations of future citizens with disabilities. I first note that in the Section 26 of the 2013 Constitution, on the right to equality and freedom from discrimination, on Subsection 3, that a person must not be fairly discriminated against directly or indirectly.

One of the grounds of that is disability, which we would like that to be considered in the revision or in your work Honourable Chair. Also Subsection 6 talks about the facilitation of reasonable access to persons with disabilities to proprietors of places and services that are identified in Subsection 5 to ensure that access are provided to persons with disabilities. We do like to see that as retained. We also acknowledge that there is a Section No. 42 that specifically address the rights of persons with disabilities. We also would like to see this retained and some parts of it strengthened and I'll come to that shortly.

Subsection 1 of this Section 42 of the 2013 Constitution says that any person with disability has the right to reasonable access to all places, public transport information including braille or sign language, or the appropriate means of communication. I note here that other rights that are in the 2013 Constitution, like rights to education, rights to work and decent work, have referred to, for example in education, it talks about primary, early childhood and secondary education. There isn't a reference to special education and I thought hard about requesting for that because but did not really want to request that inclusion because if that's in the Constitution it would probably take years to undo what probably is maybe aspirational now but maybe different moving forward into the future.

So it's one where things like education, but this particular Section 42 talks about the rights of persons with disabilities where things like education and health and work can be considered here tends to a specificity of these particular areas that sometimes are still aspirational to persons with disabilities and are not given the opportunity to do so, to be at school, to have gainful employment, to enjoy health services that many take for granted. So we are wondering whether that is a consideration that this Commission can have on strengthening this particular Section 42. Also talks about the reasonable access to materials, substances and devices relating to persons with disability and then in part Subsection 2 talks about the person with disability has a right to reasonable adaptation of buildings, infrastructure, vehicles and work arrangements to enable their full participation.

I'm paraphrasing the particular clause in my apology for not reading the full text. Then in the third part it also talks about the law administrative action taken under the law may limit or authorize the limitation of the rights set in this section. Now that probably begs the question on even interpretation of that.

How the rights of persons with disabilities can then be overruled if you like by another administrative procedure. And then Part B of the 2013 Constitution, Section 163 if I'm correct, herein lies the definition of disability and this is probably one area that we would like to be amended. So the disability includes any physical, sensory or mental or psychological or other conditions or illness that is perceived by a significant sector of the community to have a significant adverse effect on the individual's ability to participate fully and effectively in society on an equal basis with others.

Now I would like to suggest for the consideration of this honorable commission if the definition of disability that is provided in the Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act of the 2018. Now this act came to being five years after the 2013 Constitution and also it came one year after Fiji ratified the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. So Fiji is a state party if you like to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and a year after ratifying, ratification, this bill was discussed and then became the Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act 2018.

Now the definition that's in this act on persons with disabilities is probably a better version to be used in the Constitution and to replace what's in currently the 2013 Constitution which under part one of the Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act 2018 and interpretation, persons with disabilities include those with long term physical, mental, intellectual or sensory impairments which in interaction with various barriers may hinder their full and effective participation in society on an equal basis with others. I think of Fiji being a state party to the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities that international human rights treaty on disability having included that in the 2018 definition in the 2018 Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act, I think it's only appropriate that the amendment of the definition of the Constitution be made so that that version is made more current and in line with Fiji obligation as a state party to the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. Excellencies, those are the few comments that I draw from the quick look at the Constitution to bring to this consultation.
I just would like to add a few other items. Having clarified my representation as President of the Fiji Disabled People's Federation, my apology I also didn't introduce myself properly. My name is Setariki Macanawai, President of the Fiji Disabled People's Federation.

The population of persons with disabilities in Fiji is according to the 2017 census is 14.3%. So it's quite significant in terms of population and not very far off from the World Health Organization estimate of 16% to be persons with disabilities of any given country. It was 15% initially and then I think a year or two ago WHO revised it upwards to 16% to demonstrate the growing number of people with disabilities globally. So the 14.3% of persons with disabilities of each population and probably if we take the current population we are looking at probably about 132,000 citizens, people with disabilities.

And I think I'm not sure if there has been an opportunity for an organization to voice the issue and if not then it is really my honor to be doing this on behalf of this 14.3%, 132,000 people with disabilities and whose aspirations, interests really should not be overlooked. And in the notion of nothing about us without us and what the Sustainable Development Goals often talk about is leaving one behind, then really we are humbly requesting that this commission give serious consideration to our issues and our plight. The request that I'm verbally sharing today, articulating today, which we will formally present in a written submission to be provided by the end of next week.

I'll close by just saying that the ratification of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities by Fiji, the government of Fiji in 2017, four years after this 2030 constitution and then a year after that in 2018 the Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act which I already mentioned. And also not forgetting other submissions that we've made to the Electoral Commission, to the Employment Relations Act submission and also other opportunities including probably more at the policy level, the disability policy of the Fijian government through the Ministry of Women, Children and Social Protection. Opportunities for our country to pay sufficient attention, not just attention in terms of paying attention but how can they translate that attention in terms of resources, in terms also of attitudinal changes and the services that are inclusive in nature for persons with disabilities.

I'll close by saying, by making reference to the definition which I forgot to mention is currently in the 2023 constitution. It gives opportunity to communities to decide whether a person has a disability or not, if my understanding of that is correct. I think that is troublesome to persons with disabilities when we know that the prevailing attitude to disability at our community level in our society is largely negative.

I think if consideration can be given to the use, adoption of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, the definition is already shared and already captured in the 2018 Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act which Fiji ratified as a state party. I think it should be fitting that definition be made current and in line with international definition. Our members of the disability community, as I said 43% that I am hoping that I am doing justice in sharing their voice to this table.

I hope that our plea, our requests on us being given a seat at the table and in some cases transformation of the table to suit our needs so that we can participate fully, actively and meaningfully and also contribute to the well-being of our nation and also our community generally. Thank you very much Honourable chair and members of this commission for the opportunity given to me to share briefly our submission orally noting that we will be following this with a written submission in the coming week. Vinaka saka Vaka levu and God bless.

Mr. Valenitabua: We were in Rakiraki and a gentleman there who I must say was not challenged, he raised the point of excess. He spoke about the Rakiraki Town Council and also the owners of buildings in Rakiraki not providing access in relation to challenged persons who are on wheelchair.

And that was a concern that was raised similar to what you have raised today. So although the constitution contains provisions for the provision of those excess ramps or whatever they are called, there are some builders or some owners of buildings who have not taken that into consideration. We discussed it with Mr Conway Bag who is an architect and yes, although it is in the constitution, some of the planners, some of the owners of buildings still do not provide that means of access.

So you have raised a point here, we believe that we will maintain Section 42 in relation to that with improvements or strengthening. So that is a point which I wanted to raise. It has been raised before at the Commission. You have now confirmed it this morning to this Commission. I will now ask the other Commissioners if they have any comments or questions in relation to your submission. Thank you very much.

Mr. Conway : Thank you Mr. Macanawai for your submission this morning. I made note of a couple of things. You are quite right in the definitions of the constitution. Your proposal is quite taken. I looked at the Act and that has a more defined principle that you have submitted and I acknowledge that. Thank you. The other one was the understanding in the Bill of Rights that we have the right to education and all the other principles that impact Section 42 which is another person's with disabilities. I just wanted to clarify, are you saying that we need to include that in Section 42 or include it under Section 31? Thank you.

Mr. Macanawai: Can I respond now? Yes. Thank you sir. Yes. I thought about this special education and whether it has a room in Section 31. But in the way education is evolving, now we are talking about also inclusive education. So I wonder whether it would be more progressive that instead of putting special education in Section 31, it will come a time when probably education is already evolving to inclusive education now. We don't know what the future trend will be. But whether education can be included in Section 42 when you talk about the services. So having education mentioned in Section 42 when it's the Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act might give more clarity.

When we talk about education in Section 42, we are talking about the education of persons with disabilities. Whereas if special education is mentioned alongside early childhood, primary, secondary education, that might disadvantage us moving forward. When we want to innovate or remove, as in some cases, some special education, we will not include special education. So my suggestion for your consideration, Honorable Commissioners, is that education, work, those kinds of rights be mentioned in the Rights of Persons with Disabilities Act of Section 42. Thank you, sir.

Mr. Conway: Thank you very much Mr. Mathewani, I think you've clarified that and made your point very clear about where we are moving forward. Your reference to don't leave anyone behind, don't look at us any differently, as you said that could be something. But I take your point, it's something that we will grapple with in the Commission, but very compelling arguments that you've put forward this morning. Your colleague, Mr. Nemani Rawalui, was the gentleman in Rakiraki who raised these matters with us, and his complaint was, I guess, that's entrenched in code and legislation, it's just enforcement that needs to be taken. But yeah, thank you so much, I really appreciate your input this morning. Vinaka.

Mr. Valenitabua : Mr. Macanawai, there is no more comment, no more questions, no more remarks from the Commissioners. We thank you again for your attendance before the Commission this morning, you have raised points in relation to the disabled persons of this country. We will surely deliberate on the submissions we have heard so far, and we thank you very much. We wish you well, and we'll be looking forward to receiving your submissions next week.

Mr. Macanawai: Vinaka. Thank you very much, Chair, members of the Commission, for the opportunity, and we will try to get in our written submissions. Vinaka.

----------End of Session [9-7-2026]----------

National Federation Party

National Federation Party
DATE :7-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, I shall now call this consultation session to order. Mr. Biman Prasad and gentlemen and ladies of the National Federation Party, we welcome you to the Constitution Review Commission this afternoon. We appreciate your attendance this afternoon as we have been waiting for you.

The commission this afternoon is represented by commissioners. As you can see from where you are sitting, I will ask the commissioners to introduce themselves, starting from the far right. Please.

Mr. Conway: Thank you, Chair. My name is Mr Conway Begg Greetings, Mr. Prasad and members of the National Federation Party.

Ms.Nailatikau: My name is Mere Nailatikau, my background is in public policy and public diplomacy, and it's a pleasure to be here to benefit from your contributions today.

Dr. Fatiaki: Thank you. Honourable Piman Prasad and colleagues, friends from the National Federation Party, my name is John Charles Fidiaki, I'm a medical practitioner in Suva. Thank you.

Mr. Kholi: Good afternoon, all, my name is Ami Kohli, I'm a legal practitioner from Labasa.

Mr. Gounder: Good afternoon, Honourable Prasad and Honourable Singh, members of the National Federation Party, I'm Niles Gounder, and I look forward to your submission this afternoon. Thank you.

Mr Valenitabua -Yes, Honourable Prasad and the ladies and gentlemen of the National Federation Party, we are looking forward to hearing from you this afternoon. Taking on from there, would you like to introduce yourselves first before we start?

Mr .Prasad: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the commission. Let me first of all apologize, we had to change the time.

I was with the Sugar Select Committee in the Western Division and we just arrived last night. With me is Honourable Agni Dev Singh, Minister for Employment, Productivity and Industrial Relations. Kamal Hair, General Secretary of the party, Kalisi Watuwara, the Assistant General Secretary of the party, Bimal Chaudhury, and Registrar of the party, Mr. Dilip Kumar.

And Avenai also one of our party administrators. Thank you very much. You want me to start now?

Mr. Valenitabua: Yes.

Mr. Prasad: Okay. So Chairman and respected members of the commission, we have a written submission as well. What I will try and do is to highlight and perhaps go through some of the key issues.

But let me begin by talking about the National Federation Party. And in particular I want to highlight the principal objectives of the party and why it is relevant to talk about that a little bit. And I want to read this.

First, to create, promote, foster and preserve a sense of national consciousness among the citizens of Fiji, irrespective of any distinction of community, religion, sex or race. To promote, preserve and safeguard the political, economic and social rights of the citizens of Fiji, irrespective of any distinction, again, of community, religion, race or sex. To promote and preserve and safeguard the political, economic and social rights of the citizens of Fiji, again, irrespective of any distinction of community, religion, race or sex.

And finally, to strive to bring about political, economic, social and cultural integration among the citizens of Fiji by pursuing the ideal of seeking unity in diversity and by creating an atmosphere of goodwill, understanding and mutual respect for the culture and religion of all classes of citizens. In our view, Honourable Chairman and members of the Commission, these objectives are timeless. They remain true today and relevant and are in the national interest.

We have given a little bit more background as to the contribution of the National Federation Party and some monumental permanent achievements, things like the establishment of the National Provident Fund, the Agricultural Landlord and Tenants Act, negotiating the Denning Award, peaceful achievement of Fiji's independence, major role in the 1970 Constitution, Constitution Review Commission, Sir Paul Reeves-led Commission for the Review of the racist 1990 Constitution, and only party that has opposed every political upheaval and has not participated or benefited in any way from any post-coup regime or interim administration. And we are the only surviving political party that has an enduring and direct impact in Fiji's modern political and economic history. And since December 2022, as you know, we are part of the coalition government, which essentially helped to unseat the Fiji-first dictatorial government that was in place since 2014 until 2022.

I need not, Mr. Chairman, go into details of the upheavals in Fiji since May 1987. I think you and the commissioners are very well aware of it. But just to highlight, on the 10th of April, the most recent one, April 2009, the judgment of the Fiji Court of Appeal delivered on 9th April 2009, and reinforcing the 1997 Constitution as the supreme law of the land and a pathway to retaining parliamentary democracy by August 2009, was stressed by the military regime.

So, we wanted to highlight that the appeals court decision had ruled that a caretaker government led by someone else, other than the coup leader and interim prime minister, Mr Voreqe Bainimarama, and the post PM Laisenia Qarase, be appointed to facilitate. Constitution review, we can claim that NFP is the only political party in the country to have either witnessed or actively participated in the formulation of all the four constitutions in our post-independent history. We vigorously opposed the racist 1990 Constitution and vigorously opposed the 2013 Constitution, the Constitution which was forced upon us and on the people of Fiji through decree, both after the 87 and the 2006 upheaval.

You might ask, NFP participated in elections under this Constitution, and we did so with a very clear mandate and objective to change those constitutions in 1992, 1994, and our participation in 2014, we laid out very clearly in our manifesto that we will seek a change in the 2013 Constitution. So, participation in elections under imposed constitutions does not necessarily mean that our party supported this Constitution. I want to raise this very important point, the review process itself, Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission.

We are of the firm view that the process must not be rushed, otherwise it could be levelled as a facade. In our view, realistically, and I have expressed this in other forums, that there is no way whatsoever that the next general elections can be held under the provisions of a new Constitution. The enactment of the past four constitutions, either through a great democratic process, or enforced through a decree and timelines for elections, and getting ready with all the consequential legislations, electoral changes, will take time.

And in the current context, as we know, elections must be held at the latest by the 6th of February 2027. And in our view, the timeline is strictly impractical, if we are looking at the work that would be involved. Under the 1970 Constitution, agreed and legislated before independence in October 1970, the first general election was held in 1972.

The 1990 Constitution, when it was changed in July 1997, through an Act of Parliament, the election was held in May 1999. Similarly, the 2013 Constitution was imposed upon the people of Fiji on 7th September 2013. General elections were held on 17th September 2014.

I'm highlighting this, Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, to labour the point that having a new Constitution, and working meticulously through all the consequential legislations, changes to the electoral system, if we are going for constituencies, boundaries, etc., there is a lot of detailed work that is needed. So that's a very important point that we as a party would like to make. Then, the legitimacy of the 2013 Constitution, that has been very clearly articulated, and has been found by the Supreme Court to be a legally effective Constitution.

And on that basis, following the opinion of the Supreme Court to reduce approval requirements for changes, the FCRC has been tasked with recommending changes to the Constitution. The important point that we have to remember is that this Constitution was formulated and imposed upon the people of Fiji after repealing the Decrees 57 and 58 of 2012, which had outlined the process that should be followed in formulating the 2013 Constitution. So the military government did not follow its own decree, and the process they laid down to actually do the 2013 Constitution.

And the commission that was formed, the Gai Commission, came out with a report. It was a good report, but that was traced, banned, and a constitution was formulated by a group of people. We believe that the Commission has a very, very important responsibility and role.

We can use the template of the 2013 Constitution, or make changes to it, and adopt a totally new approach. The National Federation Party firmly believes that the Commission adopts a hybrid approach. This means that the Commission takes into account submissions, incorporates desirable provisions, contain both in the 1997 Constitution and the 2013 Constitution into a totally new Constitution.

And the Commission should then present both a draft Constitution and a review report to His Excellency the President. Mr. Chairman, as I said before, members of the Commission, this involves quite a delicate amount of work, intricate, as well as requiring expert advice and input. The fact that the Commission is required to make changes to the 2013, recommend changes to the 2013 Constitution, does not prevent it in any way from drafting a new Constitution altogether.

Incorporating the 2013 Constitution or repealing it is the responsibility of Parliament. The 1997 Constitution Amendment Act actually resulted in the repeal of the 1990 Constitution. Therefore, it does not mean that the review prevents the formulation of a totally new legislation or Constitution and repeal of existing legislation.

Deficiencies in the 2013 Constitution and recommendations. We recommend that the preamble must be changed to reflect what the second half of the preamble of the 1997 Constitution which states. And I don't have to, Mr. Chairman, read all that.

You have the submission. Because the imposed 2013 Constitution did not reflect the proper way in which our people should be addressed, our history should be addressed. It categorizes all those who have made Fiji their home and in the third paragraph in the preamble describes Indo-Fijians as descendants of indentured laborers from British India.

That is unnecessary. So, we recommend that the preamble in the 1997 Constitution be adopted instead of the preamble that's provided in the 2013 Constitution. The next important point, Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, is and we have highlighted this.

I have particularly highlighted this in my contributions sitting in the opposition for eight years about the limitations to the Bill of Rights. And there are a number of derogations, limitations in the 2013 Constitution and Commissioner Coley would vouch for that. So, we recommend that the Commission incorporate the Bill of Rights in 1997 and 2013 Constitution and significantly remove or reduce the limitations to what would be unlawful and not a practice in genuine democracy.

I'm talking about the limitations. So, I think that's an important point. We also recommend the removal of the teaching of contemporary and conversational ethos in Hindi as prescribed in the 2013 Constitution to be replaced by formal Vosa vaka Viti.

We also recommend that right to access land, both for agriculture and residential, be clearly stipulated and lessees, leases and tenancies include tenants, sub-leases, sub-lessees and their residences, buildings, etc. This is, Mr. Chairman and Commissioners, important. Many citizens who live in informal squatter settlements which make time to develop by government in terms of provision of proper leases and services per rental to landowners on both native and freehold land.

And there may be, this will avoid possible takeovers, illegal activities, etc. All of them need protection until a permanent housing solution and plan is implemented by government. But this will be a long-term objective and therefore the sub-leases of those in informal settlements need protection.

Appointment to independent offices, Mr. Chairman and Commissioners. We have listed the offices. In the 2013 Constitution, unlike any other Constitution, the COC is a thoroughly political body as provided for in the 2013 Constitution.

So you have the Prime Minister who is the Chair, the Attorney General and two nominees of the Prime Minister, they have four, the Leader of the Opposition and one other nominee. So essentially, if you are in government, if you are the Prime Minister, if you are the Attorney General, you have absolute leeway in making constitutional appointments. It was not the same in any other Constitution.

So we recommend that the provisions of the 1997 Constitution on the appointment of independent constitutional offices be adopted, strengthened, so as to make the appointments truly apolitical for the sake of accountability and transparency. Provision for ombudsman, this was present in the 1997 Constitution, a very important office. Sections 157 and up to 164 of the 1997 Constitution outlined very clearly the role and responsibilities of an ombudsman.

So, we also recommend that the new Constitution provides for an ombudsman and amongst his or her role, has the powers to investigate and recommend prosecution following a complaint from any person and act or omission of any public officer, employee, office or agency. When such act or omission appears to be illegal, unjust, improper and inefficient, ombudsman will serve as a judge. Ombudsman should be a person who shall have served as a judge, at least in the high court and must be appointed within three months of the government taking office under the new Constitution.

Very important position which was not provided for in the 2013 Constitution, which was in the 1997 Constitution. Code of Conduct and Accountability and Transparency Commission and Freedom of Information. We recommend provisions for the enactment of legislation to give effect to the Code of Conduct, Accountability, Transparency Commission and Freedom of Information.

Unfortunately, this was provided for in the 2013 Constitution. Between 2014 and 2022, it was brought into Parliament but never saw the light of the day. In the last three years, we have brought that back in Parliament but this has not been adopted yet.

And we recommend that the Ombudsman shall chair the Accountability and Transparency Commission. FICAG, as you heard through many submissions, our recommendation is that FICAG should be removed from the Constitution and FICAC Decree Act be repealed or significantly amended to exclude its role as an investigating and prosecuting body to one that promotes public awareness about corruption. A forensic unit should be established within the Fiji Police Force which shall investigate cases of alleged corruption and white collar crimes to avoid duplication of resources and weaponization of an organization like FICAG.

Transitional provisions, Section 173 to be removed. This is provided for in the 2013 Constitution and it goes against the grain of good democratic principles and parliamentary democracy. No constitution, no good democratic constitution will have this kind of provision.

In fact, Section 173 prevents Parliament's role from changing the decrees wrongly enacted under Section 165. There are many draconian decrees still in force because Section 173 prevents Parliament from actually changing it. So, we recommend that Sections 165 and 173 be removed from the new Constitution and all decrees that have not reached the floor of Parliament in the last 12 years be scrutinized by Parliament before being either enacted or repealed.

We also submit that there is no need for a provision like Section 13 12 in the Constitution. And we know that the RFMF commander while presenting the institution's submission to the FCRC clearly outlined the military's role which is to respect or be subservient to civilian authority at all times. The role of the armed forces in the upheavals of our history cannot be ignored.

And the submission by the RFMF commander was very thoughtful where he talked about the respect for civilian authority but a constitution should not provide a legal basis for anyone in the future to interpret that and use that as a legal basis for any kind of military intervention. So, we recommend the removal of any reference to the RFMF as being responsible at all times for the overall safety of Fiji and well-being of Fijians because it's a legal avenue for any future upheaval. The commander also talked about the immunity.

We are in full agreement with the rationale provided by the RFMF commander that given the Supreme Court's opinion of democratic deficit and in respect of the recognition of the 2013 Constitution to be legally effective, the immunity provisions as he suggested should be removed from the Constitution and we support his recommendation because I think it's very important for transparency and accountability. Entrenchment of group rights, we know about the infamous Bill No. 17 of 2021 that actually resulted in arrest of people like us who opposed this bill in the last previous parliament.

And this government, the coalition government repealed that bill when we came into government. Our recommendation is that we entrench the following legislation in conformity to Section 185 of the 1997 Constitution. The i taukei Affairs Act, the i taukei Development Fund Act, the i taukei Lands Act, i taukei Lands Trust Act, Agriculture Landlord and Tenants Act, Rotuma Act, Rotuma Lands Act and Banabans Lands or Settlement Act.

Amendments to these acts must require 66% of parliamentary majority. That's our recommendation, Mr. Chairman. New Constitution must make provisions to prevent degradation of the environment and cruelty against animals.

So, we recommend that the new Constitution has provisions for stringent laws against the degradation of the environment and cruelty against animals and promote animal welfare because this seems to be happening on a daily basis. And as a country, as people, as citizens, we need to take this head on. Conduct of political parties, we recommend the repeal of the decree and in place of that a code of conduct for political parties which must include holding of its annual general meeting within the calendar financial year.

Prohibition on those principal office holders of a political party wound up or deregistered for non-government, non-payment of debt from either contesting any type of election including general election and forming another political party. And we recommend immediate repeal of these decrees. Mr. Chairman and respected commissioners, let me get into the electoral system because this is, in our view, a very, very important aspect of any constitution.

How members of parliament are elected, what is the objective, what will they represent and what would be the participation or what would be the structure of participation of not only the citizens but also those who are elected in response to how they save the community. Fiji has had the first pass the post system under 1970, under 1990 and the alternative vote system under the 1997 constitution. Under 2013 constitution, we have the Duhon system and a proportional representation.

In the local governments, as we know, Mr. Kohli would know this well, right from 1973 to the last election we had in 2005, there was common rule. Local government elections were based on common rule. Under the 1970 constitution, Fiji had 52-member house of representatives and it was a mix of both communal and national seats.

A 70-member house of representatives purely under communal voting under the 1990 constitution. 71-member house of representatives elected under both communal and open seats, departure from the 1990 constitution to a mix of communal and open seats in the 1997 constitution. And currently 55 members under the so-called common rule in the 2013 constitution, which in many ways doesn't do justice to votes of equal value because the calculations under the Duhon system takes it, deviates from the strict proportional representation.

For example, the Duhon system which has been widely portrayed as a common rule is a bit like Sudoku with voters selecting a number. There was no name or symbol on an A3 size ballot paper. This did not produce proportional representation as prescribed in the constitution.

And I'll give you some examples. At the end of the 2018 election, Fiji's first share of votes constituted 26.2 seats in a 51-member parliament. NFP's vote share constituted 3.95 seats.

In mathematical terms, 26.2 would be rounded off to 26 and 3.9 would be rounded to 4. But under the Duhon system, 26.2 increased to 27 while 3.95 was reduced to 3. So, it kind of rendered meaningless the strict meaning of proportionality. You understand what I'm saying, you know? It wasn't strictly proportional. The St. Paul-Reeves-led Constitution Review Commission recommended a 70 member House of Representatives with 25 members to be elected on communal rule and 45 under open rule.

And it recommended that all communal constituencies be turned into open seats over a period of time, promoting more multiracial voting. But these recommendations, Mr. Chairman and the Commission, was 30 years ago. So based on experiences since our independence and with rapidly changing demographics, we recommend the following.

The new constitution make provision for a 70-member parliament to be elected under electoral system of mixed member proportional representation, MMP. This is a system in New Zealand. And we are recommending that the nation be divided into 25 constituencies and members elected on non-racial lines to be determined by the Constituency Boundaries Commission.

Elections for the 25 constituencies be held under the first-past-the-post system. And 45 members to be elected under a closed-list system strictly based on proportionality. So, in effect, there will be two ballot papers.

And two ballot papers are not unusual. Two ballot papers, one for the respective constituency and the other for the party vote of their choice. So, when people go to the polling booth, they get two ballot papers.

One, they vote for the party of their choice and one for the constituency member that they want to vote. So, you have both a constituency system and a proportional representation based on what the total party votes are and based on how many seats they get through constituency. And the threshold of eligibility of seats in parliament remain at 5%.

We recommend that it remain at 5% of the total valid vote cast in a general election. We are also saying that should a candidate, and this is a valid question that many people will ask, who contest a constituency also appears on the closed list. So, you can have a person who is standing for the constituency, but also the party puts him on the list.

Let's say, for example, there is a woman candidate that you really want to be in parliament, or a youth candidate, or a minority candidate. The party decides to put him or her on both the list as well as the constituency. Let's say he or she wins the constituency, but is also on the list, eligible to be a member, then the next person on the list will come in, in place of, so you could have both.

And it's a very good system. So, we recommend that. And we also proposed, we are proposing this electoral system because we genuinely believe that given our changing demographics, changing thinking about getting more women, getting more youth into parliament, but also making sure that our minority communities are not left out, this system will be good for both the majority and the minority communities.

The system eliminates communal voting and guarantees the representation of minorities, either from one of the 25 constituencies or from the closed list. Let's say that no Rotuma candidate wins in a constituency. But if a party wants a Rotuma or a Banabanas candidate to be in parliament, especially larger parties, you put them on the top of the list.

And by all means, they will be becoming members as list MPs. The system eliminates communal voting but guarantees representation of minorities, either from one of the constituencies or from the closed list of parties. And as I said earlier, I know the examples I was giving, Mr. Chairman and Commissioners, that women representation, minority representation can be enhanced under the MMP system.

And given our multi-ethnic, multi-racial, multi-religious society, the MMP proportional representation makes a lot of sense and one that doesn't discriminate and helps in getting minority representation, women representation in parliament. The issue of power sharing, as provided for in the 1997 constitution, we feel that in a country like Fiji, there are provisions like that in places like Mauritius. You know, best losers get in.

If a minority group doesn't get into parliament at all, then they go and look at the best loser. The person, he or she not only gets into parliament but gets a position in cabinet. And that's like power sharing.

So, we recommend that parties that win 5% of seats in parliament, not votes, they win 5% of seats, have a right to be invited to cabinet. Parties with less than 5% of the seats may be invited, 5% seat threshold, may be invited to join cabinet by the Prime Minister. And portfolios given to such members will come from the share of the Prime Minister's party or the ruling party.

Land tenure, Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, this has always been a generational issue. Major problem of expiring agricultural leases. We were out in the West talking about sugar.

Invariably, a lot of discussion was about land leases, renewal, rental mechanisms, etc., etc. And as a party, we know this very well. In 1966, the NFP negotiated the ALTO, a late leader, A.D. Patel.

Ten years later, another NFP leader, S.M. Koya, negotiated the ALTA, replacement or successor to ALTO. And there was a joint parliamentary committee, select committee on ALTA, after the formulation of the 1997 Constitution, under the then and now Prime Minister, Hon. Sitiveni Rabuka

And obviously, Parliament was dissolved in May, March 1999, so joint parliamentary select committee was no longer there. And under this proposal, under the proposal that we are recommending, a master lease concept. And in fact, in 2006, the then Prime Minister, Hon.Laisenia Qarase

Sitiveni Ligamamada Rabuka had already had some people in his office working on this, looking at how we can deal with and adopt a concept of master lease. So the concept of master lease was where government would lease the land from the ITLTB, the state and those freehold lands used for agriculture, at the rate of 10% UCB, that could be, that figure can change, it could be more now, or unimproved capital value of land, then lease that land. So government leases the land from ITLTB, from the state land, even freehold land, and sub-leases it to the tenants, and possibly to help agriculture, and use it as an incentive, could be a lower UCB.

The then Prime Minister, Rabuka at that time, had proposed that apart from the 50-year lease, a tenant would be informed by TLTB during the 25th year of the lease, whether the landholding unit wanted the lease back or not. And I think it was a good thinking, because it gives certainty to tenants, and you know well in advance that after 25 years, you have to revert that land back to the landowners. So if the landowners did not require the land in the future, then the lease would be automatically extended by another 25 years, making it a term of 75 years.

So, we believe that a master lease concept should be something that the Commission should look at. If need be, take some additional expert advice on this. And if you see our recommendations, we've laid it out very clearly.

We're saying that government leases the land, sub-leases it. In one way, it can be very helpful, because sometimes there are two layers. You have the TLTB, you have the landowning unit, the Mataqali, the landowners, and then you have the tenants.

So sometimes there are issues between the tenants and the landowners, but the lease is from the ITLTB. So government can step in, lease the land, and government can also ensure that issues such as lease arrears, rates that the landowners would advocate from time to time, can be dealt with by the government. So we submit to the Commission to please have a careful look at that.

Other salient features of the 2013 Constitution, I know there is a lot of emotions and sentiments that have been expressed about the secular state and common name. So first, in our view, the name Fijian is not new. In fact, it was there long before this thing was legislated in the 2013 Constitution.

I mean, for years, our sports people, you know, late Josefa Levula, for example, a renowned track athlete, rugby union and rugby league star, was known internationally as the Flying Fijian, a few decades before our independence, actually, in 1970. National rugby team is now known as Flying Fijians. Vijay Singh, professional golfer and one time number one in the world, was referred to as a Big Fijian.

So, Fijian has been a very widely used name, a common name for Fiji. We strongly support a secular state. Secular state doesn't, I think there is a lot of misconception about calling a country a secular state.

Secular state doesn't mean for a moment that different religions, different faiths will have issues. It's about respect and tolerance of all faiths or religions in a particular country. To me, secular state means that more than to have some kind of meaning that it's anti-religion or anti-faith, etc.

So we strongly support that and we put that in our recommendation very clearly. Again, I want to say that secularism is not in any way a sentiment against any religion or faith. In fact, it's about religious and racial tolerance.

And we fully support the new constitution recognizing Fiji as a secular state. So Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, we've listed the summary of all our recommendations. I don't need to read that again, but I would be very happy, members of my team would be happy to answer any questions or clarifications that you may have with respect to the recommendations.

And we are also happy, after this, if the Commission feels that you need additional explanation, you need more details, particularly on Master Lee's concept. We have the literature; we have more things to provide the Commission to consider some of these things. So with that, Mr. Chairman, again, let me thank you and the Commission for the opportunity to make our presentation.

And we have provided the written submission that you can have a look at it later. Thank you, Honourable Prasad. Thank you very much for that oral submission.

Mr. Valenitabua: And we also acknowledge the receipt of your written submission, which we have just mentioned. We really appreciate that we've got the written submission and then supported by the oral submission. The oral submission is being recorded, that will be typed in a copy form, and then we'll have that conceded together with the written one that you have sent us.

Thank you very much for that. Now, usually we give time for Commissioners to comment or ask questions in relation to submissions that are made to us from submitters. So I'm going to ask the Commissioners whether they have any comments or questions, which they would want to ask in order to clarify matters from the National Federation Party.

Ms. Nailatikau: Gentleman, and lady. Thank you, Chair, and thank you, members of the National Federation Party, for your submission today. I have a few questions, but in the interest of time, I'll also allow my fellow Commissioners to ask questions.

My question relates to the matter of the Code of Conduct that you have included in your written submission. We've also heard submissions more recently and throughout the consultation process about what happens when parties are wound up or deregistered while their candidates or members are in Parliament. You've spoken about what happens with political parties that may be wound up or deregistered in the lead-up to elections, for instance, but what might your views be relating to MPs or members of Parliament whose parties are deregistered or wound up while the parliamentary term is ongoing?

Mr.Biman: Well, thank you, Commissioner, for that question. With respect to parties which are deregistered, there is a provision in the 2013 Constitution that they become independent members of Parliament and they are then free to join another party. That's in the 2013 Constitution. What we were saying is that the Commission needs to look at in the future.

You know one party got deregistered. They split themselves into three groups. That party also left a debt behind.

I think some of the people who provided services to that party are left in the dark. And now the same people who are part of that have formed parties. Now we are saying that's not acceptable.

If you can't run a party, you can't look after your debt. You have no right to form another party and be a politician or so-called leader. That's what we are saying in our recommendation.

They should be actually discharged as a bankrupt because they owe money to people who provided services to the party. On the Code of Conduct, as I said, it's in the Constitution, Transparency Commission, Code of Conduct. In the last eight years, the previous government brought a bill into Parliament.

We didn't see the light of the day. Unfortunately, we in this term, we brought the bill back. It's still in the Parliament.

I can't give you a timeline when or if it is going to be enacted. But that's why we've made certain recommendations about including it as part of a transitional or saying in the new Constitution a timeline when this should be done for a new government under the new Constitution. In that way, they'll be bound by the Constitution to bring the law into Parliament within that timeframe and have it enacted.

Mr. Kohli. Thank you. Professor Prasad and Mr. Agni Deo, since you are both members of the Parliament, if I'm right, I want to ask you this question.

You have in your submission said that we should have elections under this Constitution as it is, right? You want the election to be held under this Constitution the way it is?

Mr. Biman: We as a party, we have already advocated very clearly that there are certain laws under this Constitution, particularly the electoral law, the political parties act. Some of the provisions are draconian. And we are saying that if we, as I said earlier, the timeline, because we had to go through the Supreme Court, we know the provisions that the Supreme Court has recommended, particularly the reduction from 75% majority to two-thirds majority and the referendum from 75% to a simple majority.

These are good decisions by the Supreme Court to enable a change because with the previous provision, you could never change a constitution. But what we are saying is that if we are going into the election under the 2013 Constitution, there is still time between now and when we have the election to change the provisions in the Electoral Act and the Political Parties Act which restrict political activities. For example, the electoral law, the campaign laws, these are so prohibitive.

You know, you make one mistake, you know, you could be in the court, you know, you say something to somebody about voting for them, could be construed as vote by. These are draconian laws that were enacted by the previous government to keep the opposition at bay. You know, like the manifesto, the Political Party Act is another draconian piece of legislation.

So that can be changed under this Constitution and before the next election. And I'm told that the Attorney General's Office is working on bringing those changes to Parliament around August. My question, in fact, I didn't finish it and you answered part of it.

Mr. Kohli My question, in fact, was this. A suggestion came yesterday that we should defer elections, allow interim government to be there for 12 months till all this is sorted out and then have election. My question is, what do you say to that? Simple answer.

Mr. Prasad: There is no provision in the Constitution to defer elections. Simple. And that's why we are saying that if, and we believe that the timeline is too ambitious to have a new Constitution, to have new electoral arrangements in place, boundaries, looking at the population distribution.

These are very delicate, intricate, requires expert looking at this, appropriate data, statistics to be able to do this properly. And so we are saying that there is no provision in the 2013 Constitution. Supreme Court has said that this Constitution is legally valid.

They've made recommendations. So there is no provision in the Constitution for any attempt to defer the election.

Mr. Kohli: Following up from there, on one hand you wanted to be MMP, writing changes in the electoral system to accommodate everybody.

And on the other hand you are saying that you can't defer elections. My question is, given the time, can we do all this together, like voter education, boundaries, etc. Can that all be done within the time frame?

Mr. Prasad: There is absolutely no contradiction in what I said when I said you have the election and the MMP.Ideally, we would like to have an election and the MMP if we are able. But as I said, the reality is that the timeline is too tight. Because the work that is required to get the MMP, the electoral boundaries, that's not... So there is no contradiction in the way you are saying that we want the election and we want the MMP.

We want the election and we want the MMP to be a part of the next Constitution, whenever that Constitution is put in place.

Mr. Kohli: I stand corrected by you. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Honourable Prasad, we have gone around the country and submissions from the grassroots people is that the electoral system in Fiji is too complex, too complicated for them. One recommendation was that we returned to the multi-constituency voting system or electoral system. That was one submission.

And secondly, that we have a simpler electoral system which is easily understood by the people. Now, you have taken us through the various electoral systems over the years, beginning from 1970 up to 2022. There is an introduction now onto the MMP electoral system.

How easy or how difficult would that be, if I may ask?

Mr. Prasad: Very good question, Chair. Two very straight answers. I agree with you that the current electoral system, the, as I pointed out, Sudoku paper, without any photos or numbers, yes, that confused a lot of people.

But we've had three elections on that. So there is a certain level of familiarity with the current system. The MMP system definitely would be a much better system, much simpler system, because people, voters will have two ballot papers.

You could, one would be for the constituencies, where they can have the photo, they can know the constituency like what you used to have before. So, you get a ballot paper, you have a list of five or ten candidates, you know, Mr. Kohli, Dr. Nilesh Grounder, Biman Prasad, Avinai, Mere, and they all represent different parties. You vote for the individual you want.

Then, the second ballot paper would be just voting for the party and you could have a symbol. Symbol for the party, which used to be, which is the standard that many countries have, symbol of the party. So, you get two ballot papers.

One, you choose the candidate whom you want to vote. And the second ballot paper would be the party you want to vote. So you have a party vote, you have a constituency vote.

And we are recommending 25 constituencies and 45 list members. List members will come from the proportionality of the votes that a party gets. And we are saying that the threshold should be just 5% as it is.

So, yes, the MMP voting system, ballot paper, will be easier and people will become much more familiar. But, we also need time to make the transition. There has to be a lot of education about MMP, about going back.

I mean, we know, we voted on this system. But those who were born after 2006 or 2018 or 2014, or even before that, people who voted for the first time in 2014, have no idea about the constituencies, about party symbols, about having two ballot papers. So, you would require a bit of time, education.

But it will, chair, definitely will be a simpler system of voting than what we have now.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, wonderful Prasad. I believe there is no more comments or questions from the commissioners this afternoon.

Mr. Prasad: I thought Dr. Gounder was going to ask some very difficult questions. He is keeping very quiet. Oh, he says over the Kava, yes.

Mr. Valenitabua: Anyway, thank you very much for your time, Honourable Prasad and Honourable Biman, and ladies and gentlemen of the National Federation Party. It's been a good afternoon. We have been enlightened with other things, which we will deliberate on when we sit down for deliberations starting next week.

Thank you very much. An invitation for a photo shoot.

1.0 Introduction

The National Federation Party (NFP) is the oldest political party in Fiji. The party was born over 6 decades ago in 1963 out of the struggle of the people of the then colonial Fiji for dignity and respect. The late A D Patel and his followers formally launched NFP as a multiracial party in 1963.

The principal objectives of the party have been, are and will remain as follows: -

- To create, promote, foster and preserve a sense of national consciousness among the citizens of Fiji, irrespective of any distinction of community, religion, race or sex;

- To promote, preserve and safeguard the political, economic and social rights of the citizens of Fiji, irrespective of any distinction of community, religion, race or sex;

- To strive to bring about political, economic, social and cultural integration among the citizens of Fiji by pursuing the ideal of seeking "Unity in Diversity", and by creating an atmosphere of goodwill, understanding and mutual respect for the culture and religion of all classes of citizens;

These objectives are timeless and remain as true today as they did when the party was founded. Throughout its political life, working for the national interest the party has retained these objectives as its guiding principles.

Some of these monumental and permanent achievements which the NFP was instrumental in bringing to fruition are: -

- Establishment of Fiji National Provident Fund for the workers of Fiji;
- Establishment of Housing Authority for the ordinary and average working-class citizens of Fiji;

- Enactment of Agricultural Landlord & Tenant Ordinance (ALTO in 1966) and Agricultural Landlord & Tenant Act (ALTA) in 1976 to provide long term stability and security to cane growers and agricultural tenants on leased native, state and freehold land;

- Negotiating the Denning Award and lead the struggle for the departure of Colonial Sugar Refining Company (CSR), bringing prosperity to cane growers and Fiji's sugar industry for many decades and the sharing formula of proceeds as outlined the Award continues to be the basis of calculating cane payments even after 56 years, that ensure cane growers receive 70% share of the proceeds;

- Peaceful achievement of Fiji's Independence under the 1970 Constitution;

- Establishment of the Constitution Review Commission (Sir Paul Reeves led Commission) for the review of the racist and feudalistic 1990 Constitution;

- Successful promulgation of the universally acclaimed 1997 Constitution;

- Only party that has opposed every political upheaval and has not participated or benefited in any way from any post-coup regime or interim administration.

The NFP is the only surviving political party that has had a direct role and enduring impact in Fiji's modern political transition from colonial rule to independence and subsequently providing a robust people's voice in the first seventeen years of independence.

During this period the party also acted with great responsibility and sensitivity in managing the volatile and developing race relations in the country.

Since December 24, 2022, the party is part of the coalition government, which unseated from power the Fiji First government that had ruled Fiji dictatorially since the 5th December 2006 coup till 5th October 2014 and with an iron-fist from 6th October 2014 to 23rd December 2022 under parliamentary democracy.

2.0 Upheavals in Fiji since May 1987

While it is officially recognized that there have been 4 coups in Fiji, namely May 14 and September 25 – both in 1987, May 19, 2000, and 5 December 2006, the NFP submits that there has been usurpation of either the democratically elected government or the constitution on five occasions.

The second coup is recorded as having been executed on 25th September 1987, which trashed the Deuba Accord. The Deuba Accord was agreed to by the deposed NFP/FLP coalition government and the opposition Alliance party in talks mediated by the then Governor-General Ratu Sir Penaia Ganilau.

The military rejected the Accord. Members of the judiciary were sacked. And Fiji was declared a Republic on 7th October 1987.

Similarly, on 10th April 2009, the judgment of the Fiji Court of Appeal delivered on 9th April 2009, re-enforcing the 1997 Constitution as the supreme law of the land and a pathway to returning to parliamentary democracy by August 2009, was trashed by the military regime.

The Appeals Court had ruled that a caretaker government led by someone else other than coup leader and interim Prime Minister Voreqe Bainimarama and deposed PM Laisenia Qarase be appointed to facilitate elections.

On 10th April, that judgment was trashed and the 1997 Constitution abrogated through a Decree. The interim PM/military commander was re-appointed under the Executive Authority of Fiji Decree. Most members of the judiciary were sacked.

Public Emergency Regulations and media censorship were enforced.

Therefore, if trashing of a political accord and events that followed is recorded as a coup, the trashing of the Appeal Court ruling, abrogation of the 1997 Constitution and establishment of a new legal order surely is Fiji's 5th coup.

3.0 Constitution Review

The NFP is the only political party in the country to have either witnessed or actively participated in the formulation of the four Constitutions in our pre or post independent history.

The party actively participated in the negotiations that led to the formulation of the 1970 Constitution and Fiji's Independence as well as the internationally acclaimed 1997 Constitution.

The NFP vigorously opposed the 1990 and 2013 Constitutions that were forced upon the people of Fiji through Decrees after the 1987 and 2006 upheavals respectively.

The party participated in two general elections in May 1992 and February 1994 under the racist and unjust 1990 Constitution to campaign for its change, resulting in the 1997 Constitution.

Similarly, the NFP has in the last three general elections held under the provisions of the 2013 Constitution, prescribed it in its election manifestoes and the vision document of the need to change the 2013 Constitution.

Participation in elections under constitutions that the party has opposed, does not in any way legitimise the supreme law forced upon the people. NFP opposed the1990 Constitution but participated in two elections under its provisions with the sole objective of seeking changes to the racist constitution.

The review process currently underway is born out of the Supreme Court of Fiji Opinion of August 2025 where the highly restrictive review provisions were read down.

The requirements of a 75% parliamentary majority to endorse changes was reduced to 66% and the requirement of 75% majority of total number of registered voters in a referendum on the changes was reduced to majority of those voting in a referendum.

This simply means that recommendations of this Commission, negotiated as part of a political process and tabled in parliament as Fiji's new constitution, will require a 66% majority of members of parliament and a majority of voters who participate in a referendum to endorse it.

4.0 Review process not to be rushed

The NFP is of the firm view that this process must not be rushed. Otherwise, it will be labeled a façade. Realistically, there is no way whatsoever that the next general elections can be held under the provisions of a new constitution.

And the enactment of the past four constitutions either through an agreed democratic process or enforced through a decree and timeline for elections after enforcement of consequential legislation are proof of why it is simply impossible.

In the current context, elections must be held at the latest by February 6th, 2027. And there is no way it can be held under new provisions and a new order.

It is vital that the Commission request His Excellency the President as the appointing authority and who issued the Terms of Reference, for more time instead of the current unrealistic timeline.

There are precedents because consequential legislation must be enacted to give effect to provisions of a constitution.

Under the 1970 Constitution, agreed and legislated before our Independence in October 1970, the first general elections for an independent Fiji were held in April 1972.

Under the imposed 1990 Constitution, promulgated in July 1990, elections were held in May 1992.

The 1997 Constitution (Amendment) Bill was passed in July 1997 and enacted that same month on the 25th. Yet elections were held in May 1999 due to enactment of consequential legislation to give effect to the constitution.

Similarly, the 2013 Constitution was imposed upon the people of Fiji on 7th September 2013. General elections were held on 17 September 2014.

Therefore, the next general elections should still be held under the provisions of the 2013 Constitution with government having the option of changing the Electoral Act in accordance with recommendations of the Multinational Observer Group following the 2014 elections as well as the concerns of political parties.

This Commission, therefore, must not rush the outcome of the review process in conformity to the current timeline because if it does, then the process loses credibility and legitimacy to determine what is right for Fiji.

5.0 Legitimacy of 2013 Constitution

The 2013 Constitution has been found by the Supreme Court to be the legally effective constitution. And on that basis, following the opinion of the Supreme Court to reduce approval requirements for changes, the FCRC has been tasked with recommending changes to the Constitution.

It must be remembered that this constitution was formulated and imposed upon the people of Fiji after repealing Decrees 57 and 58 of 2012 that outlined the process for a new constitution. The report and draft constitution of the Professor Yash Ghai chaired review commission was burnt.

The Ghai draft constitution was in accordance with Decrees 57 and 58. They were Fiji Constitutional Process (Constitution Commission) Decree No. 57, which outlined the limits to the work of the Commission and stipulates the timeline for the acceptance of the Constitution and its assent.

And the Fiji Constitutional Process (Constituent Assembly and Adoption of Constitution) Decree No. 58 set out the limitations on the Constituent Assembly that was to deliberate on the draft report prepared by the Commission.

The 2013 Constitution's formulation in no way followed the processes laid out in both the Decrees and the rest is history.

6.0 Commission's role

This Commission therefore has the responsibility of whether to use the 2013 Constitution as a template and make changes to it or to adopt a totally new approach.

We firmly believe the Commission adopt a hybrid approach. This means the Commission take into account submissions, and incorporate desirable provisions contained both in the 1997 and 2013 Constitutions into a totally new Constitution.

The Commission should present both a draft Constitution and a review report to His Excellency the President. This involves intricate work and requires expertise which the Commission must source and be provided with.

The fact that the Commission is required to recommend changes to the 2013 Constitution does not prevent it in any way from drafting a new constitution altogether.

Incorporating changes in the 2013 Constitution or repealing it is the responsibility of parliament. The 1997 Constitution (Amendment) Act resulted in the repeal of the 1990 Constitution which had provisions for review after 7 years.

Therefore, it does not mean that review prevents the formulation of a totally new legislation or constitution and repeal of existing legislation.

7.0 Deficiencies in 2013 Constitution and Recommendations

A. Preamble

While those who imposed the constitution in 2013 prided themselves in claiming it gave all Fijians common and equal citizenry, the Preamble of the constitution is an impediment to unity. It categorises all those who have made Fiji their home, and in the third paragraph describes Indo-Fijians as descendants of indentured labourers from British India.

We recommend the Preamble must be changed to reflect what the 2nd half of the Preamble of the 1997 Constitution which states: -

RECOGNISING that the descendants of all those who chose to make their homes in these islands form our multicultural society:
AFFIRMING the contributions of all communities to the well-being of that society, and the rich variety of their faiths, traditions, languages and cultures:
TAKING PRIDE in our common citizenship and in the development of our economy and political institutions:
COMMITTING ourselves anew to living in harmony and unity, promoting social justice and the economic and social advancement of all communities, respecting their rights and interests and strengthening our institutions of government:
REAFFIRMING our recognition of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all individuals and groups, safeguarded by adherence to the rule of law, and our respect for human dignity and for the importance of the family,

B. Limitations to the Bill of Rights

The limitations to the Bill of Rights are totally unjustified. There are more limitations than rights. Of course a constitution imposed by a dictatorship will limit the rights and these have to be removed.

We recommend that the Commission incorporate the Bill of Rights in both 1997 and 2013 Constitutions and significantly reduce or remove the limitations to what would be unlawful in a genuine democracy so as to ensure the rights are free and unfettered.

We also recommend that in case of freedom of speech, the new Constitution recommend development of legislation governing use of all platforms of social media, not to impose restrictions, but disallow posting of vulgar and racist content, including personal attacks and promoting lies.

We recommend the removal of the teaching of contemporary and conversational I Taukei and Hindi in schools to be replaced by formal Vosa Vakaviti and Hindi.

We also recommend that right to access land both for agriculture and residential be clearly stipulated and lesees, leases and tenancies include tenants, sub-leases, sub-lesees, and their residences, buildings etc.

This is important because firstly, many citizens who live in informal squatter settlements which may take time to develop by government in terms of provision of proper leases and services, pay rental to landowners on both native and freehold lands.

There have been many cases of forcible takeovers of homes leaving the victims homeless. Similarly, in many agricultural areas, there are those who are sub-lesees or annual tenancy agreement.

All of them need protection until a permanent housing solution and plan is implemented by government but this will be a long-term objective. Therefore the sub-lesees or those in informal settlements need protection.

C. Appointment to Independent Offices

All appointments to Independent Offices is done by the Constitutional Offices Commission (COC). However, the COC itself is a political body. The Chair of the COC is the Prime Minister.

The Attorney-General and 2 nominees of the PM comprise the government while the Leader of the Opposition and his/her nominee are also members.

The COC is makes key appointments for 10 positions namely:-

(a) the chairperson and the members of the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission;
(b) the chairperson and the members of the Electoral Commission;
(c) Supervisor of Elections;
(d) Secretary-General to Parliament;
(e) the chairperson and the members of the Public Service Commission;
(f) Commissioner of Police;
(g) Commissioner of the Fiji Corrections Service;
(h) Commander of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces;
(i) Auditor-General
(j) Governor of Reserve Bank of Fiji

The above 10 positions are extremely important. They must not be appointed by politicans. It defeats the very meaning of constitutional office when politicians sit on it.

We recommend that the provisions of the 1997 Constitution on the appointment of independent/constitutional offices be adopted and strengthened so as to make the appointments truly apolitical for the sake of accountability and transparency.

D. Provision for an Ombudsman

There is no provision for an Ombudsman under the 2013 Constitution, unlike the 1997 Constitution. Sections 157-164 of the 1997 Constitution outline the role responsibilities of an Ombudsman.

We recommend that the new Constitution provides for an Ombudsman who amongst his/her role, has the powers to investigate and recommend prosecution following a complaint by any person, any act or omission of any public officer or employee, office or agency, when such act or omission appears to be illegal, unjust, improper or inefficient.

The Ombudsman shall have served as a judge, at least in the High Court and must be appointed within 3 months of a government taking office under the new constitution.

E. Code of Conduct, Accountability and Transparency Commission & Freedom of Information

Governments elected under both the 1997 and 2013 Constitiutions have failed to bring legislation to the House of Representatives and Parliament respectively to enact these important legislation. These legislation are necessary to give true meaning to accountability, transparency, ethical conduct and good governance.

In April 2016, the then government tabled a Bill on Code of Conduct. Nothing happened and the Bill lapsed before the 2018 general elections. It was revived and the Justice, Law and Human Rights parliamentary committee received public submissions, scrutinised it and tabled its report in April 2019. But nothing happened and the report gathered dust.

It had to be revived after the 2022 elections but it seems unlikely to be legislated. Therefore, the new Constitution must stipulate a time frame.

We recommend provisions for the enactment of legislation to give effect to the Code of Conduct, Accountability and Transparency Commission, and Freedom of Information to ensure a government formed under the new Constitution must within 12 months of taking office enact these legislation. Failure to do so shall require the Ombudsman to refer the matter to the Supreme Court for an opinion.

The Ombudsman shall chair the Accountability and Transparency Commission.

F. FICAC must be abolished or its current role changed

FICAC or Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption has turned into a highly politicised body that has weaponised itself as an organisation of persecution.

This doesn't happen in a democracy. FICAC's prosecution and conviction rate is abysmal because more often than not, it investigates trivial matters and wastes its resources.

It is shameful that an anti-corruption body set up in 2007 and legislated in the 2013 Constitution is obsessed with investigating complaints of alleged non-compliance of Political Parties and Electoral Acts instead of pursuing corruption.

We recommend that FICAC be removed from the constitution and the FICAC Decree/Act be repealed or significantly amended to exlude its role as a an investigating and prosecuting body to one that promotes public awareness about coruption.

A forensic unit should be established within the Fiji Police Force shall investigate cases of alleged corruption and white collar crimes to avoid duplication of resources and weaponisation of an organisation like FICAC.

G. Transitional provisions and Section 173 to be removed

The transitional provisions contained in the 2013 Constitiution entrenched dictatorship in a parliamentary democracy. No constitutiuon should have those provisions. For example, all Decrees automaticaly became Acts without ratification or scrutinity by Parliament.

Further, Section 173 prevents parliament's role from changing the Decrees wrongly enacted under Section 165. This was at the height of dictoarship in the pretext of givinbg Fiji true democracy.

There are many draconian Decrees still in force, now dubiously called Acts without parliament scrutiny. These Decrees, promulgated for example after forceful termination of personnel prohibits the victims from seeking redress or justice. They disallow any Tribnunal or Court from accepting and hearing proceedings. This is unheard of in a democracy.

We recommend that Sections 165 amd 173 be removed from the new constitution. And al Decrees that have not reached the floor of parliament in the last twelve years, be scrutinised by parliament before being either enacted or repealed.

H. No need for a provision like Section 131(2)b in a Constitution

Section 131(2) of the 2013 Constitution that states "It shall be the overall responsibility of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces to ensure at all times the security, defence and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians", is a recipe for future upheavals.

This was imported from the 1990 Constitution as well as a submission by the RFMF to the Ghai Commission. This was not in the 1997 Constitution.

Recently, the RFMF Commander, while presenting the institution's submissuion to the FCRC clearly outlined the military's role, which is to respect or be be subservient to civilian authority at all times. The role of the armed forces in the upheavals of our history cannot be ignored.

The current RFMF Commander respects civilian authority. But a constitution should not provide a legal basis for the RFMF to enforce its authority.

We recommend the removal of any reference to the RFMF as being responsible at all times for the overall safety of Fiji and well-being of Fijians because it is a legal avenue for any future upheaval.

I. Immunity must be removed

Chapter 10 of the 2013, which entrenches immunity for upheavals in 1987, 2000, 2006 and abrogation of the 1997 Constitution in 2009, sets a dangerous precedent. Because the Immunity also entreches Limitation of Liabilities for Prescribed Political Events Decree 2010.

And this Decree is an Act under the Constitution, under the transitional provisions of the constitution.

This Decree or Act gives blanket and irrevocable immunity to the armed forces for the upheaval of 2000, those responsible for the abrogation of the 1997 Constitution in May 2000, mutiny of November 2000, in respect of those who carried out the acts ordered by the then RFMF Commander.

It also grants the RFMF commander at the time immunity for his correspondence to government up to 2006.

The Decree/Act grants immunity for the December 2006 upheaval, the abrogation of the 1997 Constitution in April 2009 and continues in existence until the first day of parliament on 6th October 2014.

And immunity extends to all those who served in the military an d interim regimes from 5th December 2006 to 5th October 2014.

It also incorporates immunity from May 14 to 5th December 1987 for the coups of that year.

We are in full agreement with the rationale provided by the RFMF Commander that given the Supreme Court's opinion of "democratic deficit" in respect of recognition of the 2013 Constitution to be legally effective, the immunity provisions must be removed from the new constitution.

No longer should anyone grant him or herself immunity for usurping government or violating human rights.

This is important for transparency and accountability.

J. Entrenchment of Group Rights

Unlike the 1997 Constitution, group rights, expecially legislation pertaining to these, are not entrenched.

The infamous Bill No. 17 of 2021, that resulted in the arrest of some oppositiion politicians including two from our party at the height of Covid-19 as well as curfew, is a stark reminder of what may happen in future.

This government repealed the Act arising out of Bill No. 17 but we have to secure the future for both landowners and the tenant community.

We recommend the entrenchment of the followimg legislation in conformity to Section 185 of the 1997 Constitution namely: -
i-Taukei Affairs Act
i-Taukei Development Fund Act
i-Taukei Lands Act
i-Taukei Lands Trust Act
Agricultural Land and Tenant Act
Rotuma Act
Rotuma Lands Act
Banaban Lands or Settlement Act

Amendment to these Acts must require 66% of parliamentary majority.

K. Stricter laws preventing Environment degradation and Cruelty against Animals

The new constitution must make provisions to prevent degradation of the environment and cruelty against animals or protecting animal welfare which are becoming a major issues. These canot be taken for granted any longer.

We recommend that the new constitution has provisions for stringent laws against the:

degradation of the environment cruelty against animals and promote animal welfare

L. Conduct of political parties

The Political Parties (Registration, Conduct, Funding & Disclosires) Decree/Act was designed to throttle parties when the regime decided to draft and impose a new constitution after burning the Ghai draft that was done in accordance with the then Decrees 57 and 58.

The legislation has been used to punish political parties. It has to be repealed.

We recommend the repeal of the Decree and the following: -

A code of coduct for political parties which must include holding of its Annual General Meeting within the calendar financial year.

Prohibition on those principal office holders of a political party wound up or de-registered for non-payment of debt from either contesting any type of election including general election or forming another political party.

M. Electoral system - MMP

Fiji has had the First Past the Post under the 1970 and 1990 Constitutions, Alternative Vote under the 1997 Constitution and D'Hondt system under the 2013 Constituion as systems of voting in a general election. In the local government elections held from 1973 to 2005, it was common roll.

Under the 1970 Constitution, Fiji had a 52-Member House of Represenrtatives elected under both communal and national seats, a 70-Member House of Represernatives purely under communal voting under the 1990 Constitution, a 71-Member House of Representatives elected under both communal and open seats and currently 55 Members under so-called common roll in the 2013 Constitution, which doesn't do justice to votes of equal vcalue because of calculations under the D'Hondt system.

The D'Hondt system, widely touted as a common roll, was like Sudoku, with voters selecting a number. There was no name or symbol on an A3 size ballot paper.

This did not produce proportional representation as prescribed in the constitution. For example, at the end of 2018 elections, Fiji First's share of votes constituted 26.2 seats in a 51-Member Parliament. NFP's vote share constituted 3.95 seats.

In mathematics 26.2 should become 26 and 3.95 should become 4. Not so under D'Hondt system. 26.2 increased to 27 while 3.95 was reduced to 3. It rendered meaningless the meaning of proportionality.

The Sir Paul Reeves led Constitution Review Commission, recommended a 70-Member House of Representatives with 25 Members to be elected on communal roll and 45 under Open roll. It also recommended that all communal constitutencies be turned into Open seats over time to promote multiracial voting.

These recommendations were 30 years ago.

Based on experiences since our Indepedence and with rapidly changing demographics we recommend the following:

The new Constitution make provision for a 70-Member Parliament to be elected under the electoral system of Mixed Member Proportional Representation (MMP).

The nation be divided into 25 Constituencies and Members elected on non-racial lines to be determined by the Constituency Boundaries Commission. Elections for the 25 Constituenciues be held under the First Past the Post system.

45 Members to be elected under a Closed List System strictly based on proportionality.

That there be two ballot papers issued to voters – one for the respective constituency and the other for the party vote of their choice.

The threshold for eligibility of seats in parliament remain at 5% of the total valid votes cast in a general election.

Should a candidate, who contests a constiutuency, also appear on the closed list of his or her parrty and win the seat from the constituency and also qualify to be elected under the list in accordance with the ranking, another candidate on the list ranked just below him or her qualifies for election.

The NFP has proposed this electoral system because we genuinely believe given our changing demographics, the MMP benefits both the majority and minority communities.

The system also eliminates communal voting and guarantees representation of the minorities either from one of the 25 constituencies or from the closed list of parties.

The system will also ensure greater representation of women and youth in parliament without the imposition of preferred measures because parties will strategically rank miniroties, women and youth high on the closed list, which will also be witnessed by voters both during campaign after nominations and on polling day.

M(1). Power sharing

The 1997 Constitution mandated power-sharing in government. This is important in a multiracial nation like Fiji. The winner take all concept is not conducive to good governance.

We recommend that parties that win 5% of seats in parliament have a right to be invited to Cabinet. Parties with less than 5% threshold may be invited to join Cabinet by the Prime Minister and portfolios given to such Members will come from the share of portfolios from the PM's party.

N. Land tenure – Master Lease concept

The major problem of expiring agricultural land leases and finiding solutions for their problem has been a generational issue. Whenever solutions were found, it was done through negotiation and consensus on the part of the Opposition, representating tenants and the Government, representing the landowners namely the Crown and later State and the I-Taukei Land Trust Board as custodians of native land.

In 1966, the NFP, led by its founder leader Ambalal Dahyabhai Patel was the Opposition leader in the Legislative Council, negotiated the Agricultural Landlord and Tenant Ordinance or ALTO, providing for a lease tenure of 10 years.

Ten years later, the NFP, led by the then Opposition leader Siddiq Moidin Koya negotiated Agricultural Landlord and Tenant Act or ALTA that provided for a minimum tenure of 30 years.

Following the unanimous passage and adoption of the 1997 Constitution, a Joint Parliamentary Select Committee on ALTA was formed.

The same approach that resulted in both the NFP in Opposition, led by then Opposition leader Jai Ram Reddy and the SVT Government led by then and current Prime Minister Honourable Sitiveni Rabuka was being adopted to find an amicable solution to the issue of expiring leases.

Before the JPSC was dissolved in March 1999 due to the dissolution of the House of Representatives ahead of the May general elections that year, the NFP proposed the concept of a Master Lease.

Under this proposal, the Government would lease agricultural land from the I-TLTB, the State and those freehold lands used for agriculture at the rate of 10% UCV or Un-improved Capital Value of Land and then lease out the land to tenants at a UCV of 6%.

The tenure or duration of the leases was proposed to be 50 years.

PM Rabuka proposed that apart from a 50-year lease, a tenant would be informed by TLTB during the 25th year of the lease whether the landowning unit wanted or not.

If the landowning unit wanted the land for its use, a tenant would have 25 years to prepare to leave the land at the end of the lease.

If the landowners did not require the land in future, then the lease would be automatically extended by another 25 years making it a term of 75 years.

We still believe that the concept of Master lease is still highly relevant.

We recommend that:-

- Government obtain all leases of I Taukei, State and Freehold agricultural land under a Master Lease and pay the landowners/landlords under a 10% UCV or Un-imporoved Capital Value as lease money.
- Government then lease out such land to tenants at a UCV rate of 6%.
- The tenure or duration of the lease be 50 years.
- If during the 25th year of lease the landowner/landlord wants the land for his/her or the mataqali and State's use, the tenant has 25 years to prepare to leave the land.
- If the land isn't required for future use, then the lease is automatically extended by another 25 years making the tenure 75 years.

Salient features of the 2013 Constitution

There is a lot of emotion on the issue of both common and equal citizenry by adopting the common name or nationality of "Fijian" for all our citizens and recognition of Fiji as a "Secular State".

It is the manner in which it was legislated in the 2013 Constitution without any consultation. Had there been consultation and consensus building, we are certain there would have been no opposition to these noble concepts.

Be as it may, the name "Fijian" for all citizens and recognition of Fiji as a "Secular State" is extremely logical and the best way to enhance unity and progress in our multi-ethnic, multi-cultural and multi-religious nation.

For Fiji citizens to be called "Fijian" is not new. It was done long before being legislated in the 2013 Constitution.

Our first internationally recognised sportsman the late Josefa Levula, a renowned track athlete, rugby union and rugby league star, was known internationally as "The Flying Fijian" a few decades before our Indepedence in 1970.

Ou national rugby team is know as the "Flying Fijians" because of Levula.

Professional golfer Vijay Singh, who won 3 golf majors and at one stage became the number one ranked golfer in the world, is known as the "Big Fijian".

Recommendation

Therefore, there is absolutely no debate about why citizens of Fiji are not Fijians by nationality.

NFP totally supports "Fijian" as our common identity or nationality because it inculcates pride and patriotism. NFP's founder leader Ambalal Dahyabhai Patel (A D Patel) pointed out as early as August 1964 that, "Won't it be better if we thought less of our race and more of our nationality?"

Similarly, there should be no debate about why Fiji should be recognised as a "Secular State". While it has been legislated in the 2013 Constitution, Fiji has always been a secular state since Independence.

We may have been compartmentalised during the colonial rule. We may have voted along ethincity in general elections. We may have and are continuing to display racist traits on social media platforms.

But overwhelmingly, we have lived and co-existed peacefully, except during the tumultous times of political upheavls.

We have public holidays for Easter, Christmas, Diwali, Prophet Muhammad's birthday. We observe Ram Navmi, Krishn Janamasti, Eid-ul-Fitr, Lent and other religious and cultural events. We have Tuesday prayers like Ramayan, Jumma on Fridays and Church on the weekends.

This is secularism. This is racial and religious tolerance.

We fully support the new constitution recognising Fiji as a Secular State

Summary of recommendations

- ✓ All Fiji citizens to be called Fijians as their nationality or common name
- ✓ Fiji to be recognised as a Secular State
- ✓ Preamble to be changed
- ✓ Bill of Rights limitations to be removed and strengthened
- ✓ Appointments to Independent offices not be politicised
- ✓ Provision for an Ombudsman
- ✓ Strict timeline for Code of Conduct and Accountablity and Transparency Commission
- ✓ FICAC to be abolished and its role changed
- ✓ Immunity to be removed

- ✓ Entrenchment of Group Rights
- ✓ Transitional provisions and Section 173 to be removed
- ✓ No need for Section131(2) in any Constitution
- ✓ Stricter laws protecting against environment degradation and cruelty against animals
- ✓ Conduct of political parties
- ✓ MMP system to be used in general elections and the threshold for eligibility for qualification of seats in parliament remain at 5% of total valid votes
- ✓ Solution to expiring land leases – Master Lease concept
- ✓ Commision not to rush work on constitutiuonal process

Conclusion

The NFP submits these recommendations in the national interest.

We believe these are pre-requistes to re-settling the moral compass of transparency, accountability and good governance by recomending and legislating a constitution that outlasts other four constitutons.

And the constitutional process must not be rushed or risks being a farce like the 2013 constitution.

Ultimately, the Report of the Commission will undergo scrutiny as part of the political and parliamentary process.

It will require intense negotiations, dialogue and consensus building to arrive at a constitution that is in that promotes the interest of all Fijians.

Great Council of Chiefs (Closing)

GCC Second Submission
Date:10-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: The chairman of the Great Council Chiefs, welcome you all to the level 9 of Suvavou House. Thank you for joining us this afternoon for another consultation session with the Constitution Review Commission. We were happy to receive another request for a second session with us and we have changed this second session to the closing session for consultations from the CRC.

You opened the consultation session on the 1st of April 2026 and today is the last day for the extended consultation period which the Constitution Review Commission has decided to take. And you being the last group of submitters to appear before us this afternoon, we will also be bringing this consultation to the end after this. We welcome you all.

We hope to hear more new submissions from the great Council of Chiefs at Paramount Forum for the Taukei people of the Republic of Fiji. Sitting before you this afternoon are five commissioners, six commissioners. I will ask each of them to introduce themselves despite the fact that I know that you would know most of us.

So, I would start on with, I would now re-invite Mr Conway Beg to start off the introductions this afternoon.

Mr. Beg: Thank you Chair. Chairman of the Great Council of Chiefs, Honourable members. Thank you for coming back in today. I look forward to your submission. Again, my name is Conway Beg and I'm an architect by profession. Hopefully I can contribute in this space. Thank you. Good afternoon gentlemen of the Great Council of Chiefs.

Ms. Nailatikau: My name is Merewalesi. My background is in public diplomacy and public policy and I look forward to your contributions this afternoon. Good afternoon, Chairman and gentlemen. My name is John Charles Fatiaki. I come from the village of Motusa, the island of Rotuma and I welcome you this afternoon. Thank you again for your presence. I'm a medical practitioner and a former Senator.

Mr. Kohli: Good afternoon, Chairman and members of the Great Council of Chiefs. I'm Ami Kohli. I'm from Labasa.

Dr. Gounder: Good afternoon Honourable Chairman of the Great Council of Chiefs and members of the Great Council of Chiefs. My name is Neelesh Gounder. I'm an academic at USP. I look forward to your submission this afternoon and it's great to have you back for the submission. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Good afternoon Honourable Chairman of the Great Council of Chiefs I'm Sevuloni Valenitabua, I'm from Nukui Rewa. I will not explain further. I'm sure you have been following where we were, we've been to Lau, Lomaiviti, Beqa, Ovalau, Vanualevu, Vitilevu, Sigatoka. Nadi, Ba and Yasawa and we pout Rewa Last and also Rotuma. So, without further ado I would invite the chairman great council of chief to start of this afternoon.

Mr. Seruvakula: Nisa bula, Honorable Chair, members of the Constitution Review Committee, and ladies and gentlemen, everyone in the room, please allow me on behalf of the Great Council of Chiefs to convey our sincere gratitude in granting us another opportunity, and of course, to deliver the final oral submission, perhaps what can only be described as a defining moment in our young nation's history. Mr. Chairman, to, if I may, set the scene and to understand why Fiji urgently requires a new autochthonous constitution, we must look honestly at our history trajectory. Since the signing of the Deal of Session of 1874, the Taukei people have journeyed from colonial governorship through the dawn of independence in 1970.

Our ancestors envisioned a nation where indigenous governance and modern democracy would work. Hand in hand to foster economic resilience, for self-reliance, rather. However, the political instability of the post-independence era, marked by successive coups, profoundly disrupt this momentum.

Instead of allowing the indigenous population to naturally transition into robust drivers of the national economy, these political disruptions fractured our social fabric and stalled our collective progress. The iTaukei, possesses vast natural resources. Yet historically, we have been restricted from evolving into significant wealth creators, commercial innovators, and global exporters.

The structural barriers of the 2013 constitution imposed without the genuine consultation or consent of the Vanua, exacerbated these historical setbacks. It was designed under a flawed philosophy of forced uniformity. By attempting to erase cultural distinctions and dismantle traditional safeguards under the guise of equal civic citizenship, the current framework has actively disabled the economic potential of indigenous majority.

The suppression of economic agency. By rendering the term of fair share, vague regarding resource royalties, the current framework denies landowners an equitable stake in the commercial exploitation of their resources. Impediment to middle-class growth.

A community that cannot transition into a prosperous middle-class when its customary structures are legally marginalized and its people are treated as passive recipients of state benevolence, rather than active commercial parties. The erosion of institutional integrity. The decentralization of executive power and the removal of the great council of chiefs.

Constitutional status stripped the iTaukei of the protective legal architecture required to confidently leverage their assets to long-term wealth creation. True national stability cannot be achieved by keeping the largest segment of the population economically marginalized or structurally restricted from the fruits of commercial development. A vision for genuine unity, the constructive assurance.

The Bose Levu Vakaturaga Mr. Chairman, and ladies and gentlemen does not seek a new constitution to diminish the rights of any community in Fiji. On the contrary, we present a vision where indigenous recognition, equal civic citizenship coexists constructively. We offer the solemn and constructive assurance to this honorable commission and to all citizens of Fiji when indigenous people are provided with the correct constitutionalized platform, the proper legal safeguards and targeted institutional support to become genuine wealth creators utilizing their own resources. It will not divide this country. It will unite it. When the iTaukei thrive economically, transitioning from resource rich but cash pool and owners into exporters, entrepreneurs and a stable middle class, the entire national economy expands.

Economic security eliminates the anxieties that have historically fueled political instability. By recommending a return to a pluralistic framework such as the reinstatement of the chapter two compact of 1997 constitution, we are advocating for a national conscience, a new constitution that respects the indigenous foundation of Fiji while guaranteeing the rights of all citizens will replace forced uniformity with genuine lasting harmony. We thank the commission for its dedication to this historic review and pray that your deliberations lay the bedrock for fairer, wealthier and truly united Fiji.

Mr. Chairman, the great council of chief having made the initial submission to this honorable commission on 30th of March of this year, hereby reaffirms its position as the apex body of the traditional iTaukei leadership. The council further underscores its role as the custodian of the customary supremacy inherent within the iTaukei governance structure. Our presence here today is not to repeat our initial presentation, but to add and compliment the voice of the people of Fiji and who have come forward to express their wish for a better constitution to guide the aspirations for a better prosperous Fiji.

In the exercise of this traditional authority, the great council of chief undertook a comprehensive process of awareness and consultation across the provinces of the provisional Bose Vanua's. And through these consultations, the council shared its initial submission for the understanding and endorsement of the Vanua. Chiefs who sit within the Bose Vanua ni Yasana are duly identified and registered as the rightful holders of the chiefly titles under the native lands and fisheries commission and have been traditionally installed by the respective Vanua.

These esteemed chiefs, Mr. Chairman, possess the inherent and customary rights to participate fully in the deliberation of the Bose Vanua. It was upon this platform that the Vanua came to appreciate the great council of chief's intent and the significance of its submission. The Vanua subsequently granted the endorsement and support evidence by the signatures thereby affirming their solidarity within the GCC submission, a copy of which will be submitted after our presentation, Mr. Chairman.

This endorsement forms the foundation of the submission which we're privileged, that we are privileged to present before this honorable commission. The significance of this endorsement extends beyond our procedural consultation. It reflects the conceded judgment of the heredity chiefs of the Vanua who have from time immemorial provided leadership, maintained social order, cohesion, safeguarded the welfare of their people and exercised stewardship over their customary lands and social construct, the Wu Valley, Tokatoka, Mataqali, Yavusa, Koro, and the Vanua.

It was through the foresight and wisdom of these chiefs, of these chiefly leaders that Fiji sought the protection of the British crown under the deed of session. And it is through that same enduring institution of traditional leadership that the social, cultural, and economic advancement of the indigenous people continues to be guided today. The great council of chiefs therefore respectfully submits that the views presented before this honorable commission today are not merely those of the council itself, but are reaffirmed and supported by the recognized hereditary leadership of the Vanua throughout Fiji.

The great council of chief has deliberately followed this approach in recognition of effect. The chiefs are regarded as the supreme leaders of their communities, having been endowed during installation with both 'mana and sau'. The installation ceremonies itself signifies control of supremacy and leadership, solemnly affirming that the chief is entrusted to lead, to articulate the voice of the Vanua, and to make decisions for its welfare.

This investiture ensures that the chief governs not merely as an individual, but as a living embodiment of the Vanua's will for the advancement and collective benefit of the iTaukei people. Furthermore, during the great council of chief's awareness and consultation process across the 13 provinces, the 13 boss of Vanua's regarding its first submission, and in gathering the views of the Vanua on the great council of chief's proposal. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, more than 307 chiefs attended the 13 provincial bose of Vanua.

Collectively, these chiefs represent 514,244 Itaukei people equivalent to 92.58% of Fiji's total Itaukei population, and 58.10% of Fiji's overall population. This broad representation underscores the legitimacy, inclusivity, and national significance of the great council of chief's submission. This further noted that this representation remains constant.

Irrespective of the decisions made by the itaukei people during national elections, in matters of tradition, chiefs are born into the chiefly titles and are deeply respected within the Vanua. Their authority is not contingent upon electoral process, but upon enduring cultural, spiritual foundations of itaukei society. The written submission that will be filed after these oral presentations, sets out the recommendations of the great council of chiefs in full.

In this oral submission, I will summarize the main constitutional reforms we are asking the commission to consider. At the heart of the submission is one central principle. Fiji's constitution must protect equal citizenship for, while also recognizing the distinct identity, rights, institutions, land, language, and customary system of indigenous itaukei and Rotuman people.

True national unity cannot be built by erasing difference. It must be built through mutual respect, legal clarity, democratic accountability, and substantive equity. The submission therefore recommends a shift away from forced constitutional uniformity and towards a more honest and stable pluralism.

Mr. Chairman, honorable members of the commission, the great council of chiefs is the apex representative body of the indigenous people of Fiji, respectfully presents this final submission to complement our early submissions. I will briefly speak to the written submission on the issues we have highlighted. A copy of submission once again has been forwarded for the perusal of the honorable committee members.

Our position is clear. The great council of chiefs does not accept the legitimacy of the 2013 constitution and believes Fiji should ultimately move towards a new, genuinely consultative and autonomous constitution, one developed by the people. For the people.

Our submission is made in good faith. It is not intended to diminish the rights of any community, but to strengthen constitutional legitimacy, democratic governance, national unity, and respect for the rule of law, while ensuring proper recognition of the indigenous foundations of our nation. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I'll touch on education first.

The protection of indigenous language. We recommend that 'Navosa Vakaviti' be made a compulsory core subject in all primary schools. Unlike global languages with large international speaker bases, the itaukei language has no external homeland.

If it declines in Fiji, it declines everywhere. Conventional Fiji Hindi and other languages should remain available as elective subjects based on community demand and school capacity. On early childhood medium of instruction, from early childhood education to year three, the main medium of instruction should be the indigenous vernacular or mother tongue of the majority student cohort.

Early learning in the mother tongue supports literacy, numeracy, confidence, cognitive development, especially in rural and maritime schools. Affirmative action in education. We recommend constitutionally authorized affirmative action in education, including targeted scholarships, educational development funds, and support for Itaukei, Rotuman, rural, and maritime and other disadvantaged students.

On the ethnic disaggregated educational data, we recommend restoring ethnic disaggregated education data across national examinations. Fiji education management information systems, scholarship systems, and the Bureau of Statistics. Without proper data, the state cannot see where disadvantage lies and cannot fairly allocate resources.

Differential resourcing formula. Mr. Chairman, lady, and gentlemen, we recommend a differential resourcing formula for schools funding. A flat per student funding model favors large urban schools, and disadvantaged small, rural, and maritime schools, where costs are higher and infrastructure is weaker.

Funding should consider remoteness, low enrollment, poverty, utilities, access, transport, and school vulnerability. On constitutional legitimacy. Many indigenous communities believe the 2013 constitution was not created through a process that secured meaningful participation or consent from the vanua and its traditional institutions.

The committee is invited to consider whether Fiji's long-term constitutional stability would be better served by a constitutional framework that enjoys broad public support and explicit endorsement from both the wider population and the 'vanua'. We recommend that the, we recommend the restoration of the 1997 constitutional governance framework where appropriate. These, Mr. Chairman, includes reinstating the chapter two compact from 1997 constitution.

It would protect Itaukei, Rotuman land, customs, and cultural rights, while also affirming the equal rights of all citizens to democratic participation and protection under the law. On the recognition of the great council of chiefs. We, the great council of chiefs, historically played an important constitutional and advisory role in matters affecting indigenous affairs.

It's omission from the current constitution has weakened traditional governance and reduced indigenous participation in national decision-making. We further recommend that the Bose Levu Vakaturaga, great council of chiefs, be restored to constitutional status. Recent statutory recognition is important, but ordinary legislation can be changed by future governors.

Constitutional recognition will protect the dignity, continuity, and apex guardianship role of the great council of chiefs in relation to itaukei identity, land, custom, and traditional welfare. Consistent with international standards, including the UN declaration of human rights on the rights of indigenous people, or in short, UN DRIP, we recommend constitutional recognition of the GCC and other traditional institutions. On the constitutional recognition of the itaukei, of the indigenous people of this country, the great council of chiefs, Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, supports equal citizenship for every Fijian.

However, equality should not prevent explicit constitutional recognition of the itaukei as the original inhabitants and customary owners of the land and custodians of Fiji's traditional institutions. Equal citizenship and indigenous recognition can and should exist together. On the protection of customary land and natural resources, Mr. Chairman, the great council of chiefs submits that while customary land ownership is protected, the constitution provides insufficient recognition of customary authority and natural resources, including minerals, forests, rivers, coastal areas, and traditional fishing grounds.

Customary ownership should extend to the full range of resource traditionally belonging to the Vanua. Consistent with its understanding of the full extent of ownership prior to the execution of the deed of cession in 1874. We further propose that where the government acquires freehold land, and that land is no longer required for a public purpose, it should automatically revert to itaukei reserve land classification and not remain freehold, as it is the current practice under section 29.5. This will ensure that such land is never again permanently alienated.

The great council of chiefs recommends strengthening section 30 of land owners' rights to royalty. The phrase fair share is too vague. We therefore recommend a clear constitutional minimum of no less than 20% of gross royalties of financial yields for land owners.

A mandatory 10 to 15% non-dilutable equity or partnership for land owning units in commercial extraction ventures. The great council of chiefs, Mr. Chairman, endures a fair and equitable royalty distribution framework based on the proportional share of gross income. Rather than a fixed royalty rate to better reflect fluctuations in market prices, now under these proposed arrangements, gross income would be allocated on the basis of a 60% to the developer for the risk they take to come to our country and invest.

20% of project capex, capex would be retained as a refundable environmental bond and held in escrow for the duration of the project, subject to satisfactory environmental compliances, compliance and rehabilitation obligations. Now the remaining 40% local share would be apportioned to 10% to the state and 30% to the Taukei Land Trust Board for distribution to the customary land owners through its established dividend distribution policy. This payment proposal must replace schedule three of the current royalty rates of the state-led leases and license amended regulations of 2026 that has just been shared lately.

Contrary to some thought that it is one of the best things in sliced bread, it is not. It's so outdated. We also recommend reinstating the substance of section 186 of 1997 constitution on customary law and traditional processes.

Mr. Chairman, parliament should be required to legislate for the structured application of customary law, including traditional dispute resolution, notwithstanding any other provisions of this constitution where the exercise of a right or freedom conferred by this constitution is inconsistent with recognized customary rights. The recognized customary rights shall prevail to the extent of the inconsistency. The balance of executive power.

Mr. Chairman, lady and gentlemen, the great council of chiefs is concerned about the concentration of executive authority, particularly in the office of the prime minister and the attorney general. Effective government must be accompanied by effective check and balances. We encourage reforms that strengthen parliamentary oversight, institutional independence and constitutional accountability.

Where the overextension of executive powers is used for creation and control of institutions such as FICAC, there is a tendency that vesting of power and the control of a single official may lead to abusive use of power to possibly render the machinations of such institutions as a political tool. A significant constitution distinction is that FICAC was not established by the 2013 constitution, but by a Fiji independent commission against corruption act of 2007. Consequently, the more compelling constitutional argument is not that FICAC's existence itself reflects executive overreach, but that the 2013 constitution framework facilitated or failed to impose adequate constraints on executive influence over key accountability institutions, including FICAC.

Mr. Chairman, lady and gentlemen, the great council of chiefs therefore call for the dissolution of FICAC. With the duties and functions divulged into an appropriate internal bureau housed within the appropriate division of government services such as the public service commission on indigenous representation and electoral reform, the current nationwide electoral system promotes equality, but may not always ensure adequate representation of indigenous communities, particularly those in rural and traditional areas which strongly recommend the abolishing the single national constituency model. The current system tends to favor heavily populated urban areas and weakens regional and maritime representation.

The submission proposes 60 parliaments based on large regional multi-member constituencies and dedicated maritime or isolated constituencies. Central, Western, Northern divisions would have regional representation while Lomaiviti, Kadavu, Lau and Rotuma would have specific seats. The 5% electoral threshold may be retained to prevent excessive fragmentation, but representation must better reflect Fiji's geography and communities.

And constitutional amendment. The great council of chiefs strongly support the introduction of a referendum mechanism alongside a more reasonable parliamentary threshold to amend the 2013 constitution. The current requirement of a 75% parliamentary majority in a referendum Monday, is 75% of all registered voters has created near permanent deadlock, making a meaningful reform, almost impossible and rendering the constitution virtually unamendable.

While stability is essential, the constitution must also remain responsive to the evolving needs of the nation and afford genuine opportunities for review. The great council of chief's submission therefore recommends restoring the 1997 style framework where constitutionally amendments require a two thirds majority in both houses of parliament. With special protection for indigenous interests.

In particular, any amendment affecting token land, custom, traditional titles, the Bose levu Vakaturaga indigenous rights should require the support of the great council of chiefs appointed senators. To compliment this, the great council of chief advocates the national referenda on constitutional amendments should be decided by a civil majority or simple majority of 50 plus one set, 50% plus one rather. Ensuring both democratic legitimacy and practical flexibility for reform.

On indigenous self-determination and safeguards. Mr. Chairman, international law recognizes the right of indigenous people to maintain their own political, legal and cultural institutions. The great council of chiefs believes constitution should provide stronger recognition and rights and recognition of indigenous participation in decisions affecting traditional land, resource and customary governance.

We recommend constitutional mechanisms that ensure meaningful consultation and enhanced protection whenever legislation affects customary land, natural resources, traditional governance or other indigenous rights. On the rights of labor and democratic freedoms, we recommend narrowing the broad limitation costs in the 2013 Bill of Rights. Restrictions on rights such as freedom of assembly should only be allowed where they are reasonable and justifiable in a free democratic society.

The state should not be able to rely on vague grounds such as public order or national security without strict proportionality and sensitive evidence. We strongly recommend the deletion of section 20 sub part five relating to employment relations. The constitution should genuinely protect the rights of workers to organize, bargain collectively and strike.

Labor rights should not be suspended merely because an industry is labor essential or because of broad economic interests. We also recommend removing the attorney general from the mercy commission. The office of the attorney general, Mr. Chairman is a political office holder and legal advisor to the government.

The power of mercy must be independent, impartial and free from political influence. The chair of the mercy commission should instead be an independent person appointed by the judicial service commission on public administration and separation of powers. Mr. Chairman, we recommend strengthening the neutrality of the public service.

The permanent secretaries should have independent authority over staffing, promotion, discipline and daily administration. The ministers should set policy and provide oversight. But they should not interfere in civil service personnel decisions.

This protects merit-based recruitment, reduce nepotism and favoritism and restores the boundary between political leadership and professional administration. We also recommend amending section 57. So, the trade unions, employee federations and civil society associations are not treated as public offices.

These are independent organizations, not state institutions. Their inclusion as public office weakens the freedom of association and undermines workers' representation. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, on the Rotuma, we counsel the Rotuman people.

We have received as part of our arrangement within the great council of chiefs to represent the three representatives from Rotuma shared with us their views on that. And they did tell us that they will meet the commission in Rotuma. But if I may, please allow me to share with you the views of the support from the great council of chiefs on constitutional recognition.

On behalf of the great council of chiefs, Mr. Chairman, it is a profound honor to prevent, to present the formal submission on behalf of the Rotuma Island Council and the people of Rotuma, whose collective aspirations have been meticulously gathered through extensive consultations across all seven districts and with the endorsement of the council of chiefs. This submission, of course, does not represent a pursuit of independence or cessation from the Republic of Fiji. Rather, it is advanced in the spirit of deep respect and enduring partnership to strengthen our constitutional relationship by restoring formal recognition of Rotuma's unique historical, legal, and cultural status within the state.

We believe that there needs the, we propose ladies, Mr. Chairman, lady and gentlemen, that in the new constitution, we have a dedicated constitutional chapter. The submission proposed a modest amendment to the preamble alongside the insertion of a dedicated constitutional chapter entitled Rotuma and the Rotuman people. In the 2013 constitution, you'll see Rotuma mentioned sporadically throughout the document, and it's of no little wonder Rotuma has been treated as another province of Fiji by the current government or in policies we're making.

Now, this framework seeks to formally recognize the Rotuma Isle Council as the principal representative institution of the people. Mandate meaningful consultation on all policies affecting the island. Safeguard customary land and marine resources from amendment without consent.

Restore guaranteed parliamentary representation. The connection to the great council of chiefs reflecting the interconnected traditional leadership of our nation, the three grand chiefs of Rotuma Island serve as esteemed members of the great council of chiefs. It is my distinct privilege to say to this honorable commission that the great council of chiefs of Fiji stands in complete solidarity with and formally support the submission presented by the Rotuma Island Council and the Rotuman people.

As we collectively seek to preserve our unique identity while contributing positively alongside the itaukei brothers and sisters to United Fiji. Mr. Chairman, of recent times, we have the great council of chiefs have been constantly asked by the media about the drug issues that's happening in the country, the crisis, and we've been asked time and time again is what is the great council of chiefs doing about it? The great council of chiefs have been involved in a dialogue with all levels of the leadership within the Vanua in their efforts towards bringing the people together in the fight against drugs. But we've noticed that beyond that out towards our borders, there is a gap that exists that needs to be, that has to be able to be breached in order to prevent these drugs coming into the country.

So, we've come up with, we've occurred after consultation with relevant authorities, we've come up with the recommendation for a to be included in the constitution, a maritime powers act. Now Fiji does not currently have a single consolidated maritime powers act. Equivalent to what Australia had of 2013.

Instead, Fiji's maritime governance framework is spread across several statutes and institutions, particularly the maritime transport under the ministry of transport, maritime safety authority and MSAF and the ministry of transport, shipping and fisheries and the ministry of fisheries and transport, and the ministry of transport, the marine space under the ministry of foreign affairs, police act under the police, the customs act under customs. Now the gap in enforcement, the current maritime laws focus more on maritime safety, shipping regulations, fisheries, management and maritime administration, rather than a heavily centralized security enforcement model. For instance, the maritime, the marine space act of 1977, administered by the ministry of foreign affairs, depicted the different boundaries and jurisdictions of Fiji's maritime domain, but failed to address which law enforcement agencies exercise powers of providing security of enforcement over those boundaries.

Fiji's maritime legal structure is fragmented. We've heard that Turaga Bale Tui Nayau talking about challenges he's facing in the law group. And in a way it is not unified.

A radical body into specialized autonomous subfields, instead of a cohesive rule applying across the board, laws are governed by isolated regimes and it spreads across multiple agencies and ministries and they don't talk to each other, they are restricted accordingly by the laws that governs the performance of their duties. And this has created coordination challenges, overlapping and conflicting authorities, example, customs act versus police act, onboarding search and seizure, operational inefficiencies caused by working in silos.

The recommendation is to ensure that this framework operate in harmony, we submit that a comprehensive legislation, legislative coordination act, such as the maritime powers act, is essential to seemingly integrate this distinct statutory and constitutional provisions.

This is essential to guide the efforts against illicit drug crisis that continues to consume our country and our young population. Lastly, Mr. Chairman, lady and gentlemen, I noticed that I slipped a piece of paper, it's not here with me, but I will talk through it and it's part of our submission.

The representation of women in parliament and in governing bodies. If I may, we look at the challenges we face today, it is the belief of the great council of chiefs that we are simply reaping what we sow. We have took our eyes off the ball in governing. If we look from the date of independence, even pre-independence, the number of women that represented in decision-making process is very minimal.

Fiji sits, currently sits 165 out of 181 in the least number of women represented in parliament. Women tend to socialize social issues better, education, health, welfare, families, while men tend to socialize in parliament, in governments, tend to socialize economy, development, et cetera. And if we look since independence, we look at the budget lines till to the present day, health and education sits at the bottom of the budget line or everything else above that.

So, it's of little wonder we're facing social challenges today. It's not to blame anyone in the running off, but we're not privy to what previous governments have done or no offense to authority, respect members of parliament, but it is to believe the council that we should have a proportionate representation. The recommendations you see in our submission is we are recommending a 40% representation of women in government and in municipal elections.

It's been, it's a given that going straight to parliament is a bit of a breach too fast in some cases, but we need to definitely need the municipal council so for representation of women, where women can showcase their abilities to the people of their leadership abilities that they can run that they can contribute effectively in decision-making process. So that's why the recommendation is to include it in the constitution, a 40% representation of women in decision-making in parliament. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, members of the lady and gentlemen of the Constitution Review Commission, our submission seeks a constitution that reflects both Fiji's democratic aspirations and its unique customary heritage.

We believe it is possible to uphold equal rights for all citizens while giving meaningful constitutional recognitions to the indigenous people, the Vanua, customary governance and the ownership and stewardship of traditional land and resources. A constitution built upon broad consultation, legitimacy and mutual respect will strengthen public confidence, promote reconciliation and provide a more enduring constitutional settlement for future generations. The great council of chiefs respectfully commends this submission to the Constitution Review Committee and thanks the committee for the opportunity to be heard.

On chapter 10, immunity. We were asked, it was not in our submission, the last and our first submission, Mr. Chairman, because we were having a discussion with other parts of government on the subject and that hasn't, we haven't concluded the discussion when our turn, it was the time to open the discussion. However, we've had some discussion amongst ourselves and on the immunity, we agree, we completely agree with the reviews of the RFMF.

The submission recommends repealing future immunity provisions. Now, Fiji must move forward fully equally towards full equality before the law. No person, public official, regardless where they sit in the social order or member of the security forces should receive immunity for future unlawful acts.

The great council of chief fully supports the removal of the immunity clause as it is written in the 2013 constitution. In place, we recommend a provision to allow those implicated to be summoned to a truth commission for truth telling. If they can justify to a truth commission that what the actions that they took was the only option left to safeguard the country that we left to the commission to decide.

However, if they struggle to do so or they fail to turn up, then they should be prosecuted accordingly. As I mentioned earlier at the last meeting, Mr. Chairman, you cannot live in the darkness and in the light at the same time. Just to round off, it's a Friday afternoon.

It's like asking God to come into my house and grace my house with his presence. And just as you're about to enter the door, and I said, Lord, by the way, just so you're aware, I've also got Lucifer in my bed yet and he's refusing to go anywhere. You can't have both.

You got to have, if you commit a crime, then you have to do the time. In conclusion, this submission asks the committee to consider a constitution that is democratic, culturally secure, socially just, and institutionally balanced. It seeks to protect all citizens equally while recognizing that indigenous identity.

Land, language, customary law, and traditional institution require specific constitutional protection. Our recommendation is not to divide Fiji, but to build a stronger Fiji by recognizing the truth of who we are. A diverse nation with different histories, different communities, yet shared responsibilities.

A constitution that protects those realities honestly will better serve national unity, stability, and future generations. We thank you for the opportunity, Mr. Chairman, lady, and gentlemen of the Constitutional Review Commission. Vinaka Vakalevu.

Mr. Valenitabua: Vinaka Vakalevu, Mr. Chairman of the GCC, of the Great Council of Chiefs. We have heard your oral submissions, and as you have stated, we will be anticipating receiving your additional written submissions for our deliberations, which starts next week on Monday. Okay.

What I've been hearing, it is comprehensive. There has been a slight change from the original. However, you must have heard from the members of the provincial councils or the particular councils or the provincial councils, and that has shown or has been reflected in the submissions this afternoon.

We are looking towards peace, prosperity, living together in diversity, and democracy. And your submission this afternoon are pointing towards those attributes for the population of Fiji. We will have to read it properly before we can come to further comments and further conclusions in relation to the submissions that have been submitted.

But I must thank you this afternoon for the submissions that we have heard. Now, as usual, the commissioners are usually given time at the end of the submissions to ask questions or comment on what they have heard this afternoon, to comment on the oral submission that has been prepared, and we just want to create discussions for clarification's sake. So now I invite the commissioners, if they wish to, to pass comments and ask questions in relation to matters which they have heard have been presented to the commission this afternoon.

Commissioners? Dr. Fatiaki.

Dr. Fatiaki: Chairman and members of the GCC delegation, firstly, let me thank you all most sincerely for taking time out to come and reinforce the process that we're in by presenting yourselves for a second time. That acknowledges the seriousness with which you consider the work that we're doing, and for that, we are grateful.

And also, as the team leader for the constitutional commissioners that traveled to Rotuma, I want to acknowledge some of the comments submitted in this proposal from the GCC, and just thank you for that. We're aware about that, but thank you. Thank you, Chairman and members of the GCC.

Mr. Kohli: Just two observations. Since you're such an august and reverent body, I grew up where the chief was the chief for everybody in the Vanua, not only indigenous. I want some recognition of that.

That should be there, that chiefs are there for everybody, including the indigenous, the Rotuman's, whoever, living in the Vanualevu, number one. Number two, I may not have it right, but I'm just curious. Somewhere you've suggested there is a customary law and other laws, and if they are inconsistent, then the customary law should prevail.

Did I hear it correctly or misheard you?

Mr. Seruvakula: Honorable member, I think you heard it correctly. Then I have one issue, and this is 45 years ago when I started practicing. I found out that courts used to grapple with cases where somebody has been charged in a village, and they've taken a tabua and asked for forgiveness, and they've traditionally been forgiven.

So, when they came to court, they had to face up with a law that doesn't spare them. Court may recognize just for mitigation purposes, but would not set them free by saying that now you're totally exonerated, you can go home because traditionally you have been forgiven. So how do you reconcile that?

Mr. Seruvakula: Honorable member, you are referring to social in cohesion. That is not a right. And we are talking about two systems with rights that are inherent and mostly confused. And that's where we come in.

Especially in terms of group rights that are practiced according to tradition and acknowledged by custom. So, I know your point, and I understand where there is a boundary between trying to solve a quarrel in court. But I think your example in both cases won't sit well.

So, we are very much talking about the rights and interest that disturbs the social cohesion of a particular group in general. So, I don't have an example in my head right now, but I think, let me come back to you on that. Thank you.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you.

Dr. Gounder: Thank you, Chair.

Ro Naulu: Mr. Chairman, if I can just add to what legal advisor has stated, that the GCC was invited to a legal conference in Nadi earlier this year that the Chairman and I went to, and this was an issue that we had discussed with them.

And in the reform that one of their consultants is working on, we had discussed at length how you look at customary laws with respect to some of the punishment, and where laws of the country has to come in and play a role. And even if there has been reconciliation, the laws of the government will have authority over customary laws. So, it's under discussion at the Ministry of Justice, but there has been some discussion on that, and they are aware that at the end of the day, it's the laws of the government that will have the authority over customary laws when it comes to certain issues of reconciliation that we've seen being used a lot lately. And that does not represent what the law of the world wishes to be.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you for that clarification. I must say that the courts are moving towards restorative justice, even in New Zealand, and I think they can better utilize when people from province come, somebody is charged from their place, and that can be fully taken into consideration.

Dr. Gounder: So, thank you. Thank you, Chair and Honorable Chairman and members of the GCC. Thank you once again for your submission this afternoon.

I also recognize the Chairman of Tailevu Provincial Council, who accompanied us to almost all the villages that we went to in Tailevu and also for your submission. Sorry. When we met here the last time, I mentioned that non itaukei, we look at GCC, we could also consider the chiefs of GCC, our chiefs as well.

We had Niko Nawaikula here. I'm sure all of you know him. He's a former member of parliament, strong advocate of indigenous rights.

And a similar proposal to Mr. Nawaikula was made by a law student at USP. And I want the views of the members of the GCC here today, what they think of it. The two submissions recommended if the GCC could be truly a GCC of all the people in Fiji, and if it's possible to co-opt non-ethical case as members of GCC, not as a permanent member, but perhaps on a term basis.

That might give really a true GCC of everyone in Fiji. And Mr. Nawaikula also proposed that such a system may be useful in a bicameral parliamentary system. So I wanted to hear your views this afternoon.

What do you think of that suggestion? I mean, moving forward as a GCC in a multiracial country. And I submit this with due respect. We don't have a social system where we have chiefs, but strong community leaders can support the work of the GCC.

And something that you also mentioned, unity, national unity could also be announced perhaps through that system.

Mr. Seruvakula: Thank you, Dr. Gounder. Indeed, it's responsible of the government.

The government is responsible for the welfare of all its citizens. The great council of chiefs is for the indigenous interests. But as you quite rightly pointed out, those are responsible for the interests of other races that live in Fiji.

To be a member, there's always, there's a location or in the rules or procedures for the great council of chiefs. You may have heard Dr. Jairam Reddy. Brendan spoke at the great council of chiefs.

So, there are forums within the great council of chiefs where others can come into the subcommittee that we now have. We never had in the past. Now we have a subcommittee where we've had ministers who have come and asked, can we come and speak to them? There's going to listen to them.

Okay, what do you want to talk about this? I said, well, there are certain things that can be open for people to talk about in the great council of chiefs. That's a final decision making, but one they can talk to the subcommittee and that's where they can share the differences and the interest and share with them some of the concerns that they have. But the great council of chiefs from where I sit as the chair and we've had five meetings now, I can assure you, the views of the chiefs are quite broad.

They think of everybody to the point where even when there are resolutions about to be passed, there will be some quarters that'll say, hang on, that will have an impact on the other races in from where I'm in charge of. So, I want that to be taken into account or have another look at. We've had papers pushed back because it needs better clarity because it involves other races.

So, they did, but I think we all have a point where you were about the involvement of other, so to say that it can't happen. We've only been around for, we've been re-established for the last, since 2024 and in my first three years, I see my main responsibility is to establish a platform to launch from. So, we're still doing that.

And from there, what we're doing is setting a platform for a great council of chiefs to be progressive in such a way that it maintains its relevancy in the bigger scheme of things. So, it's early days yet, but like I said, it's not impossible, but that's something that will be pretty sure will probably change, you know, in days to come. I'll let Ro Naulu add to that, if you don't mind. Thank you. Thank you. Inaka.

Ro Naulu: You know, all the members of the great council of chiefs have to resign from politics to become a member of the great council of chiefs. So, we have politics and democracy on one side and you have tradition and the BLV on the other side. So, in politics, what we have proposed, I think, and perhaps Nico as well, is a bicameral house where everybody who's Fijian can be represented. The BLV is tradition. And as you rightfully said, it's there for everybody. Government is there to look after all Fijians.

And the great council of chiefs is there to look after all the Taukei first and then look after everybody. Just as Rotuma council is, just as other races that have their own distinct groupings look after their own. And we've all come together in democracy in what is parliament.

And so, the great council of chiefs is traditional to look after specifically the Taukei from even before the deal of session was signed. But as time evolves, just as I hope, any new constitution will, as a living document will evolve as well. Who knows? It might happen.

But what we are working on within the great council of chiefs right now is to ensure that the Taukei sit right, that what we are planting today, we might not be able to see the fruits of, but if we can sit it right, maybe what we all want will happen two or three generations down. I don't know. It may be faster.

It may be slower. But if we set the scene right now, it will happen.

Mr. Seruvakula: Honorable member, if I can add, there are different layers of priorities occurring while we're trying to solve this problem.

Just as honorable member just alluded to in terms of politics on one side, democracy and the GCC on one side. And in our submission, we've raised the idea of bringing back the Senate. And in the Senate, as you would understand, and Dr. Fatiaki was a member of, there are representations from other than the chiefs.

So, I think that we will take care of this issue. But other than that, I think we should have patience because I don't think there's a time in our history where the Fijian people, the Taukei, the indigenous were given an opportunity to sort themselves out. There was always someone who was some other interest coming on top all the time, if you like, in history.

And the presentation today is about being aware of that, aware of the mix, but we are progressing. Thank you.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Chair. Many thanks to the gentlemen and ladies of the council for your submission. I apologize in advance for the inadequacy of my words. I look forward to receiving the benefit of your insight and your thoughts as well for the two questions I'd like to ask.

My first question is in relation to rights and the second is in relation to power. Having accompanied team members on consultations throughout the country, knowing the times that Fiji is experiencing, there are times of crises, of war, of economic cost of living pressure, rights often come under scrutiny, specifically the limitation of rights for the perceived benefit of a return to order of quelling dissatisfaction, for example. And one of the things we've heard throughout submissions is the limitation of rights, particularly of women and of children.

I was heartened to hear your thoughts about the representation of women in parliament and in decision-making. And at the same time, I also note that generations preceding mine and in my generation are generations of repair and of maintenance of cultural ties, of language as you so rightfully raise and of many other ways of life. And I worry that those who are most vulnerable and those who need the embrace of their culture all the more may feel turned away and dismissed. I would simply like to welcome your thinking around the aspects around the safety of children, young people and women in modern society in Fiji, whether it be now indigenous communities or the others or any community as we've been discussing today.

My second question is in relation to power. It's clear that many people place their aspirations and their hopes for custodianship, for wisdom in institutions like the Great Council of Chiefs. The institution looms large in people's consciousness, whatever their perspectives may be. I hear you speaking about the very dialogue-centered and consensus-centered ways in which you undertook consultations to make your submission, your complimentary submission today. And I wanted to understand what you might see as mechanisms for accountability or safeguarding of power as exercised by the Great Council of Chiefs. Those were my two questions.

Mr. Seruvakula: Thank you. I'm the chair and commissioner as well. We, as traditional leaders, we are facing problems with rights in our villages. We have cases in Tailevu Province where leaders who had been enforcing customary laws in their own villages have been issued restraining orders in their own village because of rights. It's a principle to do. Therefore, we should strike a balance between the customary law and rights. This is a problem as operators of customary laws and traditional leadership. We go along with the notion that we are leaders for all the people in our districts.

We go to their celebrations, Diwali, eat festivals, everything. They respect us, we respect them. But the problem is, as you discussed, is rights. We face a problem because it is the rights versus the customs. So, one has got an upper hand over the other. So, it is a DVRO against another DVRO. That's our problem. That's the real situation on the ground. And we would like to suggest that the customary law overrides that in a customary setting where we respect customs. Thank you. Yes.

Ro Naulu: Thank you for the question. Let me touch on the issue of power. In the Great Council of Chiefs Hall, there is a statement that everybody entering the Great Council of Chiefs Hall will see. In Fijian, it says, 'Duavata tiko keda I Vau'.

'Vau' being the stream that holds us together. And so, in the discussions we have, you will see that everybody sits on the same level within the house itself. Didn't start out that way, but that's the way it is now.

And so, there's no higher chief, there's no lower chief, there's just chiefs who sit in the house. And so, one of the reasons why deliberations, they take time is because we allow for discussions to take place, whether it's individually, whether it's by confederations, whether it's people who went to the same school, who went to the same institution, to allow for the discussions to take place so that at the end of the day, we all reach, we come to a consensus on the way forward. So, there is not one chief who will say something and others will automatically follow.

That may have happened in the past, not with these Great Council of Chiefs. We all listen to each other. Views can be very strongly expressed, but at the end of the day, to reach a consensus, everybody has to understand why we are here.

We are heading this way or in that direction. We were a bit concerned at the beginning of the Great Council of Chiefs after they came back together again in 2023, 2024. And I've shared this with the chairman and some of the other members of the Great Council of Chiefs that, in a sense, the 16 years that the Great Council of Chiefs was in the wilderness was probably a good thing because it allowed us to reflect what exactly is the Great Council of Chiefs all about? Is it serving a purpose? Does it still serve a purpose to this day? And so, we think it does.

With the understanding that a lot of the younger hit the key, don't fully comprehend what the Great Council of Chiefs is all about. So, going forward, this intergenerational vision that we have, we have to share what we're doing with the younger generations so that they're aware, whether it's in terms of the board appointments that we're gonna be making, whether it's in terms of the work that we're gonna be doing to resource people that we rely on to provide us with the technical input into any of the discussions that we have. It's all part of that linking to the younger generation to let them know that what we are discussing is gonna be something that will have an impact on their children and their grandchildren.

So, that's all part of it. But I can assure you that within the Great Council of Chiefs, a chief may come with very strong views on something, but at the end of the day, consensus has to be reached for us to move forward. And so, that, I think, is part of the accountability that I would say was not there in the previous Great Council of Chiefs before it was, before we ran into the wilderness.

Mr. Beg: Through you, Chair, may I? Chairman, thank you very much for your enlightening presentation from the initial one we had and the Honourable members. I'd just like to just touch on one point, which was the point that you brought up. I had the honors of travelling the Maritime, and I can say quite confidently that I went far and wide in the Maritime areas.

And you brought up this point about Maritime Powers Act, which is something that you alluded in your presentation around the drug enforcement, which is quite interesting. And I wonder whether we established in the constitution general principles, because there's existing laws already out there in, you know, with the police. You know, there's powers that the police, the internal waters, in feature, there's acts.

So generally, I think in your presentation, I just wanted you just to clarify what you had said there, if I may. So, around that point that you were bringing up about the Maritime powers and drug enforcement.

Mr. Seruvakula: Thank you, Honourable Member. Yeah, I spent some time with the, after listening to the Chiefs about the concerns on drug issue out in the islands, the Maritime part of the country. I, in order to better understand that, being the fact that I come from 'colo', I don't really understand the coast. I went and spoke with the Navy, thought to go to the experts and find out more from them.

What we found out was that, there's a lot of hard work that's been done out there, but they've all been done in silos. The gap that's been taken out there, that can be taken advantage of by the people who bring in drugs, is quite wide open. The Navy, for instance, who have, out of all the arms of government, from the police, customs, and you name it, they're the only ones who can go as far out as the EEZ.

But their powers are limited in what they can do out there. It's like a taxi ride to the coast, EEZ and back. What the Maritime power is all about is to bring, they have a setup that exists, that exists in their naval command center that was built by the Australians.

It's quite impressive. It's like, you know, one of those things, just NCI, you see in the movies. They've all laid up, but the people, or the arms of government couldn't go there, because their ex doesn't allow them to work together with the Navy, for them to go out and work out together.

So, they all, it's not because they don't want to, it's because they're guided by the laws that guides them in the performance of their duties. And bear in mind, these laws were there, that there were no drug issues like that. It's all about fisheries, transport, maritime, and those kinds of issues, nothing to do with drug, with law enforcement.

I think, I'm not sure if the commander of the RF may have touched on it, but that's one of the biggest concerns is the projection of power, of authority, law, law of authority to protect our borders. That's the reason why the need for maritime, to legislation, to force everyone to come together, and then together, they can then put their laws together, where they can all perform their duties, where they can then prosecute somebody. At the moment, it's only the police who can do that, or the customs, but for them to travel with the Navy and go and do that, there are restrictions, there are constraints. Hope I've answered you.

Mr. Beg: And thank you very much, Chairman. I think that answers, I mean, we've heard a lot from the people throughout the maritime and the rural areas. And so, it's a very valid point. And it's an instrument that we need to consider in the constitution, how it's framed, and how we look at it, rather than prescriptive. We leave that to the lawmakers. But I understand the frustration there. So, thank you, sir. I appreciate that.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you. Just before I bring the consultation session to the end, this afternoon, just a few updates for the great consular chiefs, taken from what we have gathered from the consultations and submissions, which we have heard from our people. First of all, the most welcome one was the position taken by the RFMF. And that is in relation to the immunity clause. Everywhere we went, the submission was to remove the immunity clause. It was a difficult one.

And it was a big ask at one time. And even now, with the RFMF saying that they support the immunity clause to be removed, we still have to worry about the opinion from the Supreme Court. Now, we have had good submissions in relation to that opinion, which we will be deliberating on.

I won't tell you yet what those opinions are. But it appears to have opened up an excess avenue towards removal of the immunity clause.

Secondly, the TLTB has given us their submissions.

They are undertaking reforms in relation to the operations for the benefit of the landowners. You might have read that they are even looking at some of the freehold lands that were taken or stolen, maybe, in inverted commas. So, those are the reforms that are being looked at by the TLTB and which they have presented to this commission.

And we have them in writing. And we are hoping that we could put down a few provisions in the constitution which would assist in that regard. This follows submissions from the people around the country in relation to return of native lands and mineral resources to the iTaukei landowners.

There's talk about owning the space from the sky down to the deepest part of the earth for the ITaukei's to own that. It relates to ownership, not only about land, it's about Qoliqoli's too. So, that is something that has been brought up and the TLTB will be working on that together with the Ministry of Lands.

We also heard from the Minister, the Honorable Minister of Lands, Mr. Filimoni Vosarogo, and this is in relation to the mineral resources. First of all, mineral will not be, or will include water and all those things, gravel, precious metals will not be found, oil, if we find oil in Fiji, and so forth. Now, in relation to the return of ownership of mineral resources to the Itaukei owners of the land, we were given a presentation on philosophy on why the government thinks that mineral resources ownership should be retained by the Crown, or by the state, sorry, by the state. It's for safekeeping, generally, because we, they are concerned that with us, if ownership of mineral resources is returned to the Itaukei owners, then they might be abused or misused. However, that is from the Ministry of Lands, for your information.

The immunity, like I said, immunity is still on foot right now, it's still in the constitution.

We are going to be looking at how we can remove it legally. National Federation Party came to us this afternoon, just before you, in their submission, they have asked us to entrench a number of our legislations, legislations which affect ITaukei's, and I can read them to you now, although they are submissions from the National Federation Party. They have asked us to entrench, or they have suggested to us to entrench this, similar to the section 185 of the 1997 constitution.

These are the ITaukei Affairs Act, the ITaukei Development Fund Act, the ITaukei Lands Act, the ITaukei Lands Trust Act, the Agricultural Land and Tenant Act, the Rotuma Act, the Rotuma Lands Act, and the Bannerman Lands Over Settlement Act. So, the national, that is coming from the National Federation Party, they have suggested and recommended that to us, so that we can include it in the constitution, the amended one.

And then last but not least, customary laws.

Our initial term of reference, has tasked us to include customary laws into the constitution. So, if that is put in the constitution, it should open up a lot of other avenues and other regulations and legislations in relation to our custom, including the village by-laws, which is in high demand from what we have heard all over Fiji. They are asking what is happening to the village by-laws.

I understand where we were at one time and what are the hindrance ones. So that is something that we may have to think about. There were other matters, but I think these are the main ones I can disclose to you this afternoon.

And with having said that, I'm sure we are all happy that we have met again this afternoon. We have listened to you, the chairman of the great council of chiefs, members, gentlemen and ladies of the great council of chiefs. And the commissioners also are happy that you have come to finish up the consultation sessions with us this afternoon. We are inviting, we'll be having a photo shoot. We will come down there and stand behind you.

GCC Final Submission to the Constitutional Review Commission

Introduction

The Great Council of Chiefs (GCC), as the apex representative body of the indigenous peoples of Fiji, respectfully submits this memorandum to the Constitutional Review Commission for its consideration during the current constitutional review process. This submission is made pursuant to the GCC's mandate to receive, consider and deliberate on constitutional matters affecting the indigenous peoples of Fiji, whose identity, culture, governance systems and customary rights remain inseparable from the Vanua. It is intended to supplement and expand upon the GCC's earlier submission to the Commission.

The matters raised reflect longstanding concerns expressed by traditional leaders, members of the Vanua, customary landowners and resource-owning communities regarding the constitutional arrangements established under the Constitution of the Republic of Fiji 2013. They are presented in good faith with the objective of contributing constructively to a constitutional framework that commands broad public confidence, respects democratic institutions, upholds the rule of law, and appropriately recognises the historical, cultural and customary foundations of Fiji's indigenous commission.

The GCC reiterates its longstanding position that it does not accept the legitimacy of the current Constitution. It maintains that every lawful effort should be directed towards a genuinely consultative constitutional process culminating in an autochthonous constitution—one created by the people of Fiji, for the people of Fiji.

This submission is organised around the principal constitutional issues identified by Chiefs and representatives of the Vanua. Each raises significant constitutional questions which, in the view of customary landowners, warrant careful consideration during the current review process.

1. Legitimacy of the Constitutional Foundation and the Absence of Genuine Indigenous Consent

The GCC's primary concern relates to the process through which the 2013 Constitution was adopted and the extent to which it reflected meaningful participation by the indigenous people of Fiji through their traditional institutions.

The views submitted to the GCC consistently indicate that the constitutional process following the events of 2006 did not adequately incorporate the perspectives of the Vanua or provide sufficient opportunity for traditional leaders to participate in determining the country's supreme law.

Particular concern has been expressed that the draft Constitution prepared under the leadership of Professor Yash Ghai was ultimately set aside. Instead, the Constitution presently in force emerged through a different process which, in the view of many indigenous communities, did not receive the endorsement of the traditional institutions that historically represented the collective interests of the iTaukei people.

The Commission is therefore invited to consider whether the legitimacy and long-term stability of Fiji's constitutional order would be strengthened through the development of a constitutional framework founded upon broader national participation and one that receives the explicit endorsement of the Vanua, alongside the wider citizenry.

2. Recognition of Traditional Governance Institutions

The second issue concerns the constitutional status of Fiji's traditional governance institutions, particularly the Great Council of Chiefs.

Historically, the GCC performed an important constitutional and advisory role on matters affecting indigenous affairs and served as the principal institution linking traditional leadership with the governance of the State.

The current Constitution contains no express recognition of the GCC or any constitutional functions for the institution. Many customary landowners consider that this omission has weakened traditional governance structures and diminished the formal participation of indigenous leadership in national decision-making.

International instruments, including the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP), recognise the right of indigenous peoples to maintain and strengthen their representative institutions. The GCC therefore submits that consideration should be given to constitutional mechanisms that recognise and protect traditional governance institutions while ensuring they operate consistently with democratic principles and the Constitution.

3. Recognition of the Political Status of the iTaukei People

The third issue concerns the constitutional recognition of the indigenous people of Fiji within the framework of equal citizenship.

While the Constitution adopts a common national identity by referring to all citizens collectively as "Fijians", the GCC submits that this approach provides insufficient constitutional recognition of the unique historical, political and customary status of the indigenous iTaukei people. The GCC maintains that the distinct relationship between the iTaukei and their traditional lands, arising from customary ownership, traditional law and long-established custom, warrants explicit constitutional recognition.

Accordingly, the GCC submits that the designation "Fijian" should, by reason of historical priority and the unique customary relationship with the land, be reserved for the indigenous iTaukei people.

The GCC further submits that equal citizenship is not inconsistent with constitutional recognition of indigenous status. Equality before the law can coexist with express recognition of the iTaukei as the original customary owners of the land and custodians of Fiji's traditional institutions.

The Commission is therefore invited to consider whether additional constitutional recognition of the iTaukei people's unique political, cultural and customary status would better safeguard indigenous identity while preserving equal rights for all citizens.

4. Recognition and Protection of Customary Ownership and Authority over Natural Resources

The fourth issue concerns the constitutional protection afforded to customary ownership and authority over natural resources.

While section 27 of the Constitution protects ownership of iTaukei land, customary landowners submit that the Constitution provides insufficient recognition of customary authority over the natural resources associated with those lands, including inland waters, forests, minerals, coastal areas, traditional fishing grounds and other resources that have historically formed part of the Vanua.

Concern has been expressed regarding the ownership and control of mineral resources. Although customary ownership of land is constitutionally protected, legislation such as the Mining Act vests ownership of minerals in the State. Many customary landowners consider that this creates an imbalance between State authority and customary proprietary interests.

The GCC submits that constitutional reform should examine whether customary ownership ought to extend beyond land itself to encompass the natural resources traditionally associated with customary ownership and stewardship.

The GCC further submits that the historical intention of the British Crown concerning customary land and resource ownership was reflected in colonial legislation enacted following the Deed of Cession in 1874. By way of example, section 9 of the Pacific Islanders Protection Act 1875 demonstrates Parliament's intention to confer governmental authority (imperium) rather than proprietary ownership (dominium) over indigenous territories.

This distinction between sovereignty and ownership has long been recognised in British constitutional law and subsequently affirmed in Commonwealth jurisprudence. Accordingly, the acquisition of sovereignty through the Deed of Cession transferred governmental authority to the Crown while preserving customary proprietary rights over land and associated natural resources, except where those rights were lawfully extinguished.

The GCC therefore submits that customary ownership of natural resources is an inherent proprietary right that exists independently of State sovereignty and should receive explicit constitutional recognition.

Accordingly, the Constitution should recognise that ownership of all customary land and its natural incidents—including the seabed, sub-surface minerals, inland waters and airspace immediately above customary land—vests in the customary owners in accordance with customary law and the understanding of property that existed at the time of Cession. The GCC further submits that this reflects the understanding of customary owners at both Cession in 1874 and the restoration of self-government in 1970.

The GCC endorses a fair and equitable royalty distribution framework based on a proportional share of gross income, rather than a fixed royalty rate, to better reflect fluctuations in market prices. Under this proposed arrangement, gross income would be allocated on the basis of 60% to the developer and 40% to the State and landowners. From the developer's 60% share, 20% of project capex would be retained as a refundable environmental bond and held in escrow for the duration of the project, subject to satisfactory environmental compliance and rehabilitation obligations. The remaining 40% local share would be apportioned as 10% to the State and 30% to the iTaukei Land Trust Board (TLTB), for distribution to the customary landowners through its established dividend distribution policies. This payment proposal must replace Schedule 3 of the current royalty rates of the State Lands Leases and Licenses (Amended) Regulations of 2026.

The template illustrates how constitutional reform should move beyond protecting land alone to explicitly recognise customary authority over all natural resources historically tied to the Vanua. It highlights that while sovereignty was transferred to the Crown under the Deed of Cession, proprietary rights over land and resources remained with indigenous owners. This principle supports the GCC's position that ownership of minerals, waters, seabed, and airspace must vest in customary landowners. To ensure fairness, the template proposes a royalty framework based on gross income, allocating 60% to developers and 40% to the State and landowners, with safeguards such as an environmental bond and equitable distribution through the iTaukei Land Trust Board. In essence, the example demonstrates how constitutional recognition, and a fair economic model can restore balance between State authority and customary rights, affirming indigenous stewardship as a cornerstone of national development.

Notwithstanding any other provision of this Constitution, where the exercise of a right or freedom conferred by this Constitution is inconsistent with a recognized customary right, the recognized customary right shall prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

Reclassification of Government-Acquired Freehold Land

The GCC also proposes a constitutional amendment providing that any freehold land acquired by the State, whether by purchase, buy-back, exchange or any other lawful means, should automatically revert to iTaukei Reserve Land where it is no longer required for a public purpose.

While section 29(5) of the 2013 Constitution does not presently address the reclassification of freehold land, such a proposal would require both a constitutional amendment and corresponding amendments to land legislation.

The GCC proposes the following constitutional provision:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this Constitution or any written law, where the State acquires freehold land by purchase, buy-back, exchange or any other lawful means, and that land is no longer required for a public purpose, the land shall be reclassified as iTaukei Reserve Land and thereafter held under native tenure. Such land shall not be capable of sale, transfer, exchange, mortgage or permanent alienation except as permitted under the laws governing iTaukei Reserve Land."

The purpose of this proposal is to ensure that land acquired by the State is ultimately restored to indigenous ownership under the iTaukei Reserve system and protected from future permanent alienation. The proposal seeks to strengthen the long-term protection of Fiji's indigenous land base while ensuring that land acquired for public purposes remains available for future generations of customary landowners.

5. Concentration of Executive Power

The fifth issue concerns the constitutional distribution of executive authority.

The GCC submits that the 2013 Constitution concentrates significant executive power in the offices of the Prime Minister and the Attorney-General.

Submissions received from the Provinces and the Vanua consistently advocate stronger checks and balances, enhanced parliamentary oversight and greater participation by independent constitutional institutions.

The Commission is therefore invited to consider reforms that strengthen accountability while ensuring that executive authority remains transparent, effective and subject to meaningful constitutional oversight.

Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption (FICAC)

The GCC further submits that the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption (FICAC) illustrates the broader concern regarding executive influence over accountability institutions.

Although FICAC was established under the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption Act 2007 rather than by the Constitution itself, the GCC submits that the constitutional framework failed to provide sufficient safeguards against executive influence over institutions intended to promote public accountability.

The GCC notes concerns expressed by many stakeholders that FICAC has, at times, been susceptible to political influence within a highly centralised executive system, creating the perception that it may be used as a political instrument rather than as an independent anti-corruption agency.

Accordingly, the GCC proposes that FICAC be dissolved as a standalone statutory body and that its investigative functions be transferred to a specialised bureau

6. Representation of Indigenous Communities within the Electoral System

The sixth issue concerns the electoral system established under the 2013 Constitution.

Earlier constitutional arrangements incorporated communal representation, enabling different communities, including indigenous Fijians, to elect representatives reflecting their particular interests.

However, the GCC submits that this model does not always provide adequate opportunities for indigenous communities—particularly those in rural and traditional settings—to have their collective interests effectively represented in Parliament.

The Commission is therefore invited to consider whether alternative electoral arrangements, or complementary representative mechanisms, could strengthen indigenous participation while preserving democratic equality, national unity and representative government.

7. Constitutional Amendment Procedures

The seventh issue concerns the procedures governing constitutional amendment.

The 2013 Constitution establishes particularly stringent amendment requirements intended "to promote constitutional stability". However, the GCC submits that these thresholds make meaningful constitutional reform extremely difficult, even where broad public consensus exists.

While constitutional stability is essential, the GCC submits that a constitution must also remain capable of responding to changing national circumstances and the evolving aspirations of indigenous people. An appropriate balance should therefore be maintained between constitutional permanence and constitutional adaptability.

The Commission is invited to consider whether the amendment procedures should be revised to preserve constitutional integrity while enabling future reforms supported by broad national consensus.

8. Recognition of the Right to Indigenous Self-Determination

The eighth issue concerns constitutional recognition of the right of indigenous peoples to self-determination, consistent with international human rights standards.

The United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP) affirms the right of indigenous peoples to maintain and strengthen their political, legal, economic, social and cultural institutions and to participate meaningfully in decisions affecting their communities.

Although the Constitution recognises customary land ownership and protects certain cultural rights, the GCC submits that greater constitutional recognition should be given to the participation of indigenous peoples in decisions affecting their traditional lands, natural resources and customary institutions.

The Commission is therefore invited to consider whether additional constitutional provisions could better reflect internationally recognised principles relating to indigenous peoples

9. Constitutional Safeguards for Indigenous Rights

The final issue concerns the absence of constitutional safeguards specifically designed to protect indigenous rights from future legislative change.

Previous constitutional arrangements included institutions, such as the Senate, which provided an additional level of scrutiny for legislation affecting indigenous interests. Many customary landowners consider that comparable constitutional safeguards are no longer available.

The concern extends beyond customary land ownership to encompass traditional governance institutions, qoliqoli, customary marine tenure, forests, rivers, sacred sites and other customary rights and interests that form an integral part of the Vanua.

The GCC therefore invites the Commission to consider constitutional entrenchment provisions or other institutional.

10. Maritime Powers Act (FIJI)

Fiji does not currently have a single consolidated "Maritime Powers Act" equivalent to Australia's Maritime Powers Act 2013. Instead, Fiji's maritime governance framework is spread across several statutes and institutions, particularly:

- The Maritime Transport Act 2013 (by MSAF under the Ministry of Transport),
- The Maritime Safety Authority of Fiji Act 2009 (by MSAF under the Ministry of Transport),
- Shipping and fisheries legislation (MOF and MOT),
- Marine Space Act 1977 (administered by MOFA) – Fiji national legislation for UNCLOS;
- Police Act (by Police to board, search, seizure and arrest);
- Customs Act (by FRCS to board, search, seizure and confiscate undeclared foreign substance or illicit drugs)

The current Fiji's maritime laws focus more on maritime safety, shipping regulations, fisheries managements and maritime administration rather than a heavily centralized security enforcement model. For an instance, the Marine Space Act 1977, administered by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, depicted the different boundaries and jurisdiction of Fiji's maritime domain, but failed to address which law enforcement agencies exercises powers of providing security or enforcement over those boundaries.

Fiji's maritime legal structure is fragmented in a way that it is not unified, hierarchical body into specialized, autonomous sub-fields. Instead of cohesive rules applying across the board, laws are governed by isolated regimes as it spread across multiple agencies and ministries and this has created coordination challenges, overlapping and conflicting authority such as the Customs Act and the Police Act to board, search and seizure, and operational inefficiencies caused by working in silos.

To ensure these frameworks operate in harmony, we submit that a comprehensive legislative consolidation act is essential to seamlessly integrate these distinct statutory and constitutional provisions."

11. Rotuma Council and the People of Rotuma

It is a profound honor to present this formal submission on behalf of the Rotuma Island Council and the people of Rotuma, whose collective aspirations have been meticulously gathered through extensive consultations across all seven districts and with the endorsement of the Council of Chiefs.

This submission does not represent a pursuit of independence or secession from the Republic of Fiji. Rather, it is advanced in a spirit of deep respect and enduring partnership to strengthen our constitutional relationship by restoring formal recognition of Rotuma's unique historical, legal, and cultural status within the State.

The submission proposes a modest amendment to the Preamble alongside the insertion of a dedicated constitutional chapter entitled "Rotuma and the Rotuman People." This framework seeks to:

Formally recognize the Rotuma Island Council as the principal representative institution of the people.
Mandate meaningful consultation on all policies affecting the island.
Safeguard customary lands and marine resources from amendment without consent.
Restore guaranteed parliamentary representation.

Reflecting the interconnected traditional leadership of our nation, three Grand Chiefs of Rotuma Island serve as esteemed members of the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC).

It is my distinct privilege to state to this Honourable Commission that the GCC stands in complete solidarity with, and formally supports, the submission presented by the Rotuma Island Council and the Rotuman people as we collectively seek to preserve our unique identity while contributing positively alongside our iTaukei brothers and sisters to a unified Fiji.

12. Gender Quotas for Fiji's Parliament and Municipal Councils

The Great Council of Chiefs (GCC) presents this formal submission to the Constitution Review Commission of Fiji. As custodians of Fiji's heritage and governance, the GCC emphasizes that a progressive and resilient democracy must optimize its entire leadership pool. Currently, Fiji faces an acute underrepresentation of women in political life. Women hold just 9.1% of seats in the national Parliament (5 out of 55 members), placing Fiji 165th out of 181 countries globally and 139th in Political Empowerment on the Global Gender Index. Subnational and traditional spaces exhibit a similar systemic gap; for instance, women occupy a mere 7.15% of Provincial Council positions and hold zero leadership roles at that level.

To address these imbalances and simultaneously elevate the quality of national decision-making, the GCC proposes a dual-pronged constitutional reform strategy:

i The introduction of legislated gender quotas (30–40% minimum threshold) to dismantle entrenched structural, institutional, and cultural barriers.

ii The introduction of a minimum educational qualification of a Bachelor's Degree for all parliamentary and municipal candidates to ensure high-caliber, merit-based governance.

This submission synthesizes grassroots data and regional frameworks, drawing direct insights from the comprehensive assessment within "CSO_Gender_Quota_Submission.docx".

2. Rationale and Justification

A. Overcoming Entrenched Structural Barriers to Women's Leadership

Formal legal equality has historically failed to translate into substantive representation. Research outlines multiple systemic obstacles faced by women in Fiji, including patriarchal social norms, gender stigmatization (which 69% of citizens state reduces a woman's electoral success), caregiving expectations, and male-dominated candidate selection processes. When more women run, more women win; the primary bottleneck is getting women onto the ballot. Implementing constitutional quotas does not lower the bar; rather, it corrects historical disadvantages and expands opportunities for qualified women whose talents have been systematically overlooked.

B. Harmonization with Regional and International Mandates

Fiji is legally and morally bound by voluntary ratifications and declarations. Transitioning to a constitutional quota fulfills obligations under:

- CEDAW (Ratified 1995): Article 7 mandates the elimination of discrimination in public life, while Article 4(1) explicitly recognizes temporary special measures, like quotas, as legitimate pathways to de facto equality.
- Regional Frameworks: The Pacific Leaders Gender Equality Declaration, the Pacific Islands Forum Women Leaders Meeting (PIFWLM), and the 2050 Strategy for the Blue Pacific Continent all bind Fiji to achieve gender-balanced decision-making.

C. Elevating Governance through Minimum Degree Qualifications

To complement equity with excellence, the GCC proposes that all aspiring political leaders possess a minimum of a recognized Bachelor's Degree. As modern statecraft, economic management, and legislative drafting grow increasingly complex, our leaders must possess the foundational analytical tools necessary to govern effectively. Pairing a gender quota with a high educational baseline ensures that both male and female leaders enter chambers strictly on a foundation of merit and capability, directly countering any false narratives that quotas diminish institutional standards.

3. Proposed Constitutional Amendments: Chapters & Clauses

To embed these reforms seamlessly into the supreme law of Fiji, the following specific adaptations must be made to the Constitution:

Constitutional Chapter & Clause	Proposed Amendment / Mechanism	Rationale & Justification
Chapter 2: Bill of Rights Section 26(7) (Right to Equality)	Insert explicit language protecting and authorizing legislated gender quotas and reserved seats in elected bodies.	Provides an unassailable constitutional foundation for temporary special measures, ensuring they cannot be legally challenged as discriminatory.
Chapter 3: Parliament Sections 53–56 (Electoral System)	Mandate that all registered political party lists must consist of at least 40% women candidates for national elections.	Aligns perfectly with Fiji's open party-list system, directly multiplying the number of women in the contest without disrupting voter choice.
Chapter 3: Parliament	Insert a new subsection requiring all nominated candidates to hold a	Establishes an objective, gender-neutral baseline of educational competence, ensuring highly

Section 55 (Qualifications of Candidates)	minimum of a recognized Bachelor's Degree.	professionalized legislative debate and policy formulation.
Chapter 7: Local Government (Municipal/Council Clauses)	Reserve one seat per ward or constituency for the highest-polling woman candidate not otherwise elected under the general tier.	Adapts successfully tested regional templates (e.g., Vanuatu's 2024 local governance models) to organically inject women's voices into local government without enlarging council sizes.
Chapter 7: Local Government (Municipal Candidate Rules)	Apply the minimum Bachelor's Degree requirement to municipal and township election candidates.	Enhances local administrative execution, ensuring municipal councils are equipped to manage public funds, infrastructure, and community assets prudently.

4. Enforcement and Implementation Framework

As detailed in "CSO_Gender_Quota_Submission.docx", quotas succeed or fail entirely based on design and enforcement. The GCC recommends empowering the Electoral Commission with clear oversight capabilities:

- Robust Sanctions: The Electoral Commission must legally reject any political party candidate list that fails to meet the 40% female threshold or the minimum Bachelor's Degree validation criteria.
- Financial Mechanisms: Implement public funding penalties for non-compliant parties, alongside financial bonuses or incentives for parties that exceed a 40% gender parity distribution.

By implementing these dual reforms, the Great Council of Chiefs believes Fiji will reclaim its position of regional leadership. We will build a democracy that is truly representative of its population while simultaneously raising the standard of leadership to secure a prosperous, stable, and highly capable nation.

Conclusion

The Great Council of Chiefs, on behalf of customary landowners and resource-owning communities, respectfully submits these matters for the Constitutional Review Commission careful consideration.

Our submission seeks a constitution that reflects both Fiji's democratic aspirations and its unique customary heritage. We believe it is possible to uphold equal rights for all citizens while giving meaningful constitutional recognition to the indigenous people, the Vanua, customary governance, and the ownership and stewardship of traditional lands and resources.

A Constitution built upon broad consultation, legitimacy and mutual respect will strengthen public confidence, promote reconciliation, and provide a more enduring constitutional settlement for future generations. The Great Council of Chiefs respectfully commends this submission to the Constitutional Review Commission and thanks the Commission for the opportunity to be heard.

On Chapter 10 immunity, the submission recommends repealing future immunity provisions. Fiji must move toward full equality before the law. No person, public official, or member of the security forces should receive immunity for future unlawful acts. The GCC fully supports the removal of the immunity clause as it is written in the 2013 Constitution, in place recommend a provision to allow those implicated to be summoned to a Truth Commission for truth telling, refusing to do so should then result in prosecution.

In conclusion, this submission asks the Commission to consider a constitution that is democratic, culturally secure, socially just, and institutionally balanced. It seeks to protect all citizens equally, while recognizing that indigenous identity, land, language, customary law, and traditional institutions require specific constitutional protection. Our recommendation is not to divide Fiji, but to build a stronger Fiji by recognizing the truth of who we are: a diverse nation with different histories, different communities, and shared responsibilities. A Constitution that protects those realities honestly will better serve national unity, stability, and future generations.

GCC Chair Speaking Notes

Submission to the Fiji Constitutional Review Commission

Opening

Honourable Chair, Members of the Constitution Review Commission, and all present, thank you for the opportunity to make this oral submission. The Great Council of Chiefs (GCC), having made its initial submission to this Honourable Commission on 30 March of this year, hereby reaffirms its position as the apex body of traditional iTaukei leadership. The Council further underscores its role as the custodian of the customary supremacy inherent within the iTaukei governance structure.

In the exercise of this traditional authority, the GCC undertook a comprehensive process of awareness and consultation across the thirteen Provincial Bose Vanua. Through these consultations, the Council presented its initial submission for the understanding and endorsement of the vanua. Chiefs who sit within the Bose Vanua ni Yasana are duly identified and registered as the rightful holders of chiefly titles under the Native Land and Fisheries Commission, and have been traditionally installed by their respective vanua. These esteemed chiefs possess the inherent and customary right to participate fully in the deliberations of the Bose Vanua. It was upon this platform that the vanua came to appreciate the GCC's intent and the significance of its submission. The vanua subsequently granted their endorsement and support, evidenced by their signatures, thereby affirming their solidarity with the GCC's submission. This endorsement forms the foundation of the submission which we are privileged to present before this Honourable Commission today.

The significance of this endorsement extends beyond procedural consultation. It reflects the considered judgment of the hereditary chiefs of the Vanua, who have, from time immemorial, provided leadership, maintained social order and cohesion, safeguarded the welfare of their people, and exercised stewardship over their customary lands and social construct (vuvale, tokatoka, mataqali, yavosa, koro, vanua). It was through the foresight and wisdom of these chiefly leaders that Fiji sought the protection of the British Crown under the Deed of Cession, and it is through that same enduring institution of traditional leadership that the social, cultural and economic advancement of the indigenous people continues to be guided today. The GCC therefore respectfully submits that the views presented before this Honourable Commission are not merely those of the Council itself, but are affirmed and supported by the recognised hereditary leadership of the Vanua throughout Fiji.

The GCC has deliberately followed this approach in recognition of the fact that chiefs are regarded as the supreme leaders of their communities, having been endowed during installation with both mana and sau. The installation ceremony itself signifies the conferral of supremacy and leadership, solemnly affirming that the chief is entrusted to lead, to articulate the voice of the Vanua, and to make decisions for its welfare. This investiture ensures that the chief governs not merely as an individual, but as the living embodiment of the Vanua's will, for the advancement and collective benefit of the iTaukei people.

Furthermore, during the GCC's awareness and consultation process across thirteen Bose Vanua regarding its first submission, and in gathering the views of the Vanua on the GCC's proposals, more than 307 chiefs attended the thirteen Provincial Bose Vanua. Collectively, these chiefs represented 514,244 iTaukei people—equivalent to 92.58% of Fiji's total iTaukei population and 58.10% of Fiji's overall population. This broad representation underscores the legitimacy, inclusivity, and national significance of the GCC's submission. This further noted that this representation remains constant, irrespective of the decisions made by the iTaukei people during national elections. In matters of tradition, chiefs are born into their chiefly titles and are deeply respected within their vanua. Their authority is not contingent upon electoral processes but upon the enduring cultural and spiritual foundations of iTaukei society.

The written submission that will be filed after this oral presentation sets out the recommendations of the GCC in full. In this oral submission, I will summarise the main constitutional reforms we are asking the Commission to consider. At the heart of this submission is one central principle: Fiji's Constitution must protect equal citizenship for all, while also recognising the distinct identity, rights, institutions, land, language, and customary systems of the indigenous iTaukei and Rotuman peoples. True national unity cannot be built by erasing difference. It must be built through mutual respect, legal clarity, democratic accountability, and substantive equity. The submission therefore recommends a shift away from forced constitutional uniformity and toward a more honest and stable pluralism.

Chair and Honourable Members of the Commission, the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC), as the apex representative body of the indigenous people of Fiji, respectfully presents this final submission to complement our earlier submission. I will briefly speak to the written submission on the issues we have highlighted. A copy of the submission has been forwarded for the perusal of the honourable Committee members.

Our position is clear: the GCC does not accept the legitimacy of the 2013 Constitution and believes Fiji should ultimately move towards a new, genuinely consultative and autochthonous Constitution—one developed by the people, for the people. Our submission is made in good faith. It is not intended to diminish the rights of any community, but to strengthen constitutional legitimacy, democratic governance, national unity and respect for the rule of law while ensuring proper recognition of the indigenous foundations of our nation.

1. Education, Language, Data, and Equity

1.1 Protection of Indigenous Language

We recommend that Na Vosa Vakaviti be made a compulsory core subject in all primary schools. Unlike global languages with large international speaker bases, the iTaukei language has no external homeland. If it declines in Fiji, it declines everywhere.

Conversational Fiji Hindi and other languages should remain available as elective subjects based on community demand and school capacity.

1.2 Early Childhood Medium of Instruction

From Early Childhood Education to Year Three, the main medium of instruction should be the indigenous vernacular or mother tongue of the majority student cohort.

Early learning in the mother tongue supports literacy, numeracy, confidence, and cognitive development, especially in rural and maritime schools.

1.3 Affirmative Action in Education

We recommend constitutionally authorised affirmative action in education, including targeted scholarships, educational development funds, and support for iTaukei, Rotuman, rural, maritime, and other disadvantaged students.

1.4 Ethnic-Disaggregated Education Data

We recommend restoring ethnic-disaggregated education data across national examinations, FEMIS, scholarship systems, and the Bureau of Statistics.

Without proper data, the State cannot see where disadvantage lies, and cannot fairly allocate resources.

1.5 Differential Resourcing Formula

We recommend a Differential Resourcing Formula for school funding. A flat per-student funding model favours large urban schools and disadvantages small rural and maritime schools, where costs are higher and infrastructure is weaker.

Funding should consider remoteness, low enrolment, poverty, utilities, access, transport costs, and school vulnerability.

2. Constitutional Legitimacy

Many indigenous communities believe the 2013 Constitution was not created through a process that secured meaningful participation or consent from the Vanua and its traditional institutions.

The Commission is invited to consider whether Fiji's long-term constitutional stability would be better served by a constitutional framework that enjoys broad public support and explicit endorsement from both the wider population and the Vanua.

We recommend the restoration of the 1997 constitutional governance framework where appropriate. This includes reinstating the Chapter 2 Compact from the 1997 Constitution. The Compact should serve as Fiji's national conscience: a guiding framework that balances indigenous cultural security with equal civic citizenship for all communities. It would protect iTaukei and Rotuman land, custom, and cultural rights, while also affirming the equal rights of all citizens to democratic participation and protection under the law.

3. Recognition of the Great Council of Chiefs

The GCC historically played an important constitutional and advisory role in matters affecting indigenous affairs. Its omission from the current Constitution has weakened traditional governance and reduced indigenous participation in national decision-making. We further recommend that the Bose Levu Vakaturaga, or Great Council of Chiefs, be restored to constitutional status. Recent statutory recognition is important, but ordinary legislation can be changed by future governments. Constitutional recognition would protect the dignity, continuity, and apex guardianship role of the BLV in relation to iTaukei identity, land, custom, and traditional welfare.

Consistent with international standards, including the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP), we recommend constitutional recognition of the GCC and other traditional institutions.

4. Constitutional Recognition of the iTaukei

The GCC supports equal citizenship for every Fijian.

However, equality should not prevent explicit constitutional recognition of the iTaukei as the original inhabitants/first nations people and customary owners of the land and custodians of Fiji's traditional institutions. Equal citizenship and indigenous recognition can, and should, exist together.

5. Identity, Citizenship, and the Preamble

We recommend that the Constitution remove the declaration that "we are all Fijians united by common and equal citizenry." Political citizenship should be separated from indigenous identity.

All citizens should be united by allegiance to the Republic of Fiji, but the term "Fijian" should be reserved for the indigenous iTaukei people, consistent with historical and constitutional usage. The common civic designation for all citizens should return to "Fiji Islander," while distinct categories such as iTaukei, Rotuman, Indo-Fijian, and Fiji Islander should be recognised for accurate data, policy planning, and cultural clarity.

We also recommend that the Preamble include the principle of equity, alongside equality and social justice. Equality gives every person the same formal legal status. Equity recognises that some communities, especially rural, maritime, indigenous, and historically disadvantaged communities, begin from very different social and economic positions. A Constitution that includes equity gives the State a clear mandate to correct structural disadvantage and promote real fairness.

6. Protection of Customary Lands and Natural Resources

The Great Council of Chiefs submits that while customary land ownership is protected, the Constitution provides insufficient recognition of customary authority over natural resources, including minerals, forests, rivers, coastal areas, and traditional fishing grounds (iqoliqoli).

Customary ownership should extend to the full range of resources traditionally belonging to the Vanua, consistent with its understanding of the full extent of ownership prior to the execution of the Deed of Cession of 1874.

We further propose that where Government acquires freehold land and that land is no longer required for a public purpose, it should automatically revert to iTaukei Reserve Land classification and not remain freehold as is the current practice under section 29(5). This will ensure that such land is never again permanently alienated.

The GCC recommends strengthening section 30 on landowners' rights to royalties. The phrase "fair share" is too vague. We therefore recommend:

The GCC endorses a fair and equitable royalty distribution framework based on a proportional share of gross income, rather than a fixed royalty rate, to better reflect fluctuations in market prices. Under this proposed arrangement, gross income would be allocated on the basis of 60% to the developer and 40% to the State and landowners. From the developer's 60% share, 20% of project capex would be retained as a refundable environmental bond and held in escrow for the duration of the project, subject to satisfactory environmental compliance and rehabilitation obligations. The remaining 40% local share would be apportioned as 10% to the State and 30% to the customary landowners through its established dividend distribution policies. This payment proposal must replace Schedule 3 of the current royalty rates of the State Lands Leases and Licenses (Amended) Regulations of 2026.

We also recommend reinstating the substance of section 186 of the 1997 Constitution on customary law and traditional processes. Parliament should be required to legislate for the structured application of customary law, including traditional dispute resolution, while ensuring that such processes operate consistently with constitutional human rights.

Notwithstanding any other provision of this Constitution, where the exercise of a right or freedom conferred by this Constitution is inconsistent with a recognised customary right, the recognised customary right shall prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

7. Balance of Executive Power

The GCC is concerned about the concentration of executive authority, particularly in the offices of the Prime Minister and Attorney-General. Effective government must be accompanied by effective checks and balances. The three independent arms of Governance -Parliament, Executive and Judiciary.

Where the overextension of executive powers is used for the creation and control of institutions such as FICAC, there is a tendency that vesting of power and control to a single Official may lead to abusive use of power to possibly render the machinations of such institution as a political tool.

A significant constitutional distinction is that FICAC was not established by the 2013 Constitution but by the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption Act 2007. Consequently, the more compelling constitutional argument is not that FICAC's existence itself reflects executive overreach, but that the 2013 constitutional framework facilitated, or failed to impose adequate constraints on, executive influence over key accountability institutions, including FICAC.

GCC therefore call for the dissolution of FICAC with its duties and functions divulged into an appropriate internal bureau housed within an appropriate division of government services such as the Public Services Commission.

8. Indigenous Representation and Electoral Reform

The current nationwide electoral system promotes equality but may not always ensure adequate representation of indigenous communities, particularly those in rural and traditional areas.

We recommend abolishing the single national constituency model. The current system tends to favour heavily populated urban areas and weakens regional and maritime representation.

The submission proposes a 60-seat Parliament based on large regional multi-member constituencies and dedicated maritime or isolated constituencies. Central, Western, and Northern Divisions would have regional representation, while Lomaiviti, Kadavu, Lau, and Rotuma would have specific seats.

The 5 percent electoral threshold may be retained to prevent excessive fragmentation, but representation must better reflect Fiji's geography and communities.

9. Constitutional Amendment

The Great Council of Chiefs (GCC) strongly supports the introduction of a referendum mechanism alongside a more reasonable parliamentary threshold to amend the 2013 Constitution. The current requirement of a 75 percent parliamentary majority and a referendum demanding 75 percent of all registered voters has created near-permanent deadlock, making meaningful reform almost impossible and rendering the Constitution virtually unamendable. While stability is essential, a Constitution must also remain responsive to the evolving needs of the nation and afford genuine opportunities for review. The GCC submission therefore recommends restoring the 1997-style framework, where constitutional amendments require a two-thirds majority in both Houses of Parliament, with special protections for indigenous interests. In particular, any amendment affecting iTaukei land, custom, traditional titles, the Bose Levu Vakaturaga (BLV), or indigenous rights should require the support of GCC-appointed Senators. To complement this, the GCC advocates that national referenda on constitutional amendments should be decided by a simple majority—50 percent plus one—ensuring both democratic legitimacy and practical flexibility for reform.

10. Indigenous Self-Determination and Safeguards

International law recognises the right of indigenous peoples to maintain their own political, legal and cultural institutions. The GCC believes Fiji's Constitution should provide stronger recognition of indigenous participation in decisions affecting traditional lands, resources and customary governance.

We recommend constitutional mechanisms that ensure meaningful consultation and enhanced protection whenever legislation affects customary land, natural resources, traditional governance or other indigenous rights.

11. Rights, Labour, and Democratic Freedoms

We recommend narrowing the broad limitation clauses in the 2013 Bill of Rights. Restrictions on rights such as freedom of assembly should only be allowed where they are reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society.

The State should not be able to rely on vague grounds such as public order or national security without strict proportionality, necessity, and evidence.

We strongly recommend the deletion of section 20(5) relating to employment relations. The Constitution should genuinely protect the rights of workers to organise, bargain collectively, and strike. Labour rights should not be suspended merely because an industry is labelled essential or because of broad economic interests.

We also recommend removing the Attorney-General from the Mercy Commission. The Attorney-General is a political office holder and legal adviser to government. The power of mercy must be independent, impartial, and free from political influence. The Chair of the Mercy Commission should instead be an independent person appointed by the Judicial Service Commission.

12. Public Administration and Separation of Powers

We recommend strengthening the neutrality of the public service. Permanent Secretaries should have independent authority over staffing, promotions, discipline, and daily administration.

Ministers should set policy and provide oversight, but they should not interfere in civil service personnel decisions. This protects merit-based recruitment, reduces nepotism and favouritism, and restores the boundary between political leadership and professional administration.

We also recommend amending section 57 so that trade unions, employee federations, and civil society associations are not treated as public offices. These are independent organisations, not state institutions. Their inclusion as public offices weakens freedom of association and undermines workers' representation.

13. Rotuma Council and the Rotuman People

13.1 Constitutional Recognition

It is a profound honor to present this formal submission on behalf of the Rotuma Island Council and the people of Rotuma, whose collective aspirations have been meticulously gathered through extensive consultations across all seven districts and with the endorsement of the Council of Chiefs.

This submission does not represent a pursuit of independence or secession from the Republic of Fiji. Rather, it is advanced in a spirit of deep respect and enduring partnership to strengthen our constitutional relationship by restoring formal recognition of Rotuma's unique historical, legal, and cultural status within the State.

13.2 Dedicated Constitutional Chapter

The submission proposes a modest amendment to the Preamble alongside the insertion of a dedicated constitutional chapter entitled "Rotuma and the Rotuman People."

This framework seeks to:

- ✓ Formally recognize the Rotuma Island Council as the principal representative institution of the people.
- ✓ Mandate meaningful consultation on all policies affecting the island.
- ✓ Safeguard customary lands and marine resources from amendment without consent.
- ✓ Restore guaranteed parliamentary representation.

13.3 Connection to the Great Council of Chiefs

Reflecting the interconnected traditional leadership of our nation, three Grand Chiefs of Rotuma Island serve as esteemed members of the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC).

It is my distinct privilege to state to this Honourable Commission that the GCC stands in complete solidarity with, and formally supports, the submission presented by the Rotuma Island Council and the Rotuman people as we collectively seek to preserve our unique identity while contributing positively alongside our iTaukei brothers and sisters to a unified Fiji.

14. Maritime Powers Act

14.1 Current Fragmented Framework

Fiji does not currently have a single consolidated "Maritime Powers Act" equivalent to Australia's Maritime Powers Act 2013. Instead, Fiji's maritime governance framework is spread across several statutes and institutions, particularly:

- The Maritime Transport Act 2013 (by MSAF under the Ministry of Transport)
- The Maritime Safety Authority of Fiji Act 2009 (by MSAF under the Ministry of Transport)
- Shipping and fisheries legislation (MOF and MOT)
- The Marine Space Act 1977 (administered by MOFA) – Fiji national legislation for UNCLOS
- The Police Act (by Police to board, search, seizure and arrest)
- The Customs Act (by FRCS to board, search, seizure and confiscate undeclared foreign substance or illicit drugs)

14.2 Gaps in Enforcement

The current maritime laws focus more on maritime safety, shipping regulations, fisheries management, and maritime administration rather than a heavily centralized security enforcement model.

For instance, the Marine Space Act 1977, administered by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, depicted the different boundaries and jurisdiction of Fiji's maritime domain, but failed to address which law enforcement agencies exercise powers of providing security or enforcement over those boundaries.

14.3 Coordination Challenges

Fiji's maritime legal structure is fragmented in a way that it is not unified, hierarchical body into specialized, autonomous sub-fields. Instead of cohesive rules applying across the board, laws are governed by isolated regimes as it spread across multiple agencies and ministries.

This has created:

- ✓ Coordination challenges
- ✓ Overlapping and conflicting authority (e.g., Customs Act vs Police Act on boarding, search, and seizure)
- ✓ Operational inefficiencies caused by working in silos

14.4 Recommendation

To ensure these frameworks operate in harmony, we submit that a comprehensive legislative consolidation act is essential to seamlessly integrate these distinct statutory and constitutional provisions.

15. Gender Quotas for Fiji's Parliament and Municipal Councils

A progressive, resilient, and true democracy cannot operate effectively while leaving a significant portion of its leadership pool behind.

Currently, Fiji faces a severe and systemic underrepresentation of women in political life. Women hold just 9.1% of seats in our national Parliament (5 out of 55 members), ranking us 165th globally.

In our subnational spaces, the gap is equally stark—women occupy only 7.15% of Provincial Council positions and hold zero leadership roles at that level.

To bridge this gap and simultaneously elevate national decision-making, the GCC proposes a dual-pronged constitutional reform strategy grounded in two pillars: Equity and Excellence.

Formal legal equality has not translated into real, substantive representation. Systemic obstacles—ranging from patriarchal social norms to male-dominated selection processes—continue to keep women off the ballot. The primary bottleneck is getting women onto the ballot.

Moreover, modern statecraft, economic management, and legislative drafting are complex. To complement equity with excellence, the GCC proposes an objective, gender-neutral baseline of educational competence. And thus, support and recommend that all aspiring parliamentary and municipal candidates possess a minimum of a recognized Bachelor's Degree.

Pairing a gender quota with a high educational requirement ensures that both male and female leaders enter our chambers strictly on a foundation of merit, capability, and professionalism. It completely refutes any narrative that quotas diminish institutional standards.

Quotas only succeed if they are strictly enforced. We recommend empowering the Electoral Commission to legally reject any political party list that fails to meet either the 40% female threshold or the Bachelor's Degree validation criteria. Compliance should be reinforced through robust public funding penalties for non-compliant parties, and incentives for those exceeding parity.

Commissioners, by weaving these dual reforms into the fabric of our Constitution, Fiji has a historic opportunity to reclaim its position of true regional leadership. We will build a democracy that is genuinely representative of its people, while simultaneously raising the standard of leadership to secure a prosperous, stable, and highly capable nation.

Conclusion

Honourable Members,

Our submission seeks a Constitution that reflects both Fiji's democratic aspirations and its unique customary heritage. We believe it is possible to uphold equal rights for all citizens while giving meaningful constitutional recognition to the indigenous people, the Vanua, customary governance, and the ownership and stewardship of traditional lands and resources.

A Constitution built upon broad consultation, legitimacy and mutual respect will strengthen public confidence, promote reconciliation, and provide a more enduring constitutional settlement for future generations. The Great Council of Chiefs respectfully commends this submission to the Constitutional Review Commission and thanks the Commission for the opportunity to be heard.

On Chapter 10 immunity, the submission recommends repealing future immunity provisions. Fiji must move toward full equality before the law. No person, public official, or member of the security forces should receive immunity for future unlawful acts. However, the submission also recognises the need for stability and proposes a transitional savings clause so that immunities already legally granted before the 2026 amendments are not retrospectively disturbed. This balances justice for the future with legal certainty from the past.

In conclusion, this submission asks the Commission to consider a Constitution that is democratic, culturally secure, socially just, and institutionally balanced. It seeks to protect all citizens equally, while recognising that indigenous identity, land, language, customary law, and traditional institutions require specific constitutional protection. Our recommendation is not to divide Fiji, but to build a stronger Fiji by recognising the truth of who we are: a diverse nation with different histories, different communities, and shared responsibilities. A Constitution that protects those realities honestly will better serve national unity, stability, and future generations.

George Speight

George Speight
Date:09/07/26

Mr. Valenitabua: This morning we have Mr. George Speight. Mr. Speight, we welcome you to the Commission. The commissioners sitting before you this morning, there are five of us, I will ask them to introduce them individually, beginning from my right, please.

Dr. Fatiaki: George, it's been a few years. I'm John Fatiaki, medical practitioner, Rotuma, and former senator. Thank you.

Mr. Conway: Thank you, Mr. Speight, welcome. My name is Conway Bey. Good to see you this morning.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you. Hi, good morning. My name is Ami Kohli from Labasa. I'm a legal practitioner.

Dr. Gounder: Good morning, Mr. Speight. I'm Neelesh Gounder. I'm an academic at USP, and I was doing an exam in the exam hall when the exam supervisor announced that Mr. Speight has taken over parliament, but we'll continue with the exam, and we peacefully finished the exam at five o'clock, and then went in to check the news, what had happened. But I look forward to your submission this morning. Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: George, I'm Sevuloni Valenitabua, chairperson of the commission. We welcome you this morning. Introductions completed. We are here, or this commission has been tasked to review the 2013 constitution. We have also been directed by, through our terms of reference, to go around the country, and receive, and correct, and record submissions from our people in respect of what they consider, or what they recommend to be included in the 2013 Constitution, and which parts of the law which are currently in the constitution be removed or changed. So that is what we are tasked, or that was what we are tasked to do, and we are doing now.

We've been around the country, ending up in Suva this week is the last week, and today is the second last day, and you are appearing before us. Without further ado, I now give you the mic and the floor to present your submissions to the Commission. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for your welcome, as well as the rest of the members of the Commission.

Mr. Speight: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your welcome as well as the rest of the Commission. I'm very grateful to be received this morning, and I did not anticipate that one day I'd be sitting in front of a constitution review commission like this. My history and my story is perhaps well known to all of you, or most of you, and whilst this Commission is not here to review past events, or be it being alluded to by Dr. Gounder 26 years ago, I feel that there will be another time and another place and another mechanism whereby past events can be properly reviewed, discussed, and consultations taken and the voices of all concerned heard with a view to understanding and then finding a solution. But this little blue book here is, I suppose, the culmination that binds us all out of all the events that have taken place in the past.

It is the latest document which binds us all, and it has been accepted in different views. Mine is by duress and then adopted out of convenience. Now, I'm not here to go through every single clause that's in this document. That would take quite some time. But there is a necessity, I feel, that yes, every clause needs to be re-examined in the light of what's good for our country going forward and in the light of the principles of justice, fairness, and righteousness. I think that's the foundation of any good government. And the principle that those who govern must do so through the consent of the Government. And the way that consent is to be secured is through a process like this as a start. But there are conditions inside this document that, in my view, upon a casual reading from cover to cover, by the way, which we had lots of time to do in prison, it's very clear that this document is full of contradictions. The common man on the street, me included, never had any reason to be concerned or interested even in legal documents, let alone the Constitution. And I suppose the biggest challenge has been just understanding the totality of what a document like this is meant to do and meant to be in a country. But I think generally speaking, the average person understands that this book and those before it are meant to ensure good governance, to bring about the well-being and highest common good of every single citizen in the country.

That's the purpose that this book is supposed to bring. And it must have the confidence of the majority at least of those who are governed by this book. With the diversity of backgrounds of citizens of our nation, like most nations of the world, I think it's impossible to expect that there can be absolute unity as to what a book like this should say and how it is to be constructed, because it orders our daily lives right from the top. But I think there's an understanding that if there is to be a democracy in our country as a start for governance and the foundation for how we are to be ordered in our daily lives, then at least the majority of the citizens of this country should be allowed to decide what goes into this book, nothing less. I think that principle is something that has been at the foundation of the discontent surrounding this document. The very fact that it did not come about as a result of consultation widespread and then secondly that the majority of the citizens of this nation agree that yes, this should be adopted.

Since my recent release out of my long holiday as a guest of the government, I've had to grapple with many, many developments that have taken place in society since the day that I was incarcerated by our brothers. And one of them has been technology, of course. These devices that you all hold and that we all use now and can't seem to be, can't seem to go without, have come to be a major part of our lives. And I've had quite a challenging time just trying to catch up and let alone master the technology that's come about and been launched into society, which is now freely available in our nation. But I'm grateful for the technology from the point of view that it's been a very, very useful tool for me to at least just try and catch up with what's been going on. In some respects, I never ever will catch up. It's just too much information to digest and too many voices.

But I think it provides an opportunity for everyone at least to have a say. And then how do you then gather or garner every single voice that should be heard? And in our nation, that's bordering on seven, eight, nine hundred thousand, at least registered voters on the roll. But as far as this process is concerned, the review of the Constitution, it's given me a chance to at least listen to and understand what the views are of those who have come forth. Because the minute after they've spoken, literally, thanks to our studious journalistic friends here, the rest of the nation knows what the thoughts are. And I appreciate that because it's so great. Don't even have to buy a Fiji Times or Fiji Sun anymore. No offense. They have their place.

But for me, there have been some views that I've tried to read all the views of all the submissions that have been broadcasted. And I've tried to ask myself, you know, what do I think about the ideas that have been presented? Time being of the essence, I can say generally about the things about this Constitution that have been commented on. First and foremost, I wish to acknowledge the comments made by the commander of the RFMF and the stand which the RFMF has taken in relation to this document.

I totally concur with it. I agree with it. And that then presents a great challenge as far as the governance of our country is concerned here and going forward. And the great challenge is to correct and amend and come up with a solution that justifies the cry for justice and true equality. The views and comments made by Ro Naulu Mataitini; I concur. The views and comments made by my brother Jo Nata on this specific document, perhaps not on other matters to do with events 26 years ago, I concur. It is a lengthy process. The dismantling of this from a review perspective, line by line, clause by clause. But I will say one thing in my reading of this document. It's contentious. It is contradictory, very clearly. And easily the most contentious chapter is the chapter on immunity, easily by far.

And the reason is very simple. Any law, especially this one, or book of law, must have the confidence of everyone whose lives are governed by it. And I dare say that in my short time outside of prison, the support for this document, whilst enthusiastic as far as some of the clauses are concerned, like Bill of Rights, Chapter 2. But when it comes to the principle of what is fair in a society and what is fair in the governance of a country and what is fair in how we are all treated under the law, there is a very strong tide of discontent that I've encountered in my short stay outside in relation to this document.

Quite apart from the idea as to how it was introduced in the first place. But the content, now that's another great hurdle. And the hurdle lies in the hearts of every single person, a common man, right down to the lowest rung in society. And that rung is prison, by the way. And in prison there are rungs within rungs. In prison, it's a portrayal of our society. The structure of prison and one's journey through prison is also a portrayal of how society functions.

You may be familiar with the structure of the correction system. I'll talk a little bit about it because it reflects what this book should be doing. This law has no teeth if it were not for prisons and the judicial system and accountability of every citizen in relation to being a free moral agent within society bound to uphold the law. Perhaps not this one when I talk about fair law and law that's introduced by majority consent. In that sense, this does not qualify. From that principle alone, all the other former constitutions do qualify in one degree or another. But this one doesn't. And that's the cry that comes from the lowest levels of society with those who have been taken to task for crimes committed. When you commit a crime, you do the time. If you're man enough and honest enough to confess to it, you're on the way to redemption. That is a Godly and Christian principle.

A very powerful verse in scripture actually summarizes this book. Proverbs 28:13, he who covers and hides his sin or attempts to do so one can say will not prosper. But he who confesses them and holds up to it will find mercy and shall be blessed.

Now that principle is understood by every person in our country whether they're educated or not because it's the principle of what is fair. One rule for all. Every organization in our country functions on that principle. The principle of recognizing when something is wrong and recognizing that it has to be fixed. If any progress is to be made, serious progress, whether it be in a family unit, whether it be in an organization, whether it be in any arm of Government, whether it be inside the editor's office of a newspaper company, the same principles apply. Whether it be on the grounds of the FIFA World Cup going on, you see this principle in play every single day.

The principle that if you do something wrong you're accountable and you must front up to be taken to task at last and then you must pay. So, I come from a system in prison of 24 years where like I say the rungs, you know within the rung. The big rung is the corrections department and all the prisons, 14 of them around Fiji. This thing's gone off. If you come in you are received at what they call receiving centers that is Korovou Prison generally, or Lautoka prison around the west, or Labasa prison up north and then from there you've just received your sentence and then you get classified and then from there they decide what your journey through the system is going to be.

Now if you have the distinction of being someone who's perhaps at the top of the criminal tree, yours truly perhaps you know uncontested for 24 years, I'm at the top hands down. You get special promotion straight to maximum security prison and maximum-security prison is deemed as the lowest rung of society in any nation because that's where the worst people go for crimes committed and we all believe and accept that is absolutely acceptable and necessary in order to ensure a functioning society that is orderly and one that we can trust in. That is the job of the Government of the day is to enforce that on behalf of the citizenry at large. There is no way that anybody can be allowed to get away with crime and not be held accountable for it.

If that were the case and how governance is supposed to be or wants to be or needs to be as this document preaches, you're asking one for that confidence that is needed by those governed, you're asking it to be extinguished. In fact, you are legalizing its absolute you know deletion out of the memory of the country.

That's what this document asks every citizen to do because it provides the cover that we all know from the highest crime in our penal system and all those who aided and abetted it with respect. Now when I say this, I say all of this not out of malice, not out of anger, not out of a heart that seeks revenge, none of it. I'm merely trying to highlight in a common man's language and understanding why it has a lot of problems in our country. As I said in maximum, I have the distinction of being the criminal of all criminals, enemy of the state number one, all the labels of the last 24 years. No problem, I deserve it and I accepted it. And every single inmate that I met in my journey for some reason like I say you know before you hit a place like prison you really are not interested in the laws of the country. You don't read legal documents, you just don't ask yourself apart from the Commissioners, other people in this room.

It is not a common thing for a citizen to ask for a piece of legislation and then go study and read it. We just don't do stuff like that but when you land in prison man, I tell you there is a great interest in understanding the law especially if you're contesting your conviction but the general agreement in prison about this document is unfair. Unfair, straight up, common word, unfair. Not right. Why? It gives you all these rights yeah but it's just unfair because if I come in for something minor why should people get away with something major? It's just not fair. So, we have this black cloud hanging over our nation with regard to documents like this that are imposed and then which contain things which are unfair, grossly unfair and it's widely understood now because that's the common conversation that I've encountered especially me having gone through the same experience, executed a takeover unlawfully, granted, accepted.

Like I say you know if you want redemption you have to confess. That is a spiritual principle. If you want forgiveness you need to confess. That principle is not something that was invented by the human race. No, it's invented by the creator himself because that leads to salvation. It leads to rehabilitation.

It leads to new life and awakening, the awakening of hope and trust in a community and in a country. The process of confession. Without it well you can examine your own lives and examine your own homes when upheavals happen and when things go wrong whether it be between you and someone you love or you and someone else in the family. This document is testimony to the relationship, the most important relationship in a country, the relationship between those who govern and those who are governed. This document ruptures that relationship majorly, seriously and takes away the confidence of the citizenry in the machinery of governance because it perpetuates a principle that is not good which I say in the common man's language is unfair and wrong and so that engenders a spirit of disorder.

Translation of Mr. Speight's vernacular – Most do not care about the law and do not respect the structures of leadership in Government as well as the legal frameworks and their purpose in supporting peoples lives because those at the top do not respect the law and what is entrenched is instructing people to respect the law whereas those giving directives have broken the law.

And that is why this book is contradictory. You might even say hypocritical because there are clauses in here that say that even a duly elected government has no business and has no powers and even if a hundred percent of the citizenry said we want to change, you can't touch certain parts of this thing. Now is that the way to run a country? So, you try and run your organization the same way. You try and run a government the same way.

You're going to hit a wall one day and I'm here to propose that it's about time our nation saw itself in the true light of what is right and wrong. You don't need a huge education. You don't need many letters after your name to understand what I'm talking about. What is fair and just in a country, you must all work to achieve it. We've got a great deal of hurt in our country. I'm responsible for a large part of it. Like I say the principle of confession, it's spiritual. It requires a person to accept that he or she will experience great discomfort through the process of confession but it's necessary if healing is to come and it's necessary if progress is to be made. But the first thing is recognizing that there's been a wrong that's been committed and this confirms by the very existence of the immunity chapter that those who wrote that, those who wrote this know that they committed a great wrong because they've gone to such great lengths to protect themselves from that orange uniform that I wore for many many years.

So then where does it bring us? Where are we? I'm very grateful that there was a change in government in 2022. When I say all these things, I do not say it with malice in my heart or a spirit seeking revenge on anybody. I just believe fervently that justice can be done in our country and that we must all put our minds together to find the solution to make it happen regardless of the discomfort that it will bring of those who are protected. Unfairly, but we have to do it.

We have to do it in a way that is mixed with mercy and that's always been father's principle because all of us need to die for the sins that we've committed. That is a law that we all understand but when we confess, my goodness, you know we receive back his children into the family and we are told, you know, do good, go and do bad no more. We understand that principle. If it's not for that principle, no one will confess. But we confess because we see that we shall receive mercy and it's good for the soul and it's good for a country to own up to the things that are enshrined and keep from the confession and the healing and the opportunity to heal all the broken relationships that have taken place.

Mr. Speight : That's why as long as this document is in force, as long as this document purports to be the law of the country, and yes out of convenience, it's been adopted, it prevents us from finally being healed as a country. The onus has always been on the person who committed wrong in any country under any law, especially this one, constitutional type laws. The onus is on the person who breaks the law to confess and to accept it and that is why I'm very grateful to the commander RFMF today. With respect, I just never expected that to come from the military. I just didn't, but my thank yous went up to heaven faster than the speed of light many times over, just thanking the Lord that here's a man and an institution that reflected on its own shortcomings and decided to confess and to accept the consequences. Now that's the ultimate state that a person can be in before progress, healing, and reconciliation can happen and I'm very, very, very grateful, very grateful, and to all who support the principle of truth-telling with a view to finding a way forward for the healing and mending of relationships and the proper recompense to all the aggrieved parties.

I'm all for that, I'm all for that, and I believe we have the collective knowledge and know-how and desire in our nation for us to embark on that course full speed because the quicker we do it, the quicker we can really move. This is a stumbling block with the greatest of respect, but the intent behind this, my view, is self-preservation at all costs and that is not right, that is not right. We can't expect to have the total confidence of the governed if we govern under this and so the government's initiative to bring about and allow a review process, I fully support and I'm very, very grateful for, but like I said, had it not been for a change in government, I would not be sitting here. I'd still be in Max reflecting on the walls and the bars, praying silently whilst the years roll by, but here we are and I'm grateful for it, very, very grateful. So, I do believe that the process of review of this document is a very good one. There are many, many parts of it that can be retained in a new document and there are many parts of it that should be expunged completely, not the least of which is the contentious immunity chapter, which in principle is a recipe for disaster in the long run.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission, I think, is a necessary arm of the process of moving forward in our nation. I have chosen not to appear before it. I have great respect for the process, and I support it totally, but I just feel that it does not have the teeth, neither the mandate to go all the way to actually fix things because of this problem. So, very simply, we fix this first and then truth and reconciliation can go all the way to where it should. If we don't fix this first, then truth and reconciliation, in my view, is premature. Like I said again and I'll repeat, that's not to say that there's not a lot of good things in it, that there aren't good things inside this document.

Yes, there are, but all the good has been easily outweighed by the bad and that's why it has to go in a nutshell. So, I'm grateful to be here. I'm grateful for the opportunity. I'm grateful to the good Lord in heaven and I'm grateful to the Government of the day that saw it fit to release me. I'm the last person in Fiji's history to be sentenced to death. That's not in this constitution, but it was in previous constitutions, that crimes of political crimes of the overthrow of government, whoever commits it should be killed. I accepted it. I pled guilty to it and I was sentenced to death. Thank the Lord, the President of the day decided to exercise his powers and set aside death and put in life.

So, here I am in front of all of you and I'm grateful to be before my fellow citizens in this forum and to be sharing my thoughts on this very, very important document. With the greatest of respect, I'll also mention that I don't agree with the view tabled by members of the judiciary that the current legal order should not be disturbed whatsoever. For the reasons I've been talking about since I started here today. As a matter of fact, that view held recently tabled is just not good for anything, let alone Fiji. We must put forth our best endeavors to ensure that the judiciary complies with what is fair, what is just as a principle of governance, as opposed to what is convenient legally. Otherwise, it takes away confidence in the judiciary as well.

Mr. Speight

If you expect the common man who has the ultimate responsibility of deciding who is going to govern through the ballot box and that's everybody right down to that beggar that's lying on the pavement in front of BSP at Samabula every night. That tick determines who runs our lives for four years. If you expect everybody right down to that level, including me coming out of maximum-security prison after the time served for what's protected under here, to have confidence that we need to fix this. And sometimes I illustrate this thing when we think of our own families, you know. I come from a family of six. I'm number two. And like any siblings within a family, we all watch each other and how we get treated by Mom and Dad. And we're very conscious if someone is allowed to do something that we know none of us are allowed to do. Why? Children understand this principle. And yet we are expected it to go forward over the next 10, 20, 30, 40, 50 years as if nothing is wrong. Okay, it's enough time. It's enough.

Enough. No more of this pretending that things are okay. And so, for the third time, I'll say it again because from where I've been in my last two decades plus, the comments made by and the views presented by the commander of the RFMF is the starting point. That's exactly the place that where change will start. And I'm ready to support and to give my best efforts in making sure that we get this thing done. That we set a new foundation for our country going forward. And that we set a new document with respect to this one that brings every single citizen under the law and equal. No more finger pointing from the grassroots up to the top. And this has been the way it has been ever since I hit prison, ever since this document was introduced. This document hit the corrections like a storm. For the very simple reason it was unfair. And you want to hear the voices of people who have been incarcerated talk about unfair.

Wow, yeah, it's really something. And then that goes. But like I said, when I came out just over a year ago, the record playing this song, this unfair song about our country is alive and well and strong out there in the community. I suppose it's because I served time for the same crime. And they asked me and I'm saying, I've just come out and relaxed.

Translation of vernacular - If it was for you, how about them? That's how I've been questioned at places I go to.

From all the races, by the way, all the races. Because that's one thing that we all have in common as humans, regardless of our ethnic backgrounds. We all have in common in our hearts, starting with our consciences, what is right and what is wrong. We all know. It is a common thread that keeps us together and makes society function. And that's why I say again, this document breaks that thread. And this is the first thing that we should fix. Before we can find the progress and move like what we all want. We all want Fiji to thrive. I won't talk specifically, but I'll mention it generally.

The idea of a common name. I understand the principle behind it. And I understand the reasoning behind it, but it's flawed. It makes people second guess something so special and so unique and God-given, your ethnic identity. Now, unless we fix the justice element, all of the different ethnic groups in our country can't live together very well, because it's an unfair society. That's number one. Number two, the Bill of Rights is great. It covers everybody. No problem.

But each ethnic group has its desire to continue with its uniqueness and it must be encouraged, but not at the expense of the greater group. So, there are things within each ethnic group's particular beliefs, way of doing things, that if it's not good for the greater good, then they must voluntarily just say this one. But there's another set of submissions that occurred here a couple of days ago, and that's by the TLTB with regard, and that's by Niko Nawaikula and all our itaukei brothers. Now, those voices have to be heard, and they have to be accommodated. And the process of hearing those voices and accommodating the issues brought up must never and forever going forth be labeled as racist anymore, because they're not, with respect. When the Itaukei get up and say, please, this, this, this, this, this, you know, we want addressed. Please, it has been a common practice to label it all as racist. And I ask, in my own mind, no, that's not the case. No one should feel threatened. No one should feel agitated. No one should feel uncertain. Level heads will prevail, and those that push the agenda, that itaukei issues are not good for the future of this country and should not be addressed specifically.

I ask that they reconsider and work together with the itaukei community in determining certain things about itself that only it can determine. The detail of all of that has been submitted before you, I concur, with a great majority of the views that were tabled. But it leads to this whole thing about justice, it's all connected. Unless we fix the foundation, document and take care of correcting the perceptions that exist, the perception that there isn't fairness, and this document confirms the actuality of it, this has to be fixed, so that the conscience of the country can be cleansed, so that we can all move forward together. Then it lays the foundation for the addressing of all the contentious issues, a lot of which has been misrepresented. But then true and open dialogue can happen, honest dialogue, respectful dialogue, when we all understand, as we get up in the morning, yes, we really, really, really are equal citizens in this country, under the law, it starts from there.

Then we can address the specific issues of each group. There are some things that are universal that apply to all, and there are some things that just don't, and we have to accept the differences, especially as far as the itaukei is concerned, with the greatest of respect and all the love for all of our other ethnic groups, brothers and sisters in our country. Now, let me just touch on truth and reconciliation. Like I said before, I accept it, I'm all for it, but with the right framework, legal, social, financial, and with due regard for all that, like they say, stakeholders, this favorite word that I've come to learn since I came out. Everyone's got a stake in this thing, and so we should all be mindful for it. So, with those few words, I hope I haven't bored you this morning, but those are my views in general, like I say, the specifics of this, well, that's a long, long process, but the general, my general view of this, I've just expressed. I do have faith in the process that we can all find a better way, and a more relevant way, and a fairer way going forward. With those few words, Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, I wrap up my comments this morning and thank you for your time.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much, Mr. Speight. Thank you very much for those thoughts and observations well put to us, and as usual, since you have given us your views and thoughts in relation to what the 2013 Constitution encompasses, and what a proper constitution should entail or encompass, I will ask the Commissioners if they have any comments which may raise discussions with you this afternoon.

So, commissioners, if there is anyone who might want to put a comment or ask a question which would raise discussions in relation to the review of the 2013 constitution, I now give you time. Dr. Fatiaki.

Dr. Fatiaki: Mr. Speight, may I first thank you. Thank you for those candid, frank, deep, and insightful reflections. Coming from you particularly, I think and I hope that the greater public will have the opportunity to hear your reflections as they come from a place grounded in a lived experience with, dare I suggest, a lot of wisdom that may help not necessarily just this commission, but individuals in this country, reflect on where we're at going forwards. You have obviously been keeping track of some of the consultations that have been held throughout the country, and I must confess that for me personally, it's been a learning experience.

Specific to some of the issues that you raised, or one particular issue that you raised, I'm sure some of my colleagues who are there will reflect on this, because it was first brought up I think in Vanua Levu in Dreketi at a village consultation, where a gentleman, no longer young, looked me in the eye and said, Mr. Chairman Commissioner, I was in the CRW unit in 2006, I think it was, and I came out of prison nine years ago after serving 15 years. He had a simple question for us, why did I serve and many others that were party to what I did as a soldier obeying orders, why did I serve and they didn't? I remember with my colleagues who were there, not really been able to answer it, and all I could do was say thank you for your service to the forces, but I didn't have an answer. I think today you encapsulate that because I was faced with the same question at two other places, in Naitasiri, and I think more recently as we were ending our consultations.

It wasn't directed straight at me that way, but if it were, again I would have no answer, and I think your comments reflect the sentiments of many people throughout the country, particularly in respect of what I think some people have called the elephant in the room. All I can say is that as Commissioners, we appreciate your comments, we will reflect deeply, and I mean really reflect deeply, on those particular areas relating to this elephant in the room, so that maybe that gentleman who asked that question in, I think it was Macuata, Dreketi, Vanua Levu will have an answer one day. That's the best I can say in my literal capacity as a commissioner. We're about to enter the deliberation phase over the next couple of months. Again, I thank you. I thank you for the courage to front up here. I didn't realize you were part of the program until I got informed by our legal officers that you were coming to testify. We extended that invitation to others unnamed that chose not to testify, and for you to willingly come forward with your reflections that may help this process. I thank you. I have no more comments. Chair, through you.

Mr. Begg: Thank you very much. Mr. Speight, thank you for your comments this morning. I note you make reference to the commanders of the RFMF's submission. And acknowledge accepting of it. You talk about relief of the truth, and not going to the TRC. You made that clear.

I'm not going to talk about that, but I suspect that my point as a commissioner is to hear constitutionally how that might impact the next stage of this, and to put it in your better words, as you see it, relief of the truth. So maybe down someday as my fellow commissioner says that might pan out through the next stages of this. So constitutionally, how do you think we should or how would you recommend that?

Mr. Speight: It's not a difficult question, because I think truth-telling is a very strong desire that exists within the community at large, in light of all the events that have taken place. There is a general perception that there is more to what happened than what was seen. And it is correct. There is much, much more to what happened, but which is not known publicly. But I've always held the view that if truth-telling were to really occur one day, that it should occur within the right framework. Legal, social implications, the judicial implications, but at the foundation of it all should be a desire that justice has to be part of it, mixed with mercy, the mercy element. We waited long for it in prison to happen, the mercy element, and still waiting in some degree.

I won't elaborate on it now, but I really, really believe that that the Truth and Reconciliation Commission has to be given the resources and the legal powers to work in tandem with this Commission, the review of this document, because this document can't be finalized unless the Truth and Reconciliation Commission is properly convened, resourced, and then, you know, like put to bed once and for all the question marks which exist in the minds of many. Once that is done, that lays the foundation for this, the foundation because the Truth and Reconciliation, you know, basically revolves around the participants of the perpetrators. As they say, George, you're a perpetrator, probably the worst of them all. So, I said, okay, you know, I accept that. But yeah, I'm not the only one. And so, with, like I say again, a great respect and gratitude for Commander's comments, you know, the military is a huge, huge part of this whole story.

And so, the truth-telling and the healing process, you know, is going to begin in those kinds of quarters, you know, with myself, the military, you know, I'm a civilian, I'm the only civilian that led a coup and went to jail for a time, you know, that's the way the law works. We accept it. We plead guilty. And hopefully we can find redemption back in society, let alone in front of God, to be able to make something of the rest of our lives. You know, it's going to be doubly hard. That's why, again, I just keep saying that Commander's comments and presentations, it's the start of what I see as the opportunity for our nation to really address this, take the bull by the horns, so to speak, going right back to 87, dismantling the whole thing and coming up, you know, with the acknowledgement of what took place by those who did it, the hurt that was caused, the issues that were behind it.

Those issues cannot be ignored. And once we come to grips with all of that and accept, you know, let all the voices that say it's this, it's this, it's this, it's this, you know, let's hear honestly and fairly from everyone. I mentioned Brother Jo Nata, you know, and he's given his views on 2000. You know, I don't concur with most of what he said, but I respect his right to say it and to, you know, that was his experience. We did not know each other before 2000. So, everyone takes themself to an event, you know, for their own reasons, but it's great to show respect to him, but he does not speak for me and neither does anyone else speak for me. And I would say the same for the military and everyone who's participated in coups for whatever reason.

They'll justify it the best way they know how, but is it the truth? And so we need to get down to it and understand the issues that why people participated in these things, you know, and then we can all agree or disagree, but we need to, we need to like work together, this forum, this body, the truth and reconciliation body with all of the institutions that were involved in the people and come up with a solution while satisfying justice or in the process mixed with mercy. And I believe we can do it and we have to do it. I've been thinking long and hard in prison for 24 plus years about what that process might be. I have some ideas. Let the state be set for it to take place and then we can talk about solutions, much like, you know, structures of constitution and government and all that. These are all, you know, options that are out there, but before it, we need to take care of the foundation and that's where we need to start, which is why this is good.

Mr. Beg: Thank you very much, Mr. Speight. Appreciate your comments to my questions. Thank you.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you, Mr. Speight. First of all, we, one of our mandates is to try to fix the democratic deficit in 2013 constitution. We would like to come up with something that prevents course from taking place. Of course, that's very difficult. My question to you is that was 1997 constitution one of the factors in the 2000 coup?

Mr. Speight: Good question. Let me understand the question. You're asking me whether any part of the 1997 constitution caused me to involve myself in 2000. Is that basically what you're asking?

Mr. Kohli: That is the correct question.

Mr. Speight: Yes, okay. I'd say no, 95%. Yeah, I don't, the 1997 constitution is not a perfect constitution by any means.

Mr. Kohli: Can I ask you to address that 5%?

Mr. Speight: The immunity, which in the light of justice and righteousness and fairness issues, you could say it's the reverse. You know, the immunity is a 95% that I don't like, but in all fairness, you know, that's before my involvement in the events of 2000. I never gave much thought to the 97 Constitution. I was pretty much happy with it. You know, it's, it's the things that happened within the 365-day rule of, you know, the coalition government after 99, that I was not happy with, especially the bills that were taken.

Mr. Kohli: I can see your deep desire to tell the truth. You have obviously asked forgiveness and everything. What stage would you like to be set before you reveal the whole truth and nothing but the truth?

Mr. Speight: I'm not the only one that's going to reveal the truth. There's many, many people who have, you know, the truth and what took place, but like I said, if the design behind the process is healing, justice, and then moving forward, then I'm ready. So, I suppose it will take political will to make it happen. But the government of the day has to decide that we're going to go all the way in this process.

Now that's difficult, which again, I come back because, you know, why would you promote a process which is with the greatest of respect, you know, minister and Mr. Ditoka's view that no, we shouldn't do anything like that because it's just going to be uncomfortable for many, many people. Well, that's just not, this is not the way forward. Yeah. Progress is made when people accept the consequences of wrongs committed. I keep coming back to the Commander. He's willing to accept and man up and face up to the consequences of having the immunity removed. The institution is ready to accept. It's the process that we all must sit down and discuss and agree.

These will be the penalties. And at the end of it, we must see a big light that will then bring redemption to the whole country. But justice cannot be forgotten in the process. Justice must be seen to be done and it must be done for us to get back the confidence of those who are governed by the government. Because right now, the government is being governed by people who are protected. And that is wrong. It's just wrong. It's not right. They have no moral right to lecture the country about law and order. And I believe commander's conscience has been awakened for quite some time, but you know, 500 out of 100 for him for stepping up and saying, right, we're ready to accept the consequences.

How then can healing happen? How then can moving forward happen in the country? How then can relationships be met? How then can the confidence of the citizens of the country be restored? How then? Is there another way? We've tried that way. It hasn't worked. It never will work. It just won't work. Try it in your own family. It won't work. Try it in your own marriage. It won't work. To continue as if nothing happened. It just won't work. So that's what we face as a country. And the sooner we get together and face it head on with all of the difficulties that it entails and all of the tears and the crying and the pain and the reparation to those who've been hurt, all that, yes, and justice to those who've been evading it, all that, but mixed with mercy, I believe we can do it. I really believe it.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you, Mr. Speight.

Mr. Valenitabua: Mr. Speight, you've heard comments and questions from the other commissioners. I believe I will make the final remark before we bring this session to a close. During our consultations around the country, an issue that was raised repeatedly from various places, the issue of ownership of mineral resources within lands or underneath lands. Now yesterday we had the Minister, the Honorable Minister for Lands and Mineral Resources make submissions before us in relation to the philosophy of having the government retain ownership of mineral resources. We heard the submissions, we understood it, and something which we will need to deliberate on very carefully in relation to the voice of the people and the voice of the government and the protection of mineral resources. We have heard the philosophy yesterday.

During our consultations around the country too, we have been bombarded with suggestions of the unfairness of the 2013 Constitution, not only in relation to the immunity provision, but also to various provisions in the Constitution. Now I note that when you started with your submission this morning, you stated that every provision needs to be reviewed because they are full of contradictions and unfairness. Now we heard you this morning and although you are saying that they are your views and your thoughts, I must say, you know, that they are similar to the philosophy of mineral ownership which was given us by the Minister yesterday. You're giving us reasons, the rationale of why this Constitution has to be reviewed due to the unfairness. We were at Nadaro village in Tailevu and one of the speakers there really raised the inequality before the law.

We are talking equality before the law in the Constitution. He directed that no, there's no equality because some people are not being taken to task for what they did in relation to the events or the past events which you know. So, with what we have heard this morning is going to give us a better line of thought or it's going to give us the necessity to really think hard about the immunity provisions, the immunity provision and the other provisions which have been submitted to us to be very unfair. And that is something we thank you about this morning. As you correctly stated, the Commander of the Fiji Military Forces has come forward stating the military's stance. They have told us to remove the immunity clause. However, we still have a concern in relation to the judiciary. You are stating or you have stated that you don't agree with a view of the judiciary that current legal order not to be disturbed and you in your own words this is unfair. Now that is something we have to consider also. The current legal order as has been stated by the Supreme Court is they did not touch on that immunity clause.

Mr. Speight: Well, they reinforced it, they mentioned it specifically.

Mr. Valenitabua: Right, that's it. So, we will be as you know whatever a court say they become law. So, there is a piece of law that we will have to deal with. We have heard that the voice of the people we have to consider. Whatever the people think, whatever the people ask for, we should try to entertain it. So, this commission will be in a very precarious state in relation to these issues. But thank you very much for this morning. You have opened up thoughts which we will consider very very carefully when we sit down for deliberations which starts next week. We thank you very much indeed for coming here this morning and giving us those thoughts and those views. Now with those words I thank you again for turning up here this morning or we have gone to the afternoon now and we wish you well in your future endeavor which you have just started.

Mr. Speight: Well, I'm available if you need me for any further discussions.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you very much, thank you very much.

----------End of Session [9-7-2026]----------

Justice Daniel Fatiaki

Mr. Daniel Fatiaki
Date:10-7-2026

Mr. Valenitabua: We welcome you this morning. We know that we have received you at an earlier time with the Law Reform Group, and today we are receiving you again as an individual. We thank you very much for coming before us again, coming before the Constitution Review Commission, offering you assistance.

Although we are here to receive submissions, we know that the submissions from you would be very helpful to us and it will be an assistance to us. Now, we have introduced you, introduced us to you at an earlier occasion, but for the record, I wish to introduce the commissioners this morning who are sitting. On my far right is Mr. Conway Begg, and next to him is Ms. Merewalesi Nailatikau, and on my immediate right is Dr. John Fatiaki.

On my immediate left is Mr. Ami Kohli, very well known to you, sir, and on the far left is Dr. Nilesh Gounder and I am Mr. Valenitabua:. Now, I will not talk much on the introductions because you have appeared before us before, you know what we are here for, and I would rather that we now pass the mic and the floor to you, Judge Fatiaki, so that you could present to us your submissions and your advice, your recommendations, sir. Thank you very much.

Justice Fatiaki: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair, for your introductory remarks. I would like to acknowledge the commission members who are present today, and particularly I would like to thank the commission, yourself, Mr. Chairman, for the kind invitation and the time slot you have given to you. I am humbled by the thought that you think that I might be able to assist you in your enormous task and deliberations, but I am in retirement and I have been out of practice for quite a long time, as you are probably aware, and so I haven't really had very much to do with the 2013 Constitution.

In the time that it was passed, up till now, I've spent ten years of my life in Vanuatu since 2009, and then almost two years in Nauru thereafter. So, if I'm not entirely familiar with all the provisions, you'll please excuse me. I do have some thoughts that I can share, which I hope will be helpful.

And I am familiar with some of your members, no doubt. I've also realised that we have worked together in legal practice, usually on different sides of the bench, but I'd like to take this opportunity to invite the commission members, if they think there are things that I can assist that I don't speak on, please feel free to ask me questions. I should do my very best to answer them.

I'm rather overwhelmed by your previous speakers and that I should be in the company of people such as George Spade is humbling, if not exciting. You have been entrusted with a significant responsibility as commissioners and you have extensive terms of reference to enquire into and examine the democratic deficits, that seems to be a catchphrase that emanated from the Supreme Court's opinion. Democratic deficits in the 2013 Constitution, including those that were highlighted by the Supreme Court in its opinion, you are asked to make recommendations relative to the reforms that will strengthen our constitutional framework.

Your task is not simply about changing words in a legal document. It is about ensuring that the amended Constitution reflects the aspirations of our people, protects fundamental rights and freedoms, promotes good governance, upholds the rule of law, safeguards judicial independence, strengthens democratic institutions and recognises the unique place of indigenous I taukei and Rotuman communities, including the protection of their lands and fishing rights and the role of their respective councils of chief. You are also asked to ensure that all communities, including marginalised groups, are heard and that Fiji's constitutional arrangements are consistent with ratified international conventions and human rights principles.

Public consultations are an essential part of Constitution making and I commend the Commission for undertaking such extensive Fiji-wide consultations. I have followed your sojourn through our country with much interest and I know that you have received many useful submissions from our rural communities and maritime zones. As I make my submissions today, I am guided by two simple principles.

Firstly, if it isn't broken, don't try to fix it. Constitutional reform should not be pursued for its own sake. This must not be a tick-in-the-box exercise.

The second principle is a little more complicated and it states that a government's legitimacy and moral authority to use the state's power is justified and lawful only when agreed or consented to by the people over which that power is exercised. On that basis alone, the validity of the 2013 Constitution, which was unilaterally imposed on the people of Fiji by a military decree without prior consultations or approved and adopted by a people's referendum or by parliamentary ratification, must be considered at best doubtful. It is certainly the largest democratic deficit.

However, where provisions and institutions have served the nation well, they should be strengthened and preserved in your deliberations. Where weaknesses exist, they should be considered carefully and either improved or rejected. My submission this morning focuses on several areas which I believe deserve the Commission's careful consideration and recommendations.

Firstly, the preamble. That should be extended. It is very short.

Four miserable paragraphs, I think, or sentences. It should acknowledge Fiji's constitutional history as well as recognising the nation's Christian heritage while respecting other religions. Secondly, the Constitution should identify and reinforce a shared national identity that promotes unity while respecting Fiji's rich cultural and multi-ethnic diversity.

There has been much discussion in the news and on social media about the origins and proper use of the term Fijian since the GCC's submission to the Commission of Renewed Interest in it. Some claim it belongs to the indigenous I Taukei and others believe it should be the common name for all peoples in Fiji. Undoubtedly, the arguments for and against are sincerely held and robustly advanced.

As an indigenous native from the island of Rotuma, I have always referred to myself as a Rotuman. I also grew up knowing that the indigenous natives of Fiji are and were called Fijian, not I taukei or Kai Viti. I am proud of my Rotuman heritage and name and I have no particular desire to be called a Fijian.

Neither do I feel diminished or alienated by not being called by a name that I have long known belongs to another ethnic group in our multi-ethnic society, or in not having a common name with other ethnic groups in our multiracial country. Whatever might be its foreign origins or source, the term Fijian has been applied for generations to the indigenous community as its collective name, however inappropriate, unauthentic or inaccurate it might be. Of one thing I am sure, however, and that is that a common name or national identity cannot be imposed, declared or dictated by legislative power, however well-intentioned or supreme.

Little respect is due, in my view, to a one-line declaration that we are all Fijians in a constitution that was unilaterally promulgated in a military decree without prior consultations or the agreement of the affected indigenous group. Thirdly, consideration should be given to provisions concerning dissolved political parties and whether existing arrangements adequately support democratic participation. In this regard, too, I too watched the manoeuvrings, read about the options and listened to the personal and reported utterances of the party-less MPs in Parliament after the unceremonious demise of the Fiji First Party.

I must confess that an electoral system that is so heavily biased towards political parties and so unfriendly to independence, which then allows MPs of a deregistered party to elect to become independents or by legitimising turncoats without a by-election or giving their voters a say, is a complete anathema to democratic principles. In my view, if a political party is dissolved, all seats in Parliament occupied by members of that party should be declared vacant and a by-election ordered to decide their replacements. Fourth, the qualifications of candidates for election to Parliament should promote integrity, competence and public confidence in elected representatives.

I don't necessarily agree with those who require the imposition of a minimum education requirement for people standing as candidates in an election. I think the strength of a democracy and the strength of our country is that all persons, however well-educated or uneducated they might be, have a right to be able to represent their communities and peoples of similar interests to themselves. We can't all be professors, we can't all be doctors, lawyers or even university graduates.

Many of us have come from families that never had university graduates and we see it every day in the papers and during university graduations the great enormous pride that families have when for the very first time after decades they have one person graduate from university. That's all well and good, but as I said, the unemployed, the marginalised, the handicapped, they too are all entitled to be represented by someone like them, someone they can identify with. However, in this regard, with regard to the qualification of candidates, I make two suggestions.

Firstly, each candidate should be required to provide a negative drug test certificate with their nomination form. I'm prompted to make that suggestion because of the enormous drug problem that is facing the country and I can't imagine that we would entertain our politicians appearing before parliament representing the people and being doped to the eyeballs on methamphetamines or marijuana, whichever preference they have. So, yes, I would require a negative drug test with their nomination forms.

Secondly, each candidate for election must provide a statutory declaration that he or she does not rely on the immunity provisions in Chapter 10 of the Constitution. I make no apologies for this latter suggestion, which is intended to break the laundry cycle of a coup maker removing an elected government, then ruling by decree, imposing a constitution, standing in an election and becoming prime minister while still immunised. That has to stop.

There can be no benefit for people who undertake treasonous activities and a person who undertakes treasonous activities and participates in a coup does not deserve the great privilege and honour it is to stand and represent people in a parliament. Thirdly, the judiciary should be strengthened by addressing delays in the trial of cases and in the delivery of judgements, by ensuring adequate judicial resources are provided and thereby reinforcing public confidence in the administration of justice. This is a topic that I might digress and discuss in a little bit more detail because I have personal experience of it.

The judiciary is the third arm of government, the other two being the legislature and the executive. It is considered the weakest arm. It controls neither the weapons nor the public purse.

Its standing is measured by the nature and quality of its judgements and judges and the level of persuasion that it can instil and the confidence it can get and that the public bestows on it for its complete independence and fearless upholding of the rule of law. In a funny sort of way, my history, like the history of this country, is inevitably and experimentally linked to coups. When the first coup happened in 1987, I was 34 years of age.

I was appearing before Justice Kersley in the Lautoka High Court at the time, on the 14th of May, doing a criminal trial. I was then still a prosecutor in the public prosecutor's office. I saw a clerk come in and hand a piece of paper to His Honour, who then read it.

In his full regalia, he looked up at us and he said, there's been a coup. God save the Queen. He stood up and walked out.

We were left standing there gasping. I turned to my colleague, a defence lawyer, and said, What's a coup? Never come across this thing. Didn't know what it was.

Well, in 1987, at the tender age of 34, when no one should have to decide the kind of decisions that I had to make, the Chief Justice invited me onto the High Court bench. I discussed it with my family. When he first asked me, I said, well, I really have to think about it.

I can't just give an answer right now. I need to discuss it with my young family. Anyway, that discussion is many, many decades ago, and I think you know what happened.

I accepted the invitation and became a judge of the High Court in 1988. During that first coup, I was very proud to be part of the judiciary. It stood firm and it gave advice to the Governor-General to hold firm and not give in easily to the coup makers.

I think the end result of that was that Rabuka had to commit another coup to remove the Queen, and I suppose with her the Queen's judges, who had stood firm. We became a republic after that, and that's part of our history. Since then, there have been two other coups in 2000 and 2006, and I can say that unlike that 1987 coup where the judiciary came out relatively unscathed, the other two coups actually decimated the judiciary.

There was mass resignations and mass firings, and in the end, we ended up with a judiciary which was manned by Sri Lankans. I've never had the pleasure of appearing before any of them. But I understand and I've seen some of the work that they've produced, and it is not the same as what we'd be used to in the earlier days.

And that's not surprising. They come from a distant island that had no relation up to that point in time with Fiji. Even their boat people I don't think intended ever to come to Fiji.

They usually were happy to stop off in Australia. But yes, our entire judiciary was virtually Sri Lankan, and in terms of the judiciary, that was a dark period. Since then, we've begun to recover.

Our lower judiciary is now almost entirely local, and the quality has changed slightly, but it's getting better. And we have to give our people a chance to rise to the occasion and man this judiciary, the third arm of government. I ask this commission to do its very best to ensure that the appointment of judges and magistrates is apolitical, not involve interference.

I ask that any shadow of interference by the Attorney General or government bureaucracies should be removed from the appointing authority. In my time it was the Chairman of the Public Service Commission, the Chief Justice, and a member of the Law Society, the President of the Law Society. They were the members of the Appointing Judicial Services Commission.

I think a number of appointing authorities needs to be rationalized. There are just too many. I can hardly cope with it.

The Constitution seems to be full of all sorts of people, full of all sorts of new commissions. You have to wonder how this is the idea that I have about if it's not broke, don't try and fix it. And a lot of the fixings that went on and the creation of commissions were personal things.

They were lesser people's attempts to impose themselves on institutions and professions that they found themselves wanting and incapable of performing in. And so, their input was to actually attempt to destroy the future Law Society, for instance, make membership of the Law Society non-compulsory. And so, as a result the Law Society literally split up into those who were registered members and those who were unregistered members.

It was this wholly unbelievable situation to occur. And then you even had law conferences that government lawyers were forced to attend, called the Attorney General's Conference that none of the civil practitioners wanted to go to. And then you had the Law Society's convention that only the practicing lawyers attended and none of the government lawyers were actually allowed to.

It's just phenomenal the kind of hatred and stupidity that got imposed on legal professions. And that kind of thing needs to stop. At one time the profession policed itself.

I can't say that there was any better than the new arrangements. In fact, the new arrangements seem to be working quite well with an independent legal services commission. But again, there is a commission.

My plea is that anything to do with government and the Attorney General's office should be removed from all appointing authorities. And if we're really to be independent, that's where the independents start, by the removal of any say in the appointment of independent officers. Sixthly, the commission should review the provisions relating to the constitutional immunity, particularly those contained in Chapter 10, and consider whether they serve the long-term interests of justice, accountability, and national reconciliation.

A lot has already been said about it, and unfortunately, I feel the need to add my little bit to it. Chapter 10 covers what I call a multitude of sins, and protects a host of sinners with varying degrees of participation and involvement in the events and activities during and after the 5th of December 2006, the commencement date of the 2006 coup. I wonder why it needed to be so wide, so widely framed.

If you sneezed anywhere near a coup, you were immunized. It's just phenomenal. It's utterly unbelievable.

Words like participated directly or indirectly, were involved in or accepted an appointment of whatever nature, the kind of rubbish that lawyers write, to try and catch everything and anything at all, including tadpoles in a pool. That's the kind of language they use in this immunity thing. Surprisingly, and this is what I'm utterly gobsmacked about, including amongst the identified sinners is none other than the judiciary.

They're listed as protected by this immunity in Chapter 10, and I can't believe it. The judiciary is supposed to be the pinnacle of lawfulness, and why would they need protection under an immunity clause? But that deserves another commission, and another statement of how the judiciary ended up on the list of sinners. And I think those who were practicing law during my time when I was Chief Justice would realize that the judiciary became fractured as part of the 2006 coup.

Maybe it had its beginnings in the fractures during George Spake coup, but it burst out into the open certainly in 2006, and that is another dark period. And maybe that's what they mean when they say those people who were involved in couping the judiciary needed to be protected and immunized against that kind of illegality. Why? You have to ask, why would the judiciary involve itself in illegal treasonous activity? Why does it need immunity? The only reason why anyone needs immunity is because they did something wrong, and they don't want to be answerable and accountable for it.

Well, where's the public interest in that? What benefit do we get from all these immunized people? That's why I say all those people who take advantage of that immunity clause should never be allowed to stand for parliament and elections. No. Be that as it may, in light of the commander's, the Republic of Fiji Military Forces commander's recent call for the removal of Chapter 10, I humbly add my concurring voice to the growing cause.

I know it's not an easy task for you, because no other than the Supreme Court has said that this chapter is untouchable. All sorts of language like that, terrifying stuff. But like I tell everybody, the constitution is man-made.

What man puts, man can undo. The only thing you can't undo is the Ten Commandments, and that's not man-made. But otherwise, Chapter 10, like any other chapter, can be removed, and I urge you to recommend its removal.

Otherwise, this commission, strangely enough, will sit in the face of the commander's request that it be removed, in the face of George Spade's request, in the face of my request that it be removed. I think you'd be swimming against the tide. Needless to say, the continued existence of Chapter 10 in our constitution is a democratic deficit, and a cancerous blot which serves no useful purpose other than being a constant reminder to future generations of an unfortunate part of our past that is best reserved for our history books.

Our generations after us don't need to be told that all coup-makers from time immemorial are immunized forever. Seventhly, the provisions governing the disciplined forces, especially the Republic of Fiji militia forces, should clearly define their institutional role and ensure that civilian democratic governance remains paramount. The unacceptable misunderstandings and confusion caused by the vague provisions of Section 131.2 of the 2013 Constitution can only be removed by the complete deletion of that paragraph.

It has no business in our constitution or in the Republic of Fiji militia forces. You sort of wonder to yourself, if the Republic of Fiji Military Forces have overall responsibility for the security, defence, and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians at all times, you sort of wonder to yourself, well, in the face of that, why do we even bother with a parliament that passes laws? Why do we even bother with a police force that has the primary duty to maintain law and order in this country? We have an institution that has an overarching responsibility to look after all our welfare, so why don't we just hand it all to them and say, take over, please? No. That provision must be deleted if we are ever to return to democratic government.

Eighthly, the constitutional status and independence of FICAC and the Directive of Public Prosecutions deserves careful consideration. There just seems to be so much hubra and hubris over these positions. FICAC and the DPP.

These things were unimaginable in my time. But some people say, well, you're partly to be responsible because you conducted the commission which drafted the report for FICAC and it eventually gave rise to FICAC. It was never intended to be used like that.

What happened was the last, well, the Bainimarama government, if you can call it that, weaponized FICAC and used it as an attack dog to go after people it didn't agree with. That was never its intention. Now, they have been removed, but old habits die hard.

These institutions need flushing out. There are still bad eggs hiding in there and the rot continues. I thought about whether or not I should make a submission that suggested that the DPP should continue to maintain its constitutional position as prosecutor of all matter's criminal and that FICAC should be subservient to the DPP in prosecutorial matters.

And in fact, its ability to prosecute might be something that should be taken away from FICAC and handed back to the DPP's office where it truly belongs and most familiar. FICAC can continue with its investigation and charging, but not with conducting the prosecutions.

Interests become too vested when you are investigator, prosecutor, and charging officer.

The conflict of interest is so obviously dangerous that those roles need to be separated. Finally, consideration might be given to the treatment of decrees and promulgations, including the legal framework. Before that, I encourage the commission to examine whether FICAC would benefit from the establishment or restoration of a senate as a reviewing chamber to strengthen legislative scrutiny and representation of the marginalized in our society.

Finally, consideration should be given to the treatment of decrees and promulgations, including the legal framework governing their status and transition within Fiji's constitutional order. After the 1987 coup, almost all military decrees and proclamations that had been unilaterally imposed were considered and ratified by Parliament as Acts of Parliament, or they were repealed. Since then, and after the later coups in 2000 and 2006, the contempt of familiarity set in, and all decrees and promulgations were constituted Acts by definition, however egregious, unfair, or immoral they might be.

In this latter regard, the notoriously egregious Decree No. 51 unilaterally decimated the solemn, irrevocable contracts of affected pensioners with the FNPF and substantially reduced their pensions and livelihood. Then, in a final act of official cruelty by adding salt to their gaping wounds, the military-led junta denied the affected pensioners their basic human right of access to the courts to seek redress.

Decree No. 51 remains on our statute books as an instance and indictment of what unchecked absolute power can do to the marginalised and powerless members of our society. I urge this Commission to recommend to His Excellency the immediate ex gratia payment by FNPL of 50% of each affected pensioner's entitlements without admission of liability.

The various submissions and issues raised by me are not merely legal questions. They are questions that need to be answered. They are questions about how we wish to be governed as a nation, about how we can protect our democracy, and how we can begin to rebuild confidence in our public institutions.

The Commission's report is due to be submitted to His Excellency by the end of August. It is a mammoth task and I do not envy you, but I know that you will rise to that occasion. It will be subsequently considered by Cabinet and Parliament, and it will have a lasting significance and impact on future generations of our citizens.

A constitution must belong to all the people. It should unite rather than divide, protect rather than exclude, and provide a stable foundation for peace, justice, democracy, and prosperity for our country. I thank you once again for the opportunity to present my submissions.

I wish the Commission every success as it carries out this very important national responsibility. I thank you for your time. And I invite questions if you have any.

I usually tell everyone, and I think I've told you that before, it is a rare opportunity you have to question a Chief Justice.

Mr .Kohli I don't normally get opportunities like that, Judge. Having said that, on a serious note, when I was first appointed to this Commission, I was worried about certain things.

After hearing today, I'm more worried and more concerned. And as usual, having appeared before you on many, many occasions, I've been guided by you and I seek your guidance. My question is this.

You have said that we can remove Chapter 10, and the Supreme Court, whether you call it in its opinion or determination, has told us not to touch it. And wherever we have been going as Commission, my commissioners would agree, we have been saying that we cannot get rid of Chapter 10. So now, I seek your guidance, Judge.
Tell me, how can we legally remove Chapter 10?

Justice Fatiaki: Thank you for that question. As a great cricketer, you just bowled me out gruggly, but I shall try to bat it. Let me begin by saying that the Supreme Court's decision was an opinion.

Yes, I also heard the Supreme Court say what it said about its opinion and how it is binding on all other courts of the State. You are not a court, and the Supreme Court's opinion about its binding nature is taken from Section 98.6. Decisions of the Supreme Court are subject to subsection 7, binding on all other courts of the State. It doesn't say it's binding on Parliament.

It doesn't say it's binding on Cabinet. It doesn't say it's binding on all. It says all other courts.

So, let it bind the courts. You're not a court. It may sound radical.

Maybe it is. But at my age, in my present time, I can be radical. That's the first point.

Secondly, a Supreme Court opinion is what it is. It is an opinion. It doesn't say under Section, anyway, it's the section where Cabinet can ask for, yes, 91.5. Cabinet may seek an opinion from the Supreme Court on any matter concerning the interpretation or application of this Constitution.

I think Mr. Kohli, as a trained lawyer, you will appreciate that this is a very, very special provision. It is not your normal run of the mill. No one can access the Supreme Court like Cabinet.

No one can go directly to the Supreme Court and get a judgement. The Supreme Court is truly an appellate court. It is a final appellate court.

That is its standing within the court hierarchy structure. This section, 91.5, is an aberration. It is out of the normal.

It is not part of the normal structure. And, what's more, so not only is the Cabinet invoking an unusual, unknown provision, asking the Supreme Court for an opinion, not a judgement or a decision, an opinion. I don't know.

I'm not an Englishman. But I do know the difference between an opinion and a judgement or decision. I've been playing this game long enough to know the difference.

Opinions can actually be rejected. In other words, Cabinet could reject it because it's an opinion. What's more, Cabinet is not a court.

So, it's not bound either, according to this other section I've written. And finally, this is about the status of this judgement, this opinion of the Supreme Court. Subjection 3C of 98 states that in exercising its decision, its jurisdiction, to render an opinion, it is exercising an original jurisdiction, not an appellate jurisdiction, which is its normal jurisdiction.

It's exercising an original jurisdiction. Now, anyone who's practiced law knows that original jurisdictions belong in trial courts, in first instance courts. And they exercise original jurisdictions, which are then appealed to higher level appellate courts.

That's the way jurisdictions are. So, we have an exceptional request by Cabinet going direct to the Supreme Court, seeking its opinion. And the Supreme Court, in answering that request, exercising an original jurisdiction, not a final appellate jurisdiction, which is its normal.

And thirdly, the Constitution itself says that the Supreme Court's decisions are binding on all other courts. It doesn't even say decisions and opinions of the Supreme Court. It just says decisions.

It could have said, it could have included opinions in that provision. It didn't. It could have stopped and said, binding on all.

No. It extends to other courts only. Anyway, how do you get rid of it? Draft an amended Constitution that doesn't include it.

That's simple. And leave it in suspended animation where it belongs, frozen in time. That chapter belongs in legislation.

If Parliament decides to pass an immunity act to deal with it, let Parliament do that. You see, there's the beauty of being a member of a commission. You don't have to have all the answers.

Make the recommendation. It's courageous. It's timely.

It needs to be made. And let government and other people wrestle over this question.

Mr. Kohli: Thank you, Judge. My follow-on question to that is, the Supreme Court also has suggested that the threshold for amendment be reduced from three-quarters of the members of Parliament to two-thirds of the members of Parliament. And in the referendum, it used to be 75% of registered voters, registered voters, which has been brought down to a simple majority of people who actually tend to vote. Of course, there will be registered voters, but simple majority, meaning if 1,000 people tend to vote, 501 decide, take yes, it can be changed.

Hearing your advice today, that it's just an opinion, if, for example, a recommendation is made, there should be 50% of the registered voters taking part in an exercise where they want to change the constitution. Nothing stops us from recommending that.

Justice Fatiaki: I am very, very tempted to be even more radical and say, I suggest this commission recommend the removal of the referendum requirement.

It never was part of our constitution. It never was part of our laws. Why do you feel the necessity to continue with it? Why? Because the 2013 constitution changes it? That's almost good enough reason to not follow it.

You see, I think the idea that you need parliaments, special majorities, not just ordinary majorities, special majorities, and then follow that with voters, special majorities, it's like a double whammy, you know, it's a ticking two boxes, two bases. I always understood that elected parliamentarians represented the people, but apparently when it comes to something like this, they don't. Because despite 75% or 60% saying that they agree to the constitution being amended, and carrying with them all their voters' voices, I assume, we still say, no, we want to hear from the voters.

Well, didn't you hear from the voters when they elected the parliamentarians? We elect you to represent us and be our voice. Well, they are their voice. Their voice did at 60%.

And then you say, well, we still also want to hear your voice. You, see? It's a double whammy, that's what I'm saying. Why do we need it? We've never needed it.

And I think maybe the commission needs to rethink the idea. I know, you know, that's like, remove the immunity, chief justice, former chief justice, remove the immunity, then he comes and says remove the referendum. Why not? Why not?

Mr. Kohli: The reason why I asked you that question, in a true democracy where people are truly reflecting the views of the people, you have opposition party and government.

We have here at the moment people crossing the floor. Parties deregistered. For whatever reason, you see, are they really truly representative of those people? That's the only worrying part, I'm sorry.

Justice Fatiaki: That's the reason I say, you deregister a party, every single person from that party vacates his seat automatically. You have a by-election and fill it. And the people have a voice again in who represents them.

You have this rather farcical situation where being elected on one platform, you're actually allowed, when the party deregistered, to choose whatever platform you want. It's like the voters, what are they? They're just nothing things? But see, that's why I make that recommendation also, that deregistered parties lose all their seats. None of this halfway house, take your choice, you know, 6 here, 18 there.

No, no, no. All gone. By-election.

Not the next person, by-election. Just like we used to have before. So, we understand it.

And yes, then they truly represent constituents and voters. It's a holistic thing. Everything works together to support each other.

But I think the referendum is at the tail end. It's a desperate measure, which basically concedes that we have an electoral system which is so corrupted that those people who get voted there don't represent anybody. And so, we still need the voters to give us their voice.

What an awful concession of an electoral system in a constitution. So, I do recommend, now that you've touched on it, that this commission seriously consider the benefits of the recommendations which were made by the commission, which I had the privilege of chairing, and which, unfortunately, I won't even use the expression. But you had that benefit anyway.

Mr .Valenitabua Yeah, Michel Conway?

Mr. Conway Thank you very much, Justice Fatiaki, for your compelling presentation. I listened attentively. I was very fascinated with the commentary around, or to use your words, your opinion, around the decrees, promulgations through an elected parliament or government and a non-elected parliament, and how that plays out.

And the view in the future to review the... Sorry. A little bit more about that. Sorry, it's the promulgation of the decrees, you're saying that.

You made the comment in 1987 that these arrangements were accepted and enacted in parliament. Then you go on to say that, I think you used the words, you criticised these decrees effectively, you know, and the point that I was trying to ask is, a democratic parliament should not permanently be bound by every decree that's made and how this needs to be reviewed. I just want to qualify that.

Is that what you were trying to say?

Mr. Fatiaki

Yes. I'm not used to people putting words in my mouth, I usually put it in theirs. But, yes.

Sorry about that. You see, when I grew up and studied law, I never collided with decrees and promulgations and proclamations. Those kinds of expressions were things that came out of Great Britain, you know.

It was royal proclamations and things like that. Parliament didn't do things like that. Parliament passed acts, legislation.

Now, in 1987, what they did was all the decrees and proclamations were put through the parliamentary process to determine whether or not it should continue and be given the status of acts of parliament or repealed and kicked out. Now, when I grew up studying law, I didn't think that decrees were law. I only understood that parliament passed laws.

And, in fact, the constitution says it. Only parliament can pass a law. So, in a decree which has been decreed by a Military junta, and proclamations which are proclaimed by a president at the beckoning of a Military junta, in my view, doesn't begin to become law unless and until the parliament has sat down, looked through it, considered it, and said, yes, we will give it an act of parliament.

We'll make it an act of parliament. Now, what's happened is, after 2000 and 2006, legal draftsmen and people generally became lazy, and this is where I said the contempt had set in because of the familiarity. And now, they use a one-liner in the definition section which says act, and they say it includes decree, promulgation, proclamation, this, that, everything that you want to call whatever.

Make it an act by definition. No parliamentary consideration. No, this is a one-liner.

You know, this decree 51 became an act. Really? Does anyone want to be associated with that decree? Including a government? They probably don't realize that by this definition, clause, they've made decree 51 an act. One of the most egregious, unfair, horrific blots of legislation that you will never find anywhere.

By one stroke of the pen, they made it an act of parliament. No consideration, no debate, no nothing. And all of these decrees had no input from the public, and yet, by a stroke of the pen, they've made acts of parliament and binds all of us.

Well, how ridiculous is that? And that's when I say the contempt has set in. They don't care anymore to think about these decrees before they make them acts of parliament. They don't care.

They just make them by definition. They don't even ask us what you think. And, you know, that's what's happened.

i call it contempt. I suspect it's by default. That's what's happened.

All of these things have become acts of parliament by default. Who is default now? And the politicians that we voted for, who represent nobody. Because they represent everybody, apparently.

Mr. Beg — Thank you very much, Justice Fatiaki. We appreciate the wonderful explanation. And thank you.

Ms. Nailatikau — Much gratitude to you for your time this morning. I note that you also encourage us to examine the reintroduction of the Senate.

The Senate was certainly an issue from the very first submission that we received and has consistently been raised. There are those who see it as an important addition of adding a layer of scrutiny and representation, particularly of Indigenous concerns and interests. There are others who see it as an erosion of democratic principles in the introduction of an unelected or appointed body to the legislation-making process.

Given the benefit of your experience, I'd like to invite you to perhaps propose for us what your considerations may be when considering the reintroduction of the Senate.

Justice Fatiaki

Well, the answer to that is simple, really. It's something that we've experienced before.

And it's only worked good for us, in my experience. But if you want to have a look at the original, talk about the House of Lords. I mean, that's what it is.

We call it Senate. They call it House of Lords. And they're the beginning of this whole thing.

So as far as the Senate is concerned, it's not a new animal. It is something that there's nothing undemocratic about it. I mean, it's an appointed body, appointed by the people that we vote for and that we've designated need to be on that body to represent minorities, disadvantages, marginalised and interests that don't get aired in parliamentary debates.

But, you know, the Senate I see as a fountain of wisdom. They usually have experienced wise people. And, you know, young exuberant politicians sometimes need a little bit of maturity added to their deliberations.

And if that comes from the Senate, that can only be positive. And if all the Senate does is say, hold back, stop, let's think this thing through. That in itself is a plus.

Because sometimes, you know, you can get legislation just pumped through at 100 miles an hour. Forget about Order 51. That's undemocratic.

Get rid of that. Not the Senate. Get rid of Order 51.

You know, where bills just go flying through, no debate, no nothing, no discussions, no public consults, no special committees, nothing. Just bang. That's undemocratic.

Mr. Valenitabua

Judge Fatiaki the commission members have taken that surgeon, that surgeon as you named it, around Fiji. We have heard from the people. We have heard that the immunity clause should be removed.

We have heard that the Senate should be reinstated. We have heard that the electoral system should be simplified and do away with the current one, particularly the one national constituency. We have heard a lot of things.

Now, in relation to the immunity clause, we heard you this morning, sir. It is an eye-opener. We were concerned that the opinion of the Supreme Court might be a barrier to us in relation to removing the immunity provisions despite the submission from the RFMF.

Like I said, what you have told us this morning is an eye-opener. Now, there is a second aspect which I request that you enlighten us on. We have heard from the people all around Fiji, and they have wanted change, or they want change, like I have listed at the outset of what I am saying now.

What is the effect of the voice of the people when it is confronted with, say, an opinion of the Supreme Court? I understand what you have told us, but there are other aspects of this constitution which the people want removed. What is the effect of that legally? Please. Thank you.

Justice Fatiaki — Can I ask for a five-minute break? We will take a five-minute break. What I said is an eye-opener. There are not many people who are sitting all night.

This is what I have recorded, Chair. What do you say about the effect of the voice of the people when confronted by a Supreme Court opinion? I am tempted to break into Latin, and I know the policemen will understand what I am saying. Vox populi et suprema list. The safety of the people is the supreme law, and that must dictate the recommendations of this Commission.

Let us never forget the illegitimate, illegal origins of the document that you were called upon to review. Never forget that, and that will guide you. You see, I heard the Supreme Court say that the 2013 Constitution is our law, supreme law at present.

And it discussed the various principles that are well-known now to us coup-trained judges, which my colleague and friend, Professor Wadan Nassey, heartily disagrees with. But yes, there is an element of acquiescence, there is an element of acceptance, there is an element of participation. But the welfare of the people is the supreme law.

And if the people ask you to get rid of this provision for whatever reasons, then you have a duty to make that recommendation. And let other greater minds than mine think it through about how it should be done. But like I said, never forget the illegal origins of this document.

I admire the efforts of our people, our government, and our country, and yourselves, in trying your very best to live within the document. Now, the Supreme Court itself found there was a democratic deficit in the amendment provisions, and felt entitled, as a result, to alter them. Now, you might equally feel that the same, from the people's core, you might feel the same to make the recommendation that it be removed, including, I might add, the voice of the commander, who stood most to lose by its removal.

But like I said, the vox populi may suprema list. The people's voice is the supreme law, not the Supreme Court opinion. The people's voice.

You went around the country listening to it. You heard it loud and clear. Make the recommendations.

Let it fall where it falls. Let others struggle with how to do it, how to change it. That is no longer not part of your function.

That's why you have skilled people, trained people, to come and do these things. And, I guess, writing a new constitution is probably easier than amending one. It's like building a house.

Mr. Beg will tell you. Renovations are the worst possible things that you can get involved with as an architect. It's a lot easier to draw a piece of paper and mark lines on the ground and go for it.

But when you have to tear down old walls and shore up old bones and joints, it's very, very hard. Perhaps the best illustration of that today is what's happening in New York. Renovating and converting an old office building into residential apartments.

It is collapsing around them. It resulted in the clearance of many streets and buildings. That's how dangerous this thing is.

Likewise, you are trying to amend what was once described as an unamendable constitution. You must be commended in your efforts. I don't know if I've answered your question.

I waffled a bit. That's the privilege of old age. We waffle until people tell us to stop.

Mr. Valenitabua: You have answered my question, sir. Thank you very much. Judge Fatiaki, there is no more comment, no more question from the commissioners.

And due to that, we will bring this consultation to an end. We thank you very, very much indeed for your time and advice and assistance to us this morning. You have been of great assistance and of great help.

As usual, we invite you and Mrs. Fatiaki to a photo shoot.

----------End Of Session [10-7-2026]----------

FORMER CHIEF JUSTICE DANIEL FATIAKI - SUBMISSION
LEVEL 9 10/07/26 - 11.45am - 1.09pm

Speech to the Constitution Review Commission

Honourable Chairperson, Members of the Constitution Review Commission (CRC) and members of the news media:

I would like to thank you for giving me a time slot and inviting me to make this submission to the Constitution Review Commission.

I appreciate very much the opportunity to contribute to this important national endeavour and I hope that your time will not be wasted.

The Commission has been entrusted with a significant responsibility under its Terms of Reference: to inquire into and examine the "democratic deficits" in the 2013 Constitution, including those highlighted by the Supreme Court's Opinion and to recommend reforms that will strengthen Fiji's constitutional framework.

Your task is not simply about changing words in a legal document. It is about ensuring that the amended Constitution:

- reflects the aspirations of all the people of Fiji,
- protects fundamental rights and freedoms,
- promotes good governance,
- upholds the rule of law,
- safeguards judicial independence,
- strengthens democratic institutions, and ;
- recognizes the unique place of indigenous iTaukei and Rotuman communities, including the protection of their lands and fishing rights, and the role of their respective Council of Chiefs.

The Commission has also been asked to ensure that all communities, including marginalized groups, are heard, and that Fiji's constitutional arrangements are consistent with ratified international Conventions and human rights principles.

Public consultations are an essential part of Constitution-making , and I commend the Commission for undertaking such extensive Fiji-wide consultations.

As I make my submission today, l am guided by two simple principles :

" If it isn't broken , don't try to fix it"

Constitutional reform should not be pursued for its own sake. This must not be a 'tick the box' exercise.

The second principle states that a Government's legitimacy and moral authority to use State power is justified and lawful only when agreed or consented to by the people over which that power is exercised. On that basis alone, the validity of the 2013 Constitution which was unilaterally imposed on the people of Fiji by a military Decree without prior consultations or approved and adopted by a people's referendum , or by parliamentary ratification must be considered, at best, doubtful. It is certainly a major "democratic deficit".

Where provisions and institutions have served the nation well, they should be strengthened and preserved.

Where weaknesses exist however, they should be considered carefully and thoughtfully, and either improved or rejected.

My submission focuses on several areas which I believe deserve the Commission's careful consideration and recommendations.

Firstly , the Preamble should be extended. It should acknowledge Fiji's constitutional history as well as recognizing the nation's Christian heritage whilst respecting other religions

Secondly , the Constitution should identify and reinforce a shared national identity that promotes unity while respecting Fiji's rich cultural and multi-ethnic diversity.

There has been much discussion in the news and on social media about the origins and proper use of the term: "Fijian", since the GCC's submission to the CRC renewed interest in it.

Some claim it belongs to the indigenous itaukei and others believe it should be the common name for all people's in Fiji. Undoubtedly, the arguments for and against are sincerely held and robustly advanced.

As an indigenous native from the island of Rotuma I have always referred to myself as a "Rotuman". I also grew up knowing that the indigenous natives of Fiji are/were called "Fijian" not 'itaukei' or 'kai Viti'.

I am proud of my Rotuman heritage and name and have no particular desire to be called a"Fijian".

Neither , do I feel diminished or alienated by not being called by a name that I have long known belongs to another ethnic group in our multi-ethnic society or, in not having a common name with other ethnic groups in our multi-racial country.

Whatever might be its foreign origins or source, the term 'Fijian' has been applied for generations to the indigenous community as its collective name however inappropriate, unauthentic or inaccurate it might be .

Of one thing I am sure however, and that is, that a common name or national identity cannot be imposed , declared , or dictated by legislation however well-intentioned or supreme.

Little respect is due in my view , to a one line declaration : "...that we are all Fijians..." in a Constitution that was unilaterally promulgated in a Military Decree without prior public consultations or the agreement of the affected indigenous group.

Thirdly, consideration should be given to provisions concerning dissolved political parties and whether existing arrangements adequately support democratic participation.

In this regard , l too watched the manoeuvrings , read about the options , and listened to the personal and reported utterances of the party-less MPs in Parliament after the unceremonious demise of the Fiji First Party.

I must confess that for an electoral system that is so heavily biased towards political parties and so unfriendly to independants, and which then allows MPs of a de-registerd party to elect to become independants or by legitimising "turncoats" without a by-election or giving their voters a say , is a complete anathema to democratic principles.

In my view if a political party is dissolved , ALL seats in Parliament occupied by members of the party should be declared vacant and a by-election ordered to decide the replacements.

Fourth, the qualifications of candidates for election to Parliament should promote integrity , competence, and public confidence in elected representatives.

In this regard l make two (2) suggestions. Firstly , each candidate should be required to provide a negative drug test certificate with their nomination form ; and secondly, each candidate for election must provide a statutory declaration that he/she does not rely on the immunity provisions in Chapter 10 of the Constitution.

I make no apologies for this latter suggestion which is intended to break the "laundry cycle" of a coup-maker removing an elected Government, then ruling by Decree , and later standing in am election and becoming Prime Minister while still immunised.

Fifth, the Judiciary should be strengthened by addressing delays in the trial of cases and in the delivery of judgments by ensuring adequate judicial resources are provided, and thereby reinforcing public confidence in the administration of justice.

The Judiciary is the 3rd arm of Government. It is considered the weakest arm in controlling neither the weapons or the coffers of the State. Its standing is measured by the nature and quality of its judgments and the the level of persuasion and confidence that the public bestows on it for its complete independence and fearless upholding of the "Rule of Law".

Sixthly, the Commission should review provisions relating to constitutional immunity, particularly those contained in Chapter 10, and consider whether they serve the long-term interests of justice, accountability, and national reconciliation.

Chapter10 covers a 'multitude of sins' and a 'host of sinners' with varying degrees of participation and involvement in the events and activities during , and after 5 December, the commencement date of the 2006 coup.

Surprisingly , included amongst the identified "sinners" is none other than the "Judiciary" ,which one might have expected to have no part or involvement with such an illegal treasonous activity. This raises interesting questions that remain to be answered.

Be that as it may , in light of the RFMF Commander's recent call for the removal of Chapter 10, I humbly add my concurring voice to the growing chorus.

Needless to say the continued existence of Chapter 10 in the Constitution is a "democratic deficit" and a cancerous blot which serves no useful purpose other than being a constant reminder to future generations of an unfortunate part of our past that is best reserved for our history books.

Seventhly , the provisions governing the disciplined forces especially the Republic of Fiji Military Forces, should clearly define their institutional role and ensure that civilian democratic governance remains paramount.

The unacceptable misunderstandings and confusion caused by the vague provisions of S.131(2) of the 2013 Constitution must be removed by its complete deletion.

Eighth, the constitutional status and independence of FICAC, the Director of Public Prosecutions deserve careful consideration to ensure these institutions remain impartial, independent, and accountable.

Ninth, I encourage the Commission to examine whether Fiji would benefit from the establishment or restoration of a Senate as a reviewing chamber to strengthen legislative scrutiny and representation.

Finally, consideration should be given to the treatment of decrees and promulgations, including the legal framework governing their status and transition within Fiji's constitutional order.

After the 1987 coup , all Military Decrees and Proclamations that had been unilaterally imposed, were considered and ratified as Acts of Parliament or repealed. Since then and after the later coups in 2000 and 2006 the contempt of familiarity set in and all Decrees and Promulgations were constituted "Acts" by definition however egregious, unfair or immoral it might be.

In this latter regard the notoriously egregious Decree No.51 unilaterally decimated the solemn irrevocable contracts of affected pensioners with FNPF and substantially reduced their pensions and livelihood.

Then , in a final act of official cruelty by adding salt to their gaping wounds, the Military-led junta denied the affected pensioners their basic human right of access to the Courts to seek redress.

Decree No.51 remains on our statute books as an instance and indictment of what unchecked absolute power can do to the marginalised and powerless members of society.

I urge this Commission to recommend to H.E the immediate "ex gratia" payment by FNPF of 50% of each affected pensioner's entitlements without admission of liability.

The various submissions and issues raised are not merely legal questions. They are questions about how we wish to be governed as a nation, about how we can protect our democracy, and how we can begin to re-build confidence in our public institutions.

The Commission's Report is due to be submitted to His Excellency the President by the end of ~~March~~ August. It will be subsequently considered by Cabinet and Parliament, and will have a lasting significance and impact for the future generations of Fiji citizens.

A Constitution must belong to all the people. It should unite rather than divide, protect rather than exclude, and provide a stable foundation for peace, justice, democracy, and prosperity.

Thank you once again for the opportunity to present my submission. I wish the Commission every success as it carries out this important national responsibility.

Thank you.

Dr. Fatiaki: In contact with this session are Mr. Ami Kohli, a lawyer from Labasa, Conway Beg, an architect, Neelesh Gounder from USP, and Merewalesi and I are physically present here at the Suvavou House. We welcome you. We are at the end of our long road of consultations which ends today.

And we have traveled widely throughout Fiji on that mandate that we have been given by His Excellency the President to review the 2030 Constitution. We've been guided by the terms of reference of His Excellency, which I understand has been gazetted. And likewise, the ruling and opinion of the Supreme Court that was last year issued.

And on that basis, we've had wide and meaningful, hopefully, consultations with all of Fiji. And we're at the end stage. So we look forward to listening to you and your team this morning. Thank you.

Prof. Shamim: Well, thank you so much, Acting Chair, for that warm welcome. And of course, it's much better and probably strategic to be able to address just the two of you.

I know this is a virtual, but I can see you very clearly in the AGS chambers. So, thank you for the welcome. And I want to introduce the legal section of the Office of the Vice-Chancellor.

The Manager Legal, Alisha Ali, you can see her on the screen, no doubt. We also have Ms. Natalie Raikadroga, who is also on the screen. And we have – she's a legal officer.

And we have our Sheikh, Ashraf Ali. Also, a very nice picture of him there on the banks of the river. Who is a still.

So, he's very much active. And he is our legal assistant. He's actually a final student, one of our top four students.

And he has assisted us with all the bills that we have made submissions to. And no doubt the Commission is aware of the fact that we have been making contributions to whatever bills the Attorney General's Office or the Law Reform Commission put forward for public consultation. And also, of course, the Parliamentary Select Committee as well.

So, we have been very active in the legal field recently. And that comes from our strategic plan, which is to be a think – well, one of the goals is to be the think tank and the critic and conscience of society. So we don't necessarily always follow everybody else's legal, social opinion or direction.

We have our own way of looking at things. We are very much influenced by the human values approach in education, as you might have heard. I say many a time, and I know that at NGA, you have been associated with the University of Fiji in your previous lives.

And you're quite aware of the origins of the University of Fiji as an entity of learning, but then it is a power of Fiji, which has human values at the pinnacle of its philosophy and educational strategies and goals and objectives. So, we are approaching this particular topic, which is, of course, of great significance nationally, as well as individually to each and every member of society, so that we are putting perhaps a slightly different perspective to what you might have heard in relation to constitutional development. I should also declare my interest here because I am a constitutional lawyer by profession.

I teach constitutional law at the University of Fiji, and I've done so for 10 years before I became the Vice-Chancellor. And I should also tell you that these submissions are made as though I am lecturing, although I don't like the word, talking to Law 205 students, that's the constitutional law students of the University of Fiji. And, by coincidence, I will be teaching Law 205 in the second semester.

So, when I was preparing for these submissions from the assistants on my very, very angle legal section, I was thinking of my students, because if I can explain anything to the students, then I can explain anything to anybody. I think that's really the fundamental communication strategy that we're using at the moment for a year. So we have slides which will be helpful perhaps for the Commission to look at as I go through my points.

And Alicia will be putting those slides up in a minute, and hopefully you'll be able to see them quickly. Next slide, please. Well, the very first slide, Honourable Members of the Commission, is the fundamental question of whether we need a Supreme Administrative Constitution at all.

This is something that I will be telling my Law 205 students as well, and asking them to give me a response as to whether we need a high law, or highest law, which is what a constitution is. And that means, basically, that these chambers will know this, and yourselves, those of you who are lawyers will also know that, that if you have a supreme and entrenched constitution, that all other laws in the country have to be compliant with it. And if any law is not, then the court can declare that particular law, that ordinary piece of legislation, to be inconsistent and invalid to the extent of inconsistency.

That is in the interpretation of sections of all the constitutions so far from 1970 onwards, and that's the fundamental methodology of constitutional interpretation. So our first question is, why do we need a supreme and entrenched constitution? Because if you look at the 1970, 1990, 1997 constitutions, as well as, of course, you know, what we've got at the moment, which is the 2013 constitution, there is one common theme, and that is, growth does nothing but instability. Therefore, we go back to what I consider to be the ground norm of constitutional development in Fiji, and that is the deed of section, particularly clause 4, and that has been referenced in one or two of the submissions, to the commission I've mentioned.

But also, something that not too many people know about, but is equally significant from a constitutional point of view, and that is law of sorcery's dispatch. 1875, which applied to Indian immigration to the colonies by not only the Indian government, but also the British government in India. Now, these two documents have been recently certified.

Sorry, this is my phone doing its AI business. Those two documents have been talked about over the two centuries of constitutional development in Fiji. I'm not going to do it at length now, but certainly if you want to hear more, you are most welcome to attend my first law talk class, which is on the 24th of July.

Now, if you talk about those constitutions that we are aware of, the 1970, 1990, 1997, and the 2013 constitution, other dates also come to mind. One of them is 1977, and you will know the history of 1977 because some people thought that might have been the first coup that took place in Fiji when the National Liberation Party had won elections but was not permitted to become government. Then we had 1987, we can forget that.

You all know about that as part of our genetic makeup. That was 2007 and 2009, and I put both dates there because 2007 was when the Fiji government was removed and 2009 was when the constitution was removed, so instability there in terms of both those years. So my question has been, what did these constitutions of ours do to alleviate any political crisis that we have? The answer, of course, is nothing.

The longest period of constitutional law that's had is the 2013 constitution. We've had that constitution in place for 13 years, and I suppose if we're talking about stability that we've talked about, perhaps longevity is the only thing about, the definition of stability. So the question, next slide please, is whether or not we need a supreme and entrenched constitution, and I think this is a very important philosophical point that has to be addressed.

It may not be in your terms of reference, but if you're looking at something like a constitution, which is a higher law, and that is not about specific law but it's about umbrella law, then you inevitably have to ask that question. And the answer, of course, is that what is the kind of constitution we need in order to bring about stability in every sense of the word, whether it's political stability, economic stability, foreign affairs stability, relationship with others stability, individual stability, communal stability, what kind of constitution do we need? That is the fundamental question that we need to ask, and it's a grunt form question. So I would say that instead, perhaps, since all these constitutions did nothing to alleviate any crisis, we should think about creating strong legislation.

You don't have to have a supreme and entrenched constitution. Australia doesn't. UK doesn't, and that's where our legal system comes from.

New Zealand doesn't. They have bills of rights that are very, very strong, Bill of Rights Act, in all those countries, but they don't have a supreme and entrenched. So, what is the reason for us to have one? We could have a strong electoral act, for example.

We just have the Electoral Commission. I don't know whether it may have delivered its conclusions, but we don't know too much about them. So, we've heard some research from Professor Wodanowski talk about it in the media, but we don't know the details, and there's lots of others.

So, make legislation, ordinary legislation, which is people's legislation, simply because it goes to Parliament, strong, instead of having a supreme and entrenched constitution that's taken us, basically, for the discussion. In that strong legislation, if this is what the country thinks it could do, there is a way of making it even more robust by making mandatory references to international human rights instruments in all the relevant legislation. And this is what, in our submission source, different bills that we've addressed, like the Marine Spaces Bill, the Mining Act Bill, and all the other pieces of education, and all the other pieces of legislation that we've dealt with, we've ensured that they're complied, not always with the constitution, because some of those provisions are not in the constitution, but with international law.

And international law covers every single topic in the course of political fundamentalism. Because international law started with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, and it's a long time since 1948. And what the international bodies, such as the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, the UNILO, and other UN instruments and bodies, have done is fine-tune international law so that it keeps pace with modern times and modern issues and conditions.

So, this is something that we have to consider. Next slide, please. In particular, I'm not trying to, as you know, I'm in New Zealand right now, in a family emergency, but I will be trying to keep up with all the presentations to your honorable commission.

And many are quite interesting, and some are amusing, and some are innovative, novel, for example, but there's some that I'm disquieting. And the disquieting ones are those that impliedly try to bring back, in some shape or form, the 1990 constitution. And this is worrying me a little bit, because I think, if you look at the 1990 constitution, it violated every single international law that you could think of on the right to equality and non-discrimination.

And you need to go back, if you're a commission, constitutional commission, it's inevitable that you'll be compared. The AG's office will assist you, no doubt. And all the wonderfully bright people that you've got in the secretariat will assist you.

And looking at, like, chapter 3 of the 1990 constitution, also sections 31, 41, and 83 too, I suggest that you look at those, honorable chair of the commission, because if you find anything like that in any of the presentations that I've got before you, then those would be a violation of fundamental human rights to report. Some of those, in fact, would now be defined as crimes of misdemeanor discrimination, as the 1990 constitution, definitely one that was a breach of international law, and indeed, persecution. And in 1990, Fiji had not yet ratified the Rome Statute, that's the one that developed the International Criminal Court, but we did ratify it fully, one of the earliest states in the world to do so, in 1999.

So, anything that happens now, in respect of any crime against humanity, discrimination, apartheid, or persecution of any shape or form, can be taken to the Rome Statute, through the Rome Statute procedures, to the International Criminal Court. Whether the International Office of the Prosecutor, or the International Criminal Court will actually take up that complaint is another thing, but those complaints can be taken, if it's any shape or form, resembling the 1990 constitution. And as we all know, the 1990 constitution was a product of the 1987 events, and then done away with in 1997 through a consultative process on the new constitution, the 1997 constitution.

So that's something I want to leave to the commissioners, because like everything else, anyone that's drafting legislation or doing any work in reforming the constitution, has to pay account to the responsibility that is bestowed to ensure that we do not have any new constitution that somehow brought us down to the fundamental just cautions norm, which is a national non-degradable norm in international law, to the right to equality. That is the cornerstone of our new constitution. Next slide please.

Now the Rome Statute, I mentioned that earlier, I've just mentioned it very briefly again, in terms of the rule against retrospectivity. As I said, at the time of 1990, the Rome Statute did not apply, because it didn't exist, but now of course it does, and features a signature into a red one first, so just see it. Now the Rome Statute therefore would not have applied to either 1987 or 1990 because of that, except for one thing, and that is, the rule against retrospectivity is overridden if there is, number one, an aggregate continuing crime for those that would have been in crime at the time they occurred, had it not been for state immunity.

So, state immunity was disgranted before 1987. State immunity was in a lot of 1997, just a little later on. It does not apply to earlier crimes, except if they are coming up again in the present circumstances.

So should there be anything in any new constitution that resembles one of those documents that might have gone to the International Criminal Court at the time, it can again be brought before the International Criminal Court. I also want to make a point that discrimination was always prohibited in religious constitutions, and in 1970, under Section 15, that is our fundamental law, non-discrimination. Of course it could not be in practice, but it has been there in the law, and being the highest law, the burden of compliance is rather more than just this ordinary law.

Now one of the things that we are not going to talk about is immunity. I know there has been a lot of discussion recently before the Commission about immunity in the 2013 constitution, even though there are amendments we can do on that. The problem though is that no one can talk about Section 173 at the moment, because currently it is sub judice, it is before the court, and it is before the Supreme Court just now, which is why I am not going to be talking about it, because it is our case, the University of Fiji's case.

It is an employment case, and it is before the Supreme Court, all the papers have been filed, and the Supreme Court will have its hearing in August, and it is about the validity or otherwise of Section 173. Therefore, the Commission would be wise to, for the moment, disregard any submissions on being energy proposers, or particularly Section 173 of the 2013 constitution. It would be sub judice, and it would attract a charge of contempt of court.

Next slide please. Now international law is extremely important for Fiji, because we are a member of the United Nations, and even if we weren't a member of the United Nations, we would be all mixed, because all the states, most of the states are not recognized in international law as a state, and are members of the United Nations, but also because of our role in peacekeeping. Therefore, it is, we are an obligation to respect all of the principles of international law that have been formulated through some mechanism of the United Nations.

And I have mentioned the words, the phrase, the letter phrase, the first one is hierarchical rule, which is constitutional, and international law goes beyond constitution. For example, the right to equality and non-discrimination is a jurisprudence norm, which just means that you are obliged to adhere to it, can't ignore it at all, and it has legal enforcement. So prohibition of racial discrimination is one of those jurisprudence that we are obliged to, whether or not we have the constitutional or any of the laws.

And that means also, when it gets that category of international law, it means that any state, it has nothing to do with, you know, whether it's Fiji or somebody related to Fiji, any state, any independent state can prosecute on jurisprudence grounds. So if there is any racial discrimination, or any kind of gender discrimination, or anything at all that's practiced in a particular country, and it has the policy of disclosures, then any independent state can prosecute on behalf of the people of that state, of the state where the victims are. So, I want to reiterate that any attempt to reintroduce provisions of the 1990 constitution impolitely or expressly will trigger complaints regarding jurisprudence in other countries and the world.

There are two separate ways to do it, but it can be done both ways. Next slide, please. This is something now that I would want to reiterate.

Should there be any similarity between the 1990 constitution and the proposed constitution, or any intention to replicate in shape or form international law can be invoked. Hence, this is a point I was making right at the beginning, it is better not to have a supreme and entrenched constitution than to regurgitate the 1990 constitution. I think I'll leave that one for Julia.

Next slide, please. So how do we avoid scrutiny of international law and have a constitution? These are the principles now that I'm putting before the commission that must be within any constitution to avoid scrutiny of international law. These principles are general principles.

I'm not going through provisions of the constitution of 2013 or any other constitution to explain this provision works or that provision works. I think that kind of minutiae and detail is not necessary before a commission that looks at the general overriding principles of a constitution rather than the detail. Those are usually done by the secretariat or people experts from the AG's office.

And by the way, this is about the fifth time that I have appeared before a constitutional review commission. The first time was in 1997 and I have since then also done exactly the same presentation with slight changes because of the different circumstances throughout the decades that I have been practicing as a constitutional teacher as well. So these are the principles.

There are a few of them. I think about five. Human values derived constitutional principle.

Human values, of course, comes from the University of Fiji. The first fundamental principle, the core value of any constitution is social contract. Social contract is somewhat a legal term.

The person who wrote it was John Locke and he was a lawyer by any means, but he was a social scientist operating during the age of the European United Nations. And what he said is that there is a contract, a social contract, that exists between the people and the state. The people agree not to take up arms to defend themselves, their right to defend themselves, and they give that responsibility over to the state.

And in return, the state promises contracts to protect them. That is the social contract. Now either side can breach the social contract and if that happens, it's just like any other contract in law, there is a breach of contract as its consequences.

Under the social contract principle, government is seen as a trustee of people's will. So power, government power, is strictly limited to concerns of the people. This is something governments tend to forget.

There is a distinction between representative government and responsible government. And any constitution would first of all decide whether we want a responsible government or a representative government. Choices are then assigned or allocated to either the people or to the people in power, depending on how you've decided which way you're going to go.

So that's a real fundamental principle as well. And if there is a breach, then it is considered to be not only a breach of social contract, but also a breach of trust. Now representation of social contract is usually defined by international human rights law and Bill of Rights.

So we have a Bill of Rights. We've had a Bill of Rights in every single constitution of ours, even the 1990 constitution has had a Bill of Rights. But each one has been limited according to international law.

So the 1970 constitution is limited according to the limitations in the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights. And then it got more and more specific as time went on. Limitation in the 1990 constitution was by Chapter 3. And this is why the commission perhaps should look at that or ask your egos to look at it.

In every case, apart from 2, which is the right to be free from torture, and the right to religion, every single human right has a limitation on behalf of public interest. It's always public interest, not sectarian interest, not on behalf of one small community or a majority. There's no tyranny of majority in human rights law.

And so, the constitution itself, as the epitome or example of social contract, has to have a Bill of Rights in it with suitable limitations. And in all our constitutions, we've had limitations in public interest, public order, public health. I don't know if you understand that.

During COVID, public health rights were limited, public safety, and the rights and freedoms of others. So those limitations are there. The only two exceptions are, as I said, right and right to have your own religion, practice your own belief.

That is the first principle. That should be the core value of any new constitution. Next slide.

The second important principle is non-discrimination. And that means right and access to equality, or right to equality, and access to equality. Equality of everyone, every single person in the country.

And that category has been supplied not just in the 1997 constitution, which was broadened, but specifically so in the 2013 constitution. And that's something you need to look at, because it's the right of people to practice their own religion. It's the right of people to have an education.

It's the right for people to express themselves. All those freedoms are in every single category in section 36 of the 2013 constitution. And it's pretty robust.

But one of the things that does happen, because we are humans after all, is that we change those categories as time goes on. And sometimes you remove one, sometimes you add one. But in general, the right to equality should apply to everyone.

And the only difference is, for example, if you want to have the person who is visually challenged, and you want to drive a car, well, you can't say I have the right to drive a car, even though my friend is someone else. So the public safety element then kicks in. And you say, no, your right to equality in that respect is limited.

So there's a common sense approach to the right to equality, but it is a universal principle that also is just cultural. In other words, it is part of international law and cannot be derived. Minority and majority populations have equal status, unlike in the 1990 constitution.

Right to be free from discrimination in access to governance and resources owned or managed by the state. In other words, we all took on given resources. We all do.

That is the right to equality provision that we have to exercise, given some of the representations made to the provision earlier. And I'll put that in blue. No special privileges.

What for? There's no need. If everybody's equal, then there should be no special privileges at all. Next slide.

The next point is constitutional principle is democratic representation. Representation in the electoral system. The state electoral commission has come and gone, and we don't know what's in the report, but hopefully it will not conflict with the recommendations made by this particular commission on the constitution.

Democratic representation. Now, democracy is a really interesting word. It has its roots in Greece, Greek language, ancient Greek.

And basically, democracy in those days, you see, meant representational voice of the wealthy and men. So democracy's roots are both patriarchal and supporting the rich. In our view now, in the 21st century, we have to start looking at democracy not as one thing.

It is the spectrum. And I've said this before to political parties going into the first election in the constitution. You can have a libertarian democracy, which is like everything open to everybody at any point.

National referendum comes under the libertarian democracy principles. And then you can have totalitarian democracy as well. And while we may say that we've had democratic governments in Fiji in the past, we can look at where they have fallen in that particular line of the spectrum.

The middle ground that everybody loves to claim, but actually is not the reality at all, is liberal democracy. And I think the constitution, you know, the commission should decide whether Fiji should have what kind of democracy we should have. Totalitarian democracy, libertarian democracy, or liberal democracy.

Because once you've decided that principle, it's only when you can decide on your electoral result. The question is, where do we all want to be constitutionally? It's not necessarily on the commission's decision. It's obviously the position as well.

And this is something that we can put to the people. So what kind of democracy do you really want? Do you want somebody who's going to be like a dictator within the democratic principles, or somebody who's just not going to do anything to be a laid-back kind of bloke? Or do you want something where you have a say, but ultimately you give responsibility to the government to do the right thing? That's really, I think, what people would want. But we want to call you up if you think you're doing something wrong.

That's really the ideal. Well, it's not ideal. It's something that we expect, but we don't get, so other people call it ideal.

It's not really. It is doable. So social contract means equal representation, whatever the mechanics of selection or election.

You can have one constituency, you can have many constituencies, you can have five votes for one person, you can have 20 different ways of fighting an election, whatever it is, doesn't matter. Absolutely does not matter. The bottom line is that you should have equal representation.

In other words, every person in the country should have a voice, and every person in the country should expect the parliamentarians to act in the public interest. Once you've sorted that out, then the electoral principle works itself out. Next one.

Separation of powers. This is something that's probably underrated. Because, you know, a small community, we all know who the judges are.

We know, we're related to the judges sometimes. We are in a situation where we are neighbors, we know. And how is it possible to ignore that fact? In a big society, in a huge, you know, lots of population, we can say, yeah, they will vote, we don't know.

We'll never get to see the judges; we'll never get to even see our parliamentarians. Here our parliamentarians are our cousin or our, you know, next, on the next neighborhood. But separation of powers is a constitutional principle that we need to ensure that any constitution is respected and set in stone.

It's there. It's in the 2013 constitution, actually it's a general one, I think, when we're under the state. It's 1F, I think.

I don't know about the constitution. We have to check it. But it's 1F.

And it says separation of powers there. Totally right at the beginning. Outside even of where the judiciary is spent or where the Bill of Rights are mentioned.

Separation of powers is one of the fundamentals. What does it mean? It means that the legislature has got its own job, executives have got its own job, and the judiciary has got its own job. And they should not interfere with each other.

That's basically what it means, separation of powers. So in separate things, courts, in particular, and I mention the courts right now, do not legislate or impliedly legislate, because legislative power belongs to the people. And when the courts are told, in the constitution or in any legislation or whatever, that you must not do this, then courts cannot do it.

It's very important to know. Because I do realize that this commission is also a creature of a court of opinion. Mandatory words in legislation must be strictly defined.

That's what separation of powers means. While after clauses may be written down by the courts, and they can, because sometimes they beg to get them written down, they cannot be removed. Because legislature is still the supreme authority.

It can't take power away from the people, from the elected representatives of the people, by people who are appointed. And that's basically what it means. There's been a lot of debating in constitutional circles and constitutional law classes as to the limits of judicial authority and the limits of legislative authority and the limits of executive authority.

I think that's really important for the Constitutional Commission to try and see in terms of whether a new constitution will adequately protect that fundamental constitution. Next slide, please. Funding.

Now, normally I would not include this in any constitution or submission, because, you know, economic aspects are different from political aspects, which is what a legal aspect, which is what a constitution is. But I heard the submission from the Fiji Institute of Chartered Accounts yesterday, and the question that was asked, which is, you know, what I've got to do with what we're doing at the moment, and they said, well, because any fiscal policy has its impact on the politics. Finance and politics are closely related.

In particular, taxation. Next. Those of us on a high income get social responsibility tax, that's right.

And why aren't we tagging the economy, fiscal policies, and taxation to the public? Okay. Because there are several places in the Constitution of 2013 where it's possible. One of them is Section 39, and the other one is 32.

I am aware that there was a submission by the U.W.A. Trust Board, I think it was, TLTB, that Section 29.5, Subsection 5, must be removed from the next constitution. Well, if you look at it, it means the right to equality will also have to be removed, because it gives a vision for shared resources and taxing of resources as well. You can't have any benefit in a country without also having a social responsibility and a duty to share that with others who are not so advantaged.

And that's where taxation comes to be a constitutional issue, and it must be paid to sustainable economy and cash, and assets, including natural resources. You've got a lot of wealth you need to make. Next.

It's not rocket science. Next slide, please. Offences.

This goes beyond the principles now. Now we get to the offences against the constitutional people. Well, we have treason laws.

Domestic laws have treason. Crime Act 2009, Parts 10 to 12, not only in treason, but also discrimination, genocide, persecution, and all of that. So there are domestic laws, there are international laws for that.

And this is not something new. The Penal Code of 1945, in Chapters 7 and 8, also included those kinds of offences and what the penalties are. Before the Penal Code included treason, it was the death penalty.

That was since then. We know that the Human Rights Commission, our director, ensured that the death penalty was removed from our books. The military also removed it from their regulations.

So you don't need to go elsewhere for any crimes. Local laws are quite suitable. And in the case of immunity, well, there is always international law.

Next slide, please. Transition clauses. Transition clauses appear in every single constitution.

This is just to make life easy for the bureaucrats. So transition clauses should be minimized in the necessary, only way required for smooth transition from one document to another. From one constitution to another.

Next one. Amendment of the Constitution. Well, it is featured in the Second Reading.

It has been. It features Haya Sudo. And so it requires the highest majority for amendment.

It's a rather simple thing. To change the constitution, which explicitly it says is the perfect constitution, which I'm hoping this commission will come up with, which has radicalities, a cornerstone, separation of powers, all those fundamental things. For human values constitution, then it's not an easy thing to amend.

Because you're going to have to show why it means amendment. If it's a good constitution, then the reason for amendment should be even stronger. So it requires the highest majority.

Normally, we've had 10-year intervals in Fiji, because by coincidence or planned to be, if you look back over 1970 when it was changed in 1990, then again 1997, then again 2007 and so on. We like the 10-year interval of life. So 10 years is fine.

That seems to be what people want. But it must be included in the constitution. Otherwise, you cannot have a constitution set in stone.

Now, the United States constitution was the original one from 17, whatever it was when they had it. Now, how they're dealing with it is amendment to each side. So for example, in the original constitution, slavery was allowed.

But of course, there's a time when non-people realize it's foolish that we should change things. They did it by way of amendments. And that's actually quite a good one.

So, there's a fundamental constitution which expresses its basic principles. The country's entire platform. This is us.

We want to be like this. And we're going to be like this forever. But we know that we're going to keep up with changes as well as time goes on, as people become modernized or people become amenable to changes and maybe more understanding of certain things, that you want to change it and make it a bit more relaxed.

So you have these amendments. So the American way is quite important. Next one.

Next slide, please. The final one, which I think I put it here, because this is an issue that may not have come up yet, but it's inevitable because there's been discussions about it. What is the role of the military? And a lot of controversy in all of that.

But I do agree that if you've got the armed forces, first of all, this National Service, which is something that we are bound to protect and defend the state, that young people should go through, which is something that we've already said in the university. But the constitutional role, not just of the young men, but of all the disciplined services. Because they're called disciplined services.

That's why they're disciplined. They're supposed to be disciplined. And that is they should be looking after the welfare of all the people, all the people in the country, equally.

And that's the responsibility, I'm sure, the RFMF already holds, and I think the commander said it. But it's not just the army. It should be the commissions and it should be the police.

That is the constitutional role of all the disciplined services. And that should be in the constitution, that they should be looking after the welfare. And they should also be the critic and conscience of society.

Now I say this because in the strategic plan of the University of Fiji, in the very first early part, it says the University of Fiji should be the critic and conscience of society. And we take that very seriously. Therefore we're not frightened of expressing our views.

As long as they have solid basis for those views, and we're not just expressing ourselves wildly, that we are seen as the critic and conscience of society. And I think that's an important role for the disciplined services there as well. Final slide.

Do we really have enough? Conclusion. So, number one point. No need for a supreme and entrenched constitution unless we follow all constitutional principles that I've outlined.

Do you agree? A couple of members. Two. Ordinary legislation can be sufficiently robust to deal with all matters of public interest with reference to international equal principles of rights and responsibilities in each case.

I should point out today that we're also making submissions to the endemic rights legislation for both legislation. And that will come out a bit later on. We haven't really done business today to make up all the submissions.

And there are some interesting issues that we will be bringing up. We need to look at all legislation with international law eyes. And I'm not sure that we've done that in that particular piece of legislation.

The third one. Any constitutions resembling the 1990 constitution which codifies and has codified the 1987 events and some proposed policies that were attempted to put in place between 2001 and 2007 in the inter-international state governments will remember can be subject to international legal mechanisms and penalties. And number four.

Five more. Human values approach to constitutionalism is the best way for any constitution for review commission to go. Thank you for your time.

Honourable members of the commission. If you have any questions, I'd be very pleased if I don't. If you have questions, please feel free to ask them.

Thank you.

Mr. Valenitabua: Thank you, Professor Shamim. For that, I might just ask my colleague Mere and my online colleagues if they'd like to make any comments. Mere.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Professor Shamim. I hope you can hear me clearly.

Sincere appreciation for your submission today. I think it's these types of submissions that also enrich our thinking in terms of being reflexive, also thinking about the ecosystem that a constitution, if it so exists, must exist within. And also drawing the line to other international examples, for instance.

It makes me think about how in many of the submissions, we're also of the understanding that no constitution is self-executing, that it must exist in a legislative environment in the countries where it does. And many of these submissions relate to often policy or legislation-related issues, which I believe your university is also contributing to. We did have the privilege of hearing from the Electoral Commission, as well as the Electoral Law Reform Commission, who shared their experiences in their process, in some of the thinking that they were undertaking relating to electoral systems.

And also from the Human Rights and Anti-Discrimination Commission, who touched on some of the important mechanisms that you mentioned as well. Please don't judge my questioning to be the only thing I'm thinking of. You've really given me a lot to think about this morning.

One of the things that you would have heard from the Republic of Fiji Military Forces submission was the desire for constitutional clarity on their role. And you've mentioned in your submission their role relating to the welfare of all of Fiji. Of course, not only their role, but other disciplined forces as well.

What would you say to concerns that we've been hearing in submissions that this is too broad a role and might offer an opening for interventions into democratic processes from either the military or disciplined forces? I would be interested to hear your thoughts on that, Professor Shamim. Thank you.

Prof. Shamim: Yes.

Thank you very much for a very important question. Of course, as I've said, I have to take responsibility for some of it. When I was in the Human Rights Commission, I just entered the doors of the commission in 1999.

And in May 2000, George Speight and his group entered Parliament. And my first question was to ring, because we've had a history of military groups in the past, and I, in one particular, which was not in the public interest, and that I think is clearly understood, I rang the camp, first of all, and I said, because I needed to know, as the director of the Human Rights Commission, how the commission would deal with this particular event. And I rang the military barracks, and I asked the officer, a gentleman by the name of Ulus, is the military behind this? And as a state officer myself, I had the right to ask that question.

And I was told, categorically, no. At that point in time, I watched the military take the role that it did, and I say plural, throughout that whole issue of the hostages in Parliament, how it dealt with everything, including Muaniweni. And, you know, I was very much involved in the rescue of people from Muaniweni, and the town would be violated during that whole period.

I was very interested to see what the military would do, because if the state is involved, and the military, of course, being the state, in any overthrow of a government, in that case the Labour government, then the response of the Human Rights Commission, who is responsible for all of the human rights of the human body, would be different if the military were not involved. And that made it very important for me to realize that in this particular instance, the welfare of all the people were of concern to the military, and that's what they did. Hence, I can only speak from experience, and that we relied on the military at that point in time to perhaps stop the carnage that might have happened overnight.

And I realized that the military, now I've included the police as a corrections leader, had the highest responsibility to protect us all, because no one else can. Under this social contract philosophy, we can't take up arms ourselves to defend ourselves. Who else is going to do it? Should there be an invasion from another country? Forbidden, I doubt that it will, but you never know.

Worst things will happen, as we know. History now, you look at Ukraine, you look at Iran, you look at Venezuela, you look at just about every country in the world that is conscious of what's going on in other places, aren't they? We can't take up arms because we don't have them to defend ourselves. Who do we look to? We look at people who do have institutions, who do have arms, and that's the military.

And the police are supposed to keep the order, peace and order, on the streets. They're not armed, but that's what their role is. Corrections, so that people go to prison, first of all, they're going to prison, not unfairly, but secondly also to ensure that those people who cause harm to society, violators of women and children, are not running a muck because it's easy to escape.

That's what is the definition of welfare, and they are paid to do it. My money, my funds, my taxes, go to support the military. I have a right to demand the military and the corrections and the police to defend, and protect me because I can't do it myself.

That's the answer to your question. The welfare of all the people, that's their responsibility, and they should not be permitted to abdicate that responsibility.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Professor Shamim.

Dr. Fatiaki: Thank you, Mere. Shaista, I'm going to bring the session to a close. I just have one request.

You alluded to the 1990 constitution being discussed or being brought up, and the prospects of that being incorporated into our constitution-making process. Our experience from most of the consultations we've received is where individuals have suggested that we replace the entire 2013 constitution. We asked them, with what? Invariably, almost to a T, it's the 1997 one that they bring up.

I can't offhand recall, certainly in the course of my consultations throughout the country, anyone suggesting that we bring back the 1990 constitution. I'm just interested. Maybe I missed the parts where there were consultations where people actually brought that, or maybe they were in the written ones.

We're in the process right now of collating most of the data, and we'll be deliberating from next week. But I'd be interested in that because, obviously, that would be of concern. I presume the 1997 came out to correct or to even the keel on that unsteady ship of the 1990 constitution.

So just a clarification, please.

Prof. Shamim: Yes, sure. Absolutely.

No, no. The new constitution should look like the 1990 constitution. Not at all.

But just in case you don't look at it, I suggest you look at the 1990 constitution. Of course, it already says 1997 constitution. Lots of issues with the 1990 constitution, you know, what we should be called, and all of that sort of thing.

As far as I'm concerned, if you want to talk about the naming part, I can dwell on that, but I think it's more as a judgment than anything else. But, actually, the 1990 constitution's provisions specifically mention some chapters. So if you would like to have your legal people look at those sections and the chapters, and if there's any shape or form I see, it looks like somebody's promoting that in their submissions to you, you will recognize as where it's coming from.

Dr. Fatiaki: Thank you. Thank you for that.

Prof. Shamim: Not the verification.

I don't think anybody would be foolish enough to think that we can have the 1990 constitution in the back, calling it the 1990 constitution. But if you look at the sentiment in there, and you look at things like the marine spaces, commercial use of marine spaces bill, and the mining bill, I don't know whether they changed it according to how you thought it should be, then you will see that coming through. This is what my, call it a sense or call it just a long in the truth, if you like, or being there far too long and being through too many crisis and too many constitutions, that I have a sense that there is an element there that in all its innocence, the commission of constitutional commission may not perhaps recognize.

I'm shaking for it. We need to develop an antenna on that.

Dr. Fatiaki: Thank you very much, Shaista.

That clears that up. Look, thank you and your team very much for coming this morning. We appreciate it.

Prof. Shamim: You're on mute.

Dr. Fatiaki: Can you hear me, Shaista? Okay. I was saying thank you very much, you and your team, for coming this morning and making that presentation.

Prof. Shamim: Yes, I can now, thank you.

Dr. Fatiaki: We appreciate it very much. We're very much in the process of completing the collation of all the submissions that have been made this week, and we start our deliberations proper from next week. And we appreciate very much the constitutional law 206, and we might attend in person when you're here in Suva.

But it's good to catch up.

Prof. Shamim: I will invite you, Sarah. Very much so.

I would love that very much. Because, you see, there's a whole lot of things there that I'll be telling you, because that's a two-hour class. I only have one hour before you.

But, you know, there's a whole lot of things there that I think, once you've kind of looked at the references and so on, you will say, all right, well, this is our constitutional development from 1870 onwards or 1874 onwards, and what is it exactly that we're trying to do here? And this could be the one constitutional commission that brings the camel's back.

Dr. Fatiaki: Thank you very much. It's a pleasure to have you this morning and your team, and we look forward to catching up again.

Thank you.

Ms. Nailatikau: Thank you, Professor and team.

Prof. Shamim: Thank you. Good-bye, everyone.

SUBMISSIONS TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW COMMISSION

JULY 10 2026

Professor Shaista Shameem

Need for a Supreme and Entrenched Constitution?

- Preamble: Law 205 Constitutional Law, JDP SoL first lecture on 24th July. References to the Deed of Cession (clause 4) and Lord Salisbury's Despatch (clauses 17 and 20) there.
- Consider 1970, 1990, 1997 and, reportedly, 2013 Constitutions: common theme.
- Note 1977, 1987, 2007/9.
- What did the Constitutions do to alleviate crises?
- 2013 Constitution: 13 years.

Instead, create strong Legislation

- Bill of Rights Act eg UK, NZ, Aust.
- Electoral Act
- Others.
- Make mandatory references to international human rights instruments in all relevant legislation.

Disquieting Representations to CRC

- Call for provisions resembling the 1990 Constitution. Note Chapter III, and sections 31, 41 and 83 (2).
- Some of these would now be defined as crimes of ethnic discrimination and, indeed, persecution, pursuant to international law and the Rome Statute (ratified by Fiji in 1999) prohibitions.

Rome Statute

- Rule against retrospectivity.
- Does not apply to continuing crimes or those that would have been a crime at the time they occurred had it not been for state immunity.
- In Fiji discrimination was prohibited in the 1970 Constitution (s15).

International Law: Fiji a member of the UN

- Jus cogens and erga omnes obligations:
  - Hierarchy of rule and legal enforcement

  - Prohibition of racial discrimination, so:
    - ✓any state can prosecute.

    - ❖Any attempt to reintroduce provisions of the 1990 Constitution will trigger complaints regarding jus cogens/erga omnes, and the Rome Statute.

When can international law be considered?

Should there be any similarity between the 1990 Constitution and proposed Constitution, or an intention to replicate in shape or form, international law can be invoked.

Hence, it is better not to have a supreme and entrenched Constitution than to regurgitate the 1990 Constitution.

To avoid scrutiny of international law:

- The following human values-derived constitutional principles must apply:

(1) Constitution as a social contract: John Locke.

- Government as Trustee of people's will, so power is strictly limited. Breach of trust: breach of social contract.
- Representation of social contract: international human rights law/Bill of Rights- must be correctly applied.
- Exceptions in the public interest, not sectarian interest.

Non- discrimination means right/access to equality

(2) Equality of everyone- see categories in s 26 2013 Constitution.

- Minority and majority populations have equal status. Unlike in the 1990 Constitution.
- Right to be free from discrimination in access to governance, and resources owned or managed by the state.
- No special privileges

Representation in the Electoral System

(3) Democratic Representation

What is democracy? A spectrum.

Libertarian Liberal Totalitarian

_____Democracy_____

Where do we want to be constitutionally?

Social contract: Equal representation- whatever the mechanics of selection/election.

Separation of Powers

(4) Legislature, Executive and Judiciary

- Sacrosanct
  - Courts do not legislate or impliedly legislate
  - Legislative Power belongs to the people
  - Mandatory words in legislation to be strictly applied. While ouster clauses may be read down they cannot be removed: Legislature still supreme authority.

Fundng State Services

(5) Taxation

- Pegged to sustainable economy in cash and assets including in natural resources.

  - In association with the above, consider, sections 29 and 32 of the 2013 Constitution carefully.

Offences

Against the Constitution or people.

- Domestic criminal laws apply e.g. treason, discrimination, Crimes Act 2009 Parts 10-12.
- Penal Code 1945 (chapters VII and VIII).

Transition Clauses

Only where required for smooth transition.

Amendment of the Constitution

- As Fiji's highest law, requires higher majority.
- Ten year intervals is the norm in Fiji whether by design or by coincidence.

Constitutional Role of all Disciplined Services

Welfare of all the people

Critic and conscience of society

Conclusion

1. No need for a supreme and entrenched Constitution unless we follow all constitutional principles;
2. Ordinary legislation can be sufficiently robust to deal with all matters of public interest with reference to international legal principles of rights and responsibilities in each case;
3. Any constitution resembling the 1990 Constitution codifying the 1987 events and some proposed policy 2001-2007 can be subject to international legal mechanisms and penalties.
4. Human values approach to constitutionalism.

Dear Chairman

RE: SUBMISSION OF THE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION TO THE CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMISSION

I am pleased to forward the attached submission by the Public Service Commission (PSC) on matters relating to the constitutional governance of the Public Service. The submission has been considered and approved by the Honourable Prime Minister for transmission to the Constitutional Review Commission.

The Public Service Commission welcomes the opportunity to contribute to this important national exercise and commends the Constitutional Review Commission for undertaking a comprehensive review of Fiji's constitutional framework.

The attached submission outlines the Commission's recommendations to strengthen the governance, management and administration of the Public Service. In particular, it proposes reforms that reinforce the principles of merit, professionalism, accountability, political neutrality and good governance, while restoring clear institutional roles and responsibilities within Fiji's system of public administration.

The Commission trusts that these recommendations will assist the Constitutional Review Commission in its deliberations and contribute towards a constitutional framework that supports an efficient, independent and high-performing Public Service in the best interests of the people of Fiji.

Should the Constitutional Review Commission require any clarification or wish to discuss any aspect of the submission, the Public Service Commission would be pleased to assist.

Yours sincerely,

Luke Rokovada

Submission by the Public Service Commission on Constitutional Review – Public Service Governance

1.Introduction

The Public Service Commission (PSC) welcomes the opportunity to provide submissions to the Constitutional Review Commission regarding provisions of the Constitution relating to the governance, management and administration of the Public Service.

The Commission is of the view that the constitutional framework should clearly reinforce the principles of good governance, accountability, political neutrality, professionalism and merit-based administration. In this regard, a review of the existing provisions relating to the Public Service is both timely and necessary to ensure that Fiji's constitutional arrangements support an efficient, impartial and high-performing public service.

2. Review of Section 127 – Powers of Permanent Secretaries

The Commission recommends that Sections 127(1), (2), (3), (4), (5), (7) and (8) of the Constitution be reviewed.

These provisions currently confer extensive powers on Permanent Secretaries for the management and administration of their respective Ministries, many of which are exercisable with the agreement of the responsible Minister.

While Permanent Secretaries are accountable for the effective administration of government ministries, the constitutional requirement that certain management functions be exercised with the agreement of the Minister has, in practice, blurred the distinction between political oversight and administrative authority.

This arrangement has, in some instances, resulted in Ministers becoming involved in operational and administrative matters that properly fall within the responsibilities of Permanent Secretaries. Such involvement has the potential to:

- undermine the professional independence of Permanent Secretaries;
- weaken established lines of accountability;
- create uncertainty in administrative decision-making;
- reduce operational efficiency; and
- adversely affect the morale and effectiveness of senior public service leadership.

The Commission therefore recommends that the requirement for Permanent Secretaries to exercise administrative powers "with the agreement of the Minister" be removed from the Constitution.

Permanent Secretaries should remain fully accountable for the management, administration and performance of their Ministries, while Ministers should exercise their constitutional responsibility by providing policy direction, setting strategic priorities and ensuring political accountability to Cabinet and Parliament.

This clearer separation of responsibilities would be consistent with internationally recognised Westminster principles of public administration.

3. Restoration of the Constitutional Role of the Public Service Commission

The Commission further recommends that certain powers presently vested directly in Permanent Secretaries be restored to the Public Service Commission.

Historically, under both the 1970 Constitution and the 1997 Constitution, the Public Service Commission exercised constitutional oversight of appointments, discipline, promotions, transfers and other key human resource functions across the Public Service. These arrangements strengthened merit-based appointments, consistency of standards and institutional independence.

Reinstating appropriate constitutional authority to the Commission would:

- reinforce the independence and integrity of the Public Service;
- strengthen merit-based employment practices;
- promote consistency in human resource management across government;
- provide appropriate oversight over senior public service appointments; and
- enhance public confidence in the impartial administration of government.

4. Clarifying the Distinct Roles of Ministers and Permanent Secretaries

The Commission recommends that the Constitution more clearly define the respective responsibilities of Ministers and Permanent Secretaries.

Ministers should principally be responsible for:

- policy development;
- strategic direction;
- legislative programmes;
- Cabinet decisions;
- parliamentary accountability;
- national priorities; and
- political leadership.

Permanent Secretaries should be responsible for:

- implementation of Government policies;
- operational management of Ministries;
- financial management and resource stewardship;
- organisational leadership;
- human resource management; and
- delivery of public services.

Maintaining this distinction is fundamental to preserving a politically neutral, professional and performance-driven Public Service.

5. Realignment of Public Service Governance Arrangements

The Commission also recommends a review of the current governance arrangements whereby the Public Service Commission operates separately from the Ministry responsible for the Civil Service.

Consideration should be given to re-establishing a more integrated public service governance framework in which the Public Service Commission resumes its constitutional leadership role over public service management, while Ministries provide the necessary administrative and policy support.

This approach would more closely reflect the institutional arrangements that existed under previous constitutional and legislative frameworks and would promote greater consistency, accountability and strategic leadership across the Public Service.

6. Relocating Administrative Provisions from the Constitution to Legislation

The Commission recommends that many of the detailed administrative provisions currently contained in the Constitution, including those relating to the powers and functions of Permanent Secretaries be removed from the Constitution and incorporated into the Public Service Act.

Administrative powers are more appropriately contained within ordinary legislation rather than constitutional text.

Unlike constitutional provisions, legislation can be reviewed and amended by Parliament as administrative practices evolve and government priorities change. This provides greater flexibility while preserving constitutional stability.

Accordingly, the Public Service Act should carefully prescribe the powers, responsibilities and accountabilities of Permanent Secretaries, together with the governance arrangements for the Public Service.

7. Pacific Public Service Commission Collaboration

Furthermore, Fiji's Public Service Commission is part of a strong and well-established network of Public Service Commissions and equivalent constitutional bodies across the Pacific region. More than ten of the sixteen Pacific Island countries plus Australia and New Zealand maintain Public Service Commissions or comparable institutions with constitutional or legislative responsibility for safeguarding merit-based appointments, promoting integrity and ensuring professionalism and political neutrality within the public service. Fiji's Public Service Commission is widely recognised within this regional network for its leadership, contribution to public sector reform and commitment to strengthening good governance.

This regional standing was further demonstrated in 2025 when Fiji successfully hosted the Pacific Public Service Fono, bringing together delegates from all sixteen Pacific Island countries as well as Australia and New Zealand. The Fono provided a valuable platform for dialogue, collaboration and the exchange of innovative public sector practices across the region. Fiji's leadership in convening this important regional forum was widely acknowledged and reinforced its reputation as a leader in public sector governance and reform within the Pacific.

A particular highlight of the Fono was the introduction of the Fiji Learning Institute for Public Service (FLIPS), which attracted significant interest and commendation from participating countries. FLIPS is recognised as an innovative initiative with the potential to evolve into a regional centre of excellence for public service learning, leadership development and professional capacity building for Pacific public servants. This initiative reflects Fiji's commitment to investing in the future capability of the public service, not only nationally but across the wider Pacific region.

Through regular collaboration, knowledge sharing, benchmarking of best practices and capacity-building initiatives, the Pacific Public Service Commissions continue to work collectively to strengthen public administration across the region as a collective. This collaboration is facilitated and supported by the Public Service Fale, based in New Zealand, which coordinates regional engagements and provides technical resources to promote institutional development and cooperation amongst Pacific Public Service Commissions.

The consistency of the constitutional roles and responsibilities undertaken by these independent Commissions across the Pacific further reinforces the importance of preserving and strengthening the constitutional mandate of the Fiji Public Service Commission. The Commission therefore respectfully submits that the proposed constitutional amendments are not only consistent with Fiji's governance needs but are also aligned with recognised regional principles and established Pacific practice in ensuring an independent, professional, merit-based and accountable public service.

8. Conclusion

The Commission considers that the proposed reforms would strengthen Fiji's system of public administration by restoring clear institutional accountability, reinforcing the constitutional independence of the Public Service Commission and re-establishing the proper separation between political leadership and administrative management.

These reforms would also align Fiji's public service governance arrangements more closely with established principles, promote professionalism and merit within the Public Service and enhance the effective delivery of government services to the people of Fiji.

The Public Service Commission respectfully submits these recommendations for the consideration of the Constitutional Review Commission.

Yours sincerely

Re: Invitation For Submission before Constitution Review Committee

People First Party acknowledges your invitation to appear before the Constitution Review Commission and to make submissions on the review of the 2013 Constitution. The Board of Governor have given careful consideration to the invitation and have consulted extensively before arriving at our position.

The People First Party is founded on enduring democratic values and principles. We believe in the supremacy of the 2013 Constitution, the rule of law, democracy, equality of all citizens, accountable and transparent government, respect for human rights and institutions that operate independently and within the limits prescribed by law. We believe that governments derive their legitimacy from adherence to the Constitution and that no person or institution is above the law. These principles are fundamental to maintaining public confidence in our democracy and ensuring that Fiji continues to develop as a nation founded upon justice, equality and respect for all its people.

It is through these principles that we have considered the work of the Constitution Review Commission.

Constitutions may, from time to time, require amendment to reflect the aspirations of the people and the evolving needs of the nation. However, any amendment to the supreme law must itself be undertaken strictly in accordance with the procedures prescribed by that supreme law. Constitutionalism demands no less.

The People First Party is firmly of the view that the present process departs from the constitutional framework established by the 2013 Constitution for its amendment. The Constitution expressly provides the mechanism by which it may be amended. Those requirements were deliberately included to safeguard the stability of the Constitution, preserve democratic legitimacy and ensure that constitutional change commands broad national support. Those safeguards should not be circumvented or rendered ineffective through alternative processes.

It is our considered position that constitutional reform cannot be pursued by first departing from the Constitution itself. Respect for the rule of law requires that the Constitution be amended only in the manner that the Constitution prescribes. To do otherwise would undermine the principle of constitutional supremacy and weaken public confidence in the integrity of our democratic institutions.

PEOPLE FIRST

The People First Party also notes that the Constitution Review Commission was established through a process in which the Opposition was neither consulted nor involved. While we acknowledge the Commission's invitation, our participation in these circumstances could reasonably be interpreted as legitimising or endorsing a process that we believe is inconsistent with the constitutional framework governing constitutional amendment. We are therefore unable, in good conscience and consistent with our principles, to participate in the Commission's proceedings.

Our position is also one of consistency and integrity. The People First Party has consistently maintained its position regarding the constitutional amendment process, including representing these views within Parliament. It would therefore be inconsistent with our stated commitment to constitutionalism and the rule of law to participate in a review process founded upon a methodology that we believe does not comply with the constitutional requirements for amendment.

The People First Party further believes that the Government's immediate priority should remain the welfare of the people of Fiji. At a time when many sectors continue to face significant economic and social challenges, public resources should be directed towards improving essential services, supporting economic growth, creating employment opportunities and addressing the everyday concerns of ordinary Fijians. Constitutional reform, if pursued, must be undertaken lawfully, transparently and at the appropriate time through the proper constitutional processes.

Notwithstanding our decision not to participate before the Commission, we reaffirm our longstanding support for the preservation of Fiji as a secular State, the retention of common and equal citizenry for all Fijians and the continuation of the current electoral system that upholds equality of every citizen's vote. These remain important constitutional principles that the People First Party has consistently advocated.

Finally, the People First Party firmly believes that the proper forum for considering any proposal to amend the Constitution is the Parliament of the Republic of Fiji. Parliament is the constitutionally established institution entrusted by the people with debating legislation, scrutinising proposed constitutional amendments and determining whether the constitutional thresholds for amendment have been satisfied. It is through Parliament and in strict compliance with the amendment procedures prescribed by the Constitution itself, that any proposal to amend the Constitution should property be considered. That is the lawful, transparent and genuinely democratic process contemplated by the Constitution and it is one that the People First Party will continue to uphold.

PEOPLE FIRST

Accordingly, as per the resolution of Board of Governors, the party respectfully declines the invitation to participate in the proceedings of the Constitution Review Commission and submit this statement to formally record the reasons for our position.

Yours Sincerely

Suvavou House

SUVA

Dear Chairman,

RE: LODGEMENT OF THE SUBMISSION OF THE VANUA O LAU

On behalf of the Vanua o Lau, and under the traditional authority of the Gone Turaga Bale na Tui Nayau, Sau ni Vanua ko Lau, Tui Lau - Ratu Tevita Lutunauga Kapaiwai Uluilakeba Mara - I have the honour to lodge with the Commission the enclosed submission of the Province of Lau, together with a one-page summary.

The submission was formally tabled before, and endorsed by, the Bose Vanua o Lau at Studio 6, Suva, on Monday, 13 July 2026. It bears the signatures of the Gone Turaga Bale na Tui Nayau, the Masi ni Vanua ko Lau, and the leadership of the Lau Provincial Council, and is presented as the settled and collective word of the whole Vanua - its chiefs, its council, and its people.

The Vanua o Lau is sincerely grateful to you and to the Commission for the patience and respect shown to us in receiving this submission beyond the closing date, so that it could first pass through the proper processes of the Vanua. We do not take that courtesy lightly.

The submission addresses fourteen areas of constitutional concern, together with a proposed preamble for the revised Constitution. Should the Commission wish to hear further from the Province on any part of it, our delegation - led by the chiefs of Lau - remains at the Commission's service and can make itself available at short notice.

We thank you and your fellow Commissioners for your work, and wish you well in the great task before you.

Yours faithfully,

.....
J. T. Kalounivalu

SUBMISSION TO THE

FIJI CONSTITUTION REVIEW COMMISSION

FROM THE PROVINCE OF LAU

Under the Traditional Leadership of

Gone Turaga Bale na Tui Nayau, Sau ni Vanua ko Lau, Tui Lau

Ratu Tevita Lutunauga Kapaiwai Uluilakeba Mara

PREAMBLE

The Province of Lau, through its Provincial Council and under the august traditional authority of the Gone Turaga Bale na Tui Nayau, Sau ni Vanua ko Lau, Tui Lau - Ratu Tevita Lutunauga Kapaiwai Uluilakeba Mara - and his Masi ni Vanua ko Lau, respectfully submits this document to the Fiji Constitution Review Commission.

Lau holds a unique and distinguished place in the story of this nation. It was in Lakeba - the seat of the Tui Nayau and the heart of Lau - that Christian missionaries were first received in 1835 by the paramount chief of the day, marking the beginning of a transformation that would reshape the spiritual, social, and political life of Fiji. It was the chiefs and people of Fiji who, by their own sovereign will, ceded these islands to the British Crown by the Deed of Cession of 10 October 1874 - an instrument that bears, among the signatures of the high chiefs, that of the Tui Lau of the day, Ratu Enele Ma'afu, who signed on behalf of the Turaga Tui Nayau and his people of Lau. And it was a son of Lau - Ratu Sir Kamisese Mara, then Turaga Tui Nayau - who, as Fiji's first Prime Minister, received the constitutional instruments of independence in 1970, under a framework that honoured the covenant between the Vanua, the Church, and the State.

The Province of Lau therefore approaches this review not merely as a matter of legal reform, but as a matter of ancestral obligation - an obligation to the generations who have gone before and those who will come after. This review is an undertaking of the highest national consequence: it is the opportunity to set the foundations of our nation right again - to restore its moral compass, and to lay a constitutional foundation upon which inclusivity, unity, and shared prosperity may be built for every citizen of Fiji. We urge the Commission to approach its mandate with the solemnity that this moment demands.

The Province of Lau acknowledges the advisory opinion of the Supreme Court of Fiji delivered in 2025, which affirmed that the 2013 Constitution remains the supreme law of Fiji while clarifying the pathway by which it may lawfully be amended. These submissions are made within, and in full respect of, that lawful process of review and reform.

Our submissions address fourteen areas of particular concern. They are offered in a spirit of unity, inclusion, and enduring love for Fiji - our island home.

SUBMISSION 1

Restoring the Powers and Dignity of the Great Council of Chiefs (GCC)

The Province of Lau firmly supports the call, made by the GCC and others, to restore appropriate authority and constitutional recognition to the Great Council of Chiefs.

The Great Council of Chiefs is not a relic of the past. It is the living institutional expression of the covenant made in 1874, when the paramount chiefs of Fiji - exercising their sovereign authority over the Vanua - ceded these islands to Queen Victoria in an act of considered statesmanship. That covenant, and the role of the chiefs within it, was honoured in every constitution Fiji has known prior to the 2013 Constitution. Its removal was an act of constitutional erasure that this review must address.

The Province of Lau recommends the following:

- The GCC be restored as a constitutional body with clearly defined powers, including the authority to appoint or confirm the President and Vice-President of the Republic, as provided under section 90 of the 1997 Constitution.
- The reformed GCC must be explicitly apolitical. It must not serve as an instrument of any political party or government of the day.
- While rooted in iTaukei tradition and serving primarily as the apex body of indigenous Fijian leadership, the GCC in its reformed character should reflect a broad custodianship - one that, by safeguarding the Vanua, ultimately looks after all citizens of Fiji regardless of race or religion.
- The new GCC should represent a decisive break from past failures. Its composition, deliberative processes, and accountability mechanisms should be modernised while retaining the inviolable principle of chiefly authority and customary legitimacy.

SUBMISSION 2

Restoring the Authority and Dignity of the Office of the President, and the Office of Vice-President

The Province of Lau submits that the Office of the President must be restored to the constitutional standing it held under the 1997 Constitution - as a substantive Head of State, appointed through the Great Council of Chiefs, exercising real constitutional authority as Commander-in-Chief of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces, and supported by a Vice-President.

Under the 1997 Constitution, the executive authority of the State was vested in the President (section 85); the President was the Commander-in-Chief of the military forces (section 87); the President and Vice-President were appointed by the Bose Levu Vakaturaga - the Great Council of Chiefs - following consultation with the Prime Minister (section 90); and the Republic of Fiji Military Forces were expressly made subject to the control of the responsible Minister (section 112). Taken together, these provisions placed the Presidency above partisan politics, anchored its legitimacy in the chiefly institutions of the Vanua, and located the military within a clear and accountable chain of civilian constitutional authority.

The 2013 Constitution dismantled this architecture. While section 81(3) retains for the President the title of Commander-in-Chief, the title is ceremonial in substance: section 82 requires the President to act only on the advice of Cabinet or a Minister, and section 131 vests effective authority over the Republic of Fiji Military Forces in a Commander appointed on the advice of the Constitutional Offices Commission - a body dominated by the Prime Minister and the Attorney-General. Unlike the 1997 Constitution, the 2013 Constitution contains no provision subjecting the military to ministerial control, and section 131(2) confers upon the military itself the elastic and dangerous mandate to ensure "at all times the security, defence and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians" - a provision that has been invoked to assert a self-appointed guardianship over the political life of the nation. The Office of Vice-President was abolished altogether.

The Province of Lau states its position on section 131(2) with respect, but without equivocation: the provision must be removed from the Constitution altogether. In no comparable constitutional democracy is a nation's military granted, in the constitution itself, an open-ended responsibility for the "well-being" of the nation and its people. In the democracies of the Commonwealth and beyond, the armed forces are established and their functions defined by ordinary legislation, under the control of a responsible Minister and the oversight of Parliament - they defend the nation; they do not superintend it. A constitutional clause that invites the military to judge for itself when the "well-being" of the nation requires its intervention is not a security provision. It is a standing charter for extra-constitutional action, and Fiji's own history has shown where such reasoning leads. The guardianship of the Constitution belongs to the people, the Parliament, and the courts - never to the barrel of a gun. Removing this provision takes nothing of honour from the Republic of Fiji Military Forces; it restores the RFMF to the noble and clearly bounded role in which its service to the nation, at home and in peacekeeping abroad, has earned genuine distinction.

The Province of Lau recommends that the Commission:

- Restore the President as the substantive Head of State in whom the executive authority of the State is vested, exercising defined constitutional powers - including appropriate reserve powers - as under the 1997 Constitution.
- Restore the appointment of the President by the Great Council of Chiefs, following consultation with the Prime Minister, so that the Head of State stands above party politics and draws legitimacy from the enduring institutions of the Vanua as well as the State.
- Re-establish the Office of Vice-President, appointed in the same manner, to ensure continuity, stability, and dignity in the highest offices of the land.
- Restore the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces in substance and not merely in name, with the Commander of the RFMF constitutionally accountable to the President as Commander-in-Chief, within a clear framework of civilian and parliamentary oversight.

- Repeal section 131(2) of the 2013 Constitution in its entirety, removing from the Constitution the RFMF's self-standing mandate over the "security, defence and well-being of Fiji and all Fijians." The functions of the RFMF should instead be defined by an Act of Parliament, confined to the defence of Fiji, the protection of its territorial integrity, and such duties in aid of the civil power as are prescribed by law - so that no provision of the Constitution may ever again be read as licensing extra-constitutional intervention in the government of the nation.
- Restore an express provision, in the manner of section 112 of the 1997 Constitution, placing the Republic of Fiji Military Forces under the control of a responsible Minister answerable to Parliament.

SUBMISSION 3

Indigenous Fijian and Rotuman Rights

The Province of Lau affirms its staunch support for the explicit and robust constitutional protection of the rights, interests, and concerns of the indigenous iTaukei people and the people of Rotuma.

Previous constitutions of Fiji recognised that indigenous Fijians occupy a position of special historical, cultural, and proprietary significance in this land. These protections were not discriminatory - they were an acknowledgement of historical truth and an act of constitutional justice. Their weakening or removal in 2013 left the Vanua exposed and its people diminished in their own homeland.

We call upon the Review Commission to:

- Restore explicit constitutional protections for the rights of iTaukei and Rotuman peoples as previously enshrined.
- Ensure that indigenous land rights, customary rights, and resource rights are afforded the highest order of constitutional protection.
- Provide that no future Parliament may diminish these rights without the consent of the communities concerned, expressed through appropriate consultative mechanisms including the GCC.

SUBMISSION 4

The Definition of the Term 'Fijian'

The Province of Lau raises its deepest concern regarding the unilateral redefinition of the term 'Fijian' imposed by the 2013 Constitution. That constitution, adopted without meaningful consultation with the iTaukei people or the Great Council of Chiefs, took from indigenous Fijians the name by which they had been known for generations, and assigned it as a common civic identity for all citizens of the Republic.

This was not merely a matter of nomenclature. It was an act of cultural dispossession. The term 'Fijian' carries within it the history, the ancestral identity, and the living culture of the iTaukei people. To strip that term from them - without their knowledge or consent - was a profound injustice.

We note that before 2013, the term 'Fiji Islander' served as a widely accepted and unifying common name for all citizens of Fiji, regardless of ethnicity. Each community retained its own distinct ethnic identity - iTaukei, Indo-Fijian, Part-European, Chinese, Rotuman, and others - which is the very diversity and beauty of this nation.

The Province of Lau submits that:

- The question of whether the term 'Fijian' should be exclusively reserved for the indigenous iTaukei people must be put back to the people of Fiji - through proper, meaningful, and unhurried consultation.
- The Great Council of Chiefs must be central to that consultative process, and its endorsement should be a prerequisite to any final determination.
- In the interim, the Province of Lau holds that the restoration of 'Fiji Islander' as the common civic name for all citizens - while preserving 'Fijian' for the indigenous people - is a fair, dignified, and workable solution.

SUBMISSION 5

Electoral System Reform

The Province of Lau supports the proposal to move away from the current single-national-constituency electoral system and to explore a return to a multi-constituency system.

The current system, in which all of Fiji constitutes a single electoral constituency, has demonstrably failed to produce a parliament that is truly representative of the nation's geographic and demographic diversity. Remote island provinces such as Lau, with smaller voter populations, find their voices diluted and their specific concerns marginalised in a system that rewards population concentration and well-resourced national campaigns.

The Province of Lau recommends that the Review Commission:

- Restore a multi-constituency electoral system that ensures every province and region of Fiji has meaningful representation in Parliament.

- Consider appropriate mechanisms to ensure that the people of Lau and other remote or smaller provinces are not disadvantaged by geographic isolation in exercising their democratic rights.
- Explore electoral models from comparable island nations that have successfully balanced proportional representation with geographic representation.

Candidacy Requirements and the Fijian Diaspora

The Province of Lau urges the Review Commission to fundamentally rethink who may stand for election in Fiji. A multi-constituency system is only as strong as the pool of candidates it draws upon. The nation needs the very best of its people to step forward and lead - and current eligibility rules are shutting many of those people out.

In a multi-constituency system, the Province of Lau submits that any person should be eligible to stand for election in a constituency provided they can demonstrate sufficient and genuine connection to that constituency - whether through heritage, birth, or longstanding affiliation. This principle honours the organic ties that bind citizens to place without erecting arbitrary bureaucratic barriers against those whose lives have taken them beyond our shores.

The Province of Lau is particularly concerned about the position of the Fijian diaspora. Hundreds of thousands of Fijians live and work abroad - driven by the realities of international mobility, professional opportunity, and global interconnection. These are not disloyal citizens. They are, in many cases, among the most capable, educated, and experienced people Fiji has produced, and they remain fiercely loyal to this land. The remittances they send home - now exceeding one billion Fijian dollars annually - sustain families and communities across the nation and constitute one of the largest sources of foreign exchange in the economy. Fiji cannot afford to treat these citizens as second-class participants in its democracy.

The Province of Lau therefore calls for the removal of the following unduly restrictive requirements that currently bar many qualified citizens from standing for election:

- The requirement that a citizen must have resided in Fiji for a continuous period of two years immediately prior to nomination should be removed. This rule disproportionately penalises those who have been engaged in meaningful professional, academic, or service-related work abroad - precisely the experience Fiji needs at the helm of government.
- The requirement to renounce dual citizenship as a condition of standing for election should be abolished, particularly for indigenous Fijians who are registered in the Vola ni Kawa Bula (VKB). Registration in the VKB is the most definitive and irreducible expression of iTaukei identity. No administrative requirement related to a foreign passport should be permitted to override that fundamental ancestral connection or bar an iTaukei citizen from serving their people.

- Diaspora Fijians - including iTaukei, Indo-Fijian, and other communities living abroad - have accumulated extraordinary experience in international institutions, foreign governments, global business, medicine, law, academia, and the military. Fiji urgently needs this depth of experience and expertise to meet the challenges of the twenty-first century. These citizens should be welcomed back into public life, not excluded from it.

Disclosure Requirements

The Province of Lau further calls for a thorough and balanced review of the disclosure requirements currently imposed on candidates and elected officials. While the Province firmly supports transparency and accountability in public life - both as a principle and as a practical safeguard against corruption - the current disclosure regime has in some respects become an instrument of deterrence rather than accountability.

Requirements that are excessively burdensome, intrusive into the lives of family members, or that expose candidates to undue legal risk from inadvertent non-disclosure discourage public service among precisely those citizens who have the most to offer. The Review Commission should consider how disclosure obligations can be calibrated to achieve genuine accountability without becoming a barrier to candidacy for well-qualified individuals - particularly those who have built careers and assets across multiple jurisdictions through legitimate international endeavour.

SUBMISSION 6

The Role of Christianity and Religion in the Constitution

The Province of Lau calls for explicit constitutional acknowledgement of the role of Christianity in the life of Fiji and of its people.

The acceptance of Christianity by the paramount chiefs and people of Fiji was not imposed. It was an act of sovereign and spiritual will. It began in 1835, when the then Turaga Tui Nayau - paramount chief of Lau - received Christian missionaries at Lakeba and gave them the freedom to proclaim the Gospel. From that moment, the light of Christianity spread outward from Lau across the archipelago, and in the generations that followed, Fiji was transformed.

This is not merely religious history. It is national history. Christianity predates the modern Fijian state by nearly four decades. It is woven into the culture, language, values, and identity of the iTaukei people, and into the moral fabric of the nation as a whole. Indeed, the preamble to the 1997 Constitution itself recorded the conversion of the indigenous inhabitants of these islands to Christianity and its enduring influence, alongside the contribution of other faiths, to the spiritual life of Fiji.

Fiji Day as a National Day of Prayer. The Province of Lau further submits that Fiji Day, the tenth day of October, should be observed as a National Day of Prayer and Thanksgiving. Providence has joined upon this single date the two defining covenants of our nationhood: the Deed of Cession of 10 October 1874, by which the paramount chiefs entrusted these islands in faith to a higher protection, and the Independence of 10 October 1970, by which the nation received back its sovereignty in peace and unity. It is fitting that a day already set apart to remember these covenants should also be a day on which the nation pauses - in its churches, temples, mosques, homes, and villages - to give thanks to God for the gift of this land, to pray for its leaders and people, and to renew the bonds of unity between all its communities. A National Day of Prayer would take nothing from any citizen; it would call every citizen, each according to their own faith and conscience, to the shared work of gratitude, reflection, and reconciliation.

The Province of Lau submits that:

- The Constitution should explicitly acknowledge, in its preamble and founding provisions, the Christian foundations of the Fijian state and the centrality of Christianity to the history and identity of its people.
- The current formulation of the "Secular State" provision in section 4 of the 2013 Constitution should be reviewed, so that the Constitution speaks truthfully of the nation's Christian heritage rather than treating faith as a matter foreign to the life of the State.
- Fiji Day, 10 October, be designated a National Day of Prayer and Thanksgiving - commemorating the Cession of 1874 and the Independence of 1970 - on which all citizens are invited, each according to their own faith and conscience, to give thanks for the nation, to pray for its leaders and people, and to renew the unity of all its communities.
- This acknowledgement must be made with full and genuine respect for the rights of all religious communities in Fiji - and of those of no faith - to practise and profess their beliefs freely, without discrimination, and with the freedom of religion guaranteed as a fundamental right of all citizens. The acknowledgement of our Christian heritage is an act of historical truth and national identity; it is not, and must never become, an instrument of exclusion.

SUBMISSION 7

Land, Resources, and Customary Rights

The Province of Lau strongly endorses the strengthening of constitutional protections for iTaukei proprietary and customary rights, particularly with respect to land and marine natural resources.

iTaukei land is not simply an economic asset. It is the physical and spiritual inheritance of the Vanua - the foundation upon which identity, culture, and community are built. Previous constitutions of Fiji protected this understanding. The Province of Lau calls for its full restoration.

We further submit the following additional recommendations:

- The lease formulae governing the use of iTaukei land must be comprehensively reviewed to ensure that landowners receive fair and equitable compensation that genuinely reflects the value of their lands and resources.
- Mechanisms for periodic review of lease terms should be constitutionally or legislatively mandated to prevent long-term exploitation of landowners operating under outdated or inequitable arrangements.
- Special-purpose vehicles and joint-venture partnerships between landowners and leaseholders should be encouraged and facilitated, including revenue-sharing arrangements under which leaseholders share a fair and agreed portion of the income derived from the land with the landowning units.
- The rights of iTaukei communities over their customary fishing grounds (qoliqoli), maritime resources, and other natural endowments should receive constitutional protection equivalent to that afforded to land rights.
- The governance and accountability mechanisms of the iTaukei Land Trust Board (TLTB) should be strengthened to ensure that it faithfully serves the interests of landowners.

SUBMISSION 8

Review of the Bill of Rights (Chapter 2 of the 2013 Constitution)

The Province of Lau submits that a thorough and principled review of the Bill of Rights in Chapter 2 of the 2013 Constitution is warranted and overdue. We affirm without reservation our commitment to the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms for all citizens of Fiji. Our concern is that the 2013 Bill of Rights, in its present form, promises more than it delivers.

The defect lies principally in the limitation clauses. Nearly every substantive right in Chapter 2 is accompanied by broad qualifications permitting limitation by law on expansive and loosely defined grounds. In practice, these provisions allow the rights they accompany to be hollowed out by ordinary legislation and executive action. A right that may be limited whenever Parliament or the executive considers it convenient is not a constitutional guarantee; it is a discretion dressed in the language of one.

The Province of Lau accordingly recommends that the Commission:

- Review every limitation clause in Chapter 2 and replace the current open-ended formulations with a single, general limitation provision requiring that any limitation of a right be prescribed by law, pursue a legitimate purpose, and be demonstrably reasonable, necessary, and proportionate in a free and democratic society - the standard applied in comparable constitutional democracies and under the 1997 Constitution.
- Ensure that the courts retain full jurisdiction to review any law or conduct limiting a protected right, and that no provision of the Constitution places any law, decree, or act of the executive beyond judicial scrutiny.
- Review the socio-economic rights provisions of Chapter 2, which are presently qualified by reference to the availability of State resources in terms that risk rendering them unenforceable in practice, and consider how these rights can be given genuine and progressive effect.
- Examine the interaction between the Bill of Rights and the immunity provisions of Chapter 10, and consider whether blanket and perpetual immunities - placed beyond amendment or judicial review - are compatible with the equal protection of the law promised to every citizen.
- Conduct this review in a spirit of genuine inclusion - giving voice not only to legal experts and political parties, but to the Vanua, the Church, the provinces, NGOs, and the communities of Fiji whose daily lives are shaped by these foundational provisions.

SUBMISSION 9

Independence of the Judiciary and Institutional Accountability

The Province of Lau calls for thorough constitutional reform to restore the integrity and genuine independence of the judicial branch and all state institutions.

A fundamental principle of democratic governance is the separation of powers - the independence of the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary from one another. This principle was deeply undermined in Fiji during the period of the previous government. The compromise of the judicial system - through appointments, removals, and political interference - inflicted lasting damage on public trust in the rule of law.

The Province of Lau recommends that the Constitution:

- Enshrine the full independence of the judiciary with robust protections against executive interference in the appointment, tenure, and removal of judicial officers.
- Provide clear separation of powers between the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary, with each arm of the state constrained to its proper constitutional role.
- Establish a transparent, independent, and merit-based process for judicial appointments, insulated from political patronage.
- Provide for the accountability of all three branches of government to the Constitution and to the people of Fiji, rather than to one another.

SUBMISSION 10

Rebalancing Executive Power: The Offices of the Prime Minister and the Attorney-General

The Province of Lau submits that one of the gravest structural defects of the 2013 Constitution is the extraordinary concentration of appointment and gatekeeping power in just two offices: the Prime Minister and the Attorney-General. This concentration is not incidental. It runs as a design principle through the entire document, and it must be dismantled if the independence of Fiji's institutions is ever to be more than a phrase.

The Commission need look no further than the text of the 2013 Constitution itself:

- The Chief Justice and the President of the Court of Appeal are appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister, who is required only to consult the Attorney-General (section 106(1)). The two most senior judicial offices in the land are, in substance, in the gift of the head of government.
- All other judges are appointed on the recommendation of the Judicial Services Commission - but only following consultation with the Attorney-General (section 106(2)); and the appointed members of the Judicial Services Commission itself are selected following consultation with the Attorney-General (section 104). A political officeholder, and a practising litigant before the courts on behalf of the State, thus sits at the gateway of every judicial appointment in Fiji.
- The Director of Public Prosecutions - whose independence from politics is the first condition of impartial criminal justice - is likewise appointed following consultation with the Attorney-General (section 117), as are the Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption (section 115).

- The Mercy Commission, which advises on the prerogative of mercy, is chaired by the Attorney-General (section 119).
- The Constitutional Offices Commission - which advises on the appointment of the Commander of the Republic of Fiji Military Forces (section 131(4)), the Commissioner of Police, the Supervisor of Elections, and other key constitutional offices - is chaired by the Prime Minister, includes the Attorney-General as a permanent member, and is structured so that appointees of the government of the day form a majority (section 132). The offices meant to check the executive are appointed by a body the executive controls.
- Beyond the Constitution, ordinary legislation compounded the problem: for a decade, the Attorney-General also served as the Minister responsible for elections and the electoral machinery - placing the referee's whistle in the hand of a player on the field.

No democracy can remain healthy when the judiciary, the prosecution service, the anti-corruption commission, the military command, the police, and the electoral machinery all pass through the hands of the same two officeholders. Whatever the intentions of any particular government, the architecture itself is an invitation to abuse - and Fiji's recent history records that the invitation was accepted.

The Province of Lau recommends that the Commission:

- Remove the Attorney-General entirely from the processes of appointing judges, the Director of Public Prosecutions, the FICAC Commissioner, and the members of the Judicial Services Commission. The Attorney-General is the government's chief legal adviser and its principal litigant; that office must have no role in choosing the judges and prosecutors before whom the State appears.
- Reconstitute the Constitutional Offices Commission with a balanced membership - including genuinely independent members and equal representation of government and opposition - so that no government of the day commands a majority over the appointment of the offices designed to hold it to account.
- Provide that the Mercy Commission be chaired by an independent person of judicial standing, not by a serving member of Cabinet.
- Entrench in the Constitution the principle that responsibility for the administration of elections must rest with an independent Electoral Commission answerable to Parliament, and may never be assigned to a minister who is a candidate or partisan in those elections.
- Adopt as a general drafting principle for the revised Constitution that no single officeholder may combine political office with gatekeeping authority over judicial, prosecutorial, electoral, or integrity institutions.

SUBMISSION 11

Institutional Integrity: Reform of FICAC and Anti-Corruption Bodies

The Province of Lau calls for meaningful reform of the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption (FICAC) to ensure it operates as a truly independent, effective, and procedurally fair institution.

Anti-corruption bodies derive their legitimacy - and their effectiveness - from their independence. An institution whose leadership is appointed following consultation with a member of the executive, and which combines within itself the powers to investigate, to charge, and to prosecute, concentrates precisely the kind of unchecked authority that anti-corruption institutions exist to prevent. The events of recent years surrounding FICAC have demonstrated, painfully and publicly, the consequences of this flawed design.

The Province of Lau submits that the surest safeguard is the separation of the investigative and prosecutorial functions. This is the settled practice of the most respected anti-corruption frameworks in the world. In New South Wales, the Independent Commission Against Corruption investigates and reports, but has no power to prosecute; briefs of evidence are referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who decides independently whether charges should be laid. In Hong Kong, whose ICAC served as the very model for Fiji's commission, no prosecution may be commenced by the ICAC except with the consent of a separate prosecuting authority, the Department of Justice. In Singapore, the Corrupt Practices Investigation Bureau investigates, but decisions to prosecute rest with the Public Prosecutor. In Botswana, the Directorate on Corruption and Economic Crime likewise refers its cases to the Directorate of Public Prosecutions. The lesson of these jurisdictions is uniform: the body that investigates should not be the body that decides who stands trial.

The Province of Lau recommends that:

- FICAC be confined to investigative functions only. Its prosecutorial powers should be removed, and all decisions to charge and prosecute corruption offences should rest exclusively with the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, whose constitutional independence must itself be strengthened as set out in Submission 10.
- The FICAC Act be comprehensively reviewed and reformed to remove any line of accountability from FICAC to the Attorney-General or any other member of the executive branch.
- FICAC be made directly accountable to Parliament, reporting to a dedicated parliamentary committee in a manner that ensures transparency while preserving operational independence.

- The Commissioner of FICAC be a person of the highest legal standing - equivalent in standing and qualifications to a Judge of the High Court - with extensive experience in the law, public administration, or anti-corruption practice.
- The appointment of the Commissioner be made through an independent, merit-based, and publicly accountable process, free from executive involvement or consultation.

SUBMISSION 12

The Rights of Children and the Recognition of Lawful Parental and School Discipline

The Province of Lau affirms, as its first and governing principle, that the rights, dignity, safety, and wellbeing of children are paramount. Nothing in this submission seeks to diminish the constitutional protection of children from abuse, neglect, violence, or exploitation. Those protections must remain absolute, fully intact, and vigorously enforced.

Within that framework, the Province of Lau submits that the Constitution and the law should recognise the legitimate role of parents, guardians, and teachers in the disciplinary formation of children. Fijian families, schools, churches, and communities have long understood that measured disciplinary correction - administered with restraint, with love, and strictly for the purpose of guidance and formation - is an act of care and of duty. It is the means by which respect, responsibility, and moral character have been passed from one generation to the next. The concern of our communities is that the law, as it presently stands, has left parents and teachers uncertain of their lawful authority to discipline at all, and that this uncertainty has contributed to a weakening of respect and moral formation among young people.

The Province of Lau does not advocate, and expressly rejects, any blanket or unrestrained licence for physical punishment. What we seek is narrow, defined, and disciplined: legal recognition of reasonable and proportionate correction, confined strictly to disciplinary purposes, and hedged with clear statutory safeguards.

The Province of Lau recommends that:

- Section 41 of the 2013 Constitution be reviewed to recognise the right and responsibility of parents, guardians, and teachers to administer reasonable and proportionate discipline to children in their care, strictly and exclusively for disciplinary and formative purposes.
- Any such recognition be given effect through a clear statutory code that defines the strict limits of permissible correction; that prohibits absolutely any correction administered in anger, or that causes injury, or that humiliates or degrades a child; and that draws an unmistakable legal line between lawful discipline and abuse, with meaningful accountability wherever that line is crossed.

- The constitutional rights of children to protection from abuse, neglect, violence, and exploitation remain fully intact and enforceable, and be strengthened wherever necessary.
- The framing of any reform in this area be developed with careful regard to Fiji's international obligations, including under the Convention on the Rights of the Child, so that Fiji's position is principled, defensible, and clearly understood as a framework of responsible discipline - never of harm.

Customary Law, Village By-Laws, and the Rights and Responsibilities Framework

The Province of Lau submits that the recognition and restoration of customary law within Fiji's constitutional framework is both necessary and achievable, provided it is grounded in the right philosophical and legal foundation. That foundation is the framework of Rights and Responsibilities.

The iTaukei worldview has always understood rights and responsibilities as inseparable. The Vanua is not merely a set of entitlements - it is a living covenant of mutual obligation between people, chiefs, land, and God. A constitutional framework that speaks the language of rights and responsibilities therefore resonates authentically with customary tradition, rather than imposing a foreign construct upon it. This framing also provides a universally recognised and defensible basis for reintegrating customary law into the modern legal order.

Within this framework, the Province of Lau further calls for the restoration of the legal standing of village governance, including village by-laws. The capacity of villages to order their communal life - through the traditional authority of the Turaga ni Koro, the village council, and the Vanua - was progressively eroded under the previous government, and proposals to give village by-laws proper legal recognition were shelved and abandoned. The result is a vacuum of lawful authority at the very level of society where Fijian community life is actually lived. Village communities should once again be empowered to make and enforce by-laws for the good order, cleanliness, safety, and harmony of village life, under a clear statutory framework such as the iTaukei Affairs Act.

The Province of Lau is equally mindful - and states plainly - that restored customary authority must operate within the Constitution, never alongside or above it. Village by-laws and customary mechanisms must be consistent with the Bill of Rights; they must not be capable of imposing punishments, restricting freedom of movement, conscience, or worship, or discriminating against any person in a manner the Constitution forbids; and any person affected by their application must retain full recourse to the courts. Recognition on these terms strengthens both the Vanua and the Constitution; recognition without these safeguards would ultimately discredit the very customary institutions it seeks to restore.

Equally, any restoration of customary law must be accompanied by an explicit and sincere commitment to gender equity. Customary arrangements that have historically excluded women - from land rights, chiefly deliberations, and community decision-making - must be reviewed and reformed as part of this process. This is not merely a matter of meeting Fiji's international obligations under CEDAW or the Constitution's equality provisions; it is a matter of internal justice. A restored customary framework that fails to honour the full standing of women will not endure, and will rightly attract significant opposition from women's communities, civil society, and regional bodies.

The Province of Lau therefore recommends that the Review Commission:

- Adopt a Rights and Responsibilities framework as the operative constitutional lens through which customary law is recognised, interpreted, and given effect - anchoring it within both the iTaukei worldview and the universally accepted language of modern constitutionalism.
- Restore legal recognition to village governance and village by-laws under a clear statutory framework, expressly subject to the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, with full rights of appeal and review preserved to the courts.
- Require that any restoration of customary law be accompanied by explicit provisions ensuring the full and equal inclusion of women in customary rights, land entitlements, and community governance structures.
- Engage the Great Council of Chiefs, women's representatives, provincial councils, and communities in a structured consultative process to identify precisely which customary mechanisms require adjustment before constitutional recognition is conferred.
- Ensure that the reintegration of customary law does not create a parallel system operating beyond constitutional scrutiny, but rather a complementary system consistent with the fundamental rights of all citizens of Fiji.

Restoration of the Senate and Upper House of Parliament

The Province of Lau calls for the restoration of a bicameral Parliament through the re-establishment of a Senate, or Upper House, as existed under both the 1970 Independence Constitution and the 1997 Constitution.

The abolition of the Senate under the 2013 Constitution removed a vital constitutional safeguard. The Senate served as a deliberative chamber of review - a body capable of tempering the excesses of simple majority rule, protecting the rights of minorities and the Vanua, and ensuring that legislation passed by the Lower House received the scrutiny it deserved before becoming law. Its absence has left a structural gap in Fiji's parliamentary architecture that has been felt ever since.

The Province of Lau recommends that the restored Senate be constituted to reflect a genuine balance of institutional authority, customary legitimacy, and democratic accountability. Its composition should include nominees drawn from three sources:

- The Great Council of Chiefs - as the constitutional guardian of the Vanua and the indigenous rights of the iTaukei people, the GCC should nominate Senators whose role is to ensure that the interests of the Vanua are protected and that no legislation is passed that undermines customary rights without the informed consent of the chiefly institutions.
- The Prime Minister's Office - the Government of the day should retain the ability to nominate Senators who bring expertise, experience, and policy continuity to the Upper House, ensuring the Senate remains connected to the elected executive arm of government.
- The Leader of the Opposition - to give the Senate genuine cross-party legitimacy, the Leader of the Opposition should nominate Senators who represent the views of those not in government. This ensures the Upper House functions as an independent chamber of review rather than a rubber stamp for the ruling party.

The Province of Lau believes that this tripartite composition - Vanua, Government, and Opposition - reflects the same constitutional wisdom that guided the architects of the 1970 and 1997 constitutions. It creates a Senate capable of acting as a genuine constitutional check, rather than a body captured by any single political or institutional interest. The restoration of this chamber is not a step backward - it is a return to the proven structural integrity that underpinned Fiji's most stable constitutional arrangements.

CONCLUSION

The Province of Lau presents these submissions with humility, with conviction, and with deep love for Fiji. We do so in the tradition of our forebears - chiefs and people who, in this very island chain, made decisions of historic consequence with wisdom, courage, and faith.

The constitutional review now underway is an opportunity of generational significance. It is nothing less than the chance to set the foundations of our nation right again - to restore the moral compass by which Fiji has always found its way, and to lay a constitutional foundation for genuine inclusivity, enduring unity, and shared prosperity. Fiji has the opportunity to craft a foundational document that is truly of, by, and for all its people - one that honours the covenant of 1874, reflects the spiritual inheritance of 1835, affirms the independence gained in 1970, and charts a future worthy of this blessed land.

We urge the Commission to listen not only to the voices of the cities and the parliament buildings, but to the voices of the provinces, the villages, the churches, and the Vanua. It is there, in the quiet places of this archipelago, that the truest heart of Fiji beats.

APPENDIX: PROPOSED PREAMBLE TO THE REVISED CONSTITUTION OF FIJI

The Province of Lau offers the following as a proposed Preamble to the revised Constitution of Fiji. It is submitted in the spirit of contribution, not prescription. The Commission and the people of Fiji must ultimately author their own founding words. But we offer these words as an expression of what we believe lies at the heart of this nation - its history, its faith, its diversity, and its aspirations.

WE, THE PEOPLE OF FIJI -

GATHERED on these islands of the South Pacific, shaped by wind and sea and ancient ancestry, bound together by the providence of God and the passage of history;

ACKNOWLEDGING that the indigenous iTaukei people and the people of Rotuma are the indigenous owners of this land and sea, that their connection to the Vanua is sacred, ancestral, and beyond price, and that any constitutional order worthy of this nation must honour that truth;

HONOURING the covenant made in 1874, when the paramount chiefs of Fiji, in an act of sovereign wisdom, placed these islands under the protection of the British Crown - a covenant whose obligations of honour endure, and whose spirit this Constitution is bound to uphold;

GIVING thanks for the acceptance of Christianity by our forebears, beginning at Lakeba in 1835, when the paramount chiefs of Fiji welcomed the Gospel to these shores, and recognising the transforming influence of the Christian faith on the life, values, and identity of this nation;

AFFIRMING that Fiji is, and shall remain, a nation whose foundations are Christian, while honouring the right of every citizen - of every faith and of none - to follow the path of their own conscience freely and without fear;

WELCOMING all communities of Fiji - iTaukei, Indo-Fijian, Rotuman, Part-European, Chinese, and all others who have made these islands their home - as equal participants in this nation's story, each with a distinct heritage to be honoured, and a shared future to be built together;

REMEMBERING that the independence achieved in 1970 was the fruit of unity, of inter-communal trust, and of the vision of leaders who placed Fiji above faction - and that every generation of this nation must nurture and defend that unity;

COMMITTED to a constitutional order that balances rights with responsibilities - recognising that no right exists without its corresponding duty, that the freedom of each citizen is made possible by the faithfulness of all, and that the well-being of the community can never be separated from the dignity of the individual;

RESOLVED that the institutions of this State - the Parliament, the Presidency, the Judiciary, the Great Council of Chiefs, and all who hold public office - shall serve the people of Fiji and not themselves, and shall be accountable to this Constitution above all other authority;

DETERMINED to protect the most vulnerable among us - the poor, the young, the elderly, those who dwell on the outer islands and in the remote valleys, and all whose voices have too often gone unheard in the halls of power;

ASPIRING to hand to our children and their children a Fiji more just, more prosperous, more united, and more true to itself than the one we have inherited - a Fiji at peace within itself and at ease among the nations of the world;

DO HEREBY ADOPT AND GIVE TO OURSELVES THIS CONSTITUTION, as the supreme law of our land and the living expression of our will as one people - many peoples, one nation, one Fiji.
